The books were finally completed and presented to the King and Queen respectively. Also we gave the King lessons in the translation of his books into the Malay language which were exceedingly appreciated.

The King and Queen accepted the Bahá'í Cause and made a vow to promulgate it in all the provinces of the Celebes Islands as soon as they should receive confirmation for this missionary effort.

Thus having raised the standard of Ya Bahá El Abhá, we made our preparations to return. With great sorrow at our departure, the King and Queen had all necessary preparations made for our voyage. The atmosphere was very melancholy when we went to bid adieu to their Royal Highnesses.

“Religion is divine education . . . Divine education is the sum total of all development. It is the safeguard of humanity. The world of nature is a world of defects and incompleteness. The world of the Kingdom is reached by the highway of religion and is the heaven of all divine virtues.”

A SERVANT OF GOD

CORALIE FRANKLIN COOK

"In Thee shall all families of the earth be blessed."—Book of Genesis.

"Let not a man glory in this—that he loves his country. Let him rather glory in this: that he loves his kind (humanity)."—Bahá'u'lláh.

"This is worship: to serve mankind and to minister to the needs of the people. Service is prayer."—Abdul-Bahá.

NOT since the death of "Father Abraham" (Abraham Lincoln) have the "Twilight Millions" of America mourned for any fellow being as they mourn, today, the "passing" of Julius Rosenwald. At the Nation's Capital a great memorial mass meeting has been called where two speakers—one the president of the most noted Institution in the world devoted to the education of darker peoples, the other a Jewish Rabbi of learning and power—are expected to tell of the life and services of one of the most Christian Hebrews the world has ever known since Jesus of Nazareth went about serving mankind.

It was not for black people only that Mr. Rosenwald gave away millions of dollars. "His goodness followed his horizon's rim," and mankind without regard to race, creed or color have learned the measure of his bounty.

Again and again the struggling, pitifully inadequate schools of the South, presided over by incompetent teachers (men and women with the barest rudiments of an education), have been transformed into modern buildings manned by trained and often gifted teachers, until now the Rosenwald rural schools are numbered by the hundreds and their pupils by the hundreds of thousands. Ever open-handed to Jewish institutions, Christian organizations have also had his generous support.

JULIUS ROSENWALD

August 18, 1862—January 6, 1932

The tender heart of the great philanthropist yearned over the homeless, the wounded and orphaned left in the wake of the World War and his millions went into the work of European rehabilitation.

The story of the amassing of the Rosenwald fortune reads like some fairy tale. But who shall say it is not a fulfillment of prophecy? Of the "Seed of Abraham" it seems literally true that thru this one man's bounty "all families of the earth" have been "blessed."

All educators and social workers know of "The Rosenwald Fund," a sum set apart for systematized philanthropy. Speaking of this amazing gift Mr. Rosenwald himself said, "Benevolence today has become altogether too huge an undertaking to be conducted other than on business lines." So it follows that this vast wealth is distributed on a business basis and, true to his convictions, since so fine a portion of it has been expended for colored citizens, one of the busiest and perhaps one of the most sagacious of the men employed to guard its interests is a gentleman of color.

Convinced that vast sums of money should not be piled up for selfish use, it was the Rosenwald way to give out as well as to take in. His hundreds of employees shared in his profits over and above their stipulated pay.

One's faith in humanity, even in times like the present, cannot be wholly lost while the memory of this man is alive. And, is he not already among the immortals? The writer recalls him as she last saw him in a meeting in Washington, where a few of the great, and many of the good, had met to thresh out various industrial and social problems. His world-wide fame might well have secured for him repeated homage and ovation but he would have none of it. Gentle but alert, silent but keenly interested, he never lost his modest demeanor and his very clerks were more in evidence than the man himself.

It has often been a matter of comment that the State of Illinois has the honor of being the birthplace of both Lincoln and Rosenwald—the one who struck from the slave his physical bondage, and the other who has wrought so mightily to loosen his bondage of ignorance.

It was June, 1930 that witnessed the completion of the five thousandth Rosenwald school—the first such school was by that time seventeen years old. It had been a modest affair built of frame and having one room. With appealing consistency it was located not far from Tuskegee, in Alabama. However, the heartening thing about it was the way in which the less than one thousand dollars of its cost was secured. The colored people themselves purchased the ground ($150.00), they also contributed labor appraised at $132.50, local white citizens donated $350.00 and the Rosenwald Fund, $300.00. Thus it will be seen with what unerring wisdom this work was planned in the very beginning. No one can estimate the value to the poor colored people themselves of giving the land and contributing their labor to this enterprise, nor to the white people of the community who responded so generously with their quota of the cost.

But we had started to tell of the five thousandth school—mark the progress! "History repeats itself" and it, like the first, is near a great institution—beautiful and internationally known Hampton, in Virginia. This school employs six teachers, accommodates three hundred pupils; it is built of brick, and to make practical the teaching of farming and trades is surrounded by three acres of ground. To a school of this type the fund contributes twenty-six hundred dollars. In this particular instance the colored people raised a thousand dollars and the balance was appropriated from public funds, making a total of twenty thousand dollars.

Has not Julius Rosenwald wrought mightily for his fellowmen? In deed and in truth may it not be said that his "service is a prayer?"

One of the many things standing in the way of the colored man's progress has been excessive death rate. Stoutly it is asserted that "figures do not lie," and just as positively may come the rejoinder, "But they can be awfully misleading." Fact-finding Conferences have proven that poorly paid labor, bad housing, lack of proper food in health and of medical care in sickness, contribute in larger measure to the appalling death rate among colored folk than the pigment underlying the skin contributes to it.

Significant and material figures have been collected in mortality statistics since the Trustees of the Fund have made large appropriations to hospitals, established clinics, contributed to the support of county nurses who give pre-natal and post-natal care to mothers in outlying districts, and follow up the health record of every child of school age in a given area. In almost every instance this county work is finally taken over by county authorities and supported by public money. Nothing finer in human relationships and sane cooperation for the good of all the people has been brought to light than the way in which doctors and nurses comprising the staff of white hospitals in large cities such as Chicago, Ill., and New Orleans, La. have lent their experience and training to further this health work among colored people. Nor need it be assumed that this timely service is given solely for the protection of the white people who can not escape the menace of leaving one-tenth of our population to fight at fearful odds with death and disease. In many instances the scientist becomes so absorbed in the professional aspect of his work that race and color are lost sight of and over some patient saved from the ravages of tuberculosis or some working mother wrested from the death toll of child-birth, black and white look into each others faces and know that we are all "leaves of one branch, fruit of one tree."

It were a pleasant task further to record what munificent sums this Fund has expended upon child study and upon social studies, to recount how scholarships and fellowships have been awarded for advanced study at home and abroad and their many gratifying results, but time will not permit. Let us not fail to remember, however, that the Rosenwald Fund, working in conjunction with other well known benefactions—like the Rockefeller, the Phelps-Stokes, the Jeanes, etc.—all have brought to bear such powerful material and spiritual forces upon what once seemed to be a hopeless problem as to evoke accomplishment where defeat threatened and enable a disheartened and oppressed people to make a progress during a period of some six decades such as no similarly disadvantaged group ever attained save thru a period of centuries.

Was Rosenwald a servant of God? Has God used him mightily to establish His kingdom on earth? It is easy to believe that He has, since so nobly he followed One whose blessed utterance was, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye have done it unto Me," and put into his life's practice the precepts of that Other Whose messages from 'Akka's Prison-house enlighten the world.

SEEKING AND FINDING

BY ONE WHO HAS "SOUGHT" AND "FOUND"

Chapter II

"I am summoning you to the world of the Kingdom."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

IN the first chapter we suggested (indirectly) the dawning light of cosmic consciousness as I journeyed onward in search of Truth, the fiery urge of longing to find God, and the joy in discovering the Divine Harbor.

Some details of those months when my soul was approaching the object of its search, the goal of its longing, may suggest the oneness of experience that comes to souls on the highway toward the kingdom, for many, no doubt, will recall parallel experiences in their own "Great Adventure."

For some time previous to hearing the glad-tidings of the coming of the World Educator, Baha'u'llah, thrilling and priceless experiences were continually realized. One or two of these will suffice. At one time a pure white dove seemed to be hovering over my head. Such a definite and normal consciousness was this and so joyous an experience, that I shared it with a choice friend, a revered Episcopal Rector, who was a man of rare spiritual quality.

To him was confided the conviction that when this dove did finally alight it would bring "A new heaven and a new earth" not alone to me, but to all the world. His understanding heart was not critical or unresponsive as he knew that my daily life of practical service was being joyously lived often from early morn until after midnight, and he said that this experience was not born out of the vain imaginings of a neurotic, nor was it the expression of a nervous recluse. I greatly appreciated his counsel, and he confirmed me in the continuance of a deep study of the New Testament which had already extended thru several months.

Another experience occurred shortly after this incident, and took place about two weeks before the Bahá'i Message reached me. While praying at midnight outside my tent that was pitched by the shores of a tidal river, and standing under the starlit sky, a brilliant light appeared. So great was its brilliance that I thought it must be the search light from a Navy Yard near by.

Quickly I opened my eyes. There was no light! After waiting for some moments for its return, with no result my eyes again closed. The light came the second time with greater intensity. Three times this was repeated, and then came the consciousness that it was an inner and not an outer light. Facing (as it happened) the Eastern horizon the light grew into a broad highway and then it was as though a strong cable reached into the very center of my being and drew it toward that spot.

Throughout the entire night sleep fled from the eyes, but a sublime peace and inexpressible joy and great refreshment encompassed me. While so deep, so rare and enthralling an experience could never be fully transmitted to another, nor yet could it be contained in my own mind and heart alone, I decided to share it as best I could with another friend who possessed deep poetic and spiritual insight.

His interpretation was as follows: "Light and illumination have come from the East. The sun rises in the East. The prophets of God have always appeared in the East. The mystics refer to the spiritual center in man as the eastern part of his being. Undoubtedly God has further revelation of Truth for you." This explanation satisfied. As a result it brought an added expectancy and, no doubt, a greater degree of openness.

Two WEEKS later at an informal Fourth of July celebration in the country, when singing the Battle Hymn of the Republic, as these words were reached, "In the beauty of the lillies Christ was born across the sea," such a surging wave of nearness to Christ came, and a warmth of love for Him so welled up in my heart that it caused tears to flow from my eyes as water gushes from a mountain stream. They could not be restrained. (Fortunately I was so situated that no one saw me). The ecstasy and rapture of love of the Divine Beloved One encompassed every part of my being.

Little wonder then that a few hours later when listening to the glad tidings of the "return" of the Light of Truth, there came to me the deep inner realization that the Bahá'í Message was that Light which "Lighteth everyone that cometh into the world" that the Sun of Truth had again arisen and had been illumining the path long before the consciousness of its Point of Dawning had come to me.

Some months later when writing a letter to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, clippings from current newspapers and magazines were enclosed that indicated the advancing effect upon the world, at that time, of the spiritual spring-time. I also made the statement that after once having heard 'The Message' I witnessed Its Signs on every hand, and that many were walking by the Light although they knew not from whence the Light had shone.

After first expressing to Him the joy and thankfulness for receiving the Message, there were several desires uppermost in my heart but I did not write them down. What was the significance of the dove, and the brilliant light? I wanted to mention the sense of increasing nearness to Christ, also to testify to a deeper realization of the meaning of His blessed promise, "My sheep will hear My Voice," as well as to state that I felt the oneness of the spirit of 'Abdu'l-Bahá with Christ and an increasing sense of great nearness to 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

His Tablet (letter) at the close of this chapter, brought the answers to my unwritten questions. Before there was time for a reply to my letter an American pilgrim returning from a visit to 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 'Akká told of a talk given by Him regarding the significance of the dove, and the part it had played in history. He spoke of the meaning of its descent upon the head of His Holiness Jesus Christ, and upon John the Baptist. Of Noah sending forth a dove from the Ark, its return, his sending it forth again and its return. His sending it forth the third time when it did not return, and "Noah was made glad for he knew that it had found rest for the sole of its foot." After a slight pause, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said I too am continually sending forth doves, and sometimes they come back. Then with a glorious smile that brought joy to all His listeners, he said and sometimes they do not come back, and I know they have found rest in the heart of a believer. The answer had come! It was complete and perfect even though the question had never been asked.

Upon receipt of the following Tablet from 'Abdu'l-Bahá it was as if all the questions written and unwritten were answered in such a way that the whole of life took on new meanings, and the "life more abundant" at once began.

"O thou Daughter of the Kingdom! Thy letter was received, thou hast written that the newspapers, and magazines, the orators from the platform and the ministers from the pulpit are delivering the glad tidings of the Day of God, they are encouraging and uplifting all the souls whether they be friends or strangers to spiritual matter and the progress of thought.

This is evident. For when the Sun of Truth appears and shines forth, and casts its rays upon the reality of things there is no doubt that whatever is hidden in the earth will find a new life and begin to grow. Ere long thou shalt see that the Divine Call has produced a wonderful effect among the nations and the people, the souls have become attracted to the Kingdom of God, and sublime thoughts and spiritual ideals permeate throughout.

Thank God that from thy childhood thou didst have great magnanimity and wonderful ambition, that is the reason that that light shone forth, the light was repeated and so the real vision became evident and manifest.

Thou didst meet His Honor Mr. _____ and heard through him the glad-Tidings of the Cause of God. I hope that thou mayest engage in the service of Truth, thou mayest progress day by day and deliver the glad-Tidings to the seeking souls.

Although in body thou art far yet in spirit thou art near, nay rather thou art my associate by day and by night."

This Tablet brought peace, an active, responsive peace. It was also a divine challenge for me to arise and serve the Cause of God. With the arrival of that Tablet I knew with an added certainty that the God that I had "Gone forth to find" had been found, and that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was summoning me—as well as all the people in the world—to the "World of the Kingdom!"

A SAMPLE OF DEVOTION AND FAITHFULNESS

A. SAMIMI

AMONG the living believers in Persia, whose lives are worth mentioning and whose devotion, pure love and attachment to the Cause of God may be taken as noteworthy examples for the believers, is Agha Mohammad Arbab Bahá'ian.

Jenabi Arbab comes from Kás-hán (Persia), a place which was noted for the narrow-mindedness and fanaticism of its inhabitants. His mother was a believer, too, and had received tablets (letters) from Bahá'u'lláh. Though born of a Bahá'í mother, Jenabi Arbab when quite a young boy, investigated the Cause thoroughly, then he accepted it most enthusiastically. This was at the time when Bahá'u'lláh had just declared His Manifestation in Baghdád ('Irâq).

While in Káshán Jenabi Arbab was subjected to all sorts of hardships and persecutions on the part of the Muhammadans. He was once attacked by a fanatical mob, his house was set on fire and all his belongings pillaged. Following these hardships, Jenabi Arbab could find no other alternative but to quit his home and emigrate to Tihrán. Thanks to his manly and praiseworthy efforts and perseverance, after settling down in the metropolis, he was successfully engaged in commercial pursuits for a period of fifty years. During all this time he was cleverly and tactfully giving the Message to the Mullahs, merchants and notables with whom he had dealings. Among these were two well-known Moslem ecclesiastics, Mulla Ali Kani and Haji Agha Mohammad Najm Abadi.

It may be worth mentioning here that in the early days of the Cause when there was no mail service in Persia, correspondence between the Holy Land and Persia as far as the believers were concerned was carried on through messengers called "Qasids," who traveled the long distance between Persia and Palestine on foot, taking petitions from the believers in Persia to His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdul-Bahá and bringing back with them answers. After the postal communications were established in Persia with other countries, Agha Ali Haidar of Shriván (Caucasus), who was a Bahá'i, was the first person to act as intermediary for dispatching letters to the Holy Land and getting

Jenabi Arbab was the second person to perform the duties of medium for correspondence with the Holy Land. His correspondent in Haifa (Palestine) was Jenabi Haji Mohammed Taqi Manshadi. Jenabi Arbab carried out this service most carefully and faithfully for a period of twenty years.*

We should particularly mention here that Jenabi Arbab had rendered notable services to the Cause after the passing away of Bahá'u'lláh and appointment of 'Abdul-Bahá as the Center of the Covenant of the Cause. He has about one hundred tablets or letters from Bahá'u'lláh, 'A b d u l - B a h á and Shoghi Effendi.

*This was indeed a most difficult and hard work to perform particularly when we consider the harsh attitude adopted by the old Turkish Empire and the Persian Government against the Cause. But still it was done most enthusiastically by the messengers. Also among these messengers were Mulla Mohammad Dehaji, Sheikh Salaman and Haji Mirza Haidar Ali.

The main feature of Arbab's life is his utmost sincerity and devotion as well as his real attachment to the Cause which he has so gallantly and fervently defended; also the perseverance and patience with which he has met all persecutions and troubles inflicted on him by the non-believers. Though now over ninety years of age, and therefore physically weak, he is continuing his services and tries by all means to serve the Cause. His untiring efforts to accomplish this sacred end may well be taken as a good example by other believers.

It may also be worth mentioning that Arbab had always, among his many services to the Cause, contributed generously to charitable funds. He has lately, though now of scanty resources, offered a contribution of one thousand tomans towards the fund which will be raised for the construction of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár in Tíhrán, and a sum of five hundred tomans to the fund which is now being raised for the construction of a big hall in the "Hazirat-ul-Quds" in Tíhrán. This sacrifice has been much appreciated by the Guardian of the Cause.

The body-politic may be likened to the human organism. As long as the various members and parts of that organism are coordinated and cooperating in harmony we have as a result the expression of life in its fullest degree. When these members lack coordination and harmony we have the reverse which in the human organism is disease, dissolution, death. Similarly, in the body-politic of humanity, dissension, discord and warfare are always destructive and inevitably fatal.

All created beings are dependent upon peace and coordination, for every contingent and phenomenal being is a composition of distinct elements. As long as there is affinity and cohesion among these constituent elements strength and life are manifest but when dissension and repulsion arise among them, disintegration follows. This is proof that peace and amity which God has willed for His children are the saving factors of human society whereas war and strife which violate His ordinances are the cause of death and destruction. Therefore God has sent His Prophets to announce the message of good-will, peace and life to the world of mankind.

“Unless the moral character of a nation is educated, as well as its brain and its talents, civilization has no sure basis. As Religion inculcates morality, it is therefore the truest philosophy, and on it is built the only lasting civilization.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE INTELLECT of man, conquering the earth through the power of science, had up to very recently seemed to assure to humanity a secure civilization. In those countries where scientific and technological progress had been most effective, prosperity was becoming so widespread as to indicate the early possibility of economic security, not only for nations but for every individual.

How much all this now seems a dream of the past! Today there is no security anywhere, either political or economic. As from instruments out of tune, there are only jangling notes of discord in the concert of nations. No one can tell how soon an Armageddon may break forth. As for economic security, it has as completely vanished as the snows of yesteryear.

Why is it that man, with his superb intellect, his amazing scientific discoveries, his powerful technological will that is able so to dominate nature, yet finds himself helpless today to support and maintain a stable civilization? The futility of man in the face of world-wide catastrophies is due not to the fault of his intellect, but to the fault of his emotions. Man's intellect has been steeled to be a ready and efficient instrument of his will; but his emotions, far from being so obedient, have managed always to gain the ascendancy. It is they that rule man, who is himself seeking to rule the universe. And since one can never prognosticate how the emotions of man may flare forth and for what goals, so no one can foresee, under the present system of culture, what man will do with the very civilization which his intellect has built up.

IT IS LIKE a child building a house of blocks. Creative power may go into the building; earnest purposeful activity, and even high intelligence. A structure finally emerges which is very pleasing. But now another child enters upon the scene. A quarrel ensues, and in the midst of violent emotions thereby aroused the house of blocks is knocked to pieces. The child intelligence is absolutely incapable of safe-guarding and maintaining its creations against this adverse, emotional, untamed violence.

In such a precarious situation as this now lies the great city of Shanghai, erected by western nations as an effective model of the most modern scientific civilization. Its magnificent hotels, its banks, its shops, its promenades and parks,—testify to the power, invention and constructive genius of modern technology. Yet in one moment, as it were, when emotions flare up this whole structure of modern science is endangered by the chances of war. Hundreds of millions invested here, and all the energy and effective constructive work of western nations, are faced with the utmost of insecurity. Thus do we see how emotions can jeopardize everything that the intellect can build. So elsewhere in the world: hatred, jealousies, distrust, unreasonable prejudices endanger at every moment the stability of modern civilization.

But it is not only the violent emotions which are ruining our modern civilization. There is also the persistent stealthy vice of greed, which, like an acid, can eat its way through all substance. Individual greed and national greed have succeeded in upsetting all the economic structure of humanity until now there is no security even to the rich. Nor does there appear to be any chance of betterment by way of man's intellect and will. No one sees clearly how to reconstruct the world. And no one has the power, even if the vision, to direct the emotions and will of all humanity to the extent of carrying out any needed reformation.

THERE IS ONLY one thing that can master man's emotions and dedicate them to a noble and permanent structure of civilization. That power is religion. It has proved its ability to do this in the past. It will prove its ability to do so again in the future. Religion has this power because it concerns itself directly with the emotional nature of man, reaching that first and through that purifying the will and bending the intellect to the service of high and unselfish goals. Through religion only can man's emotional aims become focused; and all his dispersive forces become rounded-up, tamed and subdued to useful purposes.

ANY ONE OF the great religions of the past and present—Judaism, Buddhism, Muhammadanism, Christianity—might, so far as their wealth of doctrine is concerned, teach humanity how to reconstruct itself at this critical epoch. Yet seemingly they fail to do so, not so much for want of spiritual truth as for want of vital, dynamic power. These religions have become rather the expression of human emotional nature than its master, such as they originally were.

Yet at this very time of the failure of human institutions, the failure even of religion to meet the world needs, there appears on the horizon a new Movement promising to accomplish all that is needed for humanity today. Not a new religion, but as 'Abdu'l-Bahá calls it, the renewal of religion. This Movement, with its magnificent institutions for a perfect world civilization as formulated by Bahá'u'lláh and given to the world, has in its doctrine and structure everything that the world needs both in general spiritual truth and in explicit plans. It provides for all the spiritual, political, economic and moral needs of man. More even than that, it demonstrates a power to inspire the heart of man to nobler living; a power to win implicit allegiance and to thus become a great unifying force for humanity.

We see the Bahá'í Movement gradually permeating the world, bringing together men and women of diverse races and religions and unifying them in a deep and fervent bond of love and unity. No possibility of dispersion under a wise and divinely appointed administrative design by Bahá'u'lláh.

Here is what the world has been waiting for. Here is its only means to security. There is no other way out. More and more as the dangers threaten, dangers growing out of man's emotional nature, will humanity be inclined to turn toward the comfort and protection of religion. And in thus turning to it will find in the Bahá'í Movement a mighty force gradually bending the nature of man into a growth harmonious with his divine station; and guaranteeing unity, happiness, prosperity, security to the world.

I*t is evident that a Power is needed to carry out and execute what is known and admitted to be the remedy for human conditions; namely, the unification of mankind. Furthermore, it is evident that this cannot be realized through material process and means. . . . It is evident that no means but an ideal means, a Spiritual Power, Divine Bestowals and the Breaths of the Holy Spirit will heal this world sickness of war, dissension and discord. Nothing else is possible, nothing can be conceived of. But through spiritual means and the Divine Power it is possible and feasible.*

“The people of religions find in the Teachings of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, the establishment of universal religion—a religion that perfectly conforms with present conditions, which in reality effects the immediate cure of the incurable disease, which relieves every pain, and bestows the infallible antidote for every deadly poison. . . .

“Today nothing but the Power of the Word of God which encompasses the realities of things can bring the thoughts, the minds, the hearts and the spirits under the shade of One Tree.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

IT IS ENOUGH

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

For thousands of years we have had bloodshed and strife. It is enough; it is sufficient. Now is the time to associate together in love and harmony.—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

CAN civilization stand up against another war? No—answers Mr. Esme Wingfield-Stratford in his recently published book, "They that Take the Sword." "We are approaching," he says, "if we have not already reached the stage at which another attack will prove fatal, certainly to civilization, as we know it, and conceivably, in the long run, to human life on this plant."

Are we doomed to another war? Yes—"unless we can use this last chance afforded us of purging the disease of war from our social system. It is not enough to frame laws and treaties, leagues and covenants, indispensable though these things may be. War is a spirit, and it is only by a change of spirit that we can hope to master it."

This is the fundamental idea underlying Mr. Wingfield-Stratford's book. The crying need in the world today is a change in the spirit of man. This change of spirit must be born in the hearts of individuals and spread from soul to soul until a new world is built up which we may call the Kingdom of Heaven on earth.

As we read we are convinced of the earnestness of the author who has spared no pains to support his thesis that "those who take the sword shall perish by the sword" with unanswerable facts from history. Not only the history of the Western World and Asiatic countries has passed under his scrutiny, but the records of ancient and ex-ting peoples and civilizations have been called on for their testimony. The long peaceful civilization of the Nile Valley, the comparatively short splendor and luxury of the warring Assyrian Empires, the high culture of the Incas, are only a few of the civilizations that bear witness that the path of the sword is the path of death. History shows, he believes, that war has been not only a destroyer of civilization but, in many cases, has prevented a real culture from growing up. War is a "soul destroying habit." In such completely militarized communities as, for example, Assyria, Sparta, Prussia, "war and the preparation for war have absorbed so much of human energy as to leave nothing over for anything worthy the name of culture or creative genius."

The author calls not only history to his aid but psychology, science, philosophy, ethics, religion. He seems to show an indomitable determination to get at the root of this matter of war which threatens to bring the world to its ruin. But no trouble is too great to take if the author can succeed in his all-important task of giving people an opportunity to see for themselves the inevitable and overwhelming consequences of war. The book deserves wide reading. We hope it will be added to school and college libraries.

We feel so fully in sympathy with the spirit of this book that we believe we can do no better than to select here and there statements and conclusions of the author and reinforce them with the words of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, those great modern Prophets Who foresaw so clearly the problems that face us today and also gave us the solution of these problems.

In His talks in America and Europe and His letters to both East and West we find 'Abdu'l-Bahá again and again emphasizing this fundamental truth of the final destructiveness of war. On one occasion He stated it thus:

“Peace is the foundation of God; war is a satanic institution. Peace is the illumination of the world of humanity; war is the destroyer of human foundations. When we consider outcomes in the world of existence we find that peace and fellowship are factors of upbuilding and betterment whereas war and strife are the causes of destruction and disintegration.”

The author does not spare his reader's feelings in setting out the horrible atrocities that so-called human beings perpetrate when they not merely give rein to but deliberately cultivate this lower, animal side of their nature.

On this same subject 'Abdu'l-Bahá speaks with great force: “God has created man noble. God has created man a dominant factor in creation. He has specialized man with particular bestowals; He has conferred upon him mind; He has given him perception. . . . With all His good gifts to man, which were to make him the manifestation of virtues, . . . which were to make him an agency of constructiveness, shall we now destroy this great edifice of God? When we are not captives of nature, when we can control ourselves, shall we allow ourselves to be captives of nature and act in accordance with the exigencies of nature?”

In the chapter on “Conflict and Love” an important principle is developed. The law of attraction or love is basic to every thing constructive in the natural world. Acting under varying conditions it is known as cohesion, gravitation, crystallization or something else, but under whatever name, it is the great unifying, constructive force throughout the universe. Its absence means separation, destruction, death. In the higher kingdoms it is called love and in man it may become extremely noble. But there are limited loves and these may make for conflict. For example the love of self may cause conflict with one's neighbor; the love and adoration of one's race may lead one to despise those of another race; patriotism, a limited love, may end in hatred for the country and people that are not ours. Patriotism is, Mr. Wingfield-Stratford says, “the result of a low and inadequate idea of love. . . . The wider love does not contradict the narrower. Patriotism can only attain its full stature in sympathy with other patriotisms, and united with them in the patriotism of mankind.”

This limited love, the author believes, is characteristic of very primitive states of society. But “even among peoples otherwise in the fore-front of civilization, this stunted mentality that holds up love at frontiers is only too widely prevalent. It was world wide in the years preceding the Great War, in which it culminated.” “We look” he adds later, “for the coming of a kingdom, a kingdom within us, and binding us ultimately together in one all-embracing unity, the effect of which will be not to annihilate, but to fulfill and perfect every lesser love."

In one of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's talks He speaks of these narrow loves as limited unities. No great results can come from such limited unities. But He says, "The unity which is productive of unlimited results is first a unity of mankind which recognizes that all are sheltered beneath the overshadowing glory of the All-Glorious. . . . This is the most great unity, and its results are lasting if humanity adheres to it."

Can mankind rise to this unlimited love or unity? Where do we find it in the world today? Not in the church, Mr. Wingfield-Stratford thinks. In the chapters, "The Rise and Fall of the Kingdom of Heaven" and "International Anarchy," the author traces the early Jewish history and the history of Christianity, the great hope of the world. For three centuries Christ's followers refused to take the sword, but finally yielded when the church allied itself with Rome under Constantine. Then the "de-spiritualization" of the church began and "could not be stopped." So the author finds, "By the time the age, known as that of the Religious Wars had drawn to a close, the de-spiritualization of religion was almost complete, and national egotism flourished unrestrained." The vision of an unlimited unity had faded, a limited national unity had taken its place.

But the world is not without hope. The unifying spirit of Christ and the vision that this spirit will finally prevail in a Kingdom of Heaven on earth has always been kept alive by a few individuals and groups. Even the Great War, the "Tragedy of Errors," whose appalling waste and destruction and unjust peace have brought us to the brink of still greater catastrophe, does not deprive us of all hope. There are unifying forces at work; the League of Nations still stands, inadequate though it be, based on "the Covenant embodying the most hopeful attempt ever made to lay the foundation of a world union and a world peace."

Our hope is in the spiritual nature of man, for despite his inhumanity to man he is "in fact the noblest of God's creatures." Because "man aspires to be Godlike" "a time comes, in the experience of most civilized communities, when spiritual mindedness takes the form of a violent revulsion against the animal in Man, a proud resolve to break the bonds of sensual desire and trample the old Adam under foot."

"It would seem that the time is ripe for the birth of a new world order, like that of early Christianity, not hostile to, but apart from, the existing state systems," writes the author in almost prophetic words. "Such a world order as we envisage would have the effect of providing the League of Nations with a soul. . . . It is unobtrusively, but surely, cultivating a habit of peace and co-operation, and providing the machinery through which this habit can function. But there is something lacking, something that the early Christianity possessed, and without which it would never have proved stronger than Rome."

Further he says: "This, then, is the answer we would give to the question—what must be done if civilization is to be saved? Nothing less will suffice than a spiritual revolution that will enable Man to adjust his own life to the already revolutionary change in his environment. Mankind must organize itself spiritually, in order that civilization may live and not die. And since civilization is world wide, so must that organization be world wide."

To Mr. Wingfield-Stratford and to other souls of such courage and insight as his, of such faith in the true spirit and destiny of mankind let us give again the glad-tidings that a new world order has already been born, its foundations are laid on a spiritual basis. This new world order is based on the teaching of Bahá'u'lláh, Who, in the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "has dawned from the horizon of the Orient flooding all regions with the light and life which will never pass away. His teachings which embody the divine spirit of the age and are applicable to this period of maturity in the life of the human world are: The oneness of the world of humanity; the protection and guidance of the Holy Spirit; The foundation of all religions is one; Religion must be the cause of unity; Religion must accord with science and reason; Independent investigation of truth; Equality between men and women; The abandonment of prejudice; Universal peace; Universal education; A universal language; Solution of the economic problem; An international tribunal and many other fundamental teachings.

"Every one who truly seeks and justly reflects will admit that the teachings of the present day emanating from mere human sources and authority are the cause of difficulty and disagreement amongst mankind, whereas the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are the very healing of the sick world, the remedy for every need and condition. In them may be found the realization of every desire and aspiration, the cause of the happiness of the world of humanity, the stimulation of mentality, the impulse for advance and uplift, the basis of unity for all nations, . . . the means of love and harmony, the one bond which will unite the East and the West."

This world order though limited in numbers is firmly founded and quietly growing. Born in Persia amid persecutions and martyrdoms less than a century ago, it is already established in five continents. It grew out of a love so divine that no sacrifice was too great for its Founders to welcome. The Báb, while still a young man, died a martyr's death; Bahá'u'lláh for forty years was a prisoner and exile; 'Abdu'l-Bahá knew not freedom from the tender age of nine until He was over sixty. This love was so contagious that in Persia thousands sacrificed their lives rather than deny their allegiance to the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh. This love was so creative that tens and hundreds of thousands of Jews, Christians, Muhammadans and others have laid aside their racial and religious differences and have united in one firm brotherhood whose aim is universal peace and justice, whose organization is built on lines of service, humility, consultation, cooperation and unity.

This is the love which is the basis of the unity of mankind "which will bring forth marvelous results. It will reconcile all religions, make warring nations loving, cause hostile kings to become friendly and bring peace and happiness to the human world."

Is not this the glad tidings for which the troubled world is looking and waiting?

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?

ROSA V. WINTERBURN

*Mrs. Winterburn has been a frequent contributor to our columns in the past. A graduate with M. A. degree from the University of Michigan, she now is a teacher of sociology, also author of books on English.

THE storms and the darkness predicted by Abdul-Bahá are upon the world. The "Friends of God" are the watchmen of this night. Watchmen, what of the night? Are our feet firm in the Cause of God "with such firmness as can not be shaken by the most great disasters of this world?" Are we "signs of guidance," "strengthened by the Holy Spirit, attracted towards God," so that we and all the world "may attain to the greatest gift in this great century and New Age?"

Warnings concerning this age are innumerable in the Bahá'í teachings. "Know, verily, that the tests are waving like unto seas in these times. They come like unto the storms of wind which engulf the great ships and uproot the great trees, the roots of which are extended and the branches prolonged, which have become old through centuries and ages."

"My counsel to you is to be firm in the Cause and love one another." "All other lights will be extinguished and your lamps lighted; all other stars will set and your stars shine in the horizon of the world; all other standards will be lowered and your flags wave in victory; all other foundations will be destroyed and your names will stand forever in the Cause of God. Thus will it be, if love, steadfastness, and union are found among you."

We are fully informed as to the need and reasons for these tests. "Were it not for tests the courageous could not be known from the coward. Were it not for tests the people of faithfulness could not be known from those of selfishness. Were it not for tests the intellects and faculties of the scholars in the great colleges would not be developed. Were it not for tests the sparkling gems could not be known from worthless pebbles. Were it not for tests the fishermen could not be distinguished from Annas and Caiaphas who were amid glory (worldly dignity). Were it not for tests the face of Mary Magdalene would not glisten with the light of firmness and certainty unto all the horizons.

"These are some of the mysteries of tests which We have unfolded unto thee that thou may thus become cognizant of the mysteries of God in every cycle. Verily, I pray God to illumine the faces (through trials) as pure gold in the fire of test."

THE WORLD today is in the grip of stormy disasters. Materiality in all its magnetic, insidious forms has swept over mankind, luring him to the search for wealth and to revelling in it when acquired. Yearly thousands of men sacrifice their souls to this material greed. Where materiality flourishes, spirituality dwindles. Yet the only lasting cure is that spiritual power shall so grow that materiality has no room to root deeply in human life. All of our necessary, convenient, and luxurious material accessories are nothing but tools which may assist in the progress of man's civilization; they are not his civilization. Lasting civilization is dependent upon the development and active use of the spiritual forces in man. Unchecked materiality brings about greed, dishonesty, corruption, hate, war; it lets loose the destructive forces. Active spirituality develops honesty, justice, sympathy, love, peace; it sets in motion the constructive forces.

Our Great Physician has told us that the world is sick; that mankind is afflicted with dangerous maladies. He has diagnosed the diseases for us. Materiality is one of the deep-seated causes of the serious world troubles of today. Man is freezing himself by staying at the level of merely material desires and accomplishments. They chill man's spirit; at that level they blind him to all but monetary gain; they prevent the growth of his spiritual powers, until he is in danger of losing his love, justice, sympathy, service to others, and faith in God. "The end of every material work is without result, because it is perishable and inconstant." Not only is man's spiritual development dwarfed, but that which he does gain is "without result." He becomes cold and hardened to the sufferings of others, if he can only gain material ease and forgetfulness for himself.

thing to the center of gravity, and every object thrown upward into space will come down, so also material ideas and worldly thoughts attract man to the center of self. Anger, passion, ignorance, prejudice, greed, envy, covetousness, jealousy, and suspicion prevent man from ascending to the realms of holiness, imprisoning him in the claws of self and the cage of egotism. The physical man, unassisted by the divine power, trying to escape from one of these invisible enemies, will unconsciously fall into the hands of another. No sooner does he attempt to soar upward than the density of the love of self, like the power of gravity, draws him to the earth. The only power that is capable of delivering man from this captivity is the power of the breaths of the Holy Spirit. The attraction of the power of the Holy Spirit is so effective that it keeps man ever on the path of upward ascension. The malevolent forces of no enemy will touch those sanctified souls who have made this universal power their guide. With tranquil heart and assured spirit they are flying upward day and night, journeying through the illimitable space of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh."

KNOW, then, that we must strive to cure mankind of this leprous materiality that creeps over the individual to his death, and that spreads its contagion ceaselessly in every direction. The only cure is "attraction to the fragrances of God, enkindlement with the fire of the love of God, reading the verses of unity, and beholding the lights from the dawning place of mystery.

After that cometh the training of the soul, purification of character and service to humanity. If thou art able to accomplish any one of these, the result is eternal and the fruit everlasting."

Self-centered existence is another disease to be dreaded. Here in the United States we have taught individualism, we have trained our children to "stand on their own feet," until far too many of us have become convinced that freedom, progress, and civilization are achieved only by looking within ourselves. Individual strength, knowledge, and initiative are, of course, imperative if man is to progress; or even if he is to seek God's will and obey it. "The confirmations of the Spirit come to that man or woman who accepts his life with radiant acquiescence. Release comes by making of the will a door through which the confirmations of the Spirit come." Individual powers are given us that they may be developed and used; but they must not become ingrowing, self-centered. One of the first requirements for man's progress is faith in that which is higher and greater and wiser than himself. Faith must be followed by action, a striving to approach closer to that All-High. Those whose eyes have been opened to the New Light of today must help as many as they can, both the young and the mature, to look definitely beyond themselves and their own narrow spheres of life into the bigger Divine Will. They must strive to understand God's purpose for all humanity—not just for themselves—and then seek ceaselessly, in big ways and in small to help men to achieve this purpose. Thus will come escape out of some of the evils of the day.

When we wonder what we can do in these complicated and trying times, the Holy Words will tell us what to do and inspire us to the doing. Ábdu'l-Bahá bids us—"Turn thy attention toward the holy Tablets of Ishráqát, Tajalliát, the Words of Paradise, the Glad Tidings, Tarazát, and the Book of Aqdas.* These divine teachings in this day are the remedy of the ailments of the world of man, and the dressing of the wounded body of existence; they are the spirit of life, the ark of salvation, the magnet of the everlasting glory, and the penetrative power in the reality of man."

IN SOME way or other, directly or indirectly, we must teach these truths to the world; we must help arouse men to want to follow them, for it is only through the power of the Spirit that mankind can be cured of his evils; and it is only by making of his will a door, an open door, that the confirmations of the Spirit can enter into man. He must will it, not drift into it, nor be pushed or dragged into it. "Unless the Holy Spirit become intermediary, one cannot attain directly to the bounties of God. Do not overlook the obvious truths. For it is a self-evident fact that a child can not be instructed without a teacher, and knowledge is a bounty from the bounties of God."

Do not be concerned about your own worthiness or unworthiness. Be content to keep passing on to others whatever blessings of God you yourself are able to understand and make your own. If you have faith in God, help someone else to rest on that faith. If you have the God love in your soul, radiate it until someone else is enkindled by that divine creative force. If you have a clearing conception of the Godlike justice, try to guide someone else to that higher level of right. "Know that the blessings of the Kingdom of Abha are not dependent upon the capacity and the worthiness of anyone; the blessings themselves are the worthiness. . . . Therefore the blessings of the Kingdom of Abha are not enchained by any fetters. The Kingdom gives the drop the influence of the sea, and the mote that of the sun. As thou hast already beheld, God has arisen, and some souls who were less than drops became like the waves of the great sea and manifested a storm equal to that of the ocean; in such cases worthiness is of no importance."

"The greatest gift of man is universal love, for this love is the magnet which renders existence eternal, attracts reality, and diffuses life with infinite joy. If this love penetrates the heart of man, all the forces of the universe will be realized in him, for it is a divine power which transports him to a divine station; and man will make no real progress until illumined by this power of love. Strive to increase the love-force of reality, to make your hearts greater centers of attraction, to create new ideals and relationships."

"I have a lamp in my hand searching through the lands and seas to find souls who can become heralds of the Cause. Day and night

I am engaged in this work. Any other deliberations in the meetings are futile and fruitless. Convey the message! Attract the hearts! Sow the seeds! Teach the Cause to those who do not know!"

Have no fear for the outcome. We may suffer; we may be ridiculed; we may die. What of it? The reason why we have been drawn by the magnet of God's love into this new revelation of His love is because some power of service within us responded to that magnet. Is it difficult to die, if necessary, in that service? Is it not our greatest glory to live or die in it?

Have no fear of the outcome.

"I say unto you that any one who will rise up in the Cause of God at this time shall be filled with the spirit of God, and that He will send His hosts from heaven to help you, and that nothing shall be impossible to you if you have faith."

"O Thou Incomparable God! O Thou Lord of the Kingdom! These souls are Thy heavenly army. Assist them, and with the cohorts of the Supreme Concurrence make them victorious; so that each one of them may become like unto a regiment and conquer these countries through the love of God and the illumination of divine teachings.

"O God! Be Thou their supporter and their helper, and in the wilderness, the mountain, the valley, the forests, the prairies and the seas, be Thou their confidant, so that they may cry out through the power of the Kingdom and the breath of the Holy Spirit!

"Verily Thou art the Powerful, the Mighty and the Omnipotent, and Thou art the Wise, the Hearing and the Seeing."

INDEPENDENT INVESTIGATION OF TRUTH

SHAHNAZ WAITE

In this article the author shows that an unprejudiced search for Truth, leads one to the study of the world's great Spiritual Revelations and their promises for mankind.

WE cannot enter the pathway of independent investigation of Truth unless the darkness of superstition, ignorance, bigotry, prejudice, intolerance, egotism, and selfishness, is overcome by the light of purity of heart and motive, open-mindedness, freedom, consideration for the viewpoint of others, justice, knowledge and reason. The creative Revealed Words have ever been the Light of Guidance on the path in all times and ages. Let us consider then how to investigate Truth as taught in the New Revelation.

"In this day," said Bahá'u'lláh, "he who seeks the Light of the Sun of Truth, must free his mind from the tales of the past." Also, "The heart must become free from the fire of superstition that it may receive the light of assurance, and that it may perceive the Glory of God."

"No man should follow blindly his ancestors and forefathers," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "nay each must see with his own eyes, hear with his own ears, and investigate Truth in order that he may find the Truth."

"All the people have a fundamental belief in common. Being one, Truth cannot be divided; the differences that appear to exist among the nations only result from their attachment to prejudice. If only men would search out Truth they would find themselves united."

"The Jews have traditional superstitions; the Buddhists and Zoroastrians are not free from them; neither are the Christians. All religions have gradually become bound by tradition and dogma. All consider themselves respectively the only guardians of the Truth and that every other religion is composed of errors. They themselves are right, all others wrong. If all condemn one another; all cannot be true."

"If five people meet together to seek for Truth, they must begin by cutting themselves free from all their own special conditions and renouncing all preconceived ideas. In order to find Truth we must give up our small trivial notions; an open receptive mind is essential. If our chalice is full of self there is no room in it for the Water of Life. The fact that we imagine ourselves right and everybody else wrong is the greatest obstacle in the path towards unity, and unity is necessary if we would reach Truth, for Truth is one."

"Science must be accepted. No one Truth can contradict another Truth. Light is good in whatsoever lamp it is burning; a rose is beautiful in whatsoever garden it may bloom; a star has the same radiance if it shine from the East or from the West. Be free from prejudice, so will you love the Sun of Truth from whatsoever point in the horizon it may arise. You will realize that if the Divine Light of Truth shone in Jesus Christ, it also shone in Moses and Buddha. The earnest seeker will arrive at this Truth.

"It means also that we must be willing to clear away all that we have previously learned, all that would clog our steps on the way to Truth; we must not shrink if necessary from beginning our education all over again. We must not allow our love for any one religion or one personality to so blind our eyes that we become fettered by superstition; when we are free from all these bonds, seeking with liberated minds, then shall we be able to arrive at our goal.

"Seek the Truth, the 'Truth shall make you free,'—so shall you see the Truth in all religions, for Truth is in all, and Truth is one."

EACH Manifestation of God is the very Incarnation of Truth. For example Jesus said, "I am the Way, the Truth and the Life." Hence the Word of a Manifestation is the Storehouse of all Truth, containing the Way, and the Life within Itself. The Words of God, spoken through His appointed Messenger, "are Spirit and they are Life." When one has attained to the knowledge of the Word of God he has entered into the straight pathway in his independent search which leads him to the goal of Truth, and beyond the Truth there is only error, superstition and tradition.

When praying for His disciples to the Father, Jesus Christ said, "Sanctify them through Thy Truth: Thy Word is Truth." 'Abdu'l-Bahá explains the Word of God when He says: "The Word of God is the Storehouse of all good, all power and all wisdom. The illiterate fishermen and savage Arabs through it were enabled to solve such problems as were puzzles to eminent sages from the beginning of time. It awakens within us that brilliant intuition which makes us independent of all tuition, and endows us with an all-embracing power of spiritual understanding. Many a soul after fruitless struggles in the ark of philosophy, was drowned in the sea of conflicting theories of cause and effect, while those on board the craft of simplicity reached the shore of the Universal Cause aided by favorable winds blowing from the point of divine knowledge. When man is associated with that transcendent power emanating from the Word of God, the tree of his being becomes so well rooted in the soil of assurance that it laughs at the hurricanes of scepticism violently attempting its destruction. For this association of the part with the Whole endows him with the Whole and this union of the particular with the Universal makes him all in all."

"THE AIM of the Prophets of God is to raise man to the degree of knowledge of his own potentiality and illumine him through the Light of the Kingdom. To transform ignorance into wisdom, injustice into justice, error into truth, cruelty into affection and incapability into progress; in short to make all the attainments of existence resplendent in him."

the pathway of reality. Search untiringly for Truth and reiterate the teachings which harmonize with the crying needs of the hour. This is the day in which dogmas must be sacrificed in our search after Truth . . . "Whosoever listens to the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh properly expounded will say, 'here is Truth—that which will render life a greater thing.'" And Jesus said—"I came that ye might have Life, and Life more abundantly." This is ever the evidence of Truth as revealed through the Word of God.

That we should seek the Truth in the sacred scriptures is clearly emphasized by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in these words, "The Bible and the Holy Books of other religions must be studied and read in the Bahá'í meetings. This study will widen one's information and acquaint one with the wonderful prophecies fulfilled today. We must affiliate with all religions and sects; speak to them from their own standpoint and show to them in practice that we love their sacred books; we read their scriptures and we honor and respect the Founder of their religion."

"Thou hast written that thou lovest the Bible; the friends and maidservants of the Merciful should know the value of the Bible, for they are the ones who have discovered its real significances and have become cognizant of the hidden mystery of the Holy Books."

At the request of the pastor who desired Him to write an inscription in the old Bible in the City Temple in London at the close of His talk there, 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote these deeply significant words: "This book is the holy book of God; of celestial inspiration. It is the Bible of salvation, the noble gospel. It is the mystery of the kingdom and its light. It is the divine bounty and the sign of the guidance of God."

In a talk given when in Paris, 'Abdu'l-Bahá stated—"The heavenly books, the Bible, the Qur'an and the other Holy Writings have been given by God as guides into the paths of divine virtue, love, justice and peace. Therefore I say unto you that ye should strive to follow the counsels of these blessed books, and so order your lives that ye may, following the examples set before you, become yourselves the saints of the Most High!

"The Spirit breathing through the Holy Scriptures is food for all who hunger.

"It is easy to read the Holy Scriptures, but it is only with a clean heart and a pure mind that one may understand their true meaning. Let us ask God's help to enable us to understand the Holy Books.

"Look at the Gospel of the Lord Christ and see how glorious it is! Yet even today men fail to understand its priceless beauty, and misinterpret its words of wisdom."

THE PATHWAY to the Fountain-head of Truth today is clearly defined; one need not lose his way in the labyrinth of ancient, dust-covered philosophies or drink of the water of vague and unprovable theories and traditions, for the Sun of Truth is shining forth in all Its Glory. "The Sun of Truth" said 'Abdu'l-Bahá "is shining giving Light and warmth to the souls of men. The sun is the life-giver to the physical bodies of all creatures upon earth; without its warmth their growth would be stunted their development would be arrested, they would decay and die. Even so the souls of men need the Sun of Truth to shed Its rays upon their souls, to develop them, to educate and encourage them. As the sun is to the body of a man so is the Sun of Truth to his soul. A man may have attained to a high degree of material progress, but without the Light of Truth his soul is stunted and starved. Another man may have no material gifts, may be at the bottom of the social ladder, but having received the warmth of the Sun of Truth his soul is great and his spiritual understanding is enlightened."

The Eternal Truth speaking through Christ proclaimed to the world—"I am the Light of the world; he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the Light of Life. . . . To this was I born and for this came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the Truth. Every one that is of the Truth heareth My voice. . . . I have many things to say unto you but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when He the Spirit of Truth is come, He will guide you into all Truth; for he shall not speak of Himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall He speak; and He will show you things to come. He shall glorify Me; for He shall receive of mine and shall show it unto you."

How many quote the words of Christ, "Ye shall know the Truth and the Truth shall set you free," then proceed to search after Truth in their own prejudiced and intolerant way. Why is it we wonder that the great proviso made by Christ in connection with this wonderful promise is so seldom added "if ye continue in My words. Then are ye my disciples indeed, and ye shall know the Truth, and the Truth shall set you free." "If ye continue in My Words,"—in that if lies the solution of the whole problem.

Each soul must follow the Light as he sees it and seek to be quickened with the power proceeding from the Word of God which ever inspires consideration, which yields to appreciation and appreciation to understanding, understanding to love and love to the Reality of Unity.

The Spirit of Truth hath appeared, to guide humanity into "all Truth," and the weary search may be o'er for those who seek. How beautiful are these words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "The Spirit of Truth is soaring on the Supreme Apex like unto a bird in order that it may discover a severed heart and alight therein and build its nest."

Independent investigation of Truth then in its highest sense eventually results in turning to the revealed Word—or the Sun of Truth, or the Manifestation of God. "This is the highway of infinite assurance. This is the pathway of intimate approach."

THE BAHÁ'Í CAUSE IN CHINA

Y. S. TSAO

The author is former President of Tsing Hua University and one of the great educationists of China and a distinguished writer of Chinese affairs. Dr. Tsao's fine appreciation of The Bahá'í Movement and its value for the needs of China today, was featured by Martha L. Root in her article in the November 1930 issue of this magazine, Volume 21, p. 263.

THE whole world is at present disturbed by general economic depression and people wonder what will happen to humanity. Leaders are talking about disarmament, economic cooperation, rationalization, etc., so mankind in general is asking for more Light and Truth. Despite this general unrest and suffering, the eyes of the world have turned specially to China, on account of the recent devastating floods, the political and social unrest, and the Manchurian imbroglio. Public opinion has been deeply stirred. The idealistic and excited students in China have marched to the capital, besieged and attacked a number of public officials. The people are bewildered, so they long for more Light and Truth.

In the midst of such a situation, there arrived in China an able and sincere Christian speaker and addressed three hundred men and women, who had received their education abroad, on the subject, "China's Hope." He outlined three alternative courses which China must inevitably be forced to take, namely, the paths of Communism, Japanese control or self-determination through redemption. In his opinion, unless the Chinese people redeem themselves by living Christ-like lives of love and service, the sins will inevitably drive China into the laps of Communism or the arms of Japanese control.

The writer was privileged to preside at that meeting and made a few closing remarks. He depicted a country which eighty years ago was on the verge of extinction, but owing to the teachings of a great leader, that country today has a constitution, a parliament, full tariff autonomy and has abolished extra-territorial rights. The message of that leader was one of over-powering love based upon Truth. A quotation befitting the occasion was used, "In all my traveling and journeying, wherever there is construction, it is the result of fellowship and love, and where everything is in ruin, it is due to hatred and enmity." The audience was asked to judge for themselves whether China is dominated by love or hatred.

THE CHINESE ATTITUDE TOWARDS RELIGION :

When an educated Chinese is told that unless he believes in a particular religion, he will be doomed to perdition, he reasons with himself to the effect that should he seek salvation by accepting that new religion, he is turning upon his forefathers, and he refuses to be convinced that the many noble men of his country and family could have been doomed by a just God. As a result he prefers to go his own way by being filial to his forebears and loyal to the teachings of the old religious leaders—chiefly Confucius and Buddha. The Chinese people believe religion teaches men to be good, and since all religions have the same aim, there is no reason why they should conflict with one another, that is the reason why they have failed to take any active interest in denominational and sectarian controversies.

Therefore, any religion which claims that the central Truth of all religions is the same, that to accept one religion does not preclude the investigation of other religious teachings, that being a follower of one religion does not mean segregation from others, and the condemnation of others, will certainly find ready acceptance when it is better understood. Since the Bahá'í Cause fulfils these conditions, it would appeal to the Chinese people because it agrees with the Chinese attitude towards religion.

On another occasion, the writer was speaking on the subject of, "The Unity of Civilization and the Universality of Religion," to a liberal Christian congregation, and as a climax and summing-up of this all-embracing subject, he quoted the "Twelve Bahá'í Principles." They were instantly acknowledged to be a most comprehensive system of religious thought with a resounding ring of finality.

CHINA'S POLITICAL IDEAL:

The age-long political ideal of China has been the early Confucian teaching, namely, the redemption of the world in accordance with the following procedure. "Rectify the heart, ennoble the person, regulate the family, rule the country and pacify the world." China has been living upon this individual and political philosophy for many centuries and even now, the leaders hearken back to this central truth every now and then. By rectifying the heart is meant the moral redemption of the human soul. This whole process from the individual heart to the whole world has been known as the "Grand Path" of Salvation.

With the impact of the western civilization upon the East, and the gradual laxity in the application of that doctrine, the Chinese people have been looking for some new ideal which may better befit the needs of the modern complex conditions of life. For some time, there was no ideal at all, and the absence of any ideal has exposed the Chinese people to the temptations and dangers common to human nature. It was only recently, that Dr. Sun Yat Sen compiled a set of principles known as the Three Principles, namely Nationalism, Democracy and Socialism, (they are known as "The People's State, People's Rights and People's Livelihood"). Some people have considered them the equivalent of the French mottoes, "Liberty, Equality and Fraternity"; or Abraham Lincoln's pithy political philosophy, "Of the people, by the people and for the people." As a set of politico-social principles, the three principles are quite noble and good, but as a philosophy of life to regulate human behavior, it compares unfavorably with the older Confucian doctrine.

The more philosophical followers of Dr. Sun, however, soon supplemented the three principles with "Universalism" as the higher goal. Nevertheless, no one is sufficiently interested in this important ideal to investigate further into this subject. Apparently, a mere code of political principles lacks the virile dynamic force of keeping the people to the straight and narrow path, so there is a lack of "sincerity of purpose and rectitude of heart." Without that sine qua non mere codes and principles cannot really become effective in transforming wicked human lives into noble lives. If the elders and leaders do not live morally inspiring lives as shining examples, the younger generation is bound to grope and grovel in the dark. If the men at the top do not sacrifice and serve the community unselfishly, the masses will naturally backslide or go to irrational extremes. There is a decided void to be filled. The central Truth of the Bahá'í Cause can supply this great need and fill this void. The fundamental teaching of the Bahá'í Movement is the fervent love of man through the pure love of God. This love must be so genuine and spontaneous, that one will labor unselfishly for one's fellowmen. To a real Bahá'í believer, the sight of human sufferings, ignorance and poverty will redouble his efforts to work for their improvement. Vain-glory, pride and selfish gains will naturally be banished from one's thoughts. China decidedly needs such men and everybody knows it and feels it keenly. If the Bahá'í Cause can supply such men, China will accept this Cause willingly and eagerly.

THE PLACE OF EDUCATION IN THE BAHÁ'Í MOVEMENT:

One of the twelve Bahá'í principles is universal education. Without knowledge, a human being is no better than an animal, for ignorance means superstition, poverty and selfishness. The Bahá'is encourage economic independence through education and work.

The children of all Bahá'í believers are enjoined to be given an education, and because girls will be the future mothers and first teachers of their children in turn, they are to be given the preference. This attitude is not only sound in practice but it surpasses any other social usage in the progress of civilization. Furthermore, a Bahá'í community makes adequate provision for the full realization of universal education, instead of merely stating the principle and leaving the actual performance to half-hearted officials or the irresponsible public. The provision is made in the following manner.

As all Bahá'is are educated, enjoined to learn a trade and to work, everybody is likely to be economically independent enough to give education to their children. It is, however, likely, that unfortunate children might be neglected. They are therefore looked after by the community as a whole, because public funds are accumulated for such purposes either from voluntary contributions or from a share in all wills of inheritance. China at present has an illiteracy of about ninety per cent of her population, but although China wishes to give free popular education, it has not been able to do so. Besides, the desire to provide education for the young comes from a deeper motive than merely economic independence, because it springs from the aim of developing every human soul to reflect the glory of his Creator. There is no plan better for making education quickly and effectively universal than that in the Bahá'í Movement.

THE NEW ECONOMIC ORDER:

The old order of Capitalism has brought about over-production, unemployment and the uneven distribution of wealth. People are suggesting and experimenting with rationalization, profit-sharing and communism, in order to produce a better distribution of wealth among the members of a given community. There are men who discern the inevitability of class warfare, there are also exponents of state-control, which are arbitrary methods to enforce a more even apportionment of profits.

According to the principles of the Bahá'í Movement, the new economic order is based upon the voluntary sharing of surplus wealth. This system is rendered effective easily because since everybody in a Bahá'í community is educated and works for his livelihood, the small number of unfortunate people and children could be provided for with facility. Such funds come from voluntary contributions and a share in the wills of inheritance. All Bahá'ís are enjoined to divide their properties into seven parts in the wills, the quotas that do not have legal claimants revert automatically to a public fund. Under ordinary circumstances, it would be difficult to provide for so many uneducated and poor people, but in a Bahá'í community the small numbers of genuinely unfortunate and unemployed render it easy to equalize the distribution of wealth for the necessities of life.

WORLD PEACE:

Although the Bahá'í Cause teaches people not to meddle with politics, nevertheless, they believe in world peace through the organization of instruments such as the League of Nations, the International Court and an International Police. The chief causes of war are territorial expansion, economic rivalry and national prejudice. But the Bahá'í principles of universal education, the new economic order and the belief in the unity of mankind will readily remove many such causes of war.

The nations of the world are devoting three-quarters of their revenue to armaments and other warlike preparations. China for the last few years has squandered about four hundred millions in unnecessary civil strife. These are the chief reasons why peaceful arts of construction have been neglected, that is why the whole world is suffering from economic exhaustion. Man therefore is his own enemy. "Glory is not his who loves his country, but it is his who loves his kind." This statement alone, says a Chinese scholar, puts the Founder of the Bahá'í Cause into the first rank of Prophethood.

UNANIMOUS TESTIMONIES:

Under these unprecedented times, the writer has ample opportunities to discuss the teachings of the Bahá'í Cause with a number of friends. It will be interesting therefore to reproduce some of their opinions towards the Bahá'í religion.

General Cheng Ming-chu, the acting chairman of the Executive Yuan, said: "China has great need for such a religion, at least it can do no harm but can do a great deal of good."

A Chinese scholar and educator said, "It embodies so many fundamental truths, that it should be carefully investigated because therein is to be found the Truth of Salvation."

A Chinese business man who recently traveled around the world said, "The principles are so comprehensive and yet so simple that they can become universal readily."

Another practical business man said, "There is no single book in the whole world which can give so much comfort in so small a volume" as Dr. Esslemont's "New Era."

A fervent Buddhistic believer said, "The principles of universal peace and unity of mankind, as taught by the Bahá'í Cause, must be the inevitable path of human progress."

A Chinese Muhammadan priest said, "The Bahá'í religion is the fulfillment of the teachings of all prophets of the past,"—and he asked for some books on the subject to read.

A Chinese Christian Minister said, "The Truth as revealed by the Bahá'í Cause transcends all religions of the present age." So he wrote a preface to the Chinese version of "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era."

A Chinese Y. M. C. A. secretary who works among Chinese students said, "It fills a great need, because the students are in search of Truth."

TRANSLATIONS:

Dr. Esslemont's book "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era" has been translated and is being printed. The English version of the translator's preface has been approved by Shoghi Effendi, who has sent a copy of it to the next issue of the Bahá'í World. A small pamphlet giving the twelve principles of the Bahá'í Cause, accompanied by the account of the Bahá'í Movement from the Encyclopedia of Larousse, and also a personal estimate of the value of the Cause to the individual, society and civilization, has been prepared in the vernacular as an introduction to the book. A copy of the proof has been sent to Mr. Inoue, the Japanese Buddhist priest who is undertaking the translation into Japanese. Miss Martha Root has asked for four hundred copies for the Spiritual Assembly of America, Miss Agnes Alexander for ten copies, Australia for ten copies and Shoghi Effendi for fifty copies.

The translation of "Paris Talks" has been started, and recently Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Cause, has given instructions for the translation of parts of "Some Answered Questions" and the "Book of Assurance." As these tasks are admittedly supremely difficult, it remains to be seen whether sufficient guidance is forthcoming for their completion.

WHEN SPRINGTIME COMES

SOON it will be the time of Spring. Already the signs of the flowers may be seen upon the mountains and in the valleys. When spring comes there is a divine wisdom in its appearance. God has a special object in renewing the earth with its bounty. For the dead earth is again made to blossom so that the life of plants and flowers may continue and be reproduced. The trees put forth their leaves and are able to bear all kinds of delicious fruits. All the birds and animals, everything with soul-life is rejoiced and rejuvenated in the coming of Spring. If this does not come to pass, it is not Spring; it may be autumn. But it is possible that Spring may come and yet a tree rooted in bad ground will be deprived of its vivifying powers. Or a fruitless tree may not bear, although the warm sun and vernal shower are descending upon it. So likewise an evil soul may derive no benefit, produce no fruit from the coming of a Manifestation of God. The divine springtime which brings forth spiritual flowers in other souls fails to beautify the soul that is evil. In general, however, just as everything is vivified, refreshed and renewed by the bounty of the literal spring, so every soul receives some degree of illumination and growth from the Manifestation when He comes. He is the Divine Spring which comes after the long winter of death and inaction. The wisdom of God is seen in His coming. He adorns the soul of man with new life, divine attributes and higher spiritual qualities. By this the soul is enlightened, illumined. That which is dark, gloomy and forbidding becomes light, hopeful and productive of new growth. So in the Divine Springtime, the blind receive sight, the deaf are made to hear, the dumb speak, the timid become courageous and the heedless awaken to new realizations. In short, they have become the image of that which God planned them to be and which the heavenly books promised shall be the true station of man. This is the power, purpose and virtue of the Heavenly Springtime."

PREPAREDNESS

ORROL L. HARPER TURNER

LIFE is one grand round of preparation. We get ready for bed, for work, for play, for marriage—for life happenings, for death—for war, for peace—for harvest, for winter, for spring and all seed-sowing periods.

Man and nature is always looking forward, planning for the future. Bees work industriously to collect their honey so that during the cold of winter they will be protected and nourished.

Public discussion considers the pro and con of means for national and international defense against invaders and possible hostilities.

The community offers protection to its members by maintaining a police system to enforce laws and regulations.

Individually, preparedness makes one man think of his insurance; another sees the total of his bank and investment credit; while a third visualizes the home he hopes to build and pay for.

We must make preparation for a speech, a book, an article; and with especial care, must the teacher prepare the way for his message. A "point of contact" must be found that will stimulate interest, promote harmony and effect understanding. Obstacles of disinterest, inattention, ignorance, prejudice, opposition and thoughtlessness must be removed by leading the student through familiar, well-known paths—and by "offering the gift" in an attractive package.

Flirting with death, men go to war and at the same time scheme for safety. An army recruit, having his wardrobe replenished before going into battle, asked for, "Paris garters." Other makes of garters were offered to him; but he refused them all, still demanding, "Paris garters—because," he added, "their sign reads, 'No metal can touch you.'"

All people, consciously or unconsciously, use food, work, recreation and rest in an effort to maintain health and thus delay the ravages of increasing age.

Just why all this precaution? From what are we trying to save ourselves? What do we fear?

You reply, "The only thing that we are absolutely sure of—death. Death is inevitable—whether we are killed in war, shot down by a robber, starved for lack of food, frozen for want of protection from cold weather, overcome by disease or old age, or wiped off the earth by some accidental happening or catastrophe."

"But," someone interjects, "why fear death? Wars, invaders, thieves, old age, starving, freezing or dangerous illness need not worry us, when our bodies lie under the sod.

"Dear ones are left behind to keep up the struggle for existence, to be sure; but if our foresight and love have already prompted us to make provision for their welfare, we have no cause to worry."

"Naturally there is no need to worry about locking the door when the 'horse' is already 'stolen,'" you retort with disgust.

The "horse" has been removed, yes; but it is not necessarily dead.

THE CHANGE we call "death" opens unknown realms of possibility; but if we have a spirit of adventure, the strange and unexplored does not daunt us; it only whets our interest.

“But,” you object, “we can not all be a Lindbergh, a Columbus, a Perry, or a Byrd.”

No, perhaps not; but if certain people possess characteristics that carry them fearless into the jaws of death, why can we not all acquire a concept of life that will make us welcome death, rather than fear it? Henry W. Longfellow says:

“There is no death! What seems so is transition;
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburb of the life elysian, Whose portal we call Death.”

Bahá'u'lláh tells us that God “made death” for us “as glad-tidings”; and goes on to ask, “Why art thou in despair at its approach?”

Every religion gives promise of an existence beyond the grave; every Prophet points the way to a life eternal.

Most people feel that these visible few years of earthly ordeal would be futile and meaningless if life ended with such a short span of experience. There would be no incentive to effort toward progress of any kind. Ambition would flag; and morals would run the gamut of profligacy. The concept of a God who would initiate such a paltry plan of creation is not acceptable to the average mind.

Abdu'l-Bahá speaks of our planet as the “womb” of the universe. With this idea of earthly experience in mind, the thought of preparedness takes on a new aspect.

A “womb” carries the developing body of an unborn child, while it is nourished by the mother until ready for birth.

If mother-earth is the “womb” of the universe, man, as an embryo in that “womb,” must be growing and developing a body or consciousness that will carry some indestructible part, not only through death, but into a new experience of life.

Christ said, “Ye must be born again.”

If our embryo is in some early stage of development, the process of growth is wholly unconscious—just like the evolution of a plant under the wise care of a gardener.

HAVE you heard of the remarkable work that Luther Burbank accomplished in his “school for plants” at Santa Rosa, California?

Burbank demonstrated that the evolution of the vegetable kingdom can be hastened, by supplying conditions of fertility, heat and moisture that will bring on changes more rapidly than nature would do. He labored to produce perfect and often new species of plant, fruit and vegetable life by eliminating defects and bringing into intensified expression the characteristics he wished to display.

From ten thousand plants he would select a few and destroy the rest. Of many thousand descendents of these plants he destroyed all but a few, and so on. Starting with a red poppy, that showed a spot of yellow, he raised a plot of poppies; a few showed yellow. These he cared for and destroyed the others. Seeds from this group produced a plot of poppies showing more yellow. He saved the best and destroyed the rest—until he had a variety of yellow poppy with blossoms six inches in diameter, coming true from the seed.

Mr. Burbank made plants take on new forms; he suppressed the bad and developed the good qualities. From a sharp cactus he evolved a spineless plant upon which catttle can graze on the arid plain. It is interesting to note also that he produced a white blackberry, which he called the "Iceberg."

He cared for his plants as a wise mother does her children—giving them the right conditions of soil, climate and food (fertilizer). He said, "I keep the evil away, sterilizing the soil and water as you sterilize milk for infants. It takes ten generations, sometimes, for a plant to overcome a hereditary fault; but the work is always rewarded in the end; and the world is richer."

What Power in creation is making human beings vary in form, evolution and perfection of quality?

Luther Burbank used times and seasons, environment and cultivation, life and death to produce a creative evolution of plants.

If a mere man, like Burbank, could effect such miracles in the vegetable kingdom, what manifestations of change and unfoldment can God produce in His universe!

If Burbank could repeatedly utilize the process of "life and death" to bring into visibility the latent qualities of plant life, why can not the Creator of us all use "life and death" (as well as "times and seasons, environment and cultivation") to bring into individual manifestation the endless Perfections of His Own Essence—that lie latent and unexpressed in embryonic man!

DEATH no more denotes the end of life—than a closing door denotes the annihilation of a departing guest!

This planet is an arena on which contrasting qualities (earthly and heavenly—material and spiritual—temporal and immortal) stage a fight for supremacy.

Experience, on the earth of time and contrast, gradually awakens in man powers of discrimination and knowledge that train him to consciously choose and use the perfect qualities of life.

At such a degree of evolution man understands how "death" can be "glad-tidings." To him, death is but an open door to fuller life.

Does it not seem probable that God plants the seeds of His Own Perfections in the earth of man's consciousness and then uses the laws of nature to evolve and specialize the expression of those Divine Qualities through individual human identities?

It is unpreparedness that makes us dread the event of death.

As embryonic man approaches maturity, he learns to open an account with the bank of life, and deposit only the assets that he can take with him and enjoy in an existence beyond the grave.

Preparedness, to a spiritual being, means making conscious effort to replace all weakness with strength, and redirect each misdirected power.

If we are born cowards, we can learn to acquire courage. If prejudices and superstitions bind us with their hereditary and environmental bonds, we can attain a new understanding that will enable us to readjust our beliefs. If hate and animosity prevail, love is needed.

If man is selfish, he should make it his business to seek the well-being of others; and gradually his life will prove that "to be pure is to be selfless." Hope can drive away discouragement; sadness and sorrow will succumb to joy and radiance. Knowledge wipes out ignorance. Awakening takes the place of sleep. Life can survive death.

It is well to remember, at this point, that there are right and wrong ways of seeking preparedness. A man came upon the remains of a train wreck. Victims were groaning and lying about on the ground with broken bones and lacerated tissues. The visitor inquired, "Has the ambulance been here yet? No?—The Doctor? No? Has the insurance man been here? No?—Then let me lie down beside you and wait too!"

The man was intending to collect insurance that did not belong to him. Other souls attempt, at times, to bask in the stolen glory of another's virtue; but dishonest plagiarizing of perfect qualities will not insure the safety of a human soul. Jesus must have been warning man to work out his own salvation, and avoid riding on the shoulders of another's effort when He said, "He that entereth not in by the door to the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber."

We may possess the entire range of material accumulations; money, houses, lands and protective insurance may be plentiful; our entire family may be secure from want; this side of the grave may be fully cared for—but what of the existence beyond?

While the human embryo lives in the womb of the mother, it is growing a body that can be used on earth; and if this "earth" is the "womb of the universe," it would seem logical to suppose that man (in that womb) is now developing something that will function for him when he is born into an existence to come.

What did Christ mean by advising us to lay up "treasures in heaven" where "thieves" can not "break through and steal"; and where "moth and rust doth not corrupt?" Why did He say, "I go to prepare a place for you; that where I am there ye may be also?"

When Ábdu'l-Bahá was asked what man's needs for a future life consisted of, he made many suggestions, among them: radiance, sanctity, knowledge, love, faith, assurance, spirituality.

It would seem that every constructive quality we can learn to use here and now is automatically preparing us for an existence to come.

Each defect that we discover in ourselves should make us strive to exercise its contrasting opposite—some specific perfection that we have not yet added to our character assets.

There is nothing more certain, coming to each of us, than the change we call death. With this definite experience to make ready for, how important soul-preparedness becomes when compared with armaments, treaties, legislation, and all forms of external protection—and yet, it is by digging in the earth of materiality that man must discover for himself the immortal gems of life that will carry the traveler spiritually victorious through the immensities to come!

SEEKING AND FINDING

By One who has "Sought" and "Found".

CHAPTER III.

"Today the establishment of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is of paramount importance, but hereafter it will not be so. This is the beginning of organization; it is like unto the first Church founded in Christianity, it is an expression of the elevation of the Word of God."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE two previous chapters have carried us through:

- 1st. The period of ardent search.
- 2nd. The discovery of the true "Guide".
- 3rd. The glimpsing of the Oneness of the Creator's Plan, as revealed through His successive Prophets and Manifestations.

As time passed the recurrent question was, What was to be the next step of my journey? What were my responsibilities now that I had found the Guide?

The divine challenge in 'Abdu'l-Baha's Tablet to me—"Engage in the service of Truth, progress day by day, and deliver the Glad-Tidings to the seeking souls" was a dynamic summons! But—I argued with my Bahá'i teacher thus—"Was I not already engaged in the service of Truth?" Our work had been founded on the pedagogy of the New Testament, and our object was to help to bring about the Kingdom of God on earth in our corner of the globe. "Why was it not enough that I should carry on there, trying to live the life in serving those one hundred and twenty-five persons, both old and young?"

He replied: "When the garment is outgrown it cannot be worn." "A quart cannot be contained in a pint cup"—and—"What about the one hundred and twenty-five thousand and you may serve directly and indirectly throughout the world if you go forth as 'Abdu'l-Bahá is expecting you to, and give the new food (Divine Teaching) especially adapted by God to the needs of this hour in human evolution?"

These suggestive ideas and questions became like leaven in the heart. Just at that time the statement quoted at the heading of this chapter reached me. Those two startling words 'paramount importance' were like a two-edged sword of guidance. Again had He not said elsewhere "When there is the most important, we must let go the important."

Reason, reflection and meditation brought a greater understanding of the statement in Chapter 1—"Whatsoever question thou hast in thy heart, turn thou thy heart toward the Kingdom of Abha and entreat at the threshold of the Almighty and reflect upon that problem, then unquestionably the light of truth shall dawn and the reality of that problem will become evident and clear to thee." These Instructions were followed.

I had my marching orders—I must journey on. Exactly whither I knew not, but the one thing I did know, I was on the way. History was repeating itself. Today it was not sufficient to continue giving alone the heavenly teachings of a former decade any more than it was acceptable in the days of Christ's sojourn upon the earth, for His disciples to continue proclaiming the divine message that Moses and His Predecessors had given to the world. It was theirs to raise the new call and give God's message of love for the needs of that New Day and Age.

The paramount service for the moment, evidently was the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár.* As Bahá'is never solicit funds from the general public, and only believers are privileged to contribute, how could this be done?

In Boston and again later in New York, I had recently met a remarkable young English woman—an Interpreter of the Greek Drama—who became attracted to the thought that land was being purchased for the erection of a House of Worship near Chicago, in which no sermons were to be preached, just the chanting of the Words of God-and-silent worship. She had been brought up a Quaker.

Thru a chain of unique events we found ourselves under one roof in the Bahá'í Center in New York City. The more she learned of this edifice that was to be open to all mankind, irrespective of race, color, creed, nationality or class, the happier she became. One day she exclaimed "Oh! that is the dream of my life, where is such a place? I would gladly give a Recital in every city I go to for that cause, if the Bahá'is will get together the audiences."

That night as the clock struck hour after hour, there was one who did not sleep. The room was so filled with that (now) familiar light that the eyes were dazzled with its brilliance. Here was I seeking to find a way of service and here was she, so gloriously equipped and eager to serve,—did our coming together mean anything? Between four and five o'clock sleep, like a refreshing benediction, descended, and when I awoke the way was clear as the noon-day sun.

In a few hours I had offered to her my services as booking agent, companion, cook, seamstress or in any capacity she desired, in exchange for her promised services to the Temple as she traveled throughout the large cities between the Atlantic and the Pacific. At the close of the interview our itinerary was completely planned.

When she was sailing from England her relatives and friends had urged her to bring a companion with her, but she protested saying, "No, if I need anyone, God will send me someone on the other side." She had only been in America a few weeks when we had met in Boston. During the subsequent months the Temple Fund was considerably increased thru her services.

Words could never recount the richness of that memorable journey which later culminated in the greatest Gift of my life—the meeting face to face with 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Chicago on His historic journey throughout the western world. Thrilling details of those priceless days will be told in later chapters, for it is the sincere prayer of the writer that this story will endure as one of the authentic "Impressions" of some of the events on that "Shining Pathway."

IT WAS MY great privilege as the result of this trip to meet and know intimately many of the selfless and devoted servants and maid-servants who had passed through the pion-

*Baha'i Temple; literally, Dawning Place of God's Praise.

This picture is so inspiring and revealing of the spiritual power of Mrs. Lua Moore Getsinger, described by the author, that we take this occasion to republish it. (See opposite page.)

earing days of the Cause in this country.

Pages could be written of their pioneer services, their ceaseless efforts in ploughing up the hard soil of prejudice, weeding out the superstitions and imaginations that had grown up in the hearts, the living of the life of true sacrifice to God and man, all of which were a most evident proof to a newly attracted believer as to the underlying reality of this Movement.

Also, all those I met, who were connected with the Cause were being observed with keen scrutiny from the depths of my heart in those early days, and I was everywhere rejoiced at the sanity, the normality, the humor and joy of these varied types of people in all walks of life, who could talk of God without sad faces, and who visibly were meeting the practical demands of daily life in a world of obligations, yet withal seemed more interested in the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth than anything else in the world, and the bringing into being of what we now behold as "A New World Order" which is slowly but surely rising like a mighty structure over the ruins of a disintegrating civilization.

One of the outstanding gifts of that winter was the meeting and daily contact with "The Maidservant of God Lua"—as 'Abdu'l-Bahá later called her. To those of our readers who knew and loved Lua*, no word of mine could add anything, but for the benefit of those who did not see her before her passing to the eternal realm, I would like to draw a brief picture of that remarkable life of joyous devoted service—that confirmed and unique teacher of whom 'Abdu'l-Bahá said in one of His Tablets, "She loved her Lord."

A radiance filled her being, it was as though a light shone forth from within. A humility and effacement pervaded her entire nature, so that one beheld her, merely as a vehicle thru which you received the heavenly teachings. She was truly "In the clutch of God."

Food, rest, composure ease, luxury,—none of these held her in bondage. Her one supreme thought was heralding the Divine Kingdom and 'bearing' souls into that Kingdom. Often have I seen her arise in the middle of the night and pray for hours for some souls who were being born into the divine consciousness.

As a spiritual physician she was carrying those loved ones in her heart and she never neglected one of them, but held them close until they could walk alone. This, to me, was one of the great secrets of her matchless services. She nurtured these spiritual children until they were able to stand the contrary winds, or the blasts of criticism and misunderstanding.

In closing I would like to leave with you the following glimpse of her dramatic and masterful teaching. When a certain prominent man, who for some time she had been teaching, had reached that moment when she felt he should no longer be depending upon her, she turned quickly toward him (when we three were alone) and said with dramatic fiery appeal, and deep love in her tone—"You have received a torch from the altar of the love of God, now go forth and light other torches!"

“The Bahá'í Movement imparts life. It is the cause of love and amity amongst mankind. It establishes communication between various nations and religions. It removes all antagonisms. And when this Cause is fully spread . . . warfare will be a thing of the past, universal peace will be realized, the oneness of the world of humanity will be recognized, and religion and science will work hand in hand.”—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

TO WHAT kind of leadership should we entrust the world today in this period of catastrophe and gloom? Economists are beginning to see that to entrust the leadership of society to the institution of “Business” has proved a flat failure. The great organizations of commerce, industry and banking—all motivated by desire for profit—have for a prolonged period displayed such efficiency of management and production as to almost give promise of establishing a permanent civilization assuring prosperity and comfort to the average individual. Yet just at the point at which this average prosperity was becoming the most striking economic phenomenon in the history of mankind, the whole structure collapsed; and this downfall of the economic structure was due to the very same force which had caused its marvelous erection—the desire for profit.

It is one thing to start in motion the machinery of production. This is easily done through the force of individualistic self-seeking, which has dominated not only our business life but far too basically the whole structure of our civilization. This force is sufficient to set in motion the wheels of industry. But it seems to be powerless to regulate production and distribution in any sane or safe way. So long as business holds the reins, and greed is the chief motive for action, civilization will undergo periodic man-made catastrophies presumably of ever increasing fatality.

No, it is not the business world motivated by profit-making which should be granted leadership in our civilization. The world can be made safe only by relegating business to its proper role of subservance to general prosperity and welfare.

But what force is there great enough to gain ascendancy over the self-seeking motives of man and establish an organization based on justice, mutuality and sympathy for the needs of the masses? In other words, a civilization based upon the Golden Rule. What can accomplish such a miracle, save the power of religion? This is just what religion is for! It is the master emotion which alone can dominate all the petty self-seeking and disruptive emotions of man. It has done this in the past. It can do it again.

Where shall we look, however, for this Spiritual Force capable of salvaging humanity from the many misfortunes into which it has been plunged by its own self-seeking?

Is any existing religion vital enough today to stem the tide of selfishness, of rancor, of economic and military warfare? Is there any religion capable of establishing unity, not only within one country but between all the races and religions of the world? Is there any movement visible to us which is capable of establishing a world brotherhood based upon mutuality, understanding and love; thus abolishing warfare and establishing an era of universal peace and prosperity?

Yes, there is a movement which promises just this—the Bahá'í Movement for universal peace and for universal religion. Here we have a forceful and pure teaching free from all traditional dogma, free from the accretions of man-made theology; with platform of principles designed to put into effect the perfect civilization, and with a dynamic power capable of attracting human beings of every race, religion or cultural background.

THE BAHÁ'Í Movement has been successfully operative in the hearts of men of many races and religions for now long over half a century and has amply demonstrated its great unifying power and its ability to change human lives, making effective upon earth those principles of conduct which all Founders of religion have preached to humanity but which fail to be expressed in the old age of every great institutionalized religion.

If any of the great world religions, grown hoary with age, could effect this salvaging of humanity, there would be no need of The Bahá'í Movement; and we should indeed welcome such a manifestation of vitality on the part of the old and now standardized religions. But everywhere we look today, we find that institutionalized religion is expressing, not the pure Voice of God for this age, but the spirit of its environing community. In other words, we find the Church divided upon all the vital issues of the day. There is no unity of concept, or unity of action. Throughout Christendom, as the poet puts it: "The world is too much with us; late and soon, getting and spending, we lay waste our powers."

It is because the secular world has too much impinged upon the world of religion that this latter department of human living has lost its dynamic and directive power. When that day comes that the Church is the expression of man's intelligence and good will rather than the expression of God's vision, then the Church loses its power to re-make human lives and re-form humanity. It is always at such a point as this that a new religious movement springs up. The Divine Power invades again the heart of humanity to impell it to greater heights of spiritual and cultural progress. This has happened always in the past. It is happening today, in the spiritual resurgence on this planet known as The Bahá'í Movement.

THE REVELATION of Bahá'u'lláh gives us the perfect plan for a new civilization that shall be founded on absolute justice, equity, mercy, love and service. A universal civilization, not particular to one nation or one race, but spreading its beneficence over all the world.

Where can we find elsewhere a Force capable of bringing all the religions and races together? Existing religions, seeking to convert the whole world to their fold, must first demonstrate to rival religionists that their faiths are inferior to the propagandist's faith. For instance, if Christian missionaries would win Muhammadans to Christianity, they must demonstrate to the Muhammadan that however good their own religion may be, Christianity is much superior. Conversely a Muhammadan seeking to win over a Christian to his religion would have to make a like claim of superiority and finality for Islam.

Now the loyalty of human nature is such that while many Christians recognize that there are splendid qualities in the Faith of Islam, there are very few, if any, who renounce Christianity to become Muhammadans. Similarly, while many enlightened Muhammadans today admire the teachings of Christ, they are not inclined to renounce Islam in order to become Christians. So we see that no existing religion has the possibility of converting the whole world to its fold. Religious unity for the world cannot come about in such a way.

Now THE miracle of The Bahá'í Movement is that it calls upon no one to renounce the authority of his own religion. It does not have to demonstrate to any religionist a falseness in his ancestral faith. Rather it calls upon him to recognize the reality and completion of his own religion in this resurgence of spiritual Force which has come to the world through the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh.

'Abdu'l-Bahá said during one of my visits to Him at Haifa, in answer to the query of a missionary conference in Edinburgh "Does the Bahá'í religion seek to supercede Christianity?" "No, the Bahá'í Movement does not supercede Christianity but completes it and carries out its meaning."

So does the Bahá'í movement also carry out and complete the meaning of Muhammadanism, of Zoroastrianism, of Judaism, of Buddhism, of Confucianism. We witness therefore the marvellous phenomenon that adherents of all of these great world religions are becoming Bahá'ís. They do so because they see in the Bahá'í Movement the true fruition of their own religion. And on becoming Bahá'ís they become brothers—one and all members of a great and loving Universal Family pledged and destined to bring universal brotherhood, universal peace, and universal prosperity to mankind.

The Bahá'í Faith is not a separatist movement. It has no desire to work in rivalry with other religions, or to prove any religion inferior or faulty. It has but one aim. This aim is to bring to earth the Kingdom of God, and to establish on this planet the Divine Civilization promised by all the Great Ones of the past. This is its aim. And its brief history has already given abundant testimony of its power of achieving this lofty and unparalleled goal for humanity.

SECRETARY WILBUR ON WORLD PROBLEMS

AS INTERVIEWED BY HOWARD C. IVES

DR. WILBUR received me in his office on the sixth floor of the great building devoted to the Department of the Interior. He laid aside his work and greeted me with courtesy and attention. After expressing my appreciation of his willingness to give me time from his busy day I explained the object of my call.

“What is your hope regarding the possible harmonizing of the various discordant elements making up the factors of our modern civilization?”

“The Bahá’i Magazine represents a Movement whose members in all the countries, nations and races of the world are working towards harmony and mutual understanding, and the gradual building up of international peace and co-operation. In your opinion can this be brought about, and how?”

“The situation is this,” he said, —and it is evidently distinctive of the man that not a moment was lost in discursive remarks “the world has suddenly been thrown into a neighborhood and the problem is so to adjust these new and untried relations as to function without serious friction. This is a difficult matter, for the human race, either as individuals or families or national groups, are not ruled by their intellects but by their emotions. Consequently the average man, or group of men, in any sudden stress of events, does not stop to consider the wisest and best thing to do under the circumstances, but is swayed by the passions or feelings of the moment. This course is almost invariably taken even when the results of such action are clearly seen by the unimpassioned observer to have quite disastrous results. If your next door neighbor encroaches a few inches on your property in a building operation your first impulse is to push him back where he belongs. His natural impulse is to enforce his claim. You both are moved primarily not by calm judicial judgments but by emotional reactions. The probable result is that you both go to extreme lengths, even to the extent of mortgaging your properties to pay attorney fees, whereas wisdom would clearly dictate a calm settlement of the difficulty by friendly discussion. The fact that the final best interests of both parties are best served by mutual concessions and the maintenance of good-will does not weigh at all under the emotional stress of the occasion, and the further you are carried by this emotional wave the more difficult it is to draw back or to recover the ground of calm reason.

“Now if this is true between neighbors speaking the same language and living under the same government and social and religious institutions, how much greater is the problem when international relations are involved in which the disputants are controlled emotionally by differing racial and religious backgrounds and subject to different governments, laws and institutions.

“This is the situation in the world today. World commerce; world intercommunication; world relations as a whole have suddenly taken the place of the local, limited, provincial relations of the past: But men have not been able to adjust their emotional reactions or their intellectual processes to this new situation. Naturally the difficulties increase with the complexities, and the complexities are inevitable with the increasing number of factors in the situation.”

“How SHALL we deal with these complex problems,” I asked, “when the national and racial interests are so varied and often so antagonistic? In talking with thoughtful people in all walks of life I find that all are pretty well agreed as to the problem and the difficulties in adjusting its factors harmoniously, but none has any practical plan for dealing comprehensively with these complexities. Yet it is plain to all that some world plan is needed.”

“It must be a more or less gradual evolution,” Dr. Wilbur replied, “we can note progress year by year. Thirty years ago if such a situation had arisen as has lately confronted us in the Far East everybody would have taken sides and joined in the fray. But in this case world opinion was focussed in a judicial body and the serious nature of the result was minimized, if not averted.”

“WE ARE deeply interested in advancing harmonious relations between the various races of the world,” I said. “The Bahá’i Movement takes the scientific attitude that the various races sprang from one common stock and that prejudice based upon color, habits or racial characteristics has no basis of fact. Do you consider that the future of the human race can be adjusted to an harmonious relationship?”

“The secret of the whole racial difficulty,” he replied, “lies in the fact that the various races have been mixed up too suddenly. The world has been thrown into one neighborhood so quickly, with so little preparation, or with none, that the various peoples and races have had their attention focussed upon each other’s defects rather than upon their good qualities. Take the Negro in this country, for instance, within fifty years his status has been changed from chattel slavery to equality in citizenship. If while this process of adjustment was going on we had had to contend with a dominant characteristic in the negro temperament of moroseness, sourness, rebellious meanness, think what a tragic situation we should have had. On the contrary we see in the Negro race the characteristic attitude of cheerfulness, happy reactions to conditions even when most trying, a more or less radiant acceptance of the situation coupled with a determined will to overcome it. Surely this is a most admirable characteristic and one that the white race might well emulate. Now if our race could emphasize this quality and teach it to their children, while endeavoring to teach the Negro more and more of those qualities which have so aided their own racial advancement, harmony would very quickly be brought about. This is increasingly being recognized and practiced. So with the Chinese and the other races of humanity. The Chinese civilization dates back four thousand years or more. Surely this must be due to inherent qualities of a very high order. Let us investigate these qualities and try to emulate them."

AT THIS point I ventured: "You have spoken of the fact that men's actions are invariably determined by their emotions rather than by their mental processes. Is it not probable, then, that the final adjustment of world psychology to the idea of racial, national, religious, social and economic solidarity and harmony will come through what we might call a great revival of pure religion? For instance, to accept the historicity of the Mosaic tradition for the moment, if we could imagine a modern Moses bringing to the world as a whole a code of laws adaptable to conditions now facing us; a code founded upon the eternal basis of love and good-will, but adapting this principle practically to a world suddenly thrown into these new and untried relationships, would not this provide that very emotional appeal of which you have spoken as the dominating influence in human motivation?"

I had previously handed to Dr. Wilbur a copy of the Bahá'í Magazine and he had said that he was to some extent familiar with the Movement.

He indicated, in answer to my question, that such an appeal might be effective but plainly was wondering how this could be brought about. I continued, for I was anxious to secure his opinion on the practicability of the Divine Plan: "This is exactly what the Bahá'ís of the world are concerned in. We believe that a great and divinely appointed Leader has appeared whose function it is to apply the eternal laws and the eternal springs of action to the new social, scientific, religious, economic and international relationships. And this large and constantly increasing group of men and women in all parts of the world are assured that Bahá'u'lláh has actually provided a code of laws, a plan of action, an architectural blue-print, so to speak, of and for this new Social World Order."

I then briefly sketched the framework of this World Order as now being established by Shoghi Effendi: the Local House of Justice; the National House of Justice and the soon-to-be-established International House of Justice, and touched upon the functions of each as being adapted to bring order and harmony out of the existing chaos and strife.

"The only answer possible to that outline of your world program is that the world can only wait and see," he said. "If there is sufficient power, sufficient spiritual appeal, sufficient sacrificial service to the cause of suffering humanity, so that the minds and actions and, above all, the emotions of any considerable numbers of the peoples of the world are swayed by this ideal then it will take root and no one can predict the result."

"Do you think it possible or feasible to organize a United States of the World on the lines of our Federal Government, or as M. Briand advanced the idea of a United States of Europe?"

"This is a political question", he answered, "and politics, we should always remember, is a constantly changing factor in human affairs. We should try to visualize humanity as an ever-flowing stream in which the generations come and go but Humanity flows on. In this stream the changing generations evolve constantly new experiments to deal with changing conditions. What we call politics is one of these experiments. We must deal with conditions as they occur, and we must use the means which humanity finds at its hand at the moment, and be practical in doing this. But we must never forget that the Goal of all endeavor is the betterment of the race as a whole in its ever onward march."

"Do you consider the hope for the unification of the world a reasonable one?"

"I prefer the word, harmonize rather than unification, he answered. "To unify implies a much longer and more difficult process than to harmonize. Unity implies amalgamation, whereas harmony implies a spiritual brotherhood while allowing an infinite diversity in the free expression of individual, social and national characteristics."

This so closely paralleled Abdu'l-Bahá's own words that I was much impressed.

"Do you anticipate great upheavels in world conditions in the process of this harmonious adjustment?" I asked: "Is it possible, do you think, for men to learn to forget their selfish, isolated, provincial attitudes in the light of a larger, more enlightened, more harmonious relationship, without going through some pretty severe tutional stress?"

"Such lessons may be learned," he answered, "without extremes of hardship. It is true that we all, nations as well as individuals, advance in wisdom and culture by steps more or less difficult of negotiation, but we must hope that mankind will learn this lesson without too great trials."

"You are hopeful, then, that the world of humanity will surely attain to an harmonious world relationship?"

"I am certainly an optimist," Dr. Wilbur said, "I feel assured that we have not advanced as far as we have on this road without attaining some feeling of security that that advance will continue. I cannot imagine that the thoughtful people of the world would consent to the governments and those responsible for world affairs taking any backward steps."

On this note I took my leave, greatly impressed with the breadth of view, the humanitarian spirit and practical wisdom of the Secretary of the Interior. He did not quote the following words from Ralph Waldo Emerson, but they fit very appropriately into the atmosphere surrounding his last words: "Shall we not trust the Power which has guided us so tenderly and taught us so much, secure that the future shall be worthy of the past?"

"The great question appertaining to humanity is religion. The first condition is that man must intelligently investigate its foundations. The second condition is that he must admit and acknowledge the oneness of the world of humanity. By this means the attainment of true fellowship among mankind is assured and the alienation of races and individuals is prevented. All must be considered the servants of God. all must recognize God as the one kind Protector and Creator."

LETTERS HOME

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

This is the second of a series of letters from the pen of Mrs. Ransom-Kehler describing her missionary tours in the Far East. The first letter was on Nikko and Japan, published in the January number.

WHAT a glorious thing it is to be a Bahá'í and know that wherever you go there will always be those who extend a loving welcome; what a moving experience always to see the eager smiling upturned faces of Bahá'ís waiting to greet you as you sail into the ports of the world.

Yes, there she is: Fung Ling Liu, my charming young Chinese friend, sister of a Cantonese Bahá'í, Mr. C. S. Liu, former Director of the Bureau of Agriculture, now President of the Agricultural College of Sun Yat Sen University. Miss Liu has just taken her Master's degree at the University of Michigan and received her appointment as Professor of history at Ling Nan University in her native city of Canton.

We drove about Hong Kong until time for the afternoon train.

Before these first contacts with China I felt like a cat in a library or a canary bird in an observation car. China is the comprehender not the comprehended. Vast, mysterious, swarming, imperturbable, materialistic, detached, casual, intense, chaotic, ordered, completely paradoxical and baffling, China remains changeless in grandeur or ruin, in victory or defeat, in affluence or poverty. She absorbs whatever goes against her, and scattered through her wide domains we see strange evidences of the forgotten back-wash of alien tribes and peoples lingering on amidst her impervious culture like stranded galleons attesting a misprized adventure.

Where there are more things than men science flourishes; where there are more men than things philosophy develops. China comprises a fourth part of this earth's population, and her four hundred million people are meditative, resigned.

But as if to chastise me for daring to draw conclusions about the infinite, for such China is, so far as a human survey goes, I am challenged by all of the modern evidences of China's eager progress.

It is no use. China is something to experience, not to describe.

Suddenly we passed out of the modern British squares and parks, for Hong Kong is a possession of Great Britain, surrounded by China after the Boxer uprising. Without preparation we drove over the Bund or waterfront, and for the first time I was confronted with the actual pragmatic meaning of Chinese population; for the face of the waters was literally packed with tiny covered junks which are the only homes known to the thousands who inhabit them.

Both my mind and heart played me the most dangerous trick, for I could neither think nor feel, just for a moment, that this seething mass was actually human; identities were so obscured by gigantic multiplication, personalities so obliterated in their problematic immensity that it took a very definite act of imagination to remember that in the squalor and deprivation, before the lidless gaze of the passing public, in spaces the size of closets, men and women were struggling and hoping; borrowing and lending; heeding the ceaseless cry of hunger; marrying and giving in marriage; bringing forth their young; a poignant pulsating part of that strange drama "of laughter and despair, of beauty and passion, of having and losing that the soul calls life."

Trying to express the sudden catch of marvel and revulsion that seized me at the sight of my fellow-beings huddled like muskrats on a raft, it was evident that to Ling it was a "conditioned reflex" which seemed as natural to her as graft and gangsters seem to us: Terrible? Yes—but; c'est la vie.

Our train was scheduled to leave Kowloon, the port of Hong Kong, for Canton at four o'clock. At five minutes to four we stepped from the ferry and rushed to the baggage check room to redeem my mountainous luggage and get it aboard the train. You cannot travel round the world, in every kind of climate, without being prepared for every exigency; while Bahá'í literature is cumbersome, heavy and indispensable.

I have heard that the principal products of New Zealand are wool, butter and scenery. The principal products of China are rice, rickshas and people, so you are never at a loss to get help. Half a dozen coolies sprang up by magic and started running with packages and parcels for the train. We were making fair progress when a troublesome customs official spoiled our plans by insisting on a scrutiny of the short and simple flannels of the poor.

While in Shanghai, Mr. Tauty, a devout and devoted Bahá'í, had presented me, on behalf of the Shanghai friends, with the most gorgeous basket of flowers that I have ever received or ever seen. It was enormous and very heavy, for it was filled with earth. And this was a conspicuous part of my equipment.

Not even deigning to go back I left poor Ling to struggle with the customs official which she did so effectually that in a few moments back they all came running; having commandeered a truck from somewhere out of the way, for no effort is made in China to save human brawn.

Accommodating spectators picked up the smaller lighter cases, scattered like chaff from the flying hand-car, and tossed them on to the platform after us. "Six, seven, eight, nine and the flowers," I panted breathlessly as the train began to move.

The conductor took no pains to conceal his displeasure. "Take it off the platform" he commanded. There was not a seat to be had—not one; the racks were crowded; so suit cases, hat boxes, packages and flowers were piled in a formidable heap just inside the door; in endless procession guards, waiters, officials, and passengers, propelled by that Oriental restlessness that fosters a kind of perpetual motion, scaled them for half an hour.

At last, in self defense I suppose, (we were travelling second) the conductor led us to a compartment in the first-class with four affluent American sailors; they handled the embarrassing baggage like tooth-picks and gave me a sense of security amidst the unusual situation.

Of course this all seems very trivial, but to me it is significant as illustrating the Chinese temperament. In the first place to hold any rank in China, even that of brakeman or conductor, is of superlative importance, and he must have service and assistance befitting his station. So for no good reason assignable to Americans the conductor whose duties seemed to require a constant patrol of the train, was accompanied by two and sometimes three assistants. When they first came to the pile of luggage stopping the passage way, "this can't stand here" he said. But assuring himself with a glance, that there was no place else to put it, during all the succeeding trips until he found us a place, he and the other officials climbed over it without the slightest notice, as if it were part of the stationary equipment. The Chinese accepts with absolute patience and resignation conditions that cannot be remedied.

Canton is a purely Chinese city. Whatever improvements we see here are of Chinese origin, not foreign, as in Shanghai and Hong Kong.

My host Mr. C. S. Liu who embraced the Cause on hearing Jenabe Fazel while an undergraduate at Cornell, is a young man of exceptional capacity who has contributed much to the advancement of agricultural practice and enlightenment among the farmers of China. "I feel", he said, "that I can best serve the Bahá'í Cause here by improving the agrarian situation." He showed me a survey that, as Director of the Agricultural Bureau, he had compiled giving valuable data and suggestions to the farmers. He had propagated a new rice that would double the increase over other varieties.

He had been married only a few months to a charming and talented young Chinese girl, who speaking little English, would retire with Ling to talk over personal things, while Mr. Liu and I sat night after night discussing China, her problems, the Bahá'í Cause and world affairs.

By a skillful guidance that was almost feminine he had in a few conversations adroitly turned me from my superficial preconceptions and given me a more penetrating approach to the Chinese psychology and character.

Of course I was horrified, as the Occidental must always be, at the casual value set on human life and human effort. Never before have I felt such a veneration for brawn and muscle. Here is a sinister standard of the equality between men and women, for all through the streets they are hitched up together—old women and young men, old men and young girls—hauling great wagon loads of sand, brick or mortar. For every horse and automobile pulling in the streets there seemed to be a hundred human beings. Labor saving devices are unknown; and I felt an actual awe as I realized that all the great civilizations that had been built, before the coming of Bahá'u'lláh into the world, had sprung from the expenditure of man's physical energy.

My first reaction was that here was a nation broken and despairing, bereft and unhappy. People do not smile; they look weighed and cheerless. Mr. Liu and I sat talking in the drawing room of his suburban home. They had just moved into a newly finished apartment and the electric wiring was not yet completed. A brisk typhoon sucked the flame up the lamp chimney and the beautiful painted scrolls that decorated the walls rattled to its boistrous blowing.

“But you cannot judge Chinese character by Occidental standards; enthusiasm and the superficial expression of enjoyment are out of keeping with the Chinese conception of dignity and discipline. Ten years ago there was not a wide paved street in Canton; today you were admiring her endless chain of boulevards. This is not the expression of hopelessness and despair. All that China needs is peace.” He continued: “Canton has equipped expedition after expedition; money that should go into education, road building, industrialization, farm improvement, which would restore confidence and stop banditry, goes for arms and ammunition. China’s revenue is enormous and a few years of peace would find her solving all her ancient problems.”

Reverence for age, respect for the opinions of others, regard for personal rights, that would enable a Chinese to put aside his own pressing business while he waited for someone to finish a game or to point a discussion, impressed me more and more as I took a deeper scrutiny of these remarkable and, to us, mysterious beings. In one aspect they seem like the French—casual, logical, cynical; in another they remind me of Americans.

Having just left Japan the contrast was even more impressive; for in Japan the human equation is of the utmost importance. When you enter a Japanese shop or restaurant an event of importance has transpired! You have arrived!

Everybody bows and stands at attention. But entering a Chinese shop is much like going into an American place of business; nobody is impressed with your presence nor seems to care whether you are there or somewhere else.

From China we have derived silk, porcelain, tea, portable block-printing, gun powder and the mariner’s compass. Splendid in her sumptuous advancement when Europe, a primeval forest, was populated by barbarians, she is not content to dream of her past, but is already turning her endless energies into new channels of expression. For never at any moment has China been lethargic; a lazy Chinese is inconceivable; to support nearly half a billion human beings on her limited territory means intense and endless toil.

An energetic and industrious people, they seem gifted with the physical strength of the superman. They never look lean or emaciated; in the squalor and struggle they look muscular, healthy, well set-up. Ricksha coolies earn about a dollar a day, which at the present rate of exchange is seventeen cents. Exhausted as they must be after such strenuous work you see them bathing and washing their clothes in the hot season only a loin cloth.

The Chinese are the bankers and merchants of the Orient. The women are sometimes more gifted than the men in commercial pursuits. An interesting example of this was Madame Liu, mother of my friends and of eight other equally intelligent and competent children. They hold among them degrees from Wellesley, Smith, Columbia, Yale, Bryn-Mawr, Cornell and Michigan, and are occupying positions of importance and trust throughout China. Madame Liu was born into a family of Christian converts but not before her feet had been broken in accordance with the ancient Chinese custom. Due to the revolution, this, together with the queue and the former costume, have been abolished.

Her husband, Dr. Liu, a renowned Cantonese physician and classmate of Dr. Sun Yat Sen, died some years ago having sacrificed his property through a mistaken investment. This tiny, frail, little lily-footed woman was left to rear and educate several of the children. Through wise and shrewd investments she has built and owns a fine three-story residence in the heart of Canton and is now quite independent, through her own efforts. What American woman of middle age could exceed that accomplishment? On her pathetic broken feet she could always out distance me on my sound ones. And she had that same open mind and candid inquiry that is a Chinese trait.

"You must tell me more about the Bahá'í Movement," she said. Ling translated and once again I regretted the language barrier that separates us from our fellows. After giving those proofs and evidences that establish Bahá'u'lláh as the Promised One for whom the world has been waiting, she said,

"I must continue my inquiry until I know the truth. The terrible mistakes of the past were due to men's blindness and ignorance. The gravest results may follow from keeping one's mind closed to truth."

Bravo! Gallant and courageous little lady! Formulating, I prayed, the new outlook of the quickened womanhood of the world. In the course of the conversation she disavowed being educated; "But," Ling quickly interpolated, "She knows and remembers the classics much better than we do."

The spell of China is ineffaceable. I have not told you of my visit in Shanghai, nor of my contact with the radiant group of Bahá'ís there, for that must be a recital of its own.

There is something indescribably poignant and living about the blue of the Chinese sky, a delicate self-effacing blue like the color of old Canton porcelain, but withal a depth so vast, so calm, that you feel it reflected in her people. Art, poetry, resignation and a vital persistence, the quaint, the inspiring and the hopeful reside in that changeless azure.

With a great pang of reluctance I left China, as she works out a new and fitting destiny under her quiet sky.

"O people of God! Be not occupied with yourselves. Be intent on the betterment of the world and the training of nations."

—Bahá'u'lláh.

DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE AND THE EXTRAORDINARY SESSION OF LEAGUE OF NATIONS

Miss Root gives us here an inspiring report of the above Conferences as seen through Bahá'í eyes. She was not only present at these sessions, but met some of the delegates and sent them Bahá'í books. Some of the delegates invited her to call, and a few called upon her. Several of them she had met in her sojourns in the different continents.

DEAR reader, stop and catch your breath and together let us see if we have the capacity, the insight, to grasp what has taken place here in Geneva, Switzerland from February second until today, at this Disarmament Conference March eighteen, 1932; and with it this Extraordinary Session of the League of Nations called at the request of China. Are they the beginning of the Parliament of Man—not a perfect Parliament of Man as outlined by Bahá'u'lláh—but the greatest attempt in this direction that the world has yet witnessed.

Picture how we came to Geneva, succeeded in getting tickets for the sessions; how we stood in line for three hours waiting for the doors to open for this world-heralded Disarmament Conference. Sixty nations, representing one billion seven hundred million people who are spending twenty-five billions of dollars a year for military preparedness, have sent their delegates here to find a way to reduce these armaments. Experts have been ten years getting ready for this event.

The doors swing open, and we soon find ourselves in an upper gallery in the centre of Geneva's largest hall. It is a good vantage-ground. Leaning over, we can see below us the President, Mr. Arthur Henderson, and we can look directly into the eyes of the delegates from fifty-nine countries and one "observer country." The world's peace has been viewed for six thousand years from the periphery, but in this moment we see it at its center!

No matter what comes, this Disarmament Conference will be a phenomenal success esoterically, because through it the consciousness of the world is awakened to the necessity and to the possibility of realizing universal peace. The principles of Bahá'u'lláh for a New World Order, enunciated more than sixty years ago, are beginning to be worked out. Old ideas are passing, private wars for private gain are being criticized. Four great empire governments destroyed during the world war, the German Empire, the Russian Empire, the Austrian-Hungarian Empire, and the Turkish Empire, have nationals in this audience who proclaim a passionate will to peace. They and the thirteen new countries formed since that world crash have a new outlook. This Disarmament Conference shows a group of fine delegates sent from every part of the globe. For them just to see one another, to hear one another's aims for disarmament and peace, is a big help to world understanding. The mould-ers of world politics are present too, countries have sent some of their greatest statesmen.

As the days go by, and we hear the speeches, we may well ask ourselves: Is this a solemn Tribunal or is it only a remarkable oratorical contest? Is it in reality the dawn of that Golden Age of all the centuries, when men will have the courage to arise and speak for pure justice and the welfare of humanity?

It isn't quite any of these, yet it is the first beginnings of all of them! The searchlights of world public opinion have so flashed on these meetings that possibly some big nations who used to find the secret sessions very convenient to talk over what they would not care to say outright, have felt it more necessary to speak openly. This frank, open consultation is one of the principles of the new day.

The small nations, every one of them, have had the courage to speak on the necessity of keeping international agreements already made and not condoning the deeds of nations who break them. For the first time in history, the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh that all countries large and small should be represented and be heard equally, is being realized. (Not quite all, but nearly all countries are represented here.) And all countries have some delegates who stand like Gibaltars for peace. Some indeed have voiced a very high spiritual note. Bahá'is will be interested to know that a few of the delegates either are Bahá'is or at least have heard and approved the universal principles of Bahá'u'lláh for world peace*

ONE DOES not need to know or ask by what names the following delegates call their religions, but here are some of the high lights of spirit: Mr. Eduard Benes, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Czechoslovakia, quoted his countryman Comenius, "Therefore, you ambassadors of peace, if you fully deserve your name, bear in mind not only the plans of mankind, but also the plans of God; consider not only what your kings demand of you, but also, what the King of Kings demands of you, and take as your goal, not war but peace."

"Our present enterprise," Mr. Benes continued, "is not a mere human undertaking; it is destined to become historic, immortal in the annals of mankind, either by its success or failure—to overlap generations and to outlive the political preoccupations of men and parties and the local and national institutions that exist in our day."

The delegate from Spain, Mr. Luis de Zulueta Escolano, Minister of Foreign Affairs said: "In order to abolish war, which is international anarchy, we must create international order—We say with the utmost deference for the nations concerned, that until the United States of America and the Soviet Union have joined the League, it is difficult to imagine how total disarmament can be brought about.—I would remind my colleagues that the Spanish delegation has been engaged upon this question from the standpoint of the predominant part which the press should take in moral disarmament. We have also stressed the importance we attach to the co-operation of women, and the Conference will very soon be consulted on the proposals submitted to it by the Council, on our recommendation for ensuring the collaboration of women in this work of peace, on which they have expended so much effort."

Mr. Salvador de Madariaga, Ambassador of Spain, in an informal talk spoke of how absurd it would be for the hands, the eyes, the heart or any other members of the human body to work against one another; and that it is just as idle for nations to plot one against another. "When we recognize that we are all parts of one whole, then we are truly morally disarmed."

Poland took a splendid stand for moral disarmament, saying that simultaneously with this gradual disarmament must come spiritual unarming, an unwillingness to kill, and an absence of rancour. She advocates education for the cure of international hatreds. She has had the insight to go directly to the root of the matter. Metal disarmament good as it is, must go with moral disarmament.

One sentence of President Henderson went straight to the heart: "Some tragedies of life are due to the follies of inaction!"

Another speaker said there is a danger that we shall lose the illumination by which we live.

Mr. Alexandre Malinoff, President of the Sobranje, former Prime Minister of Bulgaria, pointed out that general disarmament must be the final goal; that goal is very difficult, but we may prepare for it by putting aside forever the false and pessimistic idea that war is an inevitable necessity. His own words were: "We must not confine our efforts to humanizing the methods of war; we must destroy the idea of war itself."

Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Belgium, Mr. Hugh Gibson who spoke for the United States delegation said that the United States had entered this first world conference on the limitation and reduction of armaments with the determination to leave nothing undone to achieve substantial progress. His words were: "The task before the nations of the world is not to minimize the problems, but, fully mindful of them, to gather strength and determination from the conviction that the demand for a regime of international confidence, co-operation and peace will in the end have its way."

The Persian delegate, Mirza Hussein Khan Ala, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in Paris, showed in his speech, that Persia takes a most honorable and liberal stand for disarmament. This head of the Persian delegation pointed out clearly how fate has placed Irán at the world's crossroads, how she is the connecting link between the east and the west. He emphasized that the thought of peace must be instilled into the consciousness of the world. Almost all of the speakers, (and I am sorry not to mention some of the thoughts from each of their addresses), proved how the masses in all continents are looking to this conference, and hoping that perhaps "through the wise councils and deliberations, this ideal of universal peace may leap forth from the world of words into the arena of actuality," as 'Abdu'l-Bahá so ardently proclaimed sometime would come to pass.

A FEATURE for the Disarmament Conferences which has not yet been tried and could with profit be studied, is Bahá'u'lláh's plan that the delegates should be elected by the people rather than appointed by the particular government in office at the time.

One of the very impressive moments at the Conference was when the delegation representing forty-five millions of the women of the world from fifty-six countries, presented resolutions adopted at that time for actual limitation of armaments and for moral disarmament. Mrs. Laura Dreyfus-Barney took an active part in the work of this delegation.

Mr. Andre Tardieu, president of the French Delegation presented the plan of an international police force. One military delegate said to me that the idea itself is excellent but the result would depend on how wisely it is put into operation. The abolition of military aviation, he said, must go hand in hand with making civil aviation international.

A Bahá'í note was sounded in so many speeches, it must certainly give Bahá'ís new courage to see these principles discussed by some people who perhaps never heard the word Bahá'í. The spirit of the new age is in the air. "Be and it is." So a sure way to peace is the promotion of these universal teachings of Bahá'u'lláh among the diplomats, the press, the educators and the masses.

The peoples of the world, when they understand these teachings, can bring such a pressure to bear, that governments must disarm. The best way to force out darkness is to bring in Light!

THE THREATENED war between Japan and China, if it had to be it was well that it came at the time of this Disarmament Conference and that the Extraordinary Session of the League of Nations was called now, because it showed to all the world how very essential are universal principles for peace.

As a Bahá'í, I see the inner Japan and China, and I know the secret of their coming together as brothers. Visiting Japan in 1930 the head of the Bureau of Religions said to me that Japan was so eager in realizing material progress in civilization that perhaps she had neglected the spiritual civilization. He continued: "Recently our people have become aware of the defects of the past sixty years and they are becoming more conscious of the need of the religious part. There are as many denominations in Japan as in the west. I am sick of denominations, and I consider it very desirable to have all these religions united. If Bahá'ism can succeed in uniting all religions, the Bahá'í Movement will be the ideal of the world." Many of the great men of Japan were interested in the spiritual advancement of their people.

Count Okuma had said to me on a former visit to Japan: "What the youth of Japan need more than anything else, is pure religion. Not the creeds of the Christians nor the dogmas of the Buddhists, but the pure teachings of Christ and the pure teachings of Buddha. I will study these universal principles of Bahá'u'lláh and if they offer pure religion, I shall teach them to the youth of Japan."

'Abdu'l-Bahá said of Japan: "Japan will turn ablaze! Japan with one other country will take the lead in the spiritual reawakening of peoples and nations that the world shall soon witness." He said how good it would be if a group of Bahá'is could travel through Japan.

China, on the other hand, holds the key to the next few centuries. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said if these universal peace principles could be given to a few of the thinkers of China, they themselves would take them to their people. One day, in New York City, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to Mr. Mountfort Mills: "If China does not accept these universal peace principles of Bahá'u'lláh, China will become the greatest military power in the world." But China is taking a deep interest in them, and it is the nations that accept these principles, live them and promote them that will take the lead in the new civilization of the future. There will be great friendships among those nations.

HERE IN Geneva a world drama is unfolding before our eyes. We know what 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Who was in Geneva in 1911, meant when He said: "There is a spiritual force in the Lake of Geneva, there is a spiritual force in the Lake of Galilee, and the forces are akin." It is here that the League of Nations has put into reality some of the principles for the Parliament of Man. During the first days of this Disarmament Conference, I thought that if the League came out strongly with the spirit of the Covenant, it might be the time when the United States would join the League of Nations. There cannot be complete disarmament and world peace until every nation joins in a world society, until boundaries are defined, and nations through the spiritual Teachings of God become trustworthy.

Greater than the question of Shanghai and Manchuria, is the question of the functioning of the League of Nations. China, this great power representing one-fourth of the population of the globe, turned to the League and rested her case with it. Sitting at these sessions, I feel that if the League does not stand by what it promised, China, losing faith in the word of the west may build up such a military organization that in less than a century, some of the present great western powers may be destroyed; and perhaps the higher League of Nations, represented by all countries and in reality a Universal Court of Arbitration may be situated not in Europe, but in China!

"How pressing and sacred the responsibility that now weighs upon those who are already acquainted with these Teachings! How glorious the task of those who are called upon to vindicate their truth, and demonstrate their practicability to an unbelieving world! Nothing short of an immovable conviction in their divine origin, and their uniqueness in the annals of religion; nothing short of an unwavering purpose to execute and apply them to the administrative machinery of the Cause, can be sufficient to establish their reality, and insure their success. How vast is the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh! How great the magnitude of His blessings showered upon humanity in this day! And yet, how poor, how inadequate our conception of their significance and glory! This generation stands too close to so colossal a Revelation to appreciate, in their full measure, the infinite possibilities of His Faith, the unprecedented character of His Cause, and the mysterious dispensations of His Providence."

THE MASHRIQU'L-ADHKAR*

DR. ZIA BAGDADI

"When the foundation of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is laid in America, and that divine edifice is completed, a most wonderful and thrilling motion will appear in the world of existence."

"When its accessories are completed and its full machinery starts running, when the melody of vocal and instrumental music arises and bursts upon the air with its joyous trends, when the prayers and supplications addressed at dawn and at sunrise ascend to the Throne of the Almighty, then will the effect of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár be made evident and manifest."—'Abdul-Bahá.

TWAS just about a year ago that the second stage of building the Bahá'í Temple in Wilmette, near Chicago, was completed, the Temple officially dedicated at the opening of the Annual Convention, and the great glad-tidings broadcasted from the heart of America to every country throughout the world. To Bahá'ís everywhere this joyous news was like a welcome shower to the soil of dry and thirsty plants.

Every intelligent reader knows that certain material things have tremendous spiritual effect and influence. For instance, music—both from instrument and voice—simply signifies hearing material vibrations in the air; and beauty only means material shape, form and consistency of an object, yet, how great is the power of their influence upon the human soul. Therefore, is it a wonder, that this new House of Worship—the Bahá'í Temple of America—even in its incomplete stage, has created such world wide interest? To describe all the wonderful effects caused by this Holy Sanctuary would require considerable amount of time and space, which, unfortunately, are both lacking at this time. For this reason just a few facts based on personal knowledge and observation will be mentioned with the hope that they may be of interest to the readers of the Bahá'í Magazine.

The first effect that emanated from the Temple was the great joy that has filled the hearts of all the Bahá'ís of the world. For now they can plainly see their Universal Cause firmly established in its outer edifice, the Temple, which is the symbol of the inner, the emblem of the unity of all religions, nations, and races. As Ruhi Effendi Afnan says:

"Behind and beyond the actual Temple there is a spirit and a program for world reform of which the building is only an expression."

Another blessing came through the power of the Temple to unite in genuine unity, fellowship and enthusiasm the Bahá'ís of America, especially in the greatest metropolitan center of the middle west, Chicago and its suburban towns. Bahá'ís from Milwaukee, Racine and Kenosha, Wisconsin, drive with their friends to attend the Sunday meeting in the Foundation Hall of the Temple.

As to the public interest the Temple has created—it is beyond any description. People of every walk of life, tourists from all parts of the country and foreign lands, come singly and in groups, every day and at all hours. Architects, engineers, master mechanics and builders marvel at the peerless design and strength of the Temple. Merchants wonder at the beauty and texture of the priceless rugs which decorate the walls of the Foundation Hall. On learning of the history connected with these rugs, most of the visitors become moved with spiritual emotions. For these rugs originally were made by Bahá'í expert Persian rug weavers. Every one of the millions of knots had to be tied by their hands, while their eyes were shedding tears because of their pure love and sincere devotion to their beloved Master, Bahá'u'lláh, and for His Holy Shrine to which these rugs were sent from Persia. There they were placed and remained for many years until the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, Shoghi Effendi, sent them as a present from their sacred place to America's Bahá'í Temple.

Doctors, teachers and students who visit the Temple and attend the meetings express deep interest and appreciation after they hear the Bahá'í program for a new world civilization that is free from depression and human suffering.

In a letter which Ruhi Effendi Afnan wrote from Haifa he says:

"Shoghi Effendi is very glad to hear that the Temple is creating such interest around and that many people are daily coming to visit it and listen to the lectures given there. This is the realization of the Master's explicit promise. It will become even more true when the Temple is completed and the ornamentations, both of the exterior and interior, added. Let us hope for that day to come and spare no effort in spreading its realization."

In order to help the care-taker in meeting the multitudes of visitors, Bahá'í volunteers from Wilmette and Chicago are giving many hours of their time, taking turns in showing visitors around and answering their questions. Notwithstanding this more help is still needed.

"There is something about this Temple that seems to uplift my soul," said a visitor to his wife. "That is just how I feel, dear" was her reply.

While talking to Dr. Alexander Magnus, Medical Director of the Chicago Sanitarium, who in years past, shared my office, a young man said to him; "Say, Doctor, in Christian churches you find Christians, in Muhammadan Mosques you find Muhammadans, in Jewish Synagogues you find Jews, in Hindu Temples you find Hindus. But in the Bahá'í Temple, you find them all — Christians, Muhammadans, Jews, Hindus, Japanese, Chinese, Zoroastrians, different sects, nationalities and races. The doctor replied, "That is what the world needs, but human nature is slow in taking its medicine."

Mr. John —, a paralyzed young man, who used to receive a little help now and then from me before depression days, came to my office about four months ago looking for work. He looked desperate. "Come to my house in Wilmette tomorrow morning. We will have breakfast together and talk things over," I suggested. He came, and after breakfast I took him to the Temple and told him to sit and pray with me. Then leaving the Temple, I told him to go and look for work. But on that same afternoon, lo and behold! That same John — appeared again at my office door! "What are you doing here?" I exclaimed. "Oh, I just came to let you know I found a job near here," said he, with a big smile.

It is very significant indeed, to see how, during the day, from the heart of the Temple the light of spiritual knowledge and divine guidance is shining upon those who, with pure hearts and receptive minds enter therein and how during the night the powerful electric light streaming forth through its high glass dome is guiding airplanes and boats on Lake Michigan.

Praying for its completion, Ruhí Effendi wrote: "May God help the friends to sustain their sacrifices until the edifice is completed."

And here is a new appeal from the Guardian, Shoghi Effendi, which reached me a few days ago:

"I trust and pray that your collective, self-sacrificing endeavors will reinforce the resources of the National Assembly and will enable them to place the necessary contracts for the decoration of the dome and insure its completion by the end of the spring of 1933. May the Almighty guide, bless, and sustain you in your stupendous task and reward you a thousand fold for your manifold services to His Faith."

Let us hope and pray and sacrifice, that the Temple may be completed by the end of next spring, that its blessings may appear and thrill the world.

Nothing short of direct and constant interaction between the spiritual forces emanating from this House of Worship centering in the heart of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, and the energies consciously displayed by those who administer its affairs in their service to humanity can possibly provide the necessary agency capable of removing the ills that have so long and so grievously afflicted humanity. For it is assuredly upon the consciousness of the efficacy of the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, reinforced on one hand by spiritual communion with His Spirit, and on the other by the intelligent application and the faithful execution of the principles and laws He revealed, that the salvation of a world in travail must ultimately depend. And of all the institutions that stand associated with His Holy Name, surely none save the institution of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár can most adequately provide the essentials of Bahá'í worship and service, both so vital to the regeneration of the world. Therein lies the secret of the loftiness, of the potency, of the unique position of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár as one of the outstanding institutions conceived by Bahá'u'lláh.—Shoghi Effendi.

JEWS, CATHOLICS AND PROTESTANTS CONFER

LOUIS G. GREGORY

Mr. Gregory is a Bahá'í teacher of broad culture and wide travels in behalf of the Bahá'í Cause. He is a member of the National Bahá'í Spiritual Assembly and the National Interracial Committee. His observations on this remarkable attempt at the breaking down of religious prejudices is well worth our attention.

THE Spirit of the new age and the Light from on High are reflected nowadays in many gatherings of men. Peoples whose differences, from all traditions, have been thought irreconcilable, are trying to find fellowship. Those may well be joyous who, essaying the impossible, succeed.

A most interesting and inspiring series of meetings was the national conference of Jews, Catholics and Protestants recently held at our nation's capital. It was a seminar of ten sessions, is organized as a going concern, and numbers among its sponsors and workers many of the most eminent people of the nation. Statesmen, magnates, bishops, rabbis, judges, authors, editors, educators, philanthropists, celebrities of many kinds, lent their active or constructive presence. They met those of lesser degree on terms of equality and friendliness, without stiffness or ceremony. The meetings, though many and varied, were as direct as a body of business men would be in their efforts to explore and remove within the nation all friction caused by religious rancor. The general theme was "Religious liberty and mutual understanding" and membership was unrestricted save by the formality of a small fee. Its hope was to remove prejudices among the three leading religious groups in America. It felt that such narrowness came mostly as a heritage and has been most unfortunate in the rust and friction it brings into such necessary human relations as business, social life and government.

At the same time it was stated and reiterated by various speakers, that no hope or expectation of a change of faith by any of those numbered within the three religious groups was in sight. But all seemed to feel that they could unite in service to country and in those humanitarian measures of relief which all men admire.

Three keynote speakers appeared at the opening session. Rt. Rev. J. E. Freeman, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Washington said in part:

"This conference has no design of effecting some new kind of ecclesiastical merger. But the forces of this age are compelling us to regard more seriously the words of Benjamin Franklin, 'We'll hang together or we'll hang separately!' Jew, Catholic and Protestant, these are our designations; but they shall not render us immune to an appeal that concerns our solidarity as a people or our peace and security as a nation."

Rev. Francis J. Haas, director of the National Catholic School of Social Service, declared, "The man or the woman, whether Catholic, Protestant or Jew, who raises the voice of bigotry is a traitor to his country and a criminal before his God. We are here not to impugn each others beliefs, but to indict the forces that prevent us from living and working happily together."

Rabbi Abram Simon of the Washington Hebrew Congregation, averred:

"We propose in this conference to drag into the open our prejudices and misinterpretations, examine them objectively and submit them to the light of unbiased study. In that way only shall we be able to sweep away the errors and lay new foundations for an edifice of fraternal relations among people of opposite acts and faiths."

The seminars used the laboratory method in bringing to light causes of woe in our national life. Illustrations among many offered were:— "Vocational discrimination against Jews, et al; social ostracism of groups; Unconscious training in regard to prejudices; Conscious religious education that leads to prejudices; Personal insults and attacks against individuals; Political prejudices; Fear of certain organizations; Fear of intermarriage; Money profits growing out of the exploitation of certain prejudices; Unyielding opposition to a group, with utter ignorance of individuals composing it; Love of uniformity by many people; Ignorance; Intense nationalism."

THE SEMINAR in considering these and related subjects turned into a U table conference. Seated on a platform in full view of the large audience was a group of eminent thinkers, representing three religious groups and two races. These men were expected to supply remedies for the many ills. Among the wise things said may be mentioned the following:

"Whenever one group of its own motion separates itself from all other groups, it by such an attitude breeds misunderstandings."

"Religious groups should study the historical back-ground of other groups thereby discovering the causes of present practices which are misunderstood."

"Eliminate from school books all teachings which foment prejudices."

"Clergymen often oppose mergers of faiths, rarely the laity."

"Read the Bible without interpretation."

"Read in the schools extracts from the Holy Books of all religions."

Thus it may be illustrated how the conference, projected to study and correct only national ills, would not infrequently gravitate to the plane of universality and embrace mankind.

This tendency may be illustrated further by the story of a young clergyman who told how he had been a Presbyterian by birth, had attended a Congregational divinity school and was now filling a pastorate in a large city and in a subdivision which contained a great number of Jews and Muhammadans. His life was now made joyous by service to all three religions and to such an extent are his energies used up that he has neither time nor strength to mention creeds. He closed with an exhortation to lay emphasis upon justice, social ethics and work.

Another very earnest speaker declared that he was born a Morman, but had relatives among both Catholics and Protestants, so that he could not oppose other religions without hating his own kith and kin. Now he found delight in gathering together the hundred Morman students in Washington and with them studying all religions. He was told about the Bahá 'i outlook and place of meeting.

THE CONFERENCE spent a considerable part of its time divided into round table seminars, allowing more intimate contacts between people of different faiths and comparison of varied viewpoints. This brought out some of the trials experienced by minority groups in our religious and community life. An enjoyable feature was the noontide luncheon served on two occasions and showing no racial, sectional, class or creedal barriers. A United States Senator from the far South was observed seated at a table with one or more colored delegates. Breadth and friendliness pervaded all the meetings. People spoke with much frankness but also with good humor.

When the matter of prejudices as affecting the white and colored was broached at one of the meetings, it was ruled out by the chairman as not coming within the scope of the conference, which was organized only to remove religious prejudices. This decision was far from unanimous and on a test vote might have been overruled. Later at one of the large sessions a high tribute was paid the colored race for its cultural contribution to American civilization, a notable address was made by the eloquent president of Howard University, and the Men's Glee Club of that great institution gave a recital of Negro music which seemed greatly appreciated by all. Toward the end of this recital one of the colored delegates was observed to approach the director, who had just announced the Crucifixion as one of the concluding songs. The suggestion which was acted upon was that this song be omitted, as it brings much of heart-ache to our Jewish friends who were present in such numbers and showing forth so much happiness.

PERHAPS the highest flight of this conference was attained on the second day, when Dr. Carlton J. H. Hayes of Columbia University, who shared the honors of co-chairmen with Hon. Newton D. Baker for the Protestants and Roger W. Strauss, Esq. for the Jews, spoke on "Historical Backgrounds for the Discussion of Inter-Group Relations." In a most powerful way, the speaker showed the inevitable tendencies of religious majorities to oppress dissenting minorities. "The majority religion has always the chief responsibility in assuring, as well as proclaiming, religious liberty," he said. "As minorities, Jews and Catholics have been eager for equality of treatment in politics and society; more eager to obtain such rights than the Protestant majority to grant them. Thereby friction has been increased. The test of religious liberty is not the admission to equality of only such persons as believe the same as we do or are indifferent to religion. It is whether we admit such persons who believe quite differently from ourselves and are zealous in the practice of their religion. While I believe that I am right, I must sincerely respect your belief that you are right." He then proceeded to flay the Jewish majority for their intolerant attitude toward a new Prophet nearly two thousand years ago. Some of our Jewish friends were observed to wince under his castigation. Although himself a Catholic, he next excoriated Catholic majorities for their inhuman treatment of both Jews and Protestants. Next he paid his respects to Protestant majorities for their barbarous treatment of Catholics and Jews and sometimes even other Protestants, and for the sometimes unholy alliances of Protestant sects with each other for tyrannic sway over Catholics and Jews. These statements were established by historical records beyond cavil and as a summing up of his indictment this veritable "Daniel come to judgment" demanded of Jews, Catholics and Protestants that each and all should say, Mea Culpa! So powerful was the tide of eloquence, so perfect the style abounding in brilliant epigrams, so evenly balanced were the scales of justice upheld, that at the close of this remarkable address Catholics, Protestants and Jews arose to their feet as one, with prolonged applause.

THIS CONFERENCE was noble, exalted and worthy of great praise. People of breadth and vision, with love for humanity and passion for service are included in its membership. Like all things human in origin it was subject to human limitations. It was not a world conference. It made no official attempt to solve world problems as such, its specific and definite objective being to make life more livable for citizens of the United States and Canada. It took its cue from George Washington, illustrious father of the American government, who in his words to Catholics, Protestants and Jews counselled tolerance and freedom. Had he not been free from bigotry he could not have been the truly great man that history records.

This conference did not aim at organic unity. Such a purpose was inconceivable to its delegates as a whole. Yet they are preparing the way for such a step. Therefore more power to them! As this conference includes people of great influence, and meets in various cities, those who are informed of the program and message of Bahá'u'lláh should follow it up and enroll as members. A teaching which proves the unity of religion and science has much to offer them. A true unity will come only when all superstitions vanish. A touching incident of the conference was the attitude of the venerable Rabbi Morris Lazeron of Baltimore, who committed the gathering to the inevitable separations caused by creeds, and yet, as if apologetic for the fixedness of dogmas, advocated for each and all the virtue of humility. "A greater Jew than myself," he declared, obviously alluding to Jesus Christ, "once taught that virtue." O that the Master of 'Akká might address them, demonstrating as He did the "underlying unity and basic harmony of all religions." His message they must know. His spirit they will eventually find. Even now it animates their endeavors. The Bahá'í seeds which were sown in the limited opportunities offered, appeared to be finding fertile soil.

SEEKING AND FINDING

BY ONE WHO HAS "SOUGHT" AND "FOUND"

"In whatsoever matter man wisheth to engage, he must first acquire some capability and make provisions and preparations therefor." —'Abdu'l-Bahá.

CHAPTER IV

THE eventful trip from the Atlantic to the Pacific during those happy months attained its climax in the Spring when I met face to face His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Chicago (1912). Viewed in retrospect those months were indeed a period of definite preparation for this greatest gift of my life!

Before passing on to the glorious hour, however, I wish to take you with me into another harbor where my soul found comfort and strength and a fuller realization of what such a contact would entail should I ever attain the meeting (with 'Abdu'l-Bahá).

Thornton Chase, like Mrs. Lua Getsinger mentioned in Chapter 3, whom I met at that time, also shared most generously with me his experiences in 'Akká and Haifa. These two devoted and selfless disciples of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, especially, seemed to quicken and release a latent spiritual dynamic within my heart and soul, making each step along the Path an increase of attraction and illumination.

Mr. Chase was a veritable tower of spiritual strength, coupled with humility, gentleness and unceasing service. He stood out preeminently as a lover of God and a brother to all mankind. I was greatly impressed by the depth of his inner understanding, the breadth of his spiritual vision and the clarity of his mind. He possessed an inner stillness that at times was startling, and as he taught it was as though one stepped with him into an inner world that might be called a holy court, in which the spiritual sight became more keen, the inner ear more attuned to divine melodies, and the spirit seemed to contact with the Reality of existence. His attraction to the "Divine Beloved One" was so complete that he found it difficult to carry on in the practical world of affairs.

He was connected with one of the large Life Insurance Companies of America, and shortly before I met him had been transferred from the middle west to California, largely due to the fact that they felt he devoted too much time to the spread of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh.

This transfer did not at first cause him joy, but desiring always to be where he could serve most, he wrote to a friend, "My moving to the coast has not been of my own will or making but I am moved without any action on my part. Let us hope it is for some purpose of God to His Cause. . . . Give my loving greetings to the dear friends there (Cincinnati) and bid them be firm and steadfast under all conditions."

As his business took him from city to city he arranged in advance so that almost every night of his life he was engaged in speaking about the Cause of God before groups or individuals. Cold, heat or storm were never deterrents in his pathway.

A stenographer in one of the offices where he called occasionally delights to tell of her impressions of him as he passed in and out. She says that the moment he entered there was a different atmosphere. He filled the room with joy and happiness and lifted every one around him. That a light seemed to pour forth from his countenance. Countless and similar testimonies are still current in the cities thru which he passed.

I am convinced that the greatest service that I can render our readers at this juncture is to put you directly in touch with his luminous spirit thru quoting a few extracts from his letters written to believers. You will thus clearly realize what he meant to me, at that time a young seeker after truth, who had been a student of the Bahá'í teachings for a comparatively short period. The Water of Life was given clear and pure from that stream to my thirsty heart.

As far back as 1901, which was several years before he had visited 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the Most Great Prison in 'Akká, he wrote these words: "I wish that every believer, and everyone who has been inclined toward these Truths could have heard Mrs. Isabella Brittingham (another faithful disciple of 'Abdu'l-Bahá) who spoke to us here (Chicago) a week ago. . . . She gives us the most clear and understandable account of our dear Master of any we have received, and her words and manner, wisdom and sincerity, stir our minds and hearts with great power, and confirm us in all that we have dared to hope. He, the most dignified, the most majestic, the most humble, the sweetest, the highest and the lowest, the king and the servant, the wisest, the most powerful, the most loving, the most merciful of all men, is indeed our Lord and Master, our princely leader in this religion of unity and of servitude. His whole life is one of devoted service in little things as well as in great, to each pilgrim there, to every person, He renders His service, never accepting even a piece of bread, until all present are first provided for. And this is not assumption on His part, but is the sincere outflowing of His love to each and all, and this same love asserts itself constantly in gladness or pain, in peace or in trouble, in freedom or imprisonment."

And again in this paean of devotion referring to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, he pours forth his innermost soul in deepest adoration: "He is the Master! He is the Christ-Spirit of this Great Age! He is the Anointed One! The Appointed of His Father! That Father was the Greatest Manifestation of God—Bahá'u'lláh. He ('Abdu'l-Bahá) is the Center of the Covenant; the Healer and Satisfier of longing hearts! The King of servitude to Humanity!"

Replying to a letter which had dealt with such subjects as higher criticism, the psychic realm, and psychical research, he says: "It is good to be skeptical provided one does not bar himself from any conviction. The skepticism of an open mind is excellent, and better than a too great readiness to accept whatever appears. Yet it is better to believe all things than to believe nothing. In fact beliefs do not amount to much until they enter the life and re-create it.

"Higher criticism, after all is only an effort of the human mind, and is not comparable to that Highest Criticism which is of the All-Knowing, the Wise One. It is but playing in shallow pools while the great ocean of divine utterances of perfect knowledge and wisdom, is swelling up its waves for our use. It is but drinking at a little rivulet instead of quenching our thirst forever at the fountain of sweet water gushing out from the height of the mountain.

“Psychic Research is a dangerous plaything, not at all safe for any soul unless he be grounded and anchored already in the Truth of the Living God. The psychic realm is a field of danger, lying between the plane of earth and the heaven of Spirit. No human soul needs any psychic baptism in order to attain to his Highest, but rather the baptism of the Water of Truth, of real knowledge and holy instructions and the baptism of the Spirit, which is the blending of the life with the Spirit of God, so that His will becomes the center and power of our lives. Then, when He has entered His home—the human heart—the whole temple is illumined and each of its pillars becomes radiative with Light. This is the true process of advancement, and most wonderfully does Bahá'u'lláh give us that Light and guides us in the Right Path.”

Several years later when referring to his visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at ‘Akká he said, “It rejoices his heart to know of American believers, because he foresees that the great Light is to be reflected from America to the farthest Orient, China, India, Japan and even Persia.”

In speaking of Bahá’is, he says—
“We do not argue . . . argument rarely convinces, but rather antagonizes. In fact argument implies opposites, and the Bahá’i teaching is not so much words as living and it implies harmony and agreement, not opposition.”

Subsequent to his Pilgrimage to ‘Akká he wrote: “The Bahá’i Revelation is for every soul who is sincere, and to such it can bring a satisfaction and assurance that is permanent and sweet. I do earnestly hope that our friend Dr. — will be attracted to ‘Akká, and that going there she will carry an open mind, a sincere heart, an unprejudiced attention. She will find a Man, one so entirely natural and devoid of assumption. . . . One whose words will be so simple that children would be interested, One to whom personality is of no account. . . . But if once her soul meets ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, she will find that after her visit, and as ships and trains bear her farther away from Him, she will increasingly wish that she might return to sit at His feet and learn more of Him.”

“Sometimes our friends are surprised that the visitors to ‘Akká do not write or tell more important things concerning their experiences there. They all tell about the same story—of the pleasant greetings, the wishes for their happiness, the inquiries for the progress of the Cause in America, and a few simple instructions drawn from little things or occurrences there. But ask those returning ones what they desire most of all, and you will find it is the wish to go again to ‘Akká. And you will find that those simple good wishes and “Table Talks” have sown seeds in their souls, and they are not the same as they were before they went. . . . One cannot taste of heaven without longing for the atmosphere of heaven.”

THORNTON CHASE was born in Springfield, Mass., and ascended to the world of light in California in the Fall of 1912. In Inglewood Cemetery, Los Angeles on October 4, 1912, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá paid to him the following great tribute: “This revered personage was the first Bahá’i in America. He served the Cause faithfully and his services will ever be remembered throughout ages and cycles. . . . For the present his worth is not known, but in the future it will be inestimably dear. His sun will ever be shining, his stars will ever bestow the light. The people will honor this grave. Therefore, the friends of God must visit this grave and on my behalf bring flowers and seek the sublimity of the spiritual station for him and have the utmost consideration for the members of his family. This personage will not be forgotten.”

A beautiful slab now marks the spot where his body rests. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Himself provided this stone and Mr. Charles Mason Remey designed The Greatest Name that is inscribed thereon.

Doubtless he, beholding with clearer vision, realizes why he was led to California, and what is even now, thru the Divine Wisdom being accomplished at that grave. Bahá’i friends from all parts of the world gather there to pray for him, and give praise to Almighty God for such a life! Of him ‘Abdu’l-Bahá once said: “Thornton Chase is unique and peerless.”*

*Two books by Thornton Chase—“In Galilee” and “The Baha’i Revelation,” have already brought guidance and illumination to countless souls.

THE OLD ORDER CHANGETH

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

NEWs of a novel trip has recently come to us. Two friends, one colored and one white, traveled together as friends and equals in the South. The plan was to assume that there was no prejudice against this very reasonable relationship and the object to spread the Bahá’i Message both by example and by word of mouth. Of these two friends, one was gifted as a singer, the other as a public speaker. The two were received not only with courtesy in the dozen or so colleges and universities visited but with real hospitality and joy. As guests in many homes they formed real friendships. The complete account of this trip is full of human interest and significance. The few extracts quoted below show how old prejudices are dropping away and a new spirit is being born.

EARLY IN the trip the following scene took place on the campus of a southern state university. Could it have gone unchallenged twenty-five or even ten years ago?

“After parking my car, we walked on the campus together and located Dr. ———, a nationally renowned sociologist, who was lecturing to his class in civics. We waited for the conclusion of his lecture at the entrance of his classroom, on the advice of a student in the hall. As the students emerged they found Mr. N. and I chatting and joking together in a most natural and friendly manner. Dr. ——— soon saw us and greeted us most cordially. . . . Behind him trailed several students who were absorbing the entire incident, and showing their astonishment at the phenomenon of our visit.”

WE ARE reminded by the next incident, which occurred on the return trip, that the old order still persists and that the need of more workers like these two devoted souls is urgent.

“I am compelled here to relate the only unpleasant incident of our entire trip. On the very doorstep of A. University at C., as we were leaving, we assisted two boys, who were hiking their way from Florida to New York. After we had left Professor A., I stopped at a restaurant to purchase some sandwiches for these boys. Mr. N. (my colored friend and companion), inquired if I desired him to go with me, to which I readily said ‘Yes’. We entered the restaurant, which was connected with a hotel on the main street. I ordered the sandwiches. There was no one else in the restaurant at that time except the counter man (white). Before the sandwiches were ready another man (white) came in and sat at the counter. Mr. N. and I remained standing. The counter man returned with the sandwiches, and because of the presence of the additional patron, commanded Mr. N. to remove his hat. Mr. N. paid no attention to his request. I started to pay the man for the food but he kept his attention fixed on Mr. N., and repeated his command. Then

I lost my patience and said, ‘This man (meaning the patron) has his hat on. I have my hat on. Why should he take his hat off?’ ‘We do not permit colored people in here, unless they remove their hats,’ he replied. Whereupon Mr. N. walked out slowly, having retained his composure throughout. I was not quite satisfied so I walked over to the news counter and purchased a newspaper. Then I told the counter man of how wonderfully gifted a man Mr. N. was and he said it made no difference, he was a negro. I left with a sad heart at the thought that my companion so cultured, so splendid in character—the equal of any man of any color or race—should have suffered such unjust discrimination.

BUT HERE is a little incident which gives us courage:

“We learned from Professor A. that he was for three years the head of the French Department at A. University. While there he was elected to membership in the ——— Club. This group is composed of members of the faculty of the University of ——— in the same city. At the time of his election a number of professors objected to his dark skin and threatened to resign. Whereupon twenty-five of the members evidenced their resentment of so narrow a prejudice by voluntarily resigning to form a new club with Professor A., meeting regularly with him at A. University. This was a splendid testimony of the esteem he enjoyed while in C. The group regretfully dissolved when he moved away.”

FROM ONE deeply interested and experienced in inter-racial amity work, a Director of Extension Service in one university visited, comes this advice:

"We should not emphasize inter-racial activities as organizations, but as individuals.

"We should (1) set up our objectives: better relations, and equality according to merit and ability; (2) plan our activities, such as dances, dinners, concerts, etc., and carry them out in a normal way; (3) follow through the definite steps of the plan."

THE FOLLOWING MOVING words were spoken by a teacher of history in a college for colored students, on hearing the Bahá'í Message for the first time:

"The Bahá'í Movement is the greatest Movement in the world today, and is worthy of any man devoting all his life to it. To achieve the objects of this Movement is worth all other things put together. Because when it achieves its objectives all other things right themselves and we will have peace. We are all working for peace.

"When truth is sounded and you are in tune, your soul responds and tells you it is true. When I heard this Movement explained it resounded through my soul. . . . I will take every opportunity to spread this wherever possible. I consider it my mission. I am going to know more about it. I am going to be free. It has a dynamic. It is bound to succeed existing religions, because present religion is of the past, and I am going to let it stay in the past."

AND THESE telling words were uttered by the president of another college to his students:

"These two gentlemen have no consciousness that they represent two different races. Out of the Holy Land—Palestine—that laboratory of religions—this Bahá'í Movement came. I want to tell you the story of my brother. When we were younger, I remember he went to my mother and said that he was dissatisfied and was going to find another God. After he had gone I found my mother weeping and she asked, 'Will he find another God'? Now that is the situation all over the world. Over here they are looking up and praying to God—over there they are looking up and praying to God. All are praying to the same God for there is but one God. This movement goes further and says there is one humanity. . . . In spite of all differences, man must find a means of uniting in a common brotherhood."

IN A PRIVATE interview was revealed the true spiritual nature of one of the professors of a state university. These are some of his words:

"In this world today we are trying to get the fruits of love through the spirit of hate. . . . If the world ever goes forward it must step forward through love and kindness and mutuality. Our whole life must be mystical. We must draw nearer to God. We must know God. We must take time to be holy. The Prophets of the world have always been men apart from the crowd. Truth must come out from deserts, from mountains and from prisons."

THESE FRAGMENTS give us a glimpse of the new spirit that is surely developing in our country. They show some of the first fruits of what one of the two travelers calls the "most unique journey" he had ever undertaken. "I believe," he says, "it marks the beginning of a new era in the history of inter-racial work in the South. This prophecy has already found some fulfillment, for another similar trip was accomplished soon after this pioneer one."*

*This later trip was made by two distinguished Baha'i teachers—one colored and the other white, and one a member of the National Interracial Committee of the Baha'is. The reports coming to us about this trip in the interests of the divine art of getting on together, indicate that great progress has been made.

Every Bahá'í Assembly in the world is actively working for this greatest of human needs—the overcoming of racial prejudice and the establishment of an actual unity and brotherhood. This Committee bears a striking title, namely, UNITY OF EAST AND WEST COMMITTEE. Not all of the members of the Committee are represented in the picture as some were not able to be present when the group was photographed.

“Those who help on the Cause of Unity are doing God’s work. Unity is the divine bounty for this luminous century. Enmity is not so much the cause of separation as it used to be; the cause of disunion now is mostly prejudice . . . In the sight of God color makes no difference at all. He looks at the hearts of men.”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

ONE OF the most pressing needs that the world faces today is the abolition of racial prejudice. We cannot expect to realize a parliament of nations and the brotherhood of man so long as the psychology of race hatred persists.

Intercourse, acquaintance, familiarity, can do a great deal to abolish race prejudice; but even these things cannot be altogether efficacious. For instance, the British and the Hindus have mingled closely in their lives for a century in India, but the prejudice has not been abolished. Hindus and Muhammadans have lived side by side in the villages of India, but the prejudice is as strong now as it was centuries ago. It is evident that ordinary contacts, even of a sympathetic nature, are not sufficient to abolish prejudice; for prejudice is something deep-seated, something that takes its roots in the emotions.

If it were a reasoned intellectual matter, prejudice could be overcome by an awakened intelligence. But it does not belong to the category of things intellectual. It cannot be cured therefore by intellectual development, although it can be ameliorated by such development.

There is only one force powerful enough to control the lower emotions in humanity and to obliterate all traces of prejudice, that is the force of religion. Only a spiritual power can bring men of different races and religions together in absolute unity and brotherhood.

THE BAHÁ'Í Movement has as one of its principle aims the abolition of prejudice—national, racial, religious; and the substitution of a real brotherhood based upon mutual understanding and affection. Religion has performed such miracles before, and will continue to do so. But nothing short of religion can work this miracle.

In this country the interracial problem focuses almost entirely upon relations of the colored and white races. Many forces are operative in attempts to harmonize these two races and bring about more of a social and economic unity; but a powerful religious impulse alone can affect a real brotherhood between these races, abolishing emotional barriers and all vestiges of prejudice.

Bahá'is everywhere in the country over are working earnestly in this field of race amity. In the large cities conferences are held yearly. But more important than the flow of words from a platform, is the endeavor to actually get together in a human way at the banquet table. For as the Arab says, "He who shares my bread shares my life." To actually sit at the table, to actually partake of food together, is to perform the sacrament of brotherhood. Two such momentous occasions the reader will find described later in these pages.*

Such social gatherings of the two races (and of course many other races are included) is one of the most significant works that is being done by the Bahá'ís today in this country. It is of little effect for Bahá'ís to preach brotherhood if they do not put it into practice, even though it take courage and the facing of social disapprobation.

And after all this is only the normal thing. Unity, harmony, brotherhood is not some extraordinary endeavor. It is merely permitting the natural flow of human intercourse. Once the barriers are removed, this mingling together in mutual understanding and friendship is as much a joy and inspiration to one race as it is to the other.

THE PERSIAN Bahá'ís early faced the dilemma of matching doctrine with practice, and met it with boldness and spiritual zeal. Their gospel of brotherhood, of unity, of love, could not exist as mere preachments. Therefore it became necessary for Muslim Bahá'ís to fraternize with Jewish and Zoroastrian Bahá'ís. But in Persia the social dangers of such fraternization were much graver even than in this country, for religious bigotry and prejudice there heightened the social barriers.

In the early days of the Cause in Persia, for Muslim Bahá'ís to be seen fraternizing with Jewish or Zoroastrian Bahá'ís meant almost certain death. At first therefore this practice of brotherhood had to be carried on in secrecy. Later, as the persecutions became mitigated by more thorough political control and order, the Bahá'ís of different creeds and races could mingle more safely and more visibly. Even then, however, social stigma played such an important part that Muslim Bahá'ís and the Bahá'ís of other religions would find it wiser to move to some suburb of the town where they could be together and yet at the same time be somewhat segregated from the persecution mania of non-Bahá'í fellow townsmen.

Today, for the first time, under the enlightened rule of Reza Shah the Bahá'ís can mingle publicly in their lectures and unity feasts without fear of persecution or of mobderision. A traveler who would witness the amazing miracle of Muhammadans, Jews, Zoroastrains, Christians, sitting at table together in the utmost love and unity, should realize that this stupendous spectacle of brotherhood has been effected only over the course of many years and at cost of dangers, of bloodshed, of thousands of martyrdoms.

THUS WE SEE it is not so easy to establish in actual practice the poet's dream of the brotherhood of man. The average human is content to let well enough alone. If strong prejudice exists, the average man keeps on the safe side of the street. And thus prejudice continues to exist.

Let us be sure that nothing can stop prejudice except the actual expression of love; and that those who first venture to make this active expression of love court derision, opposition, even social persecution. Therefore one can see that successful work in the field of interracial unity must depend upon a strong religious enthusiasm, upon a spiritual power. Only by such aids can the tremendous obstacles to brotherhood be overcome.

SHOGHI EFFENDI, the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, has warned that in this country one of the gravest of problems is that of the relations between the white and colored races. Here in our midst is both the opportunity and the responsibility for the carrying out actually of the principles enumerated by Bahá'u'lláh. If we preach universal brotherhood, we must also practice it. Thus preaching and practice go hand in hand, the one supporting the other; and the attention of thoughtful people outside the Bahá'í world is being forcibly drawn to this pioneer work which the Bahá'ís are accomplishing, in the way of bringing the white and colored races into actual fraternity—a fraternity expressed in every phase of living, social and recreational as well as intellectual.

land dedicated to equal opportunity for every individual, can ill afford to raise barriers merely because of pigmentation. While the problem here is very grave and difficult, yet for that very reason its solution will be powerful in its influence and noble in its accomplishment. Just as America could not remain a country dedicated to slavery, so it cannot remain (and still be true to its democratic principles) a country dedicated to race prejudice.

LET US hope that the ideals held for America by 'Abdu'l-Bahá may eventually prevail, such as are set forth in this prayer by 'Abdu'l-Bahá while He was in America: "O God! Let this democracy become glorious in spiritual attainment even as it has become successful in material degrees. Render this just government victorious. Confirm this revered nation so that it may raise the standard of the Oneness of Humanity and promulgate the Most Great Peace. May it become glorious and praiseworthy among the nations of the earth.

"O God, Almighty Protector! We ask Thee by Thy holiness and bounty to pour out Thy blessing upon this government which has stretched its tent over citizens from every land, that its inhabitants, its industries, its territories may be penetrated by justice."

"The prime cause for all these happenings (wars, etc.) is racial, national, religious and political prejudice; and the root of all this prejudice lies in outworn and deepseated traditions, be they religious, racial, national, or political. So long as these traditions remain, the foundation of the human edifice is insecure, and mankind itself is exposed to continuous peril. . . . Today nothing short of these divine teachings (Bahá'í) can assure peace and tranquility to mankind. But for these teachings this darkness shall never vanish, these chronic diseases shall never be healed; nay, they shall grow fiercer from day to day."

RELIGION AND SOCIAL PROGRESS

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER, M.A.

This is the first of a series of articles which have been written for publication both in The Baha'i Magazine and the Tokyo Nichi Nichi. Articles from the pen of this gifted author are always read with deep interest and profit, and this series undoubtedly will have an especial appeal at this time as they deal so clearly with social progress as related to religion.

AS we examine the course of history we are constrained to recognize the all-important function of religion in man's development and social progress. From age to age there has appeared on earth a Being "peerless and unique," who has exercised over the hearts and minds and souls of those who have heard and accepted His message a power and an authority that is never shared by another person.

Few human beings can influence their fellowmen throughout the course of their own lifetime; to extend this influence to the third or fourth generation is the utmost of human capacity: But the Founders of the great religions of the world change and control the action of millions of people for hundreds, yes, thousands of years, as in the case of Moses and Zoroaster.

All existing civilizations in the world are civilizations originating in religion, so far as history reveals their origin, founded and fostered by great Prophets or Messengers: Brahmanism and Shintoism, being of prehistoric origin must be excluded from historical evidence; but there is every indication of their springing from a personal, not a mythological source.

To repeat, no other than the Founders of the great religions of the world have ever been able to change and regiment whole peoples, races, nations and ethnic groups, within a few brief generations; demolishing the existing beliefs and practices of those to whom they have appeared and substituting their own new and oftentimes drastic teachings.

Up to the threshold of the present century, the great artistic, social, political, legal and educational institutions of history have grown out of the laws, ordinances and principles laid down by the Prophets to the era or people that produced these institutions. The vast scheme of enlightened and humanitarian administration introduced by King Asoka when he embraced Buddhism; the miraculous and dramatic energy of Gothic architecture; the educational enterprises under religious sponsorship in Arabia, India and Europe, the interdependence of church and state, as one of the most firmly established aspects of history; the evident influence of religious doctrine in the codification of Justinian law,—are only a few of the many instances that come to mind as illustrating the far reaching, unparalleled power of the Founders of the great religions of the world.

The only example of appreciable advancement in the fundamental social relations, and the spiritualizing of human practice is due, taking our evidence from history, to these great Messengers and Educators of mankind. Not the founders of new systems of philosophy, not the conquerors of vast territories, not the enlightened scientist, not the monarch, no matter how humane, can accomplish these great ethnological movements over more than brief periods and sporadically.

The One who comes with the authentic religious message from age to age holds the allegiance of His followers when every earthly aspect that accompanied His arrival has been discarded and forgotten.

A STUDY of the comparative religions of the world reveals to us the inescapable fact that they all teach the same great spiritual truths. All religions teach that there is but one great creative power, the source of light and life. To the Buddhist this creative power is an abstract principle, not a personal being, but nevertheless the Buddha teaches a fundamental unifying creative power. All religions teach the oneness of humanity; a fact only recently established through the science of anthropology, of which Prof. Franz Boas of Columbia University is the chief proponent. All religions have for their basis of action the practice of love and good will as the one attitude through which mankind can be well pleasing to God thus accomplishing the great purpose for which he was created. All religions teach some form of survival, advancing a belief in immortality; and all religions, without exception, teach that through their Founder and through Him alone can mankind know God or attain the essential path to salvation. Each one of the religions, as it has been founded in turn, has displayed always this changeless aspect of its teaching.

However, side by side with these spiritual truths there is invariably revealed by each great Messenger who establishes His religion in the world, a body of laws and ordinances that constitute a temporal social program. These laws vary according to the time, place, condition of society and the human needs of those to whom the Prophet makes His revelation. The liveliest source of divergence among the followers of the great religions of the world is the difference in these temporal or social teachings that have been given by their Founder, as the plan and desire of God. For long after the conditions have passed which made teachings necessary, men still cling to these obsolescent forms and ceremonies. The Founder of each religion has always covenanted with His followers that a successor would follow Him; that that same spirit which had enabled Him to lighten men's burdens and to purify their hearts would appear in another being like unto Himself; but the course of history always reveals the same story—the Promised One comes into the world with a great message of authority, more advanced teachings than those which men had received in the past dispensation, and a meeting in every age with the most violent and perhaps tragic rejection on the part of those to whom He had been sent. One of the irrefutable proofs of His reality has been that oftentimes with no prestige, no power, no position, but facing the organized opposition of society as well, in spite of all opposition and denial He has triumphantly succeeded in establishing His cause.

A study of comparative religions shows that their Founders have always claimed to derive their power from God, have always taught the same basic spiritual truths, have always brought an uplifting and progressive social program and have always obtained the same historical results,—that of elevating men to loftier human relations and to greater spiritual ideals.

AS previously stated each of the great religions of the world today have been promised by its Founder that the same spirit which was in Him will return and dwell amongst men. The Buddha taught His followers that He was not the first Buddha nor would He be the last. Therefore the Buddhists are expecting the fifth Buddha. The Zoroastrians have been promised Shah Baroum; the Christians are expecting the Second Coming; the Muhammadans, the Imam Mahdi; the Brahmans, the twelfth incarnation of Vishnu; the Jews are still expecting their Messiah. Each religions has been promised by its Founder that when this promised One appears He will establish love and brotherhood, peace and goodwill throughout the earth. With each religion divided into innumerable sects it would seem impossible to reconcile the conflicting and contending divisions of any one of the religions within itself. To produce affection and sympathetic understanding among the great religions themselves would indeed require the incomparable influence of One endowed with the power of God, as in each instance this Promised One was to be.

It is self-evident that each of the religions, in this sublime expectation, is referring to one Personality, not several; for if each of these expected Messengers came, as promised, He would not produce harmony and accord, but greater conflict and misunderstanding. When sincere and spiritually-minded men and women, of whatever faith, examining the identity of teaching in all of the great religions, as previously explained, they are compelled, if they are candid and dispassionate, to admit the basic unity of all religious teaching. To find these earnest exponents of true religion to whom the spirit and not the letter of their faith is of paramount importance, would be to obliterate religious differences and to institute the practice rather than the profession of one's belief; for all religions are based upon the law of love. That "pressed down and running over men give back into our bosoms" the sympathy and generosity which we express towards them is not only a teaching common to all religions, but is sound psychology as well.

Not by the arrogance of assuming everyone else to be in the wrong and ourselves in the right; not by a blind refusal to investigate and discredit the beliefs of others, but by an independent approach to the study: first—of what we owe to religions; second—of the great basic teachings which they hold in common; and third—of the immeasurable influence which they have exerted throughout the ages over the lives of the millions who have teemed this earth. By this approach can we find the reconciling attitude that will enable us to enter into sincere accord with those who are seeking and worshipping God everywhere.

FROM THE UTTERANCES OF 'ABDUL-BAHA

HE whose morals and virtues are praiseworthy is preferred in the presence of God; he who is devoted to the kingdom is most beloved. In the realm of genesis and creation the question of color is of least importance.

The mineral kingdom abounds with many colored substances and compositions but we find no strife among them on that account. In the kingdom of the plant and vegetable, distinct and variegated hues exist but the fruit and flowers are not in conflict for that reason. Nay, rather, the very fact that there is difference and variety lends a charm to the garden. If all were of the same color the effect would be monotonous and depressing. When you enter a rose-garden the wealth of color and variety of floral forms spread before you a picture of wonder and beauty. The world of humanity is like a garden and the various races are the flowers which constitute its adornment and decoration.

IN the world of minds and souls, fellowship which is an expression of composition is conducive to life; whereas discord, which is an expression of decomposition, is the equivalent of death. Without cohesion among the individual elements which compose the body-politic, disintegration and decay must inevitably follow and life be extinguished . . . therefore in the world of humanity it is wise and seemly that all the individual members should manifest unity and affinity. . . . The Prophets of God were sent into the world upon this mission of unity and agreement.

WHEN the racial elements of the American nation unite in actual fellowship and accord, the lights of the oneness of humanity will shine, the day of eternal glory and bliss will dawn, the spirit of God encompass and the divine favors descend. Under the leadership and training of God the real Shepherd, all will be protected and preserved. He will lead them in green pastures of happiness and sustenance and they will attain to the real goal of existence. This is the blessing and benefit of unity; this is the outcome of love. This is the sign of the "Most Great Peace," this is the star of the oneness of the human world. Consider how blessed this condition will be.

NEEDED--THE SUPREME ASSEMBLY

LOUIS G. GREGORY

"Let every believer, desirous to witness the swift and healthy progress of the Cause of God, realize the twofold nature of his task. Let him first turn his eyes inwardly and search his own heart and satisfy himself that in his relations with his fellow believers, irrespective of color and class, he is proving himself increasingly loyal to the spirit of his beloved Faith. Assured and content that he is exerting his utmost in a conscious effort to approach nearer every day the lofty station to which his gracious Master summons him, let him turn to his second task, and, with befitting confidence and vigor, assail the devastating power of those forces which in his own heart he has already succeeded in subduing."—Shoghi Effendi in Bahá'i Administration, p. 120.

A GREAT mystic in one of his most popular works, pictures heaven as made up of numberless societies, emulous of each other in good deeds, cooperating without friction and keeping their faces ever turned toward the Sun of Truth. In Bahá'i literature one finds many references to this Supreme Concourse. This supreme assembly logically implies the existence of lesser assemblies. The social needs of man are such that happiness is impossible unless he finds fellowship in some measure with his kind. The progress of civilization is indexed by the increasing number of effective organizations.

In one of the small New England cities more than a hundred clubs are to be found which are active in various phases of community service and progress. Isolation in such a circle virtually means to be out of life; without influence among people of power, starved in the midst of wealth, a hermit—as it were—dwelling amid the beauty of a flower garden. As it is difficult to plan any meeting without conflicting dates, friends frequently divide their time between meetings of simultaneous dates, thereby showing their loyalty to similar ideals and their broad sympathies. Such virtues and habits by their inherent excellence command homage yet practically all such clubs and fraternities, administering as they do to human welfare, owe their origins to human exigency and invention.

THE GREATEST need of every community the world over today is a Supreme Assembly reflecting the spirit and power of the divine world. Such a group will not owe its being to the will of man, but will be consciously a Divine Emanation, created and set in motion by the Will of God. The Supreme Concourse is made up of all the Prophets of God, past and present, and of those holy souls who have been honored in being permitted to share their labors and sacrifices. Although shining in full and unveiled splendor in the world beyond, yet its signs, effects, exponents and personnel are sometimes found even in this world.

In one of the most wonderful Tablets of 'Abdu'l-Bahá revealed to an Oriental friend of rare devotion, his earthly abode is described as "the stopping place of the Supreme Concourse." This grew out of his custom of entertaining for brief periods the pilgrims who passed through his city enroute to the Most Sacred Shrines. The host and his many guests were deemed worthy to be companions of the Divine Messengers in all the worlds.

“Praise be to Him Who by His Appearance hath made this dark world the envy of the worlds of light!”

It is definitely known that an expression of the Supreme Course can appear, be organized, function and have its branches in the cities of earth. How blessed were such a city, enriched by spiritual treasures and illumined by the Light of God! All members of this Supreme Assembly would be people of insight whose heart mysteries are known to each other. All its meetings will be so attractive that no greater sacrifice than non-attendance could be imagined. Its attitudes will be reverential; its thoughts pure; its labors selfless, its tongues eloquent; its ends and methods equally noble; its harmony like the music of the spheres. Its guidance will be ever clear, its unity inspired and its exhilaration like a flame of fire. In such an assembly no one will ever need to express his private griefs and woes. With keen penetration each will see the needs of his coworkers and with tenderness be their protector. All the wounds will come from without; all the balm from within with its radiance and cheer, wisdom and knowledge, love and laughter.

All lesser assemblies will be a sacrifice to this Supreme Assembly. From this first assembly all others will be the recipients of service and inspiration. The members on the Supreme Assembly will value service on every plane, yet use all contacts for the supreme and universal good, abandoning the useless, and even bending the useful to the uses of the Supreme Will. Racial harmony, religious unity, justice, protection of minorities, rending the veils of superstition, tradition and prejudice, a program of peace and brotherhood that will eventually sweep the world,—are among the ideals it will keep constantly in view.

THE GLORIOUS Nabil, in the stirring and beautiful narrative of the Dawn-Breakers, shows the spirit animating such an assembly. This he illustrates by the marvelous events of Tarbarisi, Nayriz and Zanzan (Persia), and by the accounts of the deep insight, spiritual glow and courage of many heroes in that romantic land which gave the Cause of God its birth. It thrills with the joy of life, incites our wish for more efficiency, and appeals to the heroism and the divine that dwell within. Perhaps the great Victorian poet, contemporary of Bahá'u'lláh, who through the flash of his genius saw the universal temple and a warless world, also envisioned the Supreme Assembly when he penned these lines:

“One equal temper of heroic hearts
Made weak by time and fate, yet strong in will
To serve, to seek, to find and not to yield!”

“All prejudices between man and man are falsehoods and violations of the will of God. God desires unity and love—He commands harmony and fellowship. Enmity is human disobedience. God Himself is Love.”

MAKING YOUTH WORLD-MINDED

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

THE average college student is not world minded." So stated Mr. E. R. Murrow, president of the National Student Federation of America in a recent number of The Pan-Pacific Union Bulletin. Mr. Murrow based his statement on the type of subjects which occupied the attention of this body at their annual congress. He thinks that in this respect American students compare unfavorably with European students.

But does not the fact that this body recognizes such a deficiency augur the birth of a new spirit? There are, in fact, present evidences that an international spirit among students is, at least, in its infancy. For instance, the delegates at this very congress instructed the executive committee "not to discriminate against any applicant because of race or color." And Mr. Murrow closes his report with these words: "Believing that future harmony and mutual understanding both nationally and internationally depend upon the youth of today, the students of America are attempting to perfect a meaningful student organization which will make of the present and future college generations better citizens of the world."

FROM this same bulletin we learn of a trip made last year by a debating team from the University of Oregon all around the Pacific basin. The three members of this team in eight months debated in schools and universities in eight countries bordering on the Pacific.

In summer there are numerous travel groups of youth organized, whose aim is contact and consultation with youth of other lands. All these are faint signs of this new mind we are looking so anxiously for in young men and women. The influence of these conscious efforts for world friendship surely extends beyond those immediately involved.

One of the three cardinal principles to which 'Abdu'l-Bahá says that colleges must hold fast is: "Service to the oneness of the world of humanity; so that each student may consciously realize that he is a brother to all mankind, irrespective of religion or race." Travel, though desirable, is not necessary for the realization of this feeling in youth. No doubt we neglect opportunities for this right at our very doors. There are thousands of students scattered over our country in different colleges and universities who have come from the four quarters of the earth and who represent the most intelligent and cultured groups in their respective countries. The attitude of both these students and ourselves has been altogether too much that they are here simply to learn from America and her institutions of learning. Have we nothing to learn from them? Have they nothing to give to us?

But here, too, we must not overlook the few efforts that are being made for a closer relationship between different nationalities. For a good many years the Cosmopolitan Clubs have been functioning in the larger colleges and universities. These furnish opportunities for an insight into the culture and customs of other nationalities as well as for friendly human relations, but these opportunities are by no means made full use of.

Of even greater value may be the International Houses found in a few of the largest universities. These are residence houses where an effort is made to have a real home atmosphere. The usual plan is to have one-quarter of the residents American students. Here is a chance for a world home in miniature. Why not more of these international houses even if they must begin on a small scale? The tendency now is for the different national and racial groups to segregate themselves in their own rooming and club houses. This is natural and has advantages and will probably continue unless conscious effort is made for larger relationships.

dents living abroad? The "Bulletin" furnishes interesting information on this subject. "Of the 28,000 students attending the University of Paris, one-quarter are foreigners; at Geneva the proportion is one-half. The proportion is also big at Berlin. At Paris already eleven national houses have been erected at the beautiful Cite' Universitaire and there will eventually be twenty. With the splendid gift of Mr. Rockefeller, a central house for all students is being erected, with dining rooms, reception rooms, library, auditorium, etc. This is to be the focus of student life. Moreover it is the intention to have a certain proportion of French students in each house, e. g., one-quarter in the American house."

Surely seeds for world mindedness are being sown among the youth of the world. We see a dawn of the consciousness that an important part of a liberal education is, "Service to the oneness of the world of humanity." How can we hasten the fruition of these seeds? How can we turn this dawn into full daylight?

"The proclamation of the Oneness of Mankind—the head corner-stone of Bahá'u'lláh's all-embracing dominion—can under no circumstances be compared with such expressions of pious hope as have been uttered in the past. His is not merely a call which He raised, alone and unaided, in the face of the relentless and combined opposition of two of the most powerful Oriental potentates of His day—while Himself an exile and prisoner in their hands. It implies at once a warning and a promise—a warning that in it lies the sole means for the salvation of a greatly suffering world, a promise that its realization is at hand.

"Uttered at a time when its possibility had not yet been seriously envisaged in any part of the world, it has, by virtue of that celestial potency with which the Spirit of Bahá'u'lláh has breathed into it, come at last to be regarded, by an increasing number of thoughtful men, not only as an approaching possibility, but as the necessary outcome of the forces now operating in the world."

BAHA'IS CONTRIBUTE SIGNIFICANTLY TO RACIAL BROTHERHOOD

CORALIE FRANKLIN COOK

*"For the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea."
—Isaiah 11:9*

"The wrong in the world continues to exist just because people talk only of their ideals and do not strive to put them into practice. If actions took the place of words, the world's misery would very soon be changed into comfort."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE prophecy of Isaiah and the precept of 'Abdu'l-Bahá have met with glorious fruition in two meetings, as wide apart in miles as the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans but unmistakably united in conception and purpose.

"In New York City," writes Mrs. L. A. Mathews¹, "The National Bahá'í Committee for Racial Amity and the New York Bahá'í Spiritual Assembly, gave a dinner in the banquet hall of the Hotel Shelton, Saturday, February twenty-seventh in honor of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the New York Urban League."

It seems eminently fitting that a woman of Nordic blood who has demonstrated her interest in the "advancement of colored people" by constituting herself a generous patron of their work in the field of letters, should be mistress of ceremonies at this dinner, while the occasion becomes no less significant because she has as her assistant Mr. Louis G. Gregory², an advanced man of color who has carried the teachings sent from the "So great Prison" of 'Akká to rural groups of the "black belt" and to urban assemblages both north and south.

The welcoming address was an assurance to all that the Bahá'is had met to do honor to the two great organizations whose members spend their lives in racial uplift. Stressing the inevitable appeal made to Bahá'is is by these organizations for racial amity the hostess declared that ever since 1844 the date of its origin, the leaders of the Bahá'í religion have stood against oppression and admonished its followers to disregard race differences.

Speaker after speaker contributed gems of thought to this brilliant occasion. "The great underlying principle of the Bahá'í Movement," said one, "is the oneness of humanity. Throughout the world these groups are the dawning places of a coming civilization in which humanity as a whole will be freed from the superstitions of the dark ages."

Who fails to discover in the words of the next speaker the vision of a seer? "I trust we are laying the foundation for magnificent cooperation, fellowship, brotherhood and love in the future. I do not think there is any human being who can prophesy the good we may accomplish together because one of the crying needs of the country, one of the crying needs of the world is the establishment of a unity, concord and equality among the different races . . . So let us here resolve, in our heart of hearts and soul of souls, that this shall be the beginning of a cooperation among these three organizations that will be productive in the future of greater and greater results."

From the heart of a woman came this beautiful sentiment: "The greatest thing in the world is friendship and the greatest part of friendship is fellowship."

Thought-compelling and well worth heeding were the words of the last Bahá'í speaker: "I think what this ancient world needs most of all is a job that's big enough to fit us all together on a common task, a job that will coordinate our minds and our hearts and our inner religious convictions and our outer political and economic needs. When the people of the world have been allied in a common undertaking for some universal essential need the minor differences that we have accumulated in the past will fade away. What we need is to be able to identify people by their relationship to that common human task and not by the accidental variations of dialect or creed that we have picked up on our way.

"Now, the statement of the task that is big enough for us economically, politically, philosophically and religiously, as it seems to me, we have had put into concrete and simple language within the past few months by Shoghi Effendi, in Palestine.

'Some form of a world Super-State must needs be evolved, in whose favor all the nations of the world will have willingly ceded every claim to make war, certain rights to impose taxation and all rights to maintain armaments, except for purposes of maintaining internal order within their respective dominions. Such a State will have to include within its orbit an International Executive adequate to enforce supreme and unchallengeable authority on every recalcitrant member of the commonwealth; a World Parliament whose members shall be elected by the people in their respective countries and whose election shall be confirmed by their respective governments; and a Supreme Tribunal whose judgment will have a binding effect even in such cases where the parties concerned did not voluntarily agree to submit their case to its consideration. A world community in which all economic barriers will have been permanently demolished and the interdependence of Capital and Labor definitely recognized; in which the clamor of religious fanaticism and strife will have been forever stilled; in which the flame of racial animosity will have been finally extinguished; in which a single code of international law—the product of the considered judgment of the world's federated representatives—shall have as its sanction the instant and coercive intervention of the combined forces of the federated units; and finally a world community in which the fury of a capricious and militant nationalism will have been transmuted into an abiding consciousness of world citizenship—such indeed, appears, in its broadest outline, the Order anticipated by Bahá'u'lláh, an Order that shall come to be regarded as the fairest fruit of a slowly maturing age.'

Now, that is the job; and, somehow or other, we have all got to find our places in it."

LIKE THE play of Hamlet without Hamlet would be any gathering where colored folk are invited to express themselves and music is left out, so here and again strains of rare music vocal and instrumental flood the chamber.

Then, as the elder of the two guests, a representative of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, is introduced—sage, martyr, prophet—this man has laid bare the souls of black folk to the ready world. In turn he has plead with them, sacrificed for them; in season and out of season he has spoken when they have been dumb, seen when they have been blind; he has brow-beaten them too, but never more dictator than champion! Has he come to believe, he who in bitterness of soul because of the wrongs and injustices heaped upon his people, has been wont to scoff? Harken to his speech!

"About twenty-five years ago I was at Green Acre, that beautiful little spot in Maine where the Bahá'is foregather, and I met that simple and beautiful man, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and since that I have met other people who are with this Bahá'i Movement. I think all of us here tonight have gotten an impression of people who are using words and thinking thoughts that are quite foreign to this particular age—friendship and love and faith—words whose meaning we have almost forgotten. And if there are to be in the world people holding still to these simple things: if in addition to that, they even go so far as to think that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Urban League can sit down with each other, and in peace and harmony work out things—they have, so far as I am concerned, a very great measure of faith and hope: and I am ready to believe with them that something can be accomplished, that something can be done on the lines of these older and simpler and finer things. I thank them for giving me and you the chance to get this idea into our heads."

FROM A WELL known and philanthropic Hebrew came this quotation from a fearless scholar of his race: "I think every Jew ought to be proud and thankful to recognize Christ as a Jew and as a Prophet. That is what I am here for to shake hands with those who recognize Christ." Perhaps no speech of the whole evening emphasized more directly the power and universality of the Bahá'i teachings which claim not only the oneness of humanity but the oneness of all the great religions, than this tribute to the Nazarene.

Greetings were extended by the president of a well known college for colored people who pointed out how these schools prepare for leadership as proven by their graduates at this board.

The Urban League was finally heard from in an informing talk respecting its objects—to bring representatives of the colored and white races together to deal with problems confronting the Negro precipitated into urban surroundings, to stimulate thought and action. An organized staff of social workers is maintained and health agencies are conducted. Housing surveys are made and adjustments for the relief of both tenants and owners effected. Neighborhood, recreation and crime all share in the service of the League which work is aimed at allowing the Negro to express himself and to take his place as a fellow citizen of America.

One speaker was the victim of stage fright. This was a meeting where no word was to be spoken about the raising of money—and all speeches he had ever made were on that theme. But what better speech could one have made? “All great forward movements,” said he, “have been the result of cooperation . . . the initial step is the super-state within the individual—the superstructure of conscience, that which will eliminate from the realm of the individual prejudices in all forms. To me that is the significance of this gathering.”

The next speaker who has haz-

arded many dangerous experiences in his zeal for finding facts and disclosing fictions, voiced his satisfaction in the practical demonstration that "the Negro is not fighting his battle alone." How poignant must have been the suffering of one who in straight forward simple manner could say, "There are times when we colored folks feel we are not wanted anywhere, but this evening we shall never forget. It is a happy oasis in our bitter lives. It may be that through groups like these we shall come to know each other as human beings. We may come to lay aside artificial barriers that now keep us apart."

A white haired, low voiced, woman sent a thrill over the audience as she confessed: "I am filled with profound admiration at the way in which you who belong to the Bahà'í faith live up to it. Many there are who hear the gospel of brotherhood and think it beautiful, but fail to practice it." Half of the space given this article might well be used to tell something of the devotion of this one white woman to the welfare of the colored people. In private and public life, with voice and pen, she has given the strength of a trained mind and a righteous spirit to every man, woman and child who struggles under the ghastly handicap of color. While not counted a Bahà'í, it may well be said of this noble woman she ignores racial differences and "welcomes all in the light of oneness."

To me one of the best utterances of the evening came out in the next speech when it was said: "The Negro wants not only an opportunity to work. He doesn't want only an opportunity to receive. He wants an opportunity to give—to bring his gifts to the altar."

The youngest speaker came last. She spoke with the assurance, the definiteness, the utter candor so characteristic of the forward marching youth of today. "Every one who loves the principles for which this country stands wants to see them become a reality. But this can never be until the race problems within our borders are solved . . . Nor will we ever attain our place in the world as a humanitarian nation until these problems are faced and solved; it is not a question of being kind, because after all kindness is optional but justice is obligatory."

The dinner was over but had not these people "set up three tabernacles," one for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, one for the Urban League and one for Bahà'is."

"What is the spirit of this age? What is its focal point? It is the establishment of universal peace, the establishment of the knowledge that humanity is one family."*

IN the same date and at the same hour when the interracial dinner was given in New York City, a similar one under the auspices of the Bahà'is of Los Angeles was given in that city, and at the Metropolitan Club. Picturesque and colorful, Mrs. Sara E. Witt writes of it—"The subject of our Bahà'í speaker of the evening was the Oneness of Mankind and that oneness was indeed made manifest to such a degree that a foretaste of what the future life on this earth will be when the Kingdom of ABHA is established here as it is in heaven," was given to all.

Again the Chairman of the evening was a woman of grace and charm, and again the meeting started off with a brief allusion to the fundamental principles of the Bahà'i Revelation.

Among the guests were a number of American Indians and was it not a privilege to hear one of their number, Chief Standing Bear internationally known author and lecturer as he stood upon the stage "his Chieftain's head dress gleaming with red and white and blue feathers, chant a Sioux prayer distinguished for its spiritual power and devotion."

"Truly interracial was the musical program. A member of the Philharmonic orchestra "gave a violin number of great appeal; Weeping Star, of the Kickapoos, sang in a rich contralto three Indian songs; an American Negro, a pianist, played with the touch of genius; while a little Indian maiden played the 'tom-tom' and chanted as she contributed a group of tribal dances which when interpreted have great spiritual significance."

VARIED indeed were the speakers and the speeches. "A world traveler, recently returned from a seventeen months world tour in the interest of Esperanto, related his experiences with the different races and the confidence he had won by being able to speak to them in Esperanto." Here indeed was proof positive that "the use of an international auxiliary language will become a great means of dispelling the differences between nations."

One of the successful contestants of the Fifth Annual World Friendship Oratorical Contest, a young American of color with "a voice, rich and deep, diction perfect, and an eloquence and spiritual force a prophecy of his future work for the upliftment of humanity."

"A little Chinese lady of culture and refinement, the wife of a Japanese, spoke of the disturbance across the 'Pacific Boulevard.' "

Another dinner guest who earlier in the day had fractured two ribs, went through the evening not only as a speaker but as assistant to the chairman, without letting it be known what he suffered, and his wife a prominent and popular club-woman observed the same heroic secrecy with him.

Men and women who are devoting their lives to the work of the National League for Justice to American Indians were there and others devoted to the welfare of all races. A Filipino from the island of Luzon; other Indians of worth and distinction were there too, like Walking Eagle, research worker, and Sunflower his wife.

But the dinner at last had to come to an end and so must this inadequate report which when all is said falls short of fully portraying the spirit of these gatherings. Perhaps it will be best understood by these words from the Teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahà:

"There is a Power in this Cause, a mysterious Power, far, far away from the pen of men and angels. That invisible Power is the source of all these outward activities. It moves the hearts. It inspires the friends. It dashes into a thousand pieces all the forces of opposition. It creates new spiritual worlds. This is a Mystery of the Kingdom of Abha."

KEEPING THE WOLF FROM THE DOOR

FLORENCE KING

The Bahá'í Magazine plans to represent in each number as far as possible the youth of today. This article is written by a student of George Washington University.

CONFUSION reigns in the world today. The international economic problem is very serious and very difficult to solve. Loans and moratoriums give temporary relief, but will this relief be permanent? The farmers are crying out for help, conditions among the miners are unbelievably bad, and unemployment continues on the increase. In capitalistic countries, there is extreme wealth on the one hand and dire poverty on the other hand. Russia is experimenting with communism but seems to be slowly realizing that greater ability must receive greater rewards. Then, too, she has to depend on capitalistic countries for loans, installation of machinery, etc.

People are breaking away from old habits of thinking in regard to government, social standards, and religion. Many people are becoming Socialists and atheists. Humanity is growing more materialistic and for the most part, forgetting God. The problems confronting the world are so many and so complex that if we think deeply on this world status we finally come to the conclusion that only a Messenger sent by the all powerful Lord could possibly give the remedy. Even though the world has forgotten God, God has not forgotten the world. When a great spiritual leader who can speak with Divine authority is needed, the Lord always sends Him.

IN 1844, a young man of Persia declared Himself to be the Forerunner of "Him whom God shall make manifest." In 1868, Bahá'u'lláh declared Himself to be the One Whose coming the Báb foretold, the Promised One of all the Prophets, the Divine Manifestation in Whose era the reign of peace will actually be established. He proceeded, in spite of imprisonment and terrible persecutions, to reveal certain laws and ordinances for the bringing about of a New World Order.

Explaining the World Order of Bahá'u'llah, His Son 'Abdu'l-Bahá says in regard to the economic problem, "Perfect communism and equality are an impossibility because they would upset the affairs of the world. But there is a fair method which will not leave the poor in such need nor the rich in such wealth." He goes on to relate the attempt made by Lycurgus, king of Sparta, to divide wealth equally and shows how and why it failed. A system of graduated taxation, the poor being exempt and the wealthy giving as much as one-fifth of their incomes is suggested. The system of wages and earnings must be done away with. The employees should be considered as partners in every work. "For instance, the owners of properties, mines and factories should share their incomes with their employees and give a certain fair percentage of their products to their working men in order that the employees may receive, besides their wages, some of the general income of the factory, so that the employee may strive with his soul in the work." One-fifth of the shares of a factory should belong to the employees and the rest to the capitalists. So the matter can be settled by laws instead of by strikes.

'Abdu'l-Bahá further states that "Economics must commence with the farmer and thence reach out and embrace the other classes, inasmuch as the number of farmers is greater than that of other groups. Therefore it is becoming that the economic problem be solved for the farmer first, for the farmer is the first active agent in the body politic.

"In brief: from among the wise men of every village a Board should be organized, and the affairs of that village should be under the control of the Board. Likewise, a general storehouse should be founded and a secretary appointed for it. At the time of the harvest, with the approval of the members of the Board, a determined percentage of the entire harvest should be appropriated for the storehouse.

"This storehouse is to have seven revenues: tithes, taxes on animals, wealth without inheritors, all things whose owner cannot be discovered, a third of all treasure found in the ground, a third of the output of the mines, and voluntary contributions.

"On the other hand, there are seven expenditures. First, the general running expenses of the institution, salaries, etc., and the administration of public safety, including a department of hygiene. Second, tithes to the general government. Third, taxes on animals for the State. Fourth, support of an orphanage. Fifth, support of cripples and incurables. Sixth, support of educational institutions. Seventh, supplying any deficiency in the expenses of the poor. If anything is left in the storehouse, that must be transferred to the general treasury of the nation for general national expenses. When such a system is established, each individual member of the body politic will live in the utmost comfort and happiness and the degrees will be preserved. There will be no disturbance of these degrees whatsoever for they are the essential needs of the body politic.

"The body politic is like an army. An army needs a commander-in-chief, colonel, lieutenant, and private. It is impossible for all to enjoy the same rank; preservation of degrees is necessary, but each member of that army must live in the utmost comfort and ease.

"Likewise a city is in need of a mayor, judge, merchant, banker, artisan and farmers. Undoubtedly these degrees should be preserved, otherwise the public order would be disturbed.

"The government of a country should make laws which conform to the divine law."

After reading these rules the first remark which will be made, will be, "but how are you going to make people agree to these things, the rich would never be willing to partially share their wealth in this way. Human nature would have to undergo a radical change."

It would indeed be an impossible task if these principles had not been given by a "Manifestation of God" (a person sent by the Lord to renew religion and again give to the world the Word of God, this time applying it to the particular problems of the present day.) The Word of God is the one force which has the power to change human nature into divine nature. There have been many examples in the past of this change taking place among the saints of Christianity, as well as among the saints of other religions.

IN MANY of the larger cities in the world, there exists a Baha'i community. Once a year, the members of this community gather together to elect nine persons who make up the local Spiritual Assembly. This assembly is the governing body of the community. Once a year, the members of the community also elect delegates (the number determined by the number of members in each community) to a national convention. These delegates assemble and elect the nine members of the National Spiritual Assembly. This is the National governing body or a national House of Justice. This much of the Divine plan for the administration of the cause has been carried out. In the future, the members of these national bodies will elect the members of the International House of Justice. All international problems will be referred to this body. "It enacteth all ordinances and regulations that are not to be found in the explicit Holy Text." There is a Guardian of the Cause (Shoghi Effendi) who is the grandson of 'Abdul-Bahá and who was named in the latter's will and testament to hold this sacred office. He is to be the head of the International House of Justice and is a life member of it. "This House of Justice enacteth the laws and the government enforceth them." There is also a body to be known as the "Hands of the Cause of God" whose members are appointed by the Guardian and under whose direction they function.

"The obligations of the "Hands of the Cause of God are to diffuse the Divine Fragrances, to edify the souls of men, to promote learning, to improve the character of all men and to be, at all times and under all conditions, sanctified and detached from earthly things. They must manifest the fear of God by their conduct, their manners, their deeds and their words."

Let no one think that the Bahá'ís seek to overthrow the existing governments of the world because that is not their aim. This thoroughly democratic organization merely governs the believers. If, however, the majority of the people of the world should some day accept Bahá'u'lláh as the "Manifestation of God" and accept the teachings, perhaps this world form of government would replace the separate and antagonistic governments of the world and thus a lasting unity, peace and harmony be established in the world. The coming of the Kingdom of Heaven on earth would then be realized.

"The principle of the Oneness of Mankind, as proclaimed by Bahá'u'llah, carries with it no more and no less than a solemn assertion that attainment to this final stage in this stupendous evolution is not only necessary but inevitable, that its realization is fast approaching, and that nothing short of a power that is born of God can succeed in establishing it."

—Shoghi Effendi.

SEEKING AND FINDING

By One who has "Sought" and "Found".

CHAPTER V

THE GOAL OF MY SEARCH—THE MEETING WITH 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

Mirza Abu'l-Fadl, one of the eminent Bahá'i teachers of the Orient, has written of 'Abdu'l-Bahá—"He is a physician to every invalid, a shelter to every exile, a refuge to every seeker for help, and a dispeller of sorrow to every grieved soul". . . . "His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá summons the dwellers in the world to union and harmony". . . . "Archdeacon Wilberforce, (London, England) as befitting the station of the men of learning, has spoken of 'Abdu'l-Bahá as 'Master' before a great assemblage, and introduced Him with terms of glorification and commendation to a mighty gathering."

Of Himself, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "Know thou verily, my Thorne is my mat, my glorious crown is servitude toward God. My standard is the commemoration of my Lord; my hosts are the knowledge of my Master; my sword is the guidance of God; my dominion is my humility, my submissiveness, my lowliness, my supplication and beseeching unto God. This is that permanent reign which no one is able to dispute, gainsay or usurp."

MANY, and varied attempts have been made to describe the meeting with 'Abdu'l-Bahá face to face, but to adequately translate so great an experience into the realm of words is indeed impossible; how can the drop explain the sea or the atom the effulgent sun? At best one can but say, the drop when it reaches the sea finds its completion, the atom loses itself in the glory of the sun.

At such a time of meeting, the soul's longing is to try and become characterized to the extent of human capacity with the attributes of celestial perfection that one beholds openly manifest in the Focal Center of Divine Perfection.

Daily life in the home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, witnessing the application of the law of love in every contact, made one doubly conscious of the artificial and superficial barriers that have crept into the religious systems of the world. This "Perfect Guide" in the daily heart-contacts as well as in the larger audiences, simply and yet definitely expanded the race consciousness from the limited personal world to the universal plane. One beheld Him step by step and day by day revealing the foundation of The New World Order, and how it is to usher in the Kingdom of God on earth.

These brief glimpses into His daily life played their part in cementing in the memory the naturalness and directness of His Teaching as He planted eternal seeds in the heart of every true "listener" who came into His Presence. He did this without formality, without insistence, but always with divine attraction.

FROM THE first moment of my meeting with 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the Plaza Hotel in Chicago, (May 1912) it was as if He desired me to be detached from His Personality. That was veiled from my physical vision as by a gossamer mist stretched across my vision. I beheld only Light. This was evident, for a few minutes later when I was asked what He looked like I found I could give no description whatever of His physical stature.

I had been however instantly conscious of the dynamic of His Presence and the power of His Love, which was none other than the eternal flow of the Love of God.

Early the next morning three of us were seated outside of His door in the hotel praying silently when suddenly the door was thrown wide open by 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself, and it was then that I first met His gaze and beheld Him physically. He welcomed us and bade us enter. During the serving of morning tea—(that delightful Persian custom) we all sat for a few moments in silence. Then various questions were asked; the answers completely satisfying the questioners.

Then I gained courage to say what was in my mind and heart: "Please say to 'Abdu'l-Bahá that since He came, it is as though all the barriers between the hearts have been removed and we are melted into one great heart." "Ah," He exclaimed while raising both hands with spontaneous joy—"By the Bounty of Bahá'u'lláh that is what I came for!"

During those weeks in the home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá we caught glimpses of how His ineffable tenderness opened the doors of the hearts. We saw a life filled with literally countless acts of love and service from early morn until often long after midnight, a life vibrant with an active peace that passed all understanding, a humility and meekness never before conceived or seen, and a self-forgetfulness beyond compare. To the orphaned who came He was a loving Father, to the wisest of the earth who called upon Him He was a Sage; with the children He was one of their own age.

How they loved Him! His attraction, His mirthfulness, and His stories were to them irresistible. These little ones became like bees around a fragrant bloom. No detail was too small to claim His attention when it involved the happiness of any heart,—a special delivery letter, a telegram, a box of flowers sent to those in trouble, or a suitable recognition to one who was about to announce her engagement or a Tablet (letter) of encouragement to a young artist or musician who was struggling to attain the apex of his ambition. Or again, the taxi driver, the hotel maid, the chef in the hotel, the poor man digging the drain in the street,—all these were the recipients of His loving attention and generosity, while everything pertaining to His own life was lived in the utmost simplicity.

As the days rolled into weeks, and the weeks into months, serving in His home, I lived in a new heaven and a new earth, constantly singing those old familiar words, "I would rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness."

DURING the first days at the Hotel Plaza the friends gathered from far and near. The entire staff of the hotel management, from the manager down, all showed forth the utmost reverence. Their united thoughtful consideration was continually manifest for the welfare and comfort of their distinguished "Guest" who at once became their "Host". The last evening we were there the manager told me that 'Abdu'l-Bahá's stay had been the unique experience of their lives, that they had never had anything like unto it. Such happiness, he said, had existed in all the departments of the hotel since 'Abdu'l-Bahá's arrival, that they had had no trouble whatever in getting things done. All were on their toes to have this visit as perfect as they could make it.

The Bahá'í friends were most eager to have 'Abdu'l-Bahá speak to them alone so they went to the manager to engage a room for the purpose. Nothing, however, was available that was large enough in the way of a private room so it was arranged to have a section of the main foyer screened off. All gathered with great eagerness and 'Abdu'l-Bahá came down to address us. When He saw the screens surrounding the friends He instantly withdrew and returned to His room saying that when the screens were removed He would return and talk with whomever wished to hear Him. What a lesson! Never was there the slightest suggestion of separation or aloofness from any group. He had come for all humanity, and no soul was shut out of His heart even for a moment.

The scene at Hull House especially with the children is an unforgettable experience. When a bag of small coins was turned upside down by 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the money scattered in all directions, the children scrambled in wildest glee on hands and knees in their frantic efforts to obtain all they could. From the Riches of His Love He bestowed the special 'Gift' that they could understand.

duals, arrived in a continuous stream. His public addresses delivered in different parts of the city were crowded to the doors. His activity while ceaseless was never hurried. His walk was unlike that of any other, and people frequently followed Him for blocks not knowing who He was, but irresistibly feeling that He was unlike anyone they had ever seen but that He recalled a bible picture seen in childhood.

To the Christian He brought heavenly assurance of the Divine Station of His Holiness Jesus Christ never before so fully realized, and detailed stories of His matchless life, that have been lost to the western world. To the Jew He gave fuller teachings and comprehension concerning Moses and the creative message He brought to the world in His day; its spread throughout the world by the instrumentality of the Torah and the Old Testament of the Christians. Repeatedly did He make appeal for these two great groups—as well as for all the other divergent groups of religious thought—to investigate the reality at the foundation of all religions and discover the basic oneness lying at the heart of each and every one.

At one church the minister told 'Abdu'l-Bahá that never before had such a congregation thronged his church, that as he looked over that vast throng he could tell at a glance those who were His followers for it seemed as if from their faces emanated light. For many years the friends in America had with longing anticipated that hour, little wonder then that the light of joy and thankfulness shone forth, for at last He had come!

SEATED in His room late one afternoon as the sun was setting, after His return from the cemetery where a Bahá'í young man had been buried the day before, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, (as nearly as I can recall His Words) "Those who have ascended to the World of Light are much nearer to you than you realize." He paused, then raising His hand in the direction of Lincoln Park He continued—"Behold those trees, the shrubs, the flowers, the grass—and the people"—Another pause, then He continued, "Are the trees, the shrubs, the flowers and the grass conscious of the presence of the people?"

To a blind believer He talked one day about the sight of the heart, and how blessed she was for, though physically blind yet she possessed the true sight which had enabled her to behold the Light of Truth for this New Age.

To old and young, grave or gay, there was always that wonderful "Welcome" which seemed to come from the very Center of Existence. Many were there who said, in substance, as they watched the continual stream of guests, that it seemed as though 'Abdu'l-Bahá had for years been waiting for each individual contact, and in the heart of every one there seemed to be a realization of that fact.

A young reporter who followed His movements most closely, came to 'Abdu'l-Bahá one day and said, "'Abdu'l-Bahá what do you do to these people? No matter how sad they are, how unhappy they are, or how puzzled they are when they enter your room, when they come forth they are like new beings. It is as though all their sadness had vanished and they had become new people?" To this He replied, "It is because in every face I see the face of my Father".

When delicious fruits or candies were brought to Him He would bid me pass them around. Often there would be just a few left on the dish and I would place them by His side with the hope that He would eat them Himself. They would remain there and when the door was opened to the next guest there would frequently be just the number that there were guests and I was bidden again to pass them. Never did He consider Himself for an instant. He was at all times preferring others before Himself. Soon we grew to realize His complete detachment from all material things no matter how rare or delicious. He was at every moment the Servant of all.

How potent were His loving exhortations! To a believer one day He said "I desire that the tablet of your heart become so pure that I may write upon it without the aid of ink or pen". Again, "If the Bahá'is live according to the standard of other communities what proof have you that you have something which they have not?" And at another time, "I pray that you may become a standard of guidance to the people". To another "Raise ye such a melody that ye may stir that city with gladness."

"'Abdu'l-Bahá has clothed Himself in the mantle of servitude and devotion to the beloved of El Bahá. Truly this is a great Victory."

IN CLOUDS DESCENDING

FLORENCE E. PINCHON

IT is a curious testimony to the conservatism of the religious mind that, despite all the profound changes that are manifesting in the philosophic, scientific and metaphysical thought of today, the simple idea of progressive revelation still fails to find full acceptance among orthodox Christian creeds. Still is the First Advent, or birth of Jesus Christ, Savior of the world, regarded as an entirely unique event in history. Never had the world known a Manifestation of God before—never would it know one again.

In striking contrast to this fixed attitude concerning the First Advent are the vague and contradictory ideas held concerning the Second Advent, or what is generally called the "Return."

Ask an ordinary member of any Christian church if he believes that Christ will fulfill His so wonderfully clear promises of coming again to earth, and the answer will, in all probability be a hesitating—"I really don't know—but I suppose so." Pressed as to when, or in what manner he expects this to happen, or the signs by which he may recognize the Lord when He appears, he will frankly admit that he has no idea; that he finds the subject altogether too complicated, and that the profuse and unscientific explanations offered by would-be exponents only added to his confusion and weariness.

To such as these, the prophetic utterances scattered throughout both the Old and New Testaments are as a sealed book. As Isaiah says (29:11): "The vision of all is become unto you as the word of a book that is sealed, which men deliver to one that is learned saying: read this, I pray thee; and he saith, I cannot; for it is sealed." Daniel was instructed by the angel to seal the account of his prophetic visions "unto the time of the end," until that Messenger should come who would break the seals and reveal their hidden meanings.

Many cultured and spiritually-minded people maintain that the "return" of Christ is not to be a definite event, but rather a continual process of spiritual renewal. But that this process is being evidenced in a fuller measure today in that men are becoming more united, and desirous of peace. True indeed, as far as it goes!

Among those who stand, as it were, at the opposite extreme of interpretation, are the sects known as the "Second Adventists." Thrilling it is to see emblazoned on their banners and street placards—"The Coming of the Lord draweth nigh!" But an investigation of their teachings must fail to convince any enlightened or educated mind.

One day (the exact time is liable to alterations) while the heedless world goes on its way, eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, the Lord will suddenly come to His temple. At the sound of an angelic trumpet, lo! the heavens will roll back as a scroll, and the Son of Man clad in the bodily form—though glorified—in which He walked the streets of Jerusalem, will make His startling appearance, descending among the clouds to earth, with power and great glory. “Every eye shall see Him”—though how this will be possible, is all part of the catastrophic miracle. Those who are found worthy and watching will be caught up to meet their Lord in the air—unaided even by aeroplanes! As the rest of the unbelieving world will be consumed—naturally—“then cometh the end.”

Strange! that in these days of scientific knowledge literal interpretation of Bible symbolism can still lead men to such materialistic and fantastic beliefs. Yet, sometimes, important meetings of the Adventists are crowded, and not only by the merely curious. For one of the hopeful “signs of the times,” to Bahá’is, is the interest now being shown in this question of the “Second Coming.”

It was the earnest expectation of pure-minded and cultured Muslims, that enabled them to discern in the brilliant oriflamme of the young Báb, the advent of their Imam Mahdí, and that later led them to recognize the Universal Manifestation of the One He heralded. An intelligent interest in this subject has proved the open door by which many have entered into the new Kingdom and Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh. Yet how can we perceive the fulfilment of prophecy, unless we know what the prophecies are? And how can prophecy be proven save by, and after, its fulfilment?

Over all these vague surmises, dim hopes, and conflicting and unscientific beliefs, the Bahá’í Light flashes its rays of guidance and illumination. It offers to the sincere and humble seeker after Truth, and to the unprejudiced student of the Bible, the solution to problems and questions that have perplexed and baffled, for centuries, the minds not only of the unlearned, but of eminent scholars and theologians.

In a brief article it would not be possible to treat the vast subject of prophecy regarding the Bahá’í Revelation in any but the most cursory manner. Many volumes would be required to deal with even the utterances of the ancient prophets; remarkable utterances which they, themselves, could but partially have understood; to say nothing of the apocalypses of Daniel and of St. John, and the parables of Jesus. Only a few signposts along the road may be indicated. But enough, we hope, to induce the reader to start on the road for himself, and traveling thus, become filled with increasing amazement at the wonders of progressive revelation, at God’s Way in the world, and God’s Word for the world. As Habakkuk predicted (1:5):

“Behold ye among the heathen, and regard and wonder marvelously: for I will work a work in your days which ye shall not believe, though it be told you.”

FIRST then, shall we agree that the coming of the Lord of Hosts and of a great Day of God, of Judgment and Resurrection, followed by an age of universal righteousness and peace is the recurrent theme of the whole Bible? In passing, we may observe that prophecies of a similar nature, numbering many hundreds, are to be found in the Qur'an, and also in the Zend-Avesta and Buddhist writings.

By way of confirmation, let us stop to glean a golden corn here and there from this wide and ripening harvest-field.

“The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory (Baha) of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.” (Habk. 2:14).

“It shall come to pass in the last days that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it.” (Isa. 2:2).

Isaiah was pre-eminently the prophet of the “latter days” for almost every chapter is clearly applicable to events which have recently transpired. To read, with some knowledge of Baháí history, the ninth and fortieth chapters would alone be sufficiently convincing. “His Name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace. . . . Of the increase of His government and of peace, there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of Hosts will perform this.”

“For verily the Day of the Lord is great and very terrible, and who can abide it?” (Joel 2:11).

“And the Lord shall be King over all the earth, in that day shall there be one Lord, and His name one.” (Zech. 14:9).

The keynote of the new Revelation is unity of all religions and the oneness of humanity.

Christ, Himself, spoke much in parables, “as they were able to hear it,” about the Kingdom of God on earth, and a Day of Judgment at the end of the age. The Lord of the vineyard would come, Himself, and spread a great table, and they would come “from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south, and sit down in the kingdom of God.” (Luke 13:29).

St. John described the vision of the new heaven and earth in which righteousness and peace would reign supreme; and the city of light to which the nations would bring their glory and honor. “I am the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the ending, saith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty.” (Rev. 1:8).

GRANTED then that the Bible declares that God is to again manifest Himself, shall we pass on to the next signpost, and answer the vexed question: In what manner will He do so?

How will man, being a limited creature, be able to know, understand and comprehend the unlimited Creator? There is but one way. The way He has chosen all down the ages. He will use that form after the pattern of which we, ourselves, have been created, and which, after all, is in His image and likeness. The Creator's glorious attributes and qualities will be seen reflected in One made “like unto the son of man.”

Ezekiel (ch. 1:26) saw Him “on his throne having the appearance of a man.” And John also “like unto the son of man clothed with a garment down to the foot. (Rev. 1:13) Isaiah sang: "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulders." . . .

Christians have regarded this and similar passages as referring solely to Jesus. But Christ's work had nothing directly to do with governments, and He made no claim to be the Prince of Peace. On the contrary He said: "Suppose ye that I am come to give peace on earth? I tell you nay—but rather division."

But a large part of Bahá'u'lláh's writings are concerned with government, administrative work, and international relations. In His historic Letters to the Kings and other Potentates, He definitely claims to be the Lord of Hosts, the Father, and to have come as the world's Promised One and Peacemaker.

Again, God is described by the prophets as establishing a city which will be visited by people from all countries.

"Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God." (Ps:87).

"The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents; the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Yea, all kings shall fall down before Him: all nations shall serve Him." (Ps:72).

"Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised is the city of our God, in the mountain of His holiness. Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King." (Ps:48).

"The glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon, they shall see the Glory of the Lord (Baha) and the excellency of our God." (Isa 35:2).

"And he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations." (Isa. 25:6).

Can anyone—aware that the name Bahá'u'lláh means "the Glory or Splendor of God"—knowing the situation of 'Akká and of Haifa in relation to Mt. Carmel, where the Holy One passed His many years of imprisonment, in the heart of the land of prophecy—learning something of the heavenly Message revealed in this spot—of the thousands who, of every race, and from every religion, traveled to visit the Prophet and His Son—doubt, that here the veils of prophecy have been rent asunder, and the seals broken; here the promises of the ages have met with complete and perfect fulfillment?

But, one may ask, if our Lord is to come in this way, naturally, as a man, unheralded by the miraculous or sensational, in what part of the world, and at what time, are we to look for His appearance?

Truly He has come to us, "as a thief in the night," as the bridegroom at midnight, unrecognized save by those who are keeping vigil. Christ tells us that He shall shine forth—as have all the Founders of great faiths—from the East, "even unto the West."

When Daniel had the revelations which were to be sealed unto the "time, times and a half," until the coming of the Messenger, and the three symbolic figures of the river, he was a captive in the palace at Shushan, the capital city of the Persian king, in the province of Elam.

This part of Persia today includes Tihrán. And it is surely significant that in this capital city of the Persian empire now, Bahá'u'lláh was born, a Prince of Nur. Jeremiah declared: (ch. 49:38)—“I will set my throne in Elam, and will destroy from thence the king and the princes, saith the Lord.”

But of all the difficulties attending this subject, perhaps the most baffling is the problem of dates. To deal with this section would require many articles. It can, therefore, only be lightly touched upon.

We remember that when the disciples of Jesus asked Him at what time they were to expect the events predicted, He replied that, “the day or the hour no man knoweth—not even the angels—but the Father only.” Then among other signs, He referred them to the book of Daniel.

Since this prophet, as before mentioned, was in Persia when he received his visions, the reckoning was, naturally, given in Persian time—that is in lunar time, instead of solar. Here the “time, times and a half” means 1260 lunar years, or in Christian, and solar ones—1222. The Hegira of Muhammad corresponds to our year A. D. 622. This, added to the actual number of years in our reckoning, gives 1844, A. D. (or 1260 A. H.)—the year in which the Báb declared Himself and the new dispensation began. Likewise the prophecy regarding the twenty-three hundred days, given in the twentieth year of the reign of Artaxerxes, brings us to the same significant date. This reckoning will not, however, be clear, without a study of the full contexts. The point about Bible prophecy relating to “the last days” to be emphasized is, that, in their working out, the Hegira (that is the time the Muhammadan era began) must be taken into account, rather than our Anno Domini. The dispensation of the Prophet of Islam is indicated in the Bible quite clearly, and honored in its predictions. This method of reckoning also applies to prophecies of events yet to be fulfilled. The student who bears this in mind, while seeking for confirmatory proofs in this branch of the subject, will find that actual dates, significant in the Bahá'i Revelation, will show accurate correspondence with the times indicated.*

This brings us to our last point. By what signs shall we recognize the Manifestation? What will be its characteristics?

A careful comparison of many widely scattered passages, will reveal the fact that the Coming will be threefold in nature. Daniel, in his vision, saw three figures, one on the river, and one on either bank. The advent of the Lords of Hosts, the Father, the Almighty, who will “tread upon the high places of the earth” would be preceded and heralded by a Messenger, (Mal. 3:1)—the Báb, or Door of entrance to the new Kingdom, and followed by a Man who is called “the Branch.” This is the title by which Ábdu'l-Bahá, the eldest son and successor of Bahá'u'lláh, was known among the believers. “Thus speaketh the Lord of Hosts saying, Behold the man whose name is the Branch, and he shall grow up out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord, and he shall bear the glory, and shall sit and rule upon his throne, and he shall be a priest upon his throne, and the counsel of peace shall be between them both." (Zech. 6:12).

AS FOR the numerous other signs which are mentioned as accompanying the supreme event, one has only to read the daily newspaper to see them. The unprecedented war of Armageddon, the earthquakes in divers places, the general turmoil and restlessness, the revolutions and kings "falling down," the running of the lightnings and jostling of the chariots, the return of the Jews to Palestine, the dawn, all over the world, of new ideals. . . .

The theme is almost exhaustless, but we trust that enough has been said to convince the seeker of truth—as revealed in the Bible—that here, awaiting his patient exploration, stretches away to a great horizon, a fascinating land, of whose wonders and glories, "the half has never been told."

And those of us who are already followers of the divine Light of the New Day, shall we not pray and work ever more earnestly, so that the clouds of doubt, indifference, prejudice and materialistic interpretations veiling His appearance from those who are called by His name, may be dispersed, and that throughout Christendom there may, at last, go up the joyous cry of recognition: "Lo, this is the Lord: we have waited for Him, and He will save us; this is the Lord; for Him we have waited; we will be glad and rejoice in His Salvation!"

FROM THE UTTERANCES OF BAHÁ'ULLAH

IF thou lookest toward mercy, regard not that which benefits thee, and hold to that which will benefit the servants (mankind). If thou lookest toward justice, choose thou for others what thou chooseth for thyself. Verily, through meekness man is elevated to the heaven of power; and again, pride degrades him to the lowest station of humiliation and abasement.

THE light of men is justice; quench it not with the contrary winds of oppression and tyranny. The purpose of justice is the appearance of unity among people. . . . Truly I say all that has descended from the Heaven of the Divine Will is conducive to the order of the world, and to the furtherance of unity and harmony among its people.

Turn your eyes away from foreignness and gaze unto oneness, and hold fast unto the means which conduce to the tranquility and security of the people of the whole world. This spanwide world is but one native land and one locality. Abandon that glory which is the cause of discord, and turn unto that which promotes harmony.

CONSORT with all the people with love and fragrance. Fellowship is the cause of unity, and unity is the source of order in the world. Blessed are they who are kind and serve with love.

O CHILDREN OF MEN! Do ye know why We have created you from one clay? That no one should exalt himself over the other. Ponder in your hearts how ye were created. It behooveth you, since We have created you all from the same substance to be even as one soul, in such wise that ye may walk with the same feet, eat with the same mouth and dwell in the same land; that from your inmost being, by your deeds and actions, the signs of oneness and the essence of detachment may be made manifest.

“A heavenly soul who is conscious of the divine world, whose eye of discernment is open, who is severed from the world of nature, and has attained to spiritual power—this soul is cognizant of the divine world and the world of spirits.”

A WEEK-END in the country with a two days' rain is apt to be depressing. Yet as one tramps through the countryside between drops of rain during a lull in the storm, the cheering thought comes that somewhere the sun is shining, somewhere skies are blue. Clouds and rain are neither the universal nor the normal type of weather upon the planet.

So in the midst of the present cataclysmic depression, worldwide though it be, there comes the thought that elsewhere in the universe there may be, in all probability are, civilizations much more perfect, more spiritual, more joyous. That this civilization of ours, as evolved up to date upon the planet Earth, may not be cosmically typical is a cheering idea. For if we can lift ourselves above the perturbations of this world and conceive vividly enough the more ideal conditions which may exist in other worlds of being, we may realize that the catastrophes, the sufferings which humanity is now undergoing here are not normal to universal life; and if not normal, they can be vastly improved by approximating the normalcy designed by Destiny for the super-life of all inhabited worlds.

fection to which organized life in other worlds has attained, we know that there exists in the Realm of the Spirit the perfect pattern for our life upon this planet. In the Celestial World perfection is the norm. In the phenomenal world we tend always, by involuntary evolution and by conscious effort, toward that perfect goal and pattern.

But what is this other World of which we speak? Has any living person seen it? Can anyone bring report of it to Earth?

Yes, there have been those who not only have seen, but who have even while on earth inhabited, that world of Inner Significances. The Prophets and Manifestations of God live a dual life: one amidst the perturbations and exigencies of this world; one amidst the calm rapture and perfection of that heavenly World. If they did not have access constantly to this World of the Spirit, how could they endure the crosses which they bear in the course of their missions to humanity?

When weary, they turn to this World for refreshment. When overwhelmed with the animality and laggardness of human beings, they turn their gaze to the World of the Spirit and see perfection. Thus they are able to describe in vivid and real tones the goal of perfection toward which humanity must evolve. It is a civilization which already exists, though not yet evolved upon this planet. And since it is a part of the creative plan of God, it may be said to exist already here in embryo; it is only a matter of time and effort as regards its ultimate achievement.

WHATEVER BE the degree of per-

If it were not for this realization of an Absolute World of perfection, the efforts of the Prophets, of the Divine Teachers of humanity, would indeed assume desperate proportions; for relatively speaking, progress here is infinitesimally slow, and humanity tragically resistant.

But the Prophets of God see the future in the present. In imperfection they see perfection. In tests and trials they see realization. And in catastrophes they see opportunity and growth.

THIS GLORIOUSLY creative vision which the Manifestations have, they seek to confer upon all mankind. To those who endeavor to follow in their footsteps, patterning their lives after the Exemplar, is granted more or less vividly this same realization of the Ideal Celestial World and of the subtle influence which that World exerts upon the phenomenal evolving world.

Great as is the power of the human intellect to comprehend the realities of things, to make scientific discoveries and inventions, to penetrate the hidden mysteries of nature and thus control and manipulate the physical universe for its benefit—greater still is the power of man to comprehend through the aid of the spirit the inner significances of the Cosmos. "The light of the intellect enables us to understand and realize all that exists. But it is the Divine Light alone which can give us sight for the invisible things and which enables us to see truths that will not be visible to the world for thousands of years hence. It was the Divine Light which enabled the Prophets to see two thousand years in advance what was going to take place. And today we see the realization of their vision. Thus it is the Light which we must strive to seek, for it is greater than any other."*

HOW IMPORTANT and necessary, in this period of universal gloom, to be able to see behind the clouds! To know that the Sun of Reality is indeed shining; is calling dormant virtues to life; is resuscitating the world of humanity; is causing a new Springtime to appear which will eventuate in a wonderful fruitage.

The more the rain beats down today, the greater will be the harvest of tomorrow.

Bahá'ís stand out among others today in the possession of this vivid realization. They know not despair, nor even discouragement. The greater the tribulations, the greater the opportunities for growth.

In the beginning they see the end. In a part the whole. In the wreckage of old customs and institutions, they see the rise of a new spiritual organization of humanity. To this they dedicate their efforts. For this they strive with all their being. And when weary they, too, know how to refresh themselves in the vision of perfection which serves as the archetype of human progress.

RELIGION AND SOCIAL PROGRESS

The New Politics

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

In this the second of a series of articles written for publication both in The Bahá'í Magazine and the Tokyo Nichi Nichi, the author develops the idea of the new type of politics which will prevail in the Bahá'í world of the future.

ONE of the lively sources of divergence and misunderstanding among men is religion. In the previous article a method of religious understanding has been discussed. Something which will create in men the will to harmony and friendship is basic to a solution of the world's more material problems. Religious accord presupposes the determination to solve the world's problems on the basis of justice and goodwill. But even with a desire for goodwill we must have some intelligent method, some sane and workable plan by which the inequalities and miseries of human life can be readjusted to safer and nobler ends. When men arise with religious fervor, determined to carry forward a great spiritual command, as in the case of the religious teachings of the past, history discloses to us with a startling rapidity old methods, standards and practices are discarded and new ones established, under religious sanction.

In the case of the serious political problems which confront the world, erupting from generation to generation in war, which not only dislocates civil and economic life but destroys valuable human life as well, it is evident, even to ignorant people, that some power higher than the state is essential to that internal regulation amongst the governments of the world that will adjudicate national differences without resort to arms.

The participation of various states in a League of Nations and in a World Court is convincing evidence that thinking people realize that the old world in which governments and nations could live to themselves alone has given place to a new world, shrunk to such all-inclusive dimensions that today the nations of the world are, "members one of another."

In times past war brought merely political changes but today, with an active revolutionary party in all of the great industrialized countries, war would produce changes of such profound social and economic significance as to be fraught with the gravest danger to civilization.

Therefore some method must be devised whereby all the nations heartily and willingly give over political affairs of an international character to a body empowered to act. In order to draw every nation into such a scheme the group comprising this final parliament must be completely impartial, just and free from all political entanglements.

MANY of the great nations today are suffering under political schemes devised for a world which has vanished. At present most of the problems treated through political channels, in accordance with past custom, are not in the least political in nature: reparations, unemployment, tariff, state insurance protection, all kinds of improvement of domain are not political but economic considerations, while other issues, handled through the mechanism of politics, are legal. The simple, easy, uncomplicated problems of the past could be solved by party methods, but today's problems are different.

Government to be effective must be efficient. Those who govern must be equipped for government. Social experimentation proves that governing is very exact science that cannot be spontaneously put into practice by ignorant, uninformed men no matter how lofty and humanitarian their sentiments.

After finding men with ideals of justice and human betterment, selfless and dedicated to the common good—there are such in every country of the world—they must next possess enlightenment and information, relying in all exact matters upon expert opinion and advice. To correct the inefficiency of party politics those elected to that ultimate international office suggested in this article, would have but one task before them: to administer public affairs not upon the basis of party patronage, political allegiance and the whim of constituencies, but upon the basis of intelligent inquiry, unbiased investigation and impartial judgment. Free and open expression of opinion is essential in such considerations, but there could be no final interest as to which opinion prevailed. Personal loyalty and adherence to preconceptions would have to be effaced. What happened to personal opinions and ideas would in such a body become a matter of indifference: for the only objective would be arrival at true, just and workable conclusions. This would constitute government consultation, which could be established in the simplest village, as well as in international affairs, thus relieving the world from the strife and inefficiency of party conflicts. Popular suffrage won at such sacrifice and expense should never be relinquished. All local governments could be directly elected; national bodies elected by delegates, democratically chosen; and the final international body could then be elected by the various national governments; this would preclude either popular favor or prejudice.

“When you breathe forth the breath of the Holy Spirit from your hearts into the world, commerce and politics will take care of themselves in perfect harmony. All arts and sciences will become revealed and the knowledge of God will be manifested. It is not your work but that of the Holy Spirit which you breathe forth through the Word. This is a fundamental truth.”

Here is told one of the most moving stories, tragic yet noble, among the many martyrdoms of the Bahá'is in Persia—the story of Vargha. The material for this article was gathered by the author on her recent visit to Persia. This is the first of three installments.

TEHÉRAN, Persia, has so many faithful Bahá'í families that to go among them makes one think: "O Persia, your famous attar comes not alone from your roses, the perfume which diffuses itself through the lives of your believers is a fragrance still not equalled in other countries." If there is a more sweet or tender story of devotion to 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the great Bahá'í Cause than the lives of Ali Muhammad Vargha and his little son Ruhu'lláh Vargha of Persia, I have not heard it. When I was visiting in Tíhrán I used to meet Azizollah Vargha and his younger brother Valiollah Vargha, sons of Ali Muhammad Vargha, and often I used to ask them about their father and brother. All this narrative is absolutely true and in it the reader will see how God prepares souls to come into this world.

Ali Muhammad Vargha was an ardent Bahá'í of Tabriz, Persia, in the days when Bahá'u'lláh was a Prisoner in 'Akká, Palestine from 1868 until His passing in 1892. He was exiled and imprisoned because His Teachings which are now being studied by some rulers, many statesmen and millions of other people, were, like those of other World Teachers, very far ahead of His time. To begin at the beginning, Ali Muhammad Vargha had one son, Azizollah, two years old, when one day in April another little son was born in his home, and he and his wife named the child Ru-hu'lláh which means "the Spirit of God".

THERE was glad rejoicing when Bahá'u'lláh from 'Akká sent these parents a Tablet (a letter) about this new babe and in it the reader with insight will discern the introduction to this thrilling story which follows. Bahá'u'lláh wrote:

"O Vargha! It is for thee to chant in both ears of this little one three times:

'Verily, thou hast come by the Command of God! Thou hast appeared to speak of Him, and thou hast been created to serve Him Who is the Dear, the Beloved!'

"We mentioned this before when his mother implored us, and now We are mentioning it again. We are the Generous and the Giver!" (His mother sent no petition by letter, but it was perhaps when this little one was coming into this world that she cried out to Bahá'u'lláh.)

While Ruhu'lláh was still a little child, Bahá'u'lláh sent a second Tablet. It read:

"He is the Hearer and the Seer!
"Blessed art thou, for thou hast witnessed the grandeur and greatness of God while still a child. Blessed is the mother who nursed thee and has arisen to do what is becoming of her! We beg God to write for thee from His Supreme Pen that which is fitting to His Generosity, Bounty and Favor. Verily, He is the Generous and the Bountiful! Praise be to God, the Lord of the Worlds!"

Another Tablet to Ruhu'lláh from Bahá'u'lláh was:

"O thou Ruhu'lláh! Verily, the Greatest Spirit has inclined towards thee from the Prison and is mentioning thee with such a station that its fragrance will continue as long as My Kingdom and My Grandeur endure!

"Thou, when thou findeth and knoweth (the mention) say: 'Praise be to Thee, O Ocean of Bounty! Thanks be to Thee that Thou hast made me to appear and in my first days speak Thy mention and Thy praise. Verily, Thou art the Forgiving and the Compassionate!'"

Later, another little son came to bless their home and he was called Valiollah.

"WHAT KIND of a Bahá'í father was Ali Muhammad Vargha?" you may ask, and "How did he train his sons spiritually?" All fathers who read this tale will see in the life of this Persian the highest ideal of fatherhood, a height not reached in every home, and too high to be understood by many fathers. He, himself was a Bahá'í teacher. The picture of the Báb is preserved to the world today because Ali Muhammad Vargha led a great painter to become a believer. The narrative of the Yazdi family so distinguished in Egypt for their Bahá'í services is another fruit of the many souls to whom he first brought the Teaching in Persia. He was never outside his country except to go to Palestine, yet his pupils have served with glory in the Near East and in Europe.

Being a wise young father, recognizing in what highest education really consists, he took his two little sons, Azizollah and Ruhú'lláh (little Valiollah at that time was too young to go, he was only a babe in arms) for a pilgrimage to Bahá'u'lláh in 'Akká. Other parents could with profit follow this same plan and today take their children to meet Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause in Haifa, Palestine. If children can glimpse the highest ideals while they are still very young, these ideals may be their lofty inspiration throughout life. Certainly this story shows how one little boy developed into a teacher, a poet, a great philosopher and a world hero before he had hardly crossed the threshold of his twelfth year. Educators must see in the life of this son an astounding Power in the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh!

MANY WERE the incidents of that historic visit to Bahá'u'lláh but I only tell you a few of them. Azizollah Vargha told me that when the maternal grandfather, the father and Ruhú'lláh arrived in 'Akká they went to the room of the secretary of Bahá'u'lláh. It was furnished with a mat and they sat down on this, for they had been told that Bahá'u'lláh would come to this room to meet them. In the distance there were steps leading to an upper room and the father told Azizollah to go and stay near those steps to watch the approach of the Blessed Beauty and then to inform them. The child went but when he looked and saw Bahá'u'lláh at the head of the stairs he mounted several steps and knelt at the feet of His Lord. He was crying so hard his very bones were shaking. Bahá'u'lláh stopped and made him happy and they came down the stairway together, the little boy just behind Bahá'u'lláh. It was a great meeting, but when the visitation was over, the father said to his little son: "Why did you not do what I asked you to do? Why did you not run and tell us?" Azizollah replied: "I do not know. I do not know how I mounted those steps, I was not conscious that I went up the stairs." We know how moved Professor Edward G. Browne of Cambridge University, England, was, when he first met Bahá'u'lláh but here is an account of what it meant to a very young Persian boy.

The next day they were all invited, the grandfather, father, and two small sons to visit Bahá'u'lláh in His own room. Then when the visit was over, the two boys were invited to the room of Bahá'u'lláh's daughter, Bahiyyih, known throughout the world as the Greatest Holy Leaf. She was then perhaps about forty-five years old. She said to her little guests: "What are you doing in Persia?" and Ruhu'lláh replied: "We are teaching the Bahá'i Cause in Persia". "What do you say in speaking to people?", she queried, and Ruhu'lláh answered: "I tell them God has appeared again on this earth." The Greatest Holy Leaf smiled but said: "When you are speaking you must not say this openly." The child replied: "I do not say it to everybody, I know to whom I must say it." "How do you know the people to whom to speak?", she continued, and he said: "I know people from their eyes; when I see their eyes I know." In fun, Bahá'u'lláh's great daughter said: "Ruhu'lláh look into my eyes and see if you could speak to me?" Naively he searched her eyes and told her: "No, I cannot speak to you, because you know everything."

Two young men sitting and doing their writing lessons in the other part of the room began to laugh over the conversation and the Greatest Holy Leaf said: "Look into their eyes and see whether you could speak with them and convince them." The child looked at them long and carefully, and then answered: "It is very difficult and it is of no use to try to convince them." (These two young men were Ziaullah and Badiullah who afterwards turned against the Cause.) When this conversation was told to Bahá'u'lláh He said: "Ruhu'lláh is a Bahá'i teacher."

THE LITTLE group stayed for several months in 'Akkà and in Bahji. Ruhu'lláh studied Persian writing every day and every Friday he used to show a copy of his writing to 'Abdu'l-Bahà Who often praised it. Ruhu'lláh's father was very insistent about their lessons and very severe when they did not study, for he knew the importance of education.

Azizollah recounted another incident of the visit saying that when Bahá'u'lláh wished to reveal (dictate) a Tablet, he used to dismiss everybody with great haste. He, Azizollah, said:

"One day I was in Bahá'u'lláh's Presence with the whole family and He called for the secretary to bring ink and paper quickly and in the same moment He requested us all to go. I was just a child, but seeing this haste to send every one away, I had a great longing to be present sometime when a Tablet is revealed. I had asked from one of the members of His family to ask Bahá'u'lláh if I could come, please, to see a Tablet revealed. A few weeks later in the Garden at Bahji, when I was playing with some children, the door of the home was opened and one member of the family called me and said that Bahá'u'lláh wished to see me. I ran to His room and entering I saw that He was chanting revealed Tablets and poems. So entering His room that day, I thought everything was the same as on other days, that Bahá'u'lláh was only chanting. I stood near the door which I had entered, and was only a few moments in the room when I began trembling in my whole body. I felt I could not stand any more on my feet. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh turning to me said 'Good-bye'. As I lifted the curtain to go out, I fell on the threshold and was unconscious. They took me to the room of the wife of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh where they poured rose water and cold water on my face until I revived. The members of the Family asked me what had happened and I told them about going to Bahá'u'lláh to hear the chanting. When I was relating this, the lady who had called me first, came in, and she said to me: 'You, yourself, had asked me to permit you to be present, now that was the time when a Tablet was being revealed.' "Then I understood why Bahá'u'lláh in haste dismissed everybody. It is because the people cannot endure it, there is such a Power in the room."

Azizollah Vargha said that his father had a similar experience during this visit to 'Akká. His own words are: "Father had been asked by some one to implore Bahá'u'lláh's help concerning a certain matter and to beg that a Tablet be sent. When my father presented this petition, Bahá'u'lláh called a secretary to bring ink and paper, and He also sent for His brother Mussa-Kalim and another one of the relatives. He put a hand on each one's shoulder and began to walk up and down revealing the Tablet. Father began to tremble and he said he couldn't say what was happening. He heard Bahá'u'lláh's voice but He could not understand His Words. Some minutes passed and He dismissed them all. Then outside they began to discuss and none of the three had understood Him, they had only felt the Power. It is certainly interesting to hear about Bahá'u'lláh from those who saw and spoke with Him. They said they could not look upon His Face, it was so glorious, the eyes so shining. There was such a vibration that everyone began to tremble and they could not understand His Words; there was such a Power there."

One evening in 'Akká, Bahá'u'lláh called Ali Muhammad Vargha alone to His Presence and said: "I wish to speak with you alone to-night. There is something in the existence that in most of the Tablets We have named the greatest Ether. When any one is endowed with that Ether all his deeds and words will be effective in the world."

Then Bahá'u'lláh arose and walked a few steps and He continued: "Even this walking of the Manifestation is effective." Again sitting down, He said: "Christ declared His Mission. The Jews crucified Him and they thought what they had done was a very unimportant matter, and Christ was buried; but as Christ was endowed with that Ether, that Ether did not stay under the ground; It came up and did Its great work in the world."

Then Bahá'u'lláh turned to Ali Muhammad Vargha and said: "See 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Master, what a wonderful effect His deeds and Words have in the world! See how kind and patiently He endures every difficulty." The Bahá'í, Ali Muhammad Vargha felt that Bahá'u'lláh really was showing him the Station of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that He would be the Successor spoken of as the Greatest Branch, and Ali Muhammad Vargha asked to become a martyr in the path of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The Blessed Beauty Bahá'u'lláh, accepted this sacrifice and promised the pilgrim that he should give his life in service to 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

CONSULTATION AND SACRIFICE

THOUGHTS FROM THE 1932 BAHÁ'Í CONVENTION

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

"The continent of America, is, in the eyes of the one true God, the land wherein the splendors of His light shall be revealed, where the mysteries of His Faith shall be unveiled, where the righteous shall abide, and the free assemble."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

 ON Friday, Saturday, Sunday, April 29th to May 1st, delegates and friends representing fifty-two Bahá'í communities, organized and functioning, in the United States and Canada came together under the dome of the Bahá'í Temple at Wilmette, near Chicago, Ill. The two-fold function of the convention was pointed out by the chairman: to revitalize the inner life of the delegates and friends in attendance, and to consult for the purpose of maintaining a high standard of excellence in all activities. The second of these functions is impossible without the first; the first is fruitless without the second.

Another powerful letter from Shoghi Effendi (Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause) had arrived in time to be read early at the first session. From it a mighty inspiration for renewed inner life and a tremendous incentive for excellence in all activities went forth. "The Cause associated with the name of Bahá'u'lláh feeds itself upon . . . hidden springs of celestial strength; . . . its reliance is solely upon that mystic Source with which no worldly advantage . . . can compare; it propagates itself by ways mysterious and utterly at variance with the standards accepted by the generality of mankind," he assures us.

Again he writes, "May we not pause, pressed though we be by the daily preoccupations which the ever-widening range of the administrative activities of His Faith must involve, to reflect upon the sanctity of the responsibilities it is our privilege to shoulder?"

THE MEETING place itself was two-fold in its function. The simple beauty of the foundation hall was fraught with spiritual significance—the exquisite Persian rugs, symbolic of sacrifice, devotion, and perfection in design and workmanship; the lovely bouquets of fragrant rosebuds gradually unfolding into mature beauty as the convention proceeded; the chaste model of the completed Temple in the ante-room, inviting the spirit of praise and supplication; the blessed spot where 'Abdu'l-Bahá laid the cornerstone, compelling suppliant tears and quiet meditation; the Temple itself impressive even in its incompleteness, its dome and sides gathering light from the Great Source and transmitting it to the assembly below;—all these outer factors lifted the thoughts to the renewal of the inner life. Inspiration, too, was given by the communion of spirit and unity of purpose of the friends and delegates assembled.

On the other hand, the Temple in its very incompleteness furnished the motive for a continued effort for higher and higher standards in giving. Referring again to Shoghi Effendi's letter we find it abundantly generous in praise of things already accomplished by the American believers yet urging that the still unfinished Temple calls "for a more abundant measure of self-sacrifice, for a higher standard of concerted effort, for a still more compelling evidence of the reality of the faith that glows within you."

SUNDAY morning was given over to this problem of going forward with the Temple—the covering of the dome, ribs and clerestory with the beautiful tracery which the design calls for. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars is needed and thirty thousand dollars immediately—a stupendous task for the believers in a period of great financial depression. Sacrificial giving is stressed. Are Americans capable of sacrifice,—such sacrifice as we know is practiced in the Orient? A Persian-American friend who knows so well the characteristics of both Orientals and Occidentals asks the question. He is ready to give his dearest:—two coins, one gold, one silver, both precious because handled by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The souls are moved, the hearts are opened. With humble devotion one here, one there offers his very precious possessions:—a ring blessed by the Master; another, a watch; a necklace; money to redeem the blessed rings; more money; jewels; more ornaments, — until a sacrificial mound lies piled upon the table in front. The hearts are full, the eyes overflow, but quiet restraint prevails.

Surely on that Sunday morning consultation and the quickening of the inner life went hand in hand.

Other consultation concerned spreading the teaching both by direct and indirect methods. The reports of the amity and the teaching committees especially gave courage to forge ahead. The "Goal of a New World Order" is still far away but the fine work that has been done by amity committees—the interracial dinners in important urban centers,—New York, Washington, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Seattle, Detroit and other places, where outstanding representatives of Negro, Caucasian, Indian and Mongolian races met in social and intellectual equality; the two interracial trips into the South; other interracial group meetings—made us realize that a firm foundation for the Onewness of Mankind is laid in many hearts. The increased activity of individuals and of assemblies in spreading the Divine Message, the large increase of avowed believers, set a new standard of excellence to attain and outdo.

IN THESE and other reports the power of sacrifice and the confirmations which attend it were made evident. Hard work, long hours, raising necessary funds for special meetings, even neglect of one's means of livelihood—all these demands and more are freely met by those who are carrying forward the work of the Cause of God. One delegate said, "Certain cults offer prosperity and health to their votaries, what can we say the Bahá'í Cause offers?" "Self-sacrifice, often suffering, the joy of service and the happiness of the rich inner life," was the answer. Do we find anywhere else in recent writings, a record of such ecstatic joy as in the case of the followers of the Báb who gave unreservedly their lives, their possessions, their all, for love of Him? As we read of their heroic and utterly selfless lives in Nabil's Narrative, The Dawn-Breakers, we feel completely unworthy. And yet Shoghi Effendi says: "In the blood of the unnumbered martyrs of Persia lay the seed of the Divinely-appointed Administration which, though transplanted from its native soil, is now budding out, under your loving care, into a new order, destined to overshadow all mankind. For great as have been the attainments and unforgettable the services of the pioneers of the heroic age of the Cause in Persia, the contribution which their spiritual descendants, the American believers, the champion builders of the organic structure of the Cause, are now making towards the fulfillment of the Plan which must usher in the golden age of the Cause is no less meritorious in this strenuous period of its history."

Although this year the youth had no previously planned conference, as last year, yet they were present in perhaps greater numbers listening to and taking part in reports and discussions or having their own impromptu suppers and meetings. Their virility and enthusiasm seemed to add more hope and love and zeal. What has the Cause to offer youth? Boundless opportunities for initiative, force, tact, daring, devotion, steadfastness, self-sacrifice, yes, and danger of not being understood, but the joy of service and the happiness of the rich inner life. This is the age of youth, this is the Cause of youth and theirs are the abundant opportunities. The Báb was still a young man at the time of His Martyrdom; Qudus, His most illumined follower, countless of His other followers and of the Martyrs in the Cause were young men. Shoghi Effendi, after ten years of service as Guardian, is still a young man.

THE ONLY PUBLIC meeting was held Sunday afternoon and again the drawing power of the Temple was demonstrated. The Foundation Hall was filled to overflowing on this occasion. Daily also small and large groups come to learn of the significance of the unique and impressive structure. Teaching activities in adjacent and neighboring communities have increased greatly and believers multiplied. The prophetic words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the epistle sent to the first Bahá'í Temple Convention in 1909 and read again at this convention are already being fulfilled before our eyes. "Among the most important affairs," He said, "is the founding of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, although weak minds may not grasp its importance; nay, perchance, they imagine this (Mashriqu'l-Adhkár) to be a temple like other temples. They may say to themselves: 'Every nation has a hundred thousand gigantic temples; what result have they yielded that now this one Mashriqu'l-Adhkár (is said) to cause the manifestation of signs and prove a source of lights?' But they are ignorant of the fact that the foundation of this Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is to be in the inception of the organization of the Kingdom. Therefore it is important and is an expression of the raising of the Evident Standard, which is waving in the center of that continent, and the results and effects of which will become manifest in the hearts and spirits. No soul will be aware of this mature wisdom save after trial."

Surely the utmost endeavor will be exerted to continue to carry out the desire of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, cherished by Bahá'is all over the world. And now we have the definite goal earnestly urged by Shoghi Effendi: "That by the end of the spring of the year 1933 the multitudes who, from the remote corners of the globe, will throng the grounds of the Great Fair to be held in the neighborhood of that sacred shrine may, as a result of your sustained spirit of self-sacrifice, be privileged to gaze on the arrayed splendor of its dome—a dome that shall stand as a flaming beacon and a symbol of hope amidst the gloom of a despairing world."

Here is a responsibility which it is the privilege of Bahá'is to shoulder.

THE HOUR HAS STRUCK

The first part of this article is a quotation from an article in the Federal Council Bulletin for May entitled, "First Century Christianity and Ours," by E. G. Honrighausen, and the application to present conditions follows. The reader can make his own comparisons.

ROME AT THE TIME OF CHRIST

"The first age of Christianity had to meet the same typical groups and influences which we are now called upon to meet. Type for type, they were all there.

"There was a rampant nationalism which had deified the state, and with it the emperor who epitomized its glory. Citizenship and religion were identified; materialism was idolized.

"Syncretism, too, was a first-century phenomenon. Everywhere men were trying to find God by means of an eclectic process, selecting the best in all religions, in the hope that their quest would give satisfaction. Connoisseurs of all religions but actual participants in none! It was an age of cosmopolitanism, universalism and of popularization. In the end, these always produce folks with a remarkable breadth of mind and intellectual cleverness, but lacking in depth, thoroughness and wisdom. How modern!

"In many quarters a fatal cynicism had emerged, pessimistic and gloomy, which caused many a suicide, because the older authorities of religion and morality had been rudely swept away by a changing and critical age. The age was one of brutal transition. A sense of the failure of religious and social institutions was in the air. Mingled feelings of anticipation and uncertainty, fear and hope, universalism and individualism, epicureanism and stoicism, mysticism and realism, gripped life. A sense of satiety and 'fed-upness' created a peculiar vacuum in the soul. A let-down, an exhaustion, following in the wake of fulfilled imperial expansion, demanded physical stimulation in profusion to keep up men's spirits.

MANY PHILOSOPHIES AND CULTS

"So men ran to the philosophers. The Stoics offered some in that day what Walter Lippmann is offering some today: a dogged religion of maturity, which bravely lives on the glorious tradition of the good life. Stoicism was a noble development, and it produced lives of self-control and dignity, ruled by a strong sense of duty. It venerated the dignity of man and the staunch character. The culture of the will was stressed. But it was a stern religion, lacking passion and sympathy. Though it believed in God, it was an unsympathetic Providence, accepted largely in the spirit of agnosticism and fatalism. Stoicism's God was distant—its life was desperate and lonely, and only the 'tough-minded' could follow its teachings. How modern!

"Others ran to the Epicureans, as they run to the realists today—to Joseph Wood Krutch and Bertrand Russell. Thoroughly utilitarian and naturalistic in ethics, they sought to find life in an adolescent fearlessness in the face of a hostile or neutral environment. Sin was denied and its punishment ignored. Life was found in the here and now—it had nothing to do with realities beyond the senses. The idea of a God who sympathizes and suffers with men was quite ridiculous. Naturally such teachers put much emphasis upon human values, freedom and natural happiness. How modern!

SOCIAL DECADENCE

"The social situation was as bad as, if not worse than, our own. But early Christians never sought to change the social order by artificial means. Their faith produced a leavening and germinating ethic. How fluid social life was! A spirit of uncertainty and revolution intensified the air, and the lower classes who had nothing to lose gladly lent their support in the efforts of the desperate to get what wealth and luxury those had who lived at the dizzy top. Then, as now, society was paying for its ruthless wars waged in more adolescent and foolish days. There was plenty of wealth in the upper class, but there was no distribution except the enforced method of charity. Life was cheap, cities crowded, homes went out of fashion. The slave-institution, which regarded men as things and not as persons, was a pillar of society. Lethargy, lack of initiative, and a terrible sameness were in men's souls. Cultural tastes grew flabby, and only the spicy crudities of many a stage, amphitheatre and den of vice aroused these jaded and satiated appetites. A fast life created by a rapidly accumulated wealth of imperial expansion sapped something (as it always does) of the vitality of the older stock. How modern all this sounds!

"Of course, there was a superficial attitude of benevolence everywhere. But it lacked real sympathy. Humaneness is not love.

Slaves were better treated, as were children, women and beasts. An aging civilization gets more mellow. There were shining examples of moral life in many a home. A democracy of life was in the making that was to be a highway prepared for the coming of a greater glory.

THE SOURCE OF NEW POWER

“Into this sort of an environment of thought and life came the infant religion of Christianity and its naive adherents. They flung into the face of this tired and cynical age the impact of a new life, a new ethic, that was rooted in the love of an objective God. Their pure lives and homes, the democracy of their simple church-fellowships, where free and slave and male and female mingled, proved a powerful leaven that worked itself out into the social world without conscious and artificial manipulation. . . . Silent but potent living for the Kingdom of God and its transcendent values gave them their irresistible and unconquerable ethic. No more humanitarianism theirs!”

T was a newly revealed Infant religion that brought “a new life, a new ethic” to that age where so many conditions were similar to our own. If we are perfectly logical should we not look now for a revival of the spirit of early Christianity in a newly revealed religion? If we consider not only the conditions in our present life which are similar to conditions in the first century but also the great scientific discoveries and inventions which have brought such overwhelming and devastating changes to us, can we hope that anything less than Divine Revelation will lead humanity out of its plight? Do not these words of Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, furnish a fitting conclusion for the above remarks?

“Who, witnessing on the one hand the stupendous advance achieved in the realm of human knowledge, of power, of skill and inventiveness, and viewing on the other the unprecedented character of the suffering that afflict, and the dangers that beset, present-day society, can be so blind as to doubt that the hour has at last struck for the advent of a new Revelation, for a re-statement of the Divine Purpose, and for the consequent revival of those spiritual forces that have, at fixed intervals, rehabilitated the fortunes of human society? Does not the very operation of the world-unifying forces that are at work in this age necessitate that He Who is the Bearer of the Message of God in this day should not only reaffirm that selfsame exalted standard of individual conduct inculcated by the Prophets gone before Him, but embody in His appeal, to all governments and peoples, the essentials of that social code, that Divine Economy, which must guide humanity's concerted efforts in establishing that all embracing federation which is to signal the advent of the Kingdom of God on this earth?”

MENTAL HEALTH AND THE NEW WORLD ORDER

GENEVIEVE L. COY, PH. D.

A very timely subject for present day conditions is that of mental health. This subject is here treated from the point of view both of psychology and of religion. "Religion and science," says 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "are the two wings upon which man's intelligence can soar into the heights, with which the human soul can progress." And even religion, powerful as it is in its beneficial effect upon mental health, can well be supplemented by scientific analysis which modern psychology has brought to bear upon mental ills. The second installment of this series will appear in the August number.

THE old adage, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," had been quoted for many, many years before it occurred to anyone to apply this principle to people's health. In pioneer days a man sought a doctor only if he were seriously ill; a dentist, only when an aching tooth had to be pulled. It is only in very recent times that we have learned that it is better to have the doctor give regular examinations to the healthy person, so that he can suggest ways of preventing possible illness. We have also found that occasional visits to the dentist to have a tiny cavity filled are much better use of his skill, than to wait till an aching tooth requires an extraction. The value of prevention in physical health is now recognized by all intelligent people.

Thousands of doctors had prescribed for the physical health of their patients before anyone had the idea that such a thing as mental and emotional illness caused as much misery in the world as did diseases of the body. Slowly the work of the psychiatrist became differentiated from the field of the general practitioner, and a serious effort was made to find the causes of mental and emotional abnormalities, and to develop methods of treatment. But it is only in the past few years that attention has been turned to the prevention of mental ills, and the mental hygiene movement has fostered the ideal of keeping people in good mental health. It is with the maintenance of mental health in the average individual that the present article is concerned.

HOW MAY a person know whether he is mentally well? What constitutes mental health? The person who possesses an integrated personality is in good mental health. A personality divided within itself is ill. The full meaning of such division is best realized by considering extreme instances of mental sickness. We have all heard of cases of a man who is two different people at different times. He may call himself by two distinct names. Often one personality has no recollection of the acts of the other personality. Sometimes Personality A remembers the actions of Personality B, but B has no recollection of his life as A. It is evident that such a person is disintegrated, and is suffering from serious mental illness. But this condition of a division in the personality can occur in less obvious ways. Consider the business man who is devoutly religious on Sundays, professing charity and kindness toward all men, and yet on week-days finds it possible to bribe government officials. It is easy to say that this man is a hypocrite, but this judgment may be quite unfair. He may actually possess such a double and divided mind that he does not realize the discrepancy between his life in business and his life in church.

Such inconsistencies, due to a lack of full integration of the personality, are common. Here is a person who professes to believe in the brotherhood of man, but who would be miserable if he had to eat at the same table with a Negro. There is a woman who one day says, "Mrs. Brown is so snobbish; she is so proud of her money," and on the next declares, "I would never let my daughter marry a poor man." A third person gives part of his energy to the worthwhile work he is doing, but perhaps a third of his life is buried under a bitter weight of jealousy. His jealous fears are continually intruding on his work, and he at last finds himself unable to concentrate on constructive activity. Instead of being an effectual, whole-souled, one pointed individual, he is split in two,—the increasingly ineffectual worker on the one hand, and the miserable jealous husband on the other.

Can you not think of many people whose lives are thus inconsistent, because some part of the personality is not fully integrated with the true core and purpose of the individual's life? Many of them are useful and fairly happy, and yet they are falling short of the joy that life has to give to the man who is not "divided against himself." We need not say that such individuals are mentally ill, but it is obvious that they have not attained abounding mental health. The distribution of mental health among all people is perhaps very similar to that for physical health. Only a small percentage of mankind, on a given day, is seriously ill; only a small percentage is buoyant and radiant in perfect physical health.

There is a large, average group who might say, "I am not often really ill, but I just don't have a great deal of energy". These are the people who often could become really healthy, if they would eat the proper food, and sleep and exercise enough. So, also, in the field of mental health, the average person can be helped out of the condition in which he ignorantly accepts slight divisions in his personality, which always interfere with happiness and efficiency. The essence of mental health is to be able to bring all one's abilities, a completely unified and harmonious personality, to bear on any activity which one desires to undertake.

WHAT suggestions can be given which may show the person of average mental health the direction in which progress is to be made? We will first discuss certain attitudes which must be avoided by one who seeks a fully integrated personality. Following that we shall suggest lines of positive effort.

1. One of the most disintegrating of attitudes which finds some place in the lives of many individuals is that of fear. In ordinary modern life this is seldom a fear of actual physical danger; but mental fears are perhaps more disruptive to the personality. One of the most common of such fears is that of material loss and discomfort. A man who has had a large apartment, several servants, a car and chauffeur, suffers some financial reverses, and has to sell his car and dismiss the chauffeur. Fears for the future begin to fill his mind. He spends a large part of his time worrying about the stock market. He sees himself becoming a poor man, imagines how horrible life will be if he cannot maintain his customary financial and social status, and he ignores the fact that he is in good physical health, and that he has a happy home-life. Soon his fears are the most compelling factor in his life, and his sense of perspective is lost. Such a man often ends in a sanatorium for cases of nervous breakdown, even though his income is still ten times that of the average man.

The fear of failure in one's work destroys the mental health of many people. A woman sets herself a goal of success, as a teacher, as artist, a writer. But she is doubtful of her ability, or feels that her good work is unappreciated. Failure looms as a possibility, and her effort becomes less whole-hearted. Her fear uses energy that should go into her work, and she may actually experience the thing she has feared because of the resulting division between her activity and her negative emotions. She has failed to realize that the truly successful individual is the one who cares so fully about his work that his whole being is lost in it.

fears is the fear of public opinion. Too great a respect for convention keeps many a person from realizing his true possibilities. It is doubtful whether any man can do his best work if his eyes are on the activity, while his ears are listening eagerly for the world's praise or blame of his work. How many people do we know who are poisoned by insidious draughts from "the witch's cauldron, conformity?" Many years ago Emerson sounded a vivid warning against the fear of public opinion. In his essay on "Self Reliance", a reading of which is recommended to all who have entertained such fears, Emerson writes:

"What I must do is all that concerns me, not what the people think. This rule, equally arduous in actual and intellectual life, may serve for the whole distinction between greatness and meanness. It is the harder because you will always find those who think they know what is your duty better than you know it. . . . The objection to conforming to usages that have become dead to you, is that it scatters your force. It loses your time and blurs the impression of your character." Later in the same essay, the writer exclaims, "Misunderstood! it is a right fool's word. Is it so bad then to be misunderstood? Pythagoras was misunderstood, and Socrates, and Jesus, and Luther, and Copernicus, and Galileo, and Newton, and every pure and wise spirit that ever took flesh. To be great is to be misunderstood."

Let each man study his own heart and try to discover all the hidden fears which are sapping his vitality. Let him realize that fear is always cowardice, an unwillingness to face life squarely. "Perfect love casteth out fear", and each individual can find a love so great that fear is consumed in the flame of utter devotion to a worthwhile goal. Fear can be mastered.

2. A SECOND disintegrating factor which destroys mental health is the attitude of seeing oneself as the most important person in one's environment. This attitude is almost always due to unfortunate conditions in early childhood. A young child who is made the center of the stage comes to feel that the whole world revolves about himself. He soon expects that will defer to his wishes, will fulfil his desires. Hundreds of children carry this expectation into adulthood, and never adjust to the reality of life in the larger group. The grown person who is continually offended by real or imaginary slights, whose "feelings are always being hurt", is one who cannot give himself wholeheartedly to the work of the world. The supersensitive individual often prides himself on his superior fineness and delicacy of feeling, and fails to realize that his deep concern about his own feelings is an indication of the withering self-centeredness of his life.

This need to be the center of the stage may express itself, not as supersensitiveness, but as boasting and noisy "showing off". In that case, the individual becomes an active annoyance to his friends. His egotism is more obvious than that of the "sensitive" person. But in both instances, the root of the difficulty lies in failure to see oneself as a necessary but small part in the group life. Both of these disintegrating attitudes can be avoided by a wise training in the first four or five years of life. The grave dangers to children which come from too much unwise adult attention can scarcely be over-stated. The salvation of the mental health of the individual who has grown to manhood with either of these egocentric attitudes can lie only in losing himself wholeheartedly in a cause which is great enough to use all his energies and abilities.

The American Conference on Institutions for the Establishment of International Justice

ARTHUR DEERIN CALL

The sessions of this Conference "which concerned itself with realities," were attended by Washington Bahá'is. The Director was invited by The Bahá'í Magazine to contribute the following report on the Conference especially written for this magazine.

THE American Conference on Institutions for the Establishment of International Justice was held in the City of Washington, under the auspices of the American Peace Society, May 2, 3, 4 and 5. As its name implies, the aim of the Conference was to enable thoughtful men and women of the United States to take stock of their duties towards institutions for the establishment of international justice, with particular reference to the elimination of international war.

One listening to those who took part in the Conference, at the General Assemblies, at the luncheon meetings, or at the sessions of the Four Commissions, came away with the feeling that there is a definite mental awakening among the thoughtful people of America. Men and women, amid all the remedies offered for the maladies that now beset them and their pocketbooks, are asking if more attention should not be paid to the fundamental things. There are uses of adversity, evidently, outside the Forest of Arden, for our very troubles are leading us once more to recall that the American Dream has had to do with principles, and that chief among these principles is that justice which Daniel Webster called, "the greatest interest of man on earth . . . the ligament which holds civilized nations together."

that America is scrutinizing this justice not only with a renewed attention, but with care and ability. The lamp which the founders of this Republic, and the builders who have carried on the task, have found it vitally necessary to place before them has been the lamp of justice. This lamp, it is believed, must be kept burning, for without it our country, all countries, would be in constant danger of wreck on the rocks of wrong. Justice is our pillar of cloud by day and our pillar of fire by night. Indeed, justice is more than a pillar of cloud and a pillar of fire; it is our most substantial reality. It is the cement of every abiding human organization, especially of the State. Without it man's best laid walls soon crumble into dust.

IN HIS message to the first General Assembly of the Conference, the President of the United States expressed his gratification that the American Peace Society had called such a Conference, and added:

"From the beginnings of history, human beings have turned to justice as the safeguard of their inalienable rights to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. Impartial justice has offered mankind its most certain escape from arbitrary power. . . . The only assurance of the equal protection of all in the enjoyment of their rights is justice; and, with justice assured, nations would have little to fear for their safety or their peace.”

Those words of President Hoover were a fitting text to the work of the Conference. That note was not lacking in any of the sessions of the Conference; from the address of the Assistant Secretary of War at the opening session, May 2, to the addresses at the final banquet, May 5. It was sounded in the oration by Honorable Sol Bloom at the tomb of George Washington; in the papers of those who addressed themselves to business aspects of international justice, Ira A. Campbell, Magnus W. Alexander, W. W. Husband; in the addresses by Representative Linthicum and Senator Robinson; in the plea, indeed, for an international force by Oscar T. Crosby. Of course it was there in the argument for the Permanent Court of International Justice, by Professor Philip C. Jessup. It cropped up in the papers by William R. Castle, Under Secretary of State; by Professor Edwin M. Borchard, of Yale University Law School; by Reverend Edmund A. Walsh, S. J., Regent, School of Foreign Service, Georgetown University; by John J. Esch, President of the American Peace Society; by James Brown Scott, President of the American Society of International Law. Edwin C. Wynne, Assistant Chief of the Historical Division of the Department of State; William P. MacCracken, Jr., Secretary, American Bar Association; Harlod G. Moulton, President Brookings Institution; Leo S. Rowe, Director-General Pan-American Union; William John Cooper, United States Commissioner of Education; Stephen P. Duggan, Director of the Institute of International Education; Representative James M. Beck; Representative Ruth Bryan Owen, Elon H. Hooker, and the Secretary of Labor, William Nuckles Doak, in their differing ways, all turned to it.

And they turned to it in a spirit of getting something done.

THE CONFERENCE concerned itself with realities. After days of carefulest consideration, for example, the First Commission called for the appointment of a Commission whose duty it should be, after consultation with foreign governments, to report upon possible methods of securing settlement of all threatening international disputes by amicable and pacific means and without the use of competitive armaments. It recommended the careful consideration of the possibilities of an International Court of Claims, accessible to persons as well as to States, to pass on claims in tort or contract against governments of States recognized as members of the family of nations. It urged international conferences of a periodic nature for the progressive codification of international law. This Commission went further and submitted a draft convention looking toward the establishment of Commissions of Inquiry, supplementary to the Bryan Treaties, for the ascertainment of the law to be applied in the settlement of controversies. Since the existing Commissions of Inquiry are limited to the ascertainment of the facts only, the need in certain controversies for reports also upon the laws involved is apparent.

The Second Commission began its work by accepting four basic principles as follows: (1) Equality of opportunity for all nations; (2) National economic policies so shaped and directed as to promote the needs and growth of a harmonious world economy; (3) Joint responsibility of all nations for world recovery; (4) World recovery and further economic advance based upon efforts to maintain and improve standards of living with a view to minimizing as far as possible existing inequalities among nations.

This Second Commission urged continued cooperation with other nations through the International Labor Organization, the Economic and Financial Organization of the League of Nations, the Union for the Publication of Custom Tariffs, the International Bureau of Commercial Statistics. It recommended that our government accede to the international convention for the simplification of customs' formalities, and participate in the effort to bring about unification of commercial practices.

The Third Commission worked upon the relations of the social sciences as taught in the schools and colleges to the ideals of justice among nations.

The Fourth Commission showed clearly the international character of social work, particularly in cases of divided families and of the application of immigration and deportation laws. It examined defects in the laws regulating probate courts, in courts with jurisdiction over juvenile and child guardianship, and in the manner of obtaining competent evidence affecting naturalization. It made specific recommendations relative to these matters.

OF COURSE there will be other Conferences of a like nature. Interest in justice is not a new thing. It is as old as the ages. The Greeks thought of Themis, their Goddess of Justice, as sitting beside Jove, chief among his counselors, holding aloft her balanced scales in which she evenly weighs opposing claims. Indeed, so highly did the Greeks revere this their fair Goddess of Justice, they made her the mother of Astraea, pure and innocent, Virgin among the stars. Because interest in justice continues, frequent conferences, such as the one just held in Washington, are inevitable.

To define anything is not easy. Frequently throughout the Conference the speakers found themselves differing over the meaning of justice. It was generally accepted, however, that there is an essence of order, of well-being, of application of truth to the affairs of men, all of which are contained in the word justice. It was either Alexander Hamilton or James Madison, none knows which, who wrote in the Federalist these convincing words: "Justice is the end of Government. It is the end of Civil society. It ever has been and ever will be pursued, until it is attained, or until liberty be lost in the pursuit."

Persons who attended the Conference were for the most part scholars. They came to the Conference familiar with the fact that our United States was the direct result of a consuming thirst for justice. In 1783, after the victory of Yorktown, George Washington, then Commander-in-Chief of the American Armies, wrote a circular letter to the Governors of the States in which he emphasized four things as essential to the existence of the United States, the first of which following the necessity of an indissoluble Union, was: "a sacred regard to public justice." In 1785, he wrote to James Warren, saying that the greatness of this country could be assured: "If we would but pursue a wise, just and liberal policy toward one another and keep good faith with the rest of the world." The first familiar words of the Preamble to our Constitution are: "We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice."

IN THE morass of the present, the Conference thought it proper to examine our case from every side, and did so examine it from many sides. Its major task, however, was to look at it from the angle of justice. That was an intelligent course, for, as Emerson remarked in his discussion of "Perpetual Forces": "All our political disasters grow as logically out of attempts in the past to do without justice, as the sinking of some part of your house comes of defect in the foundation." In his last public address, delivered in the Old South Church, Boston, March 30, 1878, this very wise man of Concord referred again to justice, and "justice alone," as that which "satisfies everybody. . . . It is our part to carry out to the last the ends of liberty and justice." Jonathan Edwards' God was not a Trinity but an Quaternity, the fourth person of which was Justice. Speaking before the New York State Bar Association in 1912, Mr. Elihu Root placed justice above majorities, above officials, above government itself, resting "on the basis not of any popular vote but of the eternal laws of God."

When we think of what is lawful, rightful, equitable; when we seek for fairness, for due process of law, for the establishment of what ought to be; when our quest is for liberty and equality, for the happy balance between rights and duties, we are being led by the hand of justice. In the sixth century language of Justinian, justice is: "The persistent and unchanging will that gives to everyone his due." That, of course, is the stuff that peace is made of.

ON THIS the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, the Conference began fittingly with acknowledgements of his contributions to our foreign policy. Evidently men need to recall that our foreign policies were largely set by the Father of our Country, and that in the main those policies have been beneficent. Of course, no one quotation can be said fully to represent the views of George Washington; but the following, from his Farewell Address, comes nearest, perhaps, to expressing him, the man who so spent himself to advance the cause of good government and peace in our modern world; it certainly reveals the eternal substance of his greatness:

"Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and at no distant date, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence."

But participants in the Conference were following no mere authority, however acknowledged and acclaimed. They were trying to face the world's growing debacle and to discover as far as possible available remedies. They were aware that democracy and constitutional government are being attacked with unusual force not only abroad, but in America; that the laws and the courts must not fail to meet the demands of justice; that this is true not only for issues between persons, but also for those more complicated matters affecting the relations of states. As intelligent and patriotic Americans, they were concerned to foresee and to forefend, as best they could, dangers likely to be disclosed by an unfolding tomorrow.

A PILGRIMAGE TO GREEN ACRE

ORCELLA REXFORD, B. SC.

"I was delighted to hear of the progressive activities of that dearly beloved spot, Green Acre, upon which the Master has bestowed His tender care and loving kindness, and of which we are all hopeful that it may become, whilst the work of the Mashriq'ul-Adhkár is in progress, the Focal Center of the devotional, humanitarian, social and spiritual activities of the Cause."—Shoghi Effendi.

—John Greenleaf Whittier

GREEN ACRE a year ago, at the time of the Bahá'í Convention in Chicago, was but a name to me. Today it is the Green Akka of America for there, as at the Temple,* I found something of the same indefinable, spiritual essence that one experiences in Akka and Haifa in Palestine.

The impelling motive of my first pilgrimage to Green Acre, was the announcement at the Convention of last year that Miss Martha Root, as well as many other teachers of note, were to give a series of talks there, and that one "could drive there in two days and a half" from Chicago.

Thus in modern pilgrimage fashion, with car and trailer attached, my husband (Dr. G. V. Gregory), a friend and myself, set forth for Eliot, Maine, from Indianapolis, where I had just concluded my season's lectures with the establishment of a Bahá'í study class.

Upon inquiry, we found the fastest way to make the trip was from Detroit through Canada to Buffalo, thence to Troy, N. Y., across northern Massachusetts, by the Mohawk Trail to Portsmouth, N. H., and across the bridge into Eliot, Me., where is located Green Acre.

When we sighted the bronze tablet at the entrance to the grounds we were all excitement. Here indeed was a new adventure different from any other kind for it was spiritual in nature; a communion of souls for a common purpose of spreading the spirit of love and unity in a world of darkness.

The welcome at the Inn from the Bahá'í friends made us feel as children must who come back to the old homestead for a family reunion. We had come "home," for here was our real family, the Bahá'í friends. Though many of the people were hitherto unknown to us, yet because of the at-one-ment of spirit manifested and the light that shone from their faces, we immediately felt no strangeness but a great peace and happiness at being with our loved ones in the Bahá'í community. The thought came to me of how the ideas of the New Day change us. Here I was visiting the land of my forefathers; for almost directly opposite the Green Acre Inn one of my ancestors had had his home, yet I was detached completely from

*Baha'í Temple at Wilmette, Ill.

Baha'í Summer Colony, Eliot, Maine.

“family ties” on my first visit to this land.

GREEN ACRE is an epitome of New England beauty with its sweeping meadows sloping down to the shining “river of light”—the Piscataqua. We admired the stately elms with drooping limbs of peaceful dignity, affording shade to earnest groups of students discussing the weighty problems of life; the winding highway, passing by colonial doorways of pristine whiteness and leading to the Fellowship House where the meetings are held; the pines with cathedral spires, jealously guarding the hallowed memories of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visit to the sun-streaked aisles. Here in their hushed midst where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá used to talk to the friends, those who did not share the blessed privilege of meeting Him, seem to “tune-in” on His thought waves lingering there, under the Great Pine, and to go away conscious of having been in the Master’s Presence.

It is not the physical place that makes Green Acre. To the critical eye it might be just another summer resort with an inn, one of such places as abound throughout New England; but to the searcher for truth, it is an enchanted land of spiritual refreshment. Here, where He spent much time on His visit to America in 1912, one senses the actual presence of the living ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. One could visualize Him in His flowing robes of the East, His white turban crowning silvery locks, a Prophet in a young world, pacing up and down the paths, walking over the grassy slopes, beholding the glorious sunsets, entering the Inn, everywhere impregnating the very atmosphere and soil with His spirit. What wisdom He displayed in setting aside this spot as a spiritual birthplace for the believers to congregate in during their leisure months! He urged us to gather here, for He knew that we needed the help we could get from this hallowed place and from each other, that we might develop those most essential of all qualities, love and unity.

Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Bahá’í Cause, continually emphasizes the importance of going to Green Acre. In conversations with us at Haifa he stressed the importance of the friends and new believers getting acquainted with one another, that they might better work together in love and understanding. Surely no greater opportunity for consultation regarding our spiritual welfare could be afforded than by a visit to Green Acre. In this divine atmosphere, hallowed by the memories of the Master’s visit, we can relax from the strain and stress of a sick and unhappy world and pause for refreshment of the spirit. Here is found the leisure to develop close associations with our fellow workers, to exchange spiritual ideas and study those methods by which we can advance the Cause of God.

GREEN ACRE is not a place. It is a series of episodes in spiritual unfoldment. It “does something” to the soul of one who comes not in the spirit of criticism, of “getting” or having an enjoyable vacation, but of giving, first of all one’s love to others, of speaking constructively and of giving one’s self and time to make others happy. It is a "tuning-up" place for the slack strings of the spirit, which the discords of a jangling world have made flabby. It is the water of life which quenches the parched spirit in the desert of search. It is a confirmation of the state of mind which one brings with him and a test to those who need to have the dross of self burned away. To each visitor is vouchsafed a different experience, "for unto him that hath shall be given"; what is born within depends upon whether one sees with the eyes of the flesh or of the soul.

Green Acre affords an opportunity to study in a restful environment, to train ourselves for the stupendous task that lies ahead of each Bahá'í to teach this Cause in the days to come when thousands will demand of us "what we know". These days are close upon us, and while there is yet time, let us not be found unprepared!

Let me share with you some jottings from my note book heard at the meetings during my memorable visit.

"Green Acre is a universal spot. There are two power centers in the Cause, the Temple and Green Acre."

"Let our greatest prayer be for an increase of our capacity."

"One pearl is worth a wilderness of sand. If a pearl associates with a pebble it can turn it into a pearl. Only people can transmit love into the world."

"To become informed Bahá'is, we should set aside an hour a day to read the teachings. The balance of the time we should teach, rest or listen."

"There is no power in one's words unless there is spiritual power behind them."

WHAT DOES ONE receive at Green Acre? The inspired and life-giving words of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá read in the meetings and the instructions of the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, Shoghi Effendi; the close moments of prayer and meditation with an earnest believer in a wayside cottage; the sharing of blessed memories of the early days of the Cause and of the Master's visit to America; a thrilling narrative of a visit to Akka when 'Abdu'l-Bahá was still a prisoner, told by one of the early believers; the copying of precious Bahá'í tablets; the social hours at the homes of friends in the village; the dances at the Inn; the corn roasts on the Beach at Ogunquit at sunset; the pearls of wisdom that fall from the lips of the Bahá'í speakers and teachers, which can be captured and held for those moments when they can be passed on to a dying world; yes, these and more that the tongue cannot utter, are part of the delightful memories which one takes away from Green Acre. Memories which cause the heart to quicken with the spirit of love in the days when we are apart. Such glorious moments that give us inspiration and food to pass on to others who catch our spirit and glow with love and unity, too! Here at Green Acre we can be still and know God. Here where God is light, the darkness takes its flight.

"The peace and beauty of Green Acre," says a believer, "can never be conveyed until one realizes that its ministry is not only to the body but to the soul, that its very foundation rests upon that unique element in life called vision, which is nothing less than the voice of God in the human heart."

'Abdu'l-Bahá in tablets to Miss Farmer, who founded Green Acre, and in tablets to other friends, gave many instructions about the development of this center, among them the following which has had and will continue to have a creative effect:

"If one looks for praiseworthy results and wishes to produce eternal effects, let him make an exceeding effort that Green Acre may become an assemblage of the Word of God, and a gathering place for the spiritual ones of the heavenly world. . . . Every year a number of the beloved ones and maidservants of the Merciful must go to Green Acre and raise the divine call there—the more who go the better."

CHAPTER VI

Thank God that thou has stepped into the arena of existence in such a blessed age, and hast opened ears and eyes in such a day of promise.

—'Abdu'l-Bahá

THIS chapter will contain further impressions, memories and brief stories that are possibly not recorded elsewhere, of those priceless days during the sojourn of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the western world. My desire is to share at least a breath of the joy, fragrance, and thankfulness that filled the hearts of those privileged to observe at close range the workings of Divine Love and servitude.

The perfect balance of the life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá between the esoteric and the exoteric expression, the inner union with the Creator and its outer manifestation in human contacts, was a continual revelation to the onlooker. When beholding that shining Exemplar one was constantly aware of the inadequacies, the limitations and defects of one's own life (not that He for an instant referred to personal weaknesses or limitations; on the contrary if we did make such applications He instantly lifted them from us.) His method was always that of attraction, illumination, and inspiration; never criticism or denunciation. Great was the spiritual freedom given to every soul in His home.

The following personal experience has proved of infinite value. As I had approached that Universal Sun I was as one wearing 'blinkers' which limited my spiritual vision. Without doubt I had habitually, but unconsciously, vibrated between certain degrees in the circle of life, knowing little else or being little conscious of the remainder of the three hundred and sixty degrees. But 'Abdu'l-Bahá by His utterances and His life in an indirect way was continually expanding my horizon. At first, this was decidedly disquieting, and a temporary confusion and uncertainty resulted. Then I would just begin to reach a certain new equilibrium of thought and concept when again like the needle of a compass I was vibrating between two other unfamiliar points. This process continued for some time and grew more and more bewildering until one early morning in meditation its purpose became quite clear.

Abdu'l-Bahá was desiring that every one of His followers be possessed of the sight of the mind and the sight of the heart and have them both at all times atuned and active in every one of the three hundred and sixty degrees of existence; for nothing short of that outlook will bring the universal peace and brotherhood so long expected, upon the earth.

One morning there came from His lips a statement that made all hearts extremely sad and troubled, for we were all such children that never before had He so spoken to us. This was His challenging utterance, "The Cause of Bahá'u'lláh has not yet appeared in America." I will leave you, Reader, to deduce for yourself what that proclamation did to the heart of everyone who heard it!

WHEN OCCASION arose one day to make a decision of importance I asked one of the interpreters to inquire of 'Abdu'l-Bahá what I should do. His reply was, "Your desire is My desire, your happiness is My happiness and you must decide."

Sometimes when I would ask Him if we were going to such and such a place tomorrow or next week, He would say, "It is not yet known." So completely was He in the clutch of God that at all times it was apparent that He sought not His own will, but was as "A leaf in the wind of the Spirit," and at every instant He was moved by the breezes of God. Then again He would send for me and say, "How soon can you be ready to go to Boston," (or Montclair, or some other place which He soon intended to visit). He would then send me on ahead to prepare for His arrival.

During those months I had the distinct feeling of being in a matrix world, in which, under His guidance and protection I was, like an infant being taught to take the first steps into God's kingdom. Also often I would feel like a mechanic turning the wheels in a light-house tower. From His room at the top of the house on West 78th Street, New York City, I would pray for the different countries, races and religions. It was as though from that room 'Abdu'l-Bahá was continually sending forth into the darkness of human civilization great beams of celestial illumination, thereby guiding humanity on its way through the travail of this dark night which is preceding the promised dawn proclaimed by the Prophets and Manifestations of all time. This was one of my greatest joys. Sometimes 'Abdu'l-Bahá would find me there and He would say, "Are you happy? If you are not happy who can be happy?" What Words!

How well we recall it all, and when we contact with the friends we met under His roof, instantly we are there again and the fire of love that welded the hearts is instantly fanned into flame!

Recently it was my privilege to see at the Convention a faithful believer, devoted to the cause of service and love, who had one day (in 1912) come early in the morning to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the hotel in Chicago. He was out for a walk in the park. I asked her if she would like to make up 'Abdu'l-Bahá's bed, to which she joyously responded, thankful beyond words for the privilege of rendering Him any service. At the Convention we saw one another across the auditorium. When eye met eye we were instantly at that bedside as if it had been but yesterday and though no word was possible, it was not necessary. In reflection His Presence and His Gifts returned and the heart leapt anew with joy and thankfulness. That was to me one of the great moments during my recent stay in Chicago.

ANOTHER MORNING, in 1912, a small group of us, including Orientals and Occidentals were talking and laughing together and 'Abdu'l-Bahá entered the room. With a radiant smile He expressed His happiness at our happiness and laughter, saying that these gatherings were very blessed, and that the Orient had much to give to the West, also in turn the Occident had much to contribute to the East, and when true unity and understanding were achieved between these two groups the whole world would attain great progress.

On several occasions He brought to me great happiness as well as a real challenge when He said these words, "It was ordained by God that you should be rendering this service." How well I realized, that of myself, I could do nothing, but thru His pure Mercy and Bounty I had been permitted so great an opportunity, and the words returned with which we are all so familiar, "To whom much is given, of him much shall be required."

Whatever the need of the individual who came to Him, that need was met. The disturbed mind was set at rest through a quickening power that renewed the understanding. The one whose body was carrying the weight of disorder or disease was brought into greater harmony, and those whose spirits were depressed, to them was given the life-giving elixir of a lofty inner flight.

The heart of 'Abdu'l-Bahá was like a pure and perfect mirror that reflected the heart and life of each one who stood before Him, and after gazing into that mirror the diagnosis was complete, and steps were instantly taken towards the true and lasting healing.

A believer one day brought a friend who knew very little of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and His teachings. The friend was not well but had told no one of her sufferings and difficulties. She came, expecting to be merely an onlooker with no thought of anything but a hand shake or a greeting. After the believer had expressed her appreciation of the interview and had told 'Abdu'l-Bahá of some people to whom she was giving the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá arose, crossed the room and stooped down and removed the shoe off one of the feet of her friend, and held that foot between both His hands in silence for several moments. The pain that had caused her untold suf-

The believer who brought her was planning to undergo a serious operation for the removal of a growth, but in a short period of time after that visit, the growth passed from her body without the operation. While one felt that His emphasis was upon the health of the spirit there were times when through His understanding and control of the higher laws governing all of life 'Abdu'l-Bahá restored complete harmony of body, of mind or spirit, which ever was the particular need at the moment. Never did He mention these healings nor did others. They were just an incident in His full days of limitless service and one recalled the old familiar words, "Go, and tell no man."

THE FOLLOWING incident is but one more evidence of the innate knowledge of the Universal Educator and His unique service to the scientific investigator as well as to that of the layman. Appointment had been previously made by phone for a scientist to call upon 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Before entering His room he assured me that he had come out of curiosity and had no real interest in the interview, but that it was to please a friend of his.

Full of skepticism he entered that room, and as he did so 'Abdu'l-Bahá arose, came forward, greeting him with the utmost pleasure and courtesy. Instantly he was at ease and seemed to quite forget himself as 'Abdu'l-Bahá began to talk of South Africa and the Boer War. No mention had been made previously or at the time that this guest had ever been in South Africa.

To this man's utter surprise 'Abdu'l-Bahá went into detail about certain happenings that took place at that time that were of a private nature and had never even appeared in print. He grew aghast but in spite of himself became visibly interested, and joined in the conversation with the utmost naturalness.

After having established a firm foundation of fellowship and nearness 'Abdu'l-Bahá turned the conversation into the channels of light, color and form. These were the special line of study and discovery in which he was most engrossed. Everyone present was intensely interested in all the detailed scientific information that 'Abdu'l-Bahá brought forth.

At the close of the interview this alert man came again to me and said with the utmost eagerness, "Will you please tell me how this man knows all about these scientific subjects when they tell me that he has never been to school in his life?" I smiled, and in reply said, "Do you not think that is an interesting and worth-while question for you to be able to answer for yourself?" He went forth thoughtful and somewhat perplexed but filled with a great interest as he said these words, "'Abdu'l-Bahá has confirmed me in all of my experiments, but more than that he has given me a key by which I feel sure that I am going to be able to make further and more fundamental discoveries."

Again we bore witness to the going-forth "With Gladsome Heart"!

A SCOTCH EDITOR APPRECIATES THE BAHA'Í MAGAZINE

SINCE we last referred in this column to the Bahá'í Movement, several issues of the Bahá'í Magazine have reached our desk. The numbers for January, February and March are now before us, and all of them contain articles and notes high in tone and of fine literary quality, but by no means beyond the capacity of the average reader. Bahá'ism emphasizes the unity of the human race and the basic similarity of all religions. It is really a message to the present age as to how Christianity can be practically applied and its principles are such as appeal to the people of all nations, creeds and tongues. The Magazine therefore contains each month contributions and comments unique and interesting and such as are rarely to be met with in any other periodical publication. Taking up the latest issue before us (March) we find a combination of most helpful and uplifting reading matter. In the editorial notes we have these words: "There is only one thing that can master man's emotions and dedicate them to a noble and permanent structure of civilization. That power is religion. It has proved its ability to do this in the past. It will prove its ability to do so again in the future." And concerning the Bahá'í Movement it is remarked that in gradually permeating the world "it is bringing together men and women of diverse races and religions and unifying them in a deep and fervent bond of love and unity." This surely is the note which above all others should be struck in the present distracted state of affairs among the nations. The articles, "Watchman, What of the Night?" "Independent Investigation of Truth," "Preparedness," and others, are all rich in high suggestion and inspiring thought, and the full volume of twelve parts (a complete index of which is given) contains papers and notes on the Bahá'í world order so varied, instructive and authoritative as to surpass anything which we know of in periodical literature. They show a clear path for the world's feet amid the perplexities and welter of present-day civilization. The Bahá'í Magazine is published monthly (25 cents a copy) at 1112 Shoreham Building, Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

THE SUPREME AFFLICTION

A Study in Bahá'í Economics and Socialization

BY ALFRED E. LUNT

This article is printed in complete form at the request of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá'ís of the United States and Canada, and has been passed by the Reviewing Committee. It presents a very complete treatment of the economic plight in which the world finds itself today, and describes the perfect solution as found in The World Order of Bahá'u'lláh.

*“And We desire to show favor to those who were brought low in the land, and to make them spiritual leaders among men, and to make of them Our heirs.” —Bahá'u'lláh.

of detestable crimes. The dethronement of God, in the human consciousness, and the enthronement of gold as a cherished idol, is not a mere play upon words in the past and present history of the race.

The Primal Necessities God has created hunger and thirst, the need of warmth and shelter as essentials of the very existence of the human race, and has deposited within man an ever present consciousness of these needs. Throughout the countless ages of man's occupation of the earth, these necessities have, to an overwhelming degree, been his taskmasters, the seat of his ambitions, the source of his joys and sorrows. Since food, drink and housing are vital needs of his physical existence, and these have never been attainable except through individual effort,—these primitive needs have wielded an enormous influence in the history, progress and destiny of our race. In the hope of gold, men have yielded life. For the power of money to purchase these necessities, men have frequently laid aside honor, and have not fallen short of the commission

The Unbalanced Distribution of Necessities As the individuals of society, because of this primitive urge, identified happiness with the possession of the goods of this world, and tasted of the power that comes with the attainment of property in excess of their actual needs, the distribution of means gradually became unbalanced. This unbalanced distribution, however, is by no means a modern phenomenon. The emergence of humanity from the patriarchal state marked the taking on of individual responsibility for livelihood, and was the signal for a steady encroachment upon property by the more capable, more ambitious, or more unscrupulous members of society. We must remember that up to comparatively recent times, huge masses of humanity were either slaves, possessing no right to property of any kind; serfs, with an inchoate right at best to a meagre ownership; or feudatories, holding their fiefs, lands or properties conditioned strictly upon an oath of unrestricted service to their lord or baron. As a consequence, the favored classes held all property in their sway, and vied with each other, often by private war or foray, to attain larger and larger possessions. Many of the medieval wars had their rise in these inordinate contentions of barons and princes, in which the hapless serf or feudatory bore the brunt of the fighting.

The Emergence of Innate Differences in Economic Capacity With the successive destruction of feudalism, serfage and slavery, the struggle for existence devolved upon all men. Theoretically each man had his chance, but, here, the innate differences in the character and capacities of men became disclosed in a universal sense and for the first time. Initiative, education, ability, ambition for fame and power, cunning, cruelty, greed found abundant contrast with sloth, timidity, incapacity, ignorance and resignation. These innate differences, excellencies and defects, being part of the natural order, appeared insurmountable, and opened the way for a kind of economic slavery. Money being a seed for the reproduction of itself, tended to multiply in the hands of its possessor. Monopolies became the order of the day. In monarchical countries, the nobility held tightly to their landed estates, and wielded power over the commoner. In the republics, the wealthy classes, fortified by the laws of inheritance, and tending to accumulate ever larger ratios of the available wealth and to control it, have gradually consolidated their position, to the weakening of the agricultural element, the office worker and the day laborer.

Economic Insecurity Although the universal, public school system of the west unquestionably fits the average boy and girl for a higher level of social living, and has greatly diminished the illiterate percentage, the levels above have, at the same time, proportionately advanced in wealth and power, so that the grades and degrees of society have not materially changed. The average graduate of the public schools finds his or her economic level as a mechanic, a factory worker, a clerk, a farmer, or as proprietor of a small business. While this represents a striking improvement over the condition of the poorer classes of past centuries, it is, nevertheless, a fact that the vast majority of the inhabitants, even in the western countries of the globe, are not economically secure, beyond the weekly receipt of their pay envelopes, and when confronted with disaster, sickness or unemployment soon deplete their small reserves.

This is strikingly illustrated in the current wave of economic collapse and its consequent unemployment which has numbed the financial nerves of every country. The normal unemployment ratio has swelled to a three or four-fold extent, and hardships and anxieties multiply. Self-respecting family heads discharged from employment and unable, after urgent quest, to find remunerative jobs, reluctantly turn to the charitable agencies. The City of Boston,¹ alone, is disbursing

¹Massachusetts, U. S. A.

$24,000 daily² to an ever increasing number of destitute families. This is but an instance of what is taking place in hundreds of American cities and communities. Doles and public aid in other countries have brought great nations to the verge of national bankruptcy. The over production of commodities which followed and had its source in the feverish war period, has failed to adjust itself to the requirement of peace, and the demand for goods, seriously impaired by the diminished pay-rolls, gives no promise of restoring the economic balance of the past decade and returning the workers to the factories in the numbers and with the earnings to which they had become accustomed since 1914.

The Old Order Changeth, But Mankind Remains
Its Prisoner In the face of these conditions, industrial leaders and statesmen have proved themselves largely impotent. The old order, developed from the feudal system, enchains and blinds those who are at once its beneficiaries and its victims. While it would be idle to say that no recovery can be expected from the present economic crisis, since the economic law of supply and demand ultimately reestablishes a balance, it is, notwithstanding, equally true that such a system, susceptible, as history proves, to these repeated debacles in our economic life presents grave defects. The prime, devastating element that at present dominates the economic life of the nations is their supine and abject surrender to the natural laws of the survival of the fittest, and the struggle for existence. The claws of nature are unyielding and essentially cruel. The vegetable and animal world are its truest exponents. But is humanity likewise forever condemned to the cruelties of this soulless law of the lower levels of the creation? This point we shall endeavor to unfold.

The Tyranny of "I am not my brother's keeper", by which Cain sought to escape the questioning of the Supreme Judge, has been adopted and made a part of man's daily life. Granted that countless exceptions exist among us, the fact remains that in the economic relationships, this purely natural law has full sway. We salve our conscience with various forms of charitable aid and poor-relief, but this is but an evasion of the issue. A fundamental malady in the human body can be lastingly healed only by ascertaining the real cause of the malady, then by a prescription that meets the exact conditions. May it not be that definite human rights are being ignored, that divine relationships exist which, recognized and applied, contain the solution?

Organic Disease and Health We know that any undue separation of functions in an organism, any impairment of the reciprocal relations between its parts, is a certain cause of disease. This is equivalent to disorder and discord, and may be termed the operation of the law of decomposition in the organism. Its course, unless interrupted, is ever towards the dissolution and death of the organism. On the other hand, the unity and health of the organism is synonymous with the perfect reciprocity of its parts, their full cooperation each to each. Happiness, welfare and efficiency, according to the creative plan under which the organism came into existence is thereby bestowed. Under these conditions, the beneficent law of composition pours its blessings of life and health upon the creature. These primordial laws of composition and decomposition are rooted in the creation and are not inherently controllable by man. They bestow life and death, and constitute the inevitable fate of all created life in a world of "becoming" and contingency.

Decomposition, the Unerring Agency of Destiny

But although these basic laws of destiny are inviolable in their sphere of action, they are powerless to operate except under the exact conditions that call them forth. They are compulsory and selective but neither voluntary nor fickle. Like the arrow to the mark, they obey only the law of attraction and unerringly choose the habitations of their affinities. And by this I mean it is impossible for the law of decomposition to operate in a healthy body. Like maggots or fruit flies arising in a basket of decayed fruit or a heap of animal refuse, spontaneously appearing within rather than from without their host, decomposition enters an organism only because it is attracted by the disordered condition that exists therein. In other words, disorder, disunity, discord,—the three d's of a dismal triad,—invite decay. As Bahá'u'lláh said—"Like seeks like and has affinity with its own kind."

The body of man represents and is the highest organism we know.

Logically, and by corollary, the body of humanity, homo sapiens as a race, is likewise entitled to this distinction, in the collective or racial sense.

Nature's Dualities —Life and Death

The picture we have endeavored to paint but dimly and faintly depicts the vast cosmic forces that proceed from the inmost recesses of Nature, governing, limiting, expanding and controlling every material atom in the universe. Whether composition or decomposition, fire or humidity, sour or sweet, ebb or flow, or any of the great natural dualities, these colossal forces are, in a word, the unyielding arms, the adamant jaws, the very claws of Nature, and at the same time,—since the duality persists and its other aspect must be translated into terms of human consciousness,—they are the tireless servants of humanity, furnishing heat and moisture, cooling water to parched lips, life and movement to the blue ocean, and delectable fruits and grains to the taste. Are these forces friends or foes? Shall we fear and shun them, content in a palsied ignorance of their true origin and function,—or shall we approach closely and examine them with faith and assurance, conscious of a certain oneness with them, mindful that the Lord of all Being is our common Author? And more important, shall we submit utterly to their dominion, or shall we examine carefully the reality of these forces? Perchance, we may possess weapons by which to conquer and subdue them.

Man, More Ferocious Than Nature

If we treat Nature as we have been accustomed to treat our foreign nations of various colors and origins, with fear and poorly concealed detestation, it is certain she will, in her time, turn and rend us, or at least will have the last word. This is because only by studying her changing moods, born of the duality, in a sympathetic and dauntless spirit, can we adapt these forces to the upbuilding of civilization. As we cannot control or change the inherent properties of the laws of life and death, as was previously stated, so we cannot change natural elements such as fire into moisture, or water, per se, into something lacking humidity. But we can, and have, converted the action of fire into grateful warmth, and diverted it from turning into a destructive conflagration; we have transformed certain chemical elements into a humane, soothing anaesthetic, and we, also, have, shameful to say, utilized other natural elements and cunningly and cold-heartedly converted them into deadly and devastating vapors today threatening, with the menace of potential war, millions of living men, women and children. Man has done this. And it is a fair question to ask, whether Nature, workshop of the mysteries of creation as she is, hurler of the thunderbolt and the twisting tornado, is to be feared as are those men to be feared who consciously and deliberately in the name of an abandoned, rejected and false patriotism, hideous in their ferocity and cruelty, today forge the implements which, should war come again, will break the heart of mankind?

Nature Yields to Science Certain Aspects of Her Sovereignty

To resume. The purpose of this apparent diversion from the subject is to provide the basis upon which to certify to two outstanding verities. First, that man can adapt the blind, unintelligent forces of nature to purposes apparently contrary to their normal uses, as, for instance, sending his body under and beneath the sea in a submarine containing oxygen, which defeats the natural law that has for ages barred the body of man from the ocean depths; or imprisoning within a storage battery or confining to wires, the rampant force of electricity whose nature, undisturbed, is to be elusive, free, cosmic and unrestrained. In a word,—man possessed of a power unknown to Nature, superior to Nature and transcending Nature even as the mind transcends the mere instinct,—bends the natural forces to his own ends.

A New and Greater Conquest
Now Required

And, second, that while we cannot change or re-create the inherent properties of the natural elements, such as converting a basic element into another element, we can,—to a degree not yet wholly understood and determined as to its scope,—formulate and prepare the conditions in a particular device, or, (and this is the all important issue), within our (man's) own organism, both individually and racially, which will attract the beneficent, kindly, life-giving forces of nature, rather than those containing the elements of destruction. And this is but the first step. For behind these beneficent and kindly forces, the Sun of Truth which is the Word of God pours forth a love and a knowledge compared to which the greatest light of Nature is but a guttering candle. It is these divine powers that are our ultimate goal.

A point of receptivity for these reposes in the breast of man. But the fortifications of Nature must first be stormed.

The Equilibrium of Health and the Law of Decomposition It may, here, be objected that we are confusing the disease itself with the process or law of decomposition, or attributing to every disease two major causations. That the disease sets up its own pathology and no force enters from without in the sense of an all embracing law. Furthermore, that all diseases are self-communicatory and do not, and cannot, per se, constitute an affinity which attracts anything whatsoever.

We submit, however, that the equilibrium of the elements within an organism is the point from which all deviations from the normal must depart. As we conceive this abstruse problem, and take as the most perfect example, the body of man, it is plain, for example, that if, in such a body, the prime elements of organic iron, calcium or manganese, or any of these, are either in excess of the normal or abnormally diminished in volume, in the blood stream, a departure from the health equilibrium is thereby instanced which sooner or later must produce a disordered functioning. This is the first step toward what we call disease. The resistant factors within the body do their utmost to combat and neutralize the poisons that are automatically created by the disturbance, but if the conditions setting it in motion are not drastically changed, through a dietary and regime adapted to the need, and then only in case the organic functions are not too greatly impaired, the disorder is progressive and death intervenes. Because of this basic law of life and health, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in an illuminating and profound Tablet at one time stated that when materia medica had advanced on scientific lines sufficiently to become competent to analyze a drop of blood, to the extent of disclosing the presence and ratio of every essential element there present, each to each, medical science would at that moment have within its hands the key to health. Once knowing the degree of the departure or deviation from the normal of the elements requisite to health, and comparing this with the known proportions which each element should occupy in the blood flowing through a healthy body, the restoration of health was to be found in the assimilation of those organic aliments necessary to restore the equilibrium, or, conversely, in the reduction of intake of those aliments which had been found to be in excess in the blood of the patient.

There remains to be proved the part played by the natural disintegrating force at the focal point of the disease we have instanced. This force ever seeks to break down and destroy any composed organism. It is antithetical to that which draws together and composes the essential particles that, as units, we know as living beings. It is separative, disorganizing and ever tends to resolve the combination of elements back into their original, unrelated, and independent status. Thus, the decomposition of water releases the molecules of hydrogen and oxygen, hitherto held together by the sanction of composition,—into their original loneliness. The affinity that drew them together as moisture, is shattered. Similarly, the more complex organisms, such as the animal, in the transformation of death yield up their elements which had been conjoined during the life of the animal. The moving force in this process is this natural law of change and death. Other demonstrations exist of which lack of space prevents the details, but the essential process has become clear.

The Forces of Decomposition Within Our Economic Life are Powerless,
Unless Man Opens the Door to Their Visitation

But, in all this, the application of our thesis is primarily that a departure from the equilibrium of health and composition must exist before the destructive element can assert its power and accelerate the progress of the disease through the inflow of the separative impulse. Without this departure, the organism is immune. Secondly, that an intelligent organism, as is man, may, through this knowledge, and the power of self-analysis, become cognizant of three things: (1) The existence of a diseased state within his collective or racial body, in its economic relationships; (2) His recognition of a power which he innately possesses to change voluntarily, and in accordance with these basic, universal laws, the disorder within himself for which he, alone, is responsible; and (3) By thus applying the eternal axiom "Physician, heal thyself", employing those economic remedies that are the true "aliments" for the restoration of economic equilibrium, he will rout the enemy of his wellbeing by depriving it of the nutrition it must have for the accomplishment of its fell purpose. The situation calls for a racial adaptation of the story of Hercules and the earth-giant Antaeus. The giant's strength became atrophied and impotent when deprived of the vitalizing forces of his earth mother. May humanity shake off the tentacles of this strangling power by summoning its God-given resolution, drinking deep of the Cup of Knowledge which God has extended to this storm-tossed planet in this New Day, and with the divine weapon of heart and soul destroy forever the selfish and egotistic veils that have made him lose hope in successfully changing what he calls "human nature", which is in reality but a base surrender to the natural law that holds him in its grip. The being who has succeeded in harnessing the fire and the lightnings of Nature, will not fall short in subduing the more interior and subtle natural force that has so long tyrannized over the use and distribution of the vital necessities of his life, such as food and drink, shelter and comfort. He, man, will not, must not fail in this greatest of all conquests even though, to thus finally assert his divinely bestowed spiritual sovereignty over the power of Nature, he must pay the full price, by sacrificing and yielding up the doubtful guerdon of living unto himself alone. The New Age calls him to this greater happiness; the law of unity, deposited by the Ancient of Days in every infinitely small and infinitely great created being, calls him to establish now his own unity; to put aside the playthings of the past and lay hold of the strong rope that God has revealed in this dawn of human maturity; to place himself under a law greater than Nature, a law emanating from Him who created Nature and all her works through His Wisdom and Power. Why should mankind, possessing attributes and powers directly derived from Divinity Itself, and never possessed by Nature, the intelligence and will to conquer Nature's cosmic forces, be content to subject himself any longer to her domination over his most precious material relationships? The instillation of love for his fellow-men, the assertion of his divinely given will are invincible forces, that no merely natural power can withstand. The Way is open. Shall we walk therein, or continue to wander in the gloomy morasses of self-delusion?

The Thesis Our thesis, then, is—that since humanity, through its noble and gifted inventors and scientific discoveries, has proved its God given right to invade the darksome cavern which is Nature's fastness and stronghold, bringing forth therefrom, bound and captive the titanic forces which he, mankind, has proceeded to adapt to his material service upon the earth,—it is certain, that through a spiritual power he even now possesses, he will apply this same process, on a higher plane, to release and free millions of his own race, made in the temple and image of Almighty God, and still held fast within the claws of nature, from the economic shackles that, today, deprive them of inherent and innate rights, withhold from their out-reached hands the little comforts they crave, confine them to factory, office building and mine unnecessarily long hours, and deny them that vital interest in the great businesses they have assisted to upbuild, to which, under the law of God, they are entitled. To remedy these diseases that, in this century, have brought low the industrial and commercial structure over well nigh the whole earth, is the task and duty of every soul informed of the divinely spiritual basis upon which the economic relationships rest; of every far-seeing business man who has realized even a trace of the organic unity of mankind; and of every labor leader whose vision is big enough to see beyond the ranks of his own group and to identify their true interests with those of every other basic element of the industrial fabric.

The reason for this is because "the fundamentals of the entire economic condition are divine in nature and are associated with the world of the heart and spirit."¹ Without knowledge of the principles contemplated in this preceding quotation, no improvement in the economic state can be realized.

Nature is powerless to confer upon men the knowledge of how to achieve this new economic freedom. Nay, rather, the mind and heart of mankind, derived from a Source that is supernatural, even from God, possess those keys that will unlock the treasuries of knowledge that have been prepared against this very use in this New Age. But let not man suppose he can, in this, underestimate the power of Nature which has for so long defeated and enslaved him. He must watch her (in her interior workings within his social and economic life) even as the cat watches the mouse, or, more accurately, the mouse watches the cat. Up to now, the cat has toyed with the mouse almost as it willed, in the great economic kitchen of humanity. Man, unwittingly or urged on by greed, has left wide open the door through which the similitude of Nature delights to stalk. This door is no other than human covetousness, ignorance, strife and discord, the cutting off, by violent and harsh means, of the essential relationship that exists within the Kingdom of Man and between its component parts (individual men). This essential relationship is that which, in the Divine Mind, has made of humanity, as a whole, an organism of sacred and highest destiny. Put in another way, every human being, white or colored, it matters not, is a cell within this vast organism and entitled by divine right to the cooperation and reciprocal aid of every other cell, without exception or possibility of error; even as he in turn contributes of his full strength and function to the welfare of the whole. Who is so blind, after consideration of this strictly accurate and dynamically scientific fact, as to deny its truth?

We have previously demonstrated the unanswerable truth that the human body is the archetype of all organisms. Can the aggregate of human beings, fortified as they are by the possession of mind and soul, be less organically one than is a single cell of this great collective racial entity?

Applying these sacred and basic truths, and emphasizing again the deadly accuracy of that spiritual science that informs man of the divine reality of his own essential oneness, we would now apply it as the sole and inevitable formula for the healing of our economic life. Wise men of all nations will grasp this formula, even as the sore athirst seizes the cup of cool water. From countless sources, today, men of vision are recorded in expressions that prove their awakening to the penetrating power of this irrefutable, universal axiom. Even as "My people perish for lack of knowledge", equally it may be said—"My people are revived and made whole by accepting and applying the advices of Him who is the Knower, the Generous."

In this demonstration, full recognition must be given to the fact that the law of decomposition in its long sway over the psychology and egoistic consciousness of mankind, is not so easily overpowered as are some of nature's lesser children, such as chemical elements, fire and electricity. This is because that death-dealing law, in its purely human phase, is associated with the ultimate destinies. There are strict limits to which mankind can guide its operations; although even in its more terrifying aspects it is, in reality, as are all natural laws, the symbol of Divine Providence, and the pathway to His Nearness and Good Pleasure.

Man's Supreme Affliction Since the decompositional phenomena invariably and solely appear, as has been mentioned in detail, within an organism which has, consciously or ignorantly, allowed its original functions to become disordered, we must, in fairness, admit that these reappearing economic upheavals, this present state of suffering and threatened starvation in which millions of human beings today find themselves, comprise unerring evidence that the economic life of humanity has become the prey of the destructive, obdurate, negative power of nature, the sinister element of its duality. What can humanity do to stem this tide, which engulfs not only our industrial life, but is also the prime cause of every war that history records? Must the race perish for lack of knowledge?

The answer is plain. The causes contributing to the disease that has sapped our industrial strength must be resolutely uncovered and the remedy administered. Without attempting to enumerate every pathological lesion in our economic system, it will suffice to point out some of the major elements that, at present, operate to attract the destructive forces which have assailed the world.

Let us begin with the greatest constructive remedy, in a general sense,—following this with an enumeration of the existing maladjustments that are opposed to economic health:

Fellowship and Unity The inculcation of love and of unity between all men is a mighty restoring agency for all these ills. This must be realized. It is, in reality, the essence of the divine elixir, which has been prescribed by the Divine Physician of this Age. The oneness of mankind, our essential brotherhood, is the hope and promise of everyone of the great, universal Teachers and Prophets. This century marks the dawn and the practical expression of this great truth in the life of humanity. This is the reality of man. Every strife and discord in our common life together arises from the conflict of personalities. But the realities of the souls are in accord. The leaders of the business world must investigate this resplendent reality, and apply this unity in the business life of the world. On this point, 'Abdu'l-Bahá says—"Science cannot cure the illness of the body politic. Science cannot create unity and fellowship in human hearts. Neither can patriotism or racial prejudice effect a remedy. It can be accomplished solely through the Divine bounties and the spiritual bestowals which have descended from God in this Day for that very purpose." Arayed against this truly divine elixir for social and economic health, are these traditional, ingrained and sadly disordered states of present day civilization, centering largely in the business and political fields.

The Principle of Trusteeship 1. Failure to recognize and apply the trust relationship essentially existing between the poor and rich, the fortunate and the unfortunate. Since in every trust, there must be a trustee, a trust fund, and a beneficiary, no room is left under this arrangement for further continuance of the laissez faire policy by which man contemplates his fellow man as a creature apart, admitting no responsibility towards him. Pauperism, wretchedness and misery cannot exist in the same world with this trust principle, which is based upon the right of every member of the human family to the necessities of life, provided he, in turn, contributes his part as a worker in the world. This basic remedy will, further on, be elaborated, as will certain of the other headings of this section.

The Tithe 2. Almost entire ignorance of the divine and basic law governing the tithe or income tax.

Organic Relation-ship Between Labor and Capital 3. The barrier which has been built up between labor and capital, employee and employer. This is, in effect, a lack of unity and understanding among the leaders of both classes of their real organic relationship.

Taxation 4. A system of taxation which ignores the true principle upon which contributions to the state or government should be based.

Strikes and Profit-Sharing 5. Strikes and lock-outs in industry are a symptom, merely, of the faulty relations of worker and employer. The bargaining power of the great trades unions is based upon the collective influence of multitudes of workers whose only protection against injustice has been conceived to lie in the creation of a class bound together by a community of interest. But this community of interest is wrongly placed. It should be with the employer whose success and profit depends upon the worker's faithfulness and efficiency. Classes are an indication of separation in the business organism, and this has attracted the destructive forces of which strikes and labor troubles are but an inevitable result. The conflicting elements, therefore, must be bound together in unity through a common interest. This interest is attained through true profit-sharing which contemplates a type of partnership or ownership in the business, on the part of the worker. This means, rightly worked out, a new and hitherto unknown peace will come to the industrial ranks, which no outside force can break. Besides this, the principle of wages sufficient to assure the workmen of an adequate support should be supplemented by the adoption of a method of pensions to be accorded to faithful workers who have become feeble and helpless. The purpose in all this is to confer a sense of security upon the worker who comprises the vast majority of all men. This is brotherhood illumined by the light of justice. Wages, alone, fall short of justice to the man or woman whose hands, skilled or unskilled have become calloused and hardened by countless hours and successive years of faithful service to his or her employer, firm or corporation.

The Class Theory in Industry, an Organic Disease Without this toil, the wheels of industry c a n n o t turn; without this daily grind of human tissues and energies, no profits will appear. These workers are a component and essential part of the business organism with which they have allied themselves and are entitled to their part in its ownership. Only a blind and unsound reasoning can justify the continuance of the class theory, in industry. To do so is to descend to the level of inorganic life, the lowest mineral state. No,—man, and his economic relationships with his fellow man, is organic, inter-related, cohered. The lowly functions of the nails, hair and skin in the human body are essentials to bodily health and efficiency. The finer organs of the brain and heart, the eye and the ear all contribute instant succor and unflinching cooperation to those lowlier parts, which, in turn, protect and round out the perfection of the whole. No neglect appears in a true organism for any of its parts. The welfare of each is the vital concern of all. And, conversely, the affliction or impairment of any is a menace to the health of the whole body. It takes but little acumen to apply this example of a universal solvent of industrial harmony to the present confused, uncoordinated industrial picture.

The Upliftment and Security of Agriculture 6. At the present time, the economic status of the farmer has suffered owing, in part, to overproduction in a world wide sense, and the lessened demand which characterizes the present impoverishment of the general population. Agriculture is of first importance in the modern state. Plans of a cooperative nature must be applied to strengthen and fortify the producer through the application of the new principles of trust relationship, mutual aid and taxation, to the agricultural communities. Encouragement and assistance must be extended to the large mass of our urban floating populations, now economically insecure, to return to the land, where many of the necessities of life may be provided through scientific farming. The present unbalanced artificial and highly abnormal life of the cities is, at best, a symptom of immoderation, and has built up false standards of living for millions who are thereby deprived of the blessings of that normal existence which is synonymous with a country life. Moderation, without which the truly balanced life is impossible, is a vital feature of the civilization now dawning upon humanity.

Labor Saving Machinery Should Be in Part an Asset of Labor 7. The failure of employers, generally, to grant the workers any part of the savings in the cost of operation of a business effected by the enormous increase in the use of labor saving machinery, and, its corollary, the retention of schedules of working-hours which are a survival of conditions existing before the advent of the machine age.

Injustice to Workers No Longer Young 8. Servile and selfish submission of the business world to the unchecked operation of the natural law of the survival of the fittest which is cruelly and unwittingly applied to the elimination from industry of workers who have passed a certain age, regardless of their ability or physical fitness.

Provision for Work—Its Spiritual and Real Significance 9. The present faulty system of provision for work, due, in part, to the maladjustment now existing between the urban and the agricultural occupations. In this New Age, arts, sciences and all crafts are considered as worship, when undertaken in the right spirit. The basis for this is that all effort and exertion put forth by man from the fullness of his heart is worship, if prompted by the highest motives and the will to do service to humanity. Since all men are commanded to work and engage themselves in some one occupation, the avenues of permanent occupation must be opened through suitable enactments and provisions. Bahá'u'lláh tells us—“We have made this—your occupation—identical with the worship of God, the True

One." This will release into the fields of production and wealth vast numbers of persons at present occupying, economically speaking, a purely parasitic status.

The Tariff 10. Brief mention has been made of the tariff barriers that separate the nations. This subject is of baffling complexity unless the touchstone presented in this thesis is courageously, unflinchingly and universally applied. Granted that every tariff, other than nominal, constitutes a barrier between the nations who are, from this point of view, interdependent cells or functions of the grand organic body of the race, it is clear that such unnatural and purely provincial enactments must, inevitably, set up a pathology quite outside and contrary to the fundamental and divine proposition that humanity is essentially one family. The reprisals visited by other countries upon an inordinately high tariff made into law by a particular country, the resentments that are set up, and, more practically speaking, the boomerang-like effect upon the particular country in the impairment of its foreign trade as a consequence of the inability of foreign nations to pay their commodity debts in goods because of the high premiums exacted by the tariff impositions, is an evidence of this truth. This fact is well known, and is a material contribution to the present international economic catastrophe. There is a growing realization of this which the rapid rapproche of nations together, in recent years, has engendered. The old order justified itself in its tariff policy because it was founded upon the conception of nations as independent entities, supremely sufficient unto themselves. Other nations were foreign, untrustworthy, or, at best, precariously inimical to the fatherland. Racially they were of a different order, according to this view, ever hatching sinister designs against the fatherland, and in some strange way less human than ourselves. The strange and unknown is ever synonymous in the human mind with fear and distrust. But the new world order instituted by Bahá'u'l-láh knows neither strangeness nor foreignness. Under its dynamic impulse, nations are being drawn together, while in the process the scales of superstition and fear fall from the eyes of the different peoples, as the snow-flake melts and vanishes under the warm sun. This is because of the universal action of the Sun of Truth whose powerful rays are penetrating the densest veils.

The liquidation of the tariff question will necessarily be a gradual process; paralleling the attainment of homogenesis by the nations. The strongest bulwark of the tariff is its appeal for the preservation of the standards of living in a country fortunate enough to enable its people to utilize a larger degree of comforts and luxuries than is possessed by less favored nations. Only as the sharing of benefits is applied, only as the consciousness of the organic oneness of the whole race is implanted, only to the degree that the entire body of mankind becomes sensitized to the needs of its weaker members, will the appeal of the argument for the sustenance of a specialized and strictly localized standard of living lose its force. But since this fundamental spiritual precept is an essential element of the new world order, that transforming power is certain, in the coming days, to eliminate every outworn element, even as the mighty surges of ocean cast upon the shore every impurity.

The Unconscionable Levies of War 11. The demands and exactions of national governments for military and naval expenditures, which consume the major part of all governmental income, based upon both direct and indirect taxation of the people, and are a moving cause of tariff walls between countries, enacted for the purpose of revenue production for the payment of these crushing and unhallowed obligations.

A Universal Language 12. The reinforcement of industry in the international relations by concentration, without further delay, upon the selection of a universal language, through which improved communication and understanding with foreign business houses and industries will result, is an important remedy to the existing confusion and misunderstandings witnessed in international business dealings.

The Need of an Aqua Fortis Let us now elaborate, somewhat, certain of these major headings that are of special importance in the readjustment aimed at. It must not be supposed that a deep-seated disease, which has baffled the best economic specialists by its stubborn and frequently violent symptoms, a disease that is so chronic that those whom it has made ill have, indeed, confused its manifestations with those of normality, can be cured with mere bread and water or sugar pills.

Nay, the patient, in this case, is so near dissolution that a strong and bitter remedy must be administered, an aqua fortis, as it were, and the reactions may be, at first, convulsive, and akin to the agonies of resuscitation.

The reader will have already noted those of the above headings that constitute the point of adjustment, or moderation, between the crystallized theories of extreme capitalism and its polar opposite, socialism. This balance, in the midst of unbalance, is one of the greatest contributions in economic thought to be unfolded by Bahá'u'lláh. Fundamentally stated by Bahá'u'lláh, its teaching was extended and applied practically by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Many, perhaps most, of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's most profound discourses on the economic phase of life, were declared on American and Canadian platforms, and in western pulpits.

Capitalism and Socialism The sternest and most unrelenting objection to the adoption of the maxims of socialism has been and is its supposed assault upon the right to hold private property, and its feared interference with the vested right of individual initiative. In western countries this threat to an ancient inheritance of individual rights has produced a determined resistance that has successfully curbed any noteworthy political advance of the socialist state. No socialist political party, even in the brief days of power it may have attained in a few instances, has applied to the government of the state the full impact of socialism. This is because of this inherent, somewhat unaccountable urge within the human breast, which instinctively opposes any undue limitation of its alleged right to self-expression and self-advancement. Russia alone has succeeded, through the terrorism of revolution and regicide, in implanting a new theory of government, pseudo-socialistic in its nature, but only by the institution of a new ruling class deriving its power from a minority of the population. But the differentiation of class is not, per se, a basic doctrine of true socialism, which contemplates, rather, an average levelling of all society, and the ultimate elimination of economic class distinctions.

The Prime Defect of Capitalism

The Bahá'í Economic Plan supplies the remedy for two major defects in the capitalistic and socialistic conceptions. As stated above, it is the moderating force that ever seeks the equilibrium of the two extremities or opposing polarities. The defect of capitalism has been its unwillingness to apply the doctrine of human unity in its relationship with the working class; its failure to recognize its interdependence, which calls for sharing and cooperation, with the other integral elements of the business organism. Regardless of the increase of profits in favorable times, notwithstanding the lowering of the cost of operation and production through the wholesale discharge of workers occasioned by new labor-saving machinery, the capitalistic idea has, in the main, been to absorb for itself, its owners and stockholders, every dollar of net profit. The true theory, however, is that the benefits derived from new inventions be distributed, in a reasonable and just way, to those directly afected, in this case both employer and employee. Every invention adapted to industry is, in reality, clothed with a public interest in which the worker has a share. Both justice and equity require that the employer, alone, be not permitted to absorb 100% of the benefits. Independent of the profit-sharing plan, elsewhere treated, this blow to labor may be at least in part redressed by new and diminished schedules of working hours, thus making unnecessary the discharge of workers, while at the same time preserving wage schedules so far as possible. Such action would have an intensely stabilizing effect. Very recently, one of the largest industrial corporations in America has announced its intention to place its workers on a six hour basis, while simultaneously increasing its working forces to correspond with the new conditions.

The Fundamental Defect of Socialism

The inherent defect in the socialistic philosophy, on the other hand, is its philosophical inability to recognize the innate and created differences in human capacity and attainment. Any departure from the conception of humanity as an organism, merely confuses the issue. The organic relationships are synonymous with the differences in capacities; and each proves the existence of the other. This being true, no dead level can be successfully brought about in human society. The function of the heart can never be imposed upon the function of the liver, or the finger nails. To attempt this is only to repeat the dubious experiment of Lyncus, King of Sparta, who divided all the property of the kingdom equally, and assigned to each man his place. After Lycurgus left the kingdom, believing it to be permanently established in accordance with his plan, these innate differences of capacity among his former subjects speedily reasserted themselves, and the old order was reestablished.

Reciprocal and Organic Cooperation Essential to Human Happiness

The problem, therefore, is to build, in accordance with the new order of this century, the true reciprocal cooperation between all the human cells of this vast organism, in closest mutual service. This is the true law of being; this is the condition basically essential to the happiness and welfare of humanity. Under such a condition, there will be no extreme poverty, no man without the necessities of life. Nor will it be possible for a wealthy man, possessed of means far beyond his needs, to live in happiness side by side with one who is starving and wretched. The trust principle as applied to the economic world is inclusive of the rights of all; it is not only protective of the rights of private property and initiative, but at the same time destroys pauperism and insures the necessities of life, as a right rather than a dole, to every willing worker and to every unfortunate one who without fault on his part is the victim of economic disaster. This truly divine law is the point of reconciliation between the contending forces of capitalism and socialism. It destroys fear and will draw men together in the solution of their common problems. It is the solvent of the present incongruous economic chemistry that has arrayed its elements against each other in fear and distrust, leaving itself wide open to the influx of the destructive forces.

The Ingredients of the Divine Remedy Let us turn at this point to the utterances of Bahá'u'lláh and of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and see of what the remedy of the Divine Physician is composed. We are painfully aware of the disease, and the only question is whether we have suffered enough to awaken us to acceptance of a real remedy, rather than to continue to imbibe mere nostrums and sedatives.

We have hitherto refrained from excessive quotation from these Words of Life and Guidance, realizing that this matter must be capable of expression in its practical applications, by a simple layman who may be assumed to represent, to some degree at least, the viewpoint of students of this world wide problem. But any inspiration we have received is due to the power and justice of these Words about to be quoted:

In the Hidden Words, Bahá'u'lláh says:

“O ye rich ones upon the earth! The poor in your midst are My Trust. Therefore guard My Trust and be not intent only on your own case.”

“O Children of Dust! Tell the rich of the midnight sighing of the poor, less heedlessness may lead them (the rich) into the path of destruction; and deprive them of the tree of wealth. To give and to be generous are attributes of Mine; well is it with him that adorneth himself with My Virtues.”

“O son of Man! Bestow My wealth upon My poor, that in heaven thou mayest draw from stores of unfading splendor and treasures of imperishable glory."

"O Son of Spirit! Vaunt not thyself over the poor, for I lead him on his way and behold thee in thy evil plight and confound thee forevermore."

"O Son of Man! Thou dost wish for gold, and I desire thy freedom therefrom. Thou thinkest thyself rich in its possession, and I recognize thy wealth in thy sanctity therefrom. By My Life! This is My Knowledge, and that is thy fancy; how can My Way accord with thine?"

"O Son of Being! If poverty overtake thee, be not sad; for in time, the Lord of wealth shall visit thee. Fear not abasement, for glory shall one day rest upon thee."

"O Son of Man! Should prosperity befall thee, rejoice not; and should abasement come upon thee, grieve not; for both shall pass away and be no more."

"O Quintessence of Passion! Put away all covetousness and seek contentment; for the covetous hath ever been deprived, and the contented hath ever been loved and praised."

"O My servants! Ye are the trees of My garden, ye must give forth goodly and wondrous fruits, that ye, yourselves, and others, may profit therefrom. Thus it is incumbent upon every one to engage in crafts and professions, for therein lies the secret of wealth, O men of understanding! For results depend upon means, and the Grace of God shall be all-sufficient unto you. Trees that yield no fruit have been and will ever be fit for the fire."

"O My servant! The best of men are they that earn a livelihood by their calling, and spend upon themselves and upon their kindred, for the love of God, the Lord of all the Worlds."

"O Oppressors on Earth! Withdraw your hands from tyranny, for I have pledged Myself not to forgive any man's injustice. This is My covenant which I have irrevocably decreed in the preserved tablet and sealed it with My seal of glory."

"O Children of Negligence! Set not your affection on mortal sovereignty and rejoice not therein. Ye are even as the unwary bird that with full confidence warbleth upon the bough; till of a sudden the fowler Death throws it upon the dust, and the melody, the form and the colour are gone leaving not a trace. Wherefore take heed, O bondslaves of desire!"

Bahà'u'lláh from Bahà'i Scriptures p. 82—The Twelfth Glad Tidings: "It is incumbent upon everyone of you to engage in some one occupation, such as arts, trades and the like. We have made this—your occupation—identical with the worship of God, the True One. Reflect, O people, upon the Mercy of God and upon His Favors, then thank Him at dawn and at dusk."

Bahá'u'lláh "Hidden Words"—
"O Children of Men! Know ye not why We created you all from the same dust? That no one should exalt himself over the other. Ponder at all times in your hearts how ye were created. Since We have created you all from one same substance, it is incumbent on you to be even as one soul, to walk with the same feet, eat with the same mouth and dwell in the same land, that from your inmost being, by your deeds and actions, the signs of oneness and the essence of detachment may be made manifest. Such is My counsel to you, O concourse of light! Heed ye this counsel that ye may obtain the fruit of holiness from the tree of wondrous glory."

'Abdu'l-Bahá, Tablet to the Hague—"Through the Ideal Power he (man) should be emancipated and free from the captivity of the world of nature—as the struggle for existence is one of the exigencies of the world of nature. This matter of the struggle for existence is the fountain-head of all calamities and is the supreme affliction." (Italics ours.)

'Abdu'l-Bahá, "Promulgation of Universal Peace, p. 139.—"Religion is the outer expression of the divine reality. Therefore, it must be living, vitalized, moving and progressive. If it be without motion and non-progressive, it is without the divine life; it is dead. The divine institutes are continuously active and evolutionary; therefore the revelation of them must be progressive and continuous. All things are subject to reformation. This is a century of life and renewal. Sciences and arts, industry and invention have been reformed. Law and ethics have been reconstituted and reorganized. The world of thought has been regenerated. Sciences of former ages and philosophies of the past are useless today. Present exigencies demand new methods of solution; world problems are without precedent. Old ideas and modes of thought are fast becoming obsolete. Ancient laws and archaic ethical systems will not meet the requirements of modern conditions, for this is clearly the century of a new life, the century of the revelation of the reality, and, therefore, the greatest of all centuries."

'Abdu'l-Bahá "Promulgation of Universal Peace", p. 128.—"The essence of the matter is that divine justice will become manifest in human conditions and affairs and all mankind will find comfort and enjoyment in life. It is not meant that all will be equal, for inequality in degree and capacity is a property of nature. Necessarily there will be rich people and also those who will be in want of their livelihood, but in the aggregate community there will be equalization and readjustment of values and interests. In the future there will be no very rich nor extremely poor. There will be an equilibrium of interests, and a condition will be established which will make both rich and poor comfortable and content. This will be an eternal and blessed outcome of the glorious twentieth century which will be realized universally. The significance of it is that the glad-tidings of great joy revealed in the promises of the holy books will be fulfilled. Await ye this consummation."

"If wealth was a necessity, Christ would have wished it for Himself. He lived a simple life, and one of the titles of Baha'u'lláh was "the poor one". In Persian His title was "darvish", and that means one who has not a slave. All the Prophets of God were poor. His Holiness Moses was a mere shepherd. This will show you that in the estimation of God poverty is greater than the accumulation of wealth—that the poor are more acceptable than the lazy rich. A rich man who spends his wealth for the poor is praiseworthy."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

“What could be better before God than thinking of the poor? For the poor are beloved by our heavenly father. When His Holiness Christ came upon earth those who believed in Him and followed Him were the poor and lowly, showing the poor were near to God. When a rich man believes and follows the Manifestation of God, it is a proof that his wealth is not an obstacle and does not prevent him from attaining the pathway of salvation. After he has been tested and tried, it will be seen whether his possessions are a hindrance in his religious life. But the poor are especially beloved of God. Their lives are full of difficulties, their trials continual, their hopes are in God alone. Therefore, you must assist the poor as much as possible, even by sacrifice of yourself. No deed of man is greater before God than helping the poor. Spiritual conditions are not dependent upon the possession of worldly treasures or the absence of them. When physically destitute, spiritual thoughts are more likely. Poverty is stimulus towards God. Each one of you must have great consideration for the poor and render them assistance. Organize in an effort to help them and prevent increase of poverty. The greatest means for prevention is that whereby the laws of the community will be so framed and enacted that it will not be possible for a few to be millionaires and many destitute.”

Chapter on “True Wealth” in “Answered Questions”, p. 89. “It is clear that the honor and exaltation of man must be something more than material riches; material comforts are only a branch, but the root of exaltation of man is the good attributes and virtues which are the adornments of his reality. These are the divine appearances, the heavenly bounties, the sublime emotions, the love and knowledge of God; universal wisdom, intellectual perception, scientific discoveries, justice, equity, truthfulness, benevolence, natural courage, and innate fortitude; the respect for rights and the keeping of agreements and covenants; rectitude in all circumstances; serving the truth under all conditions; the sacrifice of one’s life for the good of all people; kindness and esteem for all nations; obedience to the teachings of God; service in the Divine Kingdom; the guidance of the people, and the education of the nations and races. This is the prosperity of the human world! This is the exaltation of man in the world! This is eternal life and heavenly honor! These virtues do not appear from the reality of man except through the power of God and the divine teachings, for they need supernatural power for their manifestation. It may be that in the world of nature a trace of these perfections may appear; but they are not established and lasting; they are like the rays of the sun upon the wall. As the compassionate God has placed such a wonderful crown upon the head of man, man should strive that its brilliant jewels may become visible in the world.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Bahá’i Scriptures, p. 445—“The disease which afflicts the body politic is a lack of love and absence of altruism. In the hearts of men no real love is found, and the condition is such that unless their susceptibilities are quickened by some power so that unity, love and accord develops within them, there can be no healing, no relief among mankind. Love and unity are the needs of the body politic today. Without these no progress nor prosperity can be attained. Therefore, the friends of God must adhere to that Power which will create this love and unity in the hearts of the sons of men."

"This is an exigency of the times, and the divine remedy has been provided. The spiritual Teachings of the Religion of God alone can create this love, unity and accord in human hearts. Therefore, hold to these heavenly agencies which God has provided so that through the love of God this soul-tie may be established, this heart-attachment realized, the light of the reality of unity be reflected from you throughout the universe."

"The secrets of the whole economic question are divine in nature, and are concerned with the world of the heart and spirit. In the Bahá'í Teachings this is most completely explained, and without the consideration of the Bahá'í Teachings it is impossible to bring about a better state."

From The Promulgation of Universal Peace, p. 128—"Among the results of the manifestation of spiritual forces will be that the human world will adapt itself to a new social form, the justice of God will become manifest throughout human affairs and human equality will be universally established. The poor will receive a great bestowal and the rich attain eternal happiness. For although at the present time the rich enjoy the greatest luxury and comfort, they are nevertheless deprived of eternal happiness; for eternal happiness is contingent upon giving and the poor are everywhere in the state of abject need.

Through the manifestation of God's great equity the poor of the world will be rewarded and assisted fully and there will be a readjustment in the economic conditions of mankind so that in the future there will not be the abnormally rich nor the abject poor. The rich will enjoy the privilege of this new economic condition as well as the poor, for owing to certain provision and restriction they will not be able to accumulate so much as to be burdened by its management, while the poor will be relieved from the stress of want and misery. The rich will enjoy his palace and the poor will have his comfortable cottage."

From Star of the West, Address of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Montreal, Canada in 1912, Vol. 13, No. 9, p. 227—

"The mystery of this phenomenon (that man cannot live to himself alone) the cause thereof is this, that mankind has been created from one single origin, has branched off from one family. Thus in reality all mankind represents one family, God has not created any difference. He has created all as one that thus this family might live in perfect happiness and well-being."

"Regarding reciprocity and cooperation: each member of the body politic should live in the utmost comfort and welfare because each individual member of humanity is a member of the body politic and if one member of the members be in distress or be afflicted with some disease all the other members must necessarily suffer. For example, a member of the human organism is the eye.

The Sympathetic Nervous System of the Body of Mankind

If the eye should be affected that affliction would affect the whole nervous system. Hence, if a member of the body politic becomes afflicted, in reality from the standpoint of sympathetic connection, all will share that affliction since this (one afflicted) is a member of the group of members, a part of the whole. Is it possible for one member or part to be in distress and the other members be at ease? It is impossible! Hence God has desired that in the body politic of humanity each one shall enjoy perfect welfare and comfort."

A Disordered Household "Although the body politic is one family yet because of lack of harmonious relations some members are comfortable and some in direst misery, some members are satisfied and some are hungry, some members are clothed in most costly garments and some families are in need of food and shelter. Why? Because this family lacks the necessary reciprocity and symmetry. This household is not well arranged. This household is not living under a perfect law. All the laws which are legislated do not ensure happiness. They do not provide comfort. Therefore, a law must be given to this family by means of which all the members of this family will enjoy equal well-being and happiness."

"Is it possible for one member of a family to be subjected to the utmost misery and to abject poverty and for the rest of the family to be comfortable? It is impossible unless those members of the family be senseless, atrophied, inhospitable, unkind. Then they would say "Though these members do belong to our family—let them alone. Let us look after ourselves. Let them die. So long as I am comfortable,

I am honored, I am happy—this my brother—let him die. If he be in misery let him remain in misery, so long as I am comfortable. If he is hungry let him remain so; I am satisfied. If he is without clothes, so long as I am clothed, let him remain as he is. If he is shelterless, homeless, so long as I have a home, let him remain in the wilderness."

"Such utter indifference in the human family is due to lack of control, to lack of a working of the law, to lack of kindness in its midst. If kindness had been shown to the members of this family surely all the members thereof would have enjoyed comfort and happiness."

"God is not partial and is no respecter of persons. He has made provision for all. The harvest comes forth for everyone. The rain showers upon everybody and the heat of the sun is destined to warm everyone. Therefore, there should be for all humanity the utmost happiness, the utmost comfort, the utmost well-being."

"But if conditions are such that some are happy and comfortable and some in misery; some are accumulating exorbitant wealth and others are in dire want—under such a system it is impossible for man to be happy and impossible for him to win the good pleasure of God. God is kind to all. The good pleasure of God consists in the welfare of all the individual members of mankind."

The Infinite Design of Universal Brotherhood "The purport is this, that we are all inhabiting one globe of earth. In reality we are one family and each one of us is a member of this family. We must all be in the greatest happiness and comfort under a just rule and regulation which is according to the good pleasure of God, thus causing us to be happy, for this life is fleeting."

The Selfish Man Lower Than the Animal "The man who thinks only of himself and is thoughtless of others is undoubtedly inferior to the animal because the animal is not possessed of the reasoning faculty. The animal is excused; but in man there is reason, the faculty of justice, the faculty of mercifulness. Possessing all these faculties he must not leave them unused. He who is so hard-hearted as to think only of his own comfort, such a one will not be called a man."

"We ask God to endow human souls with justice so that they may be fair, and may strive to provide for the comfort of all, that each member of humanity may pass his life in the utmost comfort and welfare. Then this material world will become the very paradise of the Kingdom, this elemental earth will be in a heavenly state and all the servants of God will live in the utmost joy, happiness and gladness. We must all strive and concentrate all our thoughts in order that such happiness may accrue to the world of humanity."

From "Light of the World," p. 45—"The solution begins with the village, and when the village is reconstructed, then the cities will be also. The idea is this, that in each village will be erected a storehouse. In the Language of Religion it is called the House of Finance. That is a universal storehouse which is commenced in the village. Its administration is through a committee of the wise ones of the community, and with the approval of that committee all the affairs are directed."

The Storehouse and the Trust Fund. Its Receipts and Expenditures "First, whatever contributions are necessary, they obtain from the bank at interest. For instance, they borrow from the bank at three per cent and loan to the public at four per cent. Any farmer who is in need of implements, they supply and give him all his necessities. When the crop is harvested, it will be the first income of the storehouse. The first revenue is this. But this revenue is not equally distributed. For instance, a person may have a crop of one thousand kilos and this is only sufficient for his wants and living. From him nothing will be taken because he needs it all. If something is taken from him, he will remain hungry. But again, there may be one whose needs require one thousand kilos and his income is two thousand kilos. From him one-tenth is taken. Again, one needs two thousand kilos, but his income is ten thousand kilos. From him two-tenths will be taken. He needs two thousand kilos. If two thousand are taken from him he still has six thousand remaining."

"One has fifty thousand kilos, from him one-third is taken. One may have ten thousand kilos expenses, but has one hundred thousand kilos income. One half is taken. The greater the income, the greater is the ratio of taxation."

Second: "It is also the same with the cattle. They take proportionately the revenue from the cattle. For example, if a man has two cows necessary for his wants, nothing is taken from him. The more he has, the more is taken from him.

This is the second revenue.”

“The fourth revenue comes from mines. If a mine is found upon the land of a person, one-third of it belongs to him and the remainder to the storehouse.”

“The fifth revenue is hidden treasure. If a person finds a hidden treasure in the earth he takes half of it, and the other half goes to the storehouse.”

“The sixth revenue. If it (treasure) is found on the way, also half of it belongs to the storehouse.”

“The seventh revenue is voluntary contributions to the storehouse. Of their own free will and with utmost willingness, the people will give.”

“The first expenditure: The storehouse ought to give one-tenth to the Government, to the public treasury for the public expense.”

“The second expenditure is for the poor. The poor who are in need, those who are exempt, not those who are idle. For instance, if a person’s crop is burned or he has a loss in his business, and for this reason has become poor, these poor people are to be taken care of.”

“Third, the infirm, who come to want and cannot work.”

“Fourth, the orphans. To them also help must be given.”

“Seventh: Public health. Whatever is necessary for the public health must be arranged. Swamps should be filled in, water should be brought in; whatever is necessary for the public health.”

“If there is something left over (after these expenditures), it should be given to the Great House of Justice. And thus there will be no want in the village. The people will not remain hungry, they will not remain naked. All will be in the utmost welfare and comfort.”

From The Wisdom of ‘Abdu’l-Bahà, pp. 140-143.—“One of the most important principles of the Teaching of Bahá’u’lláh is:

The right of every human being to the daily Bread whereby they exist, of the Equalization of the Means of Livelihood.”

“The arrangements of the circumstances of people must be such that poverty shall disappear, that everyone, as far as possible, according to his rank and position, shall share in comfort and well-being.”

“A financier with a colossal wealth should not exist whilst near him is a poor man in dire necessity. When we see poverty allowed to reach the condition of starvation, it is a sure sign that somewhere we shall find tyranny. Men must bestir themselves in this matter, and no longer delay in altering conditions which bring misery or grinding poverty to a very large number of people. The rich must give of their abundance, they must soften their hearts and cultivate a compassionate intelligence, taking thought for those sad ones who are suffering from lack of the very necessities of life.”

The Promulgation of Universal Peace, pp. 211, 212.—“Bahá’u’lláh has revealed principles and laws which will accomplish the adjustment of varying human capacities. He has said that whatsoever is possible of accomplishment in human government will be effected through these principles. When the laws he has instituted are carried out there will be no millionaires possible in the community and likewise no extremely poor. This will be effected and regulated by adjusting the different degrees of human capacity. The fundamental basis of the community is agriculture, tillage of the soil. All must be producers."

The Principle of Tax Exemption Bahá'í Scriptures, pp. 341-342 — "But here is the real solution. The rich should be merciful to the poor, but with their free-will, not with force. Should it be with force it would be useless. It should be according to law and not by violence, so that through a general law every one might know his duty. For example, a rich person has a large income and a poor person a small income. To put it in a more explicit way: a rich person has ten thousand kilos of products, and a poor person has ten kilos. Now is it fair to tax them equally? Nay, rather the poor person in this case must be exempt from taxes. If the poor person gives one-tenth of his income and the rich person one-tenth of his income, it will be unjust. Thus in this way a law should be made that the poor person who has only ten kilos and needs them all for his necessary food, be exempt from paying taxes. But if the rich person, who has ten thousand kilos pays one-tenth or two-tenths taxes on his products, it will not be a hardship to him. For example, if he gives two thousand kilos, he will still have eight thousand kilos. If a person has fifty thousand kilos, even though he gives ten thousand kilos he will still have forty thousand kilos. Therefore, laws must be made in this way. These laws must do away with the present system of wages and earnings. If today the owners of factories increase the wages of their employees, after a month or a year, they will again cry and strike and ask for more increase. This work has no end."

The Farm Community "For example, the farmers plant near a village. They get products from their cultivation. They take one-tenth from the rich and the poor according to their income. A general store may be built in that village for all the incomes and products to be brought therein. Then it will be considered who is rich and who is poor. The farmers whose incomes are sufficient only for their food and expenses must be free from paying taxes. All products and incomes gathered and collected must be put in the general store. If there is a helpless one in that village his daily needs must be given to him. On the other hand a rich person who needs only fifty kilos of products and still has five hundred kilos, after all his expenses are paid, should be taxed two-tenths and at the end of the year whatever remains in the store should be distributed for the general expenses."

1—One of the Bahá'í principles "suggests a plan whereby all the individual members of society may enjoy the utmost comfort and welfare. The degrees of society must be preserved. The farmer will continue to till the soil, the artist pursue his art, the banker to finance the nations. An army has need of its general, captain, and private soldiers. The degrees varying with the pursuits are essential. But in this Bahá'í plan there is no class hatred. Each is to be protected and each individual member of the body politic is to live in the greatest comfort and happiness. Work is to be provided for all and there will be no needy ones seen in the streets."

'Abdu'l-Bahá from Address in New York City, Dec. 2, 1912—"No religious books of the past Prophets speak of the economic question, while the economic problem has been thoroughly solved in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh."

'Abdu'l-Bahá, Philadelphia, June 9, 1912—"Among the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are principles which concern the readjustment of livelihood, that is to say, certain regulations are revealed which insure the welfare and well being of all humanity. Just as the rich man enjoys his rest and his pleasures surrounded by luxuries, the poor man must likewise have a home, be provided with sustenance, and not be in want. In order that all human kind may be at ease, the readjustment of the economical situation is necessary and of utmost importance; until this is effected happiness is impossible."

Voluntary Service by the Wealthy the True Equality 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Tablet to O. Schwartz, Stuttgart, Germany, Feb. 1920—

"In the Divine Teachings equality is brought about through a ready willingness to share. It is commanded as regards wealth that the rich among the people, and the aristocrats should, by their own free will and for the sake of their happiness, concern themselves with the care of the poor. This equality is the result of the lofty characteristics and noble attributes of mankind."

'Abdu'l-Bahá, Star of the West, Vol. 3, No. 2—"Among the most important principles of the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh is the equalization of the means of existence. There are in the world at present numerous cases of men who are either too poor or too rich. While some live in palaces, others have nowhere to lay their head; some have many courses to their meals, while others scarcely have enough bread to keep them alive. This state of affairs is wrong and must be remedied."

Equality in Capacity Impossible "The remedy, however, cannot consist in the bringing to pass of equality, absolute equality among men; this would be impossible. There is needed some organization which will bring about an order in this disorder. Equality is a mere dream and absolutely impracticable. If equality existed the whole order of the world would be destroyed. In mankind there is always a difference in degree. Since creation men have never been the same. Some have superior intelligence, others are more ordinary and some are devoid of intellect. How can there ever exist equality between those who are clever and those who are not? Humanity is like an army. An army must have a general, captains and soldiers, each with their appointed duties; it cannot consist of generals, only, or captains or soldiers only—there must be degrees in the organization."

The Tyranny of Starvation "Some are too rich, some are too poor, some have millions and some have nothing. As organization is necessary to control this state of affairs, it is necessary to limit riches or it is necessary to limit poverty. Either extreme is wrong. There should be a medium state. If it is right for a capitalist to possess a great fortune, then it is also just that a workman should have the means of existence. If poverty is allowed to reach a condition of starvation, it proves that there is tyranny. Men must see that this does not happen in any case. There must be special laws. The rich must give of their plenty. If they have more than they need, they must think of those who are in want."

"The government of a country should make laws which conform to the Divine Law. The Law of God exacts that there should be neither excessive wealth nor excessive poverty."

Excessive Wealth and Excessive Poverty Alike Forbidden 'Abdul-Bahá, Star of the West, Vol. 3, No. 6—There is need of an equalization so that all may have an apportionment in the comforts of life. For example, the wealthy man, whose table is adorned with all kinds of delicacies, must allow the poor to have at least his necessities. It is not right that one should have all the delicacies and all foods on his table when another is in want of the necessities of life. The rich must be merciful to the poor and out of their own willing hearts should they uplift them, they should not be forced. There must be a readjustment and legislation which shall equalize conditions until humankind may have composure and rest with utmost ease."

'Abdu'l-Bahá from the Tablet "To Guide the Guides"—"O people of wealth and riches! If you see a poor man suffering from any calamity, do not run away from him, but sit with him and ask him about the things heaped upon him from the seas of determination and predestination."

Legislation Essential 'Abdul-Bahá "Pro-mulgation of Universal Peace", Vol. 2, p. 233—"The Bahá'í Cause covers all economic and social questions under the heading and ruling of its laws. The essence of the Bahá'í spirit is that in order to establish a better social and economic condition, there must be allegiance to the laws and principles of government. Under the laws which are to govern the world, the socialists may justly demand human rights but without resort to force and violence. The governments will enact these laws, establishing just legislation and economic policies in order that all humanity may enjoy a full measure of welfare and privilege; but this will always be according to legal protection and procedure. Without legislative administration, rights and demands fail and the welfare of the commonwealth cannot be realized. Today the method of demand is the strike and resort to force which is manifestly wrong and destructive of human foundations. Rightful privilege and demand must be set forth in laws and regulations."

The Cementing of the Hearts Through Love "While thousands are considering these questions, we have more essential purposes. The fundamentals of the whole economic condition are divine in nature and are associated with the world of the heart and spirit. This is fully explained in the Bahá'í teaching, and without knowledge of its principles no improvement in the economic state can be realized. The Bahá'ís will bring about this improvement and betterment but not through sedition and appeal to physical force; not through warfare, but welfare. Hearts must be so cemented together, love must become so dominant that the rich shall most willingly extend assistance to the poor and take steps to establish those economic adjustments permanently. If it is accomplished in this way, it will be most praiseworthy because then it will be for the sake of God and in the pathway of His service. For example, it will be as if the rich inhabitants of a city should say 'It is neither just nor lawful that we should possess great wealth while there is abject poverty in this community,' and then willingly give their wealth to the poor, retaining only as much as will enable them to live comfortably."

Bahá'u'lláh, Baha'i Scriptures, p. 92. "Man should know his own self, and understand those things which lead to loftiness or to abasement, to shame or to honor, to affluence or to poverty. After man has realized his own being, and become mature, then (material) means are required. If wealth is acquired through a craft or profession, it is approvable and praiseworthy for men of wisdom, especially for those who arise to train the world and beautify the souls of the nations. These are the cup bearers of the Kawther of Knowledge, and the guides of the ideal path. They direct the people of the whole world to the right path, and instruct them in that which is conducive to the elevation and progress of being."

Wages and a Share of the Profits to Employees 'Abdu'l-Bahá "Some Answered Questions", p. 313—"For instance, the manufacturers and the industrials heap up a treasure each day, and the poor artisans do not gain their daily sustenance: that is the height of iniquity, and no just man can accept it. Therefore, laws and regulations should be established which would permit the workmen to receive from the factory owner their wages and a share in the fourth or the fifth part of the profits, according to the wants of the factory: or in some other way the body of the workmen and the manufacturers should share equitably the profits and advantages. Indeed, the direction and administration of affairs come from the owner of the factory, and the work and labour, from the body of the workmen. In other words, the workmen should receive wages which assure them an adequate support, and when they cease work, becoming feeble and helpless, they should receive from the owner of the factory a sufficient pension. The wages should be high enough to satisfy the workmen with the amount they receive, so that they may be able to put a little aside for days of want and helplessness."

"Good God! is it possible that, seeing one of his fellow-creatures starving, destitute of everything, a man can rest and live comfortably in his luxurious mansion? He who meets another in the greatest misery, can he enjoy his fortune? That is why, in the Religion of God, it is prescribed and established that wealthy men each year give over a certain portion of their fortune for the maintenance of the poor and unfortunate. That is the foundation of the Religion of God, and the most essential of the Commandments."

"As now man is not forced nor obliged by the Government, if by the natural tendency of his good heart, with the greatest spirituality, he goes to this expense for the poor, this will be a thing very much praised, approved and pleasing. Such is the meaning of the good works in the Divine Books and Tablets."

An International Assembly Should Concur in a Wise and Moderate Law for the Protection of Both Employers and Employees

Bahá'í Scriptures, p. 669—"Now I want to tell you about the law of God. According to the Divine law, employees should not be paid merely by wages. Nay, rather they should be partners in every work. The question of socialization is very difficult. It will not be solved by strikes for wages. All the governments of the world must be united, and organize an assembly, the members of which shall be elected from the parliaments and the noble ones of the nations. These must plan with wisdom and power, so that neither the capitalists suffer enormous losses, nor the laborers become needy. In the utmost moderation they should make the law, then announce to the public that the rights of the working people are to be effectively preserved; also the rights of the capitalists are to be protected. When such a general law is adopted, by the will of both sides, should a strike occur, all the governments of the world should collectively resist it. Otherwise the work will lead to much destruction, especially in Europe. Terrible things will take place."

How to Procure Sincerity and Efficiency Among
the Workers "One of the causes of a universal European war will be this question. The owners of properties, mines and factories, should share their incomes with their employees, and give a fairly certain percentage of their profits to their working-men, in order that the employees should receive, besides their wages, some of the general income of the factory, so that each employee may strive with his soul in the work."

"No more trusts will remain in the future. The question of the trusts will be wiped away entirely. Also, every factory that has ten thousand shares, will give two thousand of these ten thousand to its employees, and will write them in their names so that they may have them, and the rest will belong to the capitalists. Then at the end of the month, or year, whatever they may earn, after the expenses and wages are paid, according to the number of shares, should be divided among both. In reality, so far great injustice has befallen the common people. Laws must be made because it is impossible for laborers to be satisfied with the present system. They will strike every month and every year. Finally, the capitalists will lose. In the ancient times a strike occurred among the Turkish soldiers. They said to the Government: 'Our wages are very small and they should be increased.' The Government was forced to give them their demands. Shortly afterwards they struck again. Finally all the incomes went to the pockets of the soldiers, to the extent that they killed the king, saying: 'Why didst thou not increase the income so that we might have received more?' "

The Message of Love, Peace and Unity for Our Social and Economic Life

The above quotations are but a few of those that might be adduced from the writings and discourses of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, if space permitted, directly applicable to this intimate study of human relationships. We have, however, had to rest content with these basic extracts from a source whose every utterance is a call to humanity's inmost reality; a message of love, peace, and unity for the race; a universal diagnosis and prescription. The true physician penetrates the veil of symptoms into the field of causation. Likewise, when he finds the body overcome with a complication of diseases, he is not concerned with one disordered function only, but seeks the remote cause that has also affected or infected the other organs. The dawn of its maturity has come upon the race. The playthings and crass ignorance of childhood days have been set aside. The newly understood unity of science and religion calls for the adaptation of scientific principles to our economic life. These principles, being essentially divine, cannot conflict with the fundamental religious foundation which is the love of God and of mankind, (which Christ defined as both "the law and the prophets"), and the knowledge of God, the eternal search for which is the revealer of science and heavenly mysteries. It is the lack of this love, and ignorance of this knowledge that the Wise Physician has declared to be the primary cause of man's present turmoil and ravaging illness.

A New Economic Axiom

The introduction of the trust principle, i. e., that the poor are a divine trust, possessing certain rights as contrasted with mere charity, establishes a new economic axiom: That every human being, who is willing to work, is entitled, as of right, to the necessities of life. Since the Creator has made sufficient provision for all, and has deposited in the earth the elements essential to the production of food and shelter, it is no longer allowable that any man should starve or be without the means of existence. Man, generically speaking, is a beneficiary of the bountiful trust confided to nature by the Lord of men. More than this, he is, in the sight of God, a beneficiary of the soul impulses of his fellow-men. If a beneficiary, he is entitled to a share in the proceeds of this trust endowment. In his turn, he must contribute to the general enrichment through his labor, art or calling, and be not found wanting in this.

War Expenditures Doomed by the New World Order

The governments and communities must make work available when ordinary means fail. Relieved of the enormous burden of war expenditures, which will surely come to pass, the internal adjustments of a people will be subjected to a far deeper scrutiny than has yet been possible, and the surplus wealth of governments and general cooperative contributions alike devoted to the constructive up-building of the New Order.

A New Emphasis Upon the Evolve-ment of Individual Destinies Poor houses, and pauperism, would be erased from the picture. The mil-lions of underfed and under devel-oped, now deprived of normal devel-opment both of body and soul, will find transformation through attain-ing to their destined place in the organic life. The innate qualities of growing children will be lovingly and carefully studied by a new type of teacher, so that the God-given talents may be early ascertained, and the divers capacities encour-aged and led to their special goal of service. New knowledge and new scientific means of determining the innate capacity of a soul will be uncovered. Poor bankers will no longer be made out of good me-chanics; and boys and girls who love the soil and the sweet tang of country air will not, for lack of this knowledge, find themselves in a clerical position. The inner reali-ties of human beings will tend to a greater revelation for the abund-ance they attract.

The Right to the Necessities of Life The second import-ant change in our social structure is the principle of mutual assistance. This has al-ready been referred to as the right to necessities. A farmer whose crop is ruined by forces beyond his control, a widow with young chil-dren, a cripple unable to work, a worker ill and without means, an orphan lacking kind relatives, an unemployed though willing and self-respecting worker or artisan, all these and a hundred other types of misfortune that are daily encountered, are protected under this plan from the loss of self-respect, or from sinking into criminality, or from the humiliation of poor-relief and the cognomen of pauper. These possess a right to share in the abundance of their common mother, earth. God does not withhold from such His rain and sunshine. The children of men must not withhold from their neighbors and brothers of the race, these rights which the Mercy of God bestows, nor classify them as outcasts. Under this sys-tem, a man can, with head up and eyes unashamed, reveal to his vil-lage House of Justice his needs, his woes, his hopes, and be conscious that, in so doing, he is but receiving what is due him as a child of God. His need is usually but temporary and let it not be supposed that the vast majority of mankind fall short in self-respect. He offers to work, and work is given, but his crushing temporary burden of debt and an-xiety has been lifted, and he breathes a prayer of thanksgiving for this evidence of Divine Pro-vidence among his fellow men. A year hence he may be contributing to the funds of the common store-house. The new consciousness that will be builded through experiences like these, will enrich humanity—for the bars of individual and iso-lated selfishness have been rent asunder; the sharp claws of nature have been clipped.

A new Principle of Taxation Two sweeping changes appear. One is limitation upon the taxing power; and, by the same token, an expan-sion of that power. In the first case, the power of the community or government to tax would come into being only when the income of the citizen exceeds his actual necessary expenses. Up to that point, he is exempt, since to tax him would be an act of tyranny, in that it would automatically deprive him of at least a portion of his necessities, thus defeating the essential purpose. This is a new principle in taxation.

The expansion of the tax power, however, as it would apply to the incomes in the higher levels, is not a new principle, at least in certain western countries. The graduated income tax has become almost a tradition. The tithe, moreover, has a most ancient inheritance, even to the days of Melchizedek, King of Salem, to whom the patriarch and prophet Abraham rendered the tithe. Originally the rights of God,—the tithe, through this new and merciful command, becomes the means of succor to the unfortunate, as well as the salvation of the state.

When we speak of the tithe or income tax under the Bahá'í plan the meaning is an inclusive one. In most countries today where the income tax is in effect, enormous holdings of tax exempt securities are in the hands of the people and no revenue is derived from the holders in respect to the actual income from these intangibles. This is inconsistent with the just application of the spiritual and universal principle involved in the income tax as set forth in the Bahá'í writings. Not only tax exempt securities but a vast quantity of other intangible personal property, upon which taxes should rightly be paid at present, escape these levies. In one great commonwealth or state of America, the Tax Commissioner estimated that while the State was receiving taxes on approximately three billion dollars worth of real estate, there was at least nine billion more of intangibles escaping or exempted from taxation. This was before the income tax was enacted. What proportion of the taxable property of this particular state still escapes taxation under the income tax statute is not accurately known, but there can be no question that it is very large. It follows that a system of income taxation imposed under the high spiritual standards which have been stated as flowing from the Bahá'í plan, would greatly benefit the community, would equalize and perhaps minimize the rate or percentage of taxation now necessary under the partial application of the law, and would, above all, spread the tax into those areas hitherto untouched, whose responsibilities have had to be assumed by the middle classes of wage earners, professionals and businessmen. The fact that since the inauguration of income taxes, the volume of tax exempt securities has grown to an enormous extent, lends added emphasis to the need of the introduction of an impartial and universal system under which all income producing property be disclosed and assessed. Applying such a principle, the right of states or nations to issue tax exempt intangibles must be subjected to the closest scrutiny. The principles of interdependence and cooperation cannot admit of any indirect evasion which results in laying upon any class or level of income a burden greater than justice permits.

In this plan, however, emphasis is laid upon the preservation of the right of individual initiative, capacity, and private ownership. Whatever expansion the taxing power achieves, it will always fall short, substantially short of confiscation. An abundant residue is retained by the wealthy man who has generously contributed to the welfare of the commonwealth, and his initiative is never deprived of its reward. Nevertheless, through his recognition of his innate relationship with the living organism of his community, he has furnished that co-operation and reciprocal help that the organic life requires for its health and well-being. For example, the brain demands and receives the largest volume of blood, in the entire circulation of the body. For this, it renders the most vital and commanding service. Similarly, those in the high places of the tower of humanity, must reciprocate.

Capitalists and Socialists Meet at the Balanced Point of Moderation And, here, I believe, we will hear the "well done" of the socialist. Capital, so long entrenched, will, under this plan, step into its true place in the economic organism. It will have taken a long step toward the middle position, the path of moderation. Socialism, which is essentially a justified protest against the hardships of the present economic system, likewise, will advance toward that greatly to be desired equilibrium—and the two contending theories of social and industrial life find union in their common sacrifices. The principle of individual ownership and initiative, the degrees of capacity and service have been maintained, and on the other hand, the recognition of a common humanity, organic cooperation, and the rights of all men, have been subserved and instituted. Meditate upon this divinely practical and practically divine plan, ye who are at present full of fear of the future, and ye who have become almost disheartened and discouraged over the intractable abyss that has separated you from your brothers!

Adopt this plan and invite the warming life-giving forces of composition, health and happiness, for this is one picture of human unity and mutuality.

The Dole In the face of this system, the dole loses its appeal and fades away to nothingness. The plan, through which a nation, or state virtually chloroforms its unemployed into quiescence by opening its treasury to weekly unearned stipends, is both faulty and dangerous. It is only another symptom of social disorder. Ignoring the law of work and self-respect, the dole is an artificial political remedy with reactionary final results. Outside the law of compensation for services rendered, it cannot be regarded as a permanent or effective means of solving this all embracing problem. The principle involved differs widely from that herein set forth, which affirms the sacredness and essentiality of work, and provision for work. Although seemingly parallel to the Bahá'í plan, in providing means from the public treasury to those in need or unfortunate, the parallelism fades because the basis upon which aid is given is, in the one case, based upon charity, and in the other, upon right. Moreover, the dole deals mainly with unemployment, while this plan covers the entire field of misfortune. The dole is the extended hand of the state to its unemployed, needy ones, but it does not confer employment. The hand of labor is nerveless, for lack of available work. No service appears, to balance the payment. More basically, the need and excuse for the dole is brought about by the existence of the very disorders in our general economic life, which are alone responsible for these terrific fluctuations in the demand and supply of labor, these recurring industrial depressions whose cure depends upon the administration of all the ingredients of the divine prescription, not one only. While the dole is a gesture along the line of least resistance, to quiet a threatened revolutionary impulse on the part of the hungry and destitute, it is admittedly ineffective in any permanent sense. That prosperity which in current parlance is always "just around the corner", if too long delayed, will come too late to preserve the financial integrity of a state weakened and emasculated by the employment of a purely artificial device as a substitute for employment. We readily admit that in the present state of the economic consciousness, some such method was inevitable. We are not criticizing those who invented the dole. No other avenue was at hand. We are, however, criticizing the hit or miss system which made it necessary. The new consciousness of man's real organic life, which sees the material and spiritual civilizations indissolubly joined, which rejects and denies the right of purely material interests to dominate, any longer, the destinies of mankind, will insist upon the establishment of the balance. Material and selfish interests have deprived this organic body of its soul, notwithstanding that the body without the soul is as a lamp lacking both oil and light. To join these once more together is as 'Abdu'l-Bahá expressed it—"light upon light". The day of overweening material dominion is swiftly passing. Love and brotherhood will attract and establish the spiritual elements of civilization side by side with our material necessities.

The Challenging Statistics of Depression In the industrial depression of 1920-21, the wages of workers in the United States were cut approximately 23%, but dividends decreased but 3%, while at the same time interest paid on investments increased $71,000,000. In this current depression, 1930-31, the aggregate wages paid in 1930 diminished to the extent of $9,600,000,000, while during the same period, astonishing to relate, interest payments and dividends rose from the 1929 figures of $7,500,000,000, to a total of $8,000,000,000. This is stated on the authority of a recent article in Collier's, by Mr. Owen P. White. These figures, if accurate, disclose the protection which employers in industry accord themselves in troublous times, and illustrate the fact that the worker, discharged or on half time, pays the real price of the depression, and is, in effect, its principal victim. It is fair to assume, as well, that the use of labor saving machinery, without regard to the just interests of labor, has played a substantial part in this inequality of distribution of the earnings of industry. No more concrete example of the doctrine of living "unto oneself" need be adduced than these amazing statistics. This is the direct application of the theory of separation, and the denial of organic reciprocity.

Unemployment Reserves Now, in paying out these huge sums to stockholders and investors during depressed periods, it must be assumed that industry at least to some extent, drew upon corporate reserves accumulated in more prosperous years. The author of the article referred to, cites several illuminating facts on this subject, and applies the existence of such reserve funds directly to the subject of unemployment reserve insurance. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in one of His discourses on the matter of profit-sharing, says that other means of alleviating the lack of work should also be employed. In good business years, this unemployment reserve plan has built up, in several major instances in America, a solvent fund which, in the present crisis, has operated to keep the unemployed workers from these factories from the bread lines. Three per cent of the payroll was set aside in this fund by the employers, one and one-half per cent by the employees, during the favorable years, and from this, during the existing depression, thirty per cent of full time wages was paid each entitled worker. Were this system allowed to operate during a reasonably long term of favorable years, it would undoubtedly accumulate, through investment and interest, to a point enabling an even larger percentage of normal earnings to be paid in the time of need. But as Mr. White points out, this thirty per cent has preserved the self-respect of these workers, and is the best argument against the dole, or even the charitable community chest.

Another large and well-known corporation, which put this system in operation in 1915, found the accumulation, in 1930, warranted a payment to its unemployed workers, with dependents, of eighty per cent of their normal wage, and sixty per cent to those without dependents. Numerous other examples are cited, in which large, fore-sighted corporations have installed this beneficent plan. These reserve funds must always remain solvent, and in case of unduly protracted periods of unemployment, the depletion of the fund would terminate its benefits until it again became solvent. This constructive and humane plan is an example of what unemployment insurance can accomplish. Stabilization in industry is an attainable goal once the minds and hearts of employers are opened to the influx of the spirit of the age. Every such measure will surely attract the divine confirmation.

The Love of God In one of His Tablets (Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, p. 22) Bahá'u'lláh says—
 “The most important quality, in the education of man, is the love of God; blessed are they who possess it.”

And on the same page and on p. 23—“Verily, I declare that the love of God is in itself a manifest protection, and a solid fortress for all the peoples of the earth. It is their supreme safeguard.” . . . “While religion is weakly supported, ignorance, presumption and temerity thrive; verily, I assert that whatsoever is withheld from it becomes profit to the irresponsible, and the final result is anarchy.” . . . “Uphold religion, for it will organize the world and diffuse harmony among the creatures.”

These statements of reality penetrate to the innermost heart of our problem. In this sense, “religion” is used as identical with the divine foundations revealed by the Prophets in all ages, as contrasted with the religious systems later established by human agencies. "Religions (religious systems) are many, but Religion is one" is a divine utterance furnishing the key.

Deeds Show the Station of the Man There is but one way a man can show his love for God, and that is the degree of his service to his fellow-men. As it is written—"Deeds show the station of the man", for all are partners in mere words. It is the practical application of this truth in the field of industry and within the social structure of humanity that will rout the decompositional process just now so firmly fastened upon us all. A deepening consciousness of man as the most sacred of all created organisms, and the destruction of the superstitious, imaginary, false belief that he is individually independent and inorganic, is essential. Herein, the educators of mankind must play a leading part. While true consciousness is the light of heart and soul, the education of the mind is a pathway thereto. The new education will guide and illumine this path, and will be a powerful aid to this end in the very near future.

Fear, One of Nature's Most Satanic Forces, Is Powerless Before Love and Faith The eradication of fear, which holds the most of humanity in a grip more relentless than death, itself, and is, alas, only too well founded, in view of the unrestrained and selfish disregard of the rights of men by those who at present control the means of livelihood,—can be accomplished only by the adoption of the balanced principle of moderation we have endeavored to set forth. By the eradication of fear, Bahá'u'lláh says—"the very nature of man will be changed". Fear, an inheritance of the animal world, is, like darkness, a manifestation of the sinister, negative power of Nature. When hope and happiness arise side by side with it, it vanishes, even as darkness is found to be non-existent when the light shines. The economic gloom of today nourishes and vitalizes fear to the nth power. What is this fear that blights the countenances of millions of men with its livid and ghastly infection? It is the fear of pauperized old age; of closed doors of opportunity while the wolf crouches upon the doorstep of the workman's cottage; of the widow with little ones wending her way disconsolately to the office of the Poor Relief; of the unemployed worker turned away again and again from the door of factory and shop; of the wounded and maimed returned from the wars; of the hard-toiling farmer whose crops Nature has blighted in a single night, or upon whose fields swarms of insects have descended, raised up perchance by this very disorder that flourishes in our social structure; of the cripple who looks forward only to a lifetime of dependency; of the fifty year old worker denied the right to give of his strength and experience; yes, of the business man oppressed with anxieties as his books reveal the red ink entries of deficit.

Because of this fear, because of impending bankruptcies and the fancied loss of financial standing, how many suicides are recorded as the iron wheels of industry turn day by day? Visualize, if you may, the faces of countless thousands of the children of men, by which I mean men and women, endowed as are all humanity with heart, soul and mind, white and drawn, in whose lineaments the cruel knife of fear and anxiety has carved deep and ineradicable furrows. The juggernaut of a feverish and unrestrained industrial machine has turned these children of an all loving Father into unrecognizable shadows of their true humanity. The claws of Nature have sunk deep into their vitals, numbing the finer forces, preventing the achievement of the divine destinies they might have attained. In truth, have we surrendered to the natural law of the survival of the fittest, the "supreme affliction". Indifference worse than hate itself, the shame of Cain flaunting itself in the face of the Divine Command to keep and cherish his brother, selfish greed that seizes the results of toil,—are these not the insignia of man's degradation, of the terrible forces of decomposition hovering ever nearer to the scene of final dissolution? These agonies and this truly satanic condition are not of God, for they are blind, unintelligent, unloving, while He is the Seer, the Knower, the Loving. His Love has poured forth in this New Time, His favor to the poor and oppressed is evident. In the sight of God, man has no justification for longer living unto himself alone. Nor can he find excuse in pleading "human nature" in this light. For this disorder is not of human origin. Rather is it of a world lower than the animal. This is because man has been endowed with a power to know the Divine, while the animal does not possess that power. Man is responsible, the animal is not responsible since it has no means of knowing God.

Humanity Bows Before a Usurping Sovereignty Indeed, Nature herself, is "uninformed of God, the Almighty." By surrendering, therefore, to the natural law, humanity has accepted the sovereignty of a blind and unintelligent force. Reflect, then, upon this word from the Hidden Words of Bahá'u'lláh (from the Arabic, No. 13)—

"O Son of Spirit! I created thee rich, why dost thou bring thyself down to poverty? Noble I made thee, wherewith dost thou abase thyself? Out of the essence of knowledge I gave thee being, why seekest thou enlightenment from anyone beside Me? Out of the clay of love I moulded thee, how dost thou busy thyself with another? Turn thy sight unto thyself, that thou mayest find Me standing within thee, mighty, powerful and self-subsisting." (Italics ours.)

This moving appeal is directed to the slumbering spiritual consciousness of humanity, to that capacity within with which the world of nature has no part, to the human reality itself, a reality that transcends Nature and is destined to achieve sovereignty over her, even as today she has been permitted to usurp sovereignty over a being superior to her both intrinsically and innately. Ignorance of this supreme fact has humbled and retarded the race. But the hour has arrived when this tyranny is to be conquered. Happy are they who awakened to the divine gifts of nobility, spiritual wealth, knowledge, and love that have been deposited within them, and gird up their loins to enlist in the army that is gathering to carry the last and strongest redoubt in Nature's dark citadel.

BAHIYYIH KHANUM*

Thou wert a gleaming chalice
In our darkened night.
Thou wert a flowing river
For our soul's delight.
Thou wert a haven for our Guardian's heart
When it lay bleeding neath a weight of woe.
The worlds of love are but a counterpart
Of all the love which from Thy heart must flow.
The past, the present and the future days
Reverberate with thy immeasurable praise.
This humble homage which we offer thee
Can add no lustre to thy shining tree,
Thou symbol of eternal sanctity.

“Consider the human world. See how nations have come and gone. They have been of all minds and purposes. Some were mere captives of self and desire, engulfed in the passions of the lower nature. They attained to wealth, to the comforts of life, to fame. And what was the final outcome? Utter evanescence and oblivion. Reflect upon this. Look upon it with the eye of admonition. No trace of them remains, no fruit, no result, no benefit; they have gone utterly, complete effacement.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

“BE NOT troubled in poverty,” said Bahá'u'lláh, “nor confident in riches, for poverty is followed by riches and riches are followed by poverty, but to be poor in all save God is a wondrous gift.”

How much needed is such a vision in these days of economic loss and despair!

The life of an individual and the life of a nation are both subject to the law of rhythm. Nothing is enduring. Continuous prosperity is no more guaranteed to the individual than continuous sunshine is to the fields and flowers. Above all, we need to realize that nothing can bulwark us against misfortune, not even a large bank account.

There is nothing more fallacious in giving one a sense of protection against the universe than the accumulation of property. So much security, so much ease of living does this bring the individual that there seems no need of considering any other power in the universe. The limitless wealth that flows from capital, more than can be consumed in personal needs, seems a fortress as stalwart as the Rock of Gibraltar.

Yet in recent times we have seen such financial fortresses crumble into ruins before the attack of new economic forces as unexpected as they were irresistible in their destructive violence. Where now is the proud power of these fortunes?

It is at such time that one feels the need of turning to a higher Power. It is then that one realizes that ‘God is All-possessing;’ that all existence flows through His hands; that nothing is owned by us, nothing is guaranteed to us, nothing can be grasped and seized and permanently held by us. That is the first great lesson to be learned from the colossal economic distress which is today pervading the world.

ANOTHER MORE brightening thought to which we may turn from the melting away of wealth into airy nothingness is the realization that true wealth lies not in income or accumulated property, but in the ability of the individual to express himself creatively. Those who have courage, willpower, initiative, trained ability, and power of accommodating themselves to circumstance, carry with them their fortune. All that has availed them to succeed in the past still resides with them. Their capacity to wrest a living from the universe is undiminished. With the application of ingenuity to circumstance, some way can be found of getting out of every difficulty.

BUT PERHAPS the most important lesson of all to be learned in this economic depression is the lesson of frugality.

We Americans have been living in such a consciousness of prosperity for years that we have formed very extravagant habits. To be seen to practice economy and frugality has seemed a demeaning evidence of lack of success. Fine clothes, new accoutrements of the home, lavish expenditure for showy standards of living,—these were what everyone was seeking to demonstrate. Extravagance was the rule of the day. Many were living beyond their income and straining every nerve to earn sufficient to meet their obligations. And it even was made to appear that lavish expenditure was the road to universal prosperity.

What a remarkable transformation has now taken place in our consciousness! Just the opposite state of mind now exists. People refrain from buying anything unless they are in absolute need of it. They wear their old clothes, use their old automobile, they content themselves with existing equipment, they practice economy in every way possible. And because everybody is doing it, no one feels ashamed. Thus frugality, which was a disgrace at the heyday of our prosperity, now appears a virtue and is being practiced through necessity by every class in every section of the country.

What is the essential virtue of frugality? It is this, that it tends to counteract the incessant and un-satiating striving for the accumulation of material things and enjoyments. Once the individual starts on the road of accumulation of wealth and property, there is no end to the strain and effort. This striving to enrich oneself and to better one's standard of living has a certain definite advantage in the way of progress, both of the individual and of society. On the other hand, when carried to excess as of late in America, it has one deep-seated fault which is the greatest weakness in the structure of our civilization. That fault is the continuous fever of unnatural and excessive effort. There is a limit to the strength of every individual; but greed for prosperity knows no limits and puts a pressure upon the individual which tends to force him beyond his powers.

THERE IS only one thing that can put a stop to this eternal and agonizing striving—that is the contentment and economy of the simple life.

The psychology of contentment, of simplicity, of the moderation of desire, lies at the heart of every great religion. "Content thyself with but little of this world's goods. Verily economy is a great treasure," says 'Abdu'l-Bahá. And again, "Economy is the foundation of human prosperity. The spendthrift is always in trouble. Prodigality on the part of any person is an unpardonable sin. The fewer the habits, the better for the man. It is a divine virtue to be satisfied with very few things. . . . How complex is the life of the present age and how much more complex we are making it daily! The needs of humanity seem never to come to an end. The more men accumulate the more they want." "Contentment is real wealth. Contentment is the creator of happiness. When one is contented he does not care either for riches or poverty. He lives above the influence of them and is indifferent to them."

INDUSTRIALISM, as it developed in America was certainly moving far away from this idea of simplicity and economy. Not only were Americans urged and induced by clever advertising to buy new inventions for their comfort or pleasure, but manufacturers conceived the idea of frequent changes of style and color in order to induce the consuming public to replace articles long before they were worn out. In that way new clothes, cameras, fountain pens, automobiles, and what not, could be made to appeal to those who already possessed articles in these lines in perfect condition with years of use still in them. If this sort of thing was to go on, what would be its limits? Plainly there are no definite limits to this mad race for extravagant novelty.

The fault in this economic system is two-fold: first, of destroying the simplicity and contentment of daily life; and secondly, of forcing the wage earner, the income producer, to work beyond his powers for the satisfaction of his own wants and those of his family. Hence the break-neck speed of modern economic life; the strain, the nervous breakdowns, the premature deaths; the hectic quality of life; the unnatural and unwholesome amusements sought by diseased souls strained beyond endurance and incapable of refreshing themselves by means of normal relaxation and recreation.

The life of the Orient, meanwhile, has been the very antithesis of western industrialism. Oriental civilization has had the deep-seated fault of stagnation, as bad in one extreme as America is in the other; but her virtues are simplicity, contentment, frugality, and an easy-going tempo in the daily life which enables the individual to enjoy living even in the midst of his work. I have personally witnessed this and admired it in the Oriental life—the way in which the Oriental lives above his work, is master of it rather than being mastered by it.

THERE ARE two different uses that can be made of machinery, with its vast saving of production-time and its manifold extension of manpower. Either this new economy in time and energy can be applied to the benefit of the worker in the way of reducing the hours and strain of his daily labor, or it can be applied to the benefit of the manufacturer in the way of producing more goods. The latter is what has taken place. True, the hours of labor have been curtailed somewhat, but the tempo has been increased to such an extent that in many industries today, especially along lines of mass-production, the workman is absolutely exhausted at the end of the day's work. Even seven or eight hours of work at such a pace has been enough to strain the nervous system and to sap the vitality.

Under such a system an immense amount of goods is created which the workman as consumer is persuaded to buy. His desires are whetted; and as his wages are high he buys many things, some of which he needs, and some of which he does not need. Thus we have become economic slaves with no time to lift the head, to gaze at beauty of landscape, to enjoy the things God gives us freely; no wholesomeness left in us for the realization of life as a daily blessing.

NOW DESTINY is leading us to another type of living which enforces leisure—time to think and reflect, time to see the meaning of life. We are learning new habits. We find how easily we can do without things we have always wanted, how contented we can be with simplicity of living provided all about us are obliged to live under that same law of frugality.

This economic adversity has struck the West just in time, it would seem, to save the East from the infection of modern industrial fever. What a pity it would have been had Asia too succumbed to the mad chase for material goods, abandoning its age-old wisdom and serenity of living! But now the East has the laugh on us. "Where is your vaunted prosperity?" it can say. "To what has your industrialism led? Your super-human efforts, your exhausting toil, your stress of life, your mad rush in subway and elevated trains,—where have they got you to? With all your wonderful machinery and speedy methods of production and transportation, you have now neither happiness nor wealth."

The secret of the ideal civilization is the coalescing of these two diverse points of view, Occidental progressiveness and Oriental tranquility. America today is much more ready to accept the simple and serene life of the East than ever before in its history. We are having a practical course in the philosophy of living, a course which Destiny has introduced by means of the present chaos and distress.

There is one department of life where we can always enrich ourselves, and where outward misfortune is a cause of greater inward activity,—that is on the plane of thought and spirit. Herein the East can be our guide, with its eternal truths that lead to wisdom and serenity.

"The honor and exaltation of man must be something more than material riches; material comforts are only a branch, but the root of the exaltation of man is the good attributes and virtues which are the adornments of his reality . . . Heavenly teachings applicable to the advancement in human conditions have been revealed in this merciful age—the divine remedy for all human ailment . . . Shall we pursue the phantom of a mortal happiness which does not exist or turn toward the Tree of Life and the joys of its eternal fruits? . . . Let us pray to God that the breath of the Holy Spirit may again give hope and refreshment to the people, awakening in them a desire to do the Will of God."

NABIL'S UNIQUE NARRATIVE

In the article which follows the author has set forth some of her impressions of Nabil's most sacred and thrilling history of the Dawn of the Bahá'í Faith now in book form under the title "The Dawn-Breakers." This unique story of martyrdom, persecution, extreme devotion and sublime faith surpasses anything in all the history of divine religions. The story is of such supreme importance that many have been invited by the Editors to record their impressions in articles which will appear from month to month.

I AM preparing you for the advent of a mighty Day." These words are among those addressed by the Báb to the *Letters of the Living when He sent them out as "witnesses of the Dawn of the Promised Day of God." In The Dawn-Breakers we have the history of the first nine years of that "advent of a mighty Day"—the record of the deeds of the "witnesses of the Dawn of the promised Day of God." A wonderful record it is of those chosen heralds of a New Day who, faithful to the commands of the Báb, "with steadfast feet and sanctified hearts", scattered throughout the length and breadth of Persia to "raise the call that the Gate to the Promised One has been opened, that His proof is irrefutable, and that His testimony is complete." No obstacles were great enough to lessen the determination or dull the ardor of those souls enthralled and enkindled by the love of God.

Nabil's Narrative has long been an authority for the early history of the Bahá'í Movement but until recently has been accessible only to those who read Persian. Now Shoghi Effendi has rendered the first part into English under the title, The Dawn-Breakers. The importance of this work can hardly be overestimated and will be better understood by the world at large as time goes on.

The introduction takes us so directly into the spirit of the book and the purpose of the author that it seems fitting to quote the first page:

"The Bahá'í Movement is now well known throughout the world, and the time has come when Nabil's unique narrative of its beginnings in darkest Persia will interest many readers. The record which he sets down with such devoted care is in many respects extraordinary. It has its thrilling passages, and the splendour of the central theme gives to the chronicle not only great historical value but high moral power. Its lights are strong: and this effect is more intense because they seem like a sunburst at midnight. The tale is one of struggle and martyrdom; its poignant scenes, its tragic incidents are many. Corruption, fanaticism, and cruelty gather against the cause of reformation to destroy it, and the present volume closes at the point where the riot of hate seems to have accomplished its purpose and to have driven into exile or put to death every man, woman and child in Persia who dared to profess a leaning towards the teachings of the Báb.

"Nabil, himself a participant in some of the scenes which he recites, took up his lonely pen to recite the truth about men and women so mercilessly persecuted and a movement so grievously traduced. He writes with ease, and when his emotions are strongly stirred his style becomes vigorous and trenchant. He does not present with any system the claims and teachings of Bahá'u'lláh and His Forerunner. His purpose is the simple one of rehearsing the beginnings of the Bahá'í Revelation and of preserving the remembrance of the deeds of its early champions. He relates a series of incidents, punctiliously quoting his authority for almost every item of information. His work in consequence, if less artistic and philosophic, gains in value as a literal account of what he knew or could from credible witnesses discover about the early history of the Cause."

In order to furnish a proper background for the reading of this history much of the introduction is taken up with giving a "lifelike and vivid if unlovely picture of the Augean conditions which the Báb had to confront when He inaugurated the Movement in the middle of the nineteenth century. "For", as Shoghi Effendi further says, "it is not easy to follow the narrative in its details, or to appreciate how stupendous was the task undertaken by Bahá'u'lláh and His Forerunner, without some knowledge of the condition of church and state in Persia and of the customs and mental outlook of the people and their masters." The chief authority of the translator for a picture of these conditions is Lord Curzon, from whose scholarly work, "Persia and the Persian Question," extensive excerpts are made. Ample footnotes throughout the text from other western authorities serve to corroborate Nabil's statements or render sidelights on them.

The Báb,—“The saintly, heroic figure of the Báb, a leader so mild and serene, yet eager, resolute, and dominant”—is, of course the central personality in the narrative. One must read the pages in order to have anything like an adequate idea of His character, His determination so indomitable that no persecution could swerve Him from His chosen course; His loving kindness, so gentle and winsome that again and again His guards and keepers, chosen for their hard and unyielding characters, became His humble worshippers, His willing servants. The little glimpses of His family life, the loving relations with His friends touch us and we feel grateful for the few weeks of quietness and peace which He spent in the home of His maternal uncle prior to His going forth to face the years of persecution and His manifest destiny. Can anyone doubt, as he follows the events of those fateful six years and comprehends the undying steadfastness with which He inspired His followers, that this kingly yet submissive young man Whose foes became His friends and to Whose commands even His enemies conformed was indeed the “true One from God?”

One by one the Letters of the Living attained their hearts' desire in the meeting of the Báb. The meeting of Quddus, the Last Letter, is thus told by Nabil:

“One night, in the course of His conversation with Mulla Husayn, the Báb spoke these words: ‘Seventeen Letters have thus far enlisted under the standard of the Faith of God. There remains one more to complete the number. These Letters of the Living shall arise to proclaim My Cause and to establish My Faith. Tomorrow night the remaining Letter will arrive and will complete the number of My chosen disciples'.

“The next day, in the evening hour, as the Báb, followed by Mulla Husayn, was returning to His home, there appeared a youth dishevelled and travel-stained. He approached Mulla Husayn, embraced him, and asked him whether he had attained his goal. Mulla Husayn tried at first to calm his agitation and advised him to rest for the moment, promising that he would subsequently enlighten him. That youth, however, refused to heed his advice. Fixing his gaze upon the Báb, he said to Mulla Husayn: ‘Why seek you to hide Him from me? I can recognize Him by His gait. I confidently testify that none besides Him, whether in the East or in the West, can claim to be the Truth. None other can manifest the power and majesty that radiate from His holy person’. Mulla Husayn marvelled at his words. He pleaded to be excused, however, and induced him to restrain his feelings until such time as he would be able to acquaint him with the truth. Leaving him, he hastened to join the Báb, and informed Him of his conversation with that youth. ‘Marvel not,’ observed the Báb, ‘at his strange behaviour. We have in the world of the spirit been communing with that youth. We know him already. We indeed awaited his coming. Go to him and summon him forthwith to Our presence.’ ”

At the time of his meeting with the Báb, Quddus was twenty-two years old. So severed he became and so inspired that one of his followers believed him to be the Promised One. Five years later, after the capture of the fort at Shaykh Tabarsi he joyously surrendered his life.

Quddus is but one of the hundreds of the Dawn-Breakers, many, many of them youths, who gladly, yes, eagerly, offered their lives as witnesses of the New Day which the Báb ushered in. Their untold sufferings and their terrible persecutions can but strike horror and sadness to our hearts. Yet, even while we read of their afflictions, their joy becomes contagious, their triumphs more real than their sufferings, and their absolute assurance of the reality of the Dawn of this long foretold Day becomes a tremendous incentive to be partners in their work.

“Who knows”, writes Shoghi Effendi as he closes the epilogue of this book, “but that triumphs unsurpassed in splendour, are not in store for the mass of Bahá’u’lláh’s toiling followers? Surely, we stand too near the colossal edifice His hand has reared to be able, at the present stage of the evolution of His Revelation, to claim to be able even to conceive the full measure of its promised glory. Its past history, stained by the blood of countless martyrs, may well inspire us with the thought that, whatever may yet befall the Cause, however numerous the reverses it will inevitably suffer, its onward march can never be stayed, and that it will continue to advance until the very last promise, enshrined within the words of Bahá’u’lláh, shall have been completely redeemed.”

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

This is the third and concluding number in the series of articles written for publication in both The Bahá'í Magazine and the Tokyo Nichi Nichi. The first and second installments were published in the May and June numbers respectively.

Racial Prejudice

HAVING suggested a basis for religious and nationalistic harmony there still remains a very lively source of misunderstanding and conflict in the racial prejudices that separate mankind. Fortunately the youth of the world is not yet inured to the blindness and folly of racial antagonism. Exchange professors and students, enormously increased travel, the radical conclusions of anthropologists and biologists concerning the basic likeness of the races, increasing recognition of the danger to world peace in racial conflicts, as well as the ordinary common sense view that any race that has survived the incalculable vicissitudes of history has valuable power and assets that make it worthy of respect: these and other considerations have formed a strong bond of racial amity around the world.

To trace the infiltrations and modifications of the races through migration and admixture is merely another means of telling the story of human progress. The Ainus and Pigmy are illustrations of pure races. Ethnology gives no example of any race that has attained to high superiority without a fecundating contact with those different from itself.

As we know human beings increase in geometrical ratio: we have two parents, four grandparents, eight great-grandparents, sixteen great-great-grandparents, etc. At this rate, a rudimentary knowledge of arithmetic acquaints us with the fact that by the end of twenty generations, or about seven hundred years, every man has 1,937,152 ancestors; adding another three hundred years, or ten more generations, the total comes to 1,743,643,248 ancestors in one thousand years. Just one generation more, the thirty-first, brings our ancestry to 3,487,286,496 and as there have never been as many people as that on the globe at any time all our hysteria about pure and superior races is not only, in the words of Professor Best, "pure myth, but pure bunk."

That mankind is one great family is common to all religious beliefs. "God made of one blood all men to dwell upon the face of the earth." "Have we not all one Father? Hath not one God created us?" If this view be pressed and humanity be so regarded, we must admit that the more evolved and advanced the organism the more differentiated the organs. Each organ is specialized for its own peculiar function, which cannot be performed by any other organ. The most important contribution to the body is the high degree of distinction in its parts; and so with the great organism of humanity: each race, each nationality has its own peculiar part and function in the development of mankind; due to its differences, no other can fill that place, no other can perform that service.

The growing interdependence of mankind, his increasing enlightenment, his ever-widening acquaintance with other peoples and races, as well as the social security of a better understanding, are once more reviving the old religious sanctions of universal brotherhood and increasing human sentiments of goodwill and sympathy.

The special gift deposited in each of the so-called races (for ethnology has not accepted the idea of a basic difference) is of enormous value and advantage to the welfare and advancement of the organism of humanity; therefore racial differences should never be discredited, but enthusiastically fostered and developed. The recognition of those superiorities possessed by each of the races constitutes a basis whereon racial enmity may be annulled; for the conquest of prejudice is fundamental to any lasting solution of human problems.

Economics and the Baha'i Solution The day has passed when one must speak with bated breath of the existing economic structure as a sacrosanct institution derived from God.

The educated youth of every land are studying economics and freely discussing the fallacies, inadequacies and failures of the present system. In this world-wide depression capital and labor alike are suffering from the deficiencies of our economic practice.

The spectacle of 355,000,000,000 bushels of excess wheat in the world with millions of people undernourished and starving; virgin products and raw materials going to waste while the nations suffer from unemployment; low wages prohibiting distribution and consumption, upon which economic welfare depends; these and many other pressing problems are challenging the attention of statesmen, economists, manufacturers, laborers, farmers, everywhere.

Whatever the world's political status we are obliged to recognize that it is an economic unit; no nation today can solve its economic problem independently.

With the establishment of an International House of Justice along the lines previously suggested, these pressing economic problems could be solved for the whole world. There could be, for example, an international control of the food supply, a stabilized international currency, equitable distribution and administration in matters too far-reaching for local control.

Since the earth is the basis of wealth, and food the necessity for human welfare any solution of the economic problem would start with the farmer. If he were permitted to pay his taxes either in money or in kind the produce could be distributed by the community authorities to those points where it was most needed thereby bringing the best price. For this purpose a common storehouse would be required, such for example, as the Canadian farmers used in their Wheat Pool. A competent secretary to control this storehouse would levy a graduated tax, those producing the most paying perhaps, a fifth, while those producing little would be tax-exempt. Those producing less than their requirements would be assisted from the common store to the extent of their legitimate needs.

There should be several sources of income locally: taxes on animals, wealth without inheritors, a portion of the mines, and so forth; while the common treasury would have to pay from its revenue running expenses, such as public safety, hygiene and the like; its national tax, support of an orphanage, a hospital, the poor relief already mentioned and education. Thus this most fundamental of all public services would be removed from politics and expediency.

Economists say that the world is suffering from under-consumption of both men and materials. If every man labored there would be no drudgery. If all men worked consumption would be universal and leisure a common benefaction. In a well ordered world there would be no idle rich and no idle poor.

The yawning gulf between capital and labor cannot be spanned through wages: the time will never come when the laborer will be satisfied with his hire. The abolition of wages and the substitution of profit-sharing would obviate this fundamental source of disagreement. Then if each workman became a stockholder in the business for which he worked he would give to it his utmost loyalty and effort. Such a plan would not work satisfactorily unless it were universally adopted.

With every man working and every man owner in a business everyone would then become both a capitalist and a laborer: the wide divergence existing between them would by this method be bridged.

Under international direction, strong laws could be made to protect the capitalist from heavy losses and the laborer from want. A form of will redistributing wealth with every generation would safeguard society from the concentration of capital in the hands of the few.

With such a plan as given in this and the preceding article the sabotage that the nations of the world are now practicing on the economic machine would cease.

Bahá'í History and Teachings The program for social advancement and world betterment outlined in previous articles constitute part of the plan of Bahá'u'lláh, Founder of the Bahá'í Cause, for the solution of human problems.

Born near Tihrán, Persia in 1817, a descendant of the ancient royal dynasty, He passed from this world a titular prisoner in the penal colony of 'Akká, Palestine, in 1892. He spent forty years in exile and in prison for promulgating universal peace and human brotherhood.

In addition to the religious, racial, political and economical reconciliation already briefly described in this series, He has laid down as principles essential to human advancement: the independent search for truth, whereby we will free ourselves from ancient dogmas, inhibitions and superstitions in our investigation of reality; accord between religion, science, reason, and the abandonment of belief contrary to established proof; universal education; a universal auxiliary language; the equality between men and women; and, fundamental to all advancement, the conquest of prejudice.

It is important to note that all of the great principles laid down by Bahá'u'lláh were enunciated between 1844 and 1866, long in advance of their general acceptance. Today many of them seem commonplace, but when we recall that they were set forth in central Asia, from sixty to eighty years ago, we realize how challenging they were.

How are we to account for the fact that Bahá'u'lláh formulated His program long in advance of its acceptance if not on the basis of an innate knowledge, power and influence on His part? Everything that He suggested is today, two generations later, being agitated as necessary to advancement and security. But when He called for peace in 1869 a disarmament conference would have been an impossibility. Peace was certainly not a new idea; it had been in the world for centuries; however its general pursuit did not start until long after Bahá'u'lláh had incorporated it into His plan, together with the Court of International Arbitration, which was first founded thirty years later at the Hague.

When Bahá'u'lláh called for universal education the rulers of the world prided themselves in keeping their subjects in ignorance; but today education is the ideal of every civilized government.

In Persia in 1844 the Báb, Who foretold the coming of Bahá'u'lláh, announced the era of the equality between men and women: its fulfillment since that time has been phenomenal.

When Bahá'u'lláh spoke of reason and science as supporting true religion Darwin and Huxley were being denounced as destroyers of faith. Today Eddington, Pupin, Milliken and other great scientists declare materialism much too fantastic for science.

It is unnecessary to continue this form of argument for it is self-evident that the whole Bahá'i program was formulated by Bahá'u'lláh long in advance of its agitation or adoption in the world.

Obedience to Government 'Abdu'l-Bahá, son of Bahá'u'lláh, and Co-founder of the Bahá'i Movement, says to His followers: "It is incumbent upon you to be submissive to all monarchs who are just and to show your fidelity to every righteous king. Serve ye the sovereigns of the world with utmost truth and loyalty. Show your obedience unto them and be their well-wishers, without their leave and permission do not meddle with political affairs; well is it with them that act accordingly."

The sane and noble plan given by Bahá'u'lláh to emancipate us from our present difficulties is a plan that would have to be voluntarily and peacefully embraced, in order to establish its glorious results.

The Bahá'i Movement, numbering many millions of followers throughout the world, has for its immediate objective the fostering of love and good-will among mankind. Representatives of every religion, every race, every nationality, every social class, every degree of humanity from the lowest unto the highest are daily swelling our numbers and enhancing the prestige of peace and of brotherhood in the world.

Hereditary animosities, age-old enmities, apparently insurmountable barriers are being abrogated and forgotten under the compelling influence of these mighty teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. To Bahá'is, this practice of world friendship, is not a mere wistful idea; it is the common basis of everyday life.

The world is full of societies and movements, some working for peace, some for the advancement of women, some for the solution of the economic problems, some for education, some for a universal language, some for racial amity, some for brotherhood and understanding: but the Bahá'í Cause is the only one that combines all of these objectives under the guidance of Bahá'u'lláh Who first compiled the all-inclusive program from which each in turn, has sprung.

The following words of Bahá'u'lláh are recorded by Prof. E. G. Browne of Cambridge University who visited Him in 'Akká in 1889:

“We desire but the good of the world and the happiness of the nations; yet they deem us a stirrer up of strife and sedition worthy of bondage and banishment . . . that all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers; that the bonds of affection and unity between the sons of men should be strengthened; that diversity of religion should cease, and differences of race be annulled. . . . So it shall be; these fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away, and the ‘Most Great Peace’ shall come. . . . These strifes and this bloodshed and discord must cease and all men be as one kindred and one family. . . . Let not a man glory in this that he loves his country; let him rather glory in this, that he loves his kind.”

A PRAYER

O God of glorious eternity,
 Grant me the strength to bear
 Thy message of love
 To all who pass my door.
 Let me chant Thy sacred song.
 Let me voice the dawn of a new day,
 The dawn of brotherhood and love that is to be.
 O endow me with the power to banish the woes
 Of darkness and the spiritual blindness
 From the sad eyes of my fellow mortals.

MENTAL HEALTH AND THE NEW WORLD ORDER

GENEVIEVE L. COY, PH.D.

In the first installment of this very helpful series, published in the June number, the author defined briefly and clearly a mentally well person and what constitutes mental health, also detailing certain attitudes which must be avoided by one seeking a fully integrated personality. In this second installment she continues her suggestions and statements along lines of positive effort in this direction. The concluding number will appear in the September issue.

THE first disintegrating factor previously defined is fear, and the second is the attitude of seeing oneself as the most important person in one's environment. Both of these disintegrating attitudes can be avoided by a wise training in the first four or five years of life.

3. One of the most insidious causes of mental illness is the one which psychologists describe as the "feeling of inferiority". This is due primarily to a consciousness of a gap between one's judgment of one's own abilities, on the one hand, and one's ideals, on the other. The individual sees so much that needs to be done, so much that he would do, and yet feels himself utterly inadequate for the task. This experience comes most often to the fine and intelligent person. Instead of whole-heartedly doing the best he can, he spends part of his time and energy in worrying because he cannot do more. Because this person is usually sincere and intelligent, he can often be helped to overcome this feeling. Let us say to him, "learn to judge your abilities objectively. What things can you really do well, as judged by what you have actually accomplished? Are you perhaps trying to do something for which you are not naturally fitted? Realize your own limitations frankly and willingly. We cannot all be musicians, or artists, or financiers. Only one man in a thousand is a genius in any one field of endeavor. But you do have some ability with which you can serve the world, and in which you can develop happy efficiency. Find the thing you can do best and then use that ability to the full. All that you have a right to expect of yourself is that you shall do your best. It is also important to realize that many other people feel as distrustful of themselves as you do. Find such people, try to help them, appreciate their work,—and so in helping them, forget your own feelings of inferiority. If you spend much of your effort in worrying about how far you fall short of your ideals, you will waste your energy, and one bit in the great pattern of the world's life will be missing or will be incomplete. Use all your sincerity and intelligence to discover what that bit is to be, and then whole-heartedly set yourself to do it."

4. There is a fourth factor in mental health which overlaps somewhat on the two preceding. This is the presence of a sense of humor. The lack of this often comes from failing to see life in a true perspective. The man who feels that all his world revolves about himself seldom has a true sense of humor. He may laugh at a joke, as long as he is not the cause of it, but he is too self-centered to laugh at himself. Without the ability to laugh at oneself there can be no complete mental health. Perhaps some people are born with a predisposition toward that happy balance of knowing when to take life very seriously and when to take it lightly. Perhaps training and experience in early childhood are the most important factors in developing this kind of perspective on life and on oneself. It is certain that even in the over-serious adult a sense of humor can be developed. It is not an easy thing to do, and it implies a change of attitude toward oneself. Humor is contagious, and the man who desires to cultivate a true sense of it should associate himself with those who already possess it. If he is not an utterly self-centered person, he will soon find the wise laughter of his friends suddenly bursting forth upon his own lips. A "good laugh" is one of the best ways of releasing physical and emotional tension, and to know how and when to indulge in it is a sign of true wisdom.

When the Bahá'ís were first imprisoned in 'Akká, under conditions where even decent food and water were lacking, Bahiyyih Khanum, the daughter of Bahá'u'lláh, laughed so much that her father sent word to her, "You must not laugh so much. If the guards hear you they will think you are mad, to laugh under such conditions." Yet who can doubt the fundamental sanity of one who saw the need of humor in such difficult circumstances?

5. Failure to face reality is a fifth cause of division in the personality. One of the clearest examples of this is to be found in the "dreamer", the person who plans wonderful things, but never seriously tries to accomplish them. We all have acquaintances whose conversation is full of grandiloquent promises of the things they are "going to do", but how seldom do they take the necessary first steps in the attaining of their desires! Others sit in seclusion, dreaming of a new world in which ideal conditions shall prevail for all mankind, but say, "It is hopeless to do anything now. See all the corruption in the world! Why was I born in such a wretched age?" They fail to realize that the man who really desires a new world will set himself to understand the causes of present evils, and will then go to work at some point where it seems possible to begin to remake life in the pattern of his ideal.

In this matter, as in others we have mentioned, much can be done for the building of mental health by the proper training of young children. Even very little boys and girls can be allowed to plan how part of their day is to be spent. When the plan has been made by the child and has been accepted by him, then the adult who is guiding him should kindly and firmly insist that the plan be carried to completion. As he grows older, he can plan more and more of his own activities, and become increasingly responsible for completion of the "work" he has set himself. In the best of modern education for young children the importance of the development of such habits is understood and utilized. In a group of five-year-olds, the teacher may say to a child, at the end of the morning, "What was it you planned to do today? You were going to paint a picture of a boat? May I see your picture? You didn't do it? But that was what you planned to do. And here we always finish our plans. I think you must stay here and finish your work, while the other children go to the assembly." A child who has thus been taught that activity must follow planning runs much less danger of becoming an adult "dreamer" than does the boy who is allowed to go aimlessly from one amusement to another.

Another type of failure to face reality is found in the man who has developed a fairly comfortable routine of working and of recreation, and who is perfectly contented if no one disturbs his pattern of living. The world about him may go through cataclysmic changes, but he sees only the familiar limits of his daily runway. He is the one who says with deep feeling, "The old ways are good enough for me." He is sodden in routine, and the changing realities of great world movements are, at most, merely an annoying murmur at his horizon's rim. Arthur Christopher Benson has said, "The base, the impure desire is only the imperfect desire; if it is satisfied, it reveals its imperfections, and the soul knows that not there can it rest." The person who is sunk in routine, desires only to rest in it, and he has lost the urge to growth, which is the necessary condition of life.

The man who desires mental health must face the realities of life, —those within his own nature, and those in the outside world. Having thus frankly taken stock of conditions as they are, he must find his own part in the world's work, and give all his energy and ability to building his bit in the ideal structure of the world tomorrow.

"The Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh contains all the great laws and principles of social government. The basis of God's perfect laws is love for humanity and help for human needs. If all people followed this Revelation the masses would be immeasurably uplifted and the Cause of God glorified. This development of humanity will be gradual, not sudden. It will surely come to pass: it is impossible to swim against the current of Niagara. Teaching the Truth is like building bridges by which humanity may cross over the current which threatens."

THE SOUVENIR OF 'ABDU'L-BAHA

ALLAH K. KHAN

"Consort with all the people of the world with love and fragrance. Fellowship is the cause of unity, and unity is the source of order in the world."

—Bahá'u'lláh.

N Saturday, June 29th, 1912, Abdu'l-Bahá, while touring the United States on behalf of world peace, expressed a desire to be host to the believers of the New York metropolitan area. The friends suggested West Englewood, N. J., where there was already a small group of Bahá'ís who could accommodate the large number which were expected. All day people kept arriving from the neighboring towns to share in the great feast at which 'Abdu'l-Bahá would be host. After the material feast, He gave a wonderful talk in which He said, "The efficacy of such meetings as these is permanent throughout the ages. This assembly has a name and significance which will last forever. Hundreds of thousands of meetings shall be held to commemorate this occasion, and the very words I speak to you today shall be repeated in them for ages to come." *

Every year since then, on the last Saturday in June, and in fulfillment of the implied command of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the friends have gathered in increasing numbers on the beautiful grounds surrounding Evergreen Cabin to commemorate that wonderful visit. This day has become the great day for West Englewood, not only for the Bahá'ís, but for the whole town. Everyone, it seems, has caught the spirit that is manifested there. Everyone who comes is impressed with the variety of people present. One local paper reporting the event said, "Bergen County has never had such a cosmopolitan crowd gathered together for the spread of peace and brotherhood."

This year the occasion was truly magnificent—unique, both numerically and from the point of view of the variety of people that were present. Over four hundred people and a dozen nationalities were represented—American, Canadians, Africans, Chinese, Koreans, Syrians, Armenians and Persians, Germans, French, Italians, Russians and other European nationalities, as well as all the different faiths—Buddhist, Jewish, Muhammadan, every denomination of Christianity, and the Bahá'í faith which accepts the truth in all religions. All were interested in one ideal,—peace and brotherhood; all imbued with the Spirit of the New Age, listening intently to the speakers on the afternoon and evening programs.

THE PROGRAM itself was of a high order. Mr. Horace Holley, Secretary of the Bahá'í National Spiritual Assembly was the first to speak. He showed the fallacy of the antagonistic economic theories now prevalent, and pointed out the need of love for one another as the sole solvent for this terrible disease of the body politic caused by human greed and selfishness.

Mrs. Marie B. Moore, a teacher in the Ethical Culture Society School in New York, read the talk of 'Abdu'l-Bahá given in West Englewood in 1912, in which He called us to unity and helpfulness toward one another:

"You must become of one heart, one spirit and one susceptibility. May you become as the waves of one sea, stars of the same heaven, fruits adorning the same tree, roses of one garden; in order that through you the oneness of humanity may establish its temple in the world of mankind, for you are the ones who are called to uplift the cause of unity among the nations of the earth You must be exceedingly kind and loving toward each other, willing to forfeit life in the pathway of another's happiness. You must be ready to sacrifice your possessions in another's behalf. The rich among you must show compassion toward the poor, and the well-to-do must look after those in distress."*

Although not on the program, Mr. H. K. Tong, the manager of a syndicate of Chinese newspapers, some of which are in English, was asked to say a few words. He told of his contacts with the Bahá'ís in China, Europe and America, and said that the teachings of Bahá'u-lláh would help to bring order in China and establish her again as the peace-loving nation that she has always been.

Mr. Mountfort Mills, who happened to be present and who had just returned from Europe where he had been busy meeting world delegates at the Disarmament Conference, and presenting to them the Bahá'í ideals of peace, upon hearing Mr. Tong, recalled the statement of 'Abdul-Bahá about China which was made to him in Central Park, New York City in 1912. He had been walking with one of the Persian friends, a few feet behind 'Abdul-Bahá Who wanted to be alone. Suddenly 'Abdul-Bahá stopped, turned around and told Mr. Mills that if the Chinese did not receive the Message of Bahá'u-lláh, they would become the greatest military power on earth. Then He left them without another word and continued His solitary walk. Mr. Mills said that he did not realize the significance of that statement until now, when the words spoken by Mr. Tong, in combination with the recent developments in China, revealed in full the prophetic force behind that utterance; and he expressed the hope that China would be awakened to the reality of her mission in the world.

Dr. Genevieve Coy of Columbia University, who for a short time was in charge of the Tarbiat School in Tihrán, Persia, was the last speaker of the afternoon. She spoke on the ever present desire of man to search for reality, through nature, science, philosophy—and above all, through the Prophets of God.

After the afternoon meeting the people gathered informally for two hours to get really acquainted, some to greet old friends, some to welcome new ones, some to answer the questions of new seekers as to the basis of Bahá'í Teaching that is capable of creating true love and harmony among such varied groups.

THIS SOUVENIR was a day of surprises. An unexpected pleasure was the arrival of Mrs. Fred Schopflocher of Montreal, Canada, who had a short time ago returned from a world tour in the interest of the Bahá'í Cause. She showed some pictures which she had taken of the holy places of the world to the interest and delight of the great number who remained for the evening meeting. There were pictures of people, both young and old, in India and Burma, Malay and China, who are followers of the universal teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. The pictures of the holy shrines of Christianity and Islam and of the Bahá'i Faith, especially the Shrines of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdul-Bahá were of interest. She showed the prison where the Founders of the Bahá'i Faith spent most of their lives, from which Bahá'u'lláh wrote those famous Epistles to the kings and rulers of the earth in 1868, when He summoned all mankind to follow Him as the Guide to the Most Great Peace.

THE CULMINATION of this great day was reached when Mr. Hooper Harris of New York City gave the Message of Bahá'u'lláh. He compared briefly but with great vigor the origin of Christianity with that of the Bahá'i Faith, and showed how this Cause is putting into operation the laws which Christ brought into the world nineteen hundred years ago.

In every respect the Souvenir this year was a great success. The weather was almost perfect. The audibility of the speakers had never been better, because, as a result of the foresight of the West Englewood Bahá'i Assembly, a series of amplifiers had been placed in convenient places so that all could hear every word distinctly. The surrounding grounds were as always beautiful, and the music rendered by true artists inspiring. The people went away full of joy and thankfulness that Bahá'u'lláh had left a group here in West Englewood as well as in hundreds of other cities throughout the world, who are earnestly working for peace—peace between races, peace between nations, peace between classes, and peace between religions—in other words, peace in the hearts of the people of the world.

“That the Cause associated with the name of Bahá'u'lláh feeds itself upon those hidden springs of celestial strength which no force of human personality, whatever its glamour, can replace; that its reliance is solely upon that mystic Source with which no worldly advantage, be it wealth, fame, or learning can compare; that it propagates itself by ways mysterious and utterly at variance with the standards accepted by the generality of mankind, will, if not already apparent, become increasingly manifest as it forges ahead towards fresh conquests in its struggle for the spiritual regeneration of mankind.”

—Shoghi Effendi

WHY DO I ESPOUSE THE BAHÁ'Í CAUSE?

CHIKAO FUJISAWA

Address given at the Bahá'í celebration of May 23rd, in Tokyo. Mr. Fujisawa was for three years a member of the Secretariat of the League of Nations in Geneva. Returning to Japan he held the Chair of International Politics in the Kyushu Imperial University for six years.

HERE is no denying that in recent decades, means of communication and transportation have unprecedentedly multiplied and thereby shortened the world distance, so much so that all nations have become increasingly interdependent; their ever tightening bonds of trade and industry, of finance and economics, of agriculture and education have brought us home to an insight that the oneness of the world is a hardly disputable fact, in so far as the material aspects of our civilization is concerned.

Nevertheless, on the other hand, we are witnessing humanity hopelessly in the grip of moral bewilderment, political chaos and class antagonism, which threaten to undermine the very foundations of our civilization. In the face of these actualities, an easy-going popular belief that the realization of economic, financial and technical solidarity of the nations would ipso facto give rise to a golden epoch of permanent peace and sincere cooperation among mankind has suffered a miserable shipwreck and proved a naive illusion. The world war and the post-bellum international complications specifically bear witness to this blunt realism of our day. Indeed, in attempting to combat the social maladies, a variety of ingenious remedies have been proposed such as socialism, communism, bolshevism and fascism, but they have after all fallen far short of the final solution of the problem concerned. It is a sad story that Soviet Russia, ever boasting of eradicating the evils attendant upon capitalism, has achieved hitherto nothing else than the restoration of a slavery regime, and will, in case of her glaring triumph, plunge humanity for ever into the abyss of despair and horror.

IN A WORD, the unifying tendency of our modern material civilization could not automatically call into existence the spiritual and moral unity of mankind. This is a great lesson fought with far-reaching consequences and which we should take to heart very seriously.

How then is this outwardly somewhat paradoxical phenomenon to be accounted for? As for me, I am persuaded after a prolonged meditation that this exceedingly deplorable state of things is primarily due to the ostensible neglect on the part of the leaders of the world of a thorough-going philosophical study of the inner structure of human beings. Mainly, thanks to the sacred scriptures bequeathed by ancient oriental sages, I have come to apprehend that our human consciousness is generally obscured and bemired with the rust of obstinate bias, as well as of shallow preconceptions, in such a manner that the ultimate truth of the universe remains unfortunately shrouded from us. Hence it is only in erasing, so to speak, all this mental rust by means of a deep introspection and strenuous spiritual training that we may attain to the primordial stage of pure consciousness, wherein the light of the Sun of Truth is revealed as on the spotless surface of a mirror.

Consequently, the spiritual process in question is, as it were, a regress towards the inmost recess of our hearts, intrinsically opposite to the popular conception of progress which implies no more nor less than a mere precipitating advance, not accompanied by any retrospective act of our soul. This is the principal reason why the wonderful progress achieved in the realm of natural science and material technics has had no direct bearing upon the solution of the philosophical problem of subduing, what we may call ego centrism whose lamentable rampancy has hindered us so far from bringing about the unity of mankind on a firm moral and religious basis.

FROM WHAT precedes, it becomes now evident that the matter of great urgency for us all is reconstitution of the absolute authority of one single religion to be worshiped by all mankind, irrespective of the diversity of nationalities, races, languages and traditions, because religion is the very key wherewith to disclose the otherwise hidden sanctuary of our genuine heart, through which only we can have communion with God, the Originator of the universe.

Just as the Sun, the image of God the Almighty lavishes upon all creatures and things so benignantly its ever fostering radiance and helps them to the consummation of their respective natures, so will we human beings in whose purified hearts the omnipresent God comes to dwell, never fail to behave with deep love and overflowing sympathy towards one another since God will infallibly convince us that we are all the offspring of one common stock. From this unshakable belief there will gradually emerge the grand idea of the spiritual unity of mankind.

However, why have the existent religions ceased to play the supreme role of leading us back to the stern presence of God? It appears to me that there are two causes answerable for this visible decline of religions: one is sectarianism which is adverse to the inner nature of religion itself: and the other is the anachronistic narrow-mindedness of religious leaders. For many a century the great religious communities,—Christian, Buddhist, Muhammadan, Hindu and others have not only existed indifferently side by side, but also they have been in constant hostility and strife one against the other. Besides, what has rendered the situation worse is that each of them have become split up into a large number of sects, which are often bitterly opposed to one another. It goes without saying that this phenomenon has considerably discredited the past religions and deprived them of their original spiritual force. Secondly, religious teachers have shown an exceedingly bigoted and narrow-minded attitude towards the achievements of modern sciences and often betray a hardly justifiable disposition in blindly condemning those who wish to refute candidly such a fantastic story as the passage from the Bible according to which the world was made in six days by the hand of a personal God. It is obvious that true religion will never come into conflict with science, for the plane of the religious world is situated much higher than that of the scientific world. I believe personally that science is not merely reconcilable with religion, but also it should serve as the most powerful means of carrying into effect the religious ideal on earth.

WE HAVE waited long for the advent of a new all-embracing religion which would be able to fittingly meet the requirements of the times, and this ardent desire was at last fulfilled in the person of Bahá'u'lláh, a great modern Prophet Who appeared in Persia sounding His mighty trumpet call to afflicted humanity.

Perusal of numerous Tablets left for us by Bahá'u'lláh has impressed me so strongly with the unusual profundity of His thought and His penetrating wisdom that I could not but feel irresistibly attracted towards His noble Cause.

Bahá'u'lláh's sublime mission was to recover the unity of all mankind through God. He said among other things that of the Tree of Knowledge the All-glorious fruit is this exalted word: "Of one Tree are ye the fruits and of one bough the leaves." "Let not a man glory in this that he loves his country, but let him rather glory in this that he loves his kind." He conveyed the following message with regard to the future of mankind: "All nations should become as one in faith and all men as brothers; the bonds of affection and unity between the sons of men should be strengthened, diversity of religion should cease and the differences of race be annulled . . . these strifes and this bloodshed and discord must cease and all men be as one kindred and one family."

As a means of promoting religious unity He advocated above all the utmost charity and tolerance as being conducive to overcoming egocentrism of all shades and he earnestly called upon His followers to consort with the people of all religions with joy and gladness. His magnanimity is undoubtedly unique as shown by any great Prophet and is in sharp contrast to the stubborn narrow-mindedness with which other existent religions are generally marked.

In connection with the desirability of stimulating a close cooperation between the Occident and Orient, 'Abdu'l-Bahá refers to the value of modern scientific civilization as follows: "In these days the East is in need of material progress and the West is in need of a spiritual ideal. It would be well for the West to turn to the East for illumination and to give in exchange its scientific knowledge. There must be this interchange of gifts. The East and the West must unite to give to each other what is lacking. This union will bring about true civilization where the spiritual is expressed and carried out in the material."

Thus, the spiritual unity of mankind must first of all be guaranteed and then contemporary material civilization, instead of continuing, as at present, to weigh heavily upon us, will turn out to be the most efficacious device to translate into reality the divine will of the Absolute.

Another distinct feature of the Bahá'í Religion is the absence of any professional priesthood: all Bahá'ís are exhorted to share, whatever their occupation, in the work of teaching the ultimate truth of the universe, according to their opportunities and abilities. We can directly turn to the Divine Manifestations of the Infinite which will unfailingly reveal Itself in the deepest region of our consciousness. When we all address ourselves un-animously to one Center, then there can be neither moral confusion nor superficial sophistication, and the nearer we all draw to the rallying force of the one Absolute God, the nearer do we draw to each other.

Thus, there is no wonder that the Bahá'í Movement is bound to sweep the most enlightened strata of society in every country.

THE CRIME PROBLEM

WILLARD P. HATCH

*"If the community would endeavor to educate the masses, day by day knowledge and sciences would increase, the understanding would be broadened, the sensibilities developed, customs would become good and morals normal; in one word, in all these classes of perfections there would be progress, and there would be fewer crimes. . . . Therefore the communities must think of preventing crimes. . . ."

IN the Bahá'í Revelation three things are proved that are fundamental needs in the solution of any problem involving human conduct: these three things are—(a) the existence of a conscious and immanent God; (b) the immortality of the human spirit; (c) the fact that guidance from God, modern and complete, awaits the awakening consciousness of the people.

This article does not seek to prove any of these statements,—that proof is available for anyone who wishes to find it.

Assuming, therefore, as a basic fact that there is one God for all humanity—an all-conscious, omnipotent power, immanent and actively interested in His creation; the Provider for all, the Lover of all; and, assuming the additional basic fact that the human spirit is immortal, the opening question of this paper is as follows:

If the individual members of the human family had the certain knowledge implanted in them from early childhood that eventually they must appear before an all-knowing and just God for judgment, would, or would not, such a fact make a change for the better in human conduct?

The answer is self-evident—it would.

No sane human being would care to do evil if at all times conscious that his or her every act and thought is known and recorded before God and that, sooner or later, he or she would have to reap the consequences of each act.

Also it is clear that a sane and normal understanding can only be based upon a Faith that is founded on reason and conscious knowledge capable of logical proof. Perfect wisdom is perfect sanity and perfect wisdom must be that which comes from an errorless and all-wise God—as it is written:

* 'Abdu'l-Baha in "Some Answered Questions, p. 311.

“The source of all learning is the knowledge of God, exalted be His Glory, and this cannot be attained save through the knowledge of His Divine Manifestation.”*

Young character is plastic character. Every baby is born innocent, this has been clearly proved. Evil comes after birth, from neglected or wrong training, bad companions, wrong environment. Let the training be good, the companionship proper, the environment right and good results will follow. Habits good or bad, once established are difficult to change.

The present attitude towards crime is to wait until the criminal has committed the crime—then to make use of an expensive equipment to detect, to try, to judge, and to incarcerate the convicted criminal. This incarceration plunges the individual amongst a group of other individuals of like character but of various criminal predilections, where each shares with each his especial branch of criminal knowledge.

In a well-written article in the Los Angeles Examiner for June 12th, 1932, Prof. Francis Sayre, director of the Harvard Institute of Criminal Law, says:

“2 . . . we should make the foundation of our penal system rehabilitation. . . .”

Prof. Sayre advocates further a more scientific system of detection and a modernizing, tightening, and speeding up of criminal law procedure but ends his article with this statement: “But the greatest advance of all can be made by attacking crime at its source, through moral instruction of all school children. . . .”

Undoubtedly penal laws of some effective type will be necessary for many years to come, but surely it is possible to conceive of a civilization such as is pointed out in the Bahá'í teachings in which, because of early training in the fear and love of God, a consciousness could be created in which the commission of an evil act would cause remorse to such a degree in the individual as to root out any possibility of its repetition.

Such a consciousness as that mentioned in the preceding paragraph has already been established almost universally in regard to cannibalism.

When asked to explain the difference between material civilization and divine civilization ‘Abdu'l-Bahá replied:

“As to the difference between the natural civilization which is in the present day in force, and the Divine civilization which shall be of the results of the House of Justice. The material civilization prevents and safeguards people from committing evil deeds, through the force of the laws of retaliation and correction. Thus you see how prohibitory laws and rules of correction are constantly in circulation and yet by no means any (adequate) law of retribution is to be found; and in all the cities of Europe and America spacious prison buildings have been founded and established for correcting the criminals.

“But the Divine civilization will so train mankind that no soul will commit crimes except rare individuals, which exception is of no importance whatsoever. Consequently, there is much difference between preventing people from evil actions and crimes through correction and retaliation or through violent punishment, and so training them, enlightening them and spiritualizing them that they will shun crimes and evil deeds without any fear (however) of punishment, prevention or retaliation. Nay they will consider crimes themselves as the greatest punishment and mightiest retaliation, will be attracted to the virtues of the human world and devotedly spend their lives in that which is conducive to the enlightenment of mankind and in spreading qualities acceptable to the Threshold of the Almighty.

“Consequently, consider what a difference and distinction there is between the material civilization and the Divine civilization! The natural civilization prevents men from doing harm and wrong through force and punishment and thus withholds them from committing crimes. But the Divine civilization so trains men that the human individuals avoid sins without having any fear from punishment (material), and the very sin itself becomes unto them as the severest punishment. And they will engage in acquiring human virtues, gaining that by which mankind will be uplifted and that which will enlighten the human world with the utmost zeal and fervor.”*

In a God-fearing and God-loving humanity all crime could be made as obsolete as cannibalism, beginning with the great crime of wholesale murder, arson and robbery called war, down to the slightest infringement of the moral code. But in order to be completely effective the beginning must be made with the plastic years of childhood and kept up until, just as the physical child gradually learns to walk, so the moral and spiritual child may also learn to maintain a character equilibrium amidst the temptations of daily life.

His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh says in His great “Tablet of the World”:

“In our laws and principles a chapter has been devoted to the Law of Retaliation (for homicide, etc.) which is the cause of the protection and preservation of people; but the peoples dread of that law withholds them only outwardly from committing base and unseemly deeds. But that which prevents and guards men both outwardly and inwardly (from base deeds) is the Fear of God.”

“The Fear of God is the real Guardian and the ideal protector. Men must adhere and hold fast unto that which is conducive to this great gift.”

The above is particularly true in the work of the Juvenile Courts of the land—such teaching is the only really effective agent, and those who do not employ such a method are losing their most certain means of obtaining results.

In the Juvenile Court work, as practiced in the United States, the thought is to remove the erring youth coming under its jurisdiction from contact with older criminals, which was formerly their lot when incarcerated with them. Also to establish a friendly but firm probationary period in which every effort is to be made to re-shape lives just beginning to divert from rightful standards of conduct.

The youth of the twentieth century are independent by inclination and, to an extent, this is a sign of progress—but the youth who come before the courts of the land are expressing that independence, in ways that are harmful to themselves, their families and their associates.

In their revolt from a family control that is ignorant and unjust in many cases, this type of youth has leaped the traces into conduct completely unsocial, only too often citing cases in which family life has set them a bad example. They evidence by deeds little respect for law and order, often have a contempt for those who uphold it. However, it is true that the plastic youth who come to court will nearly always listen to a mention of an allknowing God, if it is done in the right way. It is as a rule, not hard to train them into the knowledge that nothing can be concealed from God and that, sooner or later 'What a man sows he must reap'. They can be made to realize that God is not a tyrant, laying down arbitrary laws merely because He is all-powerful, but that He is their loving Creator and that His laws are meant for their own good, their health and their happiness. They can, in this way be protected from vice and crime and social diseases. They can be taught the Fear and the Love of God—the one God of all mankind, and the results will often astonish the beholder in the transformations for good that seem almost miraculous.

However, even here the time to begin is before the children do things that would bring them into any court. The time to begin is in the schools of the world. Throughout all schools an undenominational spiritual training can readily be taught side by side with material education. If the reason that this is not done in the United States in a definite and direct manner should be a creedal fear that some denomination other than one's own will inject denominational propaganda objectionable in nature, or should the opposition of scientists to having superstitions taught in the name of religion be the trouble—then, in either case, all can alike rejoice. Such rejoicing can be because the fundamental moral laws, the proof of the existence of God, and proof of the immortality of the soul, are found in the Bahá'í Teachings in a manner in perfect agreement with science and without the slightest sectarian or denominational limitation. These truths can be taught without the slightest fear of anyone's religion being hurt, for the Bahá'í Cause loves the people of all religions and is not seeking to belittle or subvert anyone's religion, but explains, clarifies and fulfills all true religion, with prejudice towards none.

As 'Abdu'l-Bahá points out, Truth is one and is not subject to multiplicity, and all mankind is from the same God, the devil not having made anybody.

What parents, worthy of the name, but would want to see their children come to honour in the world and achieve a worthy station in the sight of God, and this is true no matter what religion they profess. Then surely, in an intelligent nation, some basis of unity can be reached, some foundation laid down upon which all could work together in love for the laudable aim of giving all children a material and spiritual education, the latter to protect them from temptation to do evil and to adorn them with the Divine virtues which are the real cause of human ennoblement.

WHAT NEXT?

A SEMINAR ON HUMAN RELATIONS

GLADYS AOKI

Many Bahá'is attended a recent Conference of Catholics, Jews and Protestants gathered for the purpose of discussing religious liberty and mutual understanding. The Conference was held in International House near the University of California in Berkeley. The author of this article, a well known Bahá'i, was appointed because a Bahá'i, to prepare a report of Round Table No. 1, the subject for discussion being "The Cause and Cure of Religious Prejudice." The report she prepared was so excellent from the standpoint of the three groups represented, that each and every one felt that she must be a member of their particular faith, indicating the universal attitude in which the report was made.

INTERNATIONAL House, on the edge of the University of California campus, offered a perfect setting for the Seminar of Human Relations held in Berkeley a few months ago. Within its paneled walls, a continuous seminar of human relations is being held, and Asiatic, Negro and Caucasian meet together in easy friendliness.

Into this free atmosphere entered Catholics, Protestants and Jews, and talked together. As they talked, each became aware, to a higher degree than before, of the existence of other groups than his own and of the beauty and reverence and dignity inherent in other creeds.

A group of believers from the Bahá'i Assemblies which encircle San Francisco Bay were interested observers of this sincere attempt to mitigate ancient prejudices. They were thrilled as, one after another, Protestant, Catholic and Jew brought out the thought that those things which we hold in common are the fundamental things. We all believe in the capacity of the human soul to develop religiously. This is our common end. The things which divide us are trivial in comparison with those which unite.

As the Bahá'is joined in the discussion the protagonists of the various groups turned to them as though assured of their sympathetic understanding and finally it was a Bahá'i who was chosen by Mr. Clinchy, the national secretary of the organization, to present the report of Round Table No. 1, before the Seminar as a whole.

GROUP No. 1 was organized for the purpose of discussing the Cause and Cure of Religious Prejudice. When does a difference of opinion become a prejudice? It is a prejudice when it becomes intolerant of the opinions of others; when it is emotional and not founded on reason. Prejudice is characterized by a lack of openmindedness, willingness to gain new truths. We were reminded that Lippman urges us to hold our opinions tentatively, lest they become prejudices.

We decided the chief causes of religious prejudice to be symptoms of the closed mind having their origin in differences of behavior and belief and their manifestation in lack of trust. They are fed by ignorance, by misinformation, which is worse than ignorance, and by partial or incomplete information. These seminars originate in a conviction, more and more widely held, that the fundamental truth of all religion is one and that true information about the beliefs of others will break down prejudice.

When we had finished the preliminary work, which included a tabulation of those prejudices most commonly held against Jew, Catholic and Protestant, Mr. Clinchy asked Rabbi Weinstein to act as discussion leader for the Jews and explain some of the points urged against them.

Dr. Weinstein dwelt particularly on the "In-Group," "Out-Group" psychology. For many generations, the Jews have been an "Out-Group." Prejudice against them is largely traditional and the explanations which are advanced are, for the most part, rationalizations. The prejudice originated in a period when the religion of the Jew differed from that held by the "In-Group" and in those days a difference in religious views was excellent ground for prejudice. When the religious bonds relaxed, their economic methods were advanced in way of rationalizations; now racial explanations are being offered.

They are an alien people, there is something which marks them off as different. What of it? Why should such a difference be resented? In the days of the Ghetto, the Jew was the inhabitant of a city within a city. At night the gates were barred and none might issue forth. The only escape was the escape of the mind. In those dark days, they learned every subtlety of mental exercise. No wonder the Jew is a disturbing element: quick-witted, penetrating, keen in argument, he is quick to puncture with his wit the happy platitudes of slower people. Their mental subtlety and alertness, their rich vitality and zest for living, these very things which set them apart are their rich contribution to human society.

FATHER O'CONNELL was the eloquent spokesman of the Roman Catholics. He interpreted the attitude of the Church on Prohibition, the observation of the Sabbath, the worship of images, birth control and purgatory. His explanations were clear, brief and to the point, but to review them all would take too long. One example should be sufficient. Some of the Protestant ministers present asked Father O'Connell why the Catholic Church prohibited her priests from joining with them in conducting services, consecrating buildings, etc. The answer was succinct. The Church regards herself as the one vehicle ordained by Christ for the preservation and transmission of His teaching. All of those who have departed from her fold she regards as heretics and she is a stern and unrelenting mistress. Her ministers may not associate themselves with heretics. She knows no compromise on this point but she does recognize a difference between the Body and the Soul of the Church. The Body consists of all those who openly acknowledge her doctrine but those who, all over the world everywhere, are leading Godly lives according to their lights, these constitute her soul.

DR. GEO. T. TOLSON of the Pacific School of Religion in Berkeley spoke for the Protestants. He mentioned the Dayton Case as an instance of behavior in the Protestant Group that was rather bewildering. When asked to explain the contradictory interpretations of the Scriptures, he replied; "I can't explain it except by saying that the Protestants have perfect religious freedom."

Protestantism stands for freedom; for the right of the individual to approach his God directly without the intervention of priest or ceremony. It believes that revelation is never ending and that even today God speaks to the individual soul and that this inner voice is man's truest and highest guide. That salvation comes to a soul when it is released from all dependence on formulas and dogmas. "We are not saved until we are released from literalism of all kinds which binds us to past ages. Religion is a living and developing thing."

DURING THE discussion it had been suggested that instead of the three columns, Jew, Catholic and Protestant, there should be two, Jew and Christian. An analysis of the attitudes of the three groups seems to show a different alignment. The position of Jew and Catholic is the position of the supporter of the law. For the Jew it is typified by the Torah, for the Catholic by the Church. They represent that great division of humanity which believes that the individual accepting a divine teaching offers up as his first sacrifice the right to individual question and protest. The Prophet reveals the law of God and this law which comes down to us imbedded in the traditions of the past must be implicitly obeyed.

The entire Protestant position on the other hand is based on the inherent right of the individual to question and protest. The Protestant however will make the point that what is questioned or protested against is not the law of God but the tradition in which it has been imbedded. Have those human agencies responsible for its transmission been correct in their understanding and interpretation of the divine revelation.

In the face of such an apparently irreconcilable difference we can only remember that unity does not imply identity and that it is only "after the clash of conflicting opinions that the shining spark of Truth flashes forth." The contribution which is of our own particular group is not the only contribution which is valuable. We should learn to appreciate, to savor and to enjoy those things which distinguish us from one another.

We may through intercourse such as this Seminar offered come to the time when the word Jew will evoke a picture of the ideal Jew; who, inspired by a divine madness became a witness for God in an indifferent world. When the word Catholic will bring to our minds the image of a Newman or a St. Francis or a St. Theresa. When the thought of Protestant will be the thought of one who stands for the integrity of the human soul: one, who freeing himself from all human attachments, turns his face toward the Source of Light and solves divine problems by the light of divine illumination.

We may even reach the point where in the most ignoble Jew, the most immoral Catholic, or the most moral Protestant we shall be conscious only of the spark of divinity, and honor and love him for that spark and for the reason that he too is the child of our Father and our brother in humanity.

BEFORE THE Round Table disbanded someone objected that we had not done anything about the removal of prejudice. Thereupon Dr. Tully C. Knoles rose to the occasion and made a motion that we abolish prejudice.

Feeling that the conference should have some positive result to report to the main body, Mr. Clinchy appointed a committee to consider the next step. This committee was composed of the three spokesmen for the three groups: Rabbi Weinstein, Father O'Connell, and Dr. Tolson, and they reported their recommendations to the Seminar on Tuesday. They were formulated under ten headings entitled, "What Next?" The establishment of these ten points will destroy prejudice.

1. Exact information secured from various sources including depositions written and oral from people devoted to the religion under suspicion.

2. The cultivation so far as is possible of an historical perspective which will relieve uninformed people of fear dating back to enormities practiced in ages past.

3. Intimate friendships and social minglings with members of religious groups toward which one is in danger of forming prejudices.

4. As far as is permissible, attendance with open and enquiring mind on the public services of other faiths.

5. A study of a great number of things in common in the ethical and religious values of Judaism, Catholicism and Protestantism.

6. The cessation of practices that irritate. (Proselytizing and defamation.)

7. The recognition of the shame and scandal of religious dividedness in a world already too much divided.

8. Recognition of the necessity that these three religions stand together and work together to stem the rising tide of secularism which is menacing all idealism.

9. The spread of inter-religious Fellowship.

10. Inter-Religious seminars where all dislikes, differences, prejudices, are being freely acknowledged and discussed in loving consultation.

THE REVELATION of our times is the inter-relatedness of all mankind. Leaders are seeing this in economic and political relations, religious leaders must recognize this idea.

Those things which we hold in common are fundamental things. We all believe in God. We formulate our attitude toward man in the Golden Rule and attempt to express it in some form of social service. We all agree that ethical training is important to that development. These are our common ends. The individual should be left free to choose his avenue of approach.

If prejudice is to be destroyed, the appeal must be to the heart as well as to the head. The power of such meetings as these to destroy prejudice lies not only in the arguments advanced, the resolutions passed, or the programs mapped out, but also in the spiritual emotions which are engendered.

This Seminar of Human Relations held in Berkeley was a rich experience. Jew and Catholic and Protestant spoke eloquently for their faiths and those who listened were lifted to a higher spiritual level than they had known before. They were welded into a unity which transcended all outer differences. At heart they were one.

THE CALL OF BAHÁ'U'LLÁH

LET there be no misgivings as to the animating purpose of the world-wide Law of Bahá'u'lláh. Far from aiming at the subversion of the existing foundations of society, it seeks to broaden its basis, to remould its institutions in a manner consonant with the needs of an ever-changing world. It can conflict with no legitimate allegiances, nor can it undermine essential loyalties. Its purpose is neither to stifle the flame of a sane and intelligent patriotism in men's hearts, nor to abolish the system of national autonomy so essential if the evils of excessive centralization are to be avoided. It does not ignore, nor does it attempt to suppress, the diversity of ethnical origins, of climate, of history, of language and tradition, of thought and habit, that differentiate the peoples and nations of the world. It calls for a wider loyalty, for a larger aspiration than any that has animated the human race. It insists upon the subordination of national impulses and interests to the imperative claims of a unified world. It repudiates excessive centralization on one hand, and disclaims all attempts at uniformity on the other.

The call of Bahá'u'lláh is primarily directed against all forms of provincialism, all insularities and prejudices. If long-cherished ideals and time-honored institutions, if certain social assumptions and religious formulae have ceased to promote the welfare of the generality of mankind, if they no longer minister to the needs of a continually evolving humanity, let them be swept away and relegated to the limbo of obsolescent and forgotten doctrines. Why should these, in a world subject to the immutable law of change and decay, be exempt from the deterioration that must needs overtake every human institution? For legal standards, political and economic theories are solely designed to safeguard the interests of humanity as a whole, and not humanity to be crucified for the preservation of the integrity of any particular law or doctrine."

“So long as the requirements of the natural world play paramount part among the children of men, success and prosperity are impossible If he comes under the shadow of the True Educator and is rightly trained, he becomes the essence of essences, the light of lights, the spirit of spirits; he becomes the center of the divine appearances, the source of spiritual qualities, the rising place of heavenly lights, and the receptacle of divine inspirations.”

MANY ARE skeptical regarding the establishment of universal peace; of an effective league of nations; of perfect harmony between capital and labor. They base their skepticism on general grounds of human nature. “War will always be,” they say, “as long as human nature remains what it is.”

Unquestionably true, but human nature can be changed. In fact, human nature is being changed every century, and has been changed gradually throughout all centuries and milleniums of recorded history. Indeed as we believe from natural evidences of evolution, human nature has gradually, during great unrecorded stages of the past, made enormous changes from the time when man knew not how to use his hands to grasp and project weapons; knew not the use of fire, nor any other of the even elemental inventions and discoveries which started him on the path of civilization.

Man has risen constantly from lower to higher planes of living; from animal grossness and brutality to a more sensitive refinement of feeling and thought. There is no reason to suppose that this progress is going to stop miraculously, and that human nature is now going to remain static for all time.

YES, human nature is changing, and will doubtless continue to change. But there needs to be an immense and spiritual force exerted if human nature is to change with sufficient speed and directness to overcome the imminent danger of cataclysm which the world today faces.

Religion has always been the chief motivation of progress toward more humanitarian institutions. If one investigates the sources of the great reform movements of the nineteenth century—the movement for free public education, the movement for the abolition of slavery, the movement for more humane treatment of the criminals and insane—one will find that the source of all these movements was deep religious conviction, a desire for service strong enough to cause the sacrifice of self for the good of society.

Religion possesses the power of changing human nature and has illustrated the ability in an infinite number of ways. Human nature can be changed, and we trust human nature will be changed in directions that will ultimately assure universal peace and a universal civilization founded upon the brotherhood of man.

Bahá'u'lláh, over fifty years ago, enunciated certain great principles for organized living upon this planet which, if carried out, would revolutionize human affairs and bring about a much more perfect society. But this ideal organization of human society depends for its achievement upon the perfecting and spiritualizing of human nature. Noble institutions cannot be firmly established in an ignoble humanity, nor can ideal patterns for human living become effective in a society that is without ideals.

A righteous people and an equitable civilization. You cannot have one without the other.

The primary aim of the Bahá'í movement, therefore, is the perfecting of human character. It seeks to elevate and ennoble man's motives and deeds. And it has within it a mysterious power which effects marvelous transformations in human nature, enabling man to characterize himself with spiritual attributes.

THE ULTIMATE universal aim of the Bahá'í movement—that of establishing a more perfect civilization upon our planet, uniting mankind under its unifying and progressive force—this ideal appeals with tremendous power to all whose spiritual conscience has been awakened. Those who accept the new world order of Bahá'u'lláh desire to devote themselves heart and soul to the carrying out of these noble institutions. Thus Bahá'is, the world over—of various races, creeds, cultural backgrounds, personal convictions and tastes—are working with absolute unity and concord for bringing to pass the world state of Bahá'u'lláh.

Because they accept this new world order of Bahá'u'lláh as a revelation of Truth for today, Bahá'is do not discuss or quibble regarding the principles which He has established. The human tendency to pick ideas to pieces, to advocate changes, to digress—in fact, all that egoistic tendency in man which projects him into argumentativeness, separativeness, aggressive individualism—all this is either eliminated or effectively subordinated in the Bahá'í movement by the reverence and loyalty of its adherents toward Bahá'u'lláh and His Revelation.

BUT IN REALITY, there is nothing in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh that can reasonably cause questioning or disagreement. The principles enunciated by Him are so lofty, so simple and clear in their outline, so evidently adapted to the crying needs of humanity today, that they win the acceptance of even the most critical minds. In fact, the nobility of these ideals, the loftiness of the cultural edifices which Bahá'u'lláh projects, has been the cause of attracting to the Bahá'í movement many people who had been deniers of revealed religion, yet finding themselves powerfully attracted to the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh have gradually come to accept His cause as definite revelation.

Did not this same thing take place in the early centuries of Christianity? How many a Roman citizen—cultural, intellectual, man of the world, skeptical as to religion became attracted to the faith of the Nazarene because of the power of its human institutions, because of its strong evidence of a reforming, vitalizing force in the lives of its adherents.

And so today, the Bahá'í movement is marvelously attracting the allegiance of men and women who have a humanitarian vision for the world, whether or not they are in the state of giving immediate allegiance to claims of Revelation. Later this allegiance comes, through witnessing evidences of a perfected life as manifested in Bahá'is through the all compelling attractiveness of the world program as enunciated by Bahá'u'lláh, and through the convincing spiritual power that is perceived to underlie all of Bahá'u'lláh's deeds and utterances.

BAHA'U'LLAH fulfilled one of the primary requirements of a Prophet—that is, absolute severance from the world, renunciation of wealth and position, and in His case even of liberty. How else can spiritual teachings be convincing? Should they come from the mouth of one who lives at ease in the midst of wealth and luxury, surrounded by all the good things of the world, people might well question the sincerity of purpose, therefore the measure of truth, in such utterances.

Religion makes a universal appeal because it proceeds from a source as universal as life itself. And we find in Bahá'u'lláh a universality covering every plane of existence. Born to a noble family, of high official position and considerable wealth, in line for a high governmental career, Bahá'u'lláh sacrificed all when He set forth to promulgate His spiritual truths.

“Bahá'u'lláh was a prisoner twenty-five years. During all this time He was subjected to the indignities and revilement of the people. He was persecuted, mocked and put in chains. In Persia His properties were pillaged and His possessions confiscated. First, banishment from Persia to Baghdad; then to Constantinople; then to Adrianople; finally from Roumelia to the prison fortress of 'Akká.

“During His lifetime He was intensely active. His energy was unlimited. Scarcely one night was passed in restful sleep. He bore these ordeals, suffered these calamities and difficulties in order that a manifestation of selflessness and service might become apparent in the world of humanity; that the 'Most Great Peace' should become a reality; that human souls might appear as the angels of heaven; that heavenly miracles would be wrought among men; that human faith should be strengthened and perfected; that the precious, priceless bestowal of God—the human mind—might be developed to its fullest capacity in the temple of the body; and man become the reflection and likeness of God, even so it hath been revealed in the Bible 'We shall create man in our own image.'

“Briefly: Bahá'u'lláh bore all these ordeals and calamities in order that our hearts might become enkindled and radiant, our spirits be glorified, our faults become virtues, our ignorance transformed into knowledge; in order that we might attain the real fruits of humanity and acquire heavenly graces; although pilgrims upon earth we should travel the road of the heavenly kingdom; although needy and poor we might receive the treasures of life eternal. For this has He borne these difficulties and sorrows.”*

How FAR removed is the Bahá'í ideal for spiritual development of the individual from a narrow religious bigotry or an ecclesiastical pattern for mere personal salvation! It is Society that the Bahá'ís seek to save. They dedicate their lives to service. They strive to spiritualize their natures, not so much for the sake of eternal blessedness as for the sake of doing the job that is vitally needed on earth today—the huge task of transforming human institutions into more noble patterns.

This ideal appeals powerfully to lofty souls. Here is something which stirs all that is generous and noble in human nature and calls forth these hidden energies in the depths of our being which can be realized only by the power of lofty ideals and which, strengthened by divine force, can become powerfully effective in the building of nobler institutions.

THE FIRST BAHÁ'Í HALL IN INDIA

THROUGH the thoughtfulness of Mr. Isfandiari Bakhtiari we are able to reproduce a picture of the new Bahá'í Hall recently completed at Karachi, India, and give a brief account of its dedication held March twenty-first, the Bahá'í New Year's Day. This Hazirat-ul-Quds, as it is called, stands in a charming garden where “in response to the invitation of the Bahá'í friends of Karachi a representative group gathered at six P. M.” A prayer chanted in Persian opened the dedication service and was followed by a reading from the writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá by the mayor of Karachi “who is taking a keen interest in the Bahá'í Movement.” Mrs. Keith Ransom-Kehler, one of the revered international Bahá'í teachers from the United States gave the principle address. Then the company proceeded to the main entrance of the Hall, Mrs. Ransom-Kehler chanted a prayer, removed the bouquet of flowers which was fastened to the door-knob and turning the key said, “To the glory of God, and the brotherhood of man I declare this building open for public worship, calling upon Bahá'u'lláh richly to bless all those who enter.” So saying, she entered the building followed by the large group of friends.

After inspecting the Hall and expressing appreciation the guests returned to the tea tables in the garden where delicious refreshments were served. “Then a vote of thanks was given to the Karachi Spiritual Assembly, to the Hazirat-ul-Quds Committee, to the Bahá'í Community, to His Honor, the Mayor of Karachi, and to the visitor from distant shores who proved by her presence the cementing and unifying power of the Bahá'í Faith. With the chanting of another prayer this happy service was terminated."

Bahá'ís all over the world share with the Karachi friends the joy and satisfaction in the completion of this Hall, and Western Bahá'ís will be particularly happy to learn that a distinguished Bahá'í teacher and lecturer from the United States had the great privilege of participating in this historic event.

Indeed, we may truly say, "What hath God wrought?" Very wonderful spiritual history is continually in the making, demonstrating the efficacy of the Bahá'í Teachings in which many statements similar to the following are to be found:

"The souls who followed Bahá'u'lláh from every nation have become as one family, living in agreement and accord, willing to sacrifice life for each other. The Muhammadan will give his life for the Christian, the Christian for the Jew, and all of them for the Zoroastrian. They live together in love, fellowship and unity. . . . If you should attend a meeting in the East you could not distinguish between Christian and Mussulman; you would not know which was Jew, Zoroastrian or Buddhist, so completely have they become fraternized and their religious differences been leveled. . . . What God-inspired progress! Ere long you shall witness that the rays of the Sun of Bahá'u'lláh have illumined the Orient and the Occident."

CRIERS OF THE DAWN

DORIS MCKAY

*This heart-appealing story, as set forth by the gifted author of this article, is based on "Nabíl's Narrative" which has been recently published under the title, "The Dawn-Breakers". This book, translated by Shoghi Effendí, constitutes an authentic history of the early days of the Bahá'í Cause.

OUR forefathers, held close, like the infants they were, to the heart of Nature, heard the rhythmic beating of that heart in cycles great and small. The span of time between flaming dawns and starry nights, between the cold of winter and the heat of summer, between florid birth and pallid death and the yearly rise and fall and rigidity of rivers, proclaimed to untutored ears: I go but I come again. Night went; day went; youth and age went; summer and winter went, and something returned always to take the place of that which had gone.

We, who are born to the edifice built by time, see the great Days and Nights of those people who are borne along with the great periods of time called Ages. For those too, nights come, days follow, winters come and springs follow, death comes and Resurrection follows.

There was such a night in Persia. It had been hundreds of years in duration, a night of darkened minds, of dreams of atavistic strivings for supremacy, of delusion and distorted fancy. For in the middle of the last century the great land of Persia, once a powerful and illustrious nation, was in a state of moral and religious decadence. Here were despotism, injustice, cruelty, complacency and conceit, formalism, fanaticism, inefficiency, stagnation—behind all there was the dread of those who fear to fall from high places. The church was Islám; the state was Islám. These throttled each other with the stranglehold of fear. Over the confusion was spread a splendid, ostentatious mantle of crimson spun with gold. Here were winter, night and death.

HE "who causeth the mornings to break forth" had decreed a dawn for that night. For over a quarter of a century a light had been burning in the soul of Shaykh Ahmad-i-Ahsá'i, causing it to twinkle in the darkness like the Morning Star it was. From his island home beyond the Persian Gulf, Shaykh Ahmad's heart had been wrung with anguish because he saw Islám broken with sects, its holy name degraded with strife and corruption. Then had dawned the conviction that he, by reason of the illumination which had been conferred upon him, had a sublime calling; he must leave home and kindred and call to the followers of Muhammad to prepare the way for Him Who alone could awaken the people from their troubled slumbers. He had left all behind him and journeying through the cities of Iráq had won honor and renown—had become known as a great religious light. At last he entered into Persia the possessor of a secret. He made allusions to this secret knowledge but guarded its full import until the time when the veils might be finally removed. What he felt was the intimation of Dawn and a yearning took possession of his entire being which impelled him in the direction of the city of Shíráz. In this city, where his heart had found its abiding place, he said to the people: "Among you there will be a number who will live to behold the Glory of a Day which the Prophets of old have yearned to witness."

In Yazd, which city Shaykh Ahmad next visited, Siyyid Kázim came, a young man of twenty-two, noted for his learning, his piety, his humility, drawn thither by a dream. How joyfully Shaykh Ahmad greeted him who was to share his mission. He left his disciples with the young man, first in Yazd, at a later time in Karbilá, where he said in parting, ". . . verily I say the hour is drawing nigh, the hour I have besought God to spare me from witnessing, for the earthquake of the last hour will be tremendous." Shaykh Ahmad died at the age of eighty-three while Siyyid Kázim, his chosen successor, awaited the appearance of a Youth around Whose advent his very life revolved.

IT WAS dawn and Shaykh Hasan-i-Zunvzí, disciple of Siyyid Kázim, found himself walking with his master through the streets of Karbilá. The Siyyid explained the reason for his early summons: "A highly esteemed and distinguished Person has arrived. I feel it incumbent on us both to visit Him."

At the door of a house a Youth was waiting for them. Upon His head was the green turban of a descendant of Muhammad. Hasan saw Him embrace Siyyid Kázim, saw his erudite master speechless and bowed before the loving-kindness of the Youth Who so greeted him. They entered an upper chamber of the house, fragrant with choice perfume and bedecked with flowers. Their Host gave them to drink from a silver cup while quoting these words from the Qur'án: "A drink of a pure beverage shall their Lord give them." These were His only words. Soon after Hasan was again upon the street marveling at the strange meeting which he had witnessed.

Three days later Hasan saw the Youth seat Himself in the midst of the disciples of Siyyid Kázim. He sat near the threshold and listened to the discourse. The sunshine fell in a little pool in His lap. When the Siyyid beheld Him he fell silent until a disciple begged him to resume his unfinished lesson. Siyyid Kázim answered, "What more can I say? Lo the Truth is more manifest than the ray of light that has fallen in that lap."

"Why is it", persisted the importunate one, "that you neither reveal His name nor identify His person?"

Again, Hasan watched the Youth at the Shrine of the Imám Husayn, ere His departure for Shíráz. He saw Him wrapt in His devotions, tears pouring from His eyes, angelic words of adoration pouring from His lips. He saw the pilgrims turn and gaze at Him and unseal the fountains of their tears. He felt his own heart captured and afame with the contagion of that ardor. He was not to forget the haunting and unearthly beauty of that unknown Youth of Shíráz.

IN THE LAND of Persia the stillness and the darkness deepened. A few felt the stirring of a celestial breeze; a few were listening intently, their eyes strained toward the horizon. One of these was Mullá Husayn, disciple of a departed master, for Siyyid Kázim had passed from this life. With the approach of Dawn the Morning Star had waned. In January of the year 1844 (the "year 60" of Muhammadan tradition,) Mullá Husayn returned to Karbilá from a mission on which Siyyid Kázim had sent him. He was a dynamic figure of faith among the bereaved and bewildered disciples of that great leader. Siyyid Kázim had frequently in the days past alluded to the "secret" and the "mystery" of which Shaykh Ahmad had spoken, and to the time when it should be made manifest. Ere his parting he admonished them: "Scatter far and wide, and detach yourselves from all earthly things, and humbly and prayerfully beseech your Lord to sustain and guide you. Never relax in your determination to seek Him Who is concealed behind the veils of glory. Persevere till the time when He, who is your true Guide and Master, will graciously aid you and enable you to recognize Him" Mullá Husayn recalled them to the spirit and the letter of these instructions. He exhorted them to a quest like that for the Grail, the success of which, was incumbent upon prayer, renunciation, purity.

Leaving behind him this appeal, Mullá Husayn proceeded on his journey, but not before, as a preface to his holy adventure, he had fortified himself with forty days of retirement, fasting and vigil. When his spiritual preparations were complete, he and his two intimate companions rode out in the direction of Bushir, on the Persian Gulf. Here, for the first time did the traveler feel an inner registration of approaching nearness to his Beloved for Whose meeting he yearned. As if drawn by a spiritual magnet he hastened to Shíráz. As Shaykh Ahmad, years before, had been called away from the cities of Iráq to this Persian city, so now did Mullá Husayn respond to that same appealing force. At length the three companions stood before the gate of the city. There Mullá Husayn tarried for a while, sending his brother and nephew into the city ahead of him.

Deep in thought he walked beside the city wall. From above the wall tall cypress trees cast shadows on the sand. He saw the pools of the shadows transfused with purple and blue. Irradiated dust glinted in the slanting rays of the late afternoon sun. Then was Mullá Husayn, traveler in the Path of God, aroused from his reverie by the sudden appearance of a radiant Youth Who came to him through the gold and the purple, with welcoming words and a tender embrace. Not understanding but compliant to the will of this Youth, Mullá Husayn went with Him to His home, becoming more and more astonished at the beauty, grace and authority of his unknown Host. Intuitions and feelings deep in the consciousness of Mullá Husayn began to unfurl their signals. "Might not my visit to this house," he asked himself, "enable me to draw nearer to the Object of my quest? Might it not hasten the termination of a period of intense longing, of strenuous search, of increasing anxiety, which such a quest involves?" A premonition of joy thrilled him.

Later Mullá Husayn was to look back upon a night of wonder and of awe. He was to behold the Hand of the Almighty as a shaper of Destiny; he was to feel himself caught up in that destiny. That night interpreters of prophecy were on the hilltops waiting—in the morning they laid away their ascension robes thinking He had not come. Only one man's ears heard the sounding of that Trump. That man was Mullá Husayn who, all unwittingly, had kept his appointment with the Beloved of the Worlds.

With what passion he had prayed in the Youth's presence: "I have striven with all my soul, O my God, and until now have failed to find Thy promised Messenger. I testify that Thy word faileth not, and that Thy promise is sure."

For Mullá Husayn's comprehension was temporarily to desert Him after the manner of a universe of doubters, who, when they behold One who cries, "Lo! I am He", stray off into byways bewildered by the splendor of the Light. He related to his Host the conditions of his quest, and heard these words, too, too marvelous to accept: "Behold all these signs are manifest in Me!" Trembling at his temerity, he sought proofs with his intellect—remembered the plan he had with which to test the Promised One. Suddenly he found himself in the midst of a rain of melodious words. He saw and heard Revelation! Words, pouring from the lips of that radiant Countenance; words, streaming with incredible rapidity from the racing pen. Features, limbs, movements, intonations, proclaimed, beyond all doubts and arguments, Himself to be that Word. The Divine Reality, abstract, impersonal, hidden behind a hundred thousand barriers of light, had again taken residence in a human temple.

THE NIGHT was in our reckoning the twenty-third of May, 1844. It was two hours and eleven minutes after sunset. "This night," He declared, "this very hour, will in the days to come, be celebrated as one of the greatest and most significant of all festivals. Render thanks to God for having graciously assisted you to attain to your hearts desire, and for having quaffed from the sealed wine of His utterance . . ."

In an attempt to describe his experience, Mullá Husayn was later to say, "All the delights, all the ineffable glories, which the Almighty has recorded in His Book as the priceless possessions of the people of Paradise—these I seemed to be experiencing that night." On the third hour after sunset, food was brought to him which seemed to him like "the fruits of Paradise". Throughout the rest of the night, he was in a timeless world, as he listened in ecstasy to the peerless utterance that poured in an unstinted flood of jewels, of music, of light. He was aroused only when the muadhhdhin sounded the call for morning prayer.

Before Mullá Husayn took his tremulous departure these words were addressed to him: "O thou who art the first to believe in Me! Verily I say, I am the Báb, the Gate of God, and thou art the Babu'l-Báb, the gate of that Gate." As he left that door, which symbolized the Door which had been opened "to all in the heavens and in the earth" gladness and strength animated his limbs, exultation expanded his bosom. He has said, "I seemed to be the Voice of Gabriel personified, calling unto all mankind: 'Awake, for, lo! the morning Light has broken. Arise, for His Cause is made manifest. The portal of His Grace is open wide; enter therein, O peoples of the world! For He who is your promised One is come!'"

THE SUCCESSIVE MANIFESTATIONS

ANNIE B. ROMER

SPLIT an atom and you will find a universe", said Bahá'u'lláh, Prophet of the new age, writing nearly three-quarters of a century ago and anticipating by nearly that time the discoveries of science in the field of atomic physics.

The Bahá'í teachings—always in line with science, in fact blazing the way for the savants of science to follow—state clearly that the physical development of man has been evolutionary.

This teaching, it may be said, is not out of harmony with that of any of the revealed religions. God is the Creator. He createth in whatsoever way He willeth, and if He has chosen to bring man up through the evolutionary stages, as has been the case with the animal, He is none the less the creative impulse and the method of the creation is of secondary importance.

The important thing is to find in God the origin, the beginning, of all things, the source of all creation, the essence of existence, the Father of all, the inspirer of all true religions, the guidance of creation and its highest known product, mankind, down through the ages.

As the physical development of mankind has been evolutionary, so has his spiritual development.

Back in the darkness of primeval man's existence his vision must necessarily have been limited by his physical surroundings. He saw as far as his physical eye could see, and no further. Within him, however, as God had purposed, were the potentialities of a larger vision; of higher things. These had not yet been revealed to him. And in his primitive state it was not possible for him to perceive much of spiritual things.

It was God's great purpose, however, for him to develop, and the method of that development is for the first time in the world's spiritual history made clear by the revelations of the Teacher for this enlightened age, Bahá'u'lláh, the most recent of the series of Manifestations through whom the Essence of Creation has spoken to His creatures.

OUT of the murk of prehistoric antiquity, then, we are shown by this revelation, when man's physical and mental development had progressed sufficiently for him to begin to learn his lesson, came at length the first gleam of light for the soul which was his real animating and moving force.

Man's spiritual eye at this stage must have been exceedingly dim. It could not bear too strong a light. But light it must have, in God's scheme for man's spiritual development.

And light, in fact, it did receive, but a reflected light, not the direct, overpowering beam from the Sun of Existence, which must have blinded it. In His wise providence the Creator provided a medium through which such Truth as man was fitted to receive might be imparted to the struggling creature which was to grow into the mentally developed and spiritually matured product which we can but feel is the state of mankind today, imperfect though it still is in so many ways.

From the Sun of Existence, then, was thrown off an orb, which gave to mankind his first inkling of the higher life that he was capable of living and destined to live. Through what personality this light was projected we shall never know. Its identity has been lost in the mists of antiquity. And it is not particularly important that we should know.

Without doubt, however, this first reflected Source of light was followed by others, as man developed in spiritual consciousness and became fitted to receive more and more of the divine revelation.

There may have been scores, there may have been hundreds, of these prehistoric teachers, these inspirational spotlights which flooded the humanity of their day with so much of the dynamic force of the Divine essence as it was successively fitted, from age to age, to receive.

WE COME, at last, to the time when man's development had progressed far enough for him to begin to have traditions—to transmit, at least by word of mouth, the impressions, the occurrences, of his generation, his age, down to his successors. And finally, in the recorded words of the earliest times known to history, we strike a name.

The name is that of Adam, for so long the traditional father of the human race, but perhaps, in the light of what we now know, simply the earliest of God's Manifestations of spiritual force to have been known by a name that has lived.

The Voice of God had spoken down through the ages, the light of the Eternal had been shed through who knows what mediums. But with the dawn of history, even though imperfectly recorded and so often savoring of mere tradition, that Voice began to speak, that light began to be imparted, through mediums whose identities have happily been preserved to us in the Holy Books which many lands and many peoples have produced.

To the Hebrew Scriptures we owe the debt of preserving for us those wonderful names which to Jew and Christian, are a source of light and inspiration—the names of Abraham, of Moses—who can but be considered true Manifestations of the Creative Essence.

God was speaking to His creatures; teaching them the way of life here; leading them on to an appreciation of what their soul life really meant; guiding them, step by step, degree by degree, to comprehension of the cosmic scheme of existence and knowledge of the life hereafter.

And, contrary to what some of us were taught, at least inferentially and sometimes very positively in our earlier religious training, the Voice of the Creator thrust itself out in the direction of not merely one race or one people. The light from the Sun of Existence shone not alone upon Palestine, but upon India, upon China, upon Persia, upon all parts, indeed, of the then known and inhabited world.

Increasing knowledge of history, in fact, is showing that gleams of religious light must have been shed even in those parts of the globe which were unknown to the chroniclers of events in the habitable world of the East. God is no picker and chooser. He is the Father of all His beings and not neglectful of the development of any of His creatures.

WHAT IS veiling such multitudes from the truth as revealed by Bahá'u'lláh today is their persistence in clinging to the "single manifestation" idea—the idea of an exclusive revelation, a revelation through one channel alone, and the tenacious holding to the belief that the Voice of the Creator stopped making itself heard two thousand years ago.

The Voice has always been the Voice of God, ringing down the ages through His successive Manifestations. He rose to supreme power in the teachings of Jesus, in Whom the virtues and attributes of the Deity were reflected in perfection.

But as God had not begun speaking through Jesus—Jesus the man, the earth-dwelling individual and not the spirit which was manifested in Him, which is ever the same—so the Divine revelation did not stop with the completion by Jesus of His mission here.

Man has heard that Divine Voice calling all down through the course of his development—through Abraham, through Moses, to the people of Israel, in Persia through Zoroaster, in China through Lao Tse and his disciple Confucius; in India through the words of the ancient mystics and through Buddha; again in Palestine and throughout the world through Jesus; in Arabia through Muhammad, and now again from Persia, but with a universal message for mankind, the Gospel of the New Day and the fulfillment of all the prophecies, through Bahá'u'lláh.

This is the second installment in the series relating the story of the martyrdom of Vargha, the Persian Bahá'í. In the first part, published in the June number, the author gave a summary of Vargha's family history including copies of the Tablets (letters) of Bahá'u'lláh addressed to them.

THE great visit in 'Akká came to an end and the little group started for Tabriz. On the way they went by Mazraeh, near 'Akká to visit the grave of Ali Muhammad Vargha's father; for years before his father, Haji Mulla Mehdi, with the latter's two sons, one of whom was Ali, had started to visit Bahá'u'lláh in the great Prison in 'Akká. They had walked the long distance from Persia, but the journey was too hard and Haji Mehdi had died here in Mazraeh so near to his heart's destination, 'Akká, which place he never reached. The others had gone on to see Bahá'u'lláh. So the reader will see that Ali Muhammad Vargha had had the great bounty to visit Bahá'u'lláh when he himself was still a boy. It is no wonder then that he had come again and brought his little sons. They prayed at the grave of Mr. Vargha's father, and they remembered with thankfulness that Bahá'u'lláh Himself had come several times to that tomb in Mazraeh to pray for their beloved relative.

When they were home again in Tabriz matters did not go quite smoothly. Ali Muhammad's wife's mother was very much against the Bahá'í Cause. She instigated one of their servants, brought up in the home from childhood, to kill her son-in-law. Secretly, however, the servant was a Bahá'í, so he went and told his master to leave the house, because if he stayed the mother-in-law would certainly get some one else to put her son-in-law to death. So Ali Muhammad Vargha left home and went to stay with a Bahá'í believer. His mother-in-law went to the Mulla and asked him to give an order that her son-in-law might be killed because he was a Bahá'í. The Mulla replied, "He has not confessed to me that he is a believer, I cannot condemn him. If you can prove to me that he is a Bahá'í, I could issue a death verdict against him."

So the grandmother took little Ruhu'lláh with her to see this Mulla. Ruhu'lláh used to speak to everybody and he was a celebrated little teacher. His grandmother told him she was taking him to the home of a friend of his father and that their host was a Bahá'í. So when the child went in he held out his little hand and said: "Alláh-u'Abhá!" The Mulla was astonished at such a salutation, but the grandmother made a sign to him not to say anything. She asked Ruhu'lláh to pray some of his Bahá'í prayers which his father had taught him. The child at once prayed the daily prayer and then he prayed a long one, one of the most deep and beautiful prayers ever revealed by Bahá'u'lláh. After the little boy had finished the Mulla said: "Those prayers are wonderful, no father should be put to death who has trained a child like this one!" and he refused to issue a verdict for the death of Ali Muhammad Vargha.

Ruhu'lláh's grandmother on his father's side of the house was very different. Her husband had had a Bahá'í teacher come to speak with her (which he did without seeing her, for she sat behind a curtain to receive her lessons). When she heard about the Bahá'í Cause and that a Prophet had appeared she said, "We are not waiting for a Prophet; I have studied all the Books, and we are waiting for a Manifestion of God." The teacher had used the word "Prophet" so as not to startle her, but to try to tell her gradually that the great World Teacher was here, but she was an apt pupil and more ready than he thought to receive the Truth. She at once became a believer.

ONE DAY in Tabriz, a group of distinguished Bahá'ís were speaking together about who would be the successor of Bahá'u'lláh. Ali Muhammad Vargha said it would be 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Another said it would be the secretary and a third held the opinion that it would be Muhammad Ali, another son. Ali Muhammad Vargha said; "Bahá'u'lláh has stated that if there is anything which we do not understand we should write to Him," so he sent a petition asking this question. Bahá'u'lláh at once wrote back saying that it would be 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Azizollah Vargha has this tablet.

Then Ali Muhammad Vargha wrote a second letter to Bahá'u'lláh asking that not only he but that one of his sons might be a martyr in the path of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Greatest Branch. Bahá'u'lláh replied to this petition and accepted their sacrifice, which means that they could become martyrs. The family moved about from place to place because he was a Bahá'í teacher and traveled throughout Persia.

Once, when the times were very dangerous a lovely Bahá'í woman near Tihrán took Azizollah and Ruhu'lláh into her own home to try to protect them. This was when the Vargha family was living in Tihrán. The husband of the Bahá'í, who was not a believer, though he was a celebrated lawyer and a great statesman, objected to having the children in the house. He said: "You cannot do this, we too, shall be killed."

His wife replied: "Let me ask you something. If a man has been a butcher for forty years and in a dark night some one gives him a dog to kill instead of a lamb, do you think he would make a mistake and kill the dog instead of the lamb?" Her husband said, "No." Then she answered: "Be assured you will not be murdered instead of a Bahá'í". She kept the children for several weeks and during that time nothing happened to any of them.

Ali Muhammad Vargha took his two children, Azizollah Vargha, who was thirteen years old, and Ruhu'lláh Vargha who was eleven, and went again to 'Akká in 1895 to visit 'Abdu'l-Bahá. (Bahá'u'lláh had passed on in 1892.) Valiollah Vargha the youngest child was left at home. There were many happy incidents during the days spent with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but I wish to relate one which though not quite so pleasant at the moment, reveals 'Abdu'l-Bahá's great character, the quickness of a father to obey and the wisdom of little Ruhu'lláh.

were playing together when one little boy uttered a naughty word; Ruhu'lláh quickly slapped him on the mouth saying he deserved punishment. This child who had said the word was the son of a great martyr and since he had come to 'Akká he had been very favored by the Holy Family and all the believers. The other children marched in a body with this little boy to tell Ruhu'lláh's father and to complain about this matter. Ruhu'lláh, when he saw them going, ran into the court and up the prison stairs, through the open door into 'Abdu'l-Bahá's room and sat down close beside Him. 'Abdu'l-Bahá was by the window writing Tablets. As soon as Ali Muhammad Vargha heard the children's story he started out to find his son. Going into the court, he saw Ruhu'lláh sitting beside 'Abdu'l-Bahá upstairs near the window. He motioned him to come down. Ruhu'lláh was vigorously nodding "no", and 'Abdu'l-Bahá attracted by this motion said, "Why are you nodding out the window?" Then Ruhu'lláh related the whole story of how he had slapped the little boy on the mouth and said he knew if he went down to the court his father was going to punish him. 'Abdu'l-Bahá called the father to come upstairs and said very sternly: "No one must say anything to Ruhu'lláh about this matter!" Usually 'Abdu'l-Bahá was very careful that children must obey their parents, but He repeated it a second time: "No one must say anything to Ruhu'lláh about this matter!" From that time on Ali Muhammad was very respectful to his little son Ruhu'lláh and he never again reproved him for anything. He was a good father and Ruhu'lláh was a good son; he never consciously did wrong.

'Abdu'l-Bahá during this visit gave Ruhu'lláh the title "Mobaleq"—which means "a teacher of religion", a Bahá'i teacher. When the family returned to Persia they went to live in Zanján which is situated in the northern province of Azarbaiján. The father, Ali Muhammad Vargha, wrote to 'Abdu'l-Bahá from Zanján and Ruhu'lláh who was continuing diligently his study of Persian writing, sent two lines of copy for 'Abdu'l-Bahá to see what progress he had made. When the answer came to the father's letter, there was a Tablet enclosed for Ruhu'lláh who at that time was eleven years old. The Tablet was in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's own handwriting and was as follows:

"He is the Most Glorious!"

"O thou who art nearer to the sucking age! The impression of the musk-like writing of that sign of the Love of God (Ruhu'lláh) was seen. Verily, in a short time thou hast improved greatly, and seeing this great progress is the cause of my joy and happiness. Certainly thou must try thy utmost that thy writing may become better day by day and in the world of writing it may become the glory and the bounty of the Supreme Pen!

"Always I must hear from thee, and thou must describe and explain about those whom thou dost teach (spiritually). Upon thee be Bahá! Signed: E. E."*

When Ali Muhammad Vargha read this Tablet, with great reverence and solemnity he knelt with forehead to the floor and said: "This is the son who will give his life as promised by Bahá'u'lláh, because a pen of wood could not have such an effect,—the effect of the Supreme Pen would be the mighty pen of martyrdom."

MENTAL HEALTH AND THE NEW WORLD ORDER

GENEVIEVE L. COY, PH.D.

In the first and second installments of this very helpful series, published in the June and August numbers respectively, the author defined briefly and clearly what constitutes mental health, detailing certain attitudes which must be avoided by one seeking a fully integrated personality, and giving suggestions along lines of positive effort in this direction. The article which follows concludes this significant treatise.

THE two greatest positive factors in producing mental health as means for combating negative factors, have been already implied in the preceding installments, and will now be described in full.

1. The first of these is to be found in the individual's life work. To find the kind of work to which a man can give his best self wholeheartedly is the surest foundation of an integrated personality. William Burnham has written a book called "The Normal Mind", which is a clear and fine presentation of the point of view of mental hygiene. The essence of this book of several hundred pages is in the author's presentation of the value of a man's work. The essential conditions for happy living, writes Burnham, are three, "a task, a plan, freedom. 1. Perhaps all will agree that the first essential is a suitable task. 2. The second essential is a plan. A mere task without a plan is likely to be mere movement, unco-ordinated activity. A plan makes the action purposeful activity. If a child makes his own plan, that develops interest and initiative. 3. This suggests the third essential, freedom—freedom to take a task or leave it, freedom to form one's own plan." (p. 212) "The most important preventive of mental disorder is a suitable task; and the greatest thing for an individual, the ordinary man, or man of talent, or even the genius, is some great task worth while as a life work." (p. 226)

It is obvious that the educator has a great responsibility in helping young people find the life work in which each can best use his abilities. An intelligent and scientific effort in this direction has only just begun. The time when the majority of people can realize their best selves in their work lies in the future, for we have not yet squarely faced the social need of a new type of civilization in which it shall be possible for each person to do work he loves to do. Until such a new world order comes into being, we shall still be confronted with thousands of partially disintegrated personalities,—ineffectual and unhappy men who may have a task, but no freedom to plan.

If an individual, through force of circumstances, is unable to find work to which he can give himself, his only safeguard lies in his use of his leisure time. Under present conditions, the value of a creative avocation cannot be overestimated. Not long ago I was talking with an intelligent Negro who said that he was a truck-driver; then he added, "I sing in a choir in Harlem." It was evident that he had found in his singing an outlet for desires and abilities which his day's work could not have satisfied. The value of creative leisure activity is not limited to the person who is doing work which does not interest him. Many people who are happy and effective in their daily work yet feel that many of their abilities are unused. A wise use of leisure will contribute to the growth of any personality. By "wise use" it is implied that the person spends his free time in some activity in which he makes constructive and whole-hearted use of abilities not employed in his daily work. A gifted doctor spends some of his leisure in wood-carving. An intelligent teacher, who has spent a busy day with little children, enjoys going into her kitchen at night and cooking an appetizing dinner for some friends. A clever seamstress spends some of her free time in raising Persian kittens. A great organist gives several hours a week to work with a club of boys in a church club-room. Who can doubt but that each of these people is finding mental health in these leisure activities as well as in his work?

2. THE SECOND positive essential for mental health is that the individual shall have a conscious ideal of a social and spiritual life for society. In fact, without this he is handicapped in choosing his life work; for this work, in order to be truly integrating, must be such that in it he realizes, not his most animal qualities, but his best and most human self. But he cannot choose his "best" unless he has accepted some ideal goal for mankind. The purposes by which he is to guide his life, he may describe as his philosophy or his religion. In order really to serve as an aid in the integrating of his personality his goals must be consciously and fully accepted as true for him; they must not be taken over uncritically from his parents or friends. They must be so much himself that they become the most dynamic guiding force in his life. The greater value of religion as against philosophy, for this purpose, lies in the fact that true religion commands the allegiance not only of the mind, but also of the heart.

IN THE BAHÁ'Í way of life all the essentials for mental health are found. In accepting the Bahá'í faith, each has realized that in it he has discovered a movement in which his own desires and abilities can be most completely unified. He has found the outline of a pattern of living which he recognizes as answering to his deepest needs. He is compelled neither by fear, nor by desire for profit or position. He is a Bahá'í because in the new world order of Bahá'u'lláh he finds himself most completely "at home".

Bahá'ís have "a task, a plan, freedom". They have the task of building a new spiritual civilization, on the ruins of material civilization. They have a plan of spiritual organization, through which this task can be accomplished. Within the great task are enough small "jobs" for every single individual. There is work for every sincere person. Each has freedom to choose his own task in helping forward the great plan. For each there is work in which he can most fully use his abilities. He knows himself part of a spiritual unity so great that he can give no place in his nature to disintegrating fears and self-centeredness.

How great the task to which Bahá'is the world over have pledged themselves may best be realized in the following words of Shoghi Effendi, "A world community in which all economic barriers will have been permanently demolished and the interdependence of Capital and Labor definitely recognized; in which the clamor of religious fanaticism and strife will have been forever stilled; in which the flame of racial animosity will have been finally extinguished; in which a single code of international law—the product of the considered judgment of the world's federated representatives—shall have as its sanction the instant and coercive intervention of the combined forces of the federated units; and finally a world community in which the fury of a capricious and militant nationalism will have been transmuted into an abiding consciousness of world citizenship—such indeed, appears, in its broadest outline, the Order anticipated by Bahá'u'lláh, an Order that shall come to be regarded as the fairest fruit of a slowly maturing age."

The true Bahá'í attains mental health,—a fully integrated personality—as he becomes an active, efficient happy part of the great spiritual harmony of life, as he becomes increasingly at one with the Divine Unity.

A MEMORANDUM ON WORLD PEACE

WALLACE R. FARRINGTON

President of The Pan-Pacific Union

"GENERALLY SPEAKING, we know that world peace will arrive when people of all nations can see and understand how utterly stupid is any other policy, how narrow and foolish are methods and programs that line us up to believe that one people, one nation, contain all the ability, all the intelligence, all the power in the world and that theirs is the God-given privilege and duty to swing the world into line or lick the world into line and kill off any that do not do as they are told.

"World peace today as I see it is theory. To bring it into general and universal practice calls for more intensive application of religious faith than many have dared to imagine. It calls for more education than the most zealous educational bureaucrat has found possible. It requires more mental elasticity than has been shown, except in spasmodic spots. It demands more plain garden variety common sense than most of us honestly believe the human race is capable of exercising in our day and generation.

"EVERYONE AGREES that world peace is the goal to be attained. World peace challenges the best minds of the world because it is regarded as the achievement of the impossible.

“Telling people to be peaceful does not get us far. They forever ask whether there is anything in it for them. They must be shown, they must be convinced that peace will make life easier, happier, better.

“Religion is a medium for peace only as it accomplishes conversion. Some religions make bloodshed and destruction of the enemy the bright particular pathway to heaven. Faith without the right kind of works is like the man at the target range who could not hit the target. Asked what was the matter, he said, “I don’t know. The bullets are leaving here all right.”

“Someone has to convince the followers of some religions that the faiths of their fathers do not hit the mark.

“IT HAS BEEN discovered that trade is more successful when no attempt is made to get the best of anybody else, and it has been discovered that it is most successful when it utilizes all the resources of science so that it may bring the utmost possible benefits to everybody.”

“Upon that discovery, there is something more than a hope for world peace. World peace has now become not only a practical possibility, but the logical outcome of successful business methods. True, there may be another world war before business generally will discover the principles upon which business success now depends; hence, work for world peace must principally consist of helping the world to grasp and to apply these truths.”

serving the whole world. It does not and cannot leave anybody out of its benefits. It destroys antagonisms on the part of consumers by making prices as low as possible, and on the part of workers by making wages as high as possible, and it undermines the whole incentive to war by making world exchange as profitable to everybody as it can possibly be. It is destructive only of the fears and hatreds and traditions which keep human beings from cooperating.

“We need ideals and spiritual urge to inspire us to drive on, and to give us confidence in the future. Somewhere along the line, and better at the beginning of the line, it is necessary for us to visualize every individual as a substantial factor in this beautiful picture. Each one well fed, well clothed, well housed and generally comfortable, comfortable in mind and body. . . .

“We all know that faith without work is of little avail, so the salesmen for peace must be resourceful in economic plans and educational programs as well as skilled in drawing fine word pictures and dramatizing a world at work as against a world at war.

“The opportunity for peace in this economic field is tremendous and beckons the best minds to new struggles for glorious victories that must certainly lead to a closer approach to a permanent stabilized world peace.

“Here in Hawaii our particular mission is to expand the traditional influence of this world center, as one of the few places where various races and nationalities feel at home.”

Excerpts from an Address.--Pan-Pacific Bulletin.

THE COMING WORLD ORDER

An Introductory Article to the Bahá'í Cause

KENNETH CHRISTIAN

The following concise and enthusiastic statement of the Bahá'í Cause was submitted as an English theme by the author who is a college freshman. It seems worthy of a place in these pages as a contribution of our youth.

CIVILIZATION today faces a paradox the like of which there is no record. The past one hundred years are marked by an avalanche of inventions, discoveries, and accomplishments. We ride in autos, fly thru the air, travel under water, pick out of the atmosphere a voice coming from a city thousands of miles away. Progress in all lines of human invention has brought us great comfort and the promise of a more varied existence.

But events of the last few years have also brought the realization that our progress is being rapidly offset by the disintegration of institutions heretofore fundamental to society. Our economic system, praised as the zenith of human achievement in business relationships, is crashing about our heads. Seldom has a human institution failed so miserably to protect its adherents. The evils of our social system are easily discernible. Political corruption is rampant while justice seems to have lapsed into senility.

On one hand we are advancing rapidly, on the other failing ignominiously. Our highly vaunted civilization is tottering. And why? Why this disintegration, this economic and social decay? Our Reason cannot help conditions, for it has no power over the emotions of men. Present day Religion can offer no solution. In short, humanity is stumped.

It is in the face of this paradox that thoughtful men and women everywhere are making a serious study of those Teachings proclaimed over sixty years ago by Bahá'u'l-láh, prince of the Persian House of Nur. This great Sage, now recognized by increasing numbers of people throughout the five continents as the World Teacher for the present era, has presented to us the outline of a World Order which alone contains the answers to our present difficulties.

When the student first approaches the Bahá'í teachings, he is immediately impressed with their clarity, irrefutable logic, applicability, and completeness. The Bahá'í teachings constitute a written revelation. This fact is of tremendous importance because it eliminates the garbling of thought in hearsay repetition and also constitutes an unquestionable basis of authority.

The logic of the Bahá'í writings is startling. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has set up a standard of proof. Each matter should be tested four ways by these questions:—is it in conformity with reason, is it in accordance with scriptural proofs, is it acceptable to the senses, and, finally, is it agreeable to the promptings of the heart? Each of these in itself is liable to error. Therefore a thing is not true unless it stand all four tests. This is the standard by which truth is to be ascertained.

There are twelve Bahá'í principles, namely, religion the cause of unity, the abandonment of all prejudice, the independent investigation of truth, the agreement of religion and science, the solution of the economic question, the establishment of an International House of Justice, equality between the sexes, universal peace, universal education, a universal auxiliary language, the oneness of mankind, the fundamental oneness of all religions. The last two principles—oneness of humanity and the fundamental oneness of all religions—are basic in the Bahá'í Cause.

There is a completeness in the Bahá'í teachings which makes the acceptance of Bahá'u'lláh's Plan for a World Order inevitable. Every phase of human activity is considered. While there is complete agreement with science, the Teachings are not cold-blooded and matter of fact. A vital, potent aliveness, coupled with deep spiritual insight, makes them a haven for all types and conditions of people.

AS ALL Movements of moment and value have small beginnings, so the Bahá'í Movement began quietly (as far as the world at large is concerned) in Persia in 1844 with the announcement by a brilliant Youth, called the Báb, that the advent of a new Manifestation of God was at hand. The Báb was publicly martyred; and in 1863, the year prophesied by Him, one of His followers, Bahá'u'lláh, announced Himself as the Promised Manifestation. These early years are marked by horrible persecution on the part of the Muhammadan clergy and the Persian government. More than twenty thousand Bahá'ís were killed and tortured cruelly. Bahá'u'lláh was exiled to the penal colony at 'Akká in the Holy Land.

With the passing of Bahá'u'lláh, in 1892, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, His eldest son, was appointed the Center of the Covenant in His (Bahá'u'lláh's) will and Testament. According to this document 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Word is the same as Bahá'u'lláh's. In 1912 'Abdu'l-Bahá visited this country where He was well received by churches, social organizations, and progressive people.

'Abdu'l-Bahá passed to the supreme world in 1921 and in His Will appointed His grandson, Shoghi Effendi, as the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause. It is the function of Shoghi Effendi to preserve the purity of the Teachings and to be a center of unity for their promulgation. Shoghi Effendi, since his appointment, has been inaugurating among the Bahá'ís of the world the Administration outlined by Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. This Administration, now functioning in world-wide scope, is the beginning of the future organization of human society.

'Abdu'l-Bahá has written, "Every great Cause in this world of existence findeth a visible expression through three means: first, intention; second, confirmation; third, action." This last is the crying need of the world today for the Bahá'í Teachings supplies the intention. The sheer divineness of it all is the motivating power that confirms those who are working for its consummation, and the days of action are at hand as the world comes nearer and nearer to complete acceptance of the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh.

PROGRESS IN PERSIA

Bahá'is particularly, will be interested in the facts and findings in the following brief digest compiled from letters and reports sent to us by Mr. A. Samimi, Mr. A. M. Nabili and Zidru'llah Khadem, members of the "Unity of the East and West Bahá'í Committee" and of the Youth Association of Tihrán, Persia.

OSE who are watching for visible fruits of the Bahá'í Movement can do no better than to look to Persia, the land of its birth. Persia has a civilization back of her, but for centuries she has been stagnant, living on her past achievements. All her power, learning and wealth have been in the hands of a few, the government an absolute monarchy influenced always and often controlled by the most corrupt and fanatical religionists. While many of her beautiful arts and skills have been preserved, until recently she has had no part in the progress or use of modern science. Of His native land 'Abdu'l-Bahá says:

"In former times Persia was verily the heart of the world and shone among the nations like a lighted taper. Her glory and prosperity broke from the horizon of humanity like the true dawn disseminating the light of knowledge and illumining the nations of the East and West. * * * The Persians being distinguished among the nations of the earth as people of conquerors, and justly admired for their civilization and learning, their country became the glorious centre of all the sciences and arts, the mine of culture and a fount of virtues. * * * How is it that this excellent country now, by reason of our sloth, vanity and indifference, from the lack of knowledge and organization, from the poverty of the zeal and ambition of her people, has suffered the rays of her prosperity to be darkened and well-nigh extinguished?"

If the reader wishes an accurate picture of the miserable and degenerate conditions in Persia at the time of the birth of the Bahá'í Movement in the middle of the last century let him peruse Shoghi Effendi's introduction to his recent translation of the Dawn-Breakers, Nabil's Narrative of the early history of the Cause.

But now all things are changing, Persia has a constitution, the present ruler, His Imperial Majesty Reza Shah is liberal in his policies, roads are being built, schools are increasing, many of the youth are being educated in modern science in the schools and universities of Europe and America. The Bahá'is, who are estimated to make up an amazing part of Persia's population and who are all the time increasing, are no longer persecuted and can carry on their activities openly except possibly in certain remote and backward communities. In many cases we find Bahá'is highly respected and occupying high positions in the government and in other responsible places.

AN ACCOUNT recently received from Mr. A. M. Nabili gives us a closeup picture of what the Bahá'í youth are doing in Tihrán and makes us realize how fast the Bahá'í Cause is growing there under the new liberalism and what it is meaning in the education of young people. In the freer atmosphere which His Majesty Reza Shah is allowing in Persia we are having an opportunity to see the rapid spread of the Bahá'í Teachings and the results of the new life which these teachings are pouring into the youth. Instead of the religious fanaticism of the old Persia we find religion becoming the basis for social progress, intellectual attainments, physical development and health, high moral standards—in fact of everything which makes for the well-rounded man.

The Bahá'í youth of Tihrán are organized in a club known as “The Association of Bahá'í Youth”. Mr. Nabili says:

“This is a sort of a club but you shall find it a very unique kind of club for it has as its object the training of the young men on the Bahá'í lines of organization and preventing their being influenced by the general moral weaknesses.”

A careful study of this report shows how varied and far reaching are the activities of this “Club” and how much is involved in preventing “moral weaknesses”. The club is open to all Bahá'í youth from eighteen to forty in age, irrespective of color, nationality and former religious belief. Those applying for membership are introduced by two young men already members. The organization and administration is along Bahá'í lines. A Managing Body of nine has charge of all affairs of the association. This Managing Body is chosen by the Bahá'í Spiritual Assembly from nineteen who are elected annually by vote of all the members of the club.

The varied and far-reaching work of this very active organization is carried on by commissions of nine each appointed by the Managing Body. The name of some of these commissions will give an idea of the scope of the work of the association: The Library and reading Room Commission, The Education Commission, The Commission for Teaching the Cause, for Classes in Public Speaking, for Amateur Theatricals, the Sports Commission, the Social and Census Commissions. Other Commissions are Finance, Employment, Assistance, Commercial Institutions, Entertainment. This “Club” is indeed only a "sort of Club!" It would seem to be a whole school and welfare organization combined. A few quotations from Mr. Nabili's report will enable us to judge for ourselves whether Tíhrán Bahá'ís are alive to the needs of the age or not.

"Literature in the library is not limited to Bahá'í books but there are also other books by famous eastern and western writers on various subjects. The aims of this Commission are to get the youth acquainted with the Bahá'í literature, increase their general knowledge and do away with their need of applying to other sources for obtaining books and so save them from the possible danger of coming across useless or even harmful, but outwardly attractive, reading material."

The Education Commission organizes classes for teaching English and other languages, arts and craft, music, etc., publishes a bulletin (hung on the wall) every Bahá'í month (19 days) called "The Message of the Youth" in which is given news of activities of the Association and articles on the Cause and other useful general subjects. The latest activity of this Commission is the establishment of a class for teaching music on modern lines." This commission also arranges for dialogues on the lives of the Bahá'í martyrs and the great servants of the Cause. One of these was on the life of Varqá and his twelve year old son Ruhu'lláh*.

"A place has been appointed by the commission for Teaching the Cause, very centrally located, where once a week a teacher receives any seekers brought there by members of the association Among the general duties of the members is to bring at least one seeker of truth to this place in the year." Public conferences on the various teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are arranged by this commission, leaflets and pamphlets printed and distributed.

One of the most valuable activities, Mr. Nabili says, is the training in public speaking. There are two classes. "A competition is arranged between the two classes every three months. On one such occasion when the subject was Spiritual love as manifested in Bahá'ism, "the hall was overcrowded and you could not judge the good results unless you had been present for they were so great that no words could express."

A "Social and Census Commission" keeps a record of the members and is on the lookout for new members. It sponsors social gatherings for promoting acquaintance and friendship among the members.

Social occasions are provided for both by the Social Commission and Sports Commission. "Picnics, outdoor and indoor games, gymnastics, walks, matches with other teams and everything that helps the body and mind development and is not, like boxing, apt to create a desire for supremacy by force or immoral means" are arranged for and encouraged.

IN A LETTER dated June 19th from Zidrullah Khadem, secretary of "The Unity of the East and West Committee" we learn about the new hall or Hazirat-ul-Quds and are impressed with the rapid growth of the Cause in Tíhrán. He says:

"As you may know we are, since the last six months occupied building a hall, the Hazirat-ul-Quds, surrounded by nineteen rooms for general gatherings and sittings of various committees. The basements are finished and construction of the body of the buildings has risen about two yards. The hall not being finished yet we had to commemorate the Ridvan in the open air. Meetings were held on the first and second day comprising thousands of friends and others. These gatherings are of great importance to friends in Persia who in the past could not even meet in groups of fifty. It is a great occasion to watch the faces of all present illuminated with radiance of love, hope and affection. What a great contrast it makes with the past to see the non-believers coming to our Bahá'í meetings in large numbers. The Hazirat-ul-Quds is situated on one of the main streets outside the city and people seeing the friends proceeding in that direction some in public busses, some in taxis, others in private cars and still others in carriages, whisper to each other that Bahá'ís are celebrating a religious festival, and to see what is going on they, too, proceed thither. They are admitted into the Bahá'í meeting place with the spirit of that universal brotherhood which Bahá'u'lláh wants to be prevalent amongst all the children of Adam, and which they do not yet know is what they have been massacring us for."

WE CANNOT refrain from quoting further from this letter in regard to Bahá'í children who were gathered together on the ninth day of Ridvan:

"Joy felt by the friends knew no bounds when they heard small children recite some of their lessons while others, only big enough to be playing, discussed moral points, international questions and history of the Bahá'í Cause. The oldest of these students, about fourteen years of age, spoke for half an hour on the first law of the Book of Aqdas regarding knowledge of God through His Manifestations and how it should be accompanied by acting His commands else neither of the two is acceptable. The saying of Prophets of the past, reasserted in this Manifestation, that in this era the children seven years old are as wise as men of seventy of other times was indeed very evident on this occasion."

And again we quote this item of interest: "This Ridvan, for the first time, the Bahá'í Schools declared a two day's holiday, because it was a Bahá'í Feast, and got it and no questions were asked. We have every reason to feel encouraged. Our Bahá'í schools stand high with the Board of Education and the Muhammadan Community. We have over one thousand and children in both schools."

WHAT IS the cause of the rapid development among Persian youth, this interest in education, this use of western methods, this desire for progress in every direction? All their communications to us show that they are endeavoring day and night to carry out the instructions of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá Who have shown us how to adapt the spiritual laws of God to the needs of this age. Letters from Shoghi Effendi and the words of friends returned from visits to Shoghi Effendi constantly add to their inspiration. Large meetings were recently held in Tihrán to hear the messages brought by Mr. Alai, recently returned (to Persia) from Haifa. "The Guardian wishes the friends in Persia," says Mr. Alai, "to show a new spirit of energy and steadfastness in the way of serving the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh. We have to prove to the world the truth and genuineness of the Bahá'í principles by deed and not by word only."

In this we see the beginning of the fulfillment of the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

"Praise be to God! She (Persia) became the East of the Sun of Truth in this age. The Light of Eternity dawned, the Everlasting Glory unveiled her countenance and the Reality of Mercifulness became manifest. This is the prosperity of Persia. Undoubtedly she will progress day by day under the shade of the Blessed Tree until her illumination shall penetrate throughout the wide expanse of the earth."

EXPERIENCES IN THE AIR

The author of this article describing a dramatic episode in the air, is an inventor in the field of aeronautics. He has had a varied career. He is an Australian, but has lived in this country several years. He heard of the Bahá'í teachings soon after coming here, and became a follower of this universal religion. Written as a letter, this material seems worthy of publication.

ASSOCIATED with a pilot of a company that uses several airplanes in its selling operations, I have had some interesting experiences. A recent flight to Boston was specially thrilling. There was very low visibility going up, so that air fields reported no callers in two days. We landed in rain at the Boston Airport after enjoying the glorious landscape around Providence—such a harmony of color, like a rare Persian carpet.

Coming back a strong head wind delayed us so that we had to decide, in the air, whether to land at an emergency field at dusk or push on with night settled down long before we could reach the home airport.

The pilot put it up to me, and I replied that it was all right with me either way, just to see what he would do. He asked if I had a box of matches. I had. There is no light on the instrument board, so we continued to strike matches periodically to see the meters throughout the length of Long Island.

What an eerie atmosphere it is in a cockpit suspended between earth and sky when the sun has gone behind a bank of threatening clouds, after the day has really closed its doors and windows, and there is a brief suggestive period just before the lights become visible below! It seems ominous, significant, a period of decision which makes contact with established solid forms slip away, and one's very life becomes dependent upon subtle invisible powers. The air feels suddenly—something more than just a little chillier, and the normal rhythmic tone of the motor sounds different—perhaps it is like the chromatic descent in Tosti's "Goodbye."

Then in the distance ahead a long row of street lamps flash on, giving a new horizon, and the spell is broken; the spirit is once more a prisoner of earth, but what a changed world!

We have been plunging forward at one hundred miles an hour all the time towards the crowded districts around New York; lights have flashed on quickly in all directions—jewels in the crown of night—and as far as the eye can see, it has become a fairyland, a dark world transformed by the genius of Edison. Now he has gone to the finer world of Light that casts no shadow. No wonder he is universally mourned, or rather revered.

What a view it is! Its cost must be a staggering figure, but worth whatever it is, and all should see it for its effect on the soul. Directly below the scene is more distinct and prosaic. Houses and streets are etched in flooding light. Electric sparks sputtering from car lines look like comets amongst the stars.

One thinks of the myriads of people in homes and theatres, unconscious of our flight through the larger space above them; and it is significant that from the height there is a tendency to feel detachment from the mass of life below. It seems so generalized. Spawn in the sea; fungus in a forest; humanity in cities; it seems all about the same from a great altitude. A foot can kick aside the fungus in its path with no compunction whatever.

That signifies what will happen in a war from the air, with attackers psychologically warped in the direction of destruction.

I felt the necessity for the definite act of will in holding the realization of the oneness of humanity and the obligations it imposes. How clearly it became a fact that man can progress scientifically far beyond his capacity to use his knowledge for safe and sane continuity. Without acceptance of a Universal Magnet in the compass of his motives to hold his other faculties on their proper course he will surely be lost.

And yet the wills must all be free. There's the rub. They must come to a state of completely free awareness of the necessity for the Magnet, and voluntary acknowledgment of it for direction. There is no substitute for experience, and many can only learn by going through the torture chamber of their own making. But I am wandering.

I started to write about getting home in the dark. It is a thrill to see the revolving beacon of the airport in the distance while there is nothing immediately below but packed house roofs to land on. But I have never had even the slightest fear in the air. In the tightest corner I am just keenly interested in how it will turn out.

We reached the field and started the usual left turn in to make a landing, and at that moment, the field light was turned out! These are circumstances in which piloting skill really begins to show itself, in what is done and how, on the spur of the moment. My friend throttled the motor and continued steadily in the gliding turn.

It is certainly a queer sensation settling down in black darkness at the speed of a train. I felt a most delightful tingling sensation of expectancy—of what—it did not matter at all. It was the nth degree of speculation on the unknown, keyed up by its concentration into a second of time. As soon as I knew the pilot's decision, I took the proper precautions, unlatched the door so that it could not be jammed, put on the belt, took the hold with my hands that would best protect my head, and quietly waited for the feel of the wheels on the ground if—

It touched and bounced. That gave the sense of touch on the control a basis for the necessary slight quick action. Another contact, and down went the tail for almost as good a landing as in broad daylight. The fellow in the hangar said he had been phoned by the boss to turn off the light as they did not expect any more in that night and he did not hear our motor. And that was all to that.

Up at five a. m. again for a take-off and over the mountains here.

THE BAHÁ'Í SUMMER SCHOOL AT LOUHELEN RANCH

ORCELLA REXFORD, B. SC.

"Bahá'w'lláh has drawn the circle of unity. He has made a design for the uniting of all people, and for the gathering of them all under the shelter of the tent of universal unity."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE unexpected sometimes proves to be the most satisfying. So it was with our first visit to Louhelen Ranch, the Bahá'í Summer School near Flint, Michigan, at its second summer session. We had other plans, but at the eleventh hour a friend urged us to go, so like the pioneers of old, scarcely knowing whither we were bound we set out in our car, from Chicago, where I had been lecturing, to attend this gathering of Bahá'ís.

We were instructed to take the road out of Flint to Davison, and then to make inquiries. We were all eagerness as we got on the proper route for we felt that every turn of the road might reveal the object of our quest. There is something exhilarating in the thought of meeting with the Bahá'í friends and we scanned each farm carefully lest we pass by. As we came round a curve in the highway we espied the name Louhelen Ranch on the barn and were at the end of a most pleasant journey through the lovely state of Michigan.

We drove up a winding driveway past a large white farm house around a circular drive in the center of which was a nine-sided building which housed the water-pump, showers and other conveniences.

Our host and hostess, Mr. and Mrs. L. W. Eggleston, who are developing their farm into a Bahá'í Summer School, gave us a warm welcome and assigned us to a room in one of the new cabins which had been erected at the rear of the house. Here we were most comfortable. Besides the four cabins there was a large two-story dormitory called Pullman Lodge, which took care of an unbelievable number of people, as well as the large farm house tent, and the log cabin down in the woods overlooking a miniature lake formed by the dam, —a delightful spot!

But even so the facilities of the ranch were taxed to their capacity, many coming who were not expected. However everything seemed elastic enough to stretch and let them all in. We marveled many times at the manner in which they were all housed and fed, knowing the great difficulties which had to be surmounted. Yet everything went along smoothly and easily as far as we could observe. All were deeply appreciative of the difficulties of taking care of such a crowd, and each I am sure resolved to help the situation out next time by making reservations in advance.

These friends had verily "come from the east and from the west, from the north and from the south" to study the reality of religion, to partake of spiritual food (the teachings of God), and to share this food with others. There were representatives from California, and Maine, and one believer was there who had recently returned from a trip around the world. Several who had met in Florida last winter were reunited here again. Nearby states supplied their quota; and Wisconsin, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Pennsylvania, New York, Washington, D. C. and Canada were also represented. It was a veritable home coming.

Of all the groups the most inspiring was the youth group, for young people made up nearly half of those present. Young college students as well as younger children were there—thoughtful, serious—attacking present day problems with the scientific knowledge at their command. Yet the lighter side of life was not neglected, for there were swimming and dancing parties at nearby lakes, horseback riding, the hikes in the

It was not however just the casual coming together of people who enjoy each other or who want a pleasant vacation in the country, but an earnest gathering of those interested in the realities of life, pioneers in a great spiritual movement which is to usher in a new era of civilization. Here we saw the spirit of sacrifice exemplified, the stretching of lean purse strings, the giving-up of long planned vacations in order to study together the best methods by which to disseminate our knowledge of how to heal the ailments of a sick world.

Keenly alert, wholesome, radiant, these young people were ready to go home and start to "do something", to turn the tide of affairs toward universal peace, universal education and the elimination of prejudice from every walk of life.

THE FIRST day was occupied with the outline of the teaching program for the coming year, closing with a consultation of all regarding the most successful methods of teaching. During the week there were classes in effective speaking; for the study of Nabil's Narrative, a marvelous book on the early days of the Bahá'í Cause; daily lectures on subjects of general interest which were open to the public; daily consultation periods; and in the evenings a camp-fire down in the woods where a small out-of-doors auditorium had been erected.

On the closing night of the conference the Youth presented us with an original play at last answering that old couplet of Burns, "O wad some Pow'r the giftie gie us to see oursels as Others see us". Each one of them "took off" one of the older ones present showing up some idiosyncracies. This furnished good-natured fun and hilarity for all who witnessed it.

The next day, Sunday, brought to a close a week of comradeship, in which we had drawn very close to one another. New friends had been discovered, our spirits were illumined and refreshed that we might go forth and apply our energies to solve the problems in which the world finds itself, the remedy for which has been supplied by Bahá'u'lláh Who has given us the solution to every one of these great problems and has promised us that when these are accepted and lived the "world will indeed become as a paradise and all men will live as brothers". We had just a little taste of what it might mean here at Louhelen Ranch, where the spirit of unity and harmony prevailed for a whole week and all appeared with radiant, happy faces, expressing the peace and joy within their hearts.

MAY WE share with you some of the gleanings from a cherished notebook, kept throughout the conference:—

"In youth we find the acceptance of challenge. As long as youth is present at this gathering, we need not fear for the future of this Cause."

"Many think that Universal Peace is impractical, a chimera. Nothing can be regarded as unattainable. The day will come when its beauteous light will shine on all mankind."

"In Shoghi Effendi's Goal of a New World Order there is outlined a change in society such as the world has never seen."

"Out of suffering comes the love of service."

"Whatever our problems, we can turn to the writings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá and find the answer."

"In every age we gain the higher consciousness by turning the mirror of our souls toward the divine Revelator and thus we gain illumination."

"Blessed is he who can recognize a Manifestation."

"The study of the Bahá'í writings is a short cut to education. The books are never dull, nor obscure, but are vital, life-giving, and create the mind anew."

Our readers will be glad to know that "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era" by Dr. Dr. J. E. Esslemont, is now available in the Swedish language through the devotion of two faithful Bahá'í sisters: the translation was done by Mrs. Rudd-Palmgren, and the entire cost of printing this first edition was paid for by Mrs. Louise Erickson of Brooklyn, N. Y. whose generous and long devoted service to the Bahá'í Cause is well known. Price $1.50, Bahá'í Publishing Committee, P. O. Box 348, Grand Central Station, New York City. The price in Sweden is five kronor.

REBUILDING THE WORLD

HUMANITY, whether viewed in the light of man's individual conduct or in the existing relationships between organized communities and nations, has, alas, strayed too far and suffered too great a decline to be redeemed through the unaided efforts of the best among its recognized rulers and statesmen—however disinterested their motives, however concerted their action, however unsparing in their zeal and devotion to its cause. No scheme which the calculations of the highest statesmanship may yet devise; no doctrine which the most distinguished exponents of economic theory may hope to advance; no principle which the most ardent of moralists may strive to inculcate, can provide, in the last resort, adequate foundations upon which the future of a distracted world can be built.

No appeal for mutual tolerance which the wordly-wise might raise, however compelling and insistent, can calm its passions or help restore its vigor. Nor would any general scheme of mere organized international cooperation, in whatever sphere of human activity, however ingenious in conception, or extensive in scope, succeed in removing the root cause of the evil that has so rudely upset the equilibrium of present-day society. Not even, I venture to assert, would the very act of devising the machinery required for the political and economic unification of the world—a principle that has been increasingly advocated in recent times—provide in itself the antidote against the poison that is steadily undermining the vigor of organized peoples and nations.

What else, might we not confidently affirm, but the unre-served acceptance of the Divine Program enunciated, with such simplicity and force as far back as sixty years ago, by Bahá'u'lláh, embodying in its essentials God's divinely appointed scheme for the unification of mankind in this age, coupled with an indomitable conviction in the unfailing efficacy of each and all of its provisions, is eventually capable of withstanding the forces of internal disintegration which, if unchecked, must needs continue to eat into the vitals of a despairing society. It is towards this goal—the goal of a new World Order, Divine in origin, all-embracing in scope, equitable in principle, challenging in its features—that a harassed humanity must strive."

“That which was applicable to human needs during the early history of the race could neither meet nor satisfy the demands of this day and period of newness and consummation. Humanity has emerged from its former degrees of limitation and preliminary training. Man must now become imbued with new virtues and powers, new moralities, new capacities.”

“Many people, I fear, today fail to realize the very critical period through which the world is passing,” warns Stanley Baldwin. “I confess that I am not sure, if a Wesley or a St. Francis arose today, that to found a body of preaching friars would not be the best thing they could do for the world.”

“Human wisdom has failed,” preaches Dr. Frank N. D. Buchman, leader of the Oxford Movement. “The modern world—disillusioned, chaotic, bewildered—demands a solution adequate to its disorder. The fundamental cause of all our troubles is personal selfishness and fear. Men must be changed if problems are to be solved. Leadership that is God-directed, this is our primary need.”

“Man is not yet spiritually ripe for the possession of the secret of atomic energy,” Sir Oliver Lodge declares. “Technically we are demi-gods, ethically still such barbarians that we would probably use the energy of the atom much as we used the less terrible forces that almost destroyed civilization during the last war.”

WHATEVER be the causes of the present chaos into which the world has fallen, many are agreed that a spiritual rejuvenation of humanity is the first requisite for reformation and stabilization. There must come to humanity a deeper sense of brotherhood—individual, national, and racial. Man must realize emotionally, as he already does intellectually, the actual interdependence of all peoples. No nation today can live unto itself. We are bound together by indissoluble ties.

This planet, sociologically and economically speaking, is plainly an organic unity. The prosperity of all depends upon the prosperity of one, just as the prosperity of one depends upon the prosperity of all. One nation cannot thrive while all the rest are plunged in economic disaster. Our modern industrial and technical civilization requires free and universal interchange of raw materials and commodities. The whole world as well as any part of it depends for its prosperity not only upon its ability to produce goods, but also upon its ability to sell goods. When any great nation is destroyed as a consumer of world-goods, the whole world suffers as well as that nation.

So it is within each country. The prosperity of the whole depends upon the prosperity of every part. Selfishness, aggressiveness, and exploitation on the part of one group not only does harm to other groups, but eventually returns like a boomerang to injure the offending group. The capitalist, taking more than his share of the profits of industry, finally harms himself by lessening the consuming power of the masses; and the masses, when usurping all power, deprive themselves of the leadership necessary for industrial organization and efficiency.

INTELLECTUALLY we realize these truths. But how ineffectual is that realization in the way of actually causing a change to occur in our economic and political institutions! These new ideals have not yet penetrated the emotional life of humanity deeply enough to motivate action. Self-seeking greed is still the strongest motive of conduct, and greed is ever shortsighted. A dollar held before the eye can shut out all the world.

When we realize how deep-seated and primitive is the acquisitive instinct in man—the tendency to greed—we can understand how this basic emotion naturally injects itself into the whole economic structure of life and how difficult it is of control. Yet until this baser, more primitive side of man's nature, is greatly moderated, there is danger that any economic reform, any attempt at ameliorating the faults in our economic institutions, will meet with failure for no institution can rise above the character of the men and women who constitute it.

WHAT, THEN, can cause man to sublimate this animal instinct of greed; for not until this is done can noble, equitable, and beneficent institutions be established. Man's emotional nature must be changed, sublimated, exalted. A world composed of the man-of-the-street as he is today cannot organize itself ideally. Whatever is attempted will fall under the stress of greed and exploitation. The cure of today will last only until another fever spell returns. The only permanent cure is a change in the motives and conduct of the individual.

What can bring about this change? Can we appeal to man's group intelligence and cause him to progress simply by the warning: "If you do not change your nature, you may suffer in the future?"

No, merely putting the facts before people is not going to idealize their mode of action. A higher force than this is necessary to change the course of this huge mass of humanity, with its immense momentum. And such a force must needs be a spiritual force, something capable of penetrating the heart of man and transforming it.

We have seen this occur in past epochs. We know that religion is the most powerful emotion that can grip the heart of man. We know that it is capable of possessing man's whole being, subordinating other emotions to their proper place.

Under the power of religion man becomes willing to forsake all personal aims, and dedicate himself to universal goals and ideals. Willing to dedicate not only his intelligence and strength, but even his life. That is what is needed today and many thoughtful people are seeing and saying just this.

IT IS EVIDENT that religion is the only force capable of welding together into an amicable working unity all the nations, races, creeds of the world.

“Human power is limited in its influence. It can unite two persons, or two tribes, or two communities, or at the utmost two nations. At the same time it confesses that this unity is temporal and may be abrogated by the whim of either of the high contracting parties.

“But the divine power unites nations and peoples and cements them together in the bond of brotherhood and peace for ages and cycles. . . . There must needs be divine power for the accomplishment of this universal aim. . . . Save through this, ideal communication will not be made possible between the children of men. They may achieve a temporal union for a few years. Men may so compound the various ingredients as to be promiscuously mixed together. But there must needs be the solvent so that they may become perfectly blended and united. In the human world that solvent is the power of the Holy Spirit which will thoroughly mix and blend the different constituents and elements representing the various nationalities, religions and sects.”*

*Abdu'l-Baha, “The Divine Art of Living,” p. 154.

WHEN we review history from the beginning of human existence to the present age in which we live, it is evident all war and conflict, bloodshed and battle, every form of sedition has been due to some form of prejudice, whether religious, racial or national, to partisan bias and selfish prejudice of some sort . . . prejudice is a destroyer of the foundations of the world of humanity whereas religion was meant to be the cause of fellowship and agreement.

“Religion must be the cause of love. Religion must be the cause of justice, for the wisdom of the Manifestations of God is directed toward the establishing of the bond of a love which is indissoluble. The bonds which hold together the body-politic are not sufficient. . . . The real bond of integrity is religious in character, for religion indicates the oneness of the world of humanity. Religion serves the world of morality. Religion purifies the hearts. Religion impels men to achieve praiseworthy deeds. Religion becomes the cause of love in human hearts, for religion is a divine foundation, the foundation ever conducive to life. The teachings of God are the source of illumination to the people of the world. Religion is ever constructive not destructive.”

BAHIYYIH KHANUM--AN APPRECIATION

ELLA GOODALL COOPER

The author, a loyal Bahá'í for many years—one of the pioneers of the Bahá'í Cause in this country—has made visits to the Holy Land, (several times accompanied by her mother, Mrs. Helen S. Goodall) and is numbered among the very first American pilgrims to visit 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She has had advantages which enable her to draw a fine pen picture of the noble and saintly sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá who was known as the Greatest Holy Leaf. This is a story which will be dear to the heart of every Bahá'í.

IT is now thirty-three years since that never-to-be-forgotten first pilgrimage to the *Most Great Prison*¹ was undertaken by a group of believers from the West and, while many details of the visit have faded into the background, there are certain events and personalities that remain clear and vivid in my memory, and which time seems powerless to efface. Next to meeting the Beloved Master Himself² was the privilege of meeting His glorious sister, Bahiyyih Khanum, known as the Greatest Holy Leaf. Her personality is indelibly imprinted upon my memory. Tall, slender and of noble bearing, her body gave the impression of perfect poise between energy and tranquility, between wiry endurance and inward composure, imparting to the beholder a sense of security, comfort and reliance, impossible to describe.

Her beautiful face was the feminine counterpart of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's the lines of suffering and privation softened by the patient sweetness of the mouth; the dominating brow, bespeaking intellect and will, lighted by the wonderful understanding eyes, in form like those of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but deep blue rather than hazel. Watching their expressive changes—as one moment they darkened with sympathy or pain, the next moment sparkled with laughter and humor—only served to deepen the impression of her irresistible spiritual attraction.

THE LADIES of the blessed family eagerly explained to us the loftiness of her spiritual station, which we instantly felt but could not analyze. They told us that Bahá'u'lláh had written for her a precious Tablet (letter) in which He had stated that so great was her spiritual attainment that her prayers would always be accepted at the Throne of God, and that her supplications and interventions for others would never fail to be answered. Thus she was set apart as the purest and most saintly of women, and through her He glorified the position of woman in this New Day. All this was recognized by the maid-servants, whether wise or simple, high or low. It was touching to witness their humble homage, scarcely less than that accorded 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself as, reverently touching her shoulder with lips and forehead, they would beg her to supplicate at the Holy Threshold in their behalf, the while their tears fell like rain.

Small wonder that such a strong

yet gentle quality of authority made her naturally the head of the household group that circled about 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She presided over the room called Ladies Room which was the center for all family gatherings, and where the women visitors were entertained. From the hour of the early morning tea, at which 'Abdu'l-Bahá was often present, to the last good-night, whispered by some weary yet grateful traveler, Khanum (as she was affectionately called) was ever in demand. During the long day, which began before six in the morning and rarely ended before eleven or twelve at night, there were frequent spontaneous gatherings in this general room, and save for the brief midday siesta, this association with the women constituted the only variation in the monotony of their prison lives. The spiritual peace and joy pervading these simple meetings was a new and unbelievable experience to us—the Western pilgrims.

The chanting of the sacred tablets by the Persian ladies, at the request of the Greatest Holy Leaf (who had thus made them happy) the murmur of low voices as news, generally tragic, was imparted, the bubbling of the friendly samovar as tea was handed around by the young serving maids, and, above all, the impalpable yet vibrant atmosphere of love and service made these meetings attract all including the children,—Shoghi Effendi among them, who slipped in for a little while and knelt quietly to listen. Even the birds seemed to feel the friendly spirit for they flew freely in and out through the open door leading to the court which was open to the sky.

THE GREATEST Holy Leaf was also custodian of the spiritual treasures of the family—(they had no material riches)—such as the sacred writings of Bahá'u'lláh and other revered relics belonging to Him and to some of the lamented martyrs. Under her care were the precious attar of rose, symbolizing the “fragrance of the Love of God,” the favorite perfume of Bahá'u'lláh,—and the collection of gold rings, set with stones of carnelian carved with the Greatest Name, the devout handiwork of the poor Bahá'is of Persia, who sent them to Khanum to be given to the pilgrims or new believers, at her own discretion.

Her authority, so real yet so humble, was instinctively accepted by the family of the Master, who sought her wise and loving counsel upon every occasion. In this way all cooperated to save the time and strength of 'Abdu'l-Bahá Whose life must be given to the service of all mankind, as they well realized. Even the believers of other lands, having come to know of her power through the accounts of the early pilgrims, have been wont to write her of their problems and beg her prayers at the Holy Shrines. And although she neither spoke nor wrote English, yet her influence, subtle and beneficent, has penetrated even to the far West, bringing courage and assurance to many a distressed soul.

DURING a later pilgrimage to 'Akká, when I accompanied my mother, we were privileged to view another aspect of the life of Bahiyyih Khanum. Having in mind the first picture of her purely spiritual activity, we found her life, like a finely-cut gem, had many facets, some of which we were yet to know. It happened that there were many Eastern pilgrims to be cared for and, consequently we had little opportunity of seeing Khanum, whose time was fully occupied with household tasks.

One day we caught a glimpse of her in the kitchen seated on a low stool, her firm, capable hands busy with a large lamb that had just been brought in from the market. Quickly dividing it, she directed which part was to be made into broth, which part served for the evening meal, which part kept for the morrow, and which sent to those poor or incapacitated friends who were daily supplied from 'Abdu'l-Bahá's table. On the shelves were huge pans holding rice soaking in clean water to be ready for the delicious pilau (a famous Persian dish), and there were many other visible evidences of the hours of preparation necessary to provide for the material welfare of the visitors.

It was then we learned of her practical efficiency. The enormous amount of work attendant upon such entertaining with only the crudest and most primitive facilities, must be seen to be appreciated. We learned that she had organized the household affairs, and each one of the Master's daughters took her turn at directing them for a week — planning the meals and marketing, and seeing that all was cooked and served to the different groups twice each day. Without running water, with only charcoal for fuel, with no gas or electricity for lighting, only oil,—the cleaning and filling of the lamps alone consumed a large amount of time and energy. I well remember seeing one day the array of lamps waiting to be filled and returned to their respective rooms. The tired little sigh with which one of the ladies was regarding them, told the story, and I thought how true it is that here in the East as well as in the West, "Woman's work is never done!"

Seeing this side of the character of the Greatest Holy Leaf, we recalled the answer made by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to one in this country who said to Him: "Please explain to me the story of Martha and Mary." He did not do this, but said: "It is My hope that you will revive the lights of both those revered women." In Bahiyyih Khanum we found this exquisite balance between the practical and spiritual teachings perfectly exemplified, and once more could be thankful for the privilege of becoming witness to the possibility of actually living the life of a true believer, fully and joyously, even in a Turkish prison, under the most trying and difficult conditions that could possibly be conceived.

When the dreaded moment came to say goodbye, the sorrow of parting from the beloved ladies was lessened only by the hope of a future visit. The last face I remember was that of the Greatest Holy Leaf, calm, gentle, radiant, her deep understanding eyes shedding the light of the Love of God upon us, that light which only glows brighter with the passing of the years.

EQUALITY OF MAN AND WOMAN

THE REALITIES of things have been revealed in this radiant century and that which is true must come to the surface. Among these realities is the principle of the equality of man and woman; equal rights and prerogatives in all things appertaining to humanity. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh declared this reality over fifty years ago.* But while this principle of equality is true, it is likewise true that woman must prove her capacity and aptitude, must show forth the evidences of equality. She must become proficient in the arts and sciences and prove by her accomplishments that her abilities and powers have merely been latent. . . . Woman must especially devote her energies and abilities toward the industrial and agricultural sciences, seeking to assist mankind in that which is most needful. By this means she will demonstrate capability and insure recognition of equality in the social and economic equation. Undoubtedly God will confirm her in her efforts and endeavours, for in this century of radiance His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh has proclaimed the reality of the oneness of the world of humanity and announced that all nations, peoples and races are one. He has shown that although individuals may differ in development and capacity, they are essentially and intrinsically equal as human beings, just as the waves of the sea are innumerable and different but the reality of the sea is one. The plurality of humanity may be likened to the waves but the reality of humankind is like the sea itself. All the waves are of the same water; all are waves of one ocean.

“Therefore strive to show in the human world that women are most capable and efficient; that their hearts are more tender and susceptible than the hearts of men; that they are more philanthropic and responsive toward the needy and suffering; that they are inflexibly opposed to war and lovers of peace. Strive that the ideal of international peace may become realized through the efforts of womankind, for man is more inclined to war than woman, and a real evidence of woman's superiority will be her service and efficiency in the establishment of Universal Peace.”

THE SOCIAL EMPHASIS IN THE BAHA'I REVELATION

HUSSEIN RABBANI

The author of this enlightened article has been a student at the American University in Beirut. He presents his subject in two parts; herein he gives us a new and concrete view of the application of religion to the art of living. The second part will be published in the November issue of the magazine.

TO-DAY one of the most vital and challenging problems in the field of religious thought is the changing attitude of the people towards religion as a whole. Men have come to lose somewhat their traditional belief in the necessity of a religion and have abandoned their original faith in the efficacy of spiritual forces in bringing about a better social order. This tendency is particularly prominent among the younger generation who have found in the different religious organizations nothing but old dogmas and outworn creeds and have consequently turned their faces towards newer fields of human activity. The modern youth, indeed, has come to realize the difficulty of adjusting obsolete religious doctrines to the present conditions of a scientific and highly industrialized society. The revolt has been mainly directed against the different ecclesiastical organizations which, owing to their conservatism and their rigidity, have refused to meet the present needs and circumstances of the world. Instead of finding a practical remedy for the many ills that have afflicted mankind, these religious bodies have preferred to adhere to their traditional beliefs and have boldly rejected every attempt to bring about a thorough reform. The same old conflict between traditionalism and modernism which has appeared so often in the course of history is now being repeated though on a much larger scale. Blind faith has not only been discarded but severely condemned. Metaphysical and theological speculations have proved their inadequacy to solve our social problems and the result has been a gradual shift of interest from the domain of theory to that of practice.

WE ARE to-day living in an age of pragmatism; pragmatism not only in the field of religion but also in all the other departments of life, in the political as well as in the industrial and the economic. Any institution, any plan or idea, which is unable to improve our social, political and religious conditions is of no worth. "You know the tree by the fruits it yields", is an old saying and is to-day a common dictum. No wonder then if religious skepticism has developed to such a degree. If our various religious bodies have lost their true significance, if they do no more administer to our vital needs but instead reduce their activities to mere ceremonial and administrative works, then let them either reform and adapt themselves to the new circumstances of the age or be swept away and relegated to the limbo of obsolescent and forgotten doctrines.

The religion of an Aquinas or an Assisi can no more satisfy the needs of a modern man. What was considered during the Middle Ages as essential is to-day but of a mere secondary importance. For a mediaevalist, religion was essentially a matter of creeds and dogmas, of unquestioning obedience to authority. Religious life consisted in mortifications and abstinence from food and other worldly affairs. Asceticism was the ideal and celibacy the "sine qua non" of sanctity.

Not so with the modern idea of religion, at least from the Bahá'í point of view. For Bahá'u'lláh as well as 'Abdu'l-Bahá have both emphasized in their writings the social function of religion in our present age. In His well-known epistle addressed to Emperor Napoleon III, Bahá'u'lláh strongly reproves the monastic life. "O concourse of monks!" He says, "Seclude not yourselves in cells and cloisters; nay, abandon them at My bidding and engage in that which profiteth your souls and the souls of mankind." And again in another passage speaking about the Sufis He says: "Some of these souls (the Sufis) hold to that which causes indolence and solitude Man must show forth fruit. A fruitless man, in the words of His Holiness the Spirit (Christ), is like unto a fruitless tree, and a fruitless tree is fit only for the fire."

These two passages clearly indicate Bahá'u'lláh's idea as to what a modern religion should not be. It is not through seclusion and physical austerities that the individual can practice true religion, but every action of his daily life should be performed in such a way as to denote on his part a religious attitude of mind. Religion should not be a cause of sorrow and should not produce torpidity. Far from that, its real purpose is to invigorate the soul, to stimulate us to action, and inspire us to think in the right way and to act in the right direction.

"A solitary life and severe discipline" says Bahá'u'lláh, "do not meet God's approval. The possessors of perception and knowledge should look unto the means which are conducive to joy and fragrance. Such practices come forth and proceed from the loins of superstition and the womb of fancy, and are not worthy the people of knowledge . . . Deprive not yourself of that which is created for you."⁸

CONCEIVED as such, religion stands above petty dogmas and creeds and transcends all human limitations. It acquires a universal character by laying emphasis on the essential rather than on the accidental and the temporary. "Religion is a reality," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "and reality is one. The fundamentals of the religions of God are one in reality. There is no difference in the fundamentals. The difference is caused by the imitations which arise later, and inasmuch as imitations differ,

Furthermore, He says: “Religion confers upon man the life everlasting. Religion is a service to the world of morality. Religion guides humanity to the eternal happiness. Religion is the cause of everlasting honour in the world of man.”⁵

Bahá'u'lláh did not only reject monastic life for being fruitless but He equally condemned all sorts of self-mortification. Since religion should be a cause of joy and activity, and inasmuch as it seeks to improve the conditions of men in their earthly life, it should give them ample opportunities to develop as fully as possible their natural gifts. Hence, the futility of celibacy. For a mediaevalist who conceived of this world as the great scene of the “drama of salvation” and for whom this earthly life was but a prison, the enjoyments of life seemed to be unlawful. His sole preoccupation was how to save his soul from eternal damnation, how to kill and stifle his passions and his carnal desires in order to avoid the wrath of God. For him the world of body was of no importance whatever. What really mattered was his soul—therefore, the best life, according to him, should consist in the elimination of our earthly desires and not in their rational satisfaction.

Such a view of life is contrary to the Bahá'í ideal. For, Bahá'u'lláh wished His followers to avail themselves of all the opportunities which this earthly life affords. True happiness consists in devotion and self-sacrifice not in seclusion and total disregard of our physical needs. It is in the world below that man should strive to realize the “Kingdom of Heaven”. And what is religion if not our attitude towards God as reflected in our attitude towards men? Our physical life has its own value which should not be underestimated. Therefore, it is useless for man to deprive himself of what he is rightfully entitled to enjoy. Celibacy should be discouraged and monogamy be universally practiced. All forms of austerities should be eliminated and life be made as pleasant as possible. Religious ceremonies and rituals, elaborate sacerdotal hierarchies have to be suppressed and religion must assume once more its original purity and its social function.

NOT ONLY so, the word prayer itself must needs be extended so as to include not only religious meditations but every kind of work which is performed in the spirit of service. Prayer, therefore, is not a mere recital of some words or formulae but also consists in right action and right thinking. In this connection Bahá'u'lláh's words are significant. “It is made incumbent on every one of you,” He says, “to engage in some one occupation, such as arts, trades, and the like. We have made this—your occupation — identical with the worship of God, the True One.”⁶

And ‘Abdu'l-Bahá commenting on these words in one of His Paris talks said the following: “In the Bahá'í Cause arts, sciences and all crafts are counted as worship. The man who makes a piece of notepaper to the best of his ability, conscientiously concentrating all his forces on perfecting it, is giving praise to God. Briefly, all effort and exertion put forth by man from the fulness of his heart is worship, if it is prompted by the highest motives and the will to do service to humanity. This is worship: to serve mankind and to minister to the needs of the people. Service is prayer. A physician ministering to the sick, gently, tenderly, free from prejudice, and believing in the solidarity of the human race, is giving praise."¹

A concrete embodiment of the principle that faith and worship are not sufficient in themselves but should be supplemented by social service is to be found in the institution of the "Mashriqu'l-Adhkár" (the Dawning Place of the mention of God) which will combine the two main elements of which the Bahá'í worship is composed, namely; spiritual meditation and social service. This dual feature of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár makes of it one of the basic institutions of the Bahá'í commonwealth of the future.

Thus, Bahá'ism in fact, teaches us that, far from seeking to renounce this world and to withdraw into a spiritual domain where all material preoccupations are entirely suppressed, it is here below that we should develop, so as to attain to a higher spiritual condition. Our subsequent growth depends on the way we have profited by the time passed on this earth; and as on this material earth we are physical beings as well as spiritual ones, it is by the appropriate use of all our faculties that we shall accomplish the perfecting of our souls."²

"How long will humanity persist in its waywardness? How long will injustice continue? How long is chaos and confusion to reign amongst men? How long will discord agitate the face of society? The winds of despair are, alas, blowing from every direction, and the strife that divides and afflicts the human race is daily increasing. The signs of impending convulsions and chaos can now be discerned, inasmuch as the prevailing order appears to be lamentably defective."

AS WE SOW, SO SHALL WE REAP

WHEN the conduct of life man is actuated by two main motives—the hope for reward, and the fear of punishment. This hope and this fear must consequently be greatly taken into account by those in authority who have important posts under government. Their business in life it is to consult together for the framing of laws, and to provide for their just administration.

The tent of the order of the world is raised and established on the two pillars of reward and retribution.

In despotic governments carried on by men without divine faith, where no fear of spiritual retribution exists, the execution of the laws is tyrannical and unjust. There is no greater prevention of oppression than these two sentiments, hope and fear. They have both political and spiritual consequences. If administrators of the law would take into consideration the spiritual consequence of their decisions, and follow the guidance of religion, "They would be divine agents in the world of action, the representatives of God for those who are on earth, and they would defend, for the love of God, the interests of His servants as they would defend their own." If a governor realizes his responsibility, and fears to defy the divine law, his judgments will be just. Above all, if he believes that the consequences of his actions will follow him beyond his earthly life, and that "as he sows so must he reap," such a man will surely avoid injustice and tyranny.

Should an official, on the contrary, think that all responsibility for his actions must end with his earthly life, knowing and believing nothing of divine favors and a spiritual kingdom of joy, he will lack the incentive of just dealing and the inspiration to destroy oppression and unrighteousness.

When a ruler knows that his judgments will be weighed in a balance by the Divine Judge, and that, if he be not found wanting, he will come into the celestial kingdom and that the light of the heavenly bounty will shine upon him, then will he surely act with justice and equity. Behold how important it is that ministers of state should be enlightened by religion!

THE WORLD COUNCIL OF YOUTH HELD IN PASADENA

NELLIE S. FRENCH

The author, a member of the Bahá'í National Spiritual Assembly, has contributed this article at the request of the editors. With her knowledge of events and her close association with the young people, she seemed eminently fitted to make a general statement about this very important conference as one not a member of the youth group but intensely interested in the success of these extremely worthy and noble endeavors.

IT was eminently fitting that so much excellence of brawn and such physical prowess as was assembled in Southern California for the celebration of the Tenth Olympiade should find its higher expression subsequent to the athletic contests, in a World Council of Youth for the consideration of intellectual and spiritual matters as well. Thus the World Council of Youth,* conceived in the mind of a brilliant young graduate of the California Institute of Technology, was born and developed remarkable proportions right here under our eyes, and while independent of the sponsorship of any particular educational institution, it was accorded the hospitality of the Institute of Technology where one of the lovely new buildings was placed at its disposal. Practically all of the closed sessions of the Council were held in the Humanities Building except on a few occasions when cordial hospitality was extended from various sources.

The age limit of eligibility to participation in the discussions was thirty years, and the only adults whose presence was welcomed were those especially invited to shed light upon some given subject, or to act as advisors. Two large public meetings were held however, one at the opening of the Council, when the aims and plans were announced, and the second at the close of the ninth day, in order that the public might be made cognizant of what had transpired during the discussions. But altho these meetings were held behind closed doors one could but feel the vibrant forces set astir by the clean, honest, earnest discussions, in which these hundred and more delegates, young men and young women from thirty-four countries, representatives of many races, associated together in a real quest for the means of better international understanding. The public meetings were held in the new Civic Auditorium where fifteen hundred or more people attended, evidence sufficient of the interest and enthusiasm with which this new gesture was received.

The accompanying photograph, and the resume of proceedings which appears elsewhere, written by an accredited delegate to the Conference, will amply justify the pride and gratification which the writer, as patroness, experienced in having lent a humble share to the success of this unique and significant event. It was a rare privilege merely to meet these splendid, intelligent young people, outstanding representatives of the celebrated universities of China and Japan, of Germany, India and England, and of our own and other countries, all fine looking and some particularly attractive in their native costumes, and all, heart and soul, dedicated to the spirit of service to humanity.

When the Council came to an end, and the separation took place there stole over all a cloud of sorrow at the parting of the ways, for a bond of true friendship had been formed which had its roots down deep in the hearts of every participant. Every argument, every difference of opinion, every feeling of strangeness had given place to the most harmonious conclusions, the most respectful consideration, the most lasting friendship. A sameness of purpose had engendered a knowledge of the sameness of ideals and established that incontrovertible proof of human oneness, regardless of color, race or creed.

And so we have seen the first World Council of Youth come and go, but not without lasting results, for we have also witnessed the organization of a permanent Council with definite plans for a next meeting to follow the Eleventh Olympiad in Berlin in 1936, and we have burnished up the star of hope until it shines radiantly in our minds with the promise of future glories yet untried, and future internationalism yet unknown; one not founded upon political or mercenary relationships, but upon the law of justice to all and the consciousness of universal love for God and man.

RELIGION AND THE WORLD COUNCIL OF YOUTH

MARION HOLLEY

The author, (a Bahá'í) chairman of the Commission on Religion and Philosophy of the World Council, gives herein a brief resume of the findings of this Commission—a wonderful picture of group thinking. Our readers of all ages will be interested in following this superb demonstration of advanced thinking of a group of young people so earnest, so sincere and so determined to find the common denominator in religion to apply mutually.

BAHÁ'IS must find a special interest and significance in the proceedings of the World Council of Youth. And particularly they may discover, in a study of its discussions, implications of a method susceptible of sensible development and wide application to the field of spiritual education.

The World Council, conceived in the mind of its chairman, Mr. Ray Cromley, as a mental counterpart of the Olympic Games, held its first sessions in Pasadena, at the California Institute of Technology, August 16-26, 1932. Out of a total of one hundred and ten delegates, approximately sixty represented nations other than the United States. Among these delegates were numbered men who had worked with Gandhi; one who had suffered imprisonment for pacifism; men outstanding in educational fields in China and Japan; leaders of the European and American Youth Movements; actual participants in the Olympic Games; countless others, renowned and obscure, but each one vibrant with purpose to discover those mutual ambitions and needs which might serve as bonds in a world whose physical proximity demands a spiritual mating.

In the words of its chairman: "Youth must learn to face things clearly, to find behind the confusion and the misunderstanding, wrongs to be righted and bridges of friendship and cooperation to be builded. Always, it seems, the standards of education and religion have conflicted with the standards of life—and Youth raised in an idealistic world is flung unprepared into a world of life, whose every purpose seems contrary to that former world. What then is Youth to do—reject the teaching of its training, or attempt to inculcate those teachings into life? But were this statement obvious—and it is not—there is yet the question of what education? What religion? What life?"

To answer one of these questions was the direct purpose of the Commission on Religion and Philosophy. To facilitate progress, discussions were divided among four sub-commissions, on The Place of Religion in the Life of Today, Comparative Religion, Young People's Methods, and Missionaries. These, after four days, gathered again to attack their problems together. The subject was vast, and time of necessity limited. Yet in a few days, the horizon of religion, distant and vague to a modern mind, divided into questions of concrete and specific import, questions met squarely and shaped into some analysis of value. What is religion? What are its indispensable minimums? Is philosophy a sufficient ethical impulse? How are the arguments of a scientific naturalism to be met? Is religion chiefly humanitarianism? Will an atheistic order of society be sufficient for the needs of a future world? Is religion's present ineffectiveness due to religion, or to man? What relationships are discoverable between the various forms of religion? What must be the essentials of the religion of the modern? Is there any justification for missionary endeavor? What applications has religion to the fields of economics, politics, education?

Such were the problems attacked, and in a manner to develop that creative discussion which "represents a faith in the possibility of setting up thought-conditions by which people will find the right ways for themselves." The method is none other than that of group thinking, a process at first alien to a collection of individualistic egos, but an ideal much sought after by those who glimpse, in the amalgamation of diverse viewpoint, the possibility of a greater creation than may develop from the lonesome sterility of an isolated mind. Let us not impute a mysterious power or inspiration to rational method. Upon the foundation of share thinking, no structure will rise unproportionate to the dimensions of its base. The scope, pro-fundity and quality of intellectual material inevitably shapes the result; and a well-stocked mind, tolerant and imaginative, may thus alter the whole course of group thought.

Here, indubitably, appears the Bahá'í opportunity. In the sessions of the Commission on Religion, it was often the privilege of Bahá'ís to indicate the more comprehensive attitude, to suggest explanations which, in their lucidity and reasonableness, appealed as obvious to delegates not yet informed of our modern Educator. But influence exerted in this manner must never be understood as the imposition of one opinion upon unwilling recipients, nor propaganda seizing unfair advantages. The laboratory of a creative discussion group is receptive only to those ideas which appeal.

THE CONSIDERATION of religion in a World Council must needs be general in its implications. It was our fortune to have among the participants a Hindu; a Buddhist; an atheist; white, colored and Chinese Christians, representing diverse Protestant sects and Catholics; a Theosophist; and three Bahá'ís—numbering thirty-four in all. The foremost problem, before any advance could occur, was to mark off religion from other phases of activity, characterize it, find its basic factors, if any, and judge these factors as to validity and usefulness in the modern world. Had the Commission, in other words, anything to apply to society, or was religion a chimera of the uneducated mind, at best an outworn mode of belief and behavior? Moreover, did these various delegates find in their elementary faiths a common denominator to apply mutually? Or must they return to their home countries and circles, condemned to local endeavor? If so, the vision of international consultation and action found itself shattered.

This was not to define religion, however. The optimism of the first sessions dissolved into despair, as philosophy, humanism, atheism, naturalism, humanitarianism, institutionalism, insistently monopolized a discussion which had set itself to understand the nature of religion. These might be interesting subjects in themselves, but surely to consider them must only delay the course of that inquiry which pointed towards the place of religion in the world today. Let us grant that "philosophy is the rational approach to reality," an intellectual activity, whereas "religious experience involves the whole personality," working radical changes in man. Refute naturalism as an insufficient explanation of the origin of life, not to mention spiritual manifestations. Show the impotency of humanism to transmute character in the large, and in the face of grave discouragement and tests, to sustain an exalted social attitude, a vital and efficacious morale. Admit the lamentable ineffectiveness of present religious institutions, but face the dilemma that no social force may operate except through an institution. Consider all of these problems. But in the end a solution remained as remote as the day you began. You had not yet defined religion. Thus did the sessions appear at the close of three days.

BUT SUDDENLY, and with what astonishment, the group perceived in this chaotic mass of data and deliberation the outlines of a definitive form. Clarity of conception on the nature of religion, a clarity long since resigned to the land of unknowables, shaped itself in the minds of the exhausted delegates. And they realized to their delight that time spent in wrestling with these impinging ideas had served to mark them off from their object. Religion, elusive to the finish, had unwittingly been captured and bounded and set off, both from its opposites, and from related subjects. Although they had not yet settled upon what it was, they knew very well what it was not.

Now this is a very great triumph. The gravest difficulties that beset a believing man, the most bewildering arguments, silence him principally because he cannot disentangle from the opposing viewpoint those factors which do not apply to his case, those assumptions having no relevancy because they attack something he does not in reality support.

The members of the Religion Commission discovered that religion is usually under-estimated. Either it is judged as an institution, and an outworn one, or envisioned as a purely personal relationship with the motivating Power often named God. Neither conception is adequate or just. Consequently, neither conception can withstand the concentrated scrutiny of an antagonist. The very minimum definition, they decided, must include both phases. And indeed, what phenomenon of nature is there that does not require two things: the idea or impulse or spirit, and the expression or form? Religion, therefore, according to this group, must be defined as "an attitude toward Divinity which is reflected in life."

WITH THIS to stand on, the burden grew considerably lighter. Two facts, puzzling in themselves, found meaning in reference to their decision. The sub-commission on Comparative Religion had reported that their study revealed a distinction in the teachings of religions. Each religion consisted of two phases, primary and secondary. The primary doctrines seemed comparable in every major faith. These include a belief in some sort of power controlling the universe, and a consequent attitude toward humanity, an attitude social, or brotherly, or loving. This sounded like the long-sought definition of the group. And in fact, it would seem natural that a minimum definition should apply to the teachings of all Prophets. If Muhammadanism and Buddhism and Christianity could be called alike religions, then one might expect a common core of similarities between them.

There were in addition the secondary teachings, and these appeared to vary, according to historical time, locale and culture. These shaped the institutions, and gave them a specific character. Moreover, they often grew into a nuisance. As one boy wrote: "Secondary teachings that find expression in form, theology and moral concepts differ widely, change with the times, are often corrupted, and have been the cause of religious prejudice and strife. They have been the means of alienating religiously-inclined people and peoples from religion. They have fostered the strife between the liberated modern mind and religion." Institutional form, in other words, quite logically became outmoded, or found no justification when applied to an alien society. And form was too easily confused with the fundamental thing. Men forgot that the stream of religion might be turned into new banks, if occasion should warrant it. Here, indeed, was an explanation of our present situation. Dynamic life could not accord with static dogma.

"When man and his particular religion seem to come to the parting of the ways it need not necessarily imply that either one or both of them are inherently wrong within themselves. Quite possibly they did not keep pace down the avenue of time. At an impasse such as this, one or the other must change pace or direction, conform to the other, or go a separate way. The institution, divorced from man, cannot survive. Man, on the other hand, can survive and found new institutions."

Well then, what shall be the nature of these institutions? Five points characterized the description:

1. "The religion of the modern must satisfy the intellect.

2. "Religion must aid in and hasten the development of culture. Philosophy and art ought to be cultivated in connection with the modern's religion.

3. "The religion of the modern must strive determinedly for the abolition of all prejudices and rivalries between those of various religious beliefs, and for the abandonment of superstition.

4. "The religion of the new type must maintain and increase the humanitarian activities of the present, at the same time not neglecting the development of the spiritual phases of man by a too-absorbing interest in the alleviation of suffering and pain in others.

5. "The religion of the modern should cultivate wholesome physical development and the recreational side of life.

"SUMMARY: The new form of religion which must come will touch all phases of man's life. The body must not suffer at the hands of the spirit, neither must the spirit occupy all the attention. The intellect must be satisfied, man must retain his sympathy for and interest in his fellows, he must develop his body, and especially must he attend to the needs of his spiritual nature."

THUS ENDED one aspect of the discussion. In a summary of this sort, more must be omitted than included. There has been no mention of that portion of the argument which introduced the judgment that religion is a basic human institution, the essence of culture, and that a decadent religion must of necessity herald a decadent society. Nor have these fundamental assertions been developed, in their application to economics, race problems, international politics, education. The compass of the paper does not permit it.

Bahá'is, however, must ask at least these questions. The Commission has stated that "intelligent spiritual leadership is the only thing which can reinstate the dynamic of religion." From whence do we procure this leadership? What persons may we look to? Is it reasonable to expect that men, heretofore dependent upon assistance, may at last lift themselves by their own bootstraps? Does any movement of humanity stir to life, crystallize and vigorously wheel into action, without a rallying point, without that impulsive Center Who alone is the nexus between unlimited Power and feeble but responsive instruments?

THE NATURE OF THE DIVINE MANIFESTATIONS

1. THIS EVOLVING WORLD

GLENN A. SHOOK

Professor of Physics, Wheaton College

In this, the first of three chapters treating the different phases of this interesting subject, the author directs particular attention to the slow evolutionary process of the concept of God from the earliest times, and shows how we have stressed what men thought about God rather than striving to gain a knowledge of God. Students of religion will find this series most informing.

IN SPEAKING of prayer 'Abdu'l-Bahá once said, "Effort should be made to make attachment to God." When asked how this attachment is to be made, he replied, "Knowledge is love. Study, listen to exhortations, think, try to understand the wisdom and greatness of God."

From the earliest times—the knowledge of which we obtain only by inference—down to the present, man has been profoundly effected by thinking about God.

The concept of God, like any other fundamental concept, was undoubtedly a matter of slow development. In the last analysis the only way in which man can know God is by experience. The individual knows by his own experience or that of some other person or that of the race. This knowledge cannot be like the knowledge of familiar objects around us, or the knowledge we gain by observation, experiment and inference. Naturally we put more stress upon what men have thought about God in the past than we do upon some means by which we may gain a knowledge of God. This puts a very heavy burden upon traditional belief and the latter is not always equal to it.

The mere fact that men have believed in God in the past is not sufficient grounds for a vital faith today. For several hundred years men believed that the earth was the center of the universe but that belief was discounted when the Copernican theory was established. Again what men have thought of God in the past is of importance to us today because it is only by such study that we can know how man has developed religiously. The only way we can discover certain phases of the Divine Plan for this race, or the only way in which we can read any meaning into life, is to study man's development.

Before the modern historic method was applied to the history of religion it was customary to paint an ideal picture of our religious development, especially the development of our own religion, with the result that most of us are not prepared for any kind of critical study. Until quite recently it was practically impossible for a scholar to write an unbiased treatise upon comparative religion. White's *History between Theology and Science is the story of a long conflict between scientific facts on the one hand and unwarranted tradition on the other. There is no doubt that many sincere religionists of that period honestly felt that the position of God in the universe would be impaired by the advance of science.

In all this we see the struggle of the race for truth but we must never suppose that we are out of the struggle. It is a very hopeful sign that today men from all walks of life are making a defense for God. The warfare today is against unscholarly and superficial thinking, the kind of thinking that overlooks the most obvious facts of man's development, namely his mental and spiritual experience.

This idea of an evolving, progressive concept of God has not received sufficient attention in the past. While we realize that early man's notion of God cannot compare with the exalted ideas of today nevertheless we do not like to feel that the world was entirely deprived of the great spiritual bounties. This is not error but only natural, however we must expand our ideas of the universe. Just as we permit a child's primitive ideas of God, realizing that there are mature people with more exalted concepts, so we must think of the earth as a part of the universe. Man has always existed so when this planet was in comparative darkness and ignorance, other worlds may have been enlightened.

On the other hand there is a kind of progressive belief, a product of the desire for truth, that does, in a real sense, create the object of the belief. Some men believed in the Ptolemaic theory after it was refuted. This kind of belief creates nothing, but there were others that believed in the Copernican theory long before it was fully demonstrated and their belief led to the truth. It is this kind of belief that has advanced the knowledge of God. A static dogmatic belief is never real although it may become an integral part of our religious life while a progressive dynamic belief is always real and consequently contributes something to the sum total of our knowledge.

In dealing with man's spiritual development we cannot confine ourselves to the historic method.

We fail to realize that there are laws in the universe, governing man's mental and spiritual growth, laws that we discover by drawing near to God and not by making God in our own image. Some of our modern philosophers amid the comforts of life may find difficulty in reconciling the omnipotence of God with His mercy but the great saints of all time have never been in such a dilemma. It is a singular fact that the truly great souls suffer the most and complain the least, but it is something more than this—it is a fact that must have its say in any religious discussion. The fact that we are in any sort of dilemma would indicate that we too are in the process of becoming.

In this connection the theory of evolution, which by the way is the only means we have for extending our knowledge in time, is of great assistance to us for it helps us to see the Divine Plan as it really is. We realize more and more that ideas, as well as things, have been,

are and ever shall be in a state of change. As long as we hold to the notion of spontaneous creation in any field of thought we are unable to make any real progress in that field. This has been confirmed by experience. To be sure when an evolving biological world first made its appearance it led directly to a mechanistic concept of life but we must remember that at the time of its inception the leading minds of the day were decidedly materialistic.

While we cannot adjust discoverable facts to fit a static philosophy we can adjust our philosophy to fit the facts. We have discovered, after a good many years of anxiety, that we can conceive of a God of an evolving world quite as readily as we can a God of a world of spontaneous creation. The only difficulty is that many traditional and philosophical ideas started with a static world, so that the moment we begin to push back into history to search out an idea like creation, we fear for the eminence of God. But if we fear to look backward we are also afraid to look forward, which is worse. In a sense this merely indicates that we have no real knowledge of God, for if we have ever been conscious of His presence no theory regarding His non-existence will disturb us; and if the heart has never known Him then no theory regarding Him may be of much assistance, but it may prepare the way.

The great Prophets realize this, so when they appear upon earth they first appeal to the heart. Thousands of people, inside and outside of Christendom, think of God as a loving Father because of the life and words of Christ. Hundreds of pilgrims entered the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá with perplexing questions, only to find that they were relatively unimportant. They came away with something that no philosopher has ever been able to bestow, namely the love of God, dynamic and enduring.

Nevertheless Christ came into the world to reflect to us the attributes of God and we cannot think of Christ and His mission without this background of ideas concerning God. For thousands of years the world was being prepared for the Gospel of Christ and Christ prepared the world for the coming of Bahá'u-lláh.

It is this everchanging flux of ideas concerning God and the place of the Manifestations in the scheme of things that concern us here. In the long run progress always results. We would like to see things move along without breaks and setbacks but that is not so much an indication of our fine sense of orderliness as a confession of our ignorance of the laws of nature, of our own limitations, and the Divine Plan.

Every loyal adherent of an ancient religious system firmly believes that his religion and his religion alone has the power of expansion and that finally the other religions will come to realize this. Yet the difficulties of such a position are perfectly clear, for the atheist and agnostic are equally sure of their position. This shows how very difficult it is for man to see the world in its entirety.

SIGNS OF THE NEW DAY

LOUIS G. GREGORY

"The oneness of the world of humanity shall be realized, accepted and established. When we reflect upon this blessed principle, it will become evident and manifest that it is the healing remedy for all human conditions. . . . In this century of radiance His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh has proclaimed the reality of the oneness of the world of humanity and announced that all nations, peoples and races are one."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE little world known as Green Acre, summer colony of the Bahá'is in Maine, is not impressive by its size and numbers. Its eighty acres might be lost in the ample dimensions of so large a village as Eliot. Neither can it be counted a rival for the great resorts considering the numbers it attracts. It is rather the charm of beauty, idealism, thought, spirit, sociability, mysticism, that makes a deep impression upon its visitors and workers and hold a subtle sway from year to year.

THE ANNUAL conference for racial amity, one of the most virile and useful of Green Acre activities, was this past season more than ever before a laboratory for the study of reality in human relations. It was dignified in procedure; its six sessions seemed to touch more people and phases of life than ever before, while its enthusiasm and happiness left nothing to be desired.

It was providential to have as the opening speaker of the conference, Judge Edward H. Adams of Portsmouth, N. H., an honored citizen of the community. His theme was, "The Faith of Lincoln," and he proved himself one of the most eloquent speakers that ever graced a meeting. Modestly he disclaimed capacity to interpret Lincoln, saying that only the great can interpret each other. But he had not gone far before he seemed to his hearers to belong to another age, living amid scenes which tested the heroic; to be one with that band of patriots and lovers of freedom who saw "the Glory of the coming of the Lord"; an associate and worker with our great martyr president, one of the most illustrious names of any clime or age. In poetic phrases pregnant with thought, the sublime faith of the great American liberator was eloquently set forth.

Mr. Samuel A. Allen, industrial secretary of the New York Urban League, was the next speaker; he is one of those who, as a student, heard 'Abdu'l-Bahá when He spoke at Howard University, Washington, D. C., twenty years ago. The subject of Mr. Allen's address was "Economics and Race Relations." From his vantage ground of service and observation, he showed how one of the most virulent results of prejudice is the way it affects people trying to earn a living, those prepared for service yet debarred by the accident of race. Social relations are much more easily established. But depression has greatly intensified the race problem. In New York City the Negro is denied admission to twenty-five unions. It sometimes happens that colored workers are laid off and whites substituted the very next day. Thousands are being driven into the radical parties under such pressure. Education and property do not make people happy. Fellowship and love do. If employers are to be reached and softened it must be by the Bahá'í method. Simple justice is needed, not mercy. Bahá'ís should seek service on public welfare committees. A burning desire for right on the part of each can melt the cold world into oneness, he felt.

The chairman, Mr. Harlan Ober, in closing the session said that Lincoln was great because he had no separatist mind but thought in terms of the whole. His spiritual love gave him vision. Now someone was greatly needed who could give Lincoln's vision to the whole world. He then reviewed the teachings and great message of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and showed how they affect both economics and race relations and how all difficulties, "due to lack of love and altruism" must pass away in the light of the new teachings. Limited relief supplied by limited minds cannot solve such problems. But the divine love and wisdom from the Universal Physician will give relief. He exhorted patience to those who are victims of oppression.

MR. CARL CARTWRIGHT, a graduate of the University of Florida, a fine representative of the liberal youth, was presented as the principal speaker at the second session. He has discovered from his scientific studies that the so-called Nordic race is non-existent, to say nothing of its claim to dominate history. There is no scientific sanction for the belief that one race is superior to another. Under his subject, "Negro Scientists Overcome Prejudice", he reviewed the life stories of two eminent Negro scientists, Dr. George W. Carver and Dr. Ernest E. Just. The bold research work and wonderful discoveries of these men have won them international fame and many honors. An amusing incident related was how the Lions Club, a business men's organization of Columbus, Ga., recently entertained Dr. Carver at luncheon. A local editor, irate at such sociability, denounced the occurrence. Thereupon the president of the club retorted that doubtless the editor's real grievance was that he had not been considered important enough to be included in the invitation! This is another illustration of the growing liberality of the South. The students of a white college in Mississippi invited Dr. Carver to address them. When the reactionary faculty heard of it, they forbade the Doctor to enter the campus. The students not to be outdone, hired a hall off the campus and gave their guest a great ovation when he appeared among them. What they felt was a great honor to the school had been turned into disgrace by the faculty, they declared. The speaker felt that the great abilities of these men and others like them would bring home to the world the certain knowledge of one humanity.

THE THIRD session was featured by two formal addresses, one by Mr. Philip A. Marangella on "Racial Amity and World Peace," and the other by Mrs. May Maxwell on the limitations existing in the minds of people of various races and nations, now happily disappearing before the glorious Light of the Sun of Truth.

The informal conference brought to the fore a bevy of youth, some four or five young ladies and a Persian student, Foad Ashraf, all of whom showed fertility of thought and fluency of expression and indicated very clearly that the orthodox limitations and racial prejudices of the old order were to them non-existent and unthinkable. It will doubtless require the youth to set the world in order. How beautiful are they in their faith, courage and consciousness of power. We find, from the study of Nabil,* that both Táhirih and Mulla Husayn-i-Bushru'i closed their dazzling careers at thirty-six; the Glorious Báb at thirty; Quddus at twenty-seven; and that such characters as Zaynab, Váhid and Hujjat were all included in the category of youth. We hail the beginnings of our American youth as amity workers. May their ends be glorious!

THE SPIRITUAL meeting of Sunday morning had as chairman Mr. F. St. George Spendlove, who expressed the idea that human enlightenment must precede human relief. The ideal cannot be attained until first projected. Each race must draw upon the resources of all centers of culture. The problem of races suggested to Rev. Henry Benton Harris, the first speaker, the cross purposes of Jews and Samaritans in the time of Jesus when He spoke to the woman of Samaria. This woman became a new creature through the light of Christ. The same spirit of universality is voiced by Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá Whose light has dawned and Who are asking all mankind to see each other as servants of one God. Some, they exhort, are as children. They must not be hated because weak. All are created in His image and likeness. Such a movement as this is the world's greatest need. May it change mankind into what it should be. In conclusion he quoted 'Abdu'l-Bahá as saying that he is blessed who prefers his brother to himself.

Mr. Howard C. Ives opened his address with Words of Bahá'u'lláh:

"Verily the Words that have descended from the heaven of the Will of God are the source of unity and harmony for the world. Close your eyes to racial differences and welcome all with the light of oneness."

Everything in existence, he declared, has a center, whether it be a star or a system. Perhaps there is a great central Sun around which the universe revolves. Even as an army gets direction, power and victory from its general, so ideal forces and light are now flowing from the Great Center which establishes the higher Unity. He then presented four aspects of unity, following the outline of 'Abdu'l-Bahá: the unity of mankind, the spiritual unity, the unity of the Holy Manifestations and the unity of the Divine Essence. Why should we still turn to man when we can turn to God? To accept and apply the decrees of the Manifestation of God is to attain the higher unity wherein nothing but reality exists.

THE WORKER'S meeting on Sunday afternoon called forth expressions from those who are doing something to relieve human ills. It was a heart to heart gathering. Influ-tial friends who had come to Green Acre for the first time, were encouraged to pour out their souls with perfect freedom. Others who were veterans in service likewise responded, sharing their rich experiences and extended studies. Harlem,* the metropolis of the Negro world, had impressive representatives of both races. Boston, sometimes referred to not as a city, but a state of mind, appeared to find its heart in this gathering. Self-examination, as well as study of the psychology of the prejudice of others, received due emphasis. The special object of this meeting was to brighten hopes and to tell ways of overcoming the various barriers to unity, that the ideal and real may be one.

Grateful acknowledgements must be made to the talented friends who contributed dramatic readings, vocal and instrumental selections at the various meetings, expressing amity in so pleasing a form.

THE LAST session was held in the People's Baptist Church in Portsmouth, N. H., the City by the Sea. The congregation and successive pastors of this colored church over the years have given fine cooperation to this work. Mrs. Ludmila Bechtold of Brooklyn, N. Y., was chairman, bringing to bear her intelligent interest and love of the work. The Hull House  address of 'Abdu'l-Bahá was read as a fitting introduction.

Mr. Samuel A. Allen again spoke and gave a striking picture of the numerous ills which attack the racially varied population of Harlem, as well as other cities. He shed his searchlight upon prejudices in various forms, intra as well as interracial. One curious incident related was that of a school teacher, training her children in jumping, who through prejudice held the rule higher for her colored pupils, only succeeding thereby in making them better jumpers than the others; another was how in a certain place a teacher who had a Japanese boy take the place of George Washington in a play, lost her position because of it. A. A. Schomberg, colored curator of a ten thousand dollar collection of books about the Negro race, collected it because when a boy in Cuba and called upon to write an article about his race, he was unable to find books in the library bearing upon that subject. In closing his address Mr. Allen related the story of two parents who were greatly alarmed one day to come upon their infant son and to find that by some means he held in his hands a carving knife. Fearing to approach him lest he harm himself, the mother tactfully held out to him an orange, whereupon he at once let fall the knife and reached for the fruit. The speaker again expressed his love of Green Acre and the conviction that a sick and sore humanity would find relief only through the divine remedies.

Orcella Rexford, the last speaker of the conference, made a fitting climax in a word picture of the world of the future. The absence of extremes of wealth and poverty, locomotion by wings as well as planes, false doctrines removed that cause strife, ignoring of national boundaries that separate, all employed and all educated, everybody wishing to do right, all governed by universal law, all speaking the same tongue, all knowing and loving the same God, all acknowledging the Supreme Tribunal and living in amity with all mankind—these were some of the details of her wonderful picture of the future under Bahá'u'lláh's divine civilization.

The speaker expressed the wish that each and all might stand in the smile of God. "A man who turns to God finds sunshine everywhere", says 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

So closed this amity conference, one of many that have been held. But the last always seems the best.

THE source of perfect unity and love in the world of existence is the bond and oneness of reality. When the divine and fundamental reality enters human hearts and lives, it conserves and protects all states and conditions of mankind, establishing that intrinsic oneness of the world of humanity which can only come into being through the efficacy of the Holy Spirit. For the Holy Spirit is like unto the life in the human body, which blends all differences of parts and members in unity and agreement. Consider how numerous are these parts and members, but the oneness of the animating spirit of life unites them all in perfect combination. It establishes such a unity in the bodily organism that if any part is subjected to injury or becomes diseased, all the other parts and functions sympathetically respond and suffer owing to the perfect oneness existing. Just as the human spirit of life is the cause of coordination among the various parts of the human organism, the Holy Spirit is the controlling cause of the unity and coordination of mankind. That is to say, the bond or oneness of humanity cannot be effectively established save through the power of the Holy Spirit, for the world of humanity is a composite body and the Holy Spirit is the animating principle of its life.

Therefore we must strive in order that the power of the Holy Spirit may become effective throughout the world of mankind, that it may confer a new quickening life upon the body-politic of the nations and peoples and that all may be guided to the protection and shelter of the Word of God.

This is the third part in the serial story of the martyrdom of Vargá and his little son Ruhú'lláh, early Persian Bahá'is. The preceding chapters gave a summary of the family history; copies of the Tablets (letters) of Bahá'u'lláh addressed to them; a brief account of the wonderful visit of the father and his two sons to 'Akká to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá; and a copy of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Tablet to Ruhú'lláh. The story will be concluded in the November number.

Ruhú'lláh, a boy so timid that he would never even go alone into the garden in the evening, was always remarkably courageous when it came to doing anything for the Bahá'i Cause. He thought a great deal about becoming a martyr, and in this connection wrote the following poem which he sent to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. One can see in reading it, how the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh train even a child into becoming a savant and a philosopher. No translation from the Persian can give the exquisite meter nor an adequate interpretation of the Persian metaphors alluding to literature and letters which the cultured people of Irán know so well. Here is his poem:

“In the Name of our Great Lord
 El-Abhá!
 O Cup-Bearer, fill the cup to the brim
 Make this Zion of my heart full of fire with your Wine.
 It is the time of receiving Bounties and the day of help.
 Face O friends of Bahá Towards the world with the banners of Guidance.
 Any one rising to serve God,
 The Lord of Mankind will help him,
 The one who sacrifices his life in the Covenant of God,
 The Face of God will turn towards him.
 O Cup-Bearer, give a cup from Thy Bounties
 That I may be pure from sin,

Although my sins cannot be counted,
 Still I am hopeful through the Favor of God.

Welcome, O Cup-Bearer of the Ancient Gathering.

Let fall a drop to this earth (body)
 through Thy Favor

Till through Generosity, this ray may shine

And be worthy of sacrifice.

O God, when the time will come that at Thy Door

I may give my life for the Love of Thy Face

What a happy day it will be,

That in the square of love

I may give my life

In the path of the Beloved's Love!

What a happy moment it will be,

That I may say openly

The praise of King Bahá on the cross!

O God, when shall come that time

That I may be severed from this fated body,

Facing towards the eternal Rose-Garden

Becoming verdant from the Bounties of seeing God?

I am burning in the desert of privation

And inflamed from the sparks of remoteness.

Take the veil from Thy Face
 ('Abdu'l-Bahá)

O King of the Worlds

In order that from the Light of Thy Face

The heavens may become illumined.

O Prince of Covenant!
 O King of Covenant!
 From your fire the Paran of Covenant is on fire.
 O Thou, who hast named Thyself
 "Abdu'l-Bahá."
 (The Servant of Bahá)
 Through Thy Commands the banners of Guidance are uplifted.
 Thou art the Dawning-Place of the secrets of God;
 Thou art the spring of the rivers of God,
 Like the letter A thou hast stood to uplift the Cause of God
 O powerful King of Kings!
 But like the letter B, thou art humble in service near the door of the Shrine of Lord Bahá.
 O Thou who art the Greatest Branch of the Tree of the Cause,
 O Thou who art Branched from the Ancient Root,
 O Thou who art the Dawning-Place of the Inspiration of God,
 Through Thee the eyes of Abhá people are enlightened.

"Give a cup from the divine wine, that I who am sleeping may become conscious;
 Rend asunder the veils of doubt and superstitions,
 Soar to the zenith of the Seventh Heaven,
 Pass from this dark cage of earth and water
 Going to the pure spiritual Kingdom;
 Become free from this world full of torture and pain,
 Facing the spiritual Native Land,
 Inhaling from the Rose-Garden of the soul
 The fragrance of the Beloved;
 Returning like a wind from the Land of the Beloved,
 Blowing fragrant and life-giving breezes

Bearing sorrow-sweeping Glad-Tidings;
 Saying openly to the friends of the world
 It is the Day of the Covenant!
 Friends be on your guard,
 O lovers of the Face of the Beloved,
 Turn your souls toward the Land of the Beloved,
 O comrades, grasp the opportunity,
 Help and assist the Cause of God,
 Try, O friends, that there may be spread in the regions of the earth
 The Teachings of the Powerful God
 Until the sleeping creatures may become conscious,
 May lay aside superstitions and prejudices,
 Their eyes becoming enlightened with the Light of God;
 The thorn-gardens of their hearts becoming rose-gardens,
 Try, O friends, it is time for service.

Give a glance through Kindness to this yearning, sorrowing bird,
 Who, being far from Thee, is restless and inconsolable.
 Through being so distant from Thee, my heart is on fire,
 Being away from Thee has inflamed my whole being,
 Help, O King, of the Kingdom of hearts!
 Being far from Thee has put my heart into flames;
 I am burning, O King, from being so far from Thee.
 Here, in this desert of loneliness and longing,
 Liberate this bird from the trap of sorrowfulness
 O King of Bounty and Sovereign of Favor!
 Do not look unto my station and capacity
 But look unto Thy Favor, O Bountiful One!"

“It is imperative that we should renounce our own particular prejudices and superstitions if we earnestly desire to seek the Truth. Unless we make a distinction in our minds between dogma, superstition and prejudice on the one hand, and Truth on the other, we cannot succeed. When we are in earnest in our search for anything, we look for it everywhere. This principle we must carry out in our search for Truth.”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

IN THESE days the notes of human unity and international amity are being strongly and widely struck in the utterances and writings of world leaders. The settlement just effected at Lausanne, though not in all respects as comprehensive as could be desired, should go far to accentuate and develop this most desirable sentiment among the nations. In essence, the common brotherhood of mankind is not only both explicit and implicit in Christianity but also in the other great religions of the world. More than eighty years ago this was elaborated and pointed out to reigning sovereigns of the time and to the world in general by a great Persian teacher whom his followers named Bahá'u'lláh (the glory of God), and has been reiterated all along by the successive guardians of the Bahá'í Cause.

“It is strange that this movement is so little known in Great Britain, though it is one of steadily increasing influence in other parts of the world. Is this because it is of Persian origin? What of that? Truth is truth, and wise leading is wise, from whatever source it may come. Was not our Lord a Jew and the great Christian religion of Judean origin?

“Anyhow, Bahá'ism is, we think,

destined to play a great and rich part in the advance and welfare of humanity in the years to come. It has many publications, one of the most lucid of which is by a Scotsman, the late Dr. J. E. Esslemont of Aberdeen; and it also publishes an excellent magazine which we have on several occasions appreciatively reviewed.

“The Bahá'í system shows how Christianity and all that is best in other religions can be practically and administratively applied. In this respect it is a Revelation fitted to the needs of the present age.

“Several issues of the Bahá'í Magazine are again before us, and the latest, that for this month, is a special number containing a treatise in the form of “A Study in Bahá'í Economics and Socialization.”* It would be well if our leaders in political and religious thought were thoroughly conversant with the principles and teaching here set forth. Yet we see little if any reference to the movement in any of our newspapers or magazines. Carefully and conscientiously read and studied, the Bahá'í writings and teachings will command universal respect.”—John O’Groat Journal, Wick, Scotland, July 15, 1932.

“The world will be filled with science, with the knowledge of the reality of the mysteries of beings, and with the knowledge of God. * * * I pray earnestly that the Light in this advanced age will so illumine the world that all may rally under the banner of unity and receive spiritual education. * * * The teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are the breaths of the Holy Spirit which create men anew.”—Abdu'l-Bahá.

IN THIS epoch of universal religious decline and moral decay the whole world is suffering from the effects of a spiritual chaos. But mature age suffers less than does youth at the portals of life; for it is here, at the beginning of life's experiences, that mistakes are most far-reaching and that wrong doing is most deeply tragic in its life-long results. Here, also, in this naturally turbulent period of life when the blood runs strong, when adventure and self-expression are the chief desires,—here more than at any other period is needed the calming influence and safe direction of religion.

But what do youth find to feed these crying needs? They find an adult world materialistic; lacking in the consciousness of God; and if practicing religion at all, practicing it mostly in a merely formal way. They find religious doctrines so full of theological superstitions, so at variance with the known truths of science as to give them little inclination toward the church. And education has still less to offer. For the college—with its questioning and skeptical attitude toward all things and its scientific laboratory methods which accept as truth only what can be proved—tends to make agnostics of youth.

Today, therefore, we find the young people either totally materialistic, having no consideration for religion and spiritual matters; or else if feeling a tendency toward religious life, doubtful and skeptical concerning established religious dogmas of the day, searching everywhere but seldom finding a complete spiritual satisfaction.

THE RESULT of this irreligious life on the morals of the rising generation is cataclysmic. For youth, with its tendency to seek wide experience, its drive toward adventure, its quest for happiness, its thirst for gratification of the senses,—how can it guide itself safely through the many temptations which the world of matter offers the struggling soul?

Behavior has become to the youth of today merely a question of expediency. With pleasure and self-indulgence the chief motives of action, youth is prone to try all things in the hope of finding new pleasures, new satisfactions of the moment. With the aid of modernistic schools of psychology, inhibitions are considered baneful and are thrown aside. Hedonistic self-expression, the search for pleasure and happiness at any cost, what else is there but this basic desire of our lower nature to influence the conduct of the youth of today?

Without the strong sanctions and authority of religion the ordinary precautionary maxims of age and experience count but little with youth. "Honesty is the best policy," we are told. But is that true? How many grafters are thriving, high in popular esteem? How many business men of shady principles are eminently successful in the world's eye and able to enjoy all those comforts and luxuries which youth aspires to? If materialistic success is to be given a higher claim than character upon our esteem, then youth is justified in wondering whether honesty after all is the best policy.

Again it is said, "Be good and you will be happy." But youth is willing to try other paths to happiness than those which lead to spiritual heights; and in its adventure into sensualism it finds that there are many pleasures from which it has been debarred by the code of ethics of the past. Why should these bars exist? Youth will have none of them. And adult warnings regarding future consequences are of little effect. For prognostications regarding the results of actions can be individually proved only by method of trial and error, and that is just what youth is endeavoring to do today.

Left without the guidance of religion, without those sure principles of action which the great spiritual teachers of humanity have taught us, the rising generation is embarking upon dangerous and catastrophic quests.

IN THE MIDST of such a world it is a most refreshing and hopeful sign to see a certain body of youth finding a moral earnestness, a deep spiritual conviction in the teachings of the Bahá'í Movement. The New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, appealing profoundly to youth because of its humanitarian principles, also is convincing on its spiritual side because of its complete harmony of religion with science. Here is a reasonable faith—one not only consistent with man's highest intellectual development but offering to humanity solutions for its major problems such as even man's intellect today is unable to achieve.

Into this great world-wide movement the youth of many countries, of many races, of many hereditary religions are throwing themselves with deep sincerity and with earnest endeavor. Here youth are finding again a solid foundation for life activity, a sure guide to conduct and to expression. Here they find motives higher than those of mere expediency. The eternal quest of the soul for beauty, guidance and truth finds assurance in the spiritual principles laid down by the great teachers of humanity. Whenever a personal problem arises a solution is clear from the point of view of what is spiritually right, of what is consistent with the plain directions of the word of God.

Thus groups of young people in Persia, in Germany, in America, in China, in Japan, and in many other countries, are studying the revealed Word of Bahá'u'lláh and are endeavoring to fashion their lives according to its pattern. Out of this earnest spiritual endeavor grows a character as beautiful as it is natural and wholesome—a character of purity, of integrity, of kindly service, of earnest responsibility both toward the development of oneself and toward the advancement of humanity. Superb are these souls, nourished by the Word of God. In their hands human affairs can be safely entrusted. Wise and learned in the learning of this world, and in addition dowered with a rich spiritual grace which reflects in all their acts, they are the salt of the earth.

Of whatever nationality, race, or creed, these youths are bound together by the closest of spiritual ties into a universal brotherhood working whole heartedly for the peace and progress and prosperity of all humanity. Never before in the history of this planet has so lofty a goal definitely inspired the vision and absorbed the energies of Youth. May the numbers of such become legion, and their influence be felt as a rising power in the affairs of nations!

“There is a point on which the philosophers and the Prophets differ. The philosophers make education the test of knowledge, holding that any man who receives sufficient education can attain a state of perfection. That is to say man possesses the potentiality for every kind of progress, and education enables him to bring this into the court of objectivity.

“The Prophets say that something else is necessary. It is true that education transforms the desert into a rose garden, the virgin forest into an orchard, saplings into trees, and single flowers into double and treble flowers, but there is a fundamental difference in men. . . . While recognizing the influence of education, we must also become acquainted with the innate disposition.

“The Prophets are sent to educate this innate quality in humanity. They are like gardeners who sow the grain which afterward springs up in a thousand forms of advancement. The Prophets are therefore the first Educators of the world, the headmasters of the world. . . .

“Bahá'u'lláh has said two steps are necessary for human development: material and divine education. . . . Divine education is the sum total of all development. It is the safeguard of humanity.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE SOCIAL EMPHASIS IN THE BAHÁ'Í REVELATION

HUSSEIN RABBANI

In a previous article the author emphasized the new conditions which humanity faces in this age and the importance of the social function of religion. In this, the second part of his article, he carries the subject into the spiritual field and shows the power of the Bahá'í Movement to mould the social life of man into more perfect patterns.

AN OUTSTANDING feature of the Bahá'í Revelation, and one which adds greatly to its social significance, is the absence from its sacred writings of any elaborate system of theology. The Bahá'í writings are mainly devoted to the enunciation of some spiritual, social, economic and political principles which, taken together, constitute the main foundations upon which the Bahá'í Organization of the future will be gradually built up. The Bahá'í Faith, therefore, has no theological system in the sense that is commonly attached to this term. What is meant by this is that the Bahá'ís have been enjoined by the Founders of their Faith not to indulge, as the adherents of other religions have done in the past, in theological and metaphysical speculations about the essence of God or the nature of His attributes and other similar problems which by their very nature stand above human comprehension.

In this connection, Bahá'u'lláh has revealed the following: "Knowledge" He said "is like unto wings for the being (of man) and is like a ladder for ascending. To acquire knowledge is incumbent upon all, but of those sciences which may profit the people of the earth, and not such sciences as begin in mere words and end in mere words."¹

The Bahá'í view of religion, therefore, is that it neither consists solely in knowledge nor in leading the life of a hermit or of an anchorite. It transcends all selfish and individualistic limitations. It abolishes all priestly castes, suppresses mystery cults and purifies human life from all sorts of egotism and superstition. Service is the cornerstone of the Bahá'í Faith. "O Son of Man!" proclaims Bahá'u'lláh, "If thou regardest mercy, look not to that which benefits thyself; but hold to that which will benefit thy fellowmen. If thou regardest justice, choose thou for others that which thou chooseth for thyself."²

Thus, individualism is not condemned but the superiority of devotion, cooperation and self-sacrifice is duly emphasized. As a certain writer puts it, the Bahá'í teachings "Meet the egoistic longing for an independent individual perfection or blessedness by enunciating the sound psychological principle that, because all human beings are interdependent, fulfillment comes only to him who seeks satisfaction in mutual rather than selfish good."³

This should in no wise imply that the Bahá'í Cause underestimates the worth of the individual. Far from that, it merely emphasizes the fact that a man can best attain his true end by renouncing his purely selfish desires and wishes. If man is a 'social animal', if he is destined by nature to live in a group life he should look first to the interests of the group and only after that to his own needs. For without sacrifice and without at least a partial renunciation of our "egos" we would be unable to live in a world of peace and concord. Surely, in a world contracted and transformed into a single highly complex organism through the tremendous progress achieved in the realm of physical sciences and by the expansion of industry and commerce, individual solitary and selfish living is impossible, nay detrimental to the individual himself. The more society advances the more impelling becomes the necessity of cooperation and social control. We are today living in a world in which social and political interdependence necessitate on the part of the individual some sacrifice, some genuine realization that mutual aid and mutual abandonment of our own individualistic point of view is of the utmost necessity if life is to be made worth living. We should strive at all times to look to "wider horizons" and through self-abnegation and voluntary submissiveness to soar on a higher plane than that in which we are actually living.

THIS IS at least the Bahá'í view of social life. It attempts to reconcile the apparently conflicting principles of individualism and group consciousness. It does not disregard individual differences but emphasizes the necessity of their subordination to the collective interest. It is at once a compromise between extreme individualism and the total annihilation of the self.

With such an emphasis on the social value of life what we have already remarked concerning asceticism, self-mortification and other forms of austerities seems but a logical conclusion. A purely individualistic religion, we said, is no longer compatible with the social conditions of our present world. Religion is no longer an exclusively individual concern. It is above all a social force. Its aim is to further the cause of brotherhood and goodwill and to bring people into a closer contact than before. It is no more a mere personal relationship between the individual and God but essentially a bond of cooperation among the children of mankind.

But the Bahá'ís believe that religion cannot yield its fruits unless it is organized and directed towards a definite goal. Without a social plan and without a common coordinating agency the principles and ideals of Bahá'u'lláh cannot be efficacious. "High aims and pure motives, however laudable in themselves, will surely not suffice if unsupported by measures that are practicable and methods that are sound. Wealth of sentiment, abundance of good-will and effort, will prove of little avail if we should fail to exercise discrimination and restraint and neglect to direct their flow along the most profitable channels. The unfettered freedom of the individual should be tempered with mutual consultation and sacrifice, and the spirit of initiative and enterprise should be reinforced by a deeper realization of the su-

HENCE, THE necessity of some sort of organization. And by organization we should not mean an elaborate sacerdotal hierarchy, a set of rigid dogmas and creeds enforced by an irresponsible authoritative body. Conceived as such, organization stifles the true spirit of religion and becomes a substitute instead of a means. History abundantly proves that in the past such forms of ecclesiastical organizations have hindered true progress and have been causes of stagnation and death.

But the Bahá'í Faith which in no wise upholds the necessity of elaborate religious ceremonies, which possesses no clergy and discards all sorts of verbal traditions, creeds and dogmas, can but condemn every attempt at organizing religion on the same model as the former religious leaders have attempted to do. The Bahá'í religion recognizes the necessity of organization but considers it as a mere tool and not as an end. It further possesses very few institutions and these far from being rigid have been formulated in such a way as to provide for the inevitable changes of time and place.

"As the administrative work of the Cause steadily expands," remarks Shoghi Effendi in one of his general letters, "as its various branches grow in importance and number, it is absolutely necessary that we bear in mind this fundamental fact that all these administrative activities, however harmoniously and efficiently conducted, are but means to an end, and should be regarded as direct instruments for the propagation of the Bahá'í Faith. Let us take heed lest in our great concern for the perfection of the administrative machinery of the Cause, we lose sight of the Divine purpose for which it has been created."²

And in another passage explaining the guiding principles of Bahá'í Administration, he says "Bahá'í Administration, should, I strongly feel, be made to serve a twofold purpose. On the one hand, it should aim at a steady and gradual expansion of the Movement along lines that are at once broad, sound and universal; and on the other it should insure the internal consolidation of the work already achieved. It should both provide the impulse whereby the dynamic forces latent in the Faith can unfold, crystalize, and shape the lives and conduct of men, and serve as a medium for the interchange of thought and the coordination of activities among the divers elements that constitute the Bahá'í community."²

What can all these words indicate if not the vital and active role which the Bahá'í Movement must needs play in the social and political regeneration of mankind? Not that it should mix itself entirely with social and political problems and thereby lose its specifically spiritual character and be reduced to a mere ethical philosophy. But, it should give people the necessary impetus, the firm conviction in the efficacy of God's power for the salvation of the world. It should act as an incentive, as a driving force and not as a political party solely occupied with the material and physical interests of the people.

But assuredly all these social transformations cannot be realized unless the individuals strive on their part to improve their moral and spiritual conduct. For it is only through individual progress that we can hope to see the accomplishment of the progress of societies.

“Not by the force of numbers, not by the mere exposition of a set of new and noble principles, not by an organized campaign of teaching—no matter how worldwide and elaborate in its character—not even

by the staunchness of our faith or the exaltation of our enthusiasm, can we ultimately hope to vindicate in the eyes of a critical and skeptical age the supreme claim of the Abhá Revelation. One thing and only one thing will unfailingly and alone secure the undoubted triumph of this sacred Cause, namely, the extent to which our own inner life and private character mirror forth in their manifold aspects the splendor of those eternal principles proclaimed by Bahá'u'lláh.”²

In such a manner religion will be no more “divorced from man's social life but will rather guide it, stabilize it and protect it, although its own domain is not to be confused with social and political activities.”

“We have arrived . . . at a stage in human evolution when moral value—that which serves the good of humanity and not merely the interest of any one group—determines not alone the desirability but also the feasibility of every public policy and every social program.

That is why the present world crisis escapes every effort to bring it under the control of normal social agencies. When another international war seems imminent, we call the crisis “political” and effort is made to control it by political bodies. When the economic depression seems most acute, we call the crisis “economic” and seek to control it by economic bodies. It would be just as logical to call the crisis “religious” and base our hopes of recovery upon the influence of the churches. In reality, the crisis is at once political, economic and religious, but humanity possesses no responsible, authoritative agency capable of coordinating all the factors and arriving at a world plan which takes all factors into account.

These considerations reveal the vital importance of a new principle of action, a new attitude and a new quality of understanding such as the student of society encounters in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. Here one makes contact with a world view raised above local and partisan interests, and a spirit of faith in divine Providence so profound that it sustains the certitude that mankind will be guided through the most terrible storm of confusion and strife the world has ever faced.”

EDUCATORS OF MATURING MAN

ORROL L. HARPER TURNER

*"The essential requirement and qualification of Prophethood is the training and guidance of the people. * * * The proofs establishing the validity of a Prophet, the proofs of His inspiration, are, after all, the very deeds of valor and greatness which He performs. If a Prophet has proved to be instrumental in the elevation of mankind, undoubtedly His Prophethood is valid."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.*

PERSISTENT, EVER more frequent, rings the question: "Who—are Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá?"

Fifty years ago the mass mind would have replied: "More freak names."

Today, when foreign titles are sought after; when a "Ghandi" holds the front page; when wars and reparations have entangled nations; when a "World Court" and a "League of Nations" meet in periodic conclave; when the economic structure of the world trembles; when the peoples of the earth are drawn together in mutual suffering and need—

We pause. And consider.

Perchance, from out the mist of the yet-to-be-known may come a blessing.

Questing souls the world over are searching, constantly for—

A remedy.

The once impassable mountains of strangeness, division, prejudice for the unfamiliar, fear of the unknown and inexperienced — are crumbling before the eyes of necessity.

The whip of suffering has roused humanity from a sleep of ages. Man is sitting up, rubbing his eyes, peering through the bars of his fingers—with surprise!

Complacency, self-satisfaction, smug assurance, are lashed on the raw. Man is forced to listen, for sounds that may bring—help.

The pot of human ignorance is stirred from the bottom. Defects of nature float to the top—waiting to be skimmed.

Starvation—has directed man's attention to his "inner parts."

Mistakes, frustrations, aborted efforts, apparent failure, have turned man loose in the "valley of search." The bewildered traveler looks with dismay at the banks of clay on either side—that must be climbed—if the vista beyond is to be glimpsed!

Hopes, plans, ambitions, have been backed up and promoted by—effort. Artists, architects, have "dreamed" their "castles" and struggled to produce them in outward form. Students have concentrated, worked, borrowed, to obtain an education. Physicians have prescribed, treated, operated, put forth utmost endeavor to establish health in their patients. Sincerity has strengthened effort, giving power to the toilers.

SUCCESS HAS BEEN ever in prospect and yet, we see on every hand: unappreciated pictures; empty houses; trained instructors without a school; people—starving, homeless, without work, minus salary; people—sick, disappointed, disillusioned, dead.

If: "Capacity increases — with sincerity and striving."

And: "Capacity attracts"—fulfillment of life.

Why: Is the world at loss? In chaos? At war? In despair?

Why: Is the night of man's ignorance so black?

Why: Are the steep of attainment so difficult to scale?

Why: Is the bird of man's soul so helpless?

"Why?" Because man (in the mass) does not know his real "inner part." Is not conscious of an immortal self. Is not awake to eternal values.

Materially minded, he mixes his brew of mundane adventure: eats, drinks, sleeps, plays, works, in and for—a limited self.

Not until—vicissitudes, trials, tests, catastrophes, experience, drive man's effort beyond the "limited," beyond unconscious, automatic evolution; not until man awakens from the "sleep of ages," can he become conscious of—a spiritual Self.

Only a comparative few of earth's inhabitants have learned to free their souls from matter, have begun to spread the wings of spirit and soar to heights of illumined knowledge.

WRITERS LIKE THE noted educator, Stanwood Cobb, manifest an awakened spirit. In his book, "Discovering The Genius Within You," he says:

"The soul of man should be the master, not the slave, of the world-about-us. . . .

"Improvement of the Self will unfailingly bring an improvement of the environment. . . .

"Every heaven must be earned. . . .

"Can we not conceive that there may exist somewhere perfection, though the material universe as a transitory phenomenal concatenation of events is still in the making? . . .

"May it not be . . . that in the main the concepts of the idealists and of the pragmatists may both be true and capable of harmonious adjustment each to the other?"

"The universe is in the making—yes! We have both the opportunity and obligation of perfecting it. But the Plan is there, already existing as a potentiality and as a constructive force; and when we strive wisely we work in accordance with the blueprints of Destiny!"

In another book, "The Meaning of Life," Mr. Cobb asserts:

"I have come to the conclusion that the sole purpose of life, so far as the individual is concerned, is growth through struggle. . . .

"Movement is the sign of life. It is more than that. It is the essence of life. . . .

"Right effort applied wisely and persistently cannot fail to win out. A remarkable statement to this effect emanates from one whose own life exemplifies extraordinarily the power to achieve a world mission in the face of apparently overwhelming odds; for although a prisoner for forty years, he yet managed from prison walls to spread over the whole world his message of universal peace and goodwill.

"Man must be tireless in his efforts," says 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 'The Divine Art of Living.' 'Once his effort is directed in the proper channel if he does not succeed today he will succeed tomorrow. Effort in itself is one of the noblest traits of human character. Devotion to one's calling, effort in its speedy execution, simplicity of spirit and steadfastness through all the ups and downs, these are the hall-marks of success. A person characterized with those attributes will gather the fruits of his labors and will also win the happiness of the Kingdom."

In his chapter on "Intuitions and Inspirations," in "Discovering the Genius Within You," Mr. Cobb says:

"'Abdu'l-Bahá, Persian seer and interpreter of the world-wide Baha'i movement, explains how it is that the cosmic rays reach man, in the form of spiritual and creative guidance. The Divine Power of the universe—that Power which we call God—must remain incomprehensible and impenetrable to man. It can never be directly perceived. But its force reaches human beings, just as the force of the sun reaches the earth, by emanation and radiation. The Spirit which makes contact with the spirit of man is this radiant messenger which bridges the gap between unknowable divine Reality and man. Only if the mirror of man's heart is tarnished, dull and dusty is little reflection possible. That is why some individuals strongly reflect the creative force of the universe and others but weakly. "This spiritual force," says 'Abdu'l-Baha, 'is the energizing factor in the life of man.' By its means are manifested the various expressions of man's genius in the realm of art, of learning, of science and of achievement in general!"

In his chapter, "The Midas Touch," Mr. Cobb says:

"It was Bahá'u'lláh, the Persian prophet, who in speaking of the dignity of labor said: 'Work done in the spirit of service is equivalent to prayer.'

"When I visited Haifa to interview 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the successor to the leadership of the Bahá'í movement, I noticed among His followers a man with a white halo of hair and a very saintlike countenance. He attracted my attention. He seemed to me the most spiritual of the men in the Persian colony living with 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Upon inquiry, I learned that this man was quite illiterate, but had for years served Bahá'u'lláh lovingly and faithfully in the capacity of cook. His whole life had indeed been a proof that work done in the spirit of service is a spiritual exercise, refining both to man's personality and to his innermost soul."

THUS, from a soul "awake" to life's vital meaning, do we receive the beginnings of an answer to the question: "Who are Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá?"

Mr. Cobb tells us that Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá lived in Persia.

Bahá'u'lláh is the Founder of a "movement" for "universal peace and goodwill." A "Prophet" with a message to the world. A man "whose own life exemplified extraordinarily the power to achieve a world mission in the face of apparently overwhelming odds." A man who upholds the "dignity of labor." Calls "effort one of the noblest traits of human character." A "spirit of service," of "devotion to one's calling" — "equivalent to prayer." A man who proclaims the "spiritual force" of the universe—"the energizing factor in the life of man."

'Abdu'l-Bahá, "interpreter of the world-wide Bahá'í movement, lived forty years in prison."

Why was He in prison?

History tells us, He was the Son of Bahá'u'lláh. Was thrown into the penal colony of 'Akká (Acre) in Palestine along with His Father and a group of Bahá'u'lláh's adherents in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-eight.

Why was Bahá'u'lláh imprisoned?

Because His teachings were spiritual and far in advance of the day in which He lived. The mass mind steeped in the ignorance of materialism made Him a target for drastic persecution.

What did His teachings consist of?

That is a big question. Its answer involves the perusal of numerous volumes — unending study and thought.

Can you imagine a man, thrown into a vermin-infested dungeon, weighted down with heavy chains, surrounded by stench and filth, a man we had never met or even heard of—so interested in you and me, in the welfare of the entire human race—that He would spend hours of each day praying for us?

Can you imagine a man incarcerated for life, kept in close confinement for years, taking the trouble to send a message to the ruling heads of nations?

To beg help for Himself? No, indeed. To call the attention of the leaders of each country to the beginning of a new era in which universal peace would become a dominant note.

Do you know that as far back as eighteen hundred and forty-four, the need for—universal peace—was proclaimed?

Realize if you can, that between the years eighteen hundred seventeen and eighteen hundred ninety-two, there lived on earth a Being—so concerned about your happiness and mine, about your progress and mine, about the well-being of all created people, that he was glad, for our sakes, to live and die in prison!

Are you aware that in nineteen hundred and eight, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was freed from the prison from which His Father had soared to other realms—sixteen years before?

During the latter part of the incarceration, Bahá'u'llah and family were given a house in the prison city. Have you heard that people—from all over the world—were permitted to visit that prison home?

From all accounts it must have been an inspiring scene even if one did not profit by the spiritual uplift. Americans, Europeans, Asiatics, Africans; Jews, Christians, Muhammadans, Buddhists; white skins, brown skins, yellow, red and black skins—sat around His table and mingled in friendly contact. People from everywhere, from all walks of life: scientists, scholars, physicians, lawyers, artists, educators, laborers, rich and poor—sought Him out.

I was not there. Bahá'u'lláh had come and gone before I was old enough to think. But I was privileged to meet and talk with 'Abdu'l-Bahá in nineteen hundred and twelve when He visited the United States.

The story of that almost unbelievable experience is too long for this brief article. Suffice it to say, the effect of that contact is with me—always.

WHO was Bahá'u'lláh?

He was: A Manifestation of divine Love. A Friend to every created being. A heavenly Gardener for human-flowers. A spiritual Physician for the healing of world-woe. The divine Educator of maturing man. A Unifier of diversities. A Harmonizer of difference in opinion.

'Abdu'l-Bahá was the interpreter, the expounder of Bahá'u'lláh's teachings. His name ('Abdu'l-Bahá)—means "Servant of God." He desired no eulogy. He told us His highest glory was found in the station of servitude. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of the servants of God.

Do I hear you calling for more information concerning the teachings of these illumined Messengers?

If we talked for a lifetime, we should but scratch the surface of their import. I shall, however, mention a few high points of interest.

1. They proclaim:

The fundamental—Oneness—of humanity; "Ye are all the leaves of one tree." The fundamental—Oneness—of phenomena; (microcosm and macrocosm). The fundamental—Oneness—of science and religion. The fundamental—Oneness—of all religions. One God. The fundamental—Oneness and continuity of prophetic Revelation.

2. They point out the benefits of:

Universal peace. Universal love (seeing the "good" in everyone). Universal cooperation. Universal arbitration. Universal understanding. Universal education. A universal language. Service to mankind.

3. They advocate:

Universal disarmament (simultaneous). A Universal Tribunal in which every nation in the world—large and small—shall have representation.

The changing of warships into merchant marine. An international police.

4. They offer a detailed Plan for:

Economic adjustment (with the poor and rich fully protected and provided for).

Taxation.

Support of schools of learning.

Adequate, assured compensation for trained instructors.

The care of the helpless, sick, aged and unfortunate.

5. They glorify the farming community as a nucleus for a world-wide material civilization.

6. They glorify the home as a nucleus for human civilization.

7. They glorify the evolving consciousness of man as a nucleus for a world-wide-spiritual-civilization.

8. They tell us a new race is in process of formation.

9. They tell us a universal civilization is passing through the pangs of birth.

Who was Bahá'u'lláh?

He was a pure Channel for the creative Word of God in our age. Again, we can say: "No man spake as this man."

The "breezes of the Infinite" wafted and His Pen was used to convey to mankind a Revelation, divine in origin, universal in scope, exact in detail.

What proof have we that Bahá'u'lláh's Message is Divine? The proof: of life, of prevision, of remedy.

His life was a full-blown Flower of Service planted in the earth-of-man; watered by the blood of more than twenty thousand martyrs; and sacrificed for the benefit of human kind.

Long before you and I had begun to think of universal peace, Bahá'u'lláh had proclaimed its need. Years before the world found itself at loss, strangled by the devastating effects of war and greed, Bahá'u'lláh had sent out a warning—suggesting specific means for prevention and remedy.

How can we be sure the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh contains the "remedy" we need?

"By their fruits ye shall know them."

In "The New World Order," Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, says:

"Leaders of religion, exponents of political theories, governors of human institutions, who at present are witnessing with perplexity and dismay the bankruptcy of their ideas, and the disintegration of their handiwork, would do well to turn their gaze to the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh and to meditate upon the World Order which, lying enshrined in His teachings, is slowly and imperceptibly rising amid the welter and chaos of present-day civilization."

STUDYING THE NEW WORLD ORDER

Bahá'í Summer School, Geyserville, California

MARION HOLLEY

The author, member of the Bahá'í Youth Group on the Pacific Coast and a recent graduate of Stanford University, gives us here a vivid picture of her observations as a student at the Summer School. The appeal of the Bahá'í Movement to Youth is happily described by her when she says, "Youth touched the environment there to new radiance of enthusiasm."

IN these days of increasing trial, when a renewed and supreme effort must be exerted by the followers of Bahá'u'lláh who would meet the intense struggle for existence and in addition complete the structure of their Temple in Wilmette, near Chicago, Illinois, when the labor of teaching grows with the opportunities and needs presented by this breakdown of a social system, when hearts have been strangely spiritually quieted by the passing of Bahiyyih Khanum¹—in such crucial times it is surely very fitting that a true omen of victory should appear, to hearten and strengthen their endeavors. From all parts of the United States comes news of success: a National Bahá'í Convention memorable for its spirit; enthusiastic days at Louhelen Ranch;² a vigorous conference for racial amity in Green Acre.³ And on the Pacific Coast Bahá'ís were privileged to experience a similar success.

The delegates to the Bahá'í Summer School at Geyserville, California, an institution of six years' standing, achieved at last that full sense of unity and fellowship towards which the whole movement of Bahá'í activity drives. With what simplicity one may state an accomplishment of this sort. But it is simplicity which belies the struggle, minimizes the single-hearted concentration on an ideal, obscures the hopeful desires of a hundred people, and omits all mention of the intoxication of mind and heart which results to these participants, and indeed to all who rest their conviction upon the future of a new type of humanity, conducting their mutual affairs in a harmony quite alien to our present competitive society.

The whole nature of a Bahá'í Summer School is subtly expressive of the institutions of the coming age. Although its principle purpose is education; although the curriculum is arranged to meet the needs of developing teachers, thus including courses in the history, program and administration of the Bahá'í Cause, as well as instruction by competent teachers in the fields of economics, comparative religions, and social institutions; although a large proportion of the activity is purposely intellectual, as is the activity in any secular university; yet the operations of the mind are seasoned with a spiritual awareness which is no by-product, but a conscious object, and a tangible expression of the inter-relationship of all the fields of human endeavor.

For, strictly speaking, in a Bahá'í society there is no distinction between things secular and things religious. The abiding sense of the stable presence of a Creator Whose will is manifested to this world through the person of a Prophet, remains with Bahá'is to permeate and guide their lives, in whatever objective pursuits they are engaged. No longer does a core of faith draw around itself immobile dogmas and practices; a distinct institution denoted as religion is not possible. The faith, rather, goes out to engage in life, and the secular, being spiritualized, is raised to the level of a new order of action. "People think religion is confined to an edifice, to be worshipped at an altar. In reality it is an attitude toward divinity which is reflected through life."¹

Undoubtedly the sources of inspiration were stronger at Geyserville this summer than at any preceding time. From the opening Feast, spread under a great and ancient fir tree now grown symbolic to Western Bahá'is, direct contact was established with the energetic spirit of Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause. Returning pilgrims carried his influence; and his own messages to the School and to the American friends established his presence so firmly as to make him seem a real and potent participant. It was by his explicit desire that the program was altered to include a complete study of The Dawnbreakers.² And it was from this study that the significant power of the Geyserville School arose.

Who, in one hasty reading, could estimate the full weight of Nabil, or discover within his dignified and quiet pages those "hidden springs of celestial strength" which so subtly exert their authority upon the minds of earnest students? Delight succeeds interest, and astonishment delight, as the characters of the early believers stir to life, move and act out their intense drama before a wondering imagination. The shock of their tragedy, at first stunning the reader, later invigorates him and impels him to a profound re-dedication of his energies to that Faith whose tremendous import has for a moment been visioned. Such a process, stimulating enough to an isolated student, gains an enormous impetus within a group, and at Geyserville engendered a corporate experience of exhilaration and unity never to be forgotten.

Parallel lectures, accompanying the study of Nabil, served to point out in other ways the unique position of the Bahá'í Cause. From a survey of the competitive and conflicting tendencies of the present order, the need for a renewal of religious and moral motives became all too evident. It was also effectively pointed out that the older sources of inspiration for such motives are so overlaid with static institutional expressions, with meaningless dogma and efflorescent organization, that man is not warranted in expecting from them the assistance he requires. Not even Christianity and Muhammadanism, most recent of the religions, have escaped the process of history, that process which unflinchingly crystallizes and vitiates.

A renewal of religion is therefore constantly required, and it was to ¹Abdu'l-Bahá, Bahá'í Year Book, Vol. 1, p. 59.

²Nabil's Narrative of the early history of the Bahá'í Cause.

fulfill this purpose that the Bahá'í Cause was promulgated. It is the spirit for this age; but although, like other earth-bound manifestations, it may be expected to grow inflexible in a proper time, this spirit differs from previous religions in one very vital aspect: namely, the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh. For the Bahá'í Faith is first among all the religions of man to bring its own form or Order, an Order which exerts an equally divine authority, and through which the power of the original impulse can be fitly and fully externalized.

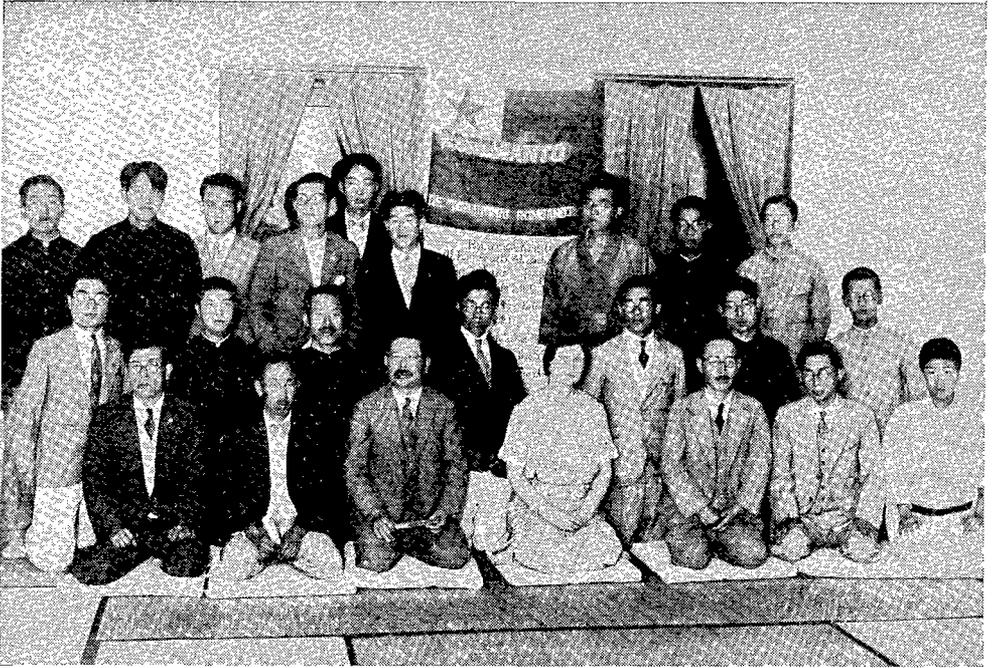

It is with constant amazement that one recalls the variety and extent of Summer School activities. No arena of life goes unrepresented. While the mind grapples with concepts strange and often difficult, the soul pursues as tenaciously those elusive qualities with which it seeks to array itself. Yet Geyserville is not a solemn place when Bahá'ís assemble. Recreation—whether in the form of sports, or music, or dancing, or that informal discussion which settles down so happily under the shade of the Big Tree—is an integral part of the program. Nor are the practical phases neglected, for a school is as much a laboratory as a study. Consequently, there are public meetings where teaching theories may be tested, and children's classes conducted by younger Bahá'ís. It is a source of pleasure that these activities are building themselves into the lives of the townspeople, who send their children to associate with ours, and often plan to share both meetings and entertainments.

Infinite are the memories of the summer, memories fragrant with the hospitality of our hosts, John and Louise Bosch, memories humorous and provocative and sobering. But how sterile must be a description of two such weeks, wherein a constant innovation of thought and feeling outdistanced, rendered forceless one's choicest words. Youth touched the environment there to new radiance of enthusiasm; profound mutuality of enterprise mingled individual restraint; fellowship generated cheerfulness; and the achievement sustained itself at times to the border of that condition wherein men find themselves "as one soul in different bodies." Geyserville, crown of long effort, presages that new day, when at last "the supreme virtues of man will glisten over the face of the earth."

"That which the Lord hath ordained as the sovereign remedy and mightiest instrument for the healing of all the world is the union of all its peoples in one universal Cause, one common Faith. This can in no wise be achieved except through the power of a skilled, an all-powerful and inspired Physician. This verily is the truth, and all else naught but error."

THE above picture will be of special interest to our readers because it was at this meeting given by the Esperantists of Tomakomai that the Bahá'í Teachings were explained for the first time on the Island of Hokkaido. The meeting was arranged by Mr. Tadashi Watanabe of the Tomakomai Technical School and an enthusiastic Esperantist. Miss Alexander, distinguished Bahá'í teacher, also a fluent Esperantist, gave the Bahá'í Teachings in that language. On many other occasions on her tour of the Island, she spoke on the Bahá'í Teachings in Esperanto, Mr. Watanabe translating into Japanese. Her audiences were composed for the most part of professional men, teachers, druggists, etc., exceptional young men, outstanding thinkers, progressive, searching for truth with unprejudiced minds.

It was through the great principle of Bahá'u'lláh—that of a Universal Language—that these introductions and opportunities were made possible. Mr. Watanabe whose untiring efforts paved the way for this service, heard of the Bahá'í Teachings in Seattle, and when he returned to Japan and the Island of Hokkaido he published many fine articles on the Bahá'í Cause.

Thus the leaven works because it is good leaven. The peoples and races of the world are being slowly but surely linked up into one community. The old barriers which kept different sections of the human race apart are disappearing. When Bahá'u'lláh appeared "in the fullness of time," He poured out the spirit on all humanity, through the power of His creative Word, which destroyed forever those solid walls of cast and creed and prejudice which were so characteristically divisive.

WINGS OVER EUROPE

FLORENCE E. PINCHON

"The Hosts of the Kingdom of Abha are drawn up and filed in battle array on the plain of the Supreme Apex and are expecting that a band of volunteers will step upon the field of action, with the intention of service, so that they may assist that band and make it victorious and triumphant."

THE destinies of Europe hang tremblingly in a delicate balance. Mighty forces impelling towards co-operation or chaos, harmony or disruption are swaying this way and that in fateful combat. Beneath the hovering wings of the angels of Light and the watchful Hosts of the Supreme Concourse, the principalities and powers of Darkness marshal their unseen array. Every hour seems fraught with issues of world-wide importance.

Those aware of the operation of these conflicting forces, and who find themselves sensitised to changes taking place in their mental and spiritual environment, will be in a position to appreciate the significance of many fresh undercurrents in the spiritual life of Great Britain today.

Here, in her mighty capital, beneath all the gay social functions of the season, the frivolous and changeful fashions, the music, exhibitions and holiday affairs, the national waves of excitement that attend sweepstakes, sporting contests and our famous horseraces, a deeper note is sounding. It is something more than the result of financial anxiety, or mere humanitarianism—that natural kindness of the British nature towards the sick and suffering, whether in the human or animal world. It is typified by the fact that, for the first time in our history, London churches are not only uniting in prayer for the distressed world, but are flinging wide their doors to the masses of city workers for daily intercession and meditation.

Muhammad declared that: "Prayer is a ladder by which everyone may ascend to heaven." And the natural instinct of even the most thoughtless of men is to turn, in the time of trouble and calamity, to some greater Power. As 'Abdul'-Bahá points out, so intimately is the universe interrelated in all its parts that even physical calamities, such as floods or earthquakes, are an indirect consequence of humanity's violation of God's laws. Yet are the sufferings involved not judgments of wrath, but have been designed, in His mercy, to exercise remedial and educative effects on the minds and in the hearts of men, and cause them to turn to Him.

The quickening of the Spirit is also manifest in an increasing effort towards closer union among the churches, both Established and Free, with a pronounced broadening and spiritualising of their message. While on the radio, in lecture hall, conference and summer school, professors, experts, and men and women prominent in widely different capacities analyse, with an unusual candour and sincerity, the problems that confront the world, and advocate the principles of a new internationalism.

Among the many recent anti-war demonstrations, the most impressive were those organized by the Women's Peace Crusade, and held simultaneously in Manchester, where it was led by that great internationalist Professor Gilbert Murray, and in Queen's Hall, London.

Here, in this famous centre of the music-loving world, assembled what Sir Philip Gibbs described as "a truly great and historic gathering." And not even the magic baton of England's most popular conductor could have evoked a warmer response or touched to deeper emotion the crowded audience, painfully aware as it was of the tremendous issues now at stake,—issues that involve the fate of Europe and ultimately of civilization itself.

In this beautiful hall, adorned with the ensigns of the nations and the green and white banners of peace, it was a moving sight to see such veteran pioneers for women's freedom and emancipation as the aged Mrs. Despard and Mrs. Pethick-Lawrence, and that noble band who through long years have laboured and suffered in order to create new and higher ideals in the minds of their fellow-countrymen. The fruit of their work appeared in that it was now possible for women of every class, creed and party to meet, on equal terms with men, in support of one common cause—the cause to which they have lately testified at Geneva by some two million signatures. Bright shade of Qurratu'l-Ayn did you rejoice in that hour?

AMONG THE many distinguished speakers was Viscount Cecil of Chelwood, now grey and worn by many a noble battle, whose quiet but authoritative voice has through long years swayed with such wisdom the councils of the friends of universal peace. He reminded us that the tasks before Statesmen at Geneva were immensely complicated, with all the Government experts floundering in a slough of technicalities. Scarcely had their representatives begun to deal with the intricate maze of international affairs. Yet with soft words and vague aspirations the peoples could no longer be satisfied. They now demanded decisions, followed by deeds. Experts should not be allowed to decide policy; that was the function of Governments, fully sanctioned by their peoples. Earnestly he advocated the control of civil aviation which could in any way be adapted to military purposes, and the formation of an international air force by the League of Nations with sanctions to defend any country attacked. Only a sympathetic understanding of the difficulties existing between France and Germany, impartial justice, a sense of their profound responsibilities, and a determination to overcome all the obstacles that prevented the establishment of arbitration and complete international control, could save civilization. Profoundly grave were Lord Cecil's warnings. "There is a very sinister feature to all the disarmament conferences. I refer to the tremendous power wielded against all the proposals by armament firms." He instanced the opposition which was internationally organised and working very effectively by underground methods; the power of money over the press, vested interests, and other reactionary forces which were fostering suspicion and increasing the sense of national insecurity.

To Bahá'í friends, many of whom were warmly supporting the meeting, the words of this wise Statesman came as an echo of the councils of Bahá'u'lláh. And as 'Abdu'l-Bahá once observed:

"God has set up no frontiers between France and Germany . . . selfish souls for the promotion of their own interest assigned boundaries and outlets and day by day attached more importance to these, until this led to intense enmity, bloodshed and rapacity . . . if this conception of patriotism remains limited within a certain circle, this will be the primary cause of the world's destruction."

DR. MAUD ROYDEN, the well-known woman preacher, the formation of whose Peace Army recently created so much interest, touched all hearts as she described the monster Fear, to whom the peoples were in bondage. Fear of loss in every shape and form, fear of poverty and unemployment actual or perspective, fear of sudden attack from the air by gas and poisoned chemicals, fear of other nations which was akin to a madness and drove humanity on towards the very things it feared. Significant words! A confirmation of the warning given by Bahá'u'lláh so long ago:

"O People of the Earth! Know verily a sudden ordeal is following ye, and a great eagle is pursuing ye."

The speaker emphasised the responsibility of just ordinary men and women—the little people. In the parable of the Ten Talents, it was the man who, having only one talent, would not bother to use it, that received severe condemnation.

To lighten the burdens of our neighbours, to contribute our mite of money or time or influence, to spread the spirit of co-operation and goodwill among classes and nations was the duty of everyone, however humble, and God would require it of us.

As 'Abdu'l-Bahá advised:
 "When a thought of war comes, oppose it by a stronger thought of peace. A thought of hatred must be destroyed by a more powerful thought of love."

SIR PHILIP GIBBS, with that gift for touching scenes of darkness and terror with spiritual beauty which made him famous as a war correspondent, recalled some of his experiences at the front. Had the world not even yet learnt its bitter lesson? Had the dolorous road to the Menin Gate been trodden by the flower of our Youth in vain? Above our beautiful green earth hovered again, today, the menacing wings of fire, destruction, chaos. Yet Youth, to whom the last war seemed only like some dim nightmare haunting the background of childish memory—continued heedless. Would they not strive to cultivate a sense of their responsibility, and answer the call to a nobler form of service in the cause of Peace? Coming from one whose writings evince such sympathy with the outlook of the younger generation, the warning and appeal created a deep impression.

Sir Norman Angell, author of "The Great Illusion" and other brilliant analytical works which have done so much to destroy the false glamour and expose the pitiful futility of war, spoke of the difficulties that workers for World Peace have to encounter, alike from concealed foes or irrational friends. From those who unreasonably demand a sudden Utopia, and those who believe that Utopias are impossible. Let us meet such with clear thinking, patience and courage. Let us be willing to take any step so long as it is forward. Lethargy and indifference stood across the road to Security. The attempt to secure a nation's safety by each one trying to become stronger than its neighbor had failed. It had failed to give us security of daily bread, security from unemployment, from financial disaster, from the complete breakdown of our civilization. Prosperous trade, a stable money, a sound economic future for the British people could only be secured by international means. Any monetary system, for instance, would break down unless it was based on international agreement. But international agreement for any purpose whatever, was impossible so long as nations could not agree to combine for their defense. The first task of international cooperation was international cooperation for defense. Under the old system, the litigants armed themselves, and tried each to be his own judge; under the new, we were trying to stand behind the law against the isolated peace breaker. To the degree to which this process of transferring power from the litigant to the law went on, disarmament became workable, and power could perform its proper social function in an organised society.

The Resolution then adopted by the meeting urged the Conference at Geneva to abolish certain classes of warships, submarines, tanks, naval and military aircraft, the private manufacture and traffic in arms, and establish international control of aircraft that could be converted to offensive purposes.

A young airman, in neat blue uniform, then stepped forward, and receiving the packet amid enthusiastic applause, passed quickly out into the night. Imagination followed him, as he winged his lonely flight across the tender blue of the summer sky, bearing to the Councils of the Nations the hope and resolve of the women of these islands, that so should be brought a little nearer that Most Great Peace, for which longs a heavy-laden and agonised world.

A FEW DAYS later, the Bahá'ís held a public meeting of their own, which was addressed by that devoted servant of the Cause, Mrs. Mary Hanford Ford, who emphasised the spiritual solvents offered to the troubled world by God's great Messenger. Alike to statesmen in their perplexity, and to the suffering and bewildered peoples, the Plan and the Way had been made plain for all to see and strive to follow.

Thus slowly but surely the Light of a New Day is breaking through the storm-charged clouds, and spiritual energies are finding release through fresh channels, as those that are outworn crumble away.

THE NATURE OF THE DIVINE MANIFESTATIONS

2. SPIRITS AND GODS

GLENN A. SHOOK

Professor of Physics, Wheaton College

In the first chapter in this series, published in the October number, the author directed particular attention to the slow evolutionary process of the concept of God from the earliest times. Herein he stresses the nature of the Divine Manifestations. The third and concluding chapter will appear in the December number.

IF, even in our own day it is difficult for men to grasp the concept of the world as a whole, it is surely not surprising that among earlier mankind such an effort was not made. As man in early times found it impossible to explain every phenomenon in terms of his own physical activity, he was led to create a galaxy of more or less independent spirits to account for what he saw and experienced. Then, as his time and opportunity for thinking and clarifying and co-ordinating ideas increased, he simplified this system by introducing deities for some universal cause. For example, at first a multitude of spirits healed various diseases, or perhaps the same disease upon different days and occasions, but as man came to think of healing in a general sense, a deity was assigned to this concept of healing. The deity can now preside over all healing, and what is more important, as Hocking points out,¹ the deity has a continuous character and may support a definite relationship. The god is no longer attached to particular physical objects but he is still associated with the tangible.

With a deity ruling over recurring events real progress begins, for now experience enters in and it is even possible to maintain a record of the god's deeds. Such records form a large part of the tradition of every religious people. Greek history is replete with the deeds of their gods, as Hebrew history is filled with the deeds of its God. The continuous character of a deity may even be studied, so to speak. The local prophet often reviews the tradition of his people, stressing points that have been overlooked or neglected, and adding to their knowledge of God or their gods as the case may be. When St. Paul was in Athens he made good use of the Greek propensity for gods in his famous speech on Mars Hill. In a few paragraphs he gives them an exalted picture of the one true God.

While some of the early ideas of their deities seem crude and materialistic to us, we should not overlook the fact that the most highly developed mystics of our day sometimes think and speak of the Divine Presence as a light, a vibration or an outpouring, although realizing at the same time that the Absolute can have none of these attributes. Perhaps even primitive man often thought and felt beyond the imagery of his religious institution.

¹Hocking—"The Meaning of God in Human Experience"

Again, if we are in a state of development we cannot think of the growth of the concept of God as a progress from error to truth. Our scientific experience of the last three hundred years has demonstrated that, as far as scientific knowledge goes, we have not passed from error to truth, but rather from one stage to a higher stage. The crude ideas of primitive man were true to him, but new experience down through the ages has extended and modified his concepts. There is a god of healing and a god of plant life, but we believe it is the same god. On the other hand we still believe in tribal gods until we unite all religions, and in a few hundred years, at most, the entire world will look upon this present plurality of religions as an error. In short, a plurality of gods is no more error than a plurality of religions, however complaisantly we may regard the latter.

WE ARE NOT concerned, however, wholly with what primitive man thought about God. We may pause to ask what was God's relation to man? Did the deity to whom primitive man prayed answer his prayers? Did he receive help and comfort in the time of his troubles? Undoubtedly God answered prayers then as He does today, namely according to our capacity. God cannot confer bounties upon people if they are not ready for them. An ignorant, undeveloped man has no cultural wants or desires. He does not ask for faith and knowledge of God, and he, therefore, cannot be endowed with those qualities.

Primitive man probably asked for such things as rain, sons, and victory in battle, and these he undoubtedly received according to the wisdom of God. Some of the principles of the Bahá'í Cause like the oneness of the world of humanity, independent investigation of truth, equality of men and women, would have been almost meaningless to the early Christian church even at its zenith.

But humanity as a whole did not evolve gradually, step by step. It is highly probable that every advance was made by some spiritual genius. Every real advance that has been made in art or music, for example, can be attributed to some individual rather than to the masses. Even the so-called folk songs are believed to be the creation of some musical genius and not that of a group of people of average musical ability. What we label good music today is that which has been created by masters and not the sum total of all the creations of mediocrity. Thus it is not unlikely that in prehistoric times some exceptional individual with greater insight than the average served to raise the general level of religious thought. This does not mean, however, that only the best was transmitted, or that the best was very near to what we might be pleased to call the truth. Hocking was undoubtedly right when he said¹; "It is a curious paradox that this most original and constant knowledge should be the most and longest subject to change, the most ancient subject of human experimentation, the most encumbered with rubbish and error. We understand in part the reason for these errors. We understand that it is not natural for man to reflect, becoming fully aware of that with which he is thinking. We understand that we have little or no native power of recognizing either self or God apart from mediators: so that in the conceptions we make of God there must always be an overburden and overinfluence of the medium, physical or personal, wherein God is thought."

From remote times, then, man has struggled with two ideas, God as pure spirit and God incarnate, or the One and the Absolute, on the one hand, and the moral and personal on the other. In speaking in this connection Hocking says¹; "After all, there is no other essential error in thinking of God than this: that God becomes an object among other objects, natural or psychical. And this is not all error. For not only do these over-materialized conceptions hold fast the genuine objectivity of God (which all-important character is usually weakened by attempts to think of God as pure spirit); but further, there is indispensable truth in the tendency to incarnate God in his works, and to think of him as there where his activity is and where his objects are. I would rather have a worshipper of a thousand idols than a worshipper of a subjective deity or an abstraction."

When we come to recorded history the ideas are more refined, but still in the process of development. We need not dwell upon this period as everyone is familiar with Old Testament history and it is replete with examples of the changing viewpoint. As a passing example, contrast the God of Genesis, who cannot find Adam when he hides from Him, with the God of the Psalms, or again the God of the Proverbs with the God of the New Testament.

WHEN THE Universal Manifestation comes He floods the earth with light, and questions that perplexed the sages of all time are elucidated in a few words, that is, to the people of capacity. Thus with the coming of Christ the world was confronted with new questions. Christ gave a new interpretation of God and He also raised questions regarding Himself. Those nearest Him could not comprehend His station and they were not a little bothered by this fact. In one instance He raises the question Himself; "Whom do men say that I, the Son of man, am?" They answered that some said that he was John the Baptist, Elias, Jeremiah or one of the prophets. When He asked the disciples what they themselves thought, Peter answered, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." The Jews as a whole put the burden of proof upon Him as is clearly shown by their question: "How long dost thou make us to doubt? If thou be the Christ, tell us plainly." But He could not tell them plainly, for they were not seeking the truth. Eventually, however, a few did realize His station and they revolutionized the religions of Europe. Although His own people did not accept Him, nevertheless they were better prepared than most of the nations to promote

His teachings. Merely as an historical character the progress He made in divine knowledge was so great that He must be classed as a spiritual genius. He is now recognized as peerless and unique.

What happened? Manifestly the world was ready for a great message and God sent this great light. To many devout followers of Christ this is the consummation of all religious history, and yet there is nothing in the words of Christ nor the prophets that would lead necessarily to this conclusion, and our experiences would indicate that a great spiritual leader is as necessary today as at any time in the past. Christ did not indicate that divine revelation had come to an end. Everything was not accomplished at this time. The world must go through greater agony and confusion in order to appreciate the value of prophetic religion. We are still worshippers of idols in the form of gold and philosophical abstractions.

Nevertheless this is the Divine Plan as we comprehend it. The race, as the individual, learns of its weakness through blunders. It grows and develops by striving and overcoming. Through the dark ages the station of Christ was an enigma. Was He human or divine? The church apparently solved this fundamental problem by combining the cultural mysticism of the Hellenistic mystery-religions with prophetic or revealed religion resulting in the so-called "Christian God-mysticism". The morals and ethics of the church were derived from revealed religion, i. e., from the Old and New Testament, but their ideas of God and Christ were considerably modified, to say the least, by mediaeval mysticism.

The disastrous results of this experiment are obvious to any student of religious history. Heiler, in speaking of this period says,¹ "The static God with whom the mystic in his ecstasy becomes wholly one is outside time and space, without any vital relation to the world and history." And again: "Mysticism and religion of revelation are the two opposite tendencies of the higher piety which in history ever repel, yet ever attract each other."

The Religion of Bahá'u'lláh, however, is inclusive and needs no interpreter other than 'Abdu'l-Bahá who was appointed by the Divine Manifestation, Bahá'u'lláh.

¹Heiler "Prayer"

"When religion, shorn of its superstitions, traditions and unintelligent dogmas, shows its conformity with science, then there will be a great unifying, cleansing force in the world which will sweep before it all wars, disagreements, discords and struggles, and then will mankind be united in the power of the love of God."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

This is the fourth and concluding part in the serial story of the martyrdom of Ali Muhammad Varqá and his little son, Ruhu'lláh, early Persian Bahá'ís. The preceding chapters gave a summary of the family history, copies of Tablets (letters) of Bahá'u'lláh addressed to them, a brief account of the wonderful pilgrimage of the father and his two sons to 'Akká to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and in the last number the poem which the little son, Ruhu'lláh, wrote in connection with his desire for martyrdom.

RHUHU'LLAH: you are worth a thousand Násr-ed-Din Sháhs! Násr-ed-Din Sháh was the Sháhan-sháh (King of Kings) who ruled when the Báb was shot with a thousand bullets, when Bahá'u'lláh was exiled with His family; and he was the Ruler in Ruhu'lláh's day.

Persecutions quickly increased in violence in Zanján and Ali Muhammad Varqá was urged to bring his family and come to Tihrán to teach the Bahá'í Cause. He sent Azizollah, who was then fourteen years old, on ahead to stay with the grandfather, and he and Ruhu'lláh started one month later. They were arrested with other Bahá'ís when they were about half-way to Tihrán and were taken back to Zanján with heavy chains about their necks and their feet in stocks. The governor of Zanján spoke with them and asked if they were Bahá'ís. Ali Muhammad Varqá spoke first and said, "Yes." Little Ruhu'lláh when questioned said, "Yes, I am a Bahá'í." But one old man denied the faith saying "No, I am not a believer." The Governor in disgust struck him saying, "Everyone knows you call yourself a Bahá'í and now you deny it; but this little boy who is just at the beginning of his life and has so many hopes in the world, has had the courage to say he is a Bahá'í."

The Governor asked the Mullas to come and talk with these Bahá'ís.

The Mullas said that they must be killed because their faith, their Teachings were against Islám. The Governor sent to ask the Prime Minister in Tihrán what should be done and the Prime Minister said to send the Bahá'í prisoners to the capital. So they were sent in their chains to Tihrán and a photograph was taken as soon as they arrived. It was the custom to take photographs of prisoners and send them to the state. The description was written on the picture. Ruhu'lláh's aba (coat) and kulah (cap) had been taken away from him and the ones that appear in the photograph were hastily borrowed from another prisoner and put on the child. They were much too large for him. They are not his own clothes at all. Now the family actually has the original photograph that was filed with the prison record. (In the revolution of 1908 when all the old archives and records were thrown out, a Bahá'í official saw this photograph and took it to Azizollah Varqá and the indictment, the crime, written is that they had become Bahá'ís, Bábis). After arresting Ali Muhammad Varqá the policemen had gone to his home and carried off his beautiful painting of the Báb (and there is only one other in the world), taken many of his precious Tablets, plundered the family books, even the register that gave the dates of their birth so that some of the family do not know when their birthdays are. They confiscated their property.

When all this had taken place and they were settled in the prison, Azizollah succeeded in getting permission to go and see his father and brother in the prison. "Ruhu'lláh, what do you need, what can I bring you?" asked Azizollah and the little brother said eagerly: "Please bring me a Book of Tablets and the Book of Prayers to read in the prison, for they took away all my books." The food was very bad in that prison and the child had very few clothes, but he did not ask for any material things.

One of the prisoners who is still living told Azizollah Varqá that one night in the dungeon when all the others were sleeping he saw Ali Muhammad Varqá lean over his little son, Ruhu'lláh, look at him so long and so lovingly, pray, and then he said: "O Bahá'u'lláh, I thank Thee that Thou hast accepted our sacrifice." This was not human love for his boy. It was divine love!

ALI MUHAMMAD VARQA WAS thirty-eight years old and his little son, Ruhu'lláh, was just beginning his twelfth year. They had been in the Tihrán prison just two months when one Friday, Násr-ed-Din Shán, Ruler of Persia, went out to Sháh Zadeh Abdu'l Azim, a village near Tihrán where there is one of the Muhammadan holy Shrines. He had ruled from 1844 until this Friday in 1896, when at the holy Shrine he was shot and killed by a Muslim revolutionary.

Everything that ever occurred in Persia at that time was blamed upon the Bahá'is. The Prime Minister knew that the murderer was a Muslim and said so. However, the Chief of the Court without consulting the Prime Minister commanded the executioner to come into one room of the dungeon with him and the Bahá'í prisoners to be brought into the long dark corridor leading to this room. There the men stood in a row waiting their turn to enter. First to go in was Ali Muhammad Varqá while his little son Ruhu'lláh stood in the open doorway as he was second. The Chief of the Court cursed Ali Mahammad Varqá, saying: "It is you Bahá'is who have murdered the Sháh!" The prisoners had had no news, they had not heard that the Sháh had been shot that day. Ali Muhammad Varqá answered him: "Bahá'is would never kill His Imperial Majesty the Sháhansháh." Angered by this, the Chief of the Court ordered the executioner to put Ali Muhammad's head into the stock and to cut his body to pieces. Ruhu'lláh witnessed the marvelous heroism of his great father as he suffered this horrible death. Then the Chief of the Court turned to the child who had stepped into the room to receive his own death, and said: "You must curse Bahá'u'lláh; if you do, you can go free and I will give you whatever you wish." Ruhu'lláh, looking into his eyes said solemnly: "I have seen Bahá'u'lláh! I could never curse Him! I will go with my father."

The Chief of the Court whispered to the executioner to strangle the boy well in order to frighten him, but not to kill him. This was done. They put the rope about his neck so tightly he swooned and it looked as if he were dead, but after some time he slowly regained consciousness and the Chief of the Court again ordered him to curse Bahá'u'lláh, "No, I will never curse Him, I will go with my father," said this child and intuitively he threw himself on his knees and began to pray to God. The Chief of the Court was so unnerved and upset, that he shouted to the executioner to kill the child quickly and he himself ran out of the room past the other Bahá'í prisoners and out of the place to his own home. The executioner quickly cut Ruhu'lláh's throat and the supreme sacrifice of two of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's great heroes was over.

Many have been martyred in the Cause to establish the Bahá'í religion, but the eternal glory of Ali Muhammad Varqá and little Ruhu'lláh is, that they voluntarily offered to give their lives to help establish the Teachings of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The other Bahá'ís in that corridor were never killed, they were set free. The Prime Minister was very angry with the Chief of the Court. He called him and demanded why he had done this hideous deed. The only answer was: "I thought perhaps Bahá'ís had killed the King and I wanted revenge!" The Prime Minister replied: "You knew the murderer was a Muslim!" That Chief of the Court still lives, a miserable, unhappy, trembling man when the Varqá name is mentioned. He still walks the streets of Tihrán.

THE STORY of the martyrdoms of Ali Muhammad Varqá and Ruhu'l-láh is absolutely true. It is told by the third prisoner in that line in the corridor who was standing on the threshold just behind Ruhu'lláh and he was still residing in Zanján until his death two years ago.

Also, the Chief of the great Bachtari Tribe whose son today has an important place in the government, wishing to hear the truth about this atrocious crime, a few year ago invited that former Chief of the Court to dine in his home. His sons were present and a few other men relatives. They asked him to tell them the whole story about the killing of the Varqá father and son. There was a reason why they wished to hear because the host's own brother had become a Bahá'í years earlier through the teacher, Ali Muhammad Varqá. The former Chief of the Court did tell them everything and it was exactly as the third prisoner had related it. The Bachtari Chief and his relatives wept, and they were so angry they beat the former Chief of the Court and kicked him out into the street.

In the thirty-three years since the holy blood of these two martyrs was shed, a new white rose has begun to be cultivated in Persia, a rose whose perfume will be more heralded than all the attar of Irán, for this is the rose of "tolerance in religion". For more than a thousand years Persia had not known this rose.

I HAD LONGED to visit the graves of these two great martyrs, to bow my head in humblest, tenderest reverence where their dear hurt bodies are laid to rest. One day the opportunity came very unexpectedly. We were driving out to see the Bahá'í cemetery and friends said "There in the distance where you see the trees and the garden is the mausoleum of Ali Muhammad Varqá and his son Ruhu'lláh; we are going to take you there after we visit the Bahá'í cemetery." I had expected to go there with the Varqá family, but in the busy days of speaking and writing there had never been a free hour, so it seemed good to go now and we went. In the days of the passing of these martyrs there was no Bahá'í cemetery and in fact their bodies were hid for a number of years. Then Azizollah Varqá and his younger brother Valiollah bought a little estate near Tihrán (about twenty minutes ride by motor car from the Yussef Abad Gate of the city.) It is inclosed by high walls and divided into two parts by another high wall. The first part is like a miniature farm or very large garden with little houses for the caretaker and his family. Each member of this peasant family was so clean, so sweet, so spiritual, one could but feel that they had been refined and ennobled by their cherished task of caring for the garden where such glorious saints are resting.

Going through the first garden into the second was like stepping into paradise. It was still winter, but the trees, the vines, the rose bushes showed plainly that in the spring and summer the place is a haven of shade and perfume. It was a typical Persian garden with a stately little lake and the birds were singing softly. The mausoleum is a beautiful nine-sided building approached with nine paths through the garden and within are nine sides and the whole is in pure white.

O, what a real peace in that place!

The sun poured through the windows as if it loved to come and dwell there! I knelt to pray and whispered first: "O Bahá'u'lláh Thou art here with them! It is the same kind of peace that I experienced in Bahjí at Thy Tomb! Thou hast never left them, living and dead Thou art with them always!" Truly it was a spiritual communion to pray in this holy spot!

Silently we passed out from that holy shrine, pressed the hands of the kind caretakers, and came back into the world of service in Tihrán.

IT IS LIVES like these of Ali Muhammad Varqá and little Ruhu'lláh that mirror forth the power and the beauty of the Bahá'í Teachings.

As the aftermath to this story, would you not like to hear of the two other sons, Azizollah and Valiollah? They are two of the most spiritual and efficient Bahá'ís of Tihrán. Azizollah went to Paris to help 'Abdu'l-Bahá when He journeyed to Europe, and Valiollah was called to be one of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's secretaries during the historic journey to the United States and Great Britain, in 1912. Friends in New York will remember that the night before 'Abdu'l-Bahá started to California, a great many friends had called to say good-bye. Valiollah Varqá was down in the drawing-room greeting them and serving tea to each one. 'Abdu'l-Bahá came down the stairs from His apartment into the drawingroom and called out: "Valiollah, come my soul, my dear!" He took his hand. Then He went over and sat down by the window and addressed the friends, saying: "Tonight I shall introduce to you Mirza Valiollah Khan Varqá. He is my son, whatever he says it is true. Believe it." Then 'Abdul'Bahá told the story of the grandfather of Valiollah, the story of his father and little brother Ruhu'lláh ending with their martyrdom. When He had finished He went upstairs and below the silent guests heard Him weeping.

So, darling little Ruhu'lláh, you and your good father were not only teaching the Bahá'í Cause in Persia, you are teaching it down the ages and in every continent. Every eye that reads of you, every ear that hears of you is urged forward to action!

THAT WHICH BENEFITS MANKIND

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

THE announcement that a new institution of learning is to be opened in the United States in less than a year gives us a feeling of hope and assurance. In this time of abnormality when so many of our cherished institutions of education and religion are sorely curtailed and hampered for lack of funds we grasp eagerly at the piece of news that two of our citizens have set aside $5,000,000 for the establishment of an Institute for Advanced Study.* For in normal times we were accustomed to hear, occasionally at least, of such gifts made for the purpose of "that which benefits mankind". So it gives us a feeling of hope and confidence to learn that a small group of scholars and philanthropists has a vision of the needs of the future and is building for them. This is constructive—a relief from the news of failures, losses and strikes.

Of the plans for this project we are told:

"The Institute will be unique among American institutions of higher education. It will concentrate its aim exclusively upon quality in the selection of teachers and students and in the nature of its work in scholarship and research. There will be no emphasis upon mere numbers, either in teachers or students or courses. It will consist of a small number of scholars, teachers, research workers and students, who will devote themselves to the really fundamental things under a regime of the most severe intellectual pattern.

"The Institute will consist of a series of schools, the first of which will be a School of Mathematics; the second, it is hoped, a School of Economics and History. It will be exclusively a post-graduate university. Students will be selected on the basis of their aptitude for the work rather than the possession of formal college degrees. It is expected, of course, that most of the students will enter with Ph.D. degrees or their equivalent, but the lack of a formal training will not bar any student who otherwise is qualified to work with the professors in the Institute."

IF ONE may judge from the limited information available this proposed institution would seem to be in harmony with the needs of the

*This fund was donated according to the New York Times in 1930 by Louis Bamberger and Mrs. Felix Fuld of Newark, New Jersey. Plans are being made to open the first department, the School of Mathematics, in October, 1933. Temporary quarters will be found in Fine Hall, at Princeton University, until permanent buildings—probably near Princeton—are ready. The Director is Dr. Abraham Flexner, well known as a leader in the educational world, and the first appointee is Dr. Albert Einstein whose name is inseparably connected with the Theory of Relativity. As Professor of Mathematics and Theoretical Physics he becomes head of the first school to be opened.

New Age at whose threshold we stand. Those who are familiar with the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá know how consistently He urged us to prepare ourselves for the new age and how thoroughly cognizent He was of its needs. At a talk given at Leland Stanford University in 1912 He said:

"The greatest attainment in the world of humanity has ever been scientific in nature. It is the discovery of the realities of things. . . . The highest praise is due to men who devote their energies to science; and the noblest center is a center wherein the sciences and arts are taught and studied. Science ever tends to the illumination of the world of humanity."

The importance of the study of the higher sciences is further emphasized by the place Bahá'u'lláh gives institutions for such study in the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, the worshipping place of the future. Grouped around the central edifice and an important part of the complete plan for the worship of God are humanitarian institutions for the relief of poverty, sickness and other suffering and "a university for the study of higher sciences giving post-graduate courses". Mankind must advance a little farther before we see scientific and research institutions visibly associated with houses of worship but we believe that in the hearts of those who are making possible this new place for research and study and of those who are organizing it there is the sincere spirit of worship in the service to humanity.

We find Bahá'u'lláh stipulating that the study of science should be of "such sciences as are profitable, which conduce to the elevation of mankind". When asked concerning the value of the study of pure mathematics and physics, the practical value as we are in the habit of saying, Dr. Flexner said:

"An institution such as we are engaged in establishing need at no time ask of itself what of practical importance can be expected of this or that person, this or that subject, this or that investigation. The history of civilization proves abundantly that sound scientific work does not only gratify human curiosity but almost invariably leads to unexpected results.

"Concrete instances in support of this position could be cited from every realm of human thought and endeavor. . . . It is as true today as it was when Goethe closed his eyes in death, that what the world needs is more light—more light to illuminate what is obscure, more light to enable us to reorganize our intellectual and political and social lives. No one is wise enough to tell the source from which illumination will come, but the experience of the race will not in the future be different from what it has been in the past, and an institute which enables men of superior wisdom and capacity to indulge their curiosity and to promote understanding will in due course produce consequences of which neither they nor we now dream."

THERE ARE other features of this institution which give us assurance, which savor of a new age. The founders have laid down the principle that "in the appointments to the staff and faculty as well as in the admission of workers and students no account shall be taken, directly or indirectly, of race, religion or sex."

"We feel strongly", they added, "that the spirit characteristic of America at its noblest, above all the pursuit of higher learning, cannot admit of any conditions as to personnel other than those designed to promote the objects for which this institution is established and particularly with no regard whatever to accidents of race, creed or sex."

When we reflect upon the present plight of suffering humanity and realize the grave need for illumination upon its problems we would wish that all who enter this institute will "search untiringly for truth", and speedily give to the world "whatever harmonizes with the crying needs of the hour."

WALK WITH HIM

E. LEIGH MUDGE

I saw a man of another race,
Foreign garb and an alien face,
And was turning away with a bitter frown
When an angel voice came whispering down.
“Walk with him,” I heard it say,
“Only a mile along his way”.
I walked with him to the highway’s end
And found that the alien was my friend.

I saw a man in a servant’s gear,
Walking alone, though crowds were near;
Then I walked with him as with the other
And found that the servant was my brother.

I walked with men of dusky faces,
Men from the distant Mongol races,
Men of varied political schools,
Divergent in faiths and forms and rules.
With a common fatherhood, all were brothers,
Yet each stood alien from the others.

Then I heard the voice of the Master say,
With the grieving tears of a distant day,
“How oft would I have gathered you,
But ye would not.” Oh, brothers true,
How can peace on earth be wrought
Till we learn the lesson the Master taught?

Yonder a stranger walks today;
Go with him a mile upon his way.

“The reality of Jesus was the perfect meaning—the Christ-hood in Him—which in the Holy Books is symbolized as the Word. . . . The reality of Christ was the embodiment of divine virtues and attributes of God. For in Divinity there is no duality. All adjectives, nouns and pronouns in that court of sanctity are one, there is neither multiplicity nor division.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

CHRIST was born into a world filled with sin. All the evil of ancient Ninevah and Babylon, had been gradually seeping through into Syria; into all of Asia Minor; had corrupted the Greek civilization; and was now beginning to infect the hitherto sound and sturdy culture of the Roman people. The virtues of primitive peoples—simplicity of living, loyalty, hardiness and hospitality, religious devotion and faithful performance of ethical obligations in the name of religion—had given place to a spiritual apathy, to extreme sensualism, to an attitude of cynicism as regards the claim of any duty. Greed, envy, hatred, held terrible sway upon the hearts of men. The race was to the swift and cunning. Others fell by the way and lay there, as in the story of the good Samaritan, with little chance of help.

This was the world into which Christ came, bringing a message not new—because spiritual truth is pristine — but vitally renewing, resurrecting in the hearts of men the ancient truths of simplicity, of faith, of charity.

IT WAS not easy for Christ, with all His spiritual potency, to make saints out of His disciples. Peter, giving way to anger and violence in the garden of Gethsemane, overcome with fear and disloyalty at the trial of Christ; John, Apostle of love, urging Christ to call down from heaven fiery battalions of angels to consume their enemies,—hardly could we recognize in these disciples the glorious devotees they were later to become when the leaven planted in them by their Teacher had had time to work and bring glorious results of character development. The episodes during the lifetime and mission of Christ form but an introduction to the colossal work of developing Christian living, of slowly forming Christian communities in the Mediterranean world.

All of the apostles, in striving to train these little groups of early Christians, emphasized the necessity of keeping one's self “unspotted from the world.” Particularly did they urge the importance of considering the body as the temple of the spirit, and of preserving its purity and integrity.

And what a need there was for some effective doctrine of purity! For Paganism was permeated with sexual depravity similar to that traditionally associated with the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. Sexual laxity and indulgence was eating like a cancer into the core of the vitality of the Mediterranean culture. It had ruined the Greeks and was now reaching into the very heart of the Roman world, vitiating its ancient moralities and starting a current of degeneracy which Pagan moralists were unable to prevent.

Now in the midst of all this evil there began to grow up little communities holding ideals dazzling in their beauty, chastity and spiritual love.

The ideals were there in shining glory. But it took several generations for even these Christian communities to manifest real purity of living. This they did achieve in time, by dint of utter segregation from the current of life of the Pagan world about them.

There was no possibility of reforming the Pagan world. Therefore the injunction of the apostles to their little flocks was to withdraw from the life of the world. The Christian communicants must begin to lead new lives wholly distinct from the Pagan life about them. They must be born not of the flesh but of the spirit. They must endeavor to live the Christ-life, relying for help in their pilgrim's progress upon prayer and a sense of unity with the Christos.

WHAT a marvelous appeal all this made to the innate spark of nobility in every man and woman! The poor, the down-trodden, the sensualist, the drunkard heard it and responded. Many in positions of social superiority, of wealth, of luxury, heard it and became attached.

Gradually complete little communities grew up, isolating themselves from the Pagan life about them. Communities well balanced; economically self-sufficing; representative of every strata of society, of various vocations, of various degrees of wealth.

Harmoniously and perfectly these early Christians learned to live together, in their common love for Christ and their earnest desire to follow in His steps.

HUMANITARIAN institutions began to blossom out in these communities as a direct expression of the Christian doctrine of the love of God and man. The early Christians put forth every endeavor to bring it about that their communal life satisfied the ideals of service and cooperation which their souls acknowledged as divine truth.

Committees were formed for the care of the sick and needy; committees to distribute food and necessities to the poor; institutions to care for the orphans and widows.

In these Christian circles no longer did the law of the jungle hold—that the race was to the swift and that the devil could take the hindmost. Now a livelihood was assured to every communicant. No one should suffer dire want while others possessed abundance. In the name of God the Father and of Christ the Son, all members of the living church were knit together in a brotherhood as efficacious in practice as it was glorious in concept.

AT FIRST these benevolent practices of the early Christians had to be carried on in secret because of the persecutions to which Christians were liable. But as the rigor of these persecutions lessened and a general Pagan tolerance developed, we find the Christians manifesting their kind deeds in a more public way.

Soon their unique humanitarian works began to attract the attention of Roman moralists. "We must," they said, "emulate the benevolence of the Christians, if we would prevent this Sect from growing to the point of absorbing the whole Pagan world!"

These writers realized that the universal practice of love and service which characterized Christian communities was proving a very tempting attraction to Pagan peoples in whose midst these Christians existed; specially attractive to all who were in suffering or misfortune.

It was far easier for the Christians to practice moral living than for the Pagans, even those of the highest ideals. For the Christians had that greatest of aids to ethical living—the motivation of religion. They believed that they possessed, each one, an immortal soul; that this soul was their real self; that the proper development of the soul was the chief aim of life upon this planet; that all their deeds here built into character, into soul-structure and would bear fruit in one way or another in the future life. This pitiful handful of years which formed their destiny upon this planet was of infinitesimal value compared to the great stretch of eternity which lay before them. How childish, how foolish, how even tragic—to waste the rich spiritual opportunities of this life in riotous or selfish living, and thus incur immense liabilities toward the future existence!

Therefore the Christians, prompted by the most efficacious moral motives which any one can have—the love of God and the desire to grow more perfect—endeavored to express righteousness in all their thoughts and deeds. They knew that the greatest reward for doing right is to grow more and more near to God; and that the greatest punishment for doing evil is to grow more evil and more densely veiled from that Truth which the initiated know as Love.

Compare this noble path of progress onward and upward forever with the doctrine which held the lives of the contemporaneous Pagans. "Carpe diem!" sang Horace, "Let us seize the day, spend it in profligacy, enjoy ourselves, make merry, for we know not what the morrow will bring!"

IN HOW similar a situation to the ancient Mediterranean world at the time of Christ is the paganistic world of today! A world without faith, without guidance, without moral standards. A despairing world, seeking in pleasures of the senses an anodyne to the drab sorrows of hopelessness.

And again, as in the days of Caesar, a Day Star rises on the horizon to flood the murky earth with penetrating rays of Warmth and Light. Again the Spirit of Truth spreads abroad the beneficent, purifying, invigorating Message of the Kingdom:

"O Son of the Supreme! To the eternal I call thee, yet thou dost seek that which perisheth. What hath made thee turn away from Our desire and seek thine own?"*

*Baha'u'llah—"Hidden Words."

THE MEANING OF CHRIST

A compilation from the revealed Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the divinely appointed authoritative Interpreter of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh.

HRIST'S birthday is a glorious day. . . . It is necessary that these anniversary celebrations be observed, else man in his negligence would forget all about his Creator. But we should seek to penetrate the dark veils of custom and imitation of ancestors, perchance we may discover the reality of the meaning.

The advent of Christ on this earth was a blessed day for it was the day on which the Sun of Reality dawned; the day on which all beings were revived. In the world's calendar, it was the beginning of a Heavenly Spring. . . . When He was on earth He was not thought much of notwithstanding they were awaiting His coming with great impatience. They thought that they would be His intimate friends. When He came they knew Him not; they persecuted Him and finally killed Him. (Unity Triumphant, p 111).

THE REALITY of Christ, that is to say the Word of God, is the cause of spiritual life. It is a "quicken- ing spirit," meaning that all the imperfections which come from the requirements of the physical life of man, are transformed into human perfections by the teachings and education of that spirit. Therefore Christ was a quickening spirit, and the cause of life in all mankind. The position of Christ was that of absolute perfection; He made His divine perfections shine like the sun upon all believing souls, and the bounties of the light shone and radiated in the reality of men. . . . The Reality of Christ was a clear and polished mirror of the greatest purity and fineness, and the Sun of Reality, that is to say, the Essence of Oneness, with its infinite perfections and attributes, became visible in the mirror. . . . The Christ sacrificed Himself so that men might be freed from the imperfections of the physical nature, and might become possessed of the virtues of the spiritual nature. This spiritual nature, which came into existence through the bounty of the Divine Reality, is the reunion of all perfections, and appears through the breath of the Holy Spirit; it is the divine perfections, it is light, spirituality, guidance, exaltation, high aspiration, justice, love, grace, kindness to all, philanthropy, the essence of life. It is the reflection of the splendor of the Sun of Reality. . . . (Answered Questions, pp. 136-137).

CHRIST came saying, "I am born of the Holy Spirit." Though it is now easy for the Christians to believe this assertion, at that time it was very difficult. The text of the Gospel says, "Is not this the son of Joseph of Nazareth whom we know? How can He say, therefore, I came down from heaven?"

Briefly this man, who apparently and in the eyes of all, was lowly, arose with such great power that He abolished a religion that had lasted fifteen hundred years, at a time when the slightest deviation from it exposed the offender to danger or to death. Moreover, in the days of Christ the morals of the whole world and the condition of the Israelites had become completely confused and corrupted, and Israel had fallen into a state of the utmost degradation, misery, and bondage. . . .

This young man, Christ, by the help of a supernatural power, abrogated the ancient Mosaic law, reformed the general morals, and once again laid the foundation of eternal glory for the Israelites. Moreover, He brought to humanity the glad tidings of universal peace, and spread abroad teachings which were not for Israel alone, but were for the general happiness of the whole human race.

Those who first strove to do away with Him were the Israelites and His own kindred. To all outward appearances they overcame Him, and brought Him into direct distress. At least they crowned Him with the crown of thorns and crucified Him. But Christ, while apparently in the deepest misery and affliction, proclaimed: "This Sun will be resplendent, this Light will shine, My grace will surround the world, and all My enemies will be brought low." And as He said, so it was; for all the kings of the earth have not been able to withstand Him. Nay, all their standards have been overthrown, whilst the banner of that Oppressed One has been raised to the zenith.

But this is opposed to all the rules of human reason. Then it becomes clear and evident that this Glorious Being was a true Educator of the world of humanity, and that

He was helped and confirmed by Divine Power. (Answered Questions, p. 20.)

WHEN His Holiness Christ appeared amongst the Jews, the first thing He did was to proclaim the validity of the Mosaic mission. He declared that the Torah, the Old Testament, was the Book of God. . . . The fame of Moses, through the Christian Movement, was spread broadcast . . . it was through the instrumentality of Christ, it was through the translation of the New Testament—the little volume of the Gospel—that the Old Testament, the Torah, was translated into six hundred languages and spread throughout the world at large. . . .

Likewise, with the superlative power and the efficacious Word of God He gathered together most of the nations of the East and the West. This was accomplished at a time when those nations were in the utmost of contention and strife. He ushered all of them into the overshadowing tent of the oneness of humanity. He so educated them that they united and agreed, even so that the Roman, the Greek, the Chaldean, the Assyrian and the Egyptian nations were perfectly blended, and the heavenly civilization was the result. (Bahá'i Scriptures, p. p. 394, 395.)

THOSE who looked at the material body of Christ, and saw Him enduring all the hardships and trials, marveled that He was the Messiah because He was in this lowly condition. As they were considering His physical being they failed to see the Light shining within it. But those who looked to the spiritual and the real existence of the spirit in Christ, firmly believed in Him.

We must not look at the lantern but at the Light—the candle inside the lantern. (Bahá'í Scriptures, p. 498.)

CHRIST SAID that nothing could ascend into heaven except that which came down from heaven. He also said, "I came from heaven and will return to heaven," and "The Son of Man is in heaven." He said this while still upon the earth and notwithstanding the fact that he had been born from Mary. There is no doubt Christ came from heaven and always was in heaven, but when He spoke He did not mean the literal sky. What then is meant by heaven? Science proves that there is no heaven or sky, but all is limitless space and one universe. In this limitless space the heavenly spheres revolve and have their orbits. But the "heaven" of Christ is that invisible world which is beyond the sight and comprehension of mere man. It is the spiritual condition. Therefore the "heaven" of Christ is the Will of God. The Sun of that heaven will never set. In it the moon and stars are always shining. It is the limitless Kingdom of God. It is sanctified from all place. Christ is always there. (Ten Days in the Light of 'Akká, p. 26.)

WHEN CHRIST appeared He manifested Himself at Jerusalem. He called men to the Kingdom of God, He invited them to eternal life, and He told them to acquire human perfections. The Light of Guidance was shed forth by that radiant Star, and He at length gave His life for humanity. All through His blessed life He suffered oppression and hardship, and in spite of all this humanity was His enemy. They denied Him, scorned him, ill-treated Him, and cursed Him. He was not treated like a man—and yet in spite of all this He was the embodiment of pity, and of supreme goodness and love. He loved all humanity, but they treated Him as an enemy and were incapable of appreciating Him. They set no value on His words, and were not illumined by the flame of His love.

Later they realized who He was. That He was the sacred and Divine Light, and that His words held eternal life. His heart was full of love for all the world, His goodness was destined to reach each one—and as they began to realize these things they repented, but He had been crucified!

It was not until many years after His ascension that they knew Who He was, and at the time of His ascension He had only a very few disciples; only a comparatively small following believed His precepts and followed His laws. The ignorant said, "Who is this individual; He has only a few disciples?" But those who knew said, "He is the Sun who will shine in the East and in the West, He is the Manifestation Who shall give life to the world. What the first disciples had seen the world realized later. (Wisdom Talks in Paris, p. p. 114-115.)

order that a certain number might acknowledge their Prophethood. They did not declare their heavenly mission and message in order to lay the foundation for a religious belief. Even His Holiness Christ did not become manifest that we should merely believe in Him as the Christ, follow Him and adore His mention. All these are limited in scope and requirement, whereas the Reality of Christ is an unlimited essence. The infinite and unlimited Reality cannot be bounded by any limitation. Nay, rather His Holiness Christ appeared in order to illumine the world of humanity, to render the earthly world celestial, to make the human kingdom a realm of angels, to unite the hearts, to enkindle the light of love in human souls, so that such souls might become independent, attaining complete unity and fellowship, turning to God, entering into the divine kingdom, receiving the bounties and bestowals of God and partaking of the manna from heaven. Through Christ they were intended to be baptized by the Holy Spirit, attain a new spirit and realize the life everlasting. All the holy precepts and the announcements of prophetic laws were for these various and heavenly purposes. (Promulgation of Universal Peace, Vol. 2, p. 438.)

THE CAUSE of Bahá'u'lláh is the same as the Cause of Christ. It is the same temple and the same foundation. Both of these are spiritual springtimes and seasons of the soul-refreshing awakening and the cause of the renovation of the life of mankind. The spring of this year is the same as the spring of last year. The origins and ends are the same. The sun of today is the sun of yesterday. In the coming of Christ, the divine teachings were given in accordance with the infancy of the human race. The teachings of Bahá'u'lláh have the same basic principles, but are according to the stage of the maturity of the world and the requirements of this illumined age. (Tablets of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Vol. 3, p. 535.)

TRUTH is one and without division. The teachings of Jesus are in a concentrated form. Men do not agree to this day as to the meaning of many of His sayings. His teachings are as a flower in the bud. Today, the bud is unfolding into a flower. Bahá'u'lláh has expanded and fulfilled the teachings, and has applied them in detail to the whole world.

There is one God; mankind is one; the foundations of religion are one. Let us worship Him, and give praise for all His great Prophets and Messengers who have manifested His brightness and glory. (Wisdom Talks in London, p. 93.)

CHRIST was a heavenly physician. He brought spiritual health and healing into the world. Bahá'u'lláh is likewise a divine physician. He has revealed prescriptions for removing disease from the body politic and has remedied human conditions by spiritual power. (Promulgation of Universal Peace, Vol. 2, p. 244.)

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

In her world travels in behalf of the Bahá'í Movement the author takes time to write to friends impressions derived from her varied experiences. These "Letters Home" we are glad to be able to present to the readers of the Bahá'í Magazine. The first installment appearing in the January 1932 number described the author's visit to Nikko and other places in Japan. In the April number she gave some of her impressions of China. Herein we find a description of her contacts with the Maoris of New Zealand.

LOST for centuries in the forgotten back-wash of nations, the Maoris of New Zealand furnish a remarkable ethnological study.

As you can well imagine I have no authority near me here in Persia, but if I remember correctly Griffith Taylor, Professor Dixon and others assert a close kinship between the Ainus of Japan and the Maoris, assigning to these primitive folk a Caucasian origin. This is a direct challenge to the Polynesian descent ordinarily ascribed to them. I remember Professor Thomas' having dealt with this subject but as it is now near twenty-five years since we sat under his inspiring tutelage I can't in the least recall his conclusions.

However, Griffith Taylor, with characteristic vigor and clarity, presents an exciting graph in which he shows that the oldest races have strayed furthest from the point of origin. The most primitive vehicles are those furthest from the great cities; those only recently discarded within a closer radius, while the newest modes of locomotion are in the city and its environs. In excavating, the oldest things would be found in the lowest strata, the later things nearer the surface. Basing his conclusion on this argument he says that the Ainus and Maoris have been flung to the periphery of the globe by gradual displacement from the seat of their Caucasian origin through the development of newer races.

But my interest in the Maoris was neither formal nor ethnological. Here is a group, fast vanishing, that gives us a picture of life in a spacious, poetic aspect.

Clever and alert the Maori, to his great detriment, has quickly assumed the habits of our western civilization. Our customs and practices are totally unsuited to the requirements of races who, through cycles of unmolested effort, have developed their own proper and protective mores. As a result of abandoning by force of circumstances, his own mode of life, the Maori population of New Zealand has been decimated. These statistics are quite informal but some one told me that whereas they numbered over a million at the time of the British occupation there now remain some sixty-five thousand.

They must have been a nation of poets and artists for everything they touched, before they were corrupted by civilization, seems to bear the impress of beauty except Niki the mascot, and the totem figures.

In the War Memorial Museum (which graces and dominates the city of Auckland overlooking from an eminence its beautiful harbor), are preserved the finest examples of early Maori artistry. A magnificent war canoe fashioned to carry near a hundred warriors was hollowed from a giant tree and spliced with infinite ingenuity to form its double prow. The indelible decoration of conventional design in black and white on the red background of the exterior showed a mastery of balance, scale and symmetry. It was far more akin to the Arabic than to the Greek, the two masters of pure design, and unlike any Polynesian art with which I am familiar.

Their ubiquitous wood-carvings are of a genre entirely different from their painting. Although they lack delicacy, and the figures are crude, literal and often ugly, there is an opulent vigor of detail about them that bespeaks a robust and dramatic taste. The houses, with their low-hanging eaves, had originally no windows and only one entrance door.

At Rotorua, the famous thermal region of New Zealand, there is a model "Pa" or village. It interested me far more than the natural wonders, which in spite of great exploitation on the part of New Zealanders seem decidedly feeble in comparison to Yellowstone Park, for example. But in the "Pa" I saw a faithful reproduction of the original environment of the Maori.

Around the village is a double stockade designed with deep strategy, to discomfit an attacking enemy; for inside the first stockade is a trench in which the spearmen concealed themselves, wounding the legs of the attackers and thus incapacitating them. The Priest and One Chief dominated the village life and occupied the best houses. A cache, on stilts very like that used by our northern tribes of Indians, preserved the village food from marauding animals. Specially selected maidens prepared that of the priest and fed him by hand.

The Town Hall, as it were, the central meeting place, was a thing of joyous beauty in miniature: the broad roof-tree and beams were decorated with Arabesques in black, red and white, since the house is thatched with stout straw the low eaves were supported by red pillars ornately carved with the legends and traditions of the race. Much mother of pearl was used on the figures and the whole effect was that of the exotic, the remote and the wondrous. There was not one false note, not one detail that marred the sense of perfect harmony.

Many heroic and interesting tales are told of the Maoris by the British in their experience of subjugating them. They had a sense of justice and fairplay well illustrated by the fact that when their ammunition was exhausted the Chief sent word to the English Commander that hostilities must cease until they could supply themselves. They were astonished when their opponents refused, since they themselves never took advantage of a helpless enemy.

The native poi or dance is remarkably graceful. There is scarcely any movement of the body except a plastic pose, but the intricate coordination of the hands and arms in the manipulation of the poi-ball calls for magnificent skill. The Maoris are tall and muscularly built (another evidence in favor of their western origin), and execute the war dance, intended to excite the valor of the fighters, with inexhaustible vitality and ease.

THROUGH the kindness of the Maori Society in Auckland I was given a letter of introduction to Chief Mita Taupopoki when I set out for Rotorua. By good fortune, on the evening of my arrival, I met Guide Rangi, a clever, gifted and beautiful Maori woman, with the accomplishments of both races. I spoke to her of my letter to the Chief and of my mission and told her that I would visit Wacka, the Maori village, upon my return from Wairacki.

Chief Taupopoki, as you can see from his photograph, is a handsome and impressive old gentleman. He received me with dignity and kindness, explaining that a previous meeting had long been arranged for that evening, but that if I would come he would gather together as many as possible to hear my message. On my return after dinner, I was greeted by a delegation, conducted to the central meeting place, while the Chief sent a boy around with a huge bell to announce my arrival and summon the Arawa tribe. In ten minutes the hall was quite filled and the Chief arose to welcome and to introduce me.

After a few complimentary phrases he said, "To what great matter are we about to listen? A subject of such urgent importance that this stranger traveling over many seas and abandoning her native land has come to share with the Maoris, obscure and forgotten, her valuable news. We await impatiently the unfolding of her purpose."

Although I speak no Maori I could recognize it as an endearing and gracious language. Its expressions are poesy and its cadences a song. The Maoris are natural orators, the women as well as the men, and express themselves on public occasions with singular rhythm and felicity.

In giving the message I stressed the fact that the solidarity of mankind to which Bahá'u'lláh summons us does not mean the reduction of all human beings to a dead level of similarity; but rather the interdependent functioning of the various races and kindreds, each making its unique and indispensable contribution to the perfect expression of the body politic. In the Bahá'í social scheme the purpose is not to make Maoris something quite different from themselves, but to stimulate them and all other peoples to attain their own highest development as a contribution to human advancement and welfare.

Then I spoke of how Bahá'u'lláh had already accomplished the purport of His message in uniting all the religions, races, nations and classes of the world, how ancient animosities and hereditary hatreds had been conquered and forgotten under the Banner of Divine Unity.

When I had finished there were a series of intelligent and important questions asked me. The Maoris are a very keen and apt race and the educated amongst them attain the highest culture. In this connection I think Mrs. Rewa Bennett, the first Maori woman to hold the office of magistrate; Mrs. Colwill and Mr. Paul, official Maori interpreter to the government.

When the questions had been answered the Chief asked a native Christian minister to thank me and then closed the meeting. "It is now evident", he said "why this great news must be spread far and wide. The cessation of hatred, the establishment of good will in the world—surely there is nothing greater than this. The Maoris heartily welcome the assurance that this One of Whom our messenger has spoken is already accomplishing this end."

On my return to Auckland I was honored by an invitation to a Maori banquet at Oraki. It was very impressive. Following the custom, the men came out to greet us but the women performed the welcoming poi. I was to witness the ancient method of cooking called te hangi. A trench is dug and into it are flung stones which have lain in a great fire; onto the stones is thrown the meat and around it are piled potatoes and other vegetables; a large basket of clams is placed at one side and at the other, fish wrapped in flax leaves. When all is ready, equally hot stones are placed on top of the food and a bucket of water dashed over the whole which is now covered with rough cloths, on which earth is immediately packed, closing in the hot steam.

In the mean time the women have been deftly weaving lovely baskets from flax leaves which will serve as dishes for the hot food.

Since the hangi cannot be disturbed for an hour we go into the hall to carry on the program. Mrs. Witaka, the spokesman of the village, arises to greet me.

"The Maoris rejoice that one from afar has come to share with them her knowledge of the great world. But you have come to a deserted home, where only a tale and a recollection can speak to you: the Maoris have departed! You must seek for them beyond." Her words were intensely solemn and impressive, and though I could not understand her, I saw that those who could were deeply moved. "The affairs of those far removed are echoed here amongst us, nor are we so remote that we can escape the cares that burden mankind. We would know if you bring comfort and peace to those who need this message. That you have honored us with your coming and displayed a generous kindness to us has warmed and rejoiced our hearts. Speak then that we may know the purpose that speeds you round the world. My greetings are finished."

When her speech had been translated I gave the Bahá'í message, Mr. Graham, a naturalized Maori, translating. Once more I spoke of how Bahá'u'lláh had united His followers and redeemed us from our prejudice and hardness of heart. Since the Maoris are nearly all Christian converts, I stressed the fact that the foundation of His message is identical with that of Jesus.

"To whatever degree the Maori tribes fought and contended, at least you were united in your religious belief: you all worshipped alike Rangí, the Mother of Heaven; but now your religion has divided you. You have taken over the quarrels and contentions of Christendom and in your sectarian loyalties are learning to hate and oppose each other. And this, too, in the name of Him Who said: 'By this shall men know that you are My disciples—that you love one another,' a Maori can't say 'my basket', 'my food', 'my coat': you must say 'our basket', 'our food': but you are forced to say 'my religion' for you do not hold it in common—religion the one thing that was revealed to bring unity, joy and concord into our lives. Bahá'u'lláh has wiped away these differences and united us as children of the One Heavenly Father."

After a poetic speech of thanks on the part of Mrs. Witaka we went to open the hangí. The odor was delicious, and piling the food into the flax baskets and trays, we sat down to a delectable feast.

After an appropriate ceremony I took my leave, performing te hangí the pressing—not the rubbing—of noses with my gracious hostesses.

It is many a winter, my dear, since we tramped across the campus in the slush, to our class in "Social Origins"; but you were a haunting presence at these interesting and significant meetings. Here is a gifted, an ingenious and a socially-minded people dropping into desuetude. Nature has but one motto: "Adapt or perish." They were perfectly adapted to their natural surroundings. Will they be able to readapt to the requirements of an artificial life soon enough to preserve for us the evidence of their ancient and generous culture?

"THE GARDEN OF THE HEART"

There is a garden in your heart
 That is filled with blossoms rare.
 How do I know, you ask of me?
 Because I catch the fragrance there!

NO MULTIPLICITY OF RACES

PREJUDICE of all kinds, whether religious, racial, patriotic or political are destructive of divine foundations in man. All the warfare and bloodshed in human history have been the outcome of prejudice. This earth is one home and nativity. God has created mankind with equal endowment and right to live upon the earth. . . . Racial prejudice or separation is unnatural and proceeds from human motive and ignorance. All are the children and servants of God. Why should we be separated by artificial and imaginary boundaries? . . . We are human and superior in intelligence. Is it befitting that lower creatures should manifest virtues which lack expression in man?"

* * * *

WHEN the man who is spiritually sagacious and possessed of insight views the world of humanity, he will observe that the Lights of the divine bounty are flooding all mankind just as the lights of the sun shed their splendor upon all existing things. All phenomena of material existence are revealed through the ray emanating from the sun. Without light nothing would be visible. Similarly all phenomena in the inner world of reality receive the bounties of God from the Source of divine bestowal. This human plane or kingdom is one creation and all souls are the signs and traces of the divine bounty. In this plane there are no exceptions; all have been recipients of their bestowals through the heavenly bounty. . . . All humanity are the children of God; they belong to the same family, to the same original race. There can be no multiplicity of races since all are the descendants of Adam. This signifies that racial assumption and distinction is nothing but superstition. . . . God did not make these divisions. These distinctions have had their origin in man himself. Therefore as they are against the plan and purpose of the reality they are false and imaginary."

* * * *

RACIAL and national prejudice which separate mankind into groups and branches, likewise have a false and unjustifiable foundation, for all men are the children of Adam and essentially of one family. There should be no racial alienation or national division among humankind . . . they have neither significance nor recognition in the estimation of God. . . . God has not divided this surface by boundaries and barriers to separate races and peoples. . . . By this division and separation into groups and branches of mankind, prejudice is engendered. . . . Therefore it has been decreed by God in this day that these prejudices and differences shall be laid aside."

THE CALL WENT FORTH

DORIS MCKAY

Nabil's Narrative of the early history of the Bahá'í Cause published under the title "The Dawn-Breakers" and translated by Shoghi Effendi, is of such supreme importance that articles have appeared from time to time reviewing portions of this sacred book. Mrs. McKay's first article on the subject appeared in the September number.*

IN the world that men call real importance is attached to the solid and the tangible. Ponderousness and resistance impress us with their durability until someday when we see how a sprouting seed has cracked a stone.

With all its fragility, the seed belongs to a higher kingdom than the stone. It has within itself the quality of growth. Its expanding cells must fulfill their destiny of accomplishment, so the persistent, tender, green thing triumphs over the venerable stone.

Every age has its fertile seeds which render acquiescent the soil from which the New shall grow. For instance, today we see the young shoots of the new internationalism conquering the old world order.

In Persia, at the time of the Declaration of the Báb, a spiritual reformation made an attack upon the ramparts of a long-established "Church-state". Those who were most aware of the decadent condition of a nation and a Faith that still claimed their loyalty, perceived that by the process of crystallization this institution had become, even as the mineral, incapable of aught but decomposition. Growth was not in it. This condition expressed itself through moral decay, fanatical adherence to tradition, political corruption. Against this legion of monsters were to be arrayed the celestial purity of purpose, illumination, attractiveness and high courage of the Forces of Light. It was the battle of the eternal sun with the transient clouds, of good with evil.

In the records of the Bábí Movement we recognize among deafening discordant sounds, "the Voice in the Wilderness". We hear the Call and the answering voices of those who respond—voices which promise ere long to swell to a chorus, ringing throughout the world.

IN PERSIA the greatest event of the day is the first, for the sun rising on the horizon becomes for a moment an inverted cup; at this instant, according to Muhammadan tradition, the divine bounties are poured upon the world.

That hour had come and Ali-Muhammad (later known as the Báb) climbed to the roof of His merchant uncle's house in Bushir to apostrophize the rising orb. That His was not an ordinary orison the neighboring roofs could testify. With joy, tears and prayers He raised His arms in the direction of the divine symbol, imbued for Him, by reason of His inner knowledge, with a significance which brought daily ecstasy. He addressed His Vision, charging the golden atmosphere with syllables of adoration, the beauty of which made His devout Muhammadan neighbors remember the angel Gabriel.

*Bahá'í Publishing Committee, P. O. Box 348, Grand Central Station, New York City.

By day, this Youth was well known in the market-place. He was a courteous and soft-spoken dealer in grains, respected for His ability, in spite of His extreme youth, in handling His uncle's business. It was in the year '59 (1843) that the potential qualities innate in this pure spirit found their destiny in a dream. He thought He drank a few drops of the blood of the martyred Imám Husayn. This mystic communion made the fire which glowed within Him to burst into a flame. "When I awoke", He later said, "I felt that the spirit of God had permeated and taken possession of my soul. My heart was filled with the joy of His Divine presence and the mysteries of His Revelation were unfolded before my eyes in all their glory."

It was not long after this experience that the Call became articulate upon the lips of this same Youth for His was the chalice designed to hold the celestial wine, the cup offered to a parched and thirsty world. Great events were shaping when, in the year '60, He made known His Mission to the disciple, Mullá Husayn. It was at Shiráz, on the memorable night of May 23rd, 1844, that He declared to that first apostle: "O thou who art the first to believe in Me! Verily I say I am the Báb, the Gate of God, and thou art the Bábu'l-Báb, the gate of that Gate. Eighteen souls must, in the beginning, spontaneously and of their own accord, accept Me and recognize the truth of My Revelation. Unwarned and uninvited, each of these must seek independently to find Me . . . Ere we depart we shall appoint unto each of the eighteen souls his special mission and shall send them forth to accomplish their task. We shall instruct them to teach the Word of God and to quicken the souls of men."

It was as He said. A few weeks passed and His expected band of followers gathered in His presence. These persons, known as the Letters of the Living, had been disciples of the revered t e a c h e r Siyyid Kázim, who throughout his life had taught the advent of the Promised One. A company of them had followed Mullá Husayn from Karbilá to Shiráz, in which direction he had left them in pursuit of his divine Quest. When upon their arrival they read in his face signs that tranquility had taken the place of the agitation with which he had left them, they asked what could have appeased his longing for his concealed Beloved. Mullá Husayn begged them to retire to the seclusion of their cells in the Masjid-i-Ilkháni and to supplicate God for illumination. In this period of meditation and prayer their intuitive powers became so acute that each one attained to the desired knowledge and was guided, even as Mullá Husayn had been, to the recognition of the Báb. Now He had summoned them to Him to receive their instructions for the time had come for them to depart.

He, to whom they so reverently listened was a Youth of twenty-two, of medium height and pleasing appearance, wearing the green sash and turban of a descendant of Muhammad. Quddus, the youngest and last of His chosen disciples, had recognized Him instantly by the majesty of His gait. This power and grace spoke through His slightest gesture. His voice was a fountain of enchantment, melodious accompaniment to words of divine grace. His manner was a blend of humility, great kindness and complete fearlessness. His eyes seemed to gaze upon the past, present and future as one scroll. They were wells of unfathomable wisdom; in their depths one might become submerged in that sublime and unparalleled passion, the love of God. Thus seemed the Báb to His Letters on the day of their setting forth.

Such words as these He then addressed to them:

"O My beloved friends! You are the bearers of the Name of God in this day. . . . You are the witnesses of the Dawn of the promised Day of God. You are the partakers of the mystic chalice of His Revelation. . . .

Beseech the Lord your God to grant that no earthly entanglements, no worldly affections, no ephemeral pursuits, can tarnish the purity, or embitter the sweetness of the grace that flows through you. . . .

I am preparing you for the advent of a mighty Day. Exert the utmost endeavour that, in the world to come, I who am now instructing you, may, before the mercy-seat of God, rejoice in your deeds and glory in your achievements. The secret of the Day that is to come is now concealed. Scatter throughout the length and breadth of this land, and, with steadfast feet and sanctified hearts, prepare the way for His coming. . . . Arise in His name, put your trust wholly in Him, and be assured of ultimate victory."

The significance of these words was well understood by those who of their own choice were prepared to embark upon this most dangerous enterprise. This miracle of a Youth Who had welded their souls together with the fire of Love, was the Manifestation of God, as, in another age, Muhammad and Christ had been. He had been chosen for the Authorship of Words which welled involuntarily from a Divine Source. He was the vehicle of the Supreme Intelligence. He was the angelic herald of change. His mission was to proclaim another event still more marvelous, the near advent of another divine Appearance, Who would be the promised Messiah for all the religions of the world.

The apostles hastened into the arena of the Islamic world, each to his own province, to the cities of Najaf and Karbilá in Iráq, to Isfáhán, K á s h a n, Tihiran, to Khurásán. In each the call was raised, "Awake, awake, for lo! the Gate of God is open, and the morning Light is shedding its radiance upon all mankind! The Promised One is made manifest; prepare the way for Him, O, people of the earth! Deprive not yourselves of its redeeming grace, nor close your eyes to its refulgent glory!"

The Báb, accompanied by Quddus made religious pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina with the intention of formally stating His Mission in those strongholds of the Muhammadan Faith. At Mecca, confronting Mírzá Muhít, leader of the Shaykhi Community,* He spoke as follows: "Verily I declare none besides Me, in this day, either in the East or in the West, can claim to be the Gate that leads men to the knowledge of God." The historian says that "Mírzá Muhít, unable to withstand the sweeping Revelation proclaimed by the Báb, fled in terror from His face."

For wherever this Message was sounded it was as if a powerful searchlight had been turned upon the souls of all men; the moths hurled themselves into the dazzling light regardless of life itself, the beetles scuttled away in consternation. The Muhammadan world was expecting the appearance of the Báb but when brought face to face with the full import of His declaration and proofs, the thought became intolerable — even as the claims of Jesus had aroused the opposition of Jews. The religious leaders in whom the thought of self predominated tried with incredible cruelty to exterminate the growing Movement. But there were others who were spiritually awake who listened to the arguments attentively and accepted their good fortune with astonished joy.

What a drama on all the Persian stage! What moving scenes! What echoes of clamouring mobs, firing squads, cannons, chanting of prayers and cries to God! Mullá Sádiq, the venerable divine, listens to the lad Quddus; he pronounces the Báb's words from his pulpit and is scourged by a thousand lashes. A sifter of wheat runs through the bazaars of Isfáhán on his way to "sift" the souls of the people in the Persian cities; he cries: "Whomsoever I find ready to espouse the Cause I have embraced, I will ask to join me and hasten forthwith to the field of martyrdom." Táhirih, jewel of Persian women, rides hundreds of miles across Persia in a howdak and before the conference of Badasht repudiates Muhammadan tradition by tearing off her veil. Mullá Husayn raises the Black Standard (of Muhammadan prophecy) and marches across Persia while the ranks of his supporters lengthen; he and his companions are starved, attacked, bombarded, at the Fort of the Shrine of Shaykh Tabarsí; he dies in the arms of Quddus while a smile lingers on his lips. A dervish comes from India to see the Báb in prison, he starts back, alone and on foot to labor for the Cause in his native land. Seven famous men are executed at Tihrán eagerly seeking to precede each other in this final test of their sincerity. Vahíd, the most learned man in Persia, leans out of an upstairs window in his house at Yazd, and exhorts his followers who even then are hemmed in by a furious mob led by a regiment. Sulaymán Khán dances and sings while candles burn in sockets cut in His flesh; he is on his way to his execution and the mob hurls epithets and stones. People stream in the direction of the Báb, to curse, to question, to adore. The Movement grows.

IT HAD taken the Báb two months of sea voyaging to reach the city of Mecca where He addressed an epistle to an inattentive Sherif in which He set forth His claims. It is now seven years later and the Sherif is questioning a pilgrim from Persia as to the Author of this manuscript, which at length had been read. What had been the circumstances attending that Call in the land of Persia?

"A great commotion" remarked the pilgrim, "has indeed seized that land during the last few years. A Youth, a descendant of the Prophet and a merchant by profession, has claimed that His utterance was the voice of Divine inspiration. . . . A multitude of people, both high and low, civil and ecclesiastical, among the inhabitants of Persia, have rallied round His standard and have willingly sacrificed themselves in His path. That Youth has, during the past year . . . suffered martyrdom in Tabríz, in the province of Ádhirbáyján. They who persecuted Him sought by this means to extinguish the light which He kindled in that land. Since His martyrdom, however, His influence has pervaded all classes of people."

AWAKENED PERSIA

A RECENT letter written by Mr. A. H. Naimi, secretary of the Unity Committee of the East and the West of the Tíhrán Spiritual Assembly, contains much of interest to readers of this magazine since it shows what is taking place in the country which gave birth to the Founders of the Bahá'í Movement in the last century; the country which was capable of producing souls of such purity and fortitude as were necessary to understand and spread the Great Message and the country which at the same time could produce those misguided souls who inflicted such revolting tortures and such inhuman persecutions upon these pure ones as we shrink from recalling. Present developments in such a country are of significance.

In his opening paragraph Mr. Naimi says: "We certainly believe that the Bahá'í Cause will spread throughout the world and will shed its spiritual light into the darkest corners of human misery, but it is in human nature for one to rejoice over every new sign which indicates the realization of the triumph he is seeking.

"Fortunately such signs are not wanting. The message of Bahá'í love is spreading in the world with wide and sure steps. There is, no doubt, the indifference and disinterestedness of the mass of the people, in the East as in the West, toward all matters concerning religion; but there are armies of life and light,—persons endowed with pure souls who understand the glory and majesty of the divine message as soon as they hear of it. . . . The Qur'án says that such persons are like pure and inflammable oil which ignites even if untouched by a flame. This class of pure souls abounds in the time of all Manifestations; the powers of the Spiritual Springtime bring the plant of their souls to such a state of maturity . . . that the buds open out by the merest breeze—nay by the merest nothing. They range between wonderful orbits of spiritual light, like St. Peter, Ali and Quddus . . . and ordinary believers who . . . obtain their admission into the divine fold by easy search or difficult groping."

In paying tribute to the intrepid few who established the Cause and made possible the present progress Mr. Naimi says: "But consider what these few did; with soul and body they lived for the divine cause. They forgot wife and children, life and wealth, and dashed headlong into the field of battle; showed such chivalrous fortitude and intrepid courage as brought tears of compassion from their direst enemies. They were the army of freedom, the veteran warriors of peace and human felicity who did their duty with purity of motive; who brought about the present comparative comfort for friends; who paved the way for the onward march of the divine message to continents and realms beyond their imaginations."

"As a result," he continues, "we see annual Bahá'í conventions holding meetings in various centers of the world; we witness the sixth Bahá'í All-Persia Annual Convention opening and continuing its sessions with a serenity befitting the congress of a dominant nation in place of the secret and cautious meetings of the early friends in subterranean haunts under the continual peril of detection and persecution.

“We wish that every one of the believers could witness with his own eyes the manifest progress of the Cause in the light of this Sixth Annual Convention which held its twelve sessions from the second to the thirteenth Shahr-ul-Jamal 89 (April 29 to May 10th, 1932). Delegates from all parts of Persia took part in the proceedings with such a love of duty and devotion to the divine interests of the Cause that it touched the hardest in heart and the most stubborn in disposition.

“Resolutions adopted by this body of Bahá’is cover a vast range of human activities bearing on many phases of life, both material and spiritual. In educational matters, for example, the convention resolved that a kindergarten be created wherever there is a Bahá’i school; that the Bahá’i community in localities where there are no public schools should try to influence the local and central educational authorities with a view to the creation of such schools or in the event that such efforts fail to produce the desired effect and where local Bahá’i resources are far from being sufficient to provide for the opening of a school, however primitive and primary, the Bahá’is should send their children to the neighboring towns where there are public schools. In a country where unity of purpose and national associations or understandings are unknown or sneered at, the Convention requires that the Bahá’i Youth Association should open branches throughout the country and the plan is already partially carried out.

“The Convention expressed the wish that inter-marriage between friends of different original creeds should be encouraged and sponsored by the Spiritual Assemblies. Examples of inter-marriage between Israelites and Moslems and between Zoroastrians and Moslems exist nowhere in the country outside the Bahá’i religion.

“In a realm where some years ago the mere suspicion of attachment to the new religion would have entailed dire and cruel tortures and certain death for the suspected ones, the Convention required that Bahá’i dates should adorn all commercial, private and general correspondence; that friends should greet with Alláh-u-Abhá instead of the official Moslem greeting of Salam-un-Aleikum; that under no circumstances should Bahá’is conceal their faith; that they should register their names and those of their families as Bahá’is in the local census; that they should keep Bahá’i festivals in their commercial, scholastic, and office activities; that they should marry according to Bahá’i precepts to which official recognition has been given in some districts and that they should dispose of their legacies in accordance with the Bahá’i regulations concerning inheritance.

“In Persia where there are no sustained and continued efforts for the advancement of the women, the Convention suggests that Bahá’i adult women’s classes should be created everywhere; that instruction in various domestic and ornamental arts should be provided for the Bahá'í women; that Bahá'í women of culture should write treatises for the education of the women and contribute articles to the local press bearing on subjects of spiritual interest; and that Bahá'í Women Teaching classes should be opened in every center for the training of women teachers to spread the Cause.

“We dare not go into more details of the numerous subjects which were dealt with by the Convention as such an attempt would require a volume, but the fact is definitely established to us and to all impartial non-Bahá'ís that the Cause has made a steady headway amidst destructive and opposing factors in Persia and in many other countries. It remains for us to sustain and intensify our efforts for some more years when we shall certainly have our reward in seeing the world awakening to the sense of its immediate and imperative need for these teachings of Divine Guidance.”

SOME forty years ago ‘Abdu'l-Bahá, in a treatise, addressed these words to the Persian people; “You that were masters of the world and in the van of mankind—how is it that you have lost your ancient glory, that you have slept in the corner of obscurity? You who were once the fount of teaching and the spring of the progress of humanity—why have you now become so exhausted and degenerate and negligible? . . . Open the eyes of your judgment and discern what it is that you sorely need. Gird up the loins of resolution and enthusiasm, and strive for the means of education and advancement.”*

Surely Mr. Naimi's letter gives us evidence that our friends in Persia are now girding up the “loins of resolution and enthusiasm”.

WORLD FRIENDSHIP

MARGARET CAMPBELL

THE occasion of the tenth Olympiade at Los Angeles, California, offered to the Bahá'ís of Southern California an unparalleled opportunity to arrange a meeting to celebrate world friendship. Leaders of several groups joined together in a concerted effort to promote better understanding between members of different nations. On the night of August Fourth, at the rooms of the Friday Morning Club, the power of the Bahá'í principles was proven in a never-to-be-forgotten commingling of clubs.

Mrs. Stuart W. French graciously presided at this International Friendship Meeting and introduced Mayor Porter, who welcomed the guests and friends at that time. According to Mayor Porter, the promotion of friendship through the housing together of thirty-eight nations gave rise to great satisfaction. Heretofore it has been considered impossible to bring into friendly living conditions the representatives of such varying manners and customs. While the world watched, Los Angeles became the garden in which blossomed such a flower as the Olympic village. Have we not 'Abdu'l-Bahá's own promise that "Los Angeles is a good city?" In the light of that promise we are not surprised when the fragrance of fellowship, such as the world has never before witnessed, becomes a living fact.

DR. ADRIAN HARTOG, Consul of the Netherlands, with pardonable pride called attention to the fact that he represents a country so wise that it has wasted nothing on armed combat for more than a hundred years. While other countries are deep in the struggle with war debts, moratoriums and heavy death taxes, the Netherlands is using its funds for construction. Instead of paying for past mistakes, it is able to pay for the reclamation of its water front and many other improvements. Holland wastes no time criticising any other country for foolish expenditures, but she is busily engaged in setting an example for the new race to follow. The Bahá'í principle of equal opportunities of development and equal rights and privileges for both sexes was well exemplified by the representatives from Holland for they sent an equal number of young men and women to the Olympic Games.

OF TREMENDOUS import was the address of Ralph Lindstrom, Olympiad Committee representative. The spirit of peace hovered near while he spoke. His was a message of pride and gratitude for the perfect sportsmanship of the national contestants in the games. As seen through this man's eyes the various contestants were not more interested in carrying the day for their own countries than in advancing for all humanity a new record. Undoubtedly the highest note sounded in the symphony of the evening was struck by this visitor (Ralph Lindstrom) when he said that no nation could justly advance its own standards by painting its own virtues against a prepared background of the faults of other countries. Mr. Lindstrom expressed enthusiasm for international sportsmanship which he considered the most natural lubricant for the creaking joints of prejudice.

THE meeting closed after Mrs. French repeated 'Abdul'-Bahá's

Prayer for All Nations:

- "O Thou kind Lord!
Thou hast created all humanity from the same parents,
Thou hast decreed that all shall belong to the same household.
In Thy Holy Presence all are Thy Servants;
And all mankind is sheltered beneath Thy Tabernacle.
Thy children are gathered at Thy Table of Bounty
And have become radiant through the light of Thy Providence.
- "O God! Thou art kind to all.
Thou hast provided for all, dost shelter all, conferest life upon all.
Thou hast endowed each and all with talents and faculties,
And all are submerged in the Ocean of Thy Mercy.
- "O Thou generous Lord! Unite all.
Let the religions agree and make all nations one;
So that they may see each other as one family
And the whole earth as one home.
May they all live together in perfect harmony.

THE NATURE OF THE DIVINE MANIFESTATIONS

3. THE TESTIMONY OF THE PROPHET

GLENN A. SHOOK

Professor of Physics, Wheaton College

In the first chapter published in the October number, the author stressed the slow evolutionary process of the concept of God from the earliest times. The second chapter in the November number treated of the nature of the Divine Manifestations. Herein is emphasized the importance of the Prophet as the way to God and the Medium through Whom the Light flows to the world. The fourth chapter, which will appear in the January number, will conclude the series.

WHEN the Prophet comes into the world He always differentiates, in no uncertain terms, between the scaffolding and the solid structure of religion and it is sometimes a surprise to religious doctors that the majority of their ideas are useless. But just as fitful spirits paved the way for deities of continuous character so our metaphysical notions may have been a necessary preliminary to the truth that has been given to us by the Manifestations for this day. Therefore many of our traditional ideas in religion and philosophy must give way to advanced ideas, ideas compatible with the maturity of this age. This is particularly true with the current concepts of the nature of the Divine Manifestations. Even the great mystics, who have preserved the reality of religion for us, have often gone astray upon such concepts as the Divine Essence. To quote Heiler¹: "The incomprehensible paradox that the small human 'I' has become an infinite 'I' the mystic can understand only as meaning that he himself has become God. As Plotinus says, the ecstatic 'has become God, nay, rather he is God.' Catherine of Genoa declares joyfully: 'My "I" is God, and I know no other "I" but this my God.' And Madam Guyon expresses herself in a similar fashion."

In the very nature of the case the Prophet alone can assist us in tearing down the scaffolding which has helped construct the edifice but which is now not only useless but unsightly. We must there turn to the Prophet and let Him report what He has seen and experienced.

AT THE outset, the idea of a Manifestation of God coming to our planet in this day is so unique that the world at large cannot grasp it. To the majority of mankind religions are, in the last analysis, institutions of the past, and to this majority progress can only be made by walking reluctantly backwards. The popular belief today concerning Christ amounts to nothing more than this: He was and is an example of a perfect life and can therefore serve, regardless of theological controversy, as a model for our lives. But this vacuous belief is inadequate for our present needs. It is popular because it satisfies a flickering desire for something religious without interfering with our every-day pursuits.

It often happens that the more we study an ancient religion the more irrelevant does that religion become to our modern life unless we possess some spiritual quality. This is confirmed by experience both past and present. If we are spiritual, however, then our study will assist us in making a correct estimate of any religion. Hocking* gets at the root of the matter when he says, "The deeds of the mystics constitute the hard parts of history; the rest has its day and passes."

We are concerned here, however, with a world which is not primarily spiritual. Hence at the outset, we cannot expect the unspiritual philosophers to make many contributions to our knowledge of the nature of the Prophets; rather we must be prepared to reject many of their conclusions.

In dealing with every-day affairs we constantly fall back upon generalizations derived from experience. The good executive uses standardized decisions wherever he can to simplify his work and to avoid mental strain. When we discover a new principle, however, our generalizations may be of very little value to us; we must rely upon logic. It is no less true in the field of religion. When the great Prophet comes into the world He brings truths that we cannot grasp if we hold to the superstitions of our ancestors. Bahá'u'lláh not only warns us of the futility of falling back upon tradition but sets it forth as a principle. The "independent investigation of truth" and "the abandonment of all prejudices" are as necessary for the preservation of society today as the "Thou shalt nots" of the Pentateuch.

TRADITIONAL CONCEPTS OF GOD

Let us see then, in the light of the writings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá how far our knowledge of God and the Manifestations of God agrees with the truth.

When we say that God is just, we are not describing God for we cannot think of justice unless we think of some person. Therefore the word "justice" gives us no concept of His form or being. On the other hand we cannot think of God as unjust, therefore in the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá,¹ "We affirm these names and attributes, not to prove the perfections of God but to deny that He is capable of imperfections." The difficulty here is not that God is just and something more which is beyond us, but rather that we do not know what the justice of God is, for if we did we would probably understand the essence of God. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá says,¹ "It is not that we comprehend His knowledge, His sight, His power and life, for it is beyond our comprehension; for the essential names and attributes of God are identical with His Essence, and His Essence is above all comprehension." If we could understand the reality of God we would then look beyond for what, I suppose, we might call the essence of essences and should we attain that we would still look beyond; which is just a complicated way of saying we never can understand the essence. We speak the truth when we say that God is just, He always has been just, and always will be just, but the statement does not imply that we comprehend God's justice.

Nevertheless, we are forced to admit that such a statement must convey something to the mind for we all feel that when we think of God's justice we have something very definite in mind but 'Abdu'l-Bahá makes it clear that the qualities attributed to God can have meaning only when applied to the Manifestations of God, otherwise we are thinking of God as a creature like ourselves which is pure imagination. He says,¹ "Accordingly all these attributes, names, praises, and eulogies apply to the places of Manifestation; and all that we imagine and suppose besides them is mere imagination, for we have no means of comprehending that which is invisible and inaccessible."

*Hocking "The Meaning of God in Human Experience."

This is a very illuminating statement for it shows clearly that all philosophical speculations as to the nature of God are futile. In this instance then, we are not justified in making any inference regarding the justice of God. 'Abdu'l-Bahá says,² "Therefore reflect that different peoples of the world are revolving around imaginations, and are worshippers of idols of thoughts and conjectures. They are not aware of this; they consider their imaginations to be the Reality which is withdrawn from all comprehension, and purified from all descriptions. They regard themselves as the people of unity and the others as the worshippers of idols; but idols at least have a mineral existence, while the idols of thoughts and imaginations of man are but fancies; they have not even mineral existence." Again He says,³ "However far mind may progress, though it may reach to the final degree of comprehension, the limit of understanding, it beholds the divine sign and attributes in the world of creation, and not in the world of God."

THE SCIENTIFIC development of recent years may be of assistance to us here. Up to the end of the nineteenth century scientists were confident that we could reduce the physical world to mechanical models and that when a model could be built to represent a given phenomenon, the phenomenon was completely explained. In that period they sought for no reality beyond the mechanical explanation. To them, matter could be reduced to small particles like billiard balls, and light was a wave disturbance in an ether, like a wave in an elastic solid, say, a rope. Today, however, we realize that the reality must lie beyond the models, beyond the mathematical equations. If we cannot comprehend the reality or essence of the physical world which is visible, it seems highly improbable that we will be able to throw much light upon the world of God.

It is interesting to recall, in this connection, a statement by Eddington³ just a few years ago. He says: "Penetrating as deeply as we can by the methods of physical investigation into the nature of a human being we reach only symbolic description. Far from attempting to dogmatize as to the nature of the reality thus symbolized, physics most strongly insists that its methods do not penetrate behind the symbolism."

When we turn back to early man, therefore, we see that his God must have been, in the very nature of the case, decidedly anthropomorphic. Even idols have their place in primitive religion and may be regarded with as much respect as philosophical abstractions.

³ Eddington, A. S., "Science and the Unseen World."

WHAT applies to justice applies to any other attribute like mercy or power. When we say that God is merciful we simply affirm that He cannot be unmerciful and be God, but that does not mean that we, His creation, understand His mercy. We may understand the mercy of man, a creature like ourselves, but the mercy of God may be something quite different from the mercy of man. We are merciful to our children and deprive them of that which is harmful but they may in some instances regard our mercy as punishment.

When the world is dark and deprived of the Divine Spirit, man sometimes raises this question, "If God is merciful how can He permit suffering?" This question has always bothered sincere people who are loving and kind. They would relieve the suffering of the world; how can a merciful God permit it? Is He not as kind as they to His creatures? The question implies that we understand the mercy of God, or what amounts to the same thing, that the mercy of God is identical with our mercy. This may seem a little difficult at first, but it is because we have never realized our limitations when it comes to speculations concerning the nature of Divinity. Again, as we pointed out earlier, all extant religions were born in a static world but we actually are living in an evolving world and it is certain that we will get more and more light as the world advances. It is also interesting to note, in this connection, that the great saints have always suffered and yet they never feel that suffering is incompatible with Divine mercy.

Let us consider another attribute. We may say that God is infinite or omnipotent but here again the statement does not carry with it the assumption that we comprehend the infinite or omnipotent character of God. To begin with we cannot form a definite picture of infinity in the physical world. If something increases without limit it exceeds all bounds. No matter how the mind strives to conceive of a great physical magnitude, infinity always lies beyond. This limitation certainly holds in the spiritual world.

'Abdu'l-Bahá¹ makes this clear when He says, "It is evident that the human understanding is a quality of the existence of man, and that man is a sign of God. How can the quality of the sign surround the creator of the sign? That is to say, how can the understanding, which is a quality of the existence of man, comprehend God. Therefore the Reality of the Divinity is hidden from all comprehension and concealed from the minds of all men."

We are now in a position to consider a modern philosophical dilemma. "How can God be merciful and omnipotent? He might permit suffering because His power is limited or He might have the power to eliminate suffering but not be merciful. How can He be both merciful and all powerful?" The question seems plausible, at first sight, but in the light of the great spiritual truths revealed to us in this day the statement is meaningless. If we cannot comprehend the omnipotence of God we cannot make any inference regarding it.

To affirm certain attributes of God is not therefore, identical with understanding these attributes when applied to God.

The attributes apply to the Manifestations or Prophets of God. To quote 'Abdu'l-Bahá again, "Therefore all that the human reality knows, discovers and understands of the names, attributes and perfections of God, refer to these Holy Manifestations. There is no access to anything else: 'the way is closed and seeking is forbidden.'"

Many great philosophers have realized that the Creator of all things must be unknowable. Spencer makes this clear in his First Principles. He says: "By continually seeking to know and being continually thrown back with a deepened conviction of the impossibility of knowing, we keep alive the consciousness that it is alike our highest wisdom and our highest duty to regard that through which all things exist as the Unknowable."

Unfortunately, however, such men sometimes fail to realize that a knowledge of the attributes of God may be obtained through His Manifestations. In other words, we are not entirely devoid of any knowledge of God, or of the Unknowable, except as this knowledge refers to His Reality.

The approach to God then, is only through His Messengers. All our knowledge of God must come through the Manifestations. "The source of all learning is the knowledge of God, exalted be His glory, and this cannot be attained save through the knowledge of His divine Manifestation."

ONLY YESTERDAY

SYLVIA PAINE

"Only Yesterday" by Frederick Lewis Allen. New York—Harper's—$3.00. A brief review of a widely read book by a member of the Bahá'í Youth Group who is now a graduate student at one of our large universities.

IT is always a fascinating game to turn the clock back in our imagination a few years and note the changes in our lives and outlook since then. Lewis Allen in his recent book Only Yesterday does this very thing for us in an unusually comprehensive and readable manner. Merely as a review of facts this would be an extremely profitable and entertaining account, but Mr. Allen adds further interest by interpreting these events causally and showing the prevailing state of mind and general attitude of the people which underlay the facts. The book leaves us wondering if after all we are not more ready to accept the element of faith which we have so light-heartedly thrown to the winds in the past ten years. Our search for new and greater freedom in social, religious, and economic realms has led us to a revolt from pre-war morals and religious beliefs. But to our surprise we are left rather cold with no guarantee of economic security and in a life which, although new, is barren of certainty and meaning.

To PICTURE mentally what we have experienced let us glance quickly at the picture Mr. Allen paints for us.

Immediately after the war came the period of the Red Scare in which any idea smacking of reform or progress was branded as radical and hence dangerously anti-American. It was a natural hangover of war time patriotism and extreme nationalism when everybody promoting every conceivable interest "wrapped themselves in Old Glory and the mantle of the founding Fathers and allied their opponents with Lenin."

Then followed the revolt in manners and morals when people, intoxicated with the spirit of "eat, drink and be merry for tomorrow we die" laughed Victorian restraints and taboos to scorn and sought new thrill and freedom in movies, sex confession magazines, violation of prohibition, and Freudianism.

The Coolidge era of prosperity was one of blatant advertising big business promoted by high pressure salesmanship and schemes for installment buying. This "prosperity spirit" spilled over into fields of education and religion. There was a boom in production of outlines of knowledge. It was the time when Bruce Barton sold Christianity to the public by showing its resemblance to business. "Jesus", he said, "picked up twelve men from the bottom ranks of business and forged them into an organization that conquered the world . . . nowhere is there such a startling example of executive success as the way in which that organization was brought together.

His parables were the most powerful advertisement of all time . . . He would be a national advertiser today."

The companion god to Big Business was Science. The heated debate over evolution took place. People were surrounded with new machines, read of new discoveries and delved into Einstein and Eddington's latest theory of the Universe. Dr. Fosdick is quoted:

"The men of faith might claim for their position ancient tradition, practical usefulness, and spiritual desirability, but one query could prick all such bubbles 'is it scientific?' When a prominent scientist comes out strongly for religion all the churches thank Heaven and take courage as though it were the highest possible compliment to God to have Eddington believe in Him."

If we are to find a new faith, it must be one which will best take account of the contributions of science and of the scientific outlook we have gained thereby.*

There was a restlessness about the whole spirit of the decade. For a time we went wild over Mah Jong, then Cue and crossword puzzles. Red Grange was the national hero one day, Lindbergh the next. But Mr. Allen points out that the really unique and pathetic thing about the spirit of new freedom and rebellion from religion, morals and ethics of pre-war days was the disillusionment which set in almost as soon as the rebellion. Nothing in the new philosophy of life was secure, its very purpose was scientifically undiscoverable and "in all this fog there was no solid thing on which a man could lay hold and say 'this is real' ”.

*Abdu'l-Bahá, Expounder of the Bahá'í Faith enunciated this principle of unity between science and religion: "There is no contradiction between true religion and science. When a religion is opposed to science it becomes mere superstition; that which is contrary to knowledge is ignorance . . . it is impossible for religion to be contrary to science even though some intellects are too weak or too immature to understand truth. . . . Put all your beliefs into harmony with science; there can be no opposition, for truth is one. When religion, shorn of its superstitions, traditions, and unintelligent dogmas, shows its conformity with science, then there will be a great unifying, cleansing force in the world which will sweep before it all wars, disagreements, discords and struggles and then will mankind be united in the power of the love of God."

And so with Al Capone and alcohol, racketeering and gang warfare, the stock market boom and succeeding crash, the tempestuous post-war decade ended.

Of the future Mr. Allen hesitates to predict. He points out clearly that with the end of the prosperity era Americans find themselves living in an altered world which calls for "new adjustments, new ideas, new habits of thought and a new order of values. The psychological as well as economic climate is changing."

AS WE ARE finding that a faith is indispensable, even in the present changing world, may we not discover that progress and change are as possible in the religious as in economic and social realms? 'Abdu'l-Bahá in a talk given in America in 1912 at the Unitarian conference in Boston said:

"Religion is the outer expression of the divine reality. Therefore it must be living, vitalized, moving and progressive. The divine institutes are continuously active and evolutionary; therefore the revelation of them must be progressive and continuous. All things are subject to re-formation . . . It is evident that no vital results are now forthcoming from the customs, institutions, and standpoints of the past . . . This is the century of Universal Peace and the reality of the divine kingdom."

May it not be possible to find, in a faith which recognizes reason, science and the fundamental unity of all religions a stimulus to put new meaning into the new life toward which we are evolving, a force which may carry us to the highest stage in the evolution of society which we yet have known?

WORLD THOUGHT AND PROGRESS

INTERDEPENDENCE and technical socialization are responsible for marvels of industrial achievement, yet business administration has inherited the creed that business is primarily for financial profit, and that he who acquires most profits is most enviable. That attitude has been restrained and modified by prevailing decency of men in business, yet an acknowledged philosophy has a way of working itself out in practice.

"The theory of business primarily for profit constantly mars or thwarts creative effort. In recent years financial manipulation by some industrial leaders for private gain has largely destroyed the confidence in industrial leadership on which business rests. To a large degree our present economic plight is the fruit of business for the greatest possible profit. The idea of "profits first," by discrediting our industrial order, may destroy the present spontaneous and vital interdependence of industry, and bring upon us arbitrary political socialization.

"Watching workmen pour out of an automobile plant, or observing the range of ideas and interests at a convention of executives, one wonders that from frail human nature and limited background there can emerge such a miracle of skill as the modern automobile. Yet to the designers even that seems crude as compared with possibilities.

"Things men can make are so fine, yet social aims and conduct are so crude! Are men of a high order of intelligence in dealing with things, but of a low order in dealing with men? I believe not. Interest in social relations and responsibilities as intense as now exists for industrial supremacy would change human relations in industry as greatly as it has changed productive methods. The average man can better understand what is fair and fine in human relations than he can understand mechanical complexities. If desire for leadership could be centered on improving human relations, near miracles could be achieved in that field.

"A cure can come only by the dominance of other incentives than 'profits first'. This is an ethical issue."—Excerpts from a series of articles on Ethics by Arthur E. Morgan, President of Antioch College, Antioch Notes.

THE ORIENT is in a period of transition; it is at the doorway and entrance of a new economic and industrial life and expansion that staggers human thought to effectively grasp. The commerce of the world is shifting to the Pacific, the home of two-thirds of the population of the globe. Despairing today perhaps, yet even now, the peoples of the Pacific must begin to prepare for a period of prosperity such as the world may never have dreamed of. Misunderstanding among the peoples of the Pacific may retard their great destiny, but cannot prevent it. It is inevitable."—Japan Times and Mail, Tokyo.

"HAWAII offers to the world something unique. The Islands are a vast human laboratory, and in the years just ahead the eyes of thoughtful men and women the world over will be focussed on what will be working out here. The new internationalism is upon us. Soon it will be impossible to divide the world into water-tight compartments, whose insulation is a selfish nationalism. To be water-tight in that sense is not to be war-tight, and the future will concern itself more and more with the fusion of races.

"The most interesting phenomenon in Hawaii, to my mind, is this racial fusion. The Islands, as part of the United States represent a crucible within a melting-pot. In the crucible you find in process of fusion, races generally regarded as antagonistic. Closer and more prolonged studies than are possible to a passing publicist are necessary to evaluate what is happening and to predict the ultimate results. Direct political consequences today may blind observers to the promises of tomorrow, but Hawaii should attract the greatest ethnologists in the world to watch and measure the progress that is being made in the greatest racial experiment the world has known. Truly East meets West in these Islands, warring philosophies have had to make a truce under the American flag, and have had leisure in that enforced peace to study each other and endeavor to find a common ground, a lowest common denominator. Hawaii will, perhaps, one day furnish a tremendous object lesson to the world."—Frank A. Russell, special Commissioner "Melbourne Herald." From an article in the Honolulu Advertiser.

"CHINA is the oldest living country but today it is also one of the youngest republics. It occupies an important place in the world not only because of the extent of its territory and the density of its population, but also because of its tremendous undeveloped natural resources. Once her resources are developed and made available for the use of mankind, China will undoubtedly move forward to a place of power among the modern nations.

"No matter in what direction one may turn in China, he will see that Old China is passing and New China arriving. The young republic is now in transition from the agricultural to the industrial stage. Modern education is opening the eyes of the Chinese people to the advantage of new machinery and scientific research in the industrial development of the country. As a result of this, both men and women everywhere have awakened to a national consciousness and their attention is being directed to the development of the unlimited wealth of the nation.

"Today changes are many and rapid in China. Keen observers of Chinese affairs are witnessing the rapid displacement of the old order of things by the new. For the first time in Chinese history laws are enacted that bestow upon women equal rights in matters of property and inheritance. Laws recognize no marriage contracts except those consummated by the young folk and permit women to sue for divorce. Chinese women have come out of their homes and are now active in practically every walk of public life.

"There are now more than two hundred Chinese women holding important offices in the service of the national government at Nanking. Women clerks, secretaries and typists are to be seen in Canton as well as in Peiping. It is a pertinent indication that our women folks are awake politically and otherwise. And for this, they should be congratulated and encouraged. For the first time in the history of China, men and women are working hand in hand, in the upbuilding of a new political life in China. The hand that rocks the cradle will help guide the destiny of the Chinese Republic."—King-Chau Mui, Consul of China, Honolulu Advertiser.

"If you desire to love God, love thy fellowmen. In them you can see the image and likeness of God. If you are eager to serve God, serve mankind. Renounce the self in the Self of God. When the aerial mariner steers his airship skyward, little by little the inharmony and incongruity of the world of matter are lost, and before his astonished vision he sees widespread the wonderful panorama of God's creation. Likewise when the student of the path of Reality has attained to the loftiest summit of divine love, he will not look upon the ugliness and misery of mankind; he will not observe any differences; he will not see any racial and patriotic differences; but he will look upon humanity with the glorified vision of a seer and a prophet. Let us all strive that we may attain to this highest pinnacle of ideal and spiritual life."

“It is towards this goal—the goal of a new World Order, Divine in origin, all-embracing in scope, equitable in principle, challenging in its features—that a harassed humanity must strive.”

—Shoghi Effendi.

RELIGION, if it is to hold the allegiance of the people today, must not only show a deep concern for the economic problems which confront humanity, but must even be able to demonstrate a remedy and engage in the actual effort of directing the achievement of new and more ideal economic principles. Those who say that religion should not meddle in such affairs are mistaken.

It is not the function of religion merely to bind up the wounds of the fallen. True religion is a creative force, guiding humanity into new and better modes of living. It is only in its decadence that religion abrogates such responsibilities. Plainly, religion cannot compete with other directive forces in the life of today unless it makes use of its prerogative to aid in the construction of a better civilization.

Those who follow the progress of inventions in the field of automatic machinery prophesy that within three years there will be in this country, unless a new economic organization takes place, many more millions unemployed. What machinery is able to do today is little short of the miraculous. It has been estimated that four hundred men working with the most modern type of brick-making machinery, could make all the bricks needed in this country. In ancient days of hand manufacture, it took five and one-half days to make one pair of shoes; today the shoe industry in this country alone, with its modern machinery equipment, has the capacity of making nine hundred millions shoes per year. A century ago in this country one man produced twenty-five tons of pig-iron a year; today our modern blast furnace technology has made it possible for one man to produce four thousand tons per annum. One modern steel-rolling mill operates without a single human being on the floor.

The technological development of the last twelve years has made almost as striking a revolution in industrial processes as the original industrial revolution of the 18th century which first substituted power machinery for hand labor. From the beginning of the industrial revolution up to the present, power machinery has multiplied the output of the first human machinery nine million times; but by far the greater part of this increase of machinery power over hand power has come within the last thirty years.

A similar change has been taking place on the farm. Machinery and modern scientific organization have reduced greatly the number of men necessary to employ in agriculture while at the same time multiplying tremendously the amount of crops. A hundred years ago it took six million men to harvest the grain crop of America. Today the same amount of grain could be harvested—with the use of modern machinery—by six thousand men.

THE AMAZING thing about the present depression is the fact that it is based not upon scarcity of food and manufactured goods but upon an over-production in these fields. That is to say, the very wealth of food and goods which machinery has enabled man to produce has proved an economic curse under our present economic organization.

Yet if we analyze the situation we shall perceive that the chief cause of the economic plight of humanity today could be made the means of the greatest permanent prosperity and material happiness which the world has ever known. With such an abundance of food products and of goods it is clearly only a just distribution of the products of machine-labor which is needed in order to assure to every individual the utmost comfort and security.

Let us conceive an analogous imaginary situation: A hundred men are by some accident wrecked on an uninhabited island of equable climate and of considerable natural resources. Some important mechanical equipment and material are salvaged in Robinson Crusoe fashion. These men, organizing some sort of a government, start to work to prepare shelters for themselves. At the same time they take steps to assure themselves a constant supply of food when the stores brought with them are exhausted. At first it takes all the labor of the group to get shelters built and to secure food, but a time comes when not all of the labor is needed for these purposes. Ingenious channels for the energy of the group are then found, for making life not only secure but pleasing. The power of the tides is harnessed and made to contribute to manufacture.

Can it be conceived that if the whole effort of the group is devoted to ameliorating life upon this desert island, the majority would become wretched and deprived? No! Clearly, the more human ingenuity and energy was applied to the life of this group, the more secure and comfortable and happy would be both their corporate and individual life. There is only one possibility of the contrary happening. If the organization of this group should result in an exploitive control by a few members, then and then only could it happen that labor plus machinery might fail to bring comfort and security to all. For greed can destroy all that human ingenuity builds up.

Applying this fable to the life of today, we may see that in reality the only thing that can disturb economic prosperity is greed. Greed can always create obstacles to human welfare. It can obstruct the ideal expression of economic forces. It is not the invention of machinery which is bringing trouble upon the human race, but the economic organization of humanity.

UNDER an ideal economic organization machinery can be nothing but a means to universal comfort, security and happiness. It will create new sources of pleasure and culture at the same time that it increases the amount of leisure for the individual.

One can conceive, as indeed many industrialists are already doing, that the day will come when every workman will own his own plot of land on which he will raise vegetables and flowers, devoting many of his leisure hours happily to the enhancement of his domestic life. With radio, with magazines and books, he will have almost limitless means for increasing his knowledge and improving his culture.

BUT WHAT part does religion have to play in this economic evolution of humanity? Religion is, in fact, the only means by which the ideal world economic organization can be brought about. Since self-seeking motives, greed and exploitation have been the cause of the present cataclysm, it is plain that no ideal economic system can be established except by the subordination of the self-seeking emotions to the altruistic emotion.

One of the chief functions of religion is to ennoble the spiritual nature of the individual man and make him potential material with which to build up ideal institutions. Religion has, however, another function equally as important—that of pointing out, thru implication or explication, the actual type of institution which should regulate the life of humanity. Unless such institutions should appear with the backing of Divine Authority, how could they be accepted and established universally, as is necessary today?

IN THE NEW WORLD ORDER of Bahá'u'lláh we have the perfect pattern of the new economic organization of humanity, both national and international. We have here an industrial system which by justly sharing the profits of industry between capital and labor abolishes dangerous conflict and also guarantees to the workman a buying power which enables him to consume the goods created, thus assuring normal constant circulation in the economic body of the nation. Internationally, the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, by abolishing racial prejudice, warfare and tariff barriers—produces a free and healthy flow of raw material and goods between the countries of the world. These and other principles of the New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, when put into effect, will not only heal the present ills of humanity but will be preventive of any such debacles in the future.

Can the year 1933, then, be considered too early to attempt wholeheartedly the spiritual awakening of humanity? Drab and dreary as is the outlook, materialistic and self-seeking as are the vast majority of people under every flag, can it be said that there is any better time than the immediate present for launching a reform?

May this year see the turning of the tide, not only toward prosperity but also toward the growth of a vast spiritual consciousness in humanity, a willingness to follow implicitly and unselfishly the guidance of God!

THE BAHÁ'Í VIEW OF AUTHORITY AND ORGANIZATION

HUSSEIN RABBANI

The author, a graduate student in one of the large universities in the East, has an exceedingly illumined concept of what the Bahá'í Teachings are and how they work out in actual practice toward establishing a better social order. Readers of the magazine will remember his two important articles under the title, "The Social Emphasis in the Bahá'í Movement," published in the October and November 1932 issues of this magazine. Those who have not read them would do well to do so as they form somewhat of an introductory background to the following contribution which defines the attitude of Bahá'ís toward organization and administration. The second and concluding part of this article will be published in the February number.

TO a student familiar with the social teachings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá it will be but evident that the problem of authority stands at the very foundations of the Bahá'í social program. Both of these teachers have, as a matter of fact, laid emphasis on the necessity of a coordinating power or agency capable of directing men's efforts in the right path. They have found the world in a state of chaos and it was their primary aim, therefore, to set up a society in which people could lead a life of peace and prosperity.¹ The environment in which they were destined to live was one of moral and political corruption. The rulers and sovereigns under whose rule they carried out their mission were most tyrannical and unjust. Whether in Persia or in Turkey their experiences with the public officials were of the greatest bitterness. Instead of order and tranquility they witnessed social and political confusion. Instead of just and able rulers they saw tyrants and despots. They themselves were twice persecuted; once at the orders of the Shah of Persia and another time at the instigation of the Sultan of Turkey. Indeed, their very existence was under continual threat and they rarely found a moment of happy tranquility in which they could freely engage in their work.

The following passage, in which Bahá'u'lláh relates some of the incidents connected with the early days of His mission, deserves quoting: "We had nothing to do with this odious deed,"² He says, "and our innocence was indisputably proved before the tribunals. Nevertheless, they arrested us and brought us to the prison in Tihrán, from Niyavaran, which was then the seat of the Royal Residence; on foot, in chains, and with bare head and feet, for a brutal fellow who was accompanying us on horseback snatched the hat from my head, and many executioners and guards hurried us along with the great speed and put us for four months in a place the like of which has not been seen. In reality a dark and narrow cell was far better than the place where this wronged one and his companions were confined. When we entered the prison, on arrival, they conducted us along a dismal corridor, and thence we descended three steep stairs to the dungeon appointed for us. The place was pitch dark, and its inmates numbered nearly a hundred and fifty—thieves, assassins and highway robbers. Holding such a crowd as this, it yet had no outlet but the passage through which we entered. The pen fails to describe this place and its putrid stench. Most of the company had neither clothes to wear nor mat to lie on. God knows what we endured in that gloomy and loathsome place!"

And yet, in spite of all these tribulations Bahá'u'lláh never attempted to undermine the social and political institutions under which He lived. He did not reject authority as such, nor did He encourage His followers to revolt against their government. He joyfully accepted what had befallen Him and instead of preaching revolution and sowing the seeds of insurrection and discord He bade His companions to act with justice towards the authorities, to be truthful to them and to serve them to the best of their abilities. His message was one of peace and brotherhood and it is as such that He addresses the rulers of the earth in His Tablets. His was an attitude of respect, though not one of uncritical and blind obedience to authority. It is true that He emphasized the necessity of obedience and respect towards the repositories of power and yet at the same time He warned them to act with justice towards the people, to consider themselves as simple trustees rather than as irresponsible governors and statesmen.²

That, in the Bahá'i view obedience to authority is essential for the protection and the safety of mankind, is abundantly proved first by the attitude of submissiveness and respect expressed by the authors of the Bahá'i Faith themselves towards all possessors of authority, whether political or otherwise, and secondly by the specific provisions of their writings.

Indeed, a careful perusal of Bahá'u'lláh's and 'Abdu'l-Bahá's writings clearly indicates how respectful they were towards the possessors of power and command. Never did they mention their names with the slightest degree of irreverence, though they atrociously suffered at their hands.

Not only so, Bahá'u'lláh as well as 'Abdu'l-Bahá specifically enjoin their followers to act towards their governments with truthfulness and sincerity. "In every country or government where any of this community reside, they must behave toward that government with faithfulness, trustfulness and truthfulness."³ And speaking on reverence, Bahá'u'lláh says: "O people of God! I exhort you to reverence. Reverence is, in the primary station, the lord of all virtues. . . . He who is endowed with reverence is endowed with a great station."⁴ Furthermore, in His Will and Testament He reveals the following: "It is incumbent upon all to aid those souls who are the day-spring of authority and the dawning-points of command, and who are adorned with the ornaments of equity and justice."⁵ And 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself confirming Bahá'u'lláh's own words declares in His Will that, "We must obey and be the well-wishers of the governments of the land, regard disloyalty unto a just king as disloyalty to God Himself, and wishing evil to the government a transgression of the cause of God."

ALL THESE statements show that the Bahá'ís are under strict obligation to respect and obey their governments and thus be loyal and faithful citizens. They should act so for two fundamental reasons; first, because of the necessity of authority as the prime requisite of any social organization, and secondly, because of the divine origin of authority itself.

To begin with, it is obvious that under present-day circumstances no social plan can be effectively carried out unless it definitely provides for a certain authoritative body or agency which will have the full competence of adjusting and coordinating the diversified and complex interests of men in their social and corporate life. For, however dispassionate and truthful men may appear yet, it is indubitable that in many of their actions they seem to manifest some selfishness which, unless curbed and wisely regulated, will lead to conflict and war.

Human beings are not pure angels as the anarchists seem to imply. Their motives are not always pure and untarnished. They are not moved to action solely by the desire for service. Back of every human action there is some element of egotism and self assertion. We are all to some extent selfish creatures, seeking our own individual interests often without due consideration to the welfare and interests of our neighbours. And yet, at the same time, these selfish creatures are capable of such a devotion and love that no force, however insidious and persistent, will ever succeed in checking their course of action.

History abundantly proves that under certain circumstances human beings have acted in such a glorious way that they have sacrificed all their interests for the sake of the collective welfare and success. Patriotism has been and still is the mainspring of many noble emotions. To defend their fatherland against the unjust encroachments of foreign invaders many lives have been willingly sacrificed and many sufferings have been shared in common. Perhaps no cause has aroused more zeal and enthusiasm than religious faith. Religion, whether we approve of it or not, has been the strongest bond of unity among all peoples and nations, irrespective of their race and language. It has knit them together so closely that no power has proved of any avail to disunite and separate them. Religion has inspired many noble souls to disregard their own welfare for their neighbor's sake. It has acted as a strong bulwark against all disrupting forces from within and from without. It has made collective and group life possible by inducing the individuals to joyfully obey the laws of God and those promulgated by His prophets. In such wise the burden of authority has been lightened and instead of being a scourge has come to be looked upon as a heavenly bestowal. "Ye shall know the Truth, and the Truth shall make you free.”

HUMAN NATURE, therefore, is a complex bundle of feelings, emotions and thoughts, which should be looked upon from different angles and different viewpoints. It is not a uniform system but a mixture of elements as diverse and as intricate as those which enter into the composition of our physical body. The individualists and the collectivists have both of them given us a one-sided account of the nature of man. “Men seem,” remarks a well known writer, “to be more separate and individual in some at least of their actions than the organic theory of society allows, and more social than the individualists allow.” We can not fully agree with Thomas Hobbes when he says that the life of man in the pre-social state was “Solitary, poor, nasty, brutish and short” and that his sole incentive to organize a society was to preserve and further his individual selfish interests. For such a conception seems to indicate that society is not natural but accidental, that group life is a deliberate creation of the rational man and not the necessary outcome of man’s social nature. Nor can we accept the other extremist view held by Hegel and Idealists, who regard the state as “a self-conscious ethical substance and a self-knowing and self-actualizing individual”, for whose sake the individual should annihilate himself and to whose biddings he should readily submit.

Both, the individualistic and the idealistic interpretations of human nature are too narrow and hence inaccurate. We are moved by a twofold motive: a selfish motive and what we may call a “social service” motive. Egotism and self-sacrifice are both of them essentially human and are deeply rooted in our inner being. The social theorist, therefore, should always take these two elements into consideration, lest he may elaborate a social plan entirely out of harmony with the actual conditions of life. The philosophy of anarchism which is based on too genteel a conception of human nature cannot be a workable theory of social organization. Nor can the extreme socialistic view which disregards the individual and sacrifices him for the sake of the group be an adequate philosophy of corporate life. The truth, as usual, is half-way between the two and it is that which the Bahá’ís strive to materialize both through their individual and their collective efforts.

“Surely the world, contracted and transformed into a single highly complex organism by the marvelous progress achieved in the realm of physical science, by the world-wide expansion of commerce and industry, and struggling, under the pressure of world economic forces, amidst the pitfalls of a materialistic civilization, stands in dire need of a restatement of the Truth underlying all the Revelation of the past in a language suited to its essential requirements.”

COUNT LEO TOLSTOY AND THE BAHÁ'Í MOVEMENT

WHEN I was in Prague, Czechoslovakia, in 1927, I met the secretary of Count Leo Tolstoy, Mr. Valentin Bulgakov; we had a long talk about Count Tolstoy and his contact with the Bahá'í Movement. Later, in December 1930, I met Miss Alexandra Tolstoy, the youngest daughter of this great Russian writer and humanitarian. She said to me then, "What Mr. Bulgakov has told you about my father's interest in the Bahá'í Movement is true. He was with him during the last four years of my father's life; he was his secretary and arranged his library." Then, too, I corresponded with Mrs. Isabel Grinevsky of Leningrad in 1927 and she wrote me about Count Tolstoy.

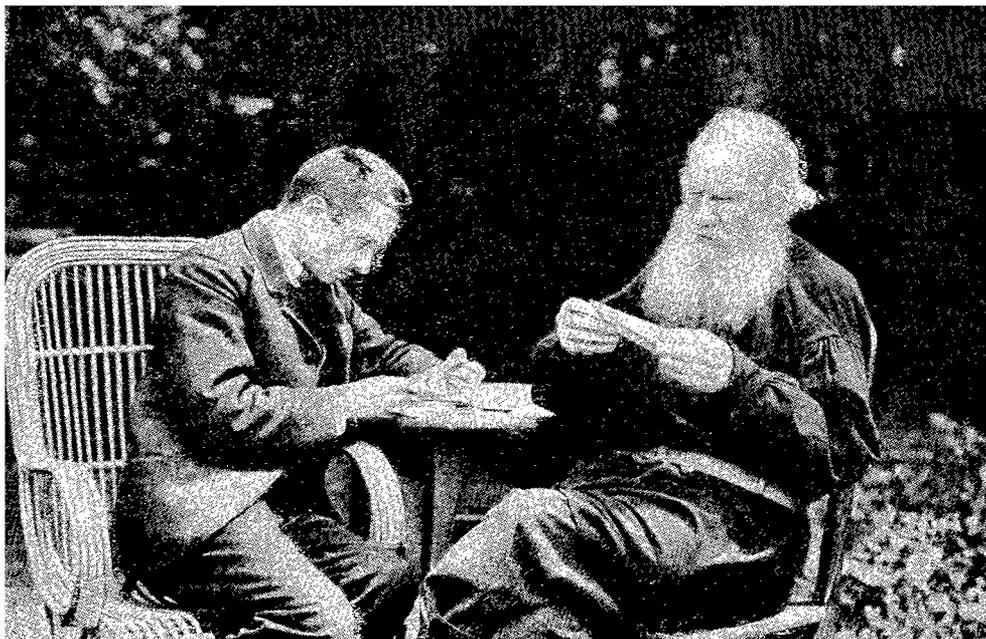

It is through these kind friends that I have the facts for this article. An added interest was given to the subject for me when only a few days ago, May 31, 1932, I interviewed the president of a Roman Catholic university in Poland who had met 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 1914, in Haifa, Palestine. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to him that there was no greater writer in Europe than Count Leo Tolstoy. "What a pity that Tolstoy, who so admired the Teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, never had the privilege of meeting Him.

"Count Tolstoy knew the Bahá'í Teachings through literature. I think he did not know any Bahá'ís personally," said Mr. Bulgakov in his talk with me. "He first heard of the Bahá'í Movement in May, 1903, when Mrs. Isabel Grinevsky brought out in Leningrad (the former capital of Russia that then was called St. Petersburg) a great drama called Báb; it was in verse and gave the illumined history of the Forerunner of the Bahá'í Movement, a young man called Báb and His disciples called Letters of the Living; the scenes were laid in Persia. This drama was played in one of the principle theatres of St. Petersburg, in January, 1904, and given a remarkable reception. Some of the critics went far in its praise. For example, the poet Fiedler (who afterward translated the drama into German) said: 'We receive from the five acts of the poetical drama Báb more information about the Bahá'í Movement than from the deep, scientific researches of Professor Edward G. Browne, Gobineau and Russian scientists and historians. As the Herold has already published two full feuilletons about the poem, we shall speak only of the performance of the play. Rarely has the renown of any play preceded the performance as has this of Mrs. Grinevsky.' "

The Herold of January, 1904, printed the following:

"The drama appeared in May of last year, 1903, the most inconvenient time for the coming out of a book, but nevertheless pens of critics began to move in the journals and magazines in praise of the author's work. Moreover, enlightened Persian society sent an inspired letter of thanks; and above all, Isabel Grinevsky had the high spiritual satisfaction that among those who praised her drama was the lion of contemporary Russian literature, Leo Tolstoy."

Mr. Wesselitzky, a Russian journalist and president of the Foreign Press Association in London, gave an address about this drama Báb in London, in English and the lecture was published in pamphlet form in French and English. I quote one paragraph from this speech: "Amidst the sorrows of disastrous war and those dreadful inner troubles, that book, Báb, was my only happy impression and it has remained since a permanent source of joy and comfort as a manifest proof of the vitality of Russia and its creative genius."*

"Count Tolstoy read this drama Báb with great interest," Mr. Bulgakov told me, "and sent a letter to Mrs. Grinevsky praising her work and telling her he was in sympathy with these teachings of the Bahá'í Movement." His letter to her was published in the press of Russia. Mrs. Grinevsky also wrote me about this letter from Count Tolstoy which she has preserved.

Next Count Tolstoy read a booklet by Mr. Arakewian that described further the history of the early followers of the Báb and gave a short account of the teachings. He studied it with eager interest, his secretary told me, and sent a copy of it to one of his friends, Mr. Boulanger, who was writing a book about all religions. Count Tolstoy urged Mr. Boulanger to include a chapter on Bahá'ism in this new book. Unfortunately the book was not published before Count Tolstoy passed on, then came the world war and it was never printed. "Count Tolstoy's heart and soul were in all universal movements like the Bahá'í Movement that aim at the unity of all mankind," said Mr. Bulgakov.

He also told me that Count Tolstoy read with deep appreciation the book, "The Voices of the Peoples" by Ivan Nagivin, in which the author writes much about different religions, the old Christian sects in Russia, the Indian Religions, and about Bahá'ism. Tolstoy liked this work because it opposed militarism and all fighting and stood for universal peace. He gave copies of this book to several of his friends sending them from his home in Yasnaya Polyana.

When I asked Mr. Bulgakov if Count Tolstoy had Bahá'í books in his library, he replied: "Certainly, he had Bahá'í books in several languages. After he had read the drama Báb and knew of the Bahá'í Movement, he sent and bought what books he could get. I remember a picture in one of the English books—a picture of a young man who looked like Christ, and was the Founder of this movement."

The secretary said that Count Tolstoy had studied the Bibles of all religions profoundly.

As one of the principles of Bahá'u'lláh is a universal auxiliary language, I asked the secretary what Count Tolstoy thought about such a language to help promote world peace, and quickly he replied: "He thought it was very important, and when he heard for the first time about Esperanto he was so delighted that he took an Esperanto grammar, studied it two hours and wrote a letter in Esperanto! He was then about seventy years old. He knew many languages, Russian, English, French, German, Italian, Hebrew, Greek, Latin."

Count Tolstoy, I feel, was a Bahá'í in spirit, for the word signifies in the Persian language "Light-bearer", even though he heard of the Teachings late in life. He was born September 10, 1828, and so was nearly seventy-five when he first learned through the drama Báb of this universal religion for peace which had its rise in Persia about the middle of the nineteenth century. He passed on November 10, 1910, but in one of his last writings, I hear, he penned these words which will be read not only by this generation but by millions yet unborn: "We spend our lives trying to unlock the mystery of the universe, but there was a Turkish Prisoner, Bahá'u'lláh, in 'Akká, Palestine, who had the key!'"

"Mankind needs a universal motive power to quicken it. The inspired Messenger Who is directly assisted by the power of God brings about universal results. Bahá'u'lláh rose as a Light in Persia, and now that Light is going out to the whole world."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

SICK AT HEART

THE world is sick. Everybody talks about it. Everybody also talks about the achievements of Science, and about knowledge of which there is no dearth, and yet the world is sick. Of food there is plenty and yet hungry people walk the streets. Factories turn out clothes and shoes and boots, and yet men and women and children are in rags. This sickness is traced to the great War, and while in one part of the world disarmament is talked about, in another arms are being sharpened for ready use

“The intellect of humanity is not sick; however great the quantity of false knowledge, there is sufficient appreciation of what is true: who does not know that sacrifice, cooperation, brotherliness, are the remedies? Why are they not applied? There is a gulf between apperception of a fact and its effective use. The will to do must be developed. Our humanity suffers from a weak will, and is not able to do that which it perceives as right. It is sick at heart

“What are the real causes which produce a poverty-stricken society? Lack of moral perception and of moral stamina Neither political legislation nor social-service will avail These cannot inspire humanity to awaken t verities and realities”—Excerpts from Editorial in The Aryan Path.

SONG OF THE NEW YOUTH

SILVIA MARGOLIS

We are the Youth of another World,
 We are the Pulse of another Earth!
 We are the Breath of another Cycle,
 We are the Fruit of another Birth!
 We will not wander erringly
 Where you, our Sires, have lately trod;
 We will not make a mockery
 Of the Commandments of our God!

Your harbors of security,
 Your citadels of brain and brawn
 All, all have reached their setting-point
 And will not have another dawn—
 They waste away and are consumed!
 But from the Emerald Hill come We,
 The Youth, the Youth of another World,
 All fragrant with fidelity!

We are the Youth of another World,
 We are the Drops of another Sea!
 We are the Breath of a Golden Era,
 We are the Leaves of a Living Tree!
 We will not stretch an arm to strike,
 We will not lift a sword to slay,
 We will not crush, we will not plunder—
 We are the Youth of another Day!

We are the Youth of another Age,
 Of another Grace are we the Fruit!

We will not deal in transient passions,
We will not waste in vain dispute!
We are the Youth of another Day,
We are the Youth of another Grace,
And we will band the East and West,
And we will heal the human Race!

We will not sit in judgment seats,
We will not learn—greed or lust,
We'll make the earth one commonwealth
We will not cavil with our Trust!
For we have come from the Emerald Hill
Bearing composure for the Earth!
We are the Youth of another World,
We are the Sons of another Birth!

We will not follow in your steps,
We will not tarry in your way,
We will not war, we will not smite,
We are the Youth of another Day!
We will not doubt, we will not wave
The false bright banners of your might!
We'll band our forces fast together—
We will not cavil with the Light!

We are the Youth of another World,
We are the Pulse of another Earth!
We are the Breath of another Cycle,
We are the Fruit of another Birth!
We will not wander erringly
Where you, our Sires, have lately trod!
We will not make a mockery
Of the Commandments of our God!

LETTERS HOME

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

In her world travels in behalf of the Bahá'í Movement the author takes time to write to friends impressions derived from her varied experiences. These "Letters Home" we are glad to be able to present to the readers of The Bahá'í Magazine. The first "letter", which appeared in the January 1932 number, described the author's visit to Nikko and other places in Japan. In the April number she gave some of her impressions of China; and last month an interesting description of her contacts with the Maoris of New Zealand. Herein she has recorded a few of her observations while traveling through India.

DO you recall, in our brave young days, how we longed to go to India to imbibe her hoary wisdom and become impregnated with her spiritual life? To visit India means to readjust every preconception. It is as remarkable as our imaginings but quite different. Japan is inscrutable, China mysterious, India baffling—to the western mind quite incomprehensible.

From her population of three hundred and thirty millions, there are forty millions accredited beggars who for religious reasons are supported by the working population. This army of parasites would abstract, as a minimum, four annas a day from the public wealth. Although, as you undoubtedly remember, my mathematics has never been spectacular, I have a vague idea that this would amount to several million dollars a year, paid as a religious duty to non-producers.

The population is notoriously undernourished, especially requiring oils. I suppose about five per cent of the people use them; but at the great shrines, like Muttra Patna, crowds stand in line waiting to pour monds (eighty pounds) of precious oil or butter onto the altar fires, in payment of some pledge to the gods, or as an inducement for future favors.

In Hyderabad, Deccan, one of the most enlightened and advanced states in India, as elsewhere, the lepers wander freely through the bazaars. When I remonstrated with one of the officials about it he said blandly: "Just how could we confine them in a lazaretto? The different castes could not occupy the same quarters, they could not eat the same food, they would require different classes of attendants; institutions of this sort would not only tax the state to the utmost because of the endless duplication required, but would create a storm of protest on account of the molestation of established religious customs."

When a holy beggar sits with a mond of rice in front of him collected in a village where the children are only half-fed, and you say to the headman, "Why do you give far more to this man than he can possibly consume when your children are hungry?" He merely answers, "It was the custom of our fathers," and this explanation fully satisfied him.

If a cow occupy the narrow lane through which your automobile must pass and you molest her in order to proceed, the villagers come to protest, saying that the cow has her own divine inspiration as to when she wishes to rise or to lie down, and must not be disturbed.

You are to wait, if necessary, two or three hours until the cow moves, but in the intense heat and the famines when men and beasts are exhausted and famishing, if the crows begin to pick at the open sores on the cow's back, not one of the villagers will disturb himself to drive away the offenders.

That is why I say that India is baffling. My mind is too feeble to reconcile these drastic contradictions.

BUT OUT of my first revulsion and amazement at these childish incongruities, came the delighted recognition of that inner spell and fascination which India casts upon the soul. I had the great advantage of traveling with Pritam Singh, late Professor of Economics at Allahabad University, Secretary of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá'ís of India and Burma, and Editor of the "Bahá'í Weekly." Through his unflinching kindness and efficiency I saw the spirit and culture of India in ways entirely closed to the tourist.

My first glimpse of ancient India was at Benares, and it was here too that I first looked upon Holy Mother Ganges. No wonder the Hindus worship this river; winding for eighteen hundred miles across the great central plateau of India it makes fertile a million fields and lends to the earth her glad increase.

Benares is like a fabled city; you can scarcely convince yourself that it is not the reflex of some half-forgotten dream. It is one of the sacred places of the Hindus, for it was here that the sublime Buddha first revealed His mission—the Buddha Whom the Hindus, with consummate subtlety and acumen, elevated to one of the incarnations of Vishnu, when driving His followers forever from their soil.

To bathe in the Ganges is to receive the protecting embrace of Vishnu Himself, for does not this sanctified flood spring from his very head manifesting in the form of a cow?

At sunrise the banks are astir with life. As we leave the hotel a band of pilgrims travel-stained and eager, who have evidently walked many miles during the night, are passing on their way to the consummation of their deepest yearning—to commingle with God in the holy waves of the Ganges.

Sealed in comfortable hour-glass chairs on the deck of an enormous rowboat, the glittering phantasmagoria unfolds before us as we float along. It is as if some stupendous being sprinkling largesse from a gigantic cornucopia had scattered, with lavish hand, temples, palaces, balustrades and galleries, appropriately to crown these holy precincts.

The temples, serrated pyramids of red sand-stone, crowd against each other from bank to brink, and magnificent palaces reared high of solid masonry dignify the scene. In the distance the slender twin minarets of a mosque remind us that an alien culture has been grafted upon the ancient stem of India; but Islam is here only a formal intruder. (In Agra I shall see the evidences of the Moslem occupation). Flung from the lofty parapets of the palaces are brilliant saris, crimson, saffron, purple, magenta drying in the early sun, and fluttering with every vagrant breeze.

From place to place long flights of broad stairs lead into the river; these are now thronged with worshippers clad in a glorious riot of color, vivid and beautiful. The women do not remove their saris (the six or nine yards of material in which they so gracefully drape themselves) when they enter the river, but the men strip except for the loin cloth, and usually a garland of daffodils or marigolds around the neck.

Of course I realized that nowhere else on earth could this sight be duplicated and I wanted a thousand eyes to impress every detail upon my memory.

Small wooden piers are built out over the river to accommodate the more bathers, and giant umbrellas, twelve feet in diameter, protect them from the sun, already hot at its rising. Naked priests sometimes sit under them, votive offerings of food and money piled before them, with earnest disciples learning from them the discipline of deliverance. The pilgrims, lifting a joyous song, march, a white-clad band, along the irregular path that crowns the bank. Everywhere is color, motion, sound. I have never heard anything, outside a boiler factory, comparable to the infernal din of the Temple bells. The gods must have much stouter nerves than mine if they withstand these strident petitions.

Near the widest flight of steps is the burning ghat where the dead bodies are cremated. On the morning of my arrival a little group of men ran past the car with a body suspended on a narrow crude litter. "Why, what is that?" I exclaimed. "A corpse", replied Professor

Singh casually. "They are taking it to the ghat." Here we find none of the western sentimentality about death. To the Hindu it is a brief and deserved respite between the struggles, trials and sorrows of a multiplicity of earthly existences. Our tender regard for that last souvenir of the soul, the lifeless body, seems to have little place in Hindu psychology.

At this ghat there are three pyres. The mourners, very few in number, sit on a little mound above, while an attendant with a long stick (the fires are intensely hot) pokes the corpse from time to time to make it burn the better. Wood is scarce and expensive. In theory the corpse is burned to ashes and these scattered in the river: in reality if there is not enough wood in the pyre completely to consume the body, its charred remains are thrown in as they are. Immediately next the ghat the city drain empties; a great flow of filthy water may be seen constantly pouring into the stream and immediately next the ghat and the drain is the broadest flight of stairs, the largest amount of piers and the greatest number of bathers.

That millions of people can survive these unhygienic and unsanitary conditions is due to the powerful actinic ray of the Indian sun, to which germs and contagions are a very trifling matter.

The water is by this time swarming with men and women offering their morning prayers; the temples are packed, the piers crowded. Lifting up the water in hollowed hands the worshippers pour libations to the sun. And now departing they fling their gay garlands upon the surface of the waters, a reminder of their prayers and their pledges.

HERE LIES a man powerless and lethargic. "What ails him?" I ask. "He is a twenty-pounder", I am told. "He looks more like twenty stone", I answer. "What do you mean?" "He is a sadhu (a religious beggar) who can eat twenty pounds of food at a time." It seems that an affair of great credit is to feed these abnormal men. Ramakrishna at last has a son. He vows a pilgrimage for himself and his wife to Benares, and there, as token of his gratitude, he will feed two fifteen and one twenty pounders. The sadhus gorge with choice food until they are absolutely distended with this unnecessary nourishment and then lie helpless for two or three days digesting it. They would not dare take a drink of water lest the food ferment and kill them. This, with millions half-starved in India.

Returning to the city a priest accosts us and bids us visit the gold-domed temple. We are not permitted to enter, as we are heathen, but view from a balcony the surging crowd that worships. The dome, a gift from some ancient rajah, is covered with lakhs of pure gold. Carved elephants and bulls, the various incarnations of Krishna, are hung with garlands.

INDIAN LIFE is full of poetry. The most lovely of their customs is the use of flowers. There are bouquets and garlands for every occasion and the women wear the most charming decorations of blossoms. Mr. Telang, a learned and delightful Hindu, General Secretary of the Theosophical Society, who entertained me the day I spoke at the Theosophical University, told a sweet little story. Some masons who were building a house, for a Moslem, by-the-bye, found a little bunch of wilted flowers by the roadside, abstracted a few of the bricks and placing the drooping bouquet in a small earthen pot of water, built a tiny shrine around it, lighted a candle and started still another place of worship.

On my way out to fill engagements at the Benares Hindu University, I noticed a candle burning in the root of a mighty tree, placed there by some humble devotee who found God everywhere.

Fortunately it was the month of marriages so that I saw a series of these gayest of all festivals. Radiancious processions follow the gorgeously apparelled bride in her litter, with a profusion of extravagant color, flowers and ornaments. The groom, on a richly caparisoned horse rides behind, no less magnificently clad than his lady. There are cymbals, music, song, shouts and laughter. Our western life seems inexcusably drab, inert and self-conscious in comparison to these spontaneous ceremonies.

Several times on returning to the hotel we had to push aside a sacred cow or heifer before we could mount the stairs: one night an enormous creature blocked the entrance. "Ah, here is the main bull," exclaimed Professor Singh quaintly.

In Benares is situated the most important Hindu University in India. Although it was closed I was given the opportunity of presenting the Bahá'í message to the faculty, who accorded me very flattering attention. The tendency of the Hindu is not to oppose or persecute but to exclude.

In India I had much the feeling I had in China—that of a crystallization so powerful that nothing except the destruction of the mould could dissolve. "What but the power of Bahá'u'lláh", I said to my dear companion, "can blot from men's recollection their outworn superstitions, their paralyzing dogmas and emancipate them for the sublime adventure of making of 'this world another world that will be filled with the holy ecstasy of the Grace of God?'"

If ever I find time again I want to tell you about my visit to Agra, Aligarh, Amritsar and Hyderabad. I longed for you a thousand times in Burma and Java. No description can convey the reality of "magic casements opening on the foam in faery lands." Here are a thousand ancient things to remind us of Beauty but to the Beauty of Holiness, which the Message of Bahá'u'lláh conveys, we turn blind eyes and deaf ears.

Oh, I nearly forgot to tell of my experience with a Brahmin advocate. As you know it is contrary to their most cherished custom to eat with any other than a Brahmin: indeed they lose their caste by so doing. Quite unwittingly I offered him a cup of tea. "You must excuse me; I am orthodox", he said. "But you Hindus teach that every human being is the immediate Presence of God: that God literally dwells in every created soul. What is there about God so unclean or so offensive that you would not want to drink a cup of tea with him?" He looked enormously embarrassed and nonplussed, but still refused the tea. You see why I call India baffling.

CONTRIBUTIONS OF THE COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES OF CHINA TO AMICABLE INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

IN EUROPE and America several universities have established a department of Chinese studies or have offered courses in Chinese history and culture. These courses certainly are of help to students to get a better understanding of the culture of old China and an appreciation of some of the biggest issues of China's present-day problems.

It interests and inspires me very much to visit some of the universities in America where a department of Chinese studies has been established. If I am not mistaken, Columbia was the first American university to start such a department. The founding of the department was made possible through the generous gift of General Horace W. Carpentier. General Carpentier had a Chinese servant named Dean Lung who had served him faithfully a number of years. It is said that in his humble service Dean Lung had exhibited such characteristics and self-evident virtues that on his death the General decided that an effort should be made to study the civilization out of which such virtues grew. He made his donation to Columbia—a total of $226,200. General Carpentier also donated to the University of California a sum from the income of which important collections of books both in Chinese and in Japanese were purchased.

In 1928 the Harvard-Yenching Institute in Cambridge, Mass., was established. This most generous gift of Mr. Charles M. Hall of Niagara Falls has enabled the Trustees of Harvard University to organize that department which in the future will be one of the most important media for international intellectual intercourse and for promotion of amicable international relations between America and the Orient. In McGill University, Montreal, there is a department of Chinese studies, of which Dr. Kiang Kang-hu, former professor at the National Imperial University, Peking, and at the National University at Nanking, is the head. In McGill University there is also the Gest Chinese Research Library, which contains, in addition to works in English and European languages, a Chinese collection of several thousand volumes. In the Congressional Library at Washington are found no less than 125,000 volumes of important Chinese works. In the libraries of Columbia, Yale, the University of California and our University of Hawaii are found many notable collections of Chinese and Japanese works. In these works are recorded the intellectual achievements of the great thinkers of the Orient, particularly of the past. At present these works are only useful to a handful of investigators but in future they should become one of the most important intermediaries of international intellectual understanding.

To ACQUAINT the students in China with the better aspects of modern Western civilization and with some of the great personalities who are guiding modern thought, prominent college professors from America and Europe have been invited to give lectures in the universities and other educational institutions. In return some of the educational leaders of China have gone abroad to give talks on present-day China and her problems, so as to cultivate an adequate understanding between the Chinese and their friends.

Quite a number of Western professors have been connected with the colleges and universities of China for more than 20 years and they are still there. Their very presence in those educational institutions which they have been serving so unselfishly and loyally shows the existence of harmonious and amicable relationship between them and their Chinese associates. International gatherings of social and academic nature on the college campus are commonplace events in the Chinese educational world today

It is my sincere hope that the political and economic aspects of international relations will soon be improved so that China's relationship with all nations will not merely be amicable but truly friendly. And to this end Chinese educators must dedicate their task.—Excerpts from an address by Dr. Shaw Chang Lee. Mid-Pacific Magazine.

THE NATURE OF THE DIVINE MANIFESTATIONS

4. GOD'S RELATION TO MAN IN PROPHETIC RELIGION

GLENN A. SHOOK

Professor of Physics, Wheaton College

In the first chapter in this series, published in the October number, the author stressed the slow evolutionary process of the concept of God from the earliest times. The second chapter, in the November number, treated of the nature of the Divine Manifestations. The third chapter, published in December, emphasized the importance of the Prophet as the way to God and the Medium through Whom the Light flows to the world. The fourth chapter, published herein, concludes the series.

FOR the first time in recorded history we have authentic information on the nature of a Divine Manifestation or Prophet. That is, the Prophet for this day has given us some light about His own station.

Humanity has always struggled with two ideas about God. He is the One, the Absolute, and the Infinite and again He is a moral and personal God. The first concept finds expression in medieval mysticism which is cold and non-personal compared with prophetic religion which is always warm, dynamic and progressive. To the mystic, God is not a revelation in history; God reveals himself to every man in mystical inspirations and visions. Of course mysticism does not always appear in its pure form. The Christian God-mysticism and the Sufist-mysticism of Islam have always shown fervour and personal warmth.

In general, mysticism has been independent of ecclesiastical authority and consequently it has been able to emerge from religious dogma and materialism in the past and we see popular forms of it even today.

Some of the mystics of the past and some modern cults teach that there is a part of the Divine Essence in each individual or that we are potential gods. Now this is only natural and indicates a real striving toward God, for we may ask, "How can we comprehend the Divine unless there is a little of the Divine within us?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá tells us that our relation to God is like the connection between the ray and the sun. The rays emanate from the sun but are not part of the sun. Again we are the creation and not a part of the Creator. To illustrate, the author writes a book which may produce a profound effect upon society but the book does not contain a part of the writer. The author might be likened to the essence of the writing as he always transcends the medium which expresses his thought. Again the musician sends forth sound vibrations into the air which may produce visible effects upon his audience but the music is not a part of the composer but rather an emanation, as it were, from the composer.

In speaking of the relation between man, the created, and God, the Creator, 'Abdu'l-Bahá says that this "proceeding", "coming forth" or "dependence" is like the ray which emanates from the sun or the discourse which comes forth or emanates from the speaker.

There is however another kind of coming forth of proceeding through "manifestation", like the coming forth of the flower from the seed. In this case the reality or essence of the seed passes into the flower. Man's proceeding or dependence is not like this, for 'Abdu'l-Bahá says', "But the appearance through manifestation is the manifestation of the branches, leaves, blossoms and fruit from the seed; for the seed in its own essence becomes branches and fruits, and its reality enters into branches, the leaves and fruits.

"This appearance through manifestation would be for God the most High, simple imperfection, and this is quite impossible; for the implication would be that the absolute Pre-existent is qualified with phenomenal attributes; but if this were so, pure independence would become pure poverty and true existence would become non-existence and this is not possible."

Hence we, His creatures, emanate from Him like the light which emanates from the sun and are therefore not a part of the reality or essence.

In some respects the great Prophets or Manifestations are like other men. 'Abdu'l-Bahá says', "We said that the Manifestations have three planes. First the physical reality, which depends upon the body; secondly, the individual reality, that is to say, the rational soul; thirdly, the divine appearance, which is the divine perfections, the cause of the life of existence, of the education of souls, of the guidance of people, and of the enlightenment of the contingent world."

On the other hand 'Abdu'l-Bahá makes it clear that the Holy Manifestations have a station that is unique. He says that no matter how far the disciples of Christ advance they will never reach the station of Christ³. In this sense Christ was not a man like other men.

Although the Manifestations have a station that is beyond our comprehension, even they are not a part of the Divine. They manifest the attributes and perfections of God in the sense that the perfect mirror reflects the rays of the sun to us. 'Abdu'l-Bahá says', "But the proceeding through manifestation (if by this is meant the Divine appearance, and not division into parts), we have said, is the proceeding and appearance of the Holy Spirit and the Word which is from God." He emphasizes the point more strongly in another place⁵; "And know that the proceeding of the Word and the Holy Spirit from God, which is the proceeding and appearance of manifestation, must not be understood to mean that the Reality of Divinity has been divided, into parts, or multiplied, or that it has descended from the exaltation of holiness and purity. God forbid!"

Was Christ God incarnate? If we mean by this that Christ was the perfect Manifestation of God; that He was the perfect reflection of God and that when men looked upon Him it was as if they looked upon the face of God, then the answer is, yes, for this is the testimony of Himself. To quote from John 14; “. . . he that hath seen me hath seen the Father; . . . I am in the Father and the Father in me..” That is, the Divine attributes of God are reflected in Christ.

God can dwell in us only in the sense that the sun dwells in the mirror.

While we cannot understand the essence of God we are commanded to try and understand the “wisdom and greatness of God”.

To recapitulate; man emanates from God like the ray from the sun and is not therefore a part of the essence or reality of God, and in consequence he is not a potential god. If God were love, mercy, justice, etc. we might manifest Him for we have these attributes but we have shown that the essence lies back of the attributes, so to speak, and is unknowable.

Even the great Prophets like Christ and Bahá'u'lláh do not contain a part of the Divine in the sense that the Divine is divided into parts. They manifest to us the Divine Perfections. The proceeding or coming forth, in this case, is not like the ray from the sun, nor the music from the musician for it is not a creation emanating from a creator. Hence the term “emanation” is not used in this connection. The Manifestions are mediums through which the Divine Perfections are transmitted to us and we may think of their station as analogous to the fine, polished mirror which reflects perfectly the rays of the sun.

Our knowledge of God comes through His Manifestations and they inform us only of His attributes and not His Reality. Moreover this knowledge is limited by our capacity.¹ “Knowing God, therefore means the comprehension and the knowledge of His attributes and not His Reality. This knowledge of His attributes is also proportioned to the capacity and power of man; and is not absolute.”

THE MANIFESTATIONS OF GOD

FROM THE TEACHINGS OF 'ABDU'L-BAHA

NO ONE hath any way to the Reality of Deity except through the instrumentality of the Manifestation. To suppose so is a theory and not a fact. Tablets, Vol. 1, p. 214.

THE KNOWLEDGE of the Reality of the Divinity is impossible and unattainable, but the knowledge of the Manifestations of God is the knowledge of God for the bounties splendors and divine attributes are apparent in them. Therefore if man attains to the knowledge of the Manifestations of God, he will attain to the knowledge of God; and if he be neglectful of the knowledge of the Holy Manifestation, he will be bereft of the knowledge of God . . . The Holy Manifestations of God are the center of the bounty, signs and perfections of God. (Answered Questions, p. 257.)

THE REALITY of the Divinity is hidden from all comprehension, and concealed from the minds of all men. . . . How can man, the created, understand the reality of the pure

Essence of the Creator? This plane is unapproachable by the understanding, no explanation is sufficient of its comprehension, and there is no power to indicate it. . . . Minds are powerless to comprehend God . . . every statement and elucidation is defective, all praise and all description are unworthy, every conception is vain, and every meditation is futile. But for this Essence of the essences, this Truth of truths, this Mystery of mysteries, there are reflections. . . . The dawning-place of these splendors, the place of these reflections, and the appearance of these manifestations, are the Holy Dawning-Places, the Universal Realities, and the Divine Beings, who are the true mirrors of the sanctified Essence of God. All the perfections, the bounties, the splendors which come from God, are visible and evident in the Reality of the Holy Manifestations, like the sun which is resplendent in a clear polished mirror with all its perfections and bounties. . . . Therefore all that the human reality knows, discovers and understands of the names, the attributes, and the perfections of God, refer to these Holy Manifestations. . . . The individual Realities of the Divine Manifestations have no separation from the Bounty of God and the Lordly Splendor. In the same way the orb of the sun has no separation from the light. . . . The Divine Manifestations are so many different mirrors, because they have a special individuality, but that which is reflected in the mirrors is One Sun. (Answered Questions.)

THE GREATEST proof of a Manifestation is the Manifestation Himself. We do not have to prove the existence of the sun. The sun is independent of proof . . . Another great proof of a Manifestation is His power to develop souls. Miracles are but secondary proofs. (Ten Days in the Light of 'Akká, pp. 32-35.)

WHEN THE Prophets of God appear upon this earth, their validity is established by means of certain proofs. One of the proofs is through the fulfillment of former prophecies, the second proofs are their creative words and phrases which salute the hearts of humanity, the third are their deeds and the fourth are their teachings.

A clear proof of validity lies in the achievements and here we are confronted by certain irrefutable facts A supreme proof is the teaching. For instance the precepts of Christ were sufficient proof of His validity. There is no greater proof than these teachings. They were the Light of that cycle and the spirit of that age. All that He said accorded with the needs of the humanity of that time. They were peerless and unique.

Consider His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh and His teachings. They are the spirit of this cycle—the light of this age The principles of Bahá'u'lláh are the remedy and balm for the wounded world; and without their inculcation, reconciliation between the nations will not be reached. These very teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are the greatest proofs of His claim. Such a power hath appeared from Him as will suffice to convince the whole world.

The proof of the sun is its light and heat. (Divine Philosophy, pp. 43-45.)

A WERTERN VISITOR IN THE LAND OF BAHÁ'U'LLAH

Readers of the Bahá'í Magazine who have been following Mrs. Keith Ransom-Kehler's "Letters Home" in which she gives us the high lights of her teaching trip around the world will be interested in the account of her arrival and first days in Tíhrán, the capital city of Persia. Two letters glowing with enthusiasm have been recently received by the editors from our Persian brothers A. H. Naimi and A. Samimi, both employed in one of the Legations in Tíhrán. Since we cannot print these letters in their entirety we make them the basis of the following brief article.

MRS. RANSOM-KEHLER arrived in Tíhrán from Haifa the 29th of last June for a three month's visit to the land of Bahá'u'lláh in order to associate with Bahá'í friends, strengthen the bonds of unity and understanding between the East and the West and visit the historic places of the Bahá'í Cause. Her visit had been heralded by a letter from Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, introducing Mrs. Ransom-Kehler to the Persian friends.

"On learning of her arrival in Persian territory," Mr. Samimi says, "a number of friends from Tíhrán went to meet her at Qazvin situated at a distance of ninety-six miles from Tíhrán. When our visitor, accompanied by a party of the friends, reached Keraj, a village situated half way between Qazvin and Tíhrán, they were joined by a large number of friends who had come to meet their sister. 'I was much impressed,' she said, 'by the warm welcome given to me by the friends and especially to be able to witness with my own eyes the realization of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's promise that the East and West will join together under the banner of unity and brotherhood.'

"When the party reached Tíhrán they found that friends, men and women, to the number of about a thousand had gathered in a garden belonging to one of the Bahá'ís outside the town to welcome Mrs. Ransom-Kehler. Our dear visitor greeted the friends most warmly and joyously with the Bahá'í greeting of "Alláh-u-Abhá'. She was especially pleased to meet among the friends Dr. Susan I. Moody, Miss Adelaide Sharp and Mrs. Clara H. Sharp, American friends."

"How soul-refreshing it is to us Persians," says Mr. Naimi, "to see a Westerner so confirmed in the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh, so freed from the usual materialistic interests of the western world that in spite of delicate health she traveled over the barren plains and mountainous roads of Persia in accordance with the expressed wishes of the Guardian to serve the Cause in the East."

Mrs. Ransom-Kehler had brought with her greetings and messages of love from the household in Haifa. In a beautiful talk she gave these messages to the friends gathered in the garden to welcome her. A message from Bahiyih Khanum* was especially emphasized. It proved to be her last message to the Persian friends. "When saying good-bye to the Greatest Holy Leaf," Mrs. Ransom-Kehler said, "she told me to give to the men as well as to the women the same message of love equally. She said also, 'When you enter the holy city of Tihrán, enter it in my name and when you speak, speak in my name.'"

After an enforced rest of two weeks in the hospital Mrs. Ransom-Kehler was able to give a public talk at the first of nine memorial services held on nine successive days in various quarters of the town in honor of the Greatest Holy Leaf. In referring to the message given to her by the Greatest Holy Leaf Mrs. Ransom-Kehler said that she now realized that it was indeed a parting message and signaled the fact that her material life was fast approaching an end.

Mr. Naimi's description of one of the gatherings where Mrs. Ransom-Kehler spoke gives us a vivid picture of the group. "A great number of the friends, young and old, children and adults, were seated on two symmetrically built flights of steps leading to a spacious elevated veranda covering the front part of a typical Persian house of old style belonging to one of the friends. The steps, the veranda and the rooms in the background were simply packed with friends. Eager faces were seen from all points gazing at the sister from the Occident with such pure feelings of Bahá'i love and gladness of heart that Mrs. Ransom-Kehler could scarcely control the tears as she said: 'Only the unlimited power of Bahá'u'lláh is able to attract such a love and unity and bring about this soul-to-soul communion between the East and the West.'"

"Mrs. Ransom-Kehler is now trying," writes Mr. Samimi, "as far as the condition of her health permits, to attend the memorial meetings which are being held in different parts of the town. She cannot help expressing her joy at the sight of the friends of all classes, men, women and children who are eager to attend the meetings and see their spiritual sister from the West. We are glad to witness the ties of real brotherhood and unity which bring the friends from the East and the West closer to each other. We are looking forward to hearing the inspiring lectures of this pure and illumined soul who is the bearer of the message of love from our dear brothers and sisters of the West. These lectures are indeed tending to strengthen the bonds of real brotherhood and friendship which unite the followers of Bahá'u'lláh in these two distant and far-off countries."

—Bertha Hyde Kirkpatrick.

*Bahiyih Khanum, sister of 'Abdu'l-Baha' and known as the Greatest Holy Leaf passed into the next world soon after Mrs. Ransom-Kehler's arrival in Tihran.

"In this radiant century divine knowledges, merciful attributes and spiritual virtues will attain the highest degree of advancement. The traces have become manifest in Persia."

TEMPLE PILGRIMAGES

ORCELLA REXFORD, B. Sc.

BEAUTY is food for the soul, it lifts one above the mundane sphere and places one in rapport with life's finer forces. Perhaps that is why man has ever exerted his greatest artistic efforts to build and decorate his temples to Deity.

Wherever one travels and in whatever land, more tourists seem drawn to a famous temple than to any other spot. There may be a feeling of spiritual adventure associated with it, who knows, for one often makes these trips even at some personal discomfort.

In the center of Guatemala the lure of an ancient Mayan Temple drew me to wade in dew-bedecked grass to my waist, past huge buttressed trees, covered with long-rope-like vines, in which swung monkeys and bright hued parrots screamed. Opalescent butterflies as blue as a fleck of the tropical sky flitted around us as we approached the ruins of a mighty pyramidal temple buried deep in the heart of the jungle. Its walls were beautifully carved but mute to the question of what manner of people built the temple at Quirigua or what concept of Deity they held.

LATER we took a long, dusty trip up the Nile to visit the temples of another civilization. Here again were evidences that religion gave rise to art and architecture, for the Egyptians built magnificent structures to their gods, decorating them in color and with sculpture. Their ceremonials developed music and rhythm, so man has unfolded his higher sensibilities simultaneously with his religion, which is always the civilizing factor among all peoples. What mattered that we went back a thousand years in transportation to ride by camel and donkey to the lovely Temple of Isis at Denderah, with its zodiacal ceiling? Pausing to admire an exquisite carving of the winged sun-disk symbolizing the sun god, I recalled Prof. Henry Breasted's description of King Ikhnaton. "Ikhnaton had gained the belief that one God created not only all the lower creatures but also all the races of men both Egyptians and foreigners. Moreover the king saw in his god a kindly father who maintained all his creatures by his goodness so that even the birds in the marshes were aware of his kindness and uplifted their wings like arms to praise him." It was remarkable to find at this time "one who had such a vision of the great father of all." No wonder he was responsible for the building of so many temples.

TO STAND on the site of Solomon's Temple in Jerusalem where so many temples had been builded and to visualize its magnificence was a stirring experience even if to-day the spot is covered by the colorfully tiled Mosque of Omar, one of the most beautiful of its kind. We donned sandals to walk over luxurious oriental rugs within, thankful that the changing times permitted a Christian to view its sacred Muhammadan precincts.

AND THEN in Europe—who can describe the glories of those magnificent cathedrals of the Middle Ages—Milan, Notre Dame and many others yet to be visited? While standing in the “Street of the Clock”, and admiring the wondrous towers of the Cathedral of Rouen, a proud townsman informed me that this building was erected by master craftsmen. They were artists so inspired by the privilege of building that magnificent structure that they worked day and night without compensation, giving all that was in them, heart and soul, that they might erect a cathedral which would go down through the ages as a monument to their love of God.

BUT THE crowning experience of all was after journeying from early dawn up the Mississippi valley in an airplane to stand at evening within that universal Temple of Light just outside Chicago with the moonlight streaming through its dome of glass. Other temples visited represent love and sacrifice but the building of this temple in Wilmette, near Chicago, represents the love and sacrifice not simply of those in one locality but of people from all quarters of the globe. In regard to this ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has said:

“Praise be to God, that, at this moment, from every country in the world, according to their various means, contributions are continually being sent toward the fund of the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár in America. From the day of Adam until now, such a thing has never been witnessed by man, that from the furthestmost country of Asia contributions were forwarded to America. . . . The mystery of the edifice is great, and cannot be unveiled yet, but its erection is the most important undertaking of the day . . . Its gates will be flung wide open to mankind; prejudice towards none, love for all.”

To enter the doors of this temple is indeed a bounty of God, for within these walls one feels alive, inspired by an abounding love for all peoples and a deep abiding peace,—free from a disturbed world.

AND FINALLY nearly a year and a half later we quietly motored out of Washington, D. C., down a modern highway in Virginia past a wooden fence, where a sign with the drawing of a glorious temple announced that we had at last come to the place where history is in the making. The sign reads that the outer decoration of the Bahá’i Temple is in the process of construction within.

Mr. John J. Earley, the master craftsman under whose direction the outer structure of the dome is being built, greeted us and showed us about. He first called our attention to an upright wooden structure, an exact replica of one-ninth of the dome of the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár in Wilmette,* reproducing the outer steel work. This is to support the plaster models of the ornamentation that is to cover the outside of the Temple dome; making a building of lacework in stone.

I was impressed by the enormity of the work being carried on there, the great amount of detail involved, the great care being exercised to get every little thing exact, the vast amount of checking to be done, and the problems to be solved for which there was no precedent, since the building of this Temple is a distinct departure from other forms of architecture and new materials and methods of construction have had to be created. It embodies the first new idea in religious architecture since the thirteenth century.

How wonderful are the ways of Providence! The Bahá'ís have for years been trying to erect this Temple to Universal Peace, but it could not have been built before this time for the materials that were to go into it had not been discovered. For instance a new type of non-corrosive metal will be used to hold the ornamentation in place.

Since the Temple must stand for ages like others that have been built, materials must be used that will withstand the climatic conditions around Chicago. It has taken twelve years of study and research to find a material that is not porous, for the outer covering. A sparkling white quartz, the hardest material known next to a diamond, is to form the outer surface of the concrete ornamentation, which will glisten like frost crystals in the sunlight. When it rains it will be washed clear as a diamond so that the building will always present a pristine whiteness, symbolizing the purity and oneness of religion.

When I inquired about the snow accumulation in the design, (for it seemed to me that a heavy snow would break the glass underneath) Mr. Allen McDaniel whose untiring efforts have made much of the engineering work possible, explained that the dome was fitted with steam pipes and during a snow storm the dome would be heated, causing the snow to melt and thus there would be no accumulation. Every emergency seems to be provided for; it is really remarkable how nothing has been overlooked.

Several units of the dome decoration in plaster were already completed and in place on the dummy wooden structure outside the plant. As I gazed on its beauty, it quite overcame me. I have never seen anything so compelling, it seems to speak and stir the soul to action. I wanted to cry out to the whole earth, "Let us hasten and complete this building, which will do so much to inspire mankind to a better way of living."

Next we went inside of a long building where there was a blue print seventy feet long, on which was a full size drawing of a rib of the dome. Here was a man carving out the copy of this design, which had been traced on clay in one of the wooden moulds. Next this carved clay was to be cast in plaster, another artist bit by bit would carve away the extra plaster, and then this would be made into a mould into which the final material will be poured. They told me that the artist who works on the carving, as indeed is true of all who are working on the Temple, has captured the spirit that animated the master craftsmen of the middle ages. They work long hours after they are supposed to lay down their tools, so inspired are they by the beauty of the design. I was told that many of the workers were making a thorough study of the Bahá'í writings that they might be even more capable of placing the spiritual essence of them within the lacey work of the Temple decorations.

Everything about this construction is different, one can't describe it. Even the building of the dome first, is contrary to the usual procedure.

It is a Herculean task. When I commented on the great amount of work involved and wondered how the engineers in charge could get time to attend to it with their other duties, they answered with great radiance in their faces: "We are glad that the conditions of the times are such that our other work does not now demand so much of us and we have the great privilege of giving almost our entire time to this work."

Somehow that is the spirit I carried away with me, the joy of sacrifice, the privilege it is to have even a small part in contributing to the erection of so marvelous a structure, that millions will view throughout the ages, that will inspire a spiritual understanding which will bring love and cooperation among all the nations. May its completion be hastened!

WORLD THOUGHT AND PROGRESS

"WITH THE most marvelous inventions of the past hundred years, through telegraph, locomotive, cablegram, wireless, radiogram, airplane and others, the world has been reduced to a very small-sized habitat for the human race. No nation can now shut its doors and live sufficient unto itself. Whether we wish it or not, we are bound to be drawn together as a family of nations, each producing what by natural endowment it can best produce and supply the needs of others. Instead of nationalism there is to be internationalism. World consciousness is to take the place of national egotism. Cooperation among nations is to supplant the hitherto bickerings, struggles for supremacy, strikes and wars between them. The establishment of the World Court, the founding of the League of Nations, the resort to arbitration instead of force, the agreement of all the countries of the world to the Kellogg-Briand

Peace Pact, all tend to realize the dream of universal brotherhood so succinctly stated by Confucius over twenty centuries ago that "all within the four seas are brethren."

"In making the above statement I am not blind to the forces of reaction, jingoism, national pride and jealousies, and the general weakness of human beings. It may take decades, yea even centuries, before we will be able to bring about this ideal state of world brotherhood, cooperation and peace. But shall we desist from pursuing our course because of these difficulties? We shall not. We shall rather redouble our efforts and inculcate in the minds of our children and our children's children this high idealism till its full realization. May the Lord of the Universe, in whatever name He is named, bless us in these worthy endeavors of ours."—Dr. C. T. Wang, Pan-Pacific Banquet, Shanghai.

“THERE ARE a few notes of cheer. This afternoon a group of students are holding an organization meeting for the promotion of a congress against war. If the universe should blunder again into a gigantic orgy of war and destruction, there are a few intelligent individuals in our universities, pulpits and publications that would strenuously protest. This is more hopeful than the situation in 1914 and 1917 when everyone from ministers to outlaws yelled for the smashing of the Central Powers in a cause that was to “make the world safe for democracy” and a “war that was to end wars.”

“We as college students today are for the most part more mature and more conscious of the problems in the outside world.”—Editorial in The Daily Northwestern, official newspaper of eleven thousand students at Northwestern University.

“WE PERCEIVE in Japan two main currents of civilization flowing in many fields—namely that of the East and the West. But the most essential is that the current has the nature of the mixture of the East and the West.

“From the East Japan has learned much about materialism and utilitarianism, but she is not forgetting to retain the spiritualism and idealism of the East. Japan owes much to the West in the introduction of modern inventions, but she is striving hard to retain oriental art and beauty.

“The progress of western civilization is moving westward and it is going to meet with Eastern civilization somewhere on the Pacific. They say that the meridian is the dividing line of the East and the West but I must say that it is also the bond between the West and the East. The aim of Japan, considering her geographical situation, is to establish the new type of civilization made by the assimilation of both Western and Eastern civilizations.”—Dr. Kokichi Morimoto, Mid-Pacific Magazine.

“WHEN FOLKS know one another well they build close and lasting friendship Fate has brought together here a strange citizenry. It is not so much the people that make Hawaii different it is the thought and feeling that flows through their minds to level former prejudices and subdue the community to a new and vital life.”
From a radio address by Raymond S. Coll, Managing Editor of The Honolulu Advertiser.

“A CENTRAL clearing house should be at work somewhere in the Pacific area to gather and disseminate information about professors who are traveling on sabbatical leave or furlough so that universities in their path could take advantage of their coming. Also, efforts should be made to develop a plan whereby professors on leave could be invited on visiting appointments at universities across the ocean. What if language barriers do exist! Interpreters can be provided. Take them in socially as well as educationally. It will prove an excellent antidote for race prejudice.—David L. Crawford, President University of Hawaii, Pacific Regional Conference, World Federation of Education Associations.

“When the holy divine Manifestations or Prophets appear in the world, a cycle of radiance, an age of mercy dawns. Everything is renewed. Minds, hearts and all human forces are re-formed, perfections are quickened, sciences, discoveries and investigations are stimulated afresh and everything appertaining to the virtues of the human world is revitalized.”

IF I HAD to choose between the so-called pious life of restraint, and a life of creative expression I should feel obliged to choose the latter. For life that is not some form of expression is worse than death.

But fortunately real religion does not entail the sacrifice of creative expression. On the contrary, religion enhances expression and exalts it to high planes. It brings greater penetration of insight and lends a subtle vibrating charm to utterance. It enhances man's emotional nature and focuses it upon useful and noble aims. It inspires aspiration and leads to the most glorious creations of which human beings are capable.

RELIGION is not an artificial compulsion, an abnormal restraint upon life, nor a passive unreasoning submission to exigencies and events. It is something dynamic, active. It releases creative forces in the individual and attracts to the individual creative forces greater than his own personal powers.

True spirituality means the full exercise of the creative intelligence in changing and ordering one's life so as to make it harmonious and joyous. Through the aid of the scientific intellect and of guiding and stimulating forces from a super-plane man becomes the ruler of his environment—organizing and administering the world about him so as to adapt it to his needs. Religion is in reality the cause of infinite progress.

IN RELIGION we find the chief origin and the highest forms of expression of all the arts. The art of painting has reached its greatest heights in the service of the church, both in Christendom and in the culture of the Buddhistic world. The art of music is connected with the dim past of temple worship and of religious festivals, as is also the art of the dance. The art of oratory shares its development between statecraft, law and the church. Literature began in every country as an expression of religious thought and the noblest literature which the world has produced is that which forms the scriptures of the various races. Architecture began as an expression of the spiritual aspiration of man and its highest forms have been thus created in the name and under the inspiration of religion.

Thus religion causes man to produce not only the most powerful forms of art, but also those purest in conception and in design. For the soul of the religiously inspired artist, being relatively free from the obstructing forces of egotism and vanity¹, can become a true channel for those creative forces which flow, we know not whence, to the glory and beautification of this planet.

MORE IMPORTANT even than creating forms of beauty and of art is the task of creating character within ourselves. This is a task which is placed in man's own hands. No one can create another's personality. This is our individual responsibility and it is the most important task before us in life.

As we create our higher Self on the inner plane, so correspondingly will be the effects of all our efforts on the outer plane. Everything flows from this center. We must be in order to do. And what we do is always an expression of what we are.

Nothing can build character as religion can. It furnishes inspiration and motive power. It holds before every individual the perfect model. It inspires him with intense desire to attain to perfection. It gives him power and guidance to work constantly in the direction of his goals.

Psychologists, much as they deprecate emotional aberrations in the name of religion, recognize what a powerful motive religion is toward the reconstruction of the Self. No force has proved so efficacious in lifting men and women from depths of degradation and despair and helping them to recreate their lives.²

Nor is religion of use only in cases of degradation. It is a normal force building up every life daily to more complete perfection. It can inspire superhuman enterprise, courage and wisdom.

Christ said, "I am come that ye might have life and have it more abundantly." A religion which inspires and motivates action is indeed the cause of more abundant, more creative living. "Sow an act, reap a habit. Sow a habit, reap a character. Sow a character, reap a destiny."

Every individual, in the process of lifting his own life up to nobler heights, finds himself inspired with a great zeal for helping to uplift humanity.

In the process of human evolution, from the savage satisfying only his animal wants to modern man with his multitudinous desires, there "at last came the selfless and compassionate man who pitied the hungry and the maimed and the heavily burdened, and dreamed a splendid dream—that he might collaborate with God in creating a world free of misery and wrong and injustice."³

What enormous possibilities await this loftiest task—the building of a more perfect world! Humanity has only for a brief two centuries been conscious of itself as a struggling evolving society. It has only within this brief span of its existence come to envision and assume conscious goals of perfection toward which to strive.

Today the conscience of men the world over is being aroused as never before to the urgent need and the glorious responsibility of creating a new world order which shall establish security and happiness for the individual. In this titanic effort where man's ordinary intelligence stands baffled and halting, why not utilize all the creative power which religion has to give?

² William James in "Varieties of Religious Experience," and Harold Begbie in "Twice Born Men," give scientific testimony to this recreative power of religion in the life of man.

The mere force of the intellect will never suffice to remake the world. There is needed the heart of charity and the soul of vision.

WHAT AN inspiring goal to work for—the goal of a New World Order! For this lofty purpose Bahá'is are working with all the power and ability God gives them. They realize their own limited powers to be totally inadequate to the task. But they work as part of a concerted movement the plan of which they believe to be perfect, and the effectiveness of which is clearly to be measured by the zeal and unity of its adherents.

The formulation of principles of organization for humanity and the guidance of humanity into such a world order is too immense a task for any human personality. It requires a super-planetary power. It is, fortunately, a responsibility which God assumes and which He alone is capable of carrying out. The function of the individual is to become a channel for this Divine force which seeks to remake the planet into a better and happier home for man. In this great endeavor the Holy Spirit—that Light which guided the Prophets and shone forth from them—this Light must be our guide.

“When you breathe forth the breath of the Holy Spirit from your hearts into the world, commerce and politics will take care of themselves in perfect harmony. All arts and sciences will become revealed and the knowledge of God will be manifested. It is not your work but that of the Holy Spirit which you breathe forth through the Word. This is a fundamental truth.”*

So HERE, in the working out of a modern world religion, is a creative task fit to call out all our powers.

No work to which man can dedicate himself is more noble, more inspiring, more worthy of the utmost consecration and concentration than that of helping to build a better world.

Within the vast scope of this superhuman task we may all be privileged to become quarriers, architects or builders—each one an artist in the true sense of the word, each one a creator working in the service of the Great Architect and for the service of humanity.

*Abdu'l-Bahá “Divine Art of Living.”

“Is not the object of every Revelation to effect a transformation in the whole character of mankind, a transformation that shall manifest itself, both outwardly and inwardly, that shall affect both its inner life and external conditions? For if the character of mankind be not changed, the futility of God's universal Manifestation would be apparent.”

—Bahá'u'lláh.

THE BAHÁ'Í VIEW OF AUTHORITY AND ORGANIZATION

HUSSEIN RABBANI

This is the second and concluding part of this article begun in the January issue. There the author pointed out how, by the instructions of Bahá'u'lláh, Bahá'ís regulate their national life in conformity with the requirements of their respective governments with absolute obedience and loyalty thereto. Herein the author dwells on the necessity of organization for the social regeneration of mankind.

WHAT the world today is suffering from innumerable diseases no one can deny. And that the fundamental causes of such a state of unrest are due to the absence of a just and powerful authority no unprejudiced mind can refuse to accept. In His Tablet to Queen Victoria, Bahá'u'lláh compares mankind to an organism which has been subjected to many diseases and attributes these sufferings to the injustice and the incompetence of rulers and statesmen. Addressing the latter, He says: "Oh, members of the Assembly yonder and in other countries! If you desire advancement, reflect and deliberate upon that which will calm the world and its condition. Consider it as the body of a man, once sound and whole, which has succumbed to malady in various forms. This body cannot be cured in a day, but rather the sickness will be aggravated, because it has fallen into the hands of unskilled physicians. However, if a wise doctor, a seeker after God, the Lord of Worlds, takes charge, one of the members will become whole, and consequently the others. Thus you are notified by Him who knows. Today I see this body in the hands of those whom the wine of pride has intoxicated to a point where they cannot prescribe a remedy. How then will they recognize this great and glorious Cause?"¹ INDEED, we are living today in a world of partial chaos and anarchy. Whether in the national or in the international sphere of activity, we have been and are still witnessing signs of an impending disorder. The disastrous results of a fierce and aggressive nationalism, with its two natural concomitants, imperialism and war, have harassed humanity by directing its energies into wasteful channels. The way out of such a chaos, the Bahá'ís believe, is not through the overthrow of the existing foundations of society and the abolition of every organized center of authority. What the world is in dire need of is not anarchy but organization. As society develops and social relationships increase in complexity our need for organization becomes more impelling. Modern society, indeed, is a vast organism and as such necessitates a coordinating power to adjust its different parts. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said: "The body-politic may be likened to the human organism. As long as the various members and parts of that organism are coordinated and cooperating in harmony we have as a result the expression of life in its fullest degree. When these members lack coordination and harmony we have the reverse which in the human organism is disease, dissolution, death. Similarly, in the body-politic of humanity, dissension, discord and warfare are always destructive and inevitably fatal."¹

And in another passage, He says: "All created beings are dependent upon peace and coordination, for every contingent and phenomenal being is a composition of distinct elements. As long as there is affinity and cohesion among these constituent elements strength and life are manifest but when dissension and repulsion arise among them, disintegration follows. This is proof that peace and amity which God has willed for His children are the saving factors of human society whereas war and strife which violate His ordinances are the cause of death and destruction. Therefore God has sent His Prophets to announce the message of good-will, peace and life to the world of mankind."²

It is, therefore, evident that what the world needs today is just and equitable rulers. For authority, if exercised in the right way, can accomplish all that is conducive to the welfare and happiness of mankind and is thus but an expression of the Divine Will. In the Bahá'í view, all authority comes from God, unless it is enforced arbitrarily and against the interests of the governed. And this is why the Bahá'ís have always been ordered to respect the possessors of just authority whose sole aim is to further and develop the interests of their people. In one of His most important writings Bahá'u-lláh has revealed the following: "Each nation must respect the position of its ruler, be humble toward him, obey him, and hold to his command. The sovereigns have been, and are the manifestations of divine might, nobility and grandeur. I have never been a sycophant, everyone can assert this, but respect for the rank of sovereigns comes from God, as is clearly shown in the words of the Prophets and Chosen. Some one asked Jesus: 'Oh, spirit of God, is it lawful to give tribute unto Caesar or not?' He replied: 'Yes, render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and unto God the things which are God's,' He did not forbid it. And these two sayings, for those who know how to see, amount to the same thing, for if that which belonged to Caesar was not accorded by God, he would have forbidden it. And likewise in the sacred verse: 'Obey God, and the Prophets, and the possessors of command among you.' The possessors of command are primarily the Imams (may God bless them)."³

But if Bahá'u-lláh has recognized the divine origin of political authority, and commanded His followers to respect and obey those who are its custodians, He has also equally emphasized the duties of the rulers towards their subjects. If there has been any social evil which He held in contempt it was tyranny. Bahá'u-lláh forbids tyranny in the most emphatic terms. In "The Hidden Words" He says: "O Oppressors on Earth! Withdraw your hands from tyranny, for I have pledged Myself not to forgive any man's injustice. This is my covenant which I have irrevocably decreed in the preserved tablet and sealed with My seal of glory."¹

And in the Tablet to Emperor Napoleon III He again emphasizes the same point. "Know verily", He declares, "that your subjects are God's trust unto you; treat them as you treat yourself. Beware of making wolves shepherds to your flocks, and of being hindered by pride and vanity from turning toward the poor and miserable."²

The duties of those who are in charge of the administration of the country are manifold. They should always act with justice and equity. "Justice and equity" says Bahá'u'lláh "are two guardians for the protection of man: they have appeared arrayed in their mighty and sacred names, to maintain the world in rectitude, and to protect the nations."³

And again he says: "No radiance can compare to that of justice; the organizations of the world, and the tranquillity of mankind depends upon it."⁴

In another passage we read: "O Son of the Spirit! The best beloved of all things in My sight is Justice; turn not away therefrom if thou desirest Me, and neglect it not that I may confide in thee. By its aid thou shalt see with thine own eyes and not through the eyes of others, and shalt know of thine own knowledge and not through the knowledge of thy neighbor. Ponder this in thy heart; how it becometh thee to be. Verily, Justice is My gift to thee and the sign of My loving-kindness. Set it then before thine eyes."⁵

All these words amply testify to the necessity of organization for the social regeneration of mankind. The individual, however well equipped with all the essential conditions of life, cannot live apart from society. He is born in a social environment and he is by nature bound up to live in the same ambium all through his earthly career. But, since social life is inevitable the necessity of some sort of organization becomes impelling. For social life carries with it, at least potentially, the germs of a possible friction between the individuals. Organization, therefore, is the 'sine qua non' of every social life. And this organization should have an authority to which every member should readily submit. For without an ultimate power of coordination and adjustment life will be a sheer impossibility. Instead of peace and tranquillity we shall find conflict and war. And such a state of affairs will be intolerable. But this authority should not be tyrannical and should under all circumstances be considered as a means rather than an end. In such wise, the individual rights are safeguarded without the possibility of any friction, and social life made possible without the individual being crushed under the weight of an all-powerful state.

REWARD AND PUNISHMENT

IN the conduct of life man is actuated by two main motives—"the hope for reward," and "the fear of punishment." This hope and this fear must consequently be greatly taken into account by those in authority who have important posts under government. Their business in life it is to consult together for the framing of laws, and to provide for their just administration.

The tent of the order of the world is raised and established on the two pillars of reward and retribution.

In despotic governments carried on by men without divine faith, where no fear of spiritual retribution exists, the execution of the laws is tyrannical and unjust. There is no greater prevention of oppression than these two sentiments, hope and fear. They have both political and spiritual consequences. If administrators of the law would take into consideration the spiritual consequence of their decisions, and follow the guidance of religion, 'They would be divine agents in the world of action, the representatives of God for those who are on earth, and they would defend, for the love of God, the interests of His servants as they would defend their own.' If a governor realizes his responsibility, and fears to defy the divine law, his judgments will be just. Above all, if he believes that the consequences of his actions will follow him beyond his earthly life, and that 'as he sows so must he reap,' such a man will surely avoid injustice and tyranny.

Should an official, on the contrary, think that all responsibility for his actions must end with his earthly life, knowing and believing nothing of divine favors and a spiritual kingdom of joy, he will lack the incentive to just dealing and the inspiration to destroy oppression and unrighteousness.

When a ruler knows that his judgments will be weighed in a balance by the Divine Judge, and that, if he be not found wanting, he will come into the celestial kingdom and that the light of the heavenly bounty will shine upon him, then will he surely act with justice and equity. Behold how important it is that ministers of state should be enlightened by religion!

A BIOGRAPHER PRESENTS A GREAT CHARACTER

"Everything becomes yours by renunciation of everything."

"No brotherhood appears in the world as lasting save that of the spiritual type."
—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

 ELDOM has biographer presented a more significant and inspiring figure than the central one in C. J. C. Street's President Masaryk.*

Flashing through the pages of this remarkable book one follows the career of a man who, from early childhood to advanced age, challenges breath-taking attention, evoking at the same time wonder and admiration. A child, a man! Teacher, reformer! Politician, statesman! Philosopher, idealist! Such is Mr. Masaryk's unparalleled career as he is depicted,—and because of it all—he is a maker of history.

About four-score years ago, in an obscure village of far away Moravia, a boy was born. No special record was made of his natal day. Perhaps to the mother who bore him there came some secret presage of what was to be the future of this man-child, but no such illumination touched the mind of his coachman-father, and to all who have watched his development and achievement, it has never ceased to be a wonder how this child apparently destined to live and die one of a laboring class, shorn of opportunity and lacking ambition, should soar so far above his apparent status as "to become the acknowledged leader of his fellow countrymen and finally the President of a State—the creation of his own brain—as prosperous and well conducted as any in Europe."

Reading Mr. Street's description of President Masaryk's mother, one is strongly reminded of the black freed-woman of the United States who in the first decade of emancipation devoted herself body and soul to the education of her offspring. Like her this Bohemian woman, witnessing the ignorance and degradation about her, determined that her son, Thomas, should be given an education. In education alone she was wise to see the open door to opportunity. It was through her sacrifice and determination that the lad was engineered through the various steps of preparation until he reached his goal—the university. From then on his own toil and his own will power became the stepping stones leading to the heights of life.

No more noble a character has ever embellished the pages of history than that which laid the foundation of Mr. Masaryk's conduct. Of peculiar significance is his religious life. His mind was ever in search of Truth and open to its teachings. No man's faith was of import to him if such a one failed to apply its precepts to his daily life, and in his own actions his religious convictions were his constant guide.

Always an independent thinker, Thomas Masaryk was never controlled by what he had been taught. He was a discoverer of Truth on his own initiative and the glory of his work as teacher lay in his habit of freely giving his own opinions, but inviting his pupils to work out their own conclusions.

Mr. Masaryk himself is a brilliant linguist. German, French, English were soon mastered by him, and it was through his influence that foreign books of worth were in any considerable number translated into the mother tongue, Czech. As he became acquainted with the habit and thought of other nations through a knowledge of their literature, his own attitude toward life broadened and the good he found, he became wise and generous in imparting. Under the "pure logic" of his teaching his pupils were given priceless spiritual values, witness the following upon two topics, so speciously glossed over or prudently(?) ignored by many college professors:

"When one speaks of alcoholism, what is in question is not the object—wine, beer or spirits—but the subject who drinks them, the mental state of the drunkard, his development under the effects of drink, the results upon himself and upon his children; what is in question is the entire physical being of the drinker, his character, and his outlook on life, not alcohol, the thing in itself."

And again upon another subject:

"It is true that the sexual instinct is very powerful; but we have, besides, various other instincts, and with respect to these we endeavor to place them under the control of our reasoning powers; the more powerful the instinct, the more urgently it requires mastering."

IT WAS inevitable that President Masaryk's devotion to his country and passion for service to his countrymen should lead him into politics, and just as certain that the politician should very soon assume the role of Statesman. Always before him were freedom and self-determination for his countrymen, but freedom for all and self-determination mapped out and controlled by the sane and the unselfish. Opposition never deterred him, carping criticism he took for helpfulness "in another dress". Fearless, he over and over again put his life in jeopardy, his very lack of any sense of danger seeming to preserve him from harm.

His applied philosophy should be put into a text-book for the benefit of students of all races for, although formulated for the needs of the Czech people, it is so sane and comprehensive that it might easily be adapted to the needs of any under-privileged and handicapped group anywhere.

President Masaryk has been the author of many books. Knowing this one longs to have access to them. His biographer says: "In consequence of the extraordinary range of his studies, the President is without question the best informed man in Europe."

One cannot help thinking what a rare privilege it would be to meet this man eighty years young. Whether in the presidential apartments in the castle at Prague among his many books of all languages most of which he reads in the original, or at his country estate where he walks, rides horseback and entertains numerous guests, one would indeed be honored to touch the hand of this man who championed a bloodless revolution and who presides over the republic of the Slavs on whose shield is the motto Truth Will Prevail and whose constitution provides for no other leader while the noble Thomas Masaryk lives.

Ye who cannot meet President Masaryk at Prague or in the fields of his estate, may seek him in the pages of Mr. Street's book. Long will you look ere you again find his like.

If love and agreement are manifest in a single family, that family will advance, become illumined and spiritual; but if enmity and hatred exist within it destruction and dispersion are inevitable. This is likewise true of a city. If those who dwell within it manifest a spirit of accord and fellowship it will progress steadily and human conditions become brighter, whereas through enmity and strife it will be degraded and its inhabitants scattered. In the same way the people of a nation develop and advance toward civilization and enlightenment through love and accord, and are disintegrated by war and strife. Finally, this is true of humanity itself in the aggregate.

When love is realized and the ideal spiritual bonds unite the hearts of men, the whole human race will be uplifted, the world will continually grow more spiritual and radiant and the happiness and tranquillity of mankind be immeasurably increased. Warfare and strife will be uprooted, disagreement and dissension pass away and Universal Peace unite the nations and peoples of the world."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE REQUIREMENT OF MEDITATION

ALFRED E. LUNT

Mr. Lunt, an attorney by profession, is well known to the readers of this magazine as a long time member of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá'is of the United States and Canada, and as author of many widely circulated and illuminating articles which have appeared in The Bahá'i Magazine. Among them his noteworthy contributions under the titles, "World Peace and the World Court"¹ and, "The Supreme Affliction—A Study in Bahá'i Economics".²

"You cannot apply the name of 'man' to any being devoid of the faculty of meditation. Without it, he would be a mere animal."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

HUMANITY, today, occupies an arena in which are locked, in a life and death struggle, the gladiators of sectarianism and universal truth. On the one hand are arrayed human dogma and prejudice; on the other the champions of the divine law, itself. The strongholds of the one are superstition, division and tradition; of the other—reality, oneness and individual verification.

The principal distinguishing mark that reveals the sectarian attitude is its unflinching personal evaluation of religious truth and its almost sole emphasis upon the literal or outward interpretations of the revealed Word. Its point of view is, therefore, one of attachment to the outer, personal phase of life, and its appeal is to the outer man in the realm of mental imagery and of sense impression.

We are speaking, here, in a purely general way of a type of religious faith in which we, also, and our ancestors, over many centuries, have played a prominent part. No thought of individual criticism or condemnation is implied, since this is a century of true education which is destined to emancipate every sincere soul from the torturing confines of the sectarian concept. Consorting with the people of every religion, without exception, is a mandate of Bahá'í faith; and this is to be done with joy and fragrance, i. e., with real love. How frequently 'Abdu'l-Bahá called the attention of the Bahá'í friends to the divine duty of educating every "uninformed one," and gently leading the children to maturity. Within each dwells the capacity to know the divine foundation.

BUT SINCE this is the age of reality, it becomes necessary to know the distinguishing characteristics of every type of religious belief. And behind these lie profound issues of human psychology which must be penetrated.

Yet we should not regard the problem as too complex and baffling. And here we touch the real issue. What, after all, marks out universal religion from sectarianism? Is it not the awakening of the slumbering reality in every soul? Is it anything less than the deepening of consciousness to a point wherein one takes "from the hands of the Divine Cup-bearer the chalice of immortal life, that all

If sectarianism is a form of attachment to the world, universal faith is its prime opposite—detachment. Nevertheless, consider that the sectarian possesses faith, and may be quite sincere in his adherence to the form he has chosen. But faith in the sense of belief, is not enough. There are two other essentials for the one who truly desires detachment. Conscious knowledge is one, and motion toward the Beloved of the Worlds is the other. Otherwise, though we call ourselves Bahá'ís, Christians, Muhammadans or Jews, we have remained in the sectarian precincts, and are subject to those limitations.

For this reason, Bahá'u'lláh has opened to the true lovers of God that pathway that some call mystic, but which is in truth the searchway to God. This is the way of meditation and communion, the greatest bounty of this Day of God. Without this divine nourishment, the reality that has been stirred to believe cannot unfold its powers, nor bring forth its sovereignty over the outer life. In such a case, the tremendous forces of the world and its attachment, cannot be put to rout. This is the true explanation of that attachment, which throughout the the ages has weakened and laid low the religious stirring that sprang up at the dawn of every Advent. Out of this, sectarianism and denominationalism, faded flowers on the tree of life, found their origin. Of this condition Bahá'u'lláh spoke, saying, “O My children! I fear lest, bereft of the melody of the dove of heaven, ye will sink back to the shades of utter loss, and never having gazed upon the beauty of the rose, return to water and clay.”

THE KEYNOTE of this age is unity. The law of the celestial spheres, deposited also within every cell that we call matter, is to reveal its glory of oneness in man. How strange and mysterious it is that man, the pivot of the creation, the highest order dwelling upon the earth, should only now have begun to recognize that law of unity which resides even in the heart of the mineral kingdom far below him. Bahá'u'lláh has revealed this law to all human-kind, and commanded its observance. What a divine gift from the Manifestation of God! What greater evidence than this could be demanded as proof of His Truth and Station?

But unity and sectarianism are polar opposites. Unity is the voice and also the action of the reality of man, not of his attached personality. Unity is detachment from every form of prejudice, and knows no separation of man from man. While sectarianism clings to its self-imposed barriers, and nourishes itself on dogmas that the twin elements of science and religion cannot accept.

We would repeat that attachment to beliefs alone, without the illumination of the Sun of Reality gained through meditation and communion, dwarfs the growth of the soul, and produces a static condition. Whosoever accepts this retarded state finds himself unable to show forth that love and that wisdom and, above all, that guidance that is the very quintessence of the Bahá'í Cause. The form, rather than the substance, becomes to him of the greater importance. All of us, without exception, need to seek the hidden treasures of divine knowledge, within, more earnestly and with greater ardor. With the blossoming of these fruits, the Bahá'í Cause in America will assume its true stature.

“Mankind receives the bounties of material civilization as well as divine civilization from the heavenly Prophets. The capacity for achieving extraordinary and praiseworthy progress is bestowed by them through the breaths of the Holy Spirit, and heavenly civilization is not possible of attainment or accomplishment otherwise. This evidences the need of humanity for heavenly bestowals, and until these heavenly bestowals are received, eternal happiness cannot be realized.”

“The purpose of the creation of man is the attainment of the supreme virtues of humanity through descent of the heavenly bestowals. The purpose of man’s creation is therefore unity and harmony, not discord and separateness. . . . When the souls become separated and selfish the divine bounties do not descend and the Lights of the Supreme Concourse are no longer reflected even though the bodies meet together.”

“The greatest and the strongest proof for showing the abundance of the Spirit to the bodies is the very appearance of It’s power and influence in these bodies.”

“The test of the Truth (of God) lies in the influence the conception has on our lives. If it makes us kind and loving in our relationship with our fellowman, we know it is a true one. In other words it must produce in our hearts a love of God which must be transmitted into love for man.”

THE BAHÁ'Í MOVEMENT IN PARIS

EDITH L. W. FENTON

The author of this article has only just recently come into contact with the Bahá'í Cause, but although her allegiance to the Bahá'í group in Paris is only of a few months standing, she has already become an ardent adherent of the Faith.

“Beware of prejudice; light is good in whatsoever lamp it is burning. A rose is beautiful in whatsoever garden it may bloom.”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

AS I walk up the little old street tucked away in a corner of Montparnasse, these words from the teachings of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá return to my memory, their wisdom quite in keeping with, and perhaps evoked by the silent old houses around me, the atmosphere of peace enfolding all. Turning at last into a large but somewhat dilapidated garden surrounded by ateliers built mostly of wood and glass, I climb a steep stair, arriving the bell at a small door on the second floor. It is opened almost immediately by a sweetfaced woman, the gracious lady of the house, and entering I find myself at once in a lofty spacious studio. On either side high uncurtained windows flood the room with radiance; the blue sky and waving tree tops so close at hand that the old studio seems but an antechamber . . . a stepping off place . . . These living things outside, this old furniture and multitudinous canvasses lining the walls appear to have been knit together in some bygone age into the present ethereal and wistful pattern. It is a tapestry woven of the past and present, of things spiritual and material and creates the right atmosphere for contemplation, heartsearching and endeavor.

A few weeks before, a friend had asked me whether I knew anything of the Bahá'í religion, and had suggested that I study it.

What I gathered from his few remarks, fired my imagination, and my enthusiasm, so that I eagerly accepted the invitation I received later to attend a meeting of the Bahá'í Society or, rather, Group.

So here I am in the temple (though anything less resembling a temple, or more fitting to be one cannot be imagined) of the Universal Religion, the essence of all religions.

I look curiously round the room. I am evidently late, for already here and there small groups of people are talking. I make out some Persians, several French, and a sprinkling of English and Americans. Presently tea is dispensed by the smiling lady of the house, and then quite naturally, and not at all abandoning mundane topics, the men and women here present begin to talk of the Cause.

WHAT HAS then brought these people of different nationalities together? A new cult? A fashionable craze? Some popular medium or magnetic fakir? No. It is clearly manifest that here there is no research for a new sensation or morbid excitement.

I am just asking myself the exact nature of the force animating and welding together all these dissimilar natures when I hear a voice raised. Someone is reading aloud:

“... No man should blindly follow his ancestors and forefathers. Nay, each must see with his own eyes, hear with his own ears and investigate the truth himself in order that he may follow the truth instead of blind acquiescence and imitation of ancestral beliefs.”¹

An Englishman across the room makes a suggestion which is taken up and I hear a discussion on the relations between the Creator and the created, which savors somewhat of Spinoza. Someone says “But in attributing this or that quality or virtue to the Godhead you are trying to define the indefinable, you are limiting the illimitable.”

During a lull a young Persian stands up and chants a prayer in his native tongue. The sacred music, so much a prayer in itself, gently echoes through the room.

A lady sitting near me no doubt sensing in me a stranger within the gates, kindly volunteers some information:

“It was in 1844 that the Bahá'í revelation declared itself in Persia. At the present day, it has spread all over the world. The initiator of this great movement for social and spiritual reconstruction was the Báb of pure heart and radiant personality. He was martyred in 1850, and His mantle fell on Bahá'u'lláh, a Persian nobleman Who announced the dawn of a new era of fraternity and world peace.

He was imprisoned and exiled by the reactionary leaders in Persia. . . .”

Again the reader's voice:

Are ye not all leaves and fruit of the same tree? . . . “O children of men! Do ye know why we have created you from one clay? That no-one should exalt himself over the other. . . . Close your eyes to racial differences, and welcome all with the light of oneness. This handful of dust, the world, is one home: let it be in unity. . . .”²

I lean towards the lady on my right and beg her to continue. She tells me that after the ascension of Bahá'u'lláh, His Son, ‘Abdu'l-Bahá, carried on His work, and how, little by little, slowly but persistently, this religion of love and harmony and reason spread through Asia and permeated other religions, so that Christians, Jews, Buddhists, Muhammadans, Zoroastrians, and many others,—all find their highest aims in this cause, for its teachings have the same basic principles.

‘Abdu'l-Bahá taught that religion should be in perfect accord with science, so that science shall sanction religion, and religion science. He preached a living faith, one that progresses, marches with the spirit of the age, meets present-day needs.

Though the Bahá'í religion directly touches and influences all branches of human activity, such as the economic question, the equality of man and woman, education for all, it also assuredly emphasizes the crying need of arbitration, an international Court of Justice, where questions of frontiers, and national honor are concerned.

These precepts for disarmament, for a "Most Great Peace" were given more than half a century ago, when no-one yet spoke of such possibilities.

I LOOK UP at the racing clouds, the green treetops, and then at all the earnest faces about me. Life outside, and inside, the material and the spiritual welded together into an imperishable oneness to will and to do for human betterment.

It seems easy, with the simple alchemy of this religion of love, here close at hand, to transform our minds, disarm our hearts. That first,—the rest will follow in natural sequence.

I murmur a few goodbyes, and find myself again in that little silent street.

What were those words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that I had just heard?—"Let us do away with all prejudices of race, of patriotism, of religion, of politics. We must become the lever for the union of the human race."

As I turn the corner, I look back once more at the spiritual oasis I have just left, and wonder how long before suffering humanity will have drunk of its lifegiving waters, and been healed.

Trouble our spirit, Lord,
 Nor let us rest.
 Terribly, terribly trouble
 Our human breast,
 Lest we wax stolid, Lord,
 As the jostling crowd;
 Or from sheer hollowness
 Wax vulgar, proud.

Trouble our spirit, Lord,
 And rock and quake.
 Terribly, terribly trouble
 Our soul awake,
 Lest we wax blind, O Lord,
 To Thine ancient Self;
 Or lose our soul in the glitter
 Of empty pelf!

Trouble our spirit, Lord,
 Nor let us be.
 Terribly, terribly trouble
 Our infinity;
 Touch our lips with love, Lord,
 Our tongue with Fire—
 That we may be a Flaming Sword
 For Thy desire!

THE CHALLENGE OF TODAY

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

"It is not necessary to lower Abraham to raise Jesus. It is not necessary to lower Jesus to proclaim Bahá'u'lláh. We must welcome the Truth of God wherever we behold it. The essence of the question is that all these great Messengers came to raise the Divine Standard of Perfections. All of them shine as orbs in the same heaven of the Divine Will. All of them give Light to the world."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

ABDU'L-BAHA once spoke these words to a group of people: "I wish to awaken you out of your deep slumbers. Do you know in what day you are living? Do you realize in what Dispensation you exist?"

And then He added this statement: "This century is the fulfillment of the promised century, the dawn of the appearances of the glorious visions of past prophets and sages."

These are not idle words. 'Abdu'l-Bahá was no emotional sensationalist. He was recognized throughout the world as a great spiritual teacher. His advice was also sought by many in high government and military positions because experience taught them that He gave wise and practicable advice. But He much preferred to talk about spiritual things, to teach that the spiritual is the basis for the practical. Those who listened and heeded what He said became refreshed and gladdened in spirit.

We are asleep spiritually and it is with our spiritual insight that we must read the signs of the times. We hear constant reference to a new age but, because He spoke in such startling terms, it is evident that 'Abdu'l-Bahá meant something different from the new age in science and invention or even in social and economic justice.

Can we not pause long enough to try to find out what 'Abdu'l-Bahá did mean when He asked these questions and made this statement? Such a consideration will take us into the field of prophecy.

To ATTEMPT to interpret prophecy is always dangerous, but when we consider prophecy in the light of history we are at least on firmer ground. A prophecy that has challenged and puzzled students of our Bible very much is in Daniel. Christ refers to it in answer to the question of His disciples, "What shall be the sign of Thy coming and of the end of the world?" Part of His answer was, "When ye therefore shall see the abomination of desolation spoken of by Daniel the prophet, stand in the holy place."*

Referring to Daniel we find that he gives dates of the "time of the end".¹ It is these dates which have puzzled people. Since Daniel gives other dates which were fulfilled in

* Matthew 24:15.

¹ How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?

And he said unto me, unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed. Daniel 8:13, 14.

"Briefly the purport of this passage is that he appoints two thousand three hundred years, for in the text of the Bible each day is a year. Then from the date of the edict of Artaxarxes to rebuild Jerusalem until the day of the birth of Christ there are 456 years, and from the birth of Christ until the manifestation of the Báb there are 1844 years. When you add 456 years to this number it makes 2300 years. That is to say, the fulfillment of the vision of Daniel took place in the year 1844 A. D., and this is the year of the Báb's Manifestation according to the actual text of the book of Daniel."—Some Answered Questions, p. 50.

the coming of Christ, Bible students felt justified in believing that these dates referred to the second coming of Christ. They believed that our Lord Jesus Christ would come literally in clouds of glory in 1843 or 1844. We learn¹ that there were independent groups of earnest Bible students in different countries and localities all of whom were looking for Christ's coming. In England, Scotland, Germany, India, Australia, America, were groups of such believers. These were all disappointed and so far as we know never learned how near they were to the truth.

God's ways are inscrutable. We still need to heed Christ's warning, "Watch therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come;" and the words of Paul, "the day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night".

LET US see what really did happen in 1844. The drama took place in far away and benighted Persia. The truly wise men who saw the star and went to worship were trained not in Christian but in Muhammadan scriptures, for these latter have prophecies too which point to the appearance of a Mighty One in the early decades of the nineteenth century.

Almost fifty years before the appearance of the Promised One a certain Shaykh Ahmad "inspired by the light that shown within him", "aglow with zeal and conscious of the sublimity of his calling" arose to "prepare the way for Him who must needs be made manifest in the fullness of time". If you would know this story in the beauty of its detail read it in "The Dawn-Breakers."

Shaykh Ahmad passed into the next world before the coming of the Promised One, but he did not lose his faith and had prepared his disciple Siyyid Kázim to carry on his work. Before the hour had struck for the world to know, Siyyid Kázim attained the presence of the Promised One and knew in his heart that it was He. It was given to the young man Husayn to be the one to whom these revealing words were uttered: "O thou who art the first to believe in Me! Verily I say, I am the Báb, the Gate of God, and thou art the Bábu'l-Báb, the gate of that Gate." This event took place May 23, 1844. It took nearly fifty years for the news of it to travel to the Western World.

THE "COMING" indeed took place, not such a one as those searchers of the scriptures anticipated, not a literal coming in the clouds, but one still mightier and yet in accord with the laws of nature. The "Coming" is not for the Christians alone, but for the whole world. This is a universal age, the Message is universal, proclaiming world unity, and the Messenger is the great Unifier.

Was this event, then, taking place in little known and unimportant Persia, really of significance to the western world and the world at large? What connection does it have with the prophecies in the Christian Bible? The burden of the Báb's message was this, that His advent marked the beginning of a new dispensation, that by His coming "The Day of God" was inaugurated and that furthermore a Mightier One than He would soon appear to teach erring humanity the way to establish the Kingdom of God in all the world. Like Christ He came not to destroy but to fulfill, not to repudiate any religion but to purify and to show men that in their purity all religions are one.

Did He appear, this Mightier One? Yes, nineteen years after in Baghdad, Bahá'u'lláh, the Glory of God, Who an exile from His native Persia, had been engaged these nineteen years in teaching the followers of the Báb, stunned and bewildered by the execution of their beloved Master and by the unheard-of persecutions and martyrdoms of their friends, announced that He Himself was the One whom the Báb had foretold, "He Whom God should manifest". He it was, Who, some years later, from the prison city of 'Akká proclaimed to the whole world that the age of universal peace and justice had dawned and laid down the universal principles upon which peace must be based, namely the oneness of religions and the oneness of humanity. If we investigate carefully, sincerely and without prejudice we shall find that Bahá'u'lláh brought not only the message of a New Age to earth but also the power to establish it, the power of the Spirit. The foundations are already laid. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has told us:

"The Kingdom of Peace, Uprightness and Reconciliation is established in the insensible world and will by degrees become manifest and apparent through the power of the Word of God."

IN THE light of history it appears that those earnest Bible students of the early nineteenth century erred in making too literal interpretation of prophecy. The end of the world is the end of the old dispensation. It seems apparent that God does not intend that we should understand prophecy until after its fulfillment. For when Daniel said that he did not understand the things that he saw and heard, the answer was, "Go thy way, Daniel; for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end."¹ Each dispensation ends when a new Messenger of God comes and this Messenger, this Manifestation of God, whose coming marks the end of the old and the beginning of the new, is able to unseal the Books—to explain what has been obscure. Thus Bahá'u'lláh makes clear many things in Jewish, Muhammadan and Christian scriptures.²

It is evident to any student of prophecy that many prophecies, such as the return of the Jews to Palestine, are being fulfilled in these days but we think that those who are studying scripture in the light of the Bahá'i revelation get a vision of the glory and reality of the New Day that others only glimpse. Many believe that the prophecies of terror, of "great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world to this time" so terrible that "except those days should be shortened, there should no flesh be saved" are now being fulfilled and that in passing through the world war and this aftermath of economic distress we are experiencing the "great and very terrible" day of the Lord spoken of by the prophet Joel. Following this will come the day when peace and righteousness shall reign when "the earth shall be filled with the Glory of the Lord."

But at present the world at large is in a period of skepticism and doubt; and to many, proofs based on the fulfillment of prophecy make small appeal. Let such study carefully and with unprejudiced mind the historical facts which have followed the "Coming". Let them discover for themselves the tremendous spiritual forces which became active in the world with the advent of the Báb. So mighty were these spiritual forces that two of the most powerful Oriental potentates backed by the most fiendish persecutions which fanatical Muhammadan religionists could devise were powerless to stop the spread of this universal message of love or to halt its power to unify.

For true spiritual power never remains mystic, hidden, mysterious. It always gives evidence of itself in the realm of being, translates itself into deeds which cause progress and are of benefit to mankind. So ever since the coming of the Báb and Bahá'u'llah great changes have been rapidly taking place in the world, great scientific discoveries and inventions. Great struggles too have been and are going on: the struggle of woman for her just position in the world, the struggle of the masses in the laboring world for justice, the struggle of the oppressed races for equal opportunities, the struggle of minority groups and nations for political justice, the struggle between the forces of peace and war. All of these struggles are the efforts of the forces of the "Kingdom of Peace, Uprightness and Reconciliation which is established in the invisible world" to become manifest in this world. Foolish man opposes them, but they must inevitably prevail for the power of the Word of God is irresistible.

THE HONEST and unprejudiced investigator will find too many things already accomplished in establishing the Bahá'í Faith. In a recent letter to American Bahá'is Shoghi Effendi sums up some of these accomplished facts:

"Born in an environment of appalling degradation, springing from a soil steeped in age-long corruptions, hatreds and prejudice, inculcating principles irreconcilable with the accepted standards of the times, and faced from the beginning with the relentless enmity of the government, church and people, this nascent faith of God has, by virtue of the celestial potency with which it has been endowed, succeeded, in less than four-score years and ten, in emancipating itself from the galling chains of Islamic domination, in proclaiming the self-sufficiency of its ideals and the independent integrity of its laws, in planting its banner in no less than forty of the most advanced countries of the world, in establishing its outposts in lands beyond the farthest seas, in consecrating its religious edifices in the midmost heart of the Asiatic and American continents, in inducing two of the most powerful governments of the West to ratify the instruments essential to its administrative activities, in obtaining from royalty befitting tributes to the excellency of its teachings, and, finally, in forcing its grievances upon the attention of the representatives of the highest tribunal in the civilized world, and in securing from its members written affirmations that are tantamount to a tacit recognition of its religious status and to an express declaration of the justice of its cause."

Can we doubt then as we view prophecy in the light of history that in the coming of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh Biblical prophecies have been fulfilled and are still being fulfilled, that this is "the day in which the Lord of Hosts has come on the clouds of Glory . . . This is the day in which the East and the West shall embrace each other like unto lovers, war and contention shall be forgotten, nations and governments will enter into an eternal bond of amity and conciliation."

WHAT SHALL we say of the future? Many of the Bible prophecies are still unfulfilled. We must always observe caution against their literal interpretation. Do the Bahá'i writings give us a picture of a perfected world suddenly emerging from the chaos and destruction of greed, ignorance and war, a world so perfect that no growth or progress is possible? Or will changes take place in accordance with laws of progress and evolution? The answer to this question will be found in investigating the basic principles which Bahá'u'lláh has shown are the foundation upon which the new world order must be built and in studying the laws and instructions He has given in conformity with which Bahá'i communities are gradually growing up all over the world. These principles, laws and instructions are sane, reasonable, workable, recognizing both the limitations of humanity and its ability for infinite progress. Let the reader investigate for himself.

Weighing carefully Biblical prophecy in relation to what has already happened are we not justified in believing that these prophecies will continue to be fulfilled? Can we not share with Shoghi Effendi the belief that:

" . . . great and marvelous as have been the achievements of the past, the glory of the golden age of the Cause, whose promise lies embedded within the shell of Bahá'u'lláh's immortal utterances, is yet to be revealed." And further that—

" . . . the welding of the communities of the East and West into the world-wide Brotherhood of which poets and dreamers have sung, and the promise of which lies at the very core of the Revelation conceived by Bahá'u'lláh; the recognition of His law as the indissoluble bond uniting the peoples and nations of the earth; and the proclamation of the reign of the Most Great Peace, are but a few among the chapters of glorious tale which the consummation of the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh will unfold."

Give thanks to God that thou hast put thy feet into the world of existence in such a great century, and that thou hast heard the divine gladtidings. Try that thou mayst comprehend the mysteries as they must and should be comprehended, and that thou mayst understand the mysteries of the Holy Books.'

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE EPIC OF THE BLACK ENSIGNS

FLORENCE E. PINCHON

*The Black Standard, "was the same standard of which Muhammad, the Prophet of God, had thus spoken: 'Should your eyes behold the Black Standards proceeding from Khurásán, hasten ye towards them, even though ye should have to crawl over the snow, inasmuch as they proclaim the advent of the promised Mihdí [Title of the Manifestation expected by Islam]. . . .' That Standard was unfurled at the command of the Báb, in the name of Quddus, and by the hands of Mulla Husayn. It was carried aloft all the way from the city of Mashhad to the Shrine of Shaykh Tabarsi. For eleven months . . . that earthly emblem of an unearthly sovereignty waved continually over the heads of that small and valiant band, summoning the multitude who gazed upon it to renounce the world and to espouse the Cause of God."

"Mount your steeds, O heroes of God! Charge—in the Name of the Lord of the Age! Holy, holy, holy, the Lord our God, Lord of the Angels and the Spirit!"

THE strange exultant cry rings out from grey caravanserais, ere the morning star has paled its brightness before the rising sun. It resounds across the desert plains, and re-echoes from bare, brown hills; the dank forests of Mazindarán know its unearthly chanting; it challenges great armies from crumbling ramparts and the precincts of saintly shrines; and those who hear it thrill with a holy joy, or tremble with unaccountable dismay, according to their understanding of its mystic meaning. At the call, a mere handful of youths and unaccustomed scholars put to ignominious flight the hosts of their assailants. Chanted in solemn unison, it strikes terror into the midnight revels of the besiegers, like a veritable rebuke of God, and they fling down their wine-cups and flee in panic as from some invisible avenging angel. The guns could not silence its potent harmonies, nor could prison, starvation, bribes, treachery, and unspeakable tortures.

For through the land of Persia the voice of God is sounding, and the call of His Herald must be answered, His commands obeyed, His love awaken passionate response, and all the prophecies of the Qur'án concerning the Promised One must needs find fulfillment.

OUT OF Khurásán comes the little procession. Its leader, frail but dauntless, wears the green turban of a Siyyid, and a sword that could fall, like that of Michael himself, upon the evil-doer. A black banner, gold-embroidered, flutters in the breeze. Beneath it marches the inspired company of those who, severed from the world, are engaged in summoning their fellow-countrymen to purify their lives, arise from their lethargy, and give welcome to a new and heavenly message brought by the long-expected Imám Mihdí,—the youthful Prophet of Shiráz—alas! already shut away from their longing sight in the grim fortress of Chihriq.

For this land of the Lion and the Sun was, in the nineteenth century, like some dark and noisome jungle, full of tangled growths of fanaticism, ignorance and vice, across which falls the baneful shadow of a corrupt Moslem priesthood. On every hand lurks danger, opposition, and death. "Make a way through this jungle," cry the followers of the Báb, "a highway for our God!"

Only utter detachment from all that the worldly prize, can bear witness to sincerity. At a word from their leader, the Mulla Husayn, all possessions are flung away—even to precious turquoise from the rich mines of Nishapur!

Such evidences of devotion, backed by irrefutable argument and passionate eloquence, attract souls all along the way. Mothers bring their sons, and sisters their brothers, pleading for their enrollment in the Legion of Light. For does not this gallant Husayn vividly recall the Imam whose martyrdom they have for centuries commemorated at Muharram? Yet few can be accepted. Only those who are of the true spiritual aristocracy of the Prophets may hope to attain so exalted a station of sacrifice. "This is the road to our Karbilá," cries their leader, "and he who is faint-hearted, and unprepared to suffer to the uttermost, let him return to his home!"

AT BARFURUSH, an angry mob, incited by the lies and misrepresentations of their mujtahid, and armed with all kinds of murderous weapons bar the way and start to attack them. Thereupon the Mulla Husayn, whose hands as a scholar were wont to tremble so that he could scarcely write, becomes transformed, by the power of the Spirit, into a mighty warrior. The rabble flee before his flashing sword, as it performs prodigies of skill unknown since the legendary days of Rustem. Yet the mercy they now implore is never denied; and ere nightfall, the caravanserai, where the exhausted little company have taken refuge, is thrown open to the generous entertainment of their enemies.

But before the deluded crowds, that fill the city with uproar, witness must be borne that they are no infidels, but true lovers of God and His Prophets. So at the hour of evening prayer, a young volunteer ascends the roof, and begins to chant aloud the familiar invocation. "Allah'u'Akbar—Mighty is the Lord!" A bullet cuts him short. Courageously, another volunteers to continue the sentence,— "I bear witness that Muhammad is the Apostle of God." He likewise falls. "There is no God, but God!" cries, with his last breath, the undaunted third.

Entering the confines of the forest, cruel treachery again awaits them, and many are required to lay down their lives. White indeed, with the bones of the slain, is this road to the new Kingdom of Abha!

AT LAST, driven to defend themselves from the ceaseless attacks made by the priestly castes, now reinforced by the state, they seek refuge amid the woods and swamps that surround the shrine of the Shaykh Tabarsi. Day and night they labor, with amazing ingenuity and energy, to construct ramparts and dig ditches. No light tasks for erstwhile gently-nurtured youth and elderly divines! Here, on the threshold, as it were, of the celestial world, and with its light and power filling their souls and animating their every action, they take their final stand. Like some noble deer that, long pursued by the wolves, turns at last at bay, resolving to make a worthy end.

Over this fortified retreat in the wilderness waves, for eleven tragically eventful months, the black ensign—earthly emblem of an un-earthly sovereignty, summoning the multitudes who gaze upon it to embrace the Cause of the Prophet of God.

Within, the valiant band of three hundred and thirteen pass the calamitous days and nights in prayer and chanting, and in studying the illuminating Tablets penned by the Báb, and others of His inspired followers. Trials unite them; until they appear like one soul in many bodies, a pure chalice and focal point of supernatural power.

But when the pitiless cannonade of the besieging armies reaches its height, then—"Mount your steeds, O heroes of God!" rings through the fort; led by the intrepid Husayn the little band sallies forth, through the snow and mud, and to the exultant shout of "Ya Sahibu'z-Zaman"—Lord of the Age! Time and again they charge the enemy, silence the guns, overthrow the barricades, and spread utter rout and panic among the trained regiments of the Shah.

FROM THE few survivors of the struggle, and also from their assailants—whose amazed admiration they repeatedly won—certain records have been obtained.

We may see Quddus, the beloved friend and confidant of the Báb, hazarding the forest at midnight to join the besieged. A small company, bearing lighted torches and chanting hymns of praise, like those who at a wedding welcome the bridegroom, go out to meet him. Quddus, whose soul is knit to Husayn's as Jonathan to David, the charm of whose personality, understanding, and inspired utterances make him a natural spiritual leader of men. No bombardment, however severe, can disturb his serenity; smiling he stands amid the explosions, chanting verses of spontaneous joy.

We can hear the voice of Husayn, as he comes forth boldly before the enemy, clad in flowing white robes and green turban, and leaning upon his lance. "O people, we wish not to fight," he cries, "we only desire to proclaim to you the fulfillment of our sacred traditions in the advent of the promised Qá'im. Has not Muhammad commanded: Should you behold the black standards proceeding from Khurásán, hasten ye towards them, even though ye should have to crawl over the snow, inasmuch as they proclaim the advent of the Mihdi? Shed not innocent blood."

To the soldiers he appears like some bright shade of their Imam of Karbilá. They are moved, even to tears. But their Commanding Officer, alarmed, orders the guns to silence his pleading. Then Husayn, raising his face towards heaven and unsheathing his sword cries: "O God, I have completed the proof to this host, and it availeth not!" Charge—in the Name of the Lord of the Age! And the utterly demoralized troops again flee before him.

But at daybreak he is borne back to the fort and laid at the feet of the anguished Quddus. Yet even the Angel of Israfil pauses, while the two friends partake of hallowed mysteries and ineffable joys revealed only to spirits transcended.

Then the final scenes: the agonies of decimation and starvation, honorable surrender, infamous betrayal, wholesale martyrdoms. And Quddus, the beloved, torn to pieces in the market-place, praying, as Christ, forgiveness for his murderers.

OVER EIGHTY years have passed, and the night wind sighs over the lone ruins of Tabarsi, and the moon kisses with silent reverence the shrine of these heroic hearts. But the beacon fires of faith they kindled amid the dark forests of Mázindarán have never been extinguished. History has emblazoned their names in imperishable glory; while that Cause, of which they were the chosen vanguard, goes marching on, beneath the sunlit banners of Bahá'u-lláh, towards world-wide spiritual victory.

“Not by the material resources which the members of this infant community can now summon to their aid; not by the numerical strength of its present-day supporters; nor by any direct tangible benefits its votaries can as yet confer upon the multitude of the needy and the disconsolate among their countrymen, should its potentialities be tested or its worth determined. Nowhere but in the purity of its precepts, the sublimity of its standards, the integrity of its laws, the reasonableness of its claims, the comprehensiveness of its scope, the universality of its program, the flexibility of its institutions, the lives of its founders, the heroism of its martyrs, and the transforming power of its influence, should the unprejudiced observer seek to obtain the true criterion that can enable him to fathom its mysteries or to estimate its virtue.”

WOMEN ASTIR IN PERSIA

COMPILED FROM A REPORT BY A. SAMIMI

THE western world hardly realizes how much awakened certain groups and classes in the Orient are. A letter from Mr. A. Samimi gives us a first hand picture direct from Persia of a recent congress of women in Tihrán. This was the first occasion on which Persian women as a community ever entertained representatives from their sisters in the eastern countries and the event was therefore of importance in the history of the progress of women in Persia.

“Early in November,” Mr. Samimi writes, “a number of women representing the Congress of Eastern Women came to Tihrán. They were headed by a lady from Lebanon (Syria) named Madame Nour Hemadeh, of the Druse Faith, finely trained and educated. She has done much for the progress and emancipation of the women of the East and has a most sympathetic view of the Bahá’i Cause whose teachings and principles she admires. A warm reception was given to her by the women of Persia.

A WOMEN’S Congress was held in Tihrán on November 27th, (1932) where delegates from the Council of Women of Egypt, Syria, Hejaz and some other countries were present. They propose to get the Persian government to recognize a larger scope of rights for the women here and to place them on the same standing with men as far as their social rights are concerned.

The delegates were entertained by various classes of women, the Bahá’is of Tihrán doing their share in giving these ladies a warm reception.

One such meeting, composed of about a hundred notable Bahá’is, both men and women, was held at the house of Aghai Kazemoff as a reception to the women delegates. The meeting was opened by chanting a prayer of ‘Abdul-Bahá’s in Arabic which deeply impressed the visiting delegates. Addresses were given by Mirza Azizullah Khan Mesbah, principle of the Tarbiat* School for Boys, and Rouhangiz Khanum, assistant principle of the Tarbiat School for Girls, in which it was pointed out that the emancipation of women is one of the principles revealed in the Bahá’i Faith over eighty years ago and has therefore been familiar to Bahá’is for a long time.

“Another meeting for Madame Nour Hemadeh and her companions was arranged for December 4th, at the house of one of the Bahá’i friends, Habibullah Khan Sabet. A number of members of the Muhammadan Progressive Women’s Society headed by Mastoureh Afshar were also invited. Among those who lectured at the meeting was Mrs. Keith Ransom-Kehler, a distinguished Bahá'í sister from America who is now back from her trip to the provinces of Khurasán, Mazindarán and Gilán, Persia. She gave a stirring and thoughtful talk regarding the conditions of women in Persia before and after the appearance of the Bahá'í Cause and gave an outline of the life of the famous Bahá'í poetess and martyr, Tahirih."

* The Tarbiat Schools for both boys and girls are Bahá’i schools which have been in operation for many years in Tihrán, the capital of Persia. Ghodsia Ashraf (a Bahá’i) was the first Persian girl to complete her education in this country. Arriving here in 1911, she attended schools in Washington, D. C., for over four years, thereafter returning to Tihrán to assist in the Tarbiat School for Girls.

IN THE address by Rouhangiz Khanum Fath Azam referred to above, she too emphasized that the equality of men and women is not a new idea to those women of the Orient who have been trained in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. In Bahá'í communities the emancipation of women has been gradually going on for eighty years. "The first ray of light," she says, "came from the Persian lady Tahirih Qurratu'l-'Ayn who removed the veil of superstition and denounced the old school of thought which gave to woman a place subordinate to man in her will, her mind, and her capacities. She was a woman of great accomplishments, an eloquent speaker and a gifted poet. For some years she was a teacher of religious doctrine to a group of students in Iráq. She reached the height of her station under the guidance of Bahá'í teachings and with a number of men and women whom she had attracted to the Bahá'í Faith traveled through Persia. After suffering imprisonment and persecution she was martyred in Tihrán. Following in her footsteps a large number of Bahá'í women arose in service to the cause of women. Especially in recent years with the revival of prosperity in Persia under its great King the difficulties of the past have vanished and a wider field of activity is open to women."

In speaking of the present position of women in Bahá'í communities in Persia (and this would be true of Bahá'í communities everywhere) she says: "The Bahá'í women vote at the elections for Spiritual Assemblies,—the Bahá'í consultative boards—whereas the question of women's suffrage has not yet been successfully established in the world. The Spiritual Assemblies make the same facilities for the education and culture of girls as they do for boys. There are the same institutions, meetings and conferences for both; and in fact women receive a greater share of general attention since the following teaching was given by His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá: 'Looking with a truth-seeking eye we see that the education of girls is more necessary than that of boys, for a time comes when girls become mothers and have to bring up children It is evident that an uneducated and uncultured girl becoming a mother causes the ignorance and deprivation of a number of children.'"

This address has an interesting paragraph too on the method these Bahá'í women use in working for progress: "It is a special characteristic of the activities of Bahá'í women that they move with cautious feet and use moderation, tact and discretion in their work. They avoid outward display, violent means, and above all interference in politics and seek equality with men in acquiring knowledge of eficiency and capacity for doing service. They work in unison with men and their methods are by no means directed towards an upheaval for demanding social rights. The Bahá'í men have themselves a perfect understanding of the scope and extent of this great work as taught by the Bahá'í Cause and they render every assistance to the women; this understanding makes the work of women quiet but deep. The general public and the government are also satisfied and thus our success is insured."

In closing this Bahá'í speaker said, "I hope that the visit and the work of these ladies who have come to our country prompted by their desire for the unity of women in the East will have significant results among women's communities in Persia and other eastern countries and will inspire them anew to proceed along the path of advancement."

And we would add that in the news of these awakened women of the Orient we see a step toward the fulfillment of the hope of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that "women of the East, as well as their Western sisters, will progress rapidly until humanity shall reach perfection."

SERVITUDE WITH SINGLENESSE OF HEART

WALTER H. BOWMAN

Martha is careful and troubled about many things,
 While Mary humbly to her loved Lord clings,
 For Mary has chosen that good part—
 She has that singleness of heart
 Which seeks to do the Will of God,
 Though it mean the path the martyrs trod;
 And Mary has a hundredfold reward
 From the bounty of her well-pleased, loving Lord.

The Future of Good Will

IN THE universal competition for survival and increase, what chance has good will? In the long run it has every chance. Good will, like all ethical action, is best in the light of its total consequences.

A man may sometimes profit by selfishness and greed, but if his neighbors have the same policy, internal dissensions will weaken that social group. It will lose ground before a society made up of men of good will who give their united strength to the common good. The men of ill will ultimately will fail, along with the society they have weakened. A community is strongest only when men of good will greatly predominate, and thereupon they will undertake the complete elimination of ill will and greed as a needless social waste.

This picture, while greatly over-simplified, is true and representative for the long run. Good will toward men is not a quixotic dream. It is the rule of economy, effectiveness, and power, and fate fights for it.

THE old law of growth, expansion, and competition will not be annulled. Energy of increasing life forever seeks expression. But the nature of the contest will change. With increasing wisdom, men will more clearly distinguish friend from foe.

Men will fight against ignorance, disease, and poverty, and not against each other. They will combat selfishness, privilege, greed, and hate. They will free themselves from the constant pressure of blind increase of population. They will war against crime, feeble-mindedness, and insanity. They will attack every blight of inheritance and environment. Superstition, prejudice, and credulity will be overcome.

Men of the future will look back at the present as a time of civil strife, when brother fought brother, while both were vulnerable to the common enemy; but also as a beginning of rebellion against this stupidity, and as a period of transition from the old age to the new.—Arthur E. Morgan, President of Antioch College—"Antioch Notes".

A JEWEL FROM THE MINE OF GOD

(SHAYKH AHMAD TO HIS FIRST DISCIPLE—HAJI 'ABDU'L VAHHAB)

MAYE HARVEY GIFT

In the history of the Bahá'í Movement, Shaykh Ahmad is as it were the dawn star—the first one to catch the rays of the spiritual Sun about to rise upon Persia and, indeed, the whole world. He felt, in fact he spiritually knew, the speedy coming of the great Messenger, though who it would be he knew not. This is the potent secret which he shares with Haji 'Abdu'l Vahhab, as told by Nabil in "The Dawn-Breakers."

* * *

"If for this day thou dost thank God
Throughout eternity,
It were but poor, inadequate return
For the great bounty He bestows on thee
In these glad-tidings that I give
On this great day to thee.

"If through all time, thou dost thank God
For bringing thee unto this day—
A day of splendor which the saints of old Yearned and implored to see—
It were but poor return.

"Thine eyes grow large with wonder;
Marvel not that language fails to bear
The greatness and the import of my thought.
Come thou with me upon the wings of prayer
Unto that realm where soul communes with soul
Without the veil of words.

"It is enough! Thine eyes reveal to me
That thou hast risen to those heights
That guard the gate to knowledge of our God
And His great destiny for man.

"The secret that within my breast has burned,
Like a consuming fire these many years,
That myst'ry I have yearned and yearned to share,
But man's perversity and arrogance
Held my tongue dumb—

"That sacred message, you are worthy to receive.

Again I say to thee, thank God,
Though it be but inadequate return.

"Have I not trained thee day by day
For this most holy hour?
When you, the first of all men on this earth,
Might share the burden and the ecstasy
Of God's most high command to me.

"My heart is overflowing with such joy,
It seems the universe itself
Must burst asunder with its might!
And thine own soul doth glow with joy supreme,
That thou art ready, even waiting for His call.

"I see thee cast aside the last of earth's dark bonds.
I see thee severed from all that the world
holds dear;
I see thee standing firm before man's scorn,
Ready to sacrifice a thousand lives
In the red path of the Beloved One.

"And so I say to thee—mark well my words—
The voice of God is now resounding through all space
With the glad-tidings of His great new day;
I am His humble messenger,
Sent to arouse men to His call.
Arise with me and spread the tidings of the day of God,
And thank thou God throughout eternity!"

THE DIVINE POLICY

JUST as the external world is a place where various peoples of different hues and colors, of various faiths and denominations, meet; just as they are submerged in the same Sea of Favors,—likewise all may meet under the dome of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár and adore the One God in the same spirit of truth, for the ages of darkness have passed away and the century of light has arrived. The imaginary prejudices are in the process of dispersion and the Light of Unity is shining.

“The difference which exists among the nations and the peoples is soon to pass away, and the fundamentals of the divine religions, which are no other than the solidarity and the oneness of the human race, are to be established. . . . The Divine policies shall rule, for the Divine policy is the oneness of the human world. God is kind to all. He considers all as His servants. He does not exclude anybody, and the policy of God is the correct and just policy. No matter how complete human policy and foresight be, it is imperfect. If we do not emulate the policy of God, or if we refuse to follow His dictates, that will be a presumptive evidence of our saying, as it were, that we know better than God; that we are knowing and wise, whereas God is ignorant; that we are sagacious, and God is not. God forbid! . . . No matter how far the human intelligence shall advance, it is still as a drop, whereas the Divine Omniscience is the very Ocean.”

“How can man be content to lead only an animal existence when God has made him so high a creature? . . . To man God has given such wonderful power that he can guide, control and overcome nature. . . . Seeing that man has been created master of nature, how foolish it is of him to become her slave!”

MANY ARE skeptical regarding the establishment of universal peace; of an effective League of Nations; of harmony between capital and labor. They base their skepticism on general grounds of human nature. “War and exploitation will always be,” they say, “as long as human nature remains what it is.”

Unquestionably true. But human nature can be changed. In fact human nature is being changed every day. It has been gradually but steadily changing during the long centuries of recorded history. And indeed, as we know from the scientific evidence of evolution, human nature has, during great unrecorded stages of the past, made enormous changes from the time when man like the animals crawled on all fours; knew not how to use his hands to grasp and project weapons; knew not the use of fire, nor any other of the even elemental inventions and discoveries which later were to start him on the path of civilization.

Man has risen constantly from lower to higher planes of living; from animal grossness and brutality to a more sensitive refinement of feeling and thought. There is no reason to suppose that this progress is going to stop miraculously, and that human nature is now going to remain static for all time.

YES, HUMAN nature is changing, and will doubtless continue to change. But there needs to be an immense and spiritual force exerted if human nature is to change with sufficient speed and directness to overcome the imminent danger of cataclysm which the world faces today.

Religion has always been the chief motivation of progress toward more humanitarian institutions. If one investigates the sources of the great reform movements of the nineteenth century—the movement for free public education, the movement for the abolition of slavery, the movement for more humane treatment of the criminals and insane—one will find that the source of all these movements was deep religious conviction, a desire for service strong enough to cause the sacrifice of self for the good of society.

Religion possesses the power of changing human nature. It has historically illustrated this ability in an infinite number of ways.

Human nature can be changed and we trust human nature will be changed, in directions that will ultimately assure universal peace and a universal civilization founded upon the brotherhood of man.

BAHA'U'LLAH, over sixty years ago, enunciated certain great principles for organized living upon this planet which if carried out would revolutionize human affairs and bring about a much more perfect society.

This ideal organization of human society depends for its achievement upon the perfecting and spiritualizing of human nature. Noble institutions cannot be firmly established in an ignoble humanity, nor can ideal patterns for human living become effective in a society that is without an idealistic urge. A righteous people and an equitable civilization—you cannot have one without the other.

The primary aim of the Bahá'í Movement, therefore, is the perfecting of human character. It seeks to elevate and ennoble man's motives and deeds. And it has within it a mysterious power which effects marvelous transformations in human nature, enabling man to characterize himself with spiritual attributes.

THE ULTIMATE universal aim of the Bahá'í Movement—that of establishing a more perfect civilization upon our planet by uniting mankind under a unifying and progressive force—this ideal appeals with tremendous power to all whose spiritual conscience has been awakened. Those who accept the New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh desire to devote themselves heart and soul to the carrying out of these noble institutions. Thus Bahá'ís the world over—of various races, creeds, cultural backgrounds, personal convictions and tastes—are striving to work with unity and concord to bring to pass the new world state.

The nobility of the ideals and the universal splendor of the cultural edifice which Bahá'u'lláh projects has been the cause of attracting to the Bahá'í Movement many people who had been deniers of revealed religion; finding themselves powerfully attracted to the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh they have gradually come to accept His Cause as a definite Revelation.

Did not this same thing take place in the early centuries of Christianity? How many a Roman citizen—cultured, intellectual, sophisticated and skeptical—became attracted to the faith of the Nazarene because of the power of its humane institutions and its strong evidence of a reforming, vitalizing force in the lives of its adherents. And so today the Bahá'í Movement is marvelously attracting the allegiance of men and women who have a humanitarian vision for the world.

THE PRINCIPLES of organization of the World State of Bahá'u'lláh depend for their achievement upon a transformation of human character such as 'Abdu'l-Bahá definitely urges:

“The cornerstone of the religion of God is the acquisition of divine perfection. . . . He is a true Bahá'í who strives by day and by night to progress and advance along the path of human endeavor; whose cherished desire is to live and act so as to enrich and illumine the world; whose source of inspiration is the Essence of Divine perfection; whose aim in life is to conduct himself so as to be the cause of infinite progress. Only when he attains unto such perfect gifts can it be said of him that he is a Bahá'í.

“. . . Dedicate yourselves wholly to the service of humanity. Then will the world be turned into a paradise; then will the surface of the earth mirror forth the glory of the . . . Kingdom.”

How far removed is the Bahá'í ideal of spiritual development from narrow religious bigotry or a theological pattern for mere personal salvation!

It is society that the Bahá'ís seek to save. To this great purpose they dedicate their lives. And they strive to spiritualize their own natures not so much for the sake of eternal blessedness as for the sake of gaining power and ability for the creative work most vitally needed on earth today—that of transforming human institutions into more noble patterns.

This ideal presents a powerful appeal to all types and classes, of whatever race. Here is something which stirs all that is generous and noble in human nature; something that calls forth these hidden energies in the depths of man's being which can be realized only by the power of lofty ideals, and which strengthened by divine force can become powerfully effective in the building of nobler institutions.

I*T is not intended that the world of humanity should be left to its natural state. It is in need of the education divinely provided for it. The holy, heavenly Manifestations of God have been the teachers. They are the divine gardeners who transform the jungles of human nature into fruitful orchards and make the thorny places blossom as the rose.*

“It is evident then that the intended and especial function of man is to rescue and redeem himself from the inherent defects of nature and become qualified with the ideal virtues of divinity. Shall he sacrifice these ideal virtues and destroy these possibilities of advancement? God has endowed him with a power whereby he can even overcome the laws and phenomena of nature, wrest the sword from nature's hand and use it against nature itself. Shall he then remain its captive, even failing to qualify under the natural law which commands the survival of the fittest? That is to say shall he continue to live upon the level of the animal kingdom without distinction between them and himself in natural impulses and ferocious instincts? There is no lower degree or greater debasement for man than this natal condition of animalism. The battlefield is the acme of human degradation, the cause of the wrath of God, the destruction of the divine foundation of man.

HOW FAITH TRANSCENDS SCIENCE

HOOPER HARRIS

The author, a pioneer in the Bahá'í Cause in America and one of its well known teachers, was among the first of the Western Bahá'í teachers to travel to India on a Bahá'í teaching tour. He here gives us an excellent presentation of the fact that science in reality does coincide with the reality of religion.

BRIEFLY defined, science is the sum of human, or material knowledge, classified,—knowledge gained and verified by exact observation and reason. Confessedly, so far as science is concerned, the age-long enigma of “Whence? Why? Whither?” is still the riddle of the universe. Life itself, the source of life, and consciousness are still unsolved problems.

A well known physicist, Sir Oliver Lodge,¹ informs us:

“When animation has ceased, the thing we properly call dead is not the complete organism, but that material portion which is left behind; we do not or should not intend to make any assertion concerning the vivifying principle which has left it,—beyond the bare fact of its departure. We know too little about that principle to be able to make safe general assertions. . . . it is not a form of energy, nor can it be expressed in terms of something else.”

“But though Life is not energy, any more than it is matter, yet it directs energy and thereby controls arrangements of matter.”

Sir Arthur Eddington is quoted as saying:²

“Theoretical physicists are dragging to light, as the basis of all the phenomena that come within their province, a scheme of symbols linked by mathematical equations. That is what the physical universe boils down to—a skeleton scheme of symbols. It is impossible to deal with the whole fact. But no one believes that what is omitted has no existence. The skeleton of symbols cries out to be filled. But it cries out in vain to physics. Physical science has no way of clothing the skeleton or filling it out. It cannot give the whole truth.”

‘ABDU’L-BAHA describes science and religion as the two wings of one bird. Flying requires two wings, and the two wings of this bird symbolize two distinct branches of knowledge. Both branches are indispensable.

The loss of either would mean the end of progress. Science itself is beginning to learn that it is in perfect agreement with religion, that is, religion of the kind that has no quarrel with science, religion that bases itself on knowledge, and not on dogma and superstition. In this period of world depression and chaos, such a religion, or faith, is the supreme need of mankind.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá thus defines faith: “By faith is meant, first, conscious knowledge; and, second, the practice of good deeds.”³

Science, in the broad sense, therefore, is the full content of the outer, material knowledge, gained and verified by exact observation, while faith is the full content of conscious knowledge, received through the Divine Manifestations, and verified by deeds and experience. Science is acquired knowledge; faith is intuitive knowledge.⁴ Science is the body of outer facts; faith is the spirit which animating that body, will solve all our problems, remove all our difficulties, and make this old world of ours “a fit place to live in.” Science has nobly done its part. It remains for religion to vivify the body of the world prepared by science, and animate it with the spirit of the new and on-coming divine civilization, for we are living in the beginnings of a new and marvellous age, a new cycle of human power. It is the Age of Ages, the Day in which Daniel prophesied

This increase of knowledge has been so tremendous that man has become frightened.

Through His Spirit God has whispered into the inner ear of man understanding which has enabled him to bring "out of the invisible into the visible" the secrets of nature and harness them to his own use to such an extent that the Frankenstein machine he has invented seems about to devour him. This is the great fear that stalks abroad today. But the fear is unjustified. The purpose of God is in man, and the day is rapidly approaching when man will also conquer this machine and compel it to the universal service of mankind. Then will come the day of the great abundance prophesied by Muhammad for all the sons of men. The present condition of misery and want is the result of materialism rampant; the coming happiness and prosperity will be the result of religion triumphant. The spiritual forces are being mobilized for the final conflict.

THAT THE organized forces of greed have misused the power material science gave them is not the fault of science. It is not science, but religion which has failed. Just recently, defending the power age before the Institute of Arts and Sciences in New York, the famous scientist and Columbia professor, Dr. Michael I. Pupin said:

"It is not the power age or science that have brought ills on the world. Rather it is the engineers of the spiritual world who have failed. Materialism can never be eliminated until the spiritual engineers in the service of church and state develop man's spiritual powers and harness them to the service of mankind."

And this is precisely what God has sent His Manifestation to do, and it will not be done until men listen to Him. The world needs to be inspired by a great universal ideal enlisting men in service for humanity as a whole, for the attainment of which they are willing to sacrifice their narrow personal and national interests and prejudices. Otherwise the reconstruction of the world and the building of a better and nobler civilization is impossible. The task is hopeless until men can be made to understand that any progress worthy of the name depends upon people and nations who believe in something and someone higher than themselves. It is such a belief that built up our own great nation; it is such a belief that built up every great enduring civilization of the past. The path of history is strewn with the wrecks of peoples who got tired of believing in God. John Grier Hibben, former President of Princeton University says:¹

"As we look back over the history of our nation, it is evident that our progress has been due to the fact that there were men and women in every generation who believed in something and someone higher than themselves. Not only were they courageous in expressing their convictions, but their lives measured up to their faith, their spirit of endurance, and their determination."

And again:

"I . . . believe that a divine power does manifest itself through the channels of consecrated human personality. . . . Certain lessons from the experience of this last decade we should learn. The first is that we are in danger at the present time not merely of losing our wealth and the material comforts and necessities of life but also our spirit."

After stating that we have reached the state in our present experiences where no ordinary effort will enable a man "to rise above the level of his depressed thoughts and feelings", he adds:

"But the untapped sources of power, to use a phrase of William James, must be called upon. We dare not allow a deflation of spirit. There must be the will to endure, the determination not to be downed, whatever may happen."

And that brings us back to Eddington, who, after telling us that science cannot fill out the skeleton of symbols and give us the whole truth, says:

"We must go back to consciousness—the only place to which we can turn. There we will find other stirrings, other revelations."

BASIL KING wrote a book entitled "The Conquest of Fear." He wrote beautifully of the protecting care of Life for children. He called it "The Life Principle". It is referred to by Sir Oliver Lodge as "the vivifying principle". We are told that it is not energy—not a form of force—for energy expends itself and this mysterious power and organizing principle seems to well from a limitless source, and yet, although it is not energy, it directs energy and controls the arrangements of matter. And how wonderful are those arrangements! Its mysterious shaping power is found in all things. It arranges them as It desires them to be. It can even say "Be—and it is." Men call it the life or vivifying principle. Bahá'u'lláh calls it the Self of God. It is the command, the desire, the will of God in every atom of His creation, and through It the atoms themselves cry out, "He is God, and there is no God but Him."

He it is who is "the untapped source of power". He it is who through the power of attraction of like for like causes elements to cohere which men call rock, or iron, or copper, or silver, or gold in the mineral world. In the vegetable world it is He Who supplies the plant life with an ability to perform what Schopenhauer describes as prodigies of power and intelligence. Study the roots of trees and of the alfalfa plant; note the power of the toadstool to penetrate a brick wall! If this directing life principle wants a creature that can swim, it is given gills; to fly, it is given wings. And for their protection He furnishes the living creatures from the insect up to man with powers of simulation and with instincts which nothing short of the directing power of a supernatural intelligence can explain, demonstrating the loving care of God in the world of the unconscious. Here we have proof in far greater abundance than we can understand, of the "untapped source of power".

IN CONCLUSION, we have at last reached "The Day of God", when God would no more speak to us in parables, but when the secret and hidden things were to be revealed. Bahá'u'lláh tells us:

"There is today a science which can eradicate fear. It must be taught from the earliest period of childhood, and if it becomes popular, the very nature of man will be changed. . . ."

"Likewise a saying has been written in the Red Book by the Supreme Pen, which makes apparent a hidden faculty in man. . . ."

When we have learned, not through scientific or acquired knowledge, but through the Spirit of Faith, to cut ourselves from all things else, and be content to let the directing, nay, the compelling Command, Will or Self of God which is in every atom of His creation have Its unopposed way in us, then, and only then, shall we become conscious of the untapped sources of power and understand why the conscious knowledge of faith transcends the acquired knowledge of science.

RELIGION AND SCIENCE

AN ESSENTIAL principle of Bahá'u'lláh's teaching is that religion must be the cause of unity and love amongst men; that it is the supreme effulgence of divinity, the stimulus of life, the source of honor and productive of eternal existence

“Furthermore the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh announce that religion must be in conformity with science and reason, otherwise it is superstition; for science and reason are realities, and religion itself is the Divine Reality unto which true science and reason must conform.

“God has bestowed the gift of mind upon man in order that he may weigh every fact or truth presented to him and adjudge whether it be reasonable. That which conforms to his reason he may accept as true, while that which reason and science cannot sanction may be discarded as imagination and superstition, as a phantom and not reality. Inasmuch as the blind imitations or dogmatic interpretations current among men do not coincide with the postulates of reason, and the mind and scientific investigation cannot acquiesce thereto, many souls in the human world today shun and deny religion. That is to say, imitations when weighed in the scales of reason will not conform to its standard and requirement; therefore these souls deny religion and become irreligious whereas if the reality of the divine religions becomes manifest to them and the foundation of the heavenly teachings is revealed coinciding with facts and evident truths, reconciling with scientific knowledge and reasonable proof, all may acknowledge them and irreligion will cease to exist. In this way all mankind may be brought to the foundation of religion, for reality is true reason and science while all that is not conformable thereto is mere superstition.”

SYMBOLS AND A SYMBOL

DALE S. COLE

"Temples are the symbols of the divine uniting force, so that when the people gather there in the house of God they may recall the fact that the law has been revealed for them and that the law is to unite them. They will realize that just as this temple was founded for the unification of mankind, the law preceding and creating it came forth in the manifest Word."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE inclination to worship is deeply seated in human beings. To primitive men, an avalanche, a storm with its lightning and thunder, a flood seemed supernatural. Malevolent spirits were feared and must be propitiated. Naturally, many spirits were imagined, both good and bad. Thus emerged the idea of many gods.

Later there began to emerge the conception of one tribal god, benevolent only to his chosen people. And then came a Prophet heralding another advance—the great idea that there was but one God for all peoples and nations. This was a tremendous step.

Great monotheistic religious movements followed, but soon man began to worship God in many and devious ways. The results were so diverse as to seem almost as if different gods were again being worshipped.

First, many gods and many ideas of worship. Second, one God for a nation and as many ideas of worship as nations. Third, one god for all nations. Fourth, one God for all nations but again many ideas as to worship.

What is the next stage in this drama of religious attitudes? It is contemporary with our times.

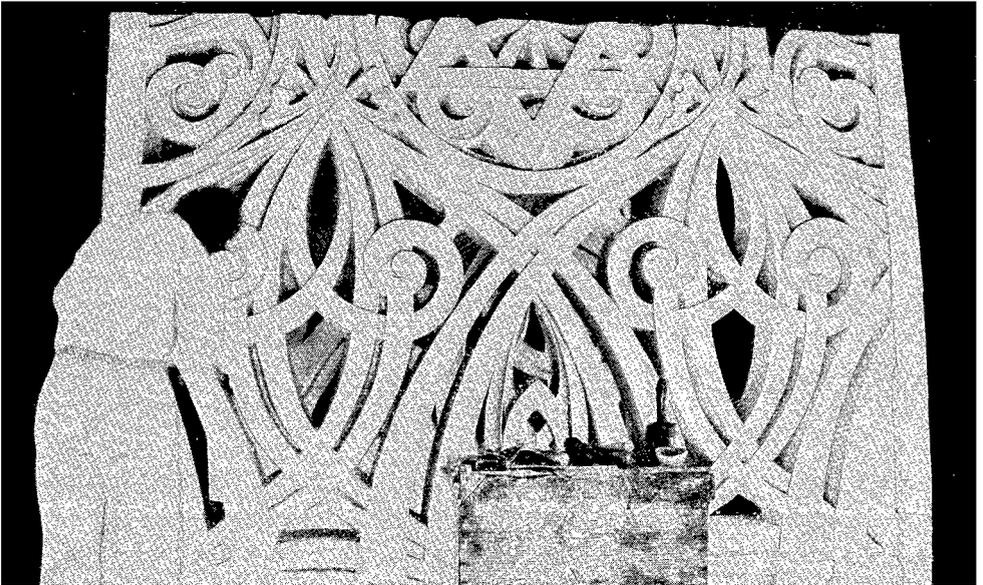

PRIMITIVE man saw in storms and avalanches symbols of a power he could not understand. He saw the outward manifestations of this power, its symbols, but the moving force of these was a mysterious one and unknown. Paradoxically, man is again confronted with forces which he does not understand in the whirlpool of conflicting political, economic and social vicissitudes.

However, today we deal with physical phenomena as astounding to us, if not more so, than the apparently supernatural occurrences of an earlier day. Our scientists are really performing wonders, or clearing away the obstructions so that the wonders may be seen. But experimental observation is not enough. The laws governing certain actions and reactions are expressed ultimately by mathematical equations and these equations are composed of symbols the meaning of which is undetermined.

Primitive man saw symbols in the upheavals of nature. Modern man sees symbols in his mathematical equations. Primitive man knew the symbols represented a Great Power. Modern man, unable to explain the symbols he employs, is being led to the same general conclusion. Thus symbols assume an important role in the evolution of human thoughts, sentiments and convictions.

NATURALLY there are great differences in the inferences drawn by primitive and modern man. Primitive man concluded that because of many strange and apparently dissimilar occurrences, there were many ultimate causes. Modern man is finding out that all of his experimental observations and mathematical speculations tend more and more towards the idea of an underlying unity. If behind or above a series of symbols there is unity—then unity itself is, perhaps, the symbol of the Great Creative Power of the Creator.

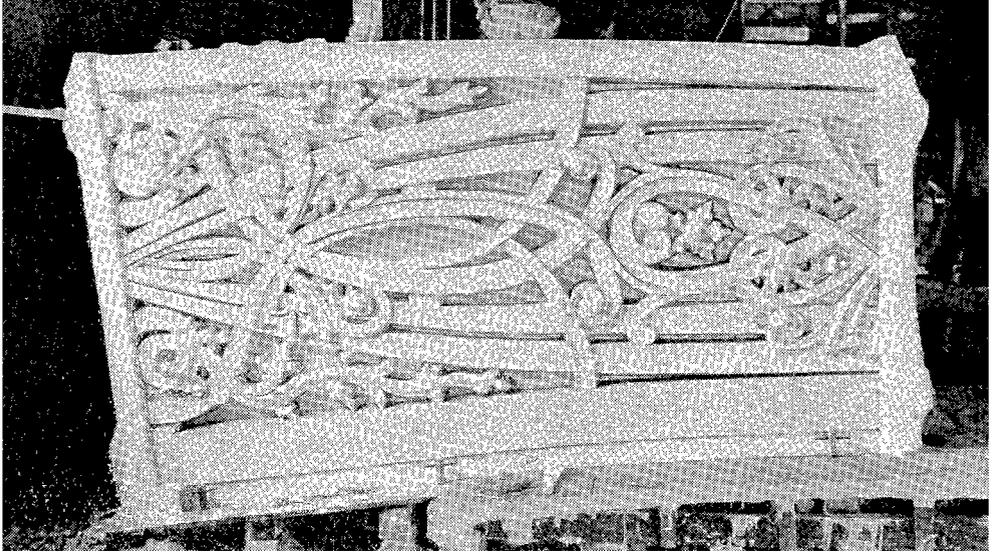

A symbol is “that which stands for or represents something else.” The Cross is the symbol of Christianity. “C” is the chemical symbol of the element carbon. “X” is the universal unknown. The symbol of authority is the government seal. The church has been the symbol of religion.

Symbols are familiar in almost every sphere of life. They stand for something, frequently long after they have ceased to mean anything—long after they have become as “tinkling brass.” In a rapidly changing world, it is not strange that some old symbols should lose their significance. As out-grown institutions crumble, their symbols fall with them.

HUMANITY is seeking for something to symbolize “security.” It cannot be found in the material world. Only in the spiritual realm is there to be found tranquility and peace. In answer to this great longing, there is arising on the shores of Lake Michigan, at Wilmette, Illinois, a symbol of profound significance—a Temple for the universal worship of the One God.

This Temple symbolizes many things for which human hearts, the world over, yearn. Outwardly, it is a building “made with hands”

Plaster model of section of rib of the dome, Bahá'í Temple in course of construction in Wilmette (suburb of Chicago), Illinois but even its architecture is new and fresh. However, it is much more than a building, more even than an institution—it is the symbol of the “spirit of this age”—of unity and concord. It is a spiritual edifice.

The significance of this symbol is so profound and penetrating that it is difficult to grasp. Perhaps it can be better understood and appreciated by considering it a super-symbol made up of numerous contributing ones, themselves important and far reaching.

It is the symbol of an obligation assumed by a relatively small number of people who have seen a great Light and wish to share it with others.

It is a symbol of sacrifice, for it is being constructed by the voluntary giving of that relatively small number in times of economic distress.

It is the symbol of liberty; freedom from traditional hindrances, superstitions and out-worn creeds, for within its portals men of all religions may worship in complete harmony.

It is the symbol of a new era in human relationships, wherein all prejudices of whatever kind will be forever obliterated from the feelings of mankind.

It is the symbol of the universal brotherhood of man made a practical principle of life.

It is the symbol of a universal religion, all inclusive.

It is the symbol of a quickening of human spiritual perception.

It is the symbol of an acceleration in human evolution and its approaching culmination.

It is a symbol of Divine Benevolence.

Its completion will evidence great progress in the drama of religious attitudes, signalling the “hour of the unity of the sons of men.”

THERE IS a mighty power in concerted thought, feeling and action—in unity. When human action is synchronized with the will of God untold benefits are possible. The principle of unity has never been really tried by man. The completion of this Temple will mark a stage in progress towards this ideal.

Concurrent with the destruction of “long cherished ideals,” “time honored institutions,” “certain social assumptions” which “no longer serve the generality of mankind” and “no longer minister to the needs of a changing world,”—the construction of this symbol of the “celestial potency” of God’s Power, inspires “wider loyalties” and “higher aspirations.”

Even in a partially completed state, it is a bright beacon in the darkness.

Only future generations will be able to appraise correctly the privilege conferred on those who assist in the unveiling of this great symbol. As its significance becomes apparent, as its influence is felt, as its unique value is appreciated, a part, however small, in its activities will be highly prized. Possibly no more benign privilege will ever exist than that of having a part in the building of this Temple, this symbol of “the spirit of the age.”

May the beneficent influences contingent upon its progress and completion be not too long delayed by any cause whatsoever.

“It behooves each one of you to manifest the attributes of God, and to exemplify by your deeds and words the signs of His righteousness, His power and glory. The very members of your body must bear witness to the loftiness of your purpose, the integrity of your life, the reality of your faith, and the exalted character of your devotion.”

THE REQUIREMENT OF MEDITATION

ALFRED E. LUNT

The first part of this article was published in the February number. It ably defined the difference between sectarianism and universal religion, and stressed the importance of daily meditation and communion. In this the second and concluding part, the author gives us a very clarifying statement on the subject of those possessing a passive faith only, and those who "eagerly and sacrificially seek the pathway of Divine mysteries."

"Forget all save Me and commune with My Spirit. This is of the essence of My command, therefore turn unto it."

—Bahá'u'lláh.

DIVINE knowledge, as entrusted to man, becomes the most powerful magnet in human society, a point of irresistible attraction. It was the possession of this knowledge by the ancient sages of Israel that brought to their gates seekers of truth from the high places of the earth. Kings and princes, philosophers and students journeyed to Jerusalem in the days of "Solomonic sovereignty," to learn of the hidden truths of life and eternity. Those arduous journeyings, accomplished only through difficult trials and the infinite hardships of slow locomotion, were inspired by this hunger of the human soul for the light of knowledge. The "knowledge of God," 'Abdu'l-Bahá declares, "is an ecstasy". All conceptions of intoxication, in this world, are but traces of that consciousness that is favored with a sip of the divine wine of impregnable Truth which is unsealed today by the hand of the immortal Cup-bearer. The nearest approach to this symbol of joy, in this world, is the cool stream of pure water into which the desert traveler, deprived for days, plunges his parched lips—and drinks. How comparatively little we realize the corresponding state of the soul of reality resident within all humanity whose thirst is quenched only at the Fountain of Life with the Water of Truth. Yet the Heavenly Table has been spread only for this.

TO PARTAKE at this table of Divine nutrition, as compared with him who remains aloof, betokens the vast gulf that yawns between him who rests satisfied with belief and passive faith, and him who eagerly and sacrificially seeks the pathway of divine mysteries. Because of this, 'Abdu'l-Bahá—Himself the "Mystery of God", that luminous Torch-bearer along the pathway of the Kingdom,—continually exhorted the friends of God to "become informed of the mysteries." And still we find those, a very few we trust, who regard such a search and such a goal as savoring of sentimentality, or as something worthy of superstitious fear, glorying rather in that intense practicality that, deprived of true guidance, has sadly failed to preserve the nations employing it from utter disintegration. Not that the enlightened soul is, in any true sense, impractical in the things that are worth while. But such a one can never worship or exalt a mere quality to the exclusion of that which is commanded by those who know and who possess the Authority of Command.

IN SHORT, it is both plain and certain, that for the pioneer believers of this illumined century, all those now living, a potential station of servitude to all humanity is reserved, like unto—perhaps excelling—that occupied by the ancient sages of former cycles. To solve the difficult questions of innumerable seekers, to show forth a trace of the Master's power to quiet and enrapture the souls, to exhibit the heavenly qualities, to illumine the administrative functions with their essential, spiritual reality of love, wisdom and justice, to be utterly freed from the personal characteristics, ambitions and exclusiveness that mark the merely sectarian,—requires a deepening of consciousness obtained only through the accepted and merciful bestowals gained by meditation and communion. Were this not so, how can we account for the innermost essences revealed by Bahá'u'lláh?

In His most powerful utterances He advises, “Thou art My stronghold; enter therein that thou mayst abide in safety. My love is in thee, know it, that thou mayst find Me near unto thee.” Again He says, “Thou art My lamp and My light is in thee. Get thou from it thy radiance.” Still again, “Within thee have I placed the essence of My light. Be thou content with it.” Also, “Turn thy sight unto thyself, that thou mayst find Me standing within thee, mighty, powerful and self-subsisting.”¹

And in one of His holy prayers, He communes “O Thou who art hidden in our innermost hearts.”

With equal emphasis Christ taught His followers that the Kingdom of Heaven was within them, and that this Kingdom must first be sought out.

And Bahá'u'lláh, in the Kitáb-i-Iqán confirms the tradition, “Man is My mystery and I am his Mystery.”² And again He informs us that, “He hath known God who hath known himself.”³ He further says, “And be ye not like those who forget God, and whom He hath therefore caused to forget their own selves, [realities]”; and “All these names and attributes are applicable to him [man].”⁴ While in the Tablet of Glad Tidings, He says, “God willing, all will turn unto the treasures that are deposited within themselves.”⁵

These utterances indicate the true stronghold to which men may turn during the successive calamities that are oppressing the world today. Especially to the friends of God does this great bounty open the gates of the City of Refuge, even unto the very Throne, itself.

In a Tablet with which ‘Abdu'l-Bahá at one time favored the writer,⁶ in recounting the wisdom of prayer, He said: “The greatest happiness for a lover is to converse with his beloved, and the greatest gift for a seeker is to become familiar with the object of his longing; that is why, with every soul who is attracted to the Kingdom of God, his greatest hope is to find an opportunity to entreat and supplicate before his Beloved, appeal to His mercy and grace and be immersed in the ocean of His utterance, goodness and generosity.”

Of the illumined souls who have trodden this path, Muhammad said: “Fear ye the sagacity of the faithful, for he seeth with the Light Divine.”

¹Hidden Words (Arabic) 10, 11, 12, 13. (Italics ours.) ²The Book of Certitude, new edition, p. 101.
³New edition, p. 102. ⁴Bahá'i Scriptures, p. 151, v. 121. ⁵Bahá'i Scriptures, p. 466, v. 869.

SOME followers of certain philosophies seek this pathway in the hope of self-advancement. But the lovers of God are actuated by the requirements of servitude in the Divine pathway, and the longing to achieve the divine destinies that He has ordained. They cling neither to life nor possessions. They rather know that, like the fruit concealed in the tree, latent within them reposes the potentiality of a divine fruitage which must be brought to maturity. Nevertheless, since divine health and well being ever attend the one who contacts the vast reservoirs of life surging in that inner realm of being, such a one, reinforced with that ageless power, witnesses, in himself, a capacity, a resourcefulness and a guidance denied to those who weakly cling to the husks of sectarianism. For these are confined by the limitations of attachment, and therefore invite to a greater or less degree the decompositional, destructive forces of Mother Nature.

To the extent that sectarian thought is based upon superstition and mythical dogma, the imaginations of the personal man as contrasted with the certainties of the seeker of divine mysteries, its followers are controlled more rigidly by the natural law of the duality. And, conversely, the advancing soul, gradually coming to recognize the mystic truth that, "There was God and nothing whatever was with Him," changes the axis of his being into harmony with the law of oneness which abhors duality. Thus he makes a flight toward the Plain of Being, that blessed realm wherein the light is unchanging and not subject to darkness, or other dual opposities.

CAN THERE exist any doubt as to which path is divinely favored? The Essence of the Sacred Books, the dynamic of the revealed Word of God—all reveal the deadly parallel. Not argument but the Word, Itself, is absolute demonstration. As for instance in The Kitáb-i-Iqán,¹ Bahá'u'lláh says: "They have even failed to realize, all this time, that, in every age, the reading of the scriptures and holy books is for no other purpose except to enable the reader to apprehend their meaning and unravel their innermost mysteries." And in the same Book² He asserts that, "One hour's reflection is preferable to seventy years of pious worship."

This reflection is the essence of meditation. The goal is within, not without, and the consciousness must be attuned to the lordly vibrations of that station wherein He stands "powerful, mighty and self-subsistent." Then, "Thou mayst hearken unto the mystic voice calling from the realms of the invisible." Then shall the Cause of God become "Light upon Light" to all mankind. This attuning of consciousness brings the worshipper for the first time to the point where the vibrations of prayer can penetrate to the Listener and the Answerer of prayer. It is idle to suppose that a prayer launched from the inferior and worldly station of personal, outer consciousness can wing its way to the Realm of Holiness. A weak broadcasting station can not imprint its message upon a receiver tuned and vibrating with infinitely high waves. But the vibrations must be of the same quality—and in the spiritual world the connecting link is the love, yearning, and union in the soul of the seeker of divine gifts.

PROTEST

SILVIA MARGOLIS

We thought you loved us, and your love was true,
That all there was of worth to know—you knew,
And so, like pilgrims, long we followed you,
Exalted you, declared you prophets, peers,
Incomparables and worthy pioneers,
And never dreamed there were yet greater seers!

While you were failing us in every need,
While we were withering within the seed—
You told us we were triumphing indeed;
You told us we were waxing strong and free
While you were bringing grinding poverty
To generations here and yet to be.

When cries of war and falling dynasties
Had drenched in blood the quaking lands and seas—
You hushed our protests with sweet words of Peace,
And when you marched us to the battlefield—
Compelled us with your avarice to yield—
You did not tell us 'twas our own we killed.

Had you no eyes, no hearts, no loftier goals
Than making sandbanks, rearing shoals—
Things to incarcerate your children's souls?
Had you no true compassion on your Young,
That you would exile them from Truth and Song?
O, how, how could you leave us Godless for so long?

Editorial Note—Is it not true, in spite of the fact that there still remain many sources of earnest spiritual teaching, that the general indoctrination of educated society during the last generation has been, as the poet tells us, Godless?

GLIMPSES OF THE NEW WORLD ORDER

Notes on a Visit to Haifa and Akká

MABEL AND SYLVIA PAINE

"The sea has innumerable pearls in its depths. A good and trained diver will obtain therefrom abundant pearls."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

A LITTLE party of four boarded the Carnaro at Trieste on November fourth, 1931. We were bound for Haifa, Palestine, where we expected, through meeting Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, and the family of 'Abdul'-Bahá and through visiting the shrines of the Founders of the Bahá'í Faith—the Báb, Bahá'ulláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá—to gain light on the problems that so vex the world, to make contact with the universal love that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had instilled into those who associated with Him and to deepen our faith in the invincible power which has characterized that Faith from its inception.

On November ninth, in the afternoon, the city of Haifa came into view. It lies at the foot of Mt. Carmel, the mountain famed in Old Testament annals as the abode of the Prophets of God. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries it has again become the centre from which spiritual teachings have gone forth. And its spiritual revival has been accompanied by considerable material progress, for it is already the chief shipping centre for Palestine. Our first impression on entering its harbor was of a commercial activity which had been distinctly lacking at the older and more Oriental port of Jaffa, where we had anchored a few hours earlier. Work on the deepened harbor is in constant progress and 'ere long ships will dock at Haifa.

After landing, some of us chose to walk through the narrow crooked streets with Ruhi Afnán, grandson of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and cousin of Shoghi Effendi, who was at the dock to greet us. Haifa streets show a mingling of the Oriental and the cosmopolitan. Its inhabitants—Jews, Arabs, Germans, French, English, Persians, and Americans—all retaining to some extent their distinctive dress, language, and customs, give the city the charm of diversity. It was interesting to note the disappearance of one former Oriental feature, the traditional black dress and veil covering the whole head and face of the Arab women. Of the Arab women we saw nearly all were unveiled.

Our walk brought us at last to the Bahá'í Western Pilgrim House situated near the edge of the city a little way up Mt. Carmel. About this house is a very delightful blending of the Orient with the Occident, the beautiful and dignified with the homey and comfortable. The circular central hall with its marble pillars, the lofty ceilings, the flat roof, sundrenched by day and moonlight bathed at night, seem apart from our workaday world of the West. But the furnishings of bedrooms, reading, writing, sitting, and dining rooms are Occidental. In the gardens on three sides of the house are magnificent poinsettias, roses, jasmine, chrysanthemums. Soon the freesias will be blossoming. We are indebted to Fugeta from Japan for these carefully tended gardens as well as many a kind personal service. Effie from Australia, of Scotch ancestry, is responsible for the beautiful order of the interior of the house. Both help to maintain the pervasive atmosphere of kindly cheer which is neither of the Orient nor the Occident, but, of the Kingdom.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER TENTH—
Today at luncheon Shoghi Effendi was present and, through his conversation, we were given a view as from a mountain top of present conditions in the world and the relations of Bahá'is to these conditions. Bahá'is, he says, are loyal to the government, but eschew party politics. They are eager to serve their country through devoting themselves to the welfare of the people. They hold administrative posts only when these are not dependent on party politics. Some Bahá'is in Persia have been appointed to important posts of this type. One is chief magistrate in a city, one head of an imperial bank. Gradually, as the Bahá'í Faith develops and spreads, it will number among its supporters outstanding citizens. The early history of the Bahá'í religion in Persia reveals the fact that it had many notables in its ranks.

In each country the Bahá'is have an especial problem. In Germany it is the Semitic question; in Persia polygamy and opium; in France, alcohol; in England, class prejudice; in America, racial prejudice. The teachings 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave on interracial relations are so sound, kind, and sincere, and the Bahá'í teaching of the oneness of mankind so thoroughgoing that Bahá'is have a stronger program and deeper sincerity than other workers for harmony between races. The Bahá'is need to be more courageous in applying these principles. Especially should they convince the Negro and the world at large that they stand for lack of prejudice in social ways.

AT THREE in the afternoon we went to the Shrine of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá on Mount Carmel. It is only five or ten minutes walk from the Pilgrim House. The road brings one to the foot of some terraces. One enters a gate and climbs alternately by flights of stone steps and paths of red crushed stone. On either side are scarlet geraniums and palms. The approach to the shrine is steep. And this steepness I liked, thinking of it as a bit of symbolism.

Near the shrine is a circle of cedars where Bahá'u'lláh used to sit. A larger circle has been planted outside to protect the original trees. The view from here is one of extreme beauty, embracing this part of the Mediterranean, 'Akká Bay, and, nine miles across the bay, the city of 'Akká which is always catching the light and reflecting it in some new way—truly like a jewel on a diadem.

Coming down the mountain we went into the house of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, now Shoghi Effendi's. Here we had the privilege of meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá's sister, His widow and two of His daughters. Each time we met these women, and this was nearly every day of our stay in Haifa, we realized more what the true beauty and nobility of womanhood may be. The face of the sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Bahiyyeh Khanum, although shadowed by age, was so full of love and a genuine interest in life and people that we did not think of her as old, but rather as ageless and eternal. The freshness of the beauty of love radiating from her captivated us. And from all these women one sees an intensely bright reflection of the Spirit of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The fact that there are several of them and that each one has a strong individuality helps to broaden one's conception of the ideal Bahá'í character, for each is thoroughly lovely in a different way.

WHEN WE were in Geneva earlier in the autumn we had the great privilege of meeting Monerva Khanum, the youngest daughter of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She showed us then both in word and deed the nature of the love which 'Abdu'l-Bahá's life exemplified. For nearly eighty years, she told us, 'Abdu'l-Bahá lived a life of perfect love, each thing He did being a lesson to teach us how to love. Realizing how difficult it is to attain such love, we questioned her a little further. It must be real, she answered. In this quality of genuineness it is like the love we have for our children. If they do wrong we are eager to excuse them.

Then, dwelling a little also on the intellectual side of love she pointed out how necessary is understanding. Most hatred comes from lack of understanding. It is to aid in understanding that Bahá'u'lláh decreed the "parliament of nations, the federation of the world." She spoke in a simple and profound way of the condition of the world. It seemed to her like a wayward child. Through Bahá'u'lláh God has shown it the way of salvation, the same way that Christ and other great religious Founders have pointed out, the eternal path which every religion in its pure and early stages shows. But the world is slow to recognize the old path made new by the clearing away of the debris of agelong superstition and imitation. And because of this slowness of apprehension God allows suffering to come in order that through suffering this child may learn. In the same way a kind parent would allow his child to suffer in order that its understanding might increase.

BUT TO COME back to this afternoon in Haifa. The conversation turned on relations with people, and the importance of not interfering with the religious beliefs of others was brought out. "Leave them alone as to their religious belief, but be very kind to them." Words like these were spoken by the wife of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She told an incident to illustrate what she meant. When a young girl she wanted to keep both the Muhammadan and the Bahá'í fast, but her mother thought that this would be too great a strain on her health as one fast followed immediately after the other. Her father said, "Leave her alone and it will come to her."

And so it did, when she was fifteen or sixteen. She said the Iqán (Book of Certitude) by Bahá'u'lláh helped her much. She wanted us to be sure to read it in the new translation by Shoghi Effendi.

Rouha Khanum, one of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's daughters, spoke of joy and sorrow, wondering which brought us nearer to God. She thought, sorrow. She told of an American woman who came a long way to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá because she had heard that He was a great spiritual teacher. She was suffering intensely because her loved ones had died. Her love for them consumed all other thought and she longed only to have them again. But in the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá she obtained the real comfort none else had been able to give.

That evening at dinner Effie told a story illustrating another side of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, His love of fun and happiness. He and His entourage were staying in Lady B's house in London. One evening there was a sound of much laughter below-stairs. It was so gay and arresting that Lady B. went down to find the occasion of the mirth, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá followed. They found Khosroe, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's servant, and one of the maids laughing and joking very happily. Khosroe was telling how women in the Orient have to obey the men and how if he and the maid were there she would have to do just what he told her and the maid was answering that in England things were different and, since they were in England, he must do what she said, etc. etc. 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave them each two shillings for being happy.

LOVE UNDER THE SUN

(A "new thing")

So much is said of Love,

What is there left that's new?

But O to be led of Love

In every thing we do!

And O to talk with Love

When we have aught to say!

LOVE!—Let us walk with Love

Into the Light of Day!

LETTERS HOME

PERSIA:—Visit to a Bahá'í Village

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

In her world travels in behalf of The Bahá'í Movement the author takes time to write to friends impressions derived from her varied experiences. These "Letters Home" we have been privileged to present to the readers of the Bahá'í Magazine at different times during the past year. The first "letter" appeared in the January, 1932 number, and described the author's visit to Nikko and other places in Japan. The April number gave some of her impressions of China; the December issue contained an interesting description of her contacts with the Maoris of New Zealand; and the January number her observations while traveling through India. Herein begins a new series on her fascinating material and spiritual experiences in Persia.

 ROSSING the western boundary of Persia, from Iráq, we behold at once the gaunt and troubled grandeur of her sterile mountain chains. Her landscape presents this profile wherever we may go; a thousand valleys past which the mountains are ever marching, sometimes stepping imperiously across our path and forcing it to fling its tortuous way to their very summits; often lifting their lofty peaks and snowy diadems to peer majestically over the clouds; in Mázindarán luxuriantly wooded—elsewhere barren and wrinkled; in Khurásán, now ancient and indifferent, their transfixed writhings bear mute testimony to the agony of earth's youth. Purple at dawn, blue at midday, rosy at dusk, feeding the countless rivulets that fling diamonds when spurned by our flying wheels, these mountains—which are Persia—have listened for ages to the inarticulate prayers sent up, from her desert valleys, in verdure and gardens and produce for the divine bounty of water. You have to get the feel of this landscape, before you can know Persia.

Her people, still pastoral and archaic, have for ages been surrounded by these almost insurmountable physical barriers. Caught as it were in a geographical back-wash, Persia has not been on the beaten path of travel, except for slow-moving caravans, or exploitation and conquest, since those ancient days when "Ships in thousands . . . and men in nations" attested to her unchallengable grandeur.

Even a short journey in Persia today is arduous. The mountains are jealous guards of the secrets and mysteries that lie beyond their confines. How infinitely more difficult was communication in days before improved roads and methods of transportation had arrived. Unfriendliness, timidity and provincialism have ever been the price of segregation and homogeneity.

Due to this isolation Persia up to the time of the Báb's proclamation was in a pre-logical, pre-scientific, pre-international condition. The magical progress that has taken place since that date has been enormously heightened in the past few years under the regime of Rida Shah Pahlevi.

IN ORDER to understand what the Bahá'í teachings have done for Persia it is only necessary to visit a Bahá'í and a non-Bahá'í community.

Tucked away in the mountains of Adhírbáyján is the Bahá'í village of Sisan,⁵ a community of about fifteen hundred souls, I would say, of whom twelve hundred and fifty are Bahá'ís. So great is their reputation for justice, understanding and enlightenment that the Muslims of the community frequently submit their conflicts and problems to the Bahá'í Assembly rather than to the Muslim Courts.

In arranging my program the Spiritual Assembly of Tabriz included a day in this heavenly place. A farsang¹ back from the main-traveled highway, a road built for Martha² two years ago leading to the village, had been rebuilt and newly repaired for the large convoy of motors that accompanied me on this occasion. Any path is good enough for a donkey, and a camel needs none at all; so I suppose the road will lapse again until the next western visitor is expected.

A little group of Sisáns were waiting at the fork of the road to direct us, and then began a triumphal progress so extravagant that it will remain forever, not an episode, but an acute emotional experience.

As our car turned into the crude new-made roadway, from every field and farmstead, from every lodge and pasture they came running—all those who perforce must remain at their work, unable to join the holiday-makers in the village. "Alláh-u-Abhá"³ rang from every side: "Alláh-u-Abhá" joyously cried the little shepherd as his frightened flock fled away. "Alláh-u-Abhá" pealed the stalwart young farmer leaving his stolid bullocks in the half-finished furrow; old men ran breathlessly from their herds calling "Alláh-u-Abhá" as they came; "Alláh-u-Abhá" was the shout of the donkey boy, and "Alláh-u-Abhá" the glad greeting of the camel-driver who had hurried all night to arrive at this rendezvous until at last the very birds, trees, streams, yes, rocks, had joined the mystic chorus and the earth herself was pulsating with the power of the Greatest Name. It was as if the Heavens had descended and all the company of men and angels had joined "the four living creatures" and "the four and twenty elders" bowed before that august throne and chanting with them, in incommunicable ecstasy, their eternal song "Holy, Holy, Holy Lord God of Hosts! Heaven and earth are full of the majesty of Thy Bahá."⁴

And then, turning sharply to enter the main road of the village there in two mighty rows were drawn up before us these hundreds of men and women rocking the houses with their joyous welcome of "Alláh-u-Abhá."

I still have the feeling that this day is something that I have read somewhere; it doesn't seem as if it could actually have happened.

Unlike the hideous black chuddar worn by the women of the towns and cities, these villagers were alive with color, and vivid, almost barbaric, it gave a very dramatic background to the scene.

¹ About three miles. ² Miss Martha Root, Bahá'í teacher who visited Persia in 1930. ³ God is the Most Glorious; the Greatest Name of God. ⁴ Glory. ⁵ Same as SAYSAN.

We stopped in front of a villa set on a hill with a very long narrow garden in front. Not only was the entire facade of the house covered with choice rugs but the whole garden wall around the entrance gate had been similarly decorated, and lovely rugs had been spread upon the dusty pathway leading to the residence.

Seating myself in an upper window I watched with dazed awe the happy, reverent throngs who crowded through the gate to do me honor. Strangely enough the women came first, every one of them carrying a baby, the mothers their infants, the grandmothers the "second youngest."

Above the marvel of this sight my senses danced with delight at the gorgeous colorings, orange, red, grass-green, magenta, Chinese pink—it was none too brilliant for the occasion.

It took about twenty minutes for the women to file in, in orderly fashion; they stood to the right, around the pool. The men followed more rapidly to the opposite side and then I was to come down to the garden and speak.

Turkish is the vernacular of the whole province of Adhírbáyján. It was very complicated: Mr. Cayvais, the interpreter who accompanied me from Tíhrán, translated to Mr. Frután (a national teacher stationed in the village at the time) who in turn rendered it into Turkish.

When I had finished I came from the terrace down several steps to the garden level in order to mingle with the friends and have a picture taken with them. Alas! the whole roll of films was a complete failure so that the pictorial record cannot accompany my letter, as I had hoped.

As I was standing with the men's group the chanting of the final monajat started; I was astonished, after a little while, to feel shy hands touching my dress, my scarf, my shoulder. One boy, with a radiant face, had placed his finger-tips on my arm. I warmly covered his hand with mine, until the prayer was finished.

Then just as picturesquely, just as dramatically as they had come they melted away, and we were called to the feast that had been prepared for us.

This village was significant to me not only because it has already established a reputation for Bahá'í justice and progress, not only because for three generations it has stood firm and staunch in the Covenant of God, not only because of the loving kindness which was so bountifully showered upon me, but because it is the native village of my dear friend Yad'u'llah, caretaker of the mansion and Shrine at Bahji. He had long since endeared himself to me as a sincere, selfless and devoted Bahá'í, and it was like meeting those already near to me to meet his brothers and sister here.

A pathetic little group stood apart on an adjoining housetop as I was speaking. Who are those? Why don't they come into the garden?" I asked. "They are Muslims," I was told. "'Allah'u'-Akbar,'" I shouted to them to the delight of the Friends.

¹ Almighty is the Lord; the opening words of the Adhan or Muslim call to prayer.

LUNCHEON over and high mountains to climb before we could find a resting place for the night, I went at once to the Hazirat-ul-Quds¹ to meet the Spiritual Assembly and say farewell.

The place was packed and lined with old and young, many who had been in the fields having been replaced by those who had attended the morning session.

As I walked between these rows of shining faces the real meaning of Bahá'í solidarity suddenly penetrated me. Here were Persians speaking Turkish, fixed in a tiny town in the mountains of Adhir-báyján, and I, a sophisticated and effete Occidental, peripatetic, artificial, cosmopolitan; but we were bound together by ties "more lasting than bronze and higher than the exalted site of the Pyramids." For knowledge of the coming of Bahá'u'lláh and knowledge of His All-enfolding Covenant is not a question of locality, education or perferment but an unshakable spiritual reality that welds those who know it into an indissoluble human brotherhood. Here is a true solidarity that can withstand all the forces of disruption in the universe.

Yad'u'llah's sister came in for a few moments to the Assembly meeting and on her behalf and theirs I was presented with two beautiful pieces of hand-woven jajim, embroidered with my name.

As I was leaving the assembly room a little idiot child, who had been causing some confusion, ran up to me and pulled at my clothing. I remembered the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that mental disorders may be healed by the power of prayer. And in a dim, remote way there stirred in my soul a faint shadow of the mighty compassion that must have seized our blessed Lord Jesus, that stern Master of tenderness, when He healed the demoniac boy. Dropping on my knees beside him I lovingly clasped the little fellow in my arms and repeated the healing prayer. He seemed mystified, quieted and happy; while in the breasts of all of us was cemented that essential unity that is attained when we touch "the depths and not the tumults of the soul." In face of such great verities as prayer and love and divine compassion, we realize that "there is neither East nor West, border, nor breed, nor birth."

THE FAREWELLS were just as moving as the welcome had been. I was tremendously agitated for fear some one would be hurt; women running, with babies in their arms, to touch my hand as I waved from our moving motor, men jostling, boys under the very wheels it seemed to me, shouting their good-byes.

And once again the two long brilliant lines raising the glad paeon "Alláh-u-Abhá." Once more the fields streaming with those leaving their occupations to give "Alláh-u-Abhá" as their Godspeed; babies in their mother's arms swelling the chorus "Alláh-u-Abhá"; again the skies were raining back the great refrain with which these simple, earnest, devoted souls were assaulting heaven.

All Persians are poets. Our Bahá'í chauffeur was stilled with the significance of the wondrous. "I never realized before," he said, "that nature could speak, but tonight the universe is crying Alláh-u-Abha."

"The quiet-colored end of evening" approached as we said farewell to our kind convoy of friends from Tabriz.

Our faces set once more toward Tihrán, the solemn lovely tone of camel bells rang from the passing caravans; the donkey trains were afoot again after the noon-day rest; the sky was peach and amethyst with the recollection of sunset; the mauve mountains, remembering their age, grew chilly; kneeling by the roadside offering the evening prayer, the resigned figure of a devout Muslim symbolized the spirit of ancient Persia. But I had seen that today which assured me that Persia was arousing from her age old lethargy, from her fanaticism, from her resignation, and that through the assistance of this great Bahá'í army of faith and strength she was already moving forward to conquer the old evil things of her past—"Not by might nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."¹

The Divine Prophets are as the coming of spring, each renewing and quickening the teachings of the Prophet who came before him. Just as all seasons of spring are essentially one as to newness of life, vernal showers and beauty, so the essence of the mission and accomplishment of all the Prophets is one and the same. Now the people of religion have lost sight of the essential reality of the spiritual springtime.

Today His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh is the Collective Center of unity for all mankind, and the splendor of His Light has likewise dawned from the East. He founded the oneness of humanity in Persia. He established harmony and agreement among the various peoples of religious beliefs, denominations, sects and cults by freeing them from the fetters of past imitations and superstitions; leading them to the very foundation of the divine religions. From this foundation shines forth the radiance of spirituality which is unity, the love of God, praiseworthy morals and the virtues of the human world. Bahá'u'lláh renewed these principles just as the coming of spring refreshes the earth and confers new life upon all phenomenal beings. . . . The spiritual springtime has come. Infinite bounties and graces have appeared. What bestowal is greater than this?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

SCIENCE NOT ENOUGH

"Religion must conform to science and reason, otherwise it is superstition. God has created man in order that he may perceive the verity of existence and endowed him with mind or reason to discover truth. Therefore scientific knowledge and religious belief must be conformable to the analysis of this divine faculty in man."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

PROFESSOR John Scott Haldane, the veteran Oxford scientist, in one of the dinner hour addresses arranged by the Christian Evidence Society at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, Trafalgar Square, London, said:

"I am a member of no church because there is so much that I cannot accept in the theology associated with existing churches. It is therefore as a free thinker that I am addressing you; though one whose reasoning has led him to a clear recognition of spiritual reality as the only reality. Do not think that, since I am engaged in scientific work, this recognition alienates me in any way from my work or from my fellowship with other scientific workers. It is just the opposite. We are all engaged in the pursuit of truth, though of different partial aspects of it. The recognition that spiritual reality, as the pursuit of truth, is embodied in all scientific work brings us together, and we are still together when we are fighting against what seems to us to be theology.

"The ordinary world which we see and feel around us is a spiritual world of values, in which we find the manifestation of God. We find it in our comradeship with others, in the honest and diligent carrying on of our occupations, in our care for one another, in public services and in our joint recognition and furtherance of truth and beauty.

"If we lose sight of this spiritual world, we have lost sight of what is alone ultimately real in ourselves, and we are not realizing ourselves. Science by itself cannot guide us, since from its very nature it does not deal with values which are supreme.

"Science is not enough. Reason in its highest form as religion, and real religion extending into every part of our lives, is what the world is most in need of, and particularly just now, with old theological beliefs, which to a large extent embodied religion, along with old scientific beliefs, as well as old political beliefs, disintegrating in every direction."

Is it not thrilling to see how, day by day, the Bahá'í Teachings are being worked out? How wonderfully these words express the principle revealed so long ago that, "Religion must go hand in hand with science." The day is coming—and everything indicates that it is not far distant—when the real meaning of religion will be known and appreciated, for religion is not a thing of theology but of life, or, in the Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Religion is an attitude toward God which is expressed in life."

MISSIONS AND WORLD PROGRESS

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

"The gift of God to this enlightened age is the knowledge of the oneness of mankind and the fundamental oneness of religion. War shall cease between nations, and by the Will of God the Most Great Peace shall come; the world will be seen as a new world, and all men shall live as brothers."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

WHAT is happening in the world? The wisest are puzzled as they try to read the signs of the times. No one longer doubts that great and rapid social, industrial and economic changes are going on about him. As to how fundamental, far-reaching and permanent these changes are we do not agree. Now comes a searching study of missions which not only gives added signs of change, but may perhaps, if we are wise and thoughtful, help us to evaluate some of these great changes. Most of us are so absorbed in making our own adjustments that although we are conscious that China, Japan and India figure frequently in the headlines yet we scarcely realize that changes equally great or greater than those near us are going on in all parts of the world, that the great continent of Asia, where dwells more than half the population of the world, having awakened from its sleep of centuries, is astir.

We are indebted to the Commission appointed by the Layman's Foreign Missions Inquiry for giving us facts and picturing conditions in the Far East which make us more consciously aware of changes there. What changes are necessary in mission method and aims to meet these changes in mission fields is the principle question which this commission seeks to answer. It is imperative that something be done. For perhaps even more compelling than the changes is the fact that for a number of years the interest in missions among church supporters has gradually waned and contributions for the purpose have gradually diminished. This commission's report shows not only how difficult is the situation but how earnest is the desire that the adjustment be scientific, wise and well considered. To those who have not been thinking in terms of missions and a changing world the recommendations of the commission come perhaps as a distinct shock. This may be good; the Western World, too, may need to be startled out of its sleep.

The rise of the spirit of nationalism is responsible for some of the changed conditions which missions are facing. For example, the present government regulation in China requires that the heads of registered colleges be Chinese and prohibits colleges from making the attendance of students at religious exercises compulsory. In India, the rise of government colleges with larger resources has resulted in some cases in institutions superior to the Christian colleges. In Japan the fine system of government schools extending from the kindergarten through the university puts the Christian schools with a few exceptions in a decidedly inferior position. In other ways, too, Japan is so decidedly westernized that any mission work carried on there must be on a decidedly new basis. These are but a few examples showing how new conditions demand new methods and new aims.

THE REPORT of the inquiry, published under the title *Re-Thinking Missions is based upon data obtained from scientifically directed research. First a corps of research workers went to India, Burma, China and Japan (the inquiry was limited to these countries) to obtain data. Then a commission of fifteen men and women, specialists in education, medicine, religion and other fields involved, was sent to these same countries to appraise the work of Christian missions in the light of this data.

Outstanding in this report is the changed attitude toward evangelization. The first missionaries inspired by the religious awakening in Europe and America about the middle of the eighteenth century were primarily evangelists. Of necessity they soon found themselves engaged in educational and medical service and the improvement of social life. Up to the present time, however, the avowed motive of all mission work has been evangelization. Such words as these, therefore, will come to some as abrupt and even startling: "We believe, then, that the time has come to set the educational and other philanthropic aspects of mission work free from organized responsibility to the work of conscious and direct evangelization. We must be willing to give largely without any preaching; to cooperate with non-Christian agencies for social improvement; and to foster the initiative of the Orient in defining the ways in which we shall be invited to help." These words we believe, embody the spirit of the commission and summarize its recommendations. "Evangelizing by living and by human service" should hereafter take primary instead of secondary place. "Ministry to the secular needs of men in the spirit of Christ is evangelism, in the right sense of the word." The future missionary will be a "learner and a co-worker with the non-Christians occupied with the same task."

In accord with this spirit detailed recommendations are worked out showing the scope of Christian missions as this group of investigators conceives it in relation to churches, education, Christian literature, medical work, agriculture, industry, women's activities. Conditions in the different countries call for different procedures. It is in cooperation with native agencies along these lines that the future of missionary activity lies. The truly Christian life speaks for itself, deeds not words become the criterion.

IN THE FIRST chapters which contain the general principles upon which the more detailed survey and recommendation are based is reading matter that will enlarge one's concept of life in relation to others and liberalize one's attitude toward religion. Indeed this is true of the whole report. We find fine appreciation of what different religions may offer each other; Christians may learn the art of meditation from Buddhists in exchange for the humanitarian activities which western Christians know so well how to practice. From Orientals we may learn how to make religion a natural thing, "a theme of ordinary conversation", not something to be hidden and partly ashamed of. One basis for the co-operation of all religions, they point out, may be found in an opportunity to unite against a common menace of all society, namely, materialism and non-religion. "At the beginning of our century of Protestant missions", we read, "Christianity found itself addressing men attached to other religions: its argument was with these religions. At present, it confronts a growing number of persons, especially among the thoughtful, critical of or hostile to all religion. Its further argument, we judge, is to be less with Islam or Hinduism or Buddhism than with materialism, secularism, naturalism."

On the other hand we find this statement as to the direction of the changed feeling towards religion among some of the more thoughtful and cultured Orientals: "There is generally speaking an openness of mind to the view that whatever is valid in morals needs something of the nature of religion to give it full effect in the human will. . . . That this religious ingredient will not be identical with any of the positive religions now offering themselves; that there is a simpler religion coming into human consciousness which might be called the religion of the modern man, the religious aspect of the coming world culture."

Many passages lead us to reflect upon the truths that are common in all religions, to see "how necessary it has become for every religion to be aware of and to stand upon the common ground of all religion". "The great religions agree", they assert, "That it is the office of religion in human affairs to make prevalent the spirit of love". The appeal throughout is for an end of sectarianism both at home and abroad in spite of the fact, (or perhaps because of it) that the commission represented seven denominations.

THE BOOK is much more than a survey of missions, as it must needs be. The reader of this report will have a much better understanding of the industrial, educational, agricultural and social conditions in these countries than many a round-the-world traveler. One feels in reading it that our friends in the Far East have common needs with ourselves, that after all "we are brothers in a common quest, and the first step is to recognize it and disarm ourselves of our prejudices".¹ The missionary of the new age must have a vision of "world unity in civilization" and of the "moral unity of the world"; in cooperation with leaders in these various countries he must guide the world culture which this group see to be emerging away from secularism and non-religion.

We find in these pages a frank admission that much of the present mission work is ineffective, totally unadapted to the changed conditions and present needs and in some cases so narrow and dogmatic as to be positively inimical to the true spirit of Christ.¹ Recognizing the immense undertaking of the uplift of the rural masses the commission finds that: "Nothing could be a more legitimate function of the Christian mission than to have a part in this labor if it were prepared to do so. At present, in our judgment, it is not prepared." These defects and weaknesses, the commission believes, should be faced and overcome; Christian missions should continue for "if there is any truth or value in religion at all, it is for all men." The great goal of the mission, however, must be the transfer of its responsibility to the hands of the nationals.

One is tempted to go much further into detail than the limits of a brief paper allow, for this report has value to all interested in world progress. Its universal spirit makes one conscious that mankind is one, that his spiritual aspirations and his needs and desires in material things differ not greatly in whatever country he lives. One is also conscious of the challenge the report makes to churchmen all over the western world. Already we hear the reverberations of the controversy it is bound to stir. To those who are still living in the nineteenth century the report seems radical in the extreme, even heretical. To those who are in touch with the rapidly changing conditions in Asia the recommendations seem necessary, even urgent. And still a few consider the report not radical enough, that it does not recognize how revolutionary the changes in Asia are.

Many both within and without the church are asking will the Christian Church as a whole become so imbued with the spirit of universality which permeates this report that it will rise in the spirit of unity to carry out its recommendations.

¹ It is interesting to note that some fifteen or more years ago, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said in answer to a question asked Him by a missionary: "It has been witnessed that when a missionary teacher tries to undermine, either with bitter antipathy or indirect references, the religions of the students in which they have been brought up, he is unconsciously undermining the religion of Christianity."

RELIGIOUS UNITY IS POSSIBLE

The following teaching is quoted from an address by 'Abdu'l-Bahá given in All Souls Unitarian Church, New York City, during His memorable visit to this country in 1912.

HIS Holiness, Bahá'u'lláh has said that if one intelligent member be selected from each of the varying religious systems, and these representatives come together seeking to investigate the reality of religion, they would establish an interreligious body before which all disputes and differences of belief could be presented for consideration and settlement. Such questions could then be weighed and viewed from the standpoint of reality and all imitations be discarded. By this method and procedure all sects, denominations and systems would become one.

Do not question the practicability of this and be not astonished. It has been accomplished and effected in Persia. In that country the various religionists have conjoined in investigating the reality and have united in complete fellowship and love. No traces of discord or differences remain among them; now affection and unity are manifest instead. They live together in harmony and accord like a single family. Antagonism and strife have passed away; love and agreement have taken the place of hatred and animosity. Furthermore, those souls who have followed Bahá'u'lláh and attained this condition of fellowship and affiliation are Muhammadans, Jews, Christians, Zoroastrians, Buddhists, Nestorians, Sunnites, Shiites and others. No discord exists among them. This is a proof of the possibility of unification among the religionists of the world through practical means. Imitations and prejudices which have held men apart have been discarded and the reality of religion envelops them in a perfect unity. When reality envelops the soul of man love is possible.

The divine purpose in religion is pure love and agreement. The Prophets of God manifested complete love for all. Each one announced the glad-tidings of His successor and each subsequent one confirmed the teachings and prophecies of the Prophet who preceded Him. There was no disagreement or variance in the reality of their teaching and mission. Discord has arisen among their followers who have lost sight of the reality and hold fast to imitations. If imitations be done away with and the radiant shining reality dawn in the souls of men love and unity must prevail. In this way humanity will be rescued from the strife and wars which have prevailed for thousands of years; dissensions will pass away and the illumination of unity dawn.

Consider how all the Prophets of God were persecuted and what hardships they experienced. His Holiness Jesus Christ endured affliction and accepted martyrdom upon the cross in order to summon mankind to unity and love. What sacrifice could be greater? He brought the religion of love and fellowship into the world. Shall we make use of it to create discord, violence and hatred among mankind?

Moses was persecuted and driven out into the desert. Abraham was banished; Muhammad took refuge in caves; the Báb was killed and Bahá'u'lláh was exiled and imprisoned forty years. Yet all of them desired fellowship and love among men. They endured hardships, suffered persecution and death for our sakes that we might be taught to love one another and be united and affiliated instead of discordant and at variance. Enough of these long centuries which have brought such vicissitudes and hardships into the world through strife and hatred.

Now in this radiant century let us try to do the Will of God that we may be rescued from these things of darkness and come forth into the boundless illumination of heaven, shunning division and welcoming the divine oneness of humanity.

THE CORNER STONE

IT WOULD be idle, however, to contend that the war, with all the losses it involved, the passions it aroused and the grievances it left behind, has solely been responsible for the unprecedented confusion into which almost every section of the civilized world is plunged at present. Is it not a fact—and this is the central idea I desire to emphasize—that the fundamental cause of this world unrest is attributable, not so much to the consequences of what must sooner or later come to be regarded as a transitory dislocation in the affairs of a continually changing world, but rather to the failure of those into whose hands the immediate destinies of peoples and nations have been committed, to adjust their system of economic and political institutions to the imperative needs of a rapidly evolving age? Are not these intermittent crises that convulse present-day society due primarily to the lamentable inability of the world's recognized leaders to read aright the signs of the times, to rid themselves once for all of their preconceived ideas and fettering creeds, and to reshape the machinery of their respective governments according to those standards that are implicit in Bahá'u'lláh's supreme declaration of the Oneness of Mankind—the chief and distinguishing feature of the Faith He proclaimed? For the principle of the Oneness of Mankind, the cornerstone of Bahá'u'lláh's world-embracing dominion, implies nothing more or less than the enforcement of His scheme for the unification of the world—the scheme to which we have already referred. “In every Dispensation,” writes ‘Abdu'l-Bahá, “the light of Divine Guidance has been focussed upon one central theme In this wondrous Revelation, this glorious century, the foundation of the Faith of God and the distinguishing feature of His Law is the consciousness of the Oneness of Mankind.”

APRIL, 1933

No. 1

“All humanity must obtain a livelihood by sweat of the brow and bodily exertion; at the same time seeking to lift the burden of others, striving to be the source of comfort to souls and facilitating the means of living. This in itself is devotion to God.”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

“BE NOT TROUBLED in poverty,” said Bahá'u'lláh, “nor confident in riches, for poverty is followed by riches and riches are followed by poverty, but to be poor in all save God is a wondrous gift.”

How much needed is such a vision in these days of economic loss and despair! The life of an individual and the life of a nation are both subject to this law of rhythm. Nothing is enduring. Continuous prosperity is no more guaranteed to the individual than continuous sunshine is to the fields and flowers. Above all, we need to realize that nothing can bulwark us against misfortune, not even a large bank account.

There is nothing more fallacious in giving one a sense of security against the universe than a huge fortune. So much security, so much ease of living does this bring the individual that there appears to be no need of considering any other power in the universe. The limitless wealth that flows from capital, more even than can be consumed in personal needs, seems a fortress as stalwart as the Rock of Gibraltar. And yet in recent times we have seen such financial fortresses crumble into ruins before the attack of new economic forces as unexpected as they are irresistible in their destructive violence.

It is at such times as this that one feels the need of turning to a Higher Power. Now, if never before, we realize that “God is All-possessing.” That all existence flows through His Hands. That nothing is owned by man, nothing is guaranteed to man, nothing can be grasped and seized and permanently held by man.

THE ORIENT has never lost the sense of close dependence upon that Infinite Power which guides the destinies not only of this planet but of the universe. A feeling of reverence and submission to this Power deeply permeates the life of Orientals, giving them patience in misfortune and humility in periods of success and prosperity.

The Bahá'í Movement will have the effect upon the Western world of turning it back again to that spiritual sense of life which at one time characterized Christianity. Piety in the best sense of the word—a realization of the power of God and submission to the will of God—will be restored as a wholesome cleansing agent to life. Without this feeling of submission to the Infinite, misfortune becomes a bitterness, a rancor that gnaws the vitals and leads to insanity or suicide. But under the inspiration of true religion life can be lived nobly whether in poverty or wealth, whether in sickness or health, whether in misfortune or prosperity.

A striking example of how man can transcend circumstances by the power of the spirit is presented in the life of a Bahá'í whom I knew for years—a successful business man whose work had wide ramifications over the country, a man of personality and power. There came, however, a financial reverse. At the age of seventy he was left with nothing. On top of this came a paralytic stroke which left him an invalid utterly dependent both for support and care upon his friends. Yet in the one year that was left to him of life—a life of absolute poverty and comparative invalidism—all his friends witnessed in Mr. R—a transcendent quality of character, a nobility of soul, an added grandeur which called forth more respect and reverence for him even than had his prior successful life of financial power and humanitarian service. What but a deep spiritual sense could have so enabled this man to transcend events?

ANOTHER more brightening thought to which we may turn from the collapse of property and income is the realization that true wealth lies not in income or accumulated property, but in the ability of the individual to express himself creatively. Those who have courage, will power, initiative, trained ability, and power of accomodating themselves to circumstance,—such carry with them their fortune. All that has availed them to succeed in the past still resides with them. Their capacity to wrest a living from the universe is undiminished. With the application of ingenuity to the dilemma, some way can always be found of getting along, of existing until times are better and then again rising with the general tide of prosperity. For the comforting thought given by Bahá'u-lláh, is that just as wealth is followed by poverty, so is poverty followed by wealth.

Perhaps the most important lesson to be learned in this economic depression is that of frugality. Americans have been living in such a consciousness of prosperity for years that they have formed very extravagant habits. To be seen to practice economy and frugality has not seemed the commendable thing. On the contrary, lavish expenditure for high standards of living, fine clothes, and new accoutrements of the home,—these were what everyone was seeking to demonstrate. Extravagance was the rule of the day. Many were living beyond their income. It even seemed to appear that lavish expenditure was the road to universal prosperity, according to the doctrine newly evolved that the more the individual spent the greater the production and general prosperity that would ensue.

What a remarkable transformation has taken place in the consciousness of the American people! Just the opposite state of mind now exists. People refrain from buying anything unless they are in absolute need of it. They wear their old clothes, use their old automobile, content themselves with existing equipment, practice economy in every way possible. And because everybody is doing it no one feels ashamed. Thus frugality, which was a disgrace at the hey-day of our prosperity, now appears a virtue and is being practiced from necessity by every class in every section of the country.

What is the virtue of frugality? It is this—that it tends to counteract the incessant and insatiable striving for the accumulation of material things and enjoyments. Once the individual starts on the road of accumulation of mere things, there is no end to the strain and effort to enrich himself and better his standard of living. This striving has a certain definite advantage in the way of progress, both of the individual and of society. On the other hand, when carried to excess it has one deep-seated fault which is the greatest weakness in the structure of American civilization. That fault is the incessant strain of unnatural and excessive effort. There is a limit to the strength of every individual; but greed for prosperity knows no limits and puts a pressure upon the individual which tends to force him beyond his powers.

The only thing that can put a stop to this incessant and agonizing striving after wealth is the habit of economy, of strict frugality, and of contentment with simple living.

The psychology of contentment, of simplicity, of moderation of desire lies at the heart of every great religion. It was definitely the basis of Buddhism. It was implied throughout the teachings of Christ and by example in His own life and in the lives of His apostles. It runs through all the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá and was demonstrated in their lives.

It is NOT our personal vicissitudes, however, that should most concern us at this time of universal disaster. What should most occupy our thoughts, our intelligence, our will power is the need of a solution for all humanity; the need of an organization for the world such as will prevent this needless suffering in the future. If we care only for our own private fortunes our efforts will have but ephemeral consequences; but if we concern ourselves with the destiny of humanity all that we achieve during our lifetime will go on producing beneficent effects for decades, for centuries perhaps.

The very nature of the misfortunes which engulf people today of every class and of every race call forth all that is generous in human nature. Now is the time, if never before, to practice humanitarianism on a universal scale. Now is the time not only to devote ourselves to private charity but to exert ourselves to the utmost for the building up of noble institutions which shall insure prosperity and happiness to the human race in future epochs.

It is indeed an inspiration to find at hand such a universal Cause as the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, promising as it does an infinite variety of benefits to humanity: economic stability, political tranquility, the realization of brotherhood and world unity, and the growth of a great universal civilization which shall confer its blessings uniformly upon all mankind. Effort put into the spread of this marvelous Movement is a spiritual capital well invested, an endowment the income from which will bless future ages.

DALE S. COLE

"The Law of God is a Collective Center which unites various peoples, nativities, tongues and opinions. All find shelter in its protection and become attracted by it . . . the Manifestation of God and the Law of God accomplish unity."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

MAN is subject to several kinds of law. There are the great laws of the physical universe; gravity, the flow of time, the behavior of the ether.

There are those which have to do with human institutions—such as the law of supply and demand, and of diminishing returns.

Then there are the intricate codes imposed by man himself to regulate his conduct with reference to his fellows in society.

There are the moral laws written and unwritten, which say that this is right and that is wrong. These are sanctions arrived at from experience.

The fifth class of laws are those God-given regulations for the guidance of mankind.

We live under the dominion of natural law without protest because it is natural to do so and we can not escape the operation of these laws even though we try.

However much we may seek to manipulate at times the economic laws, we recognize their sovereignty and the benefits of trying to live in accordance with them instead of against them.

The third and fourth classes of laws, those imposed upon man by himself are theoretically based upon the idea that those things which are the best for the greatest number are just and equitable. Human relationships are so numerous and varied that the body of the law has become a very extensive library indeed.

It is not surprising that we have good laws and bad; that some meet general approval and some do not and that individuals may feel rebellious against some of them. But, in general, we obey our laws, not necessarily because we want to, but either because we realize that it is best to do so or through fear of punishment.

Few there be who obey our laws from a sense of duty to mankind's best interests. We may dimly realize that general obedience to laws serves these best interests—but it is not a dominant idea.

Humanity, as a unit, a whole, is not very real to us. It is a big conception and our lives, today, have to do mostly with little things. We do not think often in general terms, rather how will this or that affect me and mine—not how will it affect everyone, nationally and internationally.

Running through all consideration of law and the question of obedience is the psychological phenomenon that restraint breeds a tendency to disobedience in human beings. Tell a lad he cannot do a thing and that thing becomes so desirable that he may think nothing of disobeying an admonition. There is an element of thrill and relish in disobedience. Tell a nation they cannot have intoxicating beverages and resentment is aroused even though such prohibition was approved as a beneficial wartime measure.

There is one immutable law which cannot be disobeyed—this is the law of change. Human institutions crumble and human laws become outgrown and obsolete. This condition has existed at various times in the past and marked the decline of peoples and nations. Civilizations rise and fall and from the debris of the old springs a new era of human progress. Destruction precedes reconstruction. The acorn gives up its identity that the oak may grow into a mighty tree.

HUMANITY has gone through successive cycles tending always to material advancement until a high degree of achievement in this sphere has been attained.

But it is not enough. It is being realized, as never before, that something very essential is lacking in the scheme of life which we have been following.

This essential is obedience to God's Law for this enlightened age. With the realization that this obedience is fundamental to further progress, a new conception comes into our consciousness.

Obedience is a tremendous privilege, not a mere act of voluntary or involuntary compliance and submission. It is not resignation to a stronger force, rather is it aligning one's efforts with this force. It is not the loss of liberty of action, rather is it contributing to an action which is greater, more far reaching and more widespread. It is not the surrendering of one's prerogatives, rather is it sharing in tremendously greater ones.

There is a great and profound difference between obeying because we have to, or obeying because we will benefit, and obeying because we feel that it is a privilege to merge our small individual increment of influence to that great integrated force potential in the collective, universal obedience to God's Divine Law.

There are many unwritten laws which are strong and binding because they are generally accepted as good and are upheld by the power of concerted thought, feeling and action. We do not appraise correctly this latent force. Should everyone, or a majority, or even a very large number obey God's Law there would result mighty and beneficent events in this troubled arena of human activity.

If we obey because we feel it a privilege to do so there cannot be the slightest resentment. There can be no resentment in our hearts because there will be nothing to resent. Our will will be non-existent, merged in that of God. Where there is only one will operative there can be no counter-currents, no whirlpools or eddies of confusion and misunderstanding.

IT MUST be appreciated that God's Law applies not only to you and me and to our nation, but it guides all peoples and all nations and consequently is universal.

Perhaps we may not understand it, may not be able to grasp the great significances. Perhaps some details of its operation may not be clear, veiled for the present in the immensity of its possibilities. But these quite human limitations detract not one whit from its effectiveness.

God's Law deals with humanity and the world as a whole. We are not accustomed to such magnitudes and they may stagger us. But we are not responsible for its justification—that can safely be left in God's hands. We are only responsible for our own obedience, and even that is not really a responsibility but a great bounty and privilege, a privilege which is a boon, not a deterrent; a privilege which is a reward not a punishment; a privilege which is positive, not negative; a privilege which is a help and not a handicap; a privilege which is dynamic and not static; a privilege which is spiritual and not material.

The Divine Law will temper and shape human laws so that we can without confusion "render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's."

OBEDIENCE to God's Law is the greatest privilege ever offered

* Baha'u'llah in the "Tablet of Ahmad."

mankind. It is not mandatory: "Who so desires let him turn away from this counsel, but who so desires let him choose the path to his Lord."*

This conception of obedience as being a privilege is one of the distinguishing features of the Bahá'í Revelation. If we obey because we feel it is a privilege to do so, not because it is expedient, not because it is convenient, not because it is pleasant, not because of hope of reward or fear of punishment—but because we are appreciative of the privilege, then we become instruments through which the Law of God may become operative in its fullness, with unimaginable benefit to mankind.

When we obey unreservedly and joyously the Law of God we "charge the things we fashion" with a breath of the spiritual dynamic, which is the only power of sufficient potency to make effective the principle of the Oneness of Mankind—that foundation upon which the glorious future of humanity will be erected in accordance with the Law of God for this day as given to us by Bahá'u'lláh.

"The Manifestation of God is a perfect example of real obedience . . . We must look to God for all we desire, all we attain. The Will of God must outwork its purposes in us. Our human will must be laid down in sacrifice and love. A pupil must submit entirely to the will of the teacher. This is true sacrifice, true obedience. When you really love God you will be willing to sacrifice everything and submit yourself entirely to His will."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

O B E D I E N C E

DEVOTION to God involves implicit obedience to His revealed commands even when the reason for these commands is not understood. The sailor implicitly obeys his captain's orders even when he does not know the reason for them, but his acceptance of authority is not blind. He knows full well that the captain has served a thorough probation, and given ample proofs of competence as a navigator. Were it not so, he would be foolish indeed to serve under him. So the Bahá'í must implicitly obey the Captain of his Salvation, but he will be foolish indeed if he has not first ascertained that this Captain has given ample proofs of trustworthiness. Having received such proofs, however, to refuse obedience would be even greater folly, for only by intelligent and open-eyed obedience to the wise master can we reap the benefits of his wisdom, and acquire this wisdom for ourselves. Be the captain never so wise, if none of the crew obey him how shall the ship reach its port or the sailors learn the art of navigation? Christ clearly pointed out that obedience is the path of knowledge. He said:

"My doctrine is not mine, but His that sent me. If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."—St. John 7:16,17.

So Bahá'u'lláh says:

"Faith in God, and the knowledge of Him, cannot be fully attained except . . . by practicing all that He hath commanded and all that is revealed in the Book from the Pen of Glory."—Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh.

Implicit obedience is not a popular virtue in these democratic days, and indeed entire submission to the will of any mere man would be disastrous. But the Unity of Humanity can be attained only by complete harmony of each and all with the Divine Will. Unless that Will be clearly revealed, and men abandon all other leaders and obey the Divine Messenger, then conflict and strife will go on, and men will continue to oppose each other, to devote a large part of their energy to frustrating the efforts of their brother men instead of working harmoniously together for the Glory of God and the common good.

LETTERS HOME

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

In her world travels in behalf of The Bahá'í Movement the author takes time to write to friends impressions derived from her varied experiences. These "Letters Home" we have been privileged to present to the readers of the Bahá'í Magazine at different times during the past year. The first "letter" appeared in the January, 1932 number, and described the author's visit to Nikko and other places in Japan. The April number gave some of her impressions of China; the December issue contained an interesting description of her contacts with the Maoris of New Zealand; and the January number her observations while traveling through India. Last month appeared the first installment in a new series on her fascinating material and spiritual experiences in Persia. Herein she describes certain historic points and principles "which are essential to a full understanding of the spirit animating the followers of the Báb."

IN AN hour I must be on the platform and I am not even dressed, but I have an irresistible urge to start this promised letter to you; for once I have started a thing I write until it is finished; and the stories of Persia within me are struggling to be told.

If ever I undertook to write anything formal on Persia I would be nonplussed as to whether I should call it "White Rooms," "Dream Gardens," or "Mud Fences." For this country is one astounding and fascinating contradiction. The ugliest thing on earth, a mud fence, encloses the most beautiful, a Persian garden; the (to us) shocking dislocation of taste, a white room, houses the matchless design of a Persian carpet; in an old ramshackle, tumble-down bazar one finds the loveliest things—inlay and lacquer from Shiráz, brass or silver from Isfáhán, silk and prints from Yazd, the turquoise tiles and pottery of Hamadán, embroideries and rich brocades—all divinely beautiful.

God has conferred upon Persia an unquenchable spirit; to whatever depths she may descend she carries with her a mysterious redemptive power. Within the brief confines of history she has given to the world three Manifestations¹ of God: Zarathrustra, the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh. In less than a hundred years after the coming of the Promised One² profound, yes, fundamental changes, are wiping away the obvious evidences of her fanaticism, her cruelty, her ignorance and her degradation, and are preparing her not slowly, but with magical rapidity, for an era of enlightenment, urbanity and fluent self-expression.

To the Bahá'í the most venerated spots are not those where the two Manifestations of our Faith lie buried³ but Shiráz in Persia, and Baghdád in Iráq where their respective missions were revealed. Surely no other place than Shiráz on Persian soil is more sacred to us than the Shrine at Sheik Tabarsi where first "The Dawn-Breakers" of our Revelation gave "the last full measure of devotion," entrusted to history her most lustrous and heroic page, and "rapt in holy ecstasy, writ with their life-blood upon the tablet of the world the verses of God's Divine Unity."

Tihrán, the birthplace of Bahá'u'lláh, is indeed a Holy City, and Nur, His family seat, but we are told to reverence Baghdád especially in His commemoration.

The names of those exalted beings who happily wooed death and were wedded to the Station of self-sacrifice in the Pathway of God have left the overwhelming evidence of their sanctity and devotion forever enshrined within the humble little memorial at Sheik Tabarsi.

AS WE were quitting Khurásán I recalled how Mulla Husayn and his small but valiant band of followers, encamped under the "Black Standards," awaited Divine Guidance and then went down the rocky defiles into Mázindarán—their Karbilá.

It seems a thousand pities that only the special student of history or comparative religion should know those events and episodes in the great religions of the world that, through the centuries, have made their adherents ready to die for them.

Certainly one of the outstanding events of secular as well as of religious history was the martyrdom of the younger son of Fatimah (the only daughter and the only child of Muhammad) the Imam Husayn.

All sects of Muhammadans agree that the Prophet informally appointed His cousin and son-in-law Ali, together with His lineal descendants, to succeed Him. But since the words of the Prophet were oral and traditional, since they were not written, a group of His followers after His death feeling that Muhammad has been too much swayed by His affection for His family, and fearing their influence, at once swept aside His command and elected those democratically—the Caliphs—who were to act as defenders and custodians of His Faith.

Ali, finally, after three predecessors had been chosen, was elected Caliph. His tempestuous career ended with his murder, his older son Hasan, according to the explicit utterance of Muhammad, succeeding him as the second Imam. Ali was the first Imam and the fourth Caliph.

Hasan was poisoned by order of Mu'aviyah, leader of the opposing party, and when some years later his younger brother who had now returned to Arabia was summoned to send his allegiance to the newly elected Caliph, an office not provided for by Muhammad, he quite deliberately and with the sublime intent of giving his life in obedience to his Grandfather's behest set out to Mesopotamia with seventy-two of his followers there to offer up his soul for the great principle of the Imamate.

For Imam means Guardian and the Imamate alone could have protected the Cause of Muhammad from schism, sectarianism and strife. If, in the Qur'án, Muhammad had written this succession as an indubitable part of His Teaching; if His followers were constrained to recognize one authorized person to whom they must give allegiance there could, of course, never be any division, any disunity, for division or challenge of the explicit written word of the Founder would at once put them outside His Faith; so there could be no split within it.

The sincere follower of every religion must see that the weakness of His Faith lies in this fact: that it has no authoritative interpreter, none to whom the faithful can turn as representing the authentic successor of its Founder.

THE statement of Jesus concerning Peter is subject to half a dozen interpretations including the charge of interpolation in the Gospel, and the great majority of Christians reject His statement as establishing any unchallengeable succession or as conferring the right of interpreting His words. Nobody, whom all alike will accept, can tell us what He really meant. We have in Christendom three hundred and fifty-two sects, each insisting that Jesus meant a different thing. And to whatever degree these sects may protest against succession and interpretation, each has arrogated to itself the letter, excluding any who dare question its interpretation, and hands down through succeeding generations its own decision and decree concerning the Teaching of our Lord. So that every sect is practicing interpretation and succession however much it may deny it.

If Jesus, Muhammad, or the Founder of any other religion, had written an unassailable document in which He specifically named an individual, together with his successors, and said to His followers, "What these say I meant, you must accept as what I did mean; to reject him or them is to repudiate me;" we see, with perfect clarity, that the rivalries, misunderstandings and bloodshed promoted in the name of religion would have been absolutely impossible.

It was to defend this great principle of an Interpreter, a Guardian, a Rallying Centre which would obviate schism, that the Imam Husayn became a voluntary martyr.

As he neared Kufih, the great Islamic stronghold where his father had been martyred, he was informed that an army of twenty thousand was marching out against him. He deflected his course to the then small settlement of Karbilá, and there his little band was practically annihilated and he became the great redemptive figure of Shi'a Islám.

Three times before Shimr, his murderer, dispatched him, he cried to those assembled, "Is there any who will assist me?" extending to them their last opportunity for submission and obedience to the request and desire of Muhammad.

On several occasions Mulla Husayn referred to Sheik Tabarsi as Karbilá. Those who cast in their lot with him had no illusions as to the outcome of their enterprise. They, too, deliberately sacrificed their lives to prove to a negligent and vicious world the Reality of that One in Whose Pathway suffering was a joy and death a triumph.

It is a long time since, at the beginning of my letter, I mentioned the Báb'ul-Báb's¹ descent into Mázin-darán; but an understanding of the historic points and principles to which I have been referring are essential to a full understanding of the Báb.

the spirit animating the followers

For many years in those strange hallucinations that come with encroaching sleep, in reveries, and in dreams, I have seen, not a score of times but a hundred times or more those now familiar mountain passes that wind down into Mázin-darán. Once when we were driving in California I remember telling you that I had seen that road before, although it was the first time I had traversed it. But it was not until I traveled from Amiriyyih to Shahid (Ali Abad) that a profound inner delight and agitation coupled with scene after scene of my well-remembered fantasy assured me that this was the place of my visions. Suddenly we shot between high stone cliffs that the sun would only penetrate for half an hour at noonday, and the mysterious sense of unreality that seized me brought back the thought of heavy lids and drowsiness; and then a stabbing joy of recollection. To see luxuriant verdure again—Mázin-darán is sub-tropical after the starved, stark mountains of Khurásán—added to my sense of unreality. Being, as you have often said, a realist, I am not in the least addicted to this sort of thing, which made it all the stranger.

RUSSIA'S CULTURAL CONTRIBUTION TO BAHÁ'ISM

The author, well known as a Bahá'í traveling teacher and lecturer, here relates the story of the Russian poet who gave to the world three celebrated writings about the Bahá'í Teachings. Miss Root has succeeded in giving us a marvelous bit of history and a story of surpassing interest. The second part will follow next month.

MRS. ISABEL GRINEVSKY, a Russian poet in Lenin-grad, gave a great impetus to the Bahá'í Movement and to world art in her three celebrated writings, the two dramas, "Báb" and "Bahá'u'lláh", and a narrative called "A Journey in the Countries of the Sun". The last named is an account of her visit to 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 1911 when He was in Ramleh, Egypt. While the last is in prose it has verses introduced so that we might almost say that the three form a trilogy in poetic form presenting the new universal religion of the oneness of mankind proclaimed by those three heavenly personages, the Báb the Fore-runner, Bahá'u'lláh the Revealer of the Word and 'Abdu'l-Bahá the Center of the Covenant of the Bahá'í Movement.

From the point of view of art the dramas rank high. Russian critics affirm that these works have proclaimed their author a poet of the first order. One of her countrymen, Mr. Wesselitzky, President of the Foreign Press Association of London, said that he read the drama "Báb" on a railway train when he was returning to England from Russia in August, 1905. His own words were: "I was at once attracted by the rare combination of philosophical thought with a great power of expression, beauty, imagery, and harmony of verse. I keenly felt the delight of reading a new, great poem and discovering a new first-rate poet. I should have felt so on broad, general grounds from whatever country the poet came! However, my joy was intensified by the fact that the poem had been written in my own language and that the author was a country-woman of mine."

This article purports to give a little history of these works, for 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself praised these dramas. (I do not know that He saw the narrative.) When He held the manuscript of the drama "Bahá'u'lláh" in His hands, He blessed it and prophesied to the author that these two dramas would be played in Tíhrán!

The drama "Báb" was published in May, 1903, and was played in one of the principal theatres in St. Petersburg in January, 1904. It was this drama that first brought to Count Leo Tolstoy a knowledge of the Bahá'í teachings. He read the book and at once wrote to Mrs. Grinevsky his appreciation of her great drama and his sympathy with the Bahá'í Movement; the letter was printed in the Russian press and the poet has his letter in her possession now.

I HAVE before me as I write a clipping from the "Herald" of January, 1904: "The play Báb appeared in May of last year, 1903, the most inconvenient time for the appearance of a book. Nevertheless the pens of the critics began to move in the journals and magazines in order to compose hymn-songs of praise to the author. Moreover an enlightened Persian society sent her an inspired letter of thanks; and above all, Mrs. Isabel Grinevsky had the spiritual satisfaction that among those who eulogized her drama was the lion of contemporary Russian literature, Leo Tolstoy. The impression was such that it made us think that amidst the statists representing the Persian throngs were real Persians; it seemed as if the scene exhaled the perfume of the roses of Shiraz!"

Mr. Wesselitsky, whom I mentioned earlier in this story, gave a lecture in London in 1907 about this drama and his speech was afterwards published in pamphlets in English and French.* I quote two paragraphs: "Amidst the sorrows of disastrous war and those dreadful inner troubles, that book "Báb" was my only happy impression, and it remains since a permanent source of joy and comfort as a manifest proof of the vitality of Russia and its creative genius.

"The romantic side of this drama, too, is quite original. The plot is not based on adultery as in French drama and not on seduction as in 'Faust', but on renouncement and self-sacrifice. The romantic side of the Báb is closely allied with the metaphysical-ethical side. The drama has so much of the latter that every act may seem to be a sermon and the drama itself a suite of sermons. Yet all that preaching is relieved by genuine enthusiasm, eloquence of the heart and real passion. The conflict in the soul of the hero is not between passion and reason, but between two passions—human love and love divine—the latter being stronger and more ardent than the former. It is that manifestation of the power of the higher aims in the heart of man which is the chief feature of this book and the secret of its irresistible charm."

CELEBRATING the decade of the first performance of "Báb" in January, 1914, Mrs. Grinevsky gave a great conference on the drama in one of the most beautiful concert halls of Leningrad. The "St. Petersburg Informations Paper" gives the event a long review praising the author and her reading of selections from the poem and her address. One paragraph particularly I remember: "As a characteristic of the frame of mind of the poetess during the creation of her poem, the following words of her own may serve as an illustration: 'A well known professor told me that the name of my poem, "Báb" does not sound well to the ears of Russians. I answered that the names of the people who preached the ideals of love, paying for those ideals with their lives, must sound well to all those who have ears to hear. All noble ideals are so few in these days that it would be worth while to renew the performance of "Báb" in order to awaken the remembrance of these ideals. We, the people of the West, rise too late, we do not know the East where the sun shines!" "

The play was presented again in the Folk Theater in Leningrad in April, 1917, after the Russian Revolution. People came even from Moscow and Turkestan to see it. Diplomats from foreign countries were in the audience; the ambassador from China was one. A second edition of the drama had been published in 1916, and these books were sold at the entrance of the theater; many spectators sat with the open books in their hands during this performance. It is a long drama in five acts, equal in the number of verses to "Don Carlos" of Schiller and "Cromwell" of Victor Hugo.

WHEN I wrote asking Mrs. Grinevsky about these dramas she sent me several letters. I should state that she has written many works along different lines of thought and lectured on many subjects in Russia, and had often spoken in conferences on these two dramas, "Báb" and "Bahá'u'l-láh." She was a member of the former Philosophic Society of the University, an active member of the former Oriental Society, and is a member of the present Bibliological Society and several literary societies and unions. She said that before she wrote her poem "Báb", the Russian public generally had not heard much about the Bahá'í Movement. She herself knew about it only from reading. The critics thought she had traveled much in Persia, she was so well informed about the life there, but as a matter of fact she had not been in Irán. She had heard that some Bahá'í believers from Persia had been driven out of their land into Turkey and India, and that some had come to Turkestan and were residing in the cities of Táshkand, Ishqabád and Mary and in the city of Báku in the Caucasus.

"Still, I thought", she says, "these believers in the Báb now called Bahá'ís had mingled with other nations, and perhaps had ceased to exist as a religious entity. The description of Professor Edward G. Browne seemed to me a fairy tale. How astonished I was when, after my drama 'Báb' made its appearance in 1903, I received one day a letter with the following address: 'To the Author of the book "Báb", Mrs. Isabel Grinevsky in St. Petersburg.' Neither street nor number of the house was marked, yet thanks to the careful postal authorities, that letter though unregistered, reached me safely."

Both the handwriting and signature proved unknown but she relates: "That letter was from Ali-Akber Mamedhanly from Báku who wrote that he was a believer in the Báb, that he had read in the News of Báku about my poem, the account of which had interested him greatly and that he would like to get the book. He asked that if he found any mistakes against the Teachings of the Báb, could he perhaps point them out? It was like a star falling from heaven at my feet! As if I had found a precious stone where I had not expected to find one."

The book was mailed to him at once and she explained to that Bahá'í that she had had to deviate just a little from a few of the historical facts for the sake of a dramatic whole. She added: "I wrote for a public all unprepared to hear moral, religious and philosophical ideas from the stage; it was accustomed to lighter plays, not a theme about God, of religion, especially about the conception of a new religion or rather, I would say religion renewed!"

The Bahá'í from Báku politely replied to Mrs. Grinevsky's letter as follows: "The impression which I received in reading your drama was such that I could not see any mistakes of any kind, even though I read it many times. We read it in the Bahá'í Assembly (meeting) and the believers send you sincerest thanks. They feel sure that the literary world will soon unite in a general solemnizing of your creative powers."

She said that he also wrote beautifully about the Bahá'í life in Caucasus stating among other points: "We live here cherishing the tenets for which our grandfathers, fathers and brothers shed their blood maintaining the chief principles: pardon, patience and love to mankind." Mrs. Grinevsky said that these letters were written in Russian and showed that the Bahá'ís were very enlightened in literature and science. She also added: "It was such a joy to me to find that there are in the world people so congenial to me in feeling and in vision. I loved with my soul those spiritual people who, just like the people in my drama, were holding those principles of pardon, patience and love to all mankind, holding them not as a dead dogma but as a living truth!"

"Unity is love. It cannot be established without love. Therefore, try as far as possible to be filled with love . . . Love draws us in friendship to the people of every race and religion. He is a Bahá'í, . . . from whom we breathe the fragrance of this love again. The highest love is independent of any personal advantages which we may draw from the love of the friend. If you love truly, your love for your friend will continue even if he treats you ill."

GLIMPSES OF THE NEW WORLD ORDER

Notes on a Visit to Haifa and 'Akká

MABEL AND SYLVIA PAINE

"We cannot conceive a star without light, a tree without fruit. If we claim to be followers of Light, we must diffuse the Light through our actions. The name will not be sufficient. . . . The Bahá'í must see that his words and deeds reflect the Glory of God."
—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

In the first installment of these "Diary Notes" of a visit to Haifa and 'Akká, published last month, the authors told of their arrival at Haifa and of their meeting with Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause; with Bahiyyih Khanum, the sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and other members of His family, and of their conversations with them concerning Him. The present installment definitely concerns a visit to 'Akká' the old Prison quarters where Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá and seventy followers were incarcerated with unspeakable hardships and sufferings.

SATURDAY, November fourteenth. Today at luncheon the subject of the divinity of Christ came up. This phrase, Shoghi Effendi pointed out, is ambiguous. If it means God incarnate it is unscientific. A truer word is Manifestation. This word implies the true Trinity, which consists of God, Whom we may compare to the Sun; the Prophet,—as Christ, Moses, Muhammad, Bahá'u'lláh—who is like a perfect mirror catching the sun's rays and reflecting even its disc; and the Holy Spirit, which may be compared to the sun's rays connecting sun and mirror.

In the afternoon at tea with the ladies the talk was about bringing up children. One of the ladies counselled, "Don't force them to take a certain course, however praiseworthy and desirable, but take the stones out of that path, make it as easy for them as you can." She told how her children were taught to pray. She didn't tell them to pray, but they saw and heard her pray. One day when she was praying her little boy asked what she was doing. She told him she was talking to God, asking Him to help them to be good. After a day or two he said he would like to talk with God.

She said she thought what was needed, even more than people to talk and write about the Bahá'í teachings was people to live them. "How sad 'Abdu'l-Bahá was," she added, "when He heard of one who professed to be a Bahá'í yet did not live in the right way. She told of a Persian Bahá'í who spoke rudely to his wife. His little son noticed this and one day remarked to him, "You can't be a Bahá'í, or you wouldn't speak in that way."

Another story she told was of a young Bahá'í in Persia to whom the cashier in a bank gave by mistake fifty pounds too much. As soon as the young man discovered the mistake he returned the money. The bank official was so much impressed that he asked the young man what his religion was.

No one who witnessed the life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá could doubt that the Bahá'í faith is first of all the noble living of life. Still, the memory of His teachings, reinforced by His life of loving service, remains in Haifa. The other day this conversation was overheard in a Haifa shop. A woman came in to make a purchase and asked the storekeeper how he was getting along.

"Just well enough," he replied, "to keep soul and body together. But I am contented. Life is short and happiness is not dependent on having many material things. Abbas Effendi* used to tell us so and make us realize it."

"Yes," answered the woman, "it seems to me Abbas Effendi is still living with us. His body passed away but His life and influence still go on among us."

A Christian came to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house shortly after His passing. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's life, he said, impressed him more profoundly than did the life of Christ. He told his bishop this and the bishop reproved him for not being more loyal to Christ. He replied that it was simply that Christ's life was further removed and so did not touch him so closely. The quality of life he believed was the same.

One of the ladies described the evening when 'Abdu'l-Bahá returned to Haifa after His long journey through Europe and America in 1912. When the ship anchored almost everyone in Haifa was down at the water's edge to greet Him, although people had been requested not to come because He was so very tired. Some went aboard the ship, lifted Him in their arms and carried Him to the small boat for landing.

FRIDAY, November thirteenth. Today at luncheon the subject of institutions was discussed. Any idea or movement, Shoghi Effendi said, needs an institution. For instance educational ideas must be carried out in schools, social and political movements find expression in institutions. Inherently an institution is a necessary and a good thing. The trouble creeps in when institutions, with the lapse of time, become corrupt. Then they need to be renewed.

In the same way any movement needs a creed. A creed is not a bad thing. What is bad is when men add non-essentials to a creed.

The supposed quotation from 'Abdu'l-Bahá that the Bahá'í Cause is not an organization should read, "You cannot limit the Bahá'í Cause to an organization." The Bahá'í Cause must be organized just as everything must be. Institutions are necessary. All institutions now are decadent, but without institutions we should have nothing but anarchy. Bahá'is regard institutions not as ends, but as means.

MONDAY, November sixteenth. Late this morning we drove in an automobile the nine miles drive around the edge of the Bay of 'Akká to the vicinity of 'Akká.

'Akká, the ancient fortress and prison city is a scene of some of the greatest tests as well as triumphs of the little group of leaders of the Bahá'í Cause in its early days. Here seventy Bahá'ís, exiles from their native land, were sent by the Sultan of the Ottoman Empire in the hopes that this greatest prison would prove to be the end of the leaders and the religious faith which they were spreading. Vermin-infested, filthy in the extreme, it was a place where the worst criminals were sent to languish and die. Strangely enough the little band of Bahá'ís after living herded together in an unspeakably filthy room in the prison for two years, suffering from malaria, as well as insufficient food and water, were given more liberties. Instead of being forgotten, the Cause for which they were sacrificing their freedom spread.

* The name by which 'Abdu'l-Baha was known in Palestine.

The road lay along the sandy beach by the sea. The day was clear and it was an especially impressive experience to ride on the sand with the sparkling blue sea on the left, past Arab fishermen drawing their nets, travelers on donkeys and camels as well as in motor cars. The white buildings of the ancient city of 'Akká gleamed out as our journey's goal. 'Akká was Napoleon's goal when he came with his army from Egypt. He hoped to make it the gateway to conquering the Near East, but found it instead an insurmountable obstacle which turned him back.

We had left Mount Carmel, where the Jewish prophets and Jesus walked, and ahead of us in the far distance we could see the snowcapped mountains of Lebanon. Soon we arrived at the gates of the city of 'Akká. At one time there were three walls around the city and the gates were closed at sundown. Although now the entrance to the city is open at all times, we noticed as we went in the "needle's eye" a small opening in the wall beside the main gate about five feet high. Late travelers could enter through this opening and their camels, too, if unloaded, could get in by a process of kneeling and squirming through. The streets of 'Akká are narrow and dirty, paved with worn stones and filled with men and women, mostly in Oriental garb, and children playing and fighting or going to the bakery with enormous flat trays filled with loaves of bread of a tannish hue, looking something like our pancakes. The children's clothes, the streets and bread all shade into a light greyish tan hue and perhaps it is just as well not to be too germ-conscious.

"In every dispensation the command of friendship and the law of love have been revealed, but it has been circumscribed within the circle of the believing friends and not with contrary enemies. Praise be to God that in this wonderful cycle the laws of God are not confined within any limitations, neither must they be exercised toward a special community to the exclusion of another. He hath commanded all the friends to show love, friendship, amity and kindness to all the people of the world."

A GREAT NEW SERMON IN STONE

RUTH J. MOFFETT

The following conversation takes place within the Bahá'í Temple and its Foundation Hall at Wilmette, Illinois, on the shores of Lake Michigan.

The characters are members of a family group that have stopped to view the Temple and learn about its meaning.

A teacher of the Bahá'í Cause comes forward to meet the group.

Barbara: I do wish you would tell us something of the meaning of it all.

Teacher: It would be stimulating to follow the history of the growth and development of this lofty conception, which architects claim will far surpass even the Taj Mahal in beauty and ideals, when completed. The Taj is, you know, the lovely symbol of a beautiful earthly love. This Temple is the exquisitely beautiful symbol of a Divine Love. All mankind is embraced in that Divine Love in a spirit of unity and universality, such as the world has never known before. Man may come to a desire to know God by means of any one of the nine pathways represented by the nine doors to this temple. But they merge together in the worship of the one True God, under this great dome, symbolizing light, glory and splendor. The meeting of the ribs in the spire of light at the peak above your heads symbolizes the uniting of the arms of all the religious thought of the world in prayer.

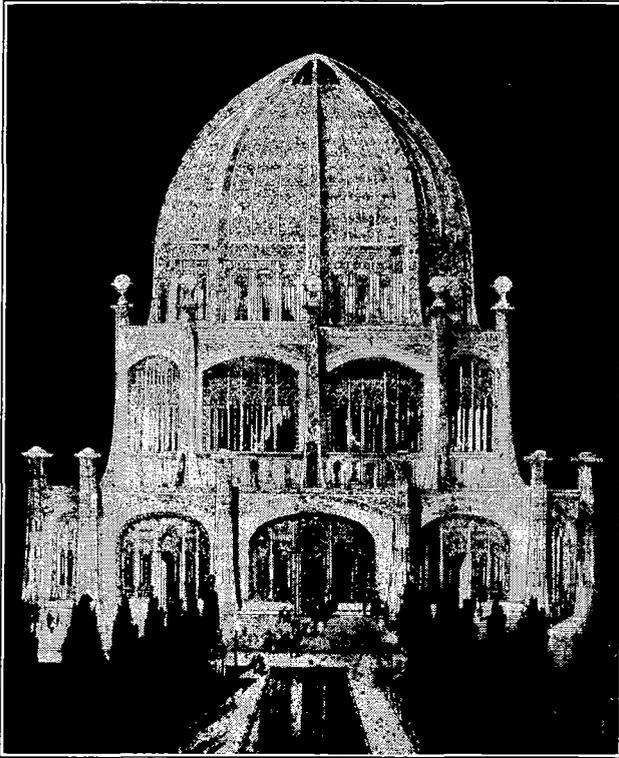

This lofty conception thus put in concrete form cannot help but engage the attention of the responsible leaders of the people and nations of the world.

(They all stand under the magnificent dome gazing upward speechless.)

Robert: (breaking the silence). In the general trend of recent events with their dark and menacing outlook, a universal House of Worship such as this, with thousands like it, is surely needed in the world.

Teacher: Yes, I am sorry to say, the vast ever swelling army of unemployed, the increasing commercialism, the corruption of law, the weakening of the church, the stupendous and crazy race in armament building, the impoverishment and enslavement of peoples and nations who stand confused and helpless amid the increasingly threatening storms,—all force us to realize the truth of these words: "Little wonder if one of Europe's preeminent thinkers, honored for his wisdom and restraint, should have been forced to make so bold an assertion, 'The world is passing through the gravest crisis in the history of civilization.' 'We stand,' writes another, 'before either a world catastrophe, or perhaps before the dawn of a greater era of truth and wisdom.' 'It is in such times,' he adds, 'that religions have perished and are born.' ".* In times such as these all mankind is forced with humbleness of heart to seek a united spiritual refuge in the One True God. This great Universal Temple is a symbol of this.

Barbara: Do you mean that the completion of this Universal Temple can help, not only Chicago, but can really help the whole world?

Teacher: Yes, the call of Bahá'u'llah, the Glory of God, Whom Christ said would come in the Glory of the Father, has given to mankind the principles of a Divine Program embodying in its essentials, God's divinely-appointed plan for the unification of mankind in this age and in the clarifying words of Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause,—“It is towards this goal—the goal of a new World Order Divine in origin, all-embracing in scope, equitable in principle, challenging in its features—that a harassed humanity must strive.” He, Bahá'u'lláh, has quickened a declining people and a corrupt society into the glorious dawn of this Day of the most Great Peace.

(They stand in front of the lighted plaster model of the Temple.)

Mr. V.: This is extremely interesting, and very much needed in this distressed and rapidly changing world.

Teacher: This beautiful model was made by the skilled hand of the able architect, Mr. Louis Bourgeois, as the result of remarkable inspiration. Professor Luigi Guogolino, noted architect of Italy, who recently came to make a brief survey of the model, remained three hours or more. For two hours he spoke not a word. His conclusion, when he reluctantly had to leave was—“This is a new creation which will revolutionize architecture in the world, and it is the most beautiful thing I have ever seen. Without doubt it will have a lasting page in history. It is a revelation from another world.” “There is none of the austerity and solemnity which characterizes the religious architecture of the past. It has grandeur and supreme beauty but no severity. It seems to be vibrant with life, lifting the consciousness into the splendor of the dome, into which the whole structure seems to ascend, symbolizing the uplifted aspirations and consciousness of mankind. It is a new architectural pattern as San Vitale was the mother church of Christian architecture. Perhaps it may also signify and symbolize a new power of the Holy Spirit which is now being profoundly felt by all humanity'.

Mr. V.: What is the key-note back of this marvelous new type of architecture, its unusually beautiful dome and its exquisite outer ornamentation, in which we see embodied most of the religious symbols of the world?

Teacher: That is easily answered, Mr. Vanderwolff. The principles of the knowledge of the Oneness of Mankind and the fundamental Oneness of Religion are the keynote of this Temple design and also the pivot around which the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh revolve.

Mrs. V.: Just what do you mean by the Oneness of Mankind? Was not that taught by Christ?

Teacher: Yes, Jesus the Christ and all the other Prophets called men to love one another, but Bahá'u'lláh has given to the world the consciousness of the Oneness of Mankind, a deeper and a more far-reaching consciousness than was ever given to the world before. His power is uniting individuals in all the relationships of life, all the nations, races, religions and classes into a beautiful symphonic whole.

Mrs. V.: That is a beautiful idea. I begin to understand that vast far-reaching and inclusive ideas are symbolized in this great Temple. I did not know it could be possible to have such a wonderful concept in the world today, where there seems to be so much disagreement and division. Why, it is a beautiful sermon of universal truths moulded in stone. May I ask if I would be permitted to bring my whole club membership for a tour of the Temple, and would you be so kind as to tell them just what you have told us?

Teacher: Yes, Indeed. We shall be so happy to greet all of your friends and answer any questions they may wish to ask. We have conducted many tours of club women, university students as well as men's clubs, even children's groups, and explained to them this unusual architecture and the profound meanings that lie behind it.

Jimmie: Oh! Do you suppose I could bring my boy's club here Saturday afternoon? I know all the fellows would like to come and have you tell them just what you have told us.

Teacher: Indeed, you may. It will be a pleasure to meet your boy friends. Shall we make it Saturday afternoon at 2 o'clock?

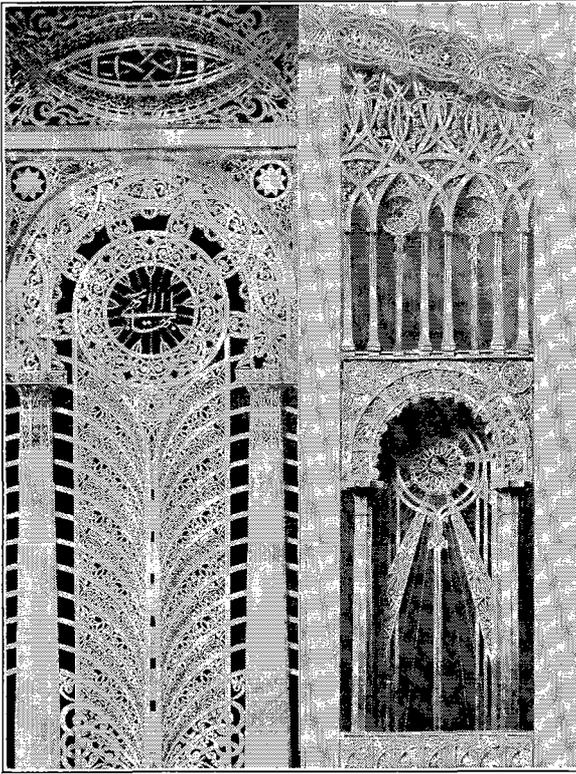

Jimmie: That will be great. I'll tell them they'll have the time of their lives (catching a shocked look from his mother)—I mean—

Mr. V.: May I ask one more question before time for your afternoon service?

Teacher: Certainly you may.

Mr. V.: Thank you. I understand from your explanation that this great Temple symbolizes something more than reawakening the spirit of goodwill and brotherhood among men, but I do not understand how far that spirit of unity will be expressed in the affairs of life. Will it not eventually bring a deadening uniformity?

Teacher: The principles of

An Interior Panel

Bahá'u'lláh apply not only to the individual but to all the relationships of life, binding all mankind into one human family. This implies an organic change in the very structure of society. For instance, it means the demilitarization and the reconstruction of the civilized world; it will create a world effectively unified in its trade, commerce, industry, political machinery, language and educational standards, as well as in its expression of ethical, moral and spiritual values. Yes, it will allow for infinite diversity in its national and individual characteristics. Victor Hugo caught the spirit of this age shortly before his death when he said: "Today we have the United States of America; tomorrow the United States of Europe; next day the United States of the Orient; and one day we shall have the United States of the world". The world is rapidly moving toward that ideal, and in the principles of Bahá'u'lláh we find the great dynamic power that will ere long establish the Kingdom of God upon earth. However, as the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, Shoghi Effendi, has so clearly expressed it, "The principles of Bahá'u'lláh will civilize the world, but the knowledge of and belief in Bahá'u'lláh will regenerate mankind."

Mr. V.: Thank you. I deeply appreciate, not only the great needs of the world today, but that such a mighty conception has been given to the world which is capable of bringing about the vast transformation of society. Have not all the poets sung and the Prophets proclaimed an age of unity and peace? I should like to direct my energy and thought in cooperation with this great constructive transforming force in the world.

Barbara: O father! You have the ability to help other leaders in industry and finance to become attracted to these great ideals and also to cooperate in establishing these principles more quickly in the world. Now we must study and know more of these great truths as soon as possible. There is Robert over at the book table. It looks as though he has bought most of the books already.

Mrs. V.: Father, I have never known of your being so impressed with anything of this nature before. I, too, confess an eagerness to know more about these great truths for I long to do my bit in helping to bring about the unity and harmony in the world that this beautiful Temple symbolizes.

Mr. V.: Yes. We must study. I am impressed as I have never been. I have never before found a satisfactory solution for the world's problems and I hope that I may prove worthy to have a share in the honor of building this great Temple. It truly is a great new sermon in stone.

NEW LIGHT

MARGARET DIXON

"We must not begin with words and end with words. We must act and teach mankind with the irresistible force of example. . . . One drop of deed is better than an ocean of words, and one ounce of action is more valuable than a ton of eloquent speeches."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

RECEIVING a letter of invitation to a farewell social to a Mr. and Mrs. Hyde Dunn, Melbourne, Australia, whose names had been often mentioned, but whose mission in our City was still unknown to me, a desire to know the nature of their message urged me to accept the invitation.

The small hall was beautifully decorated in purple and gold; from the centre to all sides were gold streamers, each bearing on it the name of some country to which the Bahá'í Message had been carried. At one end was a bower of green foliage, and amongst it in letters of gold hung the strange, mystical name, Bahá'u'lláh. It seemed as if one stood at the door of a new world, for here was a strange thrilling vibration that made the heart throb with expectancy.

In a short time there entered a man of elderly, yet withal most youthful appearance, his face shining and illumined. A little later came a sweet-faced woman, gracious, and with a wonderful attraction which could not be defined. Something about them brought an inner conviction that they were possessors of that which was well worth seeking, and the vow was instantly registered to seek. Seeking in this case certainly meant finding, for these two dear disciples of Bahá'u'lláh were only too ready to heap hospitality and love on me and give generously of their time and knowledge, as well as Bahá'í Literature to be read and studied at home.

Happily their departure from Melbourne was postponed for a month, and during that time the first Melbourne Bahá'í Assembly was formed. That indeed was a

Mr. and Mrs. Hyde Dunn, pioneer teachers of the Bahá'í Cause in Australia

happy and memorable time when we gathered day after day, at the house of Alice Culbert, later dubbed the Bahá'í Nursery, and learned the history of the coming of the Promised One.

Since that time years have passed—years of patient devotion, and strenuous effort to awaken the heedless; and in the hearts of the Bahá'ís there is always not only the fervent hope, but the strong conviction, that the field so long tilled and tended with such love will bear a plentiful harvest of souls, and that in the future Australians will be filled with the Light of Bahá'u'lláh.

THE PIONEERS of such a country as this must needs be souls of dauntless courage, and pure hearts. Today we read the history of our pioneers and explorers, in prose and verse and think with wonder and admiration, of the feats of endurance and self-sacrifice that they performed.

We love their memories, inasmuch as to them we owe the founding of our splendid country, and the establishment of our great cities.

In the words of an Australian poetess,

“Though her mountains sternly fronting,
Bade them on their way turn back,
And her deserts widely stretching,
Offered them a pathless track.

“Wild nor desert could not daunt them,
Peril could not make them fear,
On they pressed until the landscape
Showed before them bright and clear.”

And if this can be said of those physical pioneers, how much more is there to tell of those who, with no support save God, left their home, the friends they loved, crossed the ocean, landing strangers in a strange land, without youth or money in order spiritually to pioneer a great continent and establish therein the Cause of God. In the years to come, when the standard of God is understood in our land, and in the cities Bahá'í Temples are raised to the name of Bahá'u'lláh; when He is known and worshipped throughout the length and breadth of Australia; when the principles He laid down are followed—then will appear in its true light the magnitude of their undertaking. Many a mountain of doubt and darkness they have overcome, many a desert of unbelief they have crossed, for dense mists of materiality envelop this land of the youngest of the nations, the Benjamin of the tribes of Israel.

Taken as a people, we are still crude and undeveloped, even as the country we live in. We are still in the early youth of a nation and are mostly pleasure loving and indolent, in no way inclined towards spiritual matters. A noted sculptor on his return after 25 years absence from his native land, said, "Australia seems to me like a beautiful body whose soul is still unawakened." It has taken colossal efforts of patience and love by this gallant couple¹ to do even what has been done—establish centres in all the capital cities,—centers, which must be strengthened by many returned visits.

Mr. Dunn, has traveled incessantly from one end of Australia to another, striking the lonely furrow into the crude clay of the hearts he has met and sowing the seed wherever possible. Mrs. Dunn has remained in the cities striving, by faithfully living the life and lovingly serving all with tenderness, thoughtfulness, and kindly actions, by visiting the sick, comforting the forlorn, advising the perplexed to lead souls to the Cause. Both exemplify in their daily lives the admonitions of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Who so inspired them on their contact with Him as to give them the desire and urge to serve Him by coming to Australia to spread His Message. Their lives will ever stand as a monument to the Power of the Living God to help those who arise to serve Him.

TODAY, as regards the Bahá'í Cause, Australia is as a vast field, plowed and sown by these faithful servants, waiting the germination of the seed and its growth into the world of visibility. Where are the reapers who will harvest the souls?

"I bear witness, O Friends, that the Favor is complete, the Argument fulfilled, the Proof manifest, and the evidence established. Let it now be seen what your endeavors in the path of detachment will reveal."²

"The call of God," 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "hath proved the very life of the universe and the animating Spirit of mankind. Behold how it hath vivified the heart of man and stirred the consciousness of the world. Ere long its signs shall be made manifest and the fast asleep shall be awakened."

¹ Mr. and Mrs. Hyde Dunn, formerly of San Francisco, Calif. ² Baha'u'llah, Hidden Words (Perian), v. 82.

"When a man turns his face to God he finds sunshine everywhere. All men are his brothers . . . Radiate the light of the love of God to such an extent as to be able to remove entirely the gloom and darkness of hatred, bigotry and enmity from among humanity . . . In so doing you will manifest that not in words only, but in deed and in truth you think of all men as your brothers."

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

AND SPEAKING THUS--THEY PASSED

FLORENCE E. PINCHON

*"Behold our progress and enlightenment! We are the people! We shall surely stand! And speaking thus—they passed."

SO WROTE an American poet during the last world war, in telling lines that expressed this common reluctance of the human mind to recognize the impermanence of its own creations. How few of us, indeed, seem gifted with that forward-looking imagination which could qualify us to become professors, or even humble members of the "Faculty of Foresight" suggested by a certain distinguished writer. It is so much easier to linger in thought among the records of the past, or believe that nothing could surpass the wonders of present achievement, than to exercise vision, and humbly recognize that the civilization of which we happen to form a part is destined to pass away, is, in fact, passing, even as we extol its so-called progress. Yet this is the lesson which is taught by all history, and which is essential to its true understanding. The gradual decline of a civilization is as much in the natural order of things as the fall of an autumn leaf, however little we may like the idea.

Let us, for instance, with the poet, picture the bold Assyrians sweeping in their chariots through the crowded marts of their fortified cities viewing the lofty towers and ponderous ramparts; watching, perhaps, the all-conquering legions of Sennacherib as they thunder by in their gleaming purple and gold; while their hearts are swelling with pride and belief in their enduring strength and glory. How little they could have imagined the shifting sand-dunes of their ultimate destiny!

Nor could the priests and architects of Egypt's massive pyramids and sculptured temples have ever dreamed that all their learning, vast monuments of power, and even the sacred tombs of their mighty dead would one day lie as empty shells—relics of interest only to the excavator or the tourist.

Would it have seemed possible to the patrician of the Roman Empire, when "mistress of the world," or even to the philosophers of ancient Greece, that all their glories, and the gain of hard-wrought centuries would crumble, with their builders, into dust, while the wisdom of their brilliant thinkers, enshrined in a few classics, become "as a tale that is told"?

TO-DAY, maybe, we have, in this respect, grown a little wiser. Education, the discoveries of archaeology and scientific research, as well as the profound distresses of the times, have induced a certain measure of humility, and a clearer perspective of the procession of the ages and our allotted place in its changeful pageantry. And so, while still apt to extol our enlightenment and progress, we have begun to seriously question wherein that "progress" truly lies, and to realize, however vaguely, that spiritual enlightenment must inform and direct material advancement, if we are not to suffer a passing that would be both premature and ignoble, into the darkness of oblivion.

Now, to many a thoughtful observer of the times it appears that over our present civilization the shadows lengthen, and as at the close of a day of storm and tempest the sun is beginning to set in fiery gleams. Yet again the Eastern horizon is crimson with the fires of hate and aggression; while in Europe the forces of disruption and unrest have received fresh impetus. As a keen student of international affairs recently declared: "Since intensified nationalism and preparations for war continue to grow side by side with those for disarmament and peace, sooner or later a final clash would seem to be inevitable."

And if anything more were needed to deepen this impression, it would be the report of the Inter-parliamentary Union at Geneva, on the Character of Future Warfare, recently published in England in book form. Compiled by Sir Norman Angell and seventeen other experts, belonging to eight nations, its cool, scientific analysis of the chemical and mechanical inventions lying in wait for the victimization of humanity reads like some hideous fantasy of a nightmare. No wonder that another observer—Dr. John Hutton—commenting upon it, cries: "Does a civilization that can conceive such things, or, aware of their menace, permit them to exist, deserve to survive?" But as he further remarks, the only hopeful way in which it is possible to regard the recent revival, all over the world, of militarism, is to recognize that it presages some ultimate struggle between the natural and the spiritual outlook of the nations concerned. Like the final convulsion of the man obsessed by evil spirits, of whom we read in the New Testament, the very violence of the attack which rent him indicated approaching deliverance by the Great Physician.

In proportion, therefore, as the spiritual powers, wrestling for the soul of our present civilization, increase in strength and vitality, so fear, suspicion, and greed arise hydra-headed in our midst.

But to those nations and great empires who deliberately turn aside from justice, doing despite to their higher intelligence and better natures, the Prophets of old, as faithful Watchmen, have ever uttered stern warnings. To show fear and vacillation when moral courage is required for the vindication of the right, or lethargic clinging to outworn ideas and methods when problems of human agony cry to heaven for bold solution and energetic reconstruction, to put monetary gain before human welfare, pride and prejudice before the security of peace, is to sin against the Light. "This is the condemnation, that Light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather than the Light because their deeds are evil."

“LIGHT is come into the world.” It is just here that those who have been privileged to hear and to understand the Bahá'í Message may lift up their hearts and take courage, fully persuaded that the hour of redemption draws nigh. Indeed, one often wonders how thoughtful and sensitive minds can, without such an assurance, bear the mental and spiritual perplexities and the spectacle of universal suffering presented by these tragic years! But for those who have caught the vision, there lies a clear pathway of guidance through the gloom, a divine Direction revealed to a drifting world. Herein we can see, shining above the angry torrents of chaos, the rainbow of the renewed Covenant of God with men—heavenly love watching human madness, yet with unalterable mien! Already those who are aware, may discern the brightening colours of this Rainbow of Promise, and may trace, here and there, arising from out the crumbling institutions and systems of the present, the dim outlines of that new World Order promulgated by Bahá'u'llah.

“We live in an age” writes Dr. Micklem of Oxford, “when that civilization is breaking up which has largely been the creation of Protestantism.” In expressing his conviction that to Christianity would still be given the work of reconstructing a better world, he exclaims: “God grant that we may have a Prophet to lead us into that new task!” “Before they call, I will answer,” was the promise given through Isaiah. A promise which has already been fulfilled “exceeding abundantly above all we can ask or think,” since the Spirit manifested through Christ, the Son, shines again—resurgent—in the Glory of the Father, the greatness of whose Revelation and its profound significance for the whole earth, only future centuries will be able to fully comprehend and bear witness.

To those of us who are anxiously watching the swift march of events to-day, it becomes increasingly evident that only through obedience, whether that obedience be conscious or not, to the spiritual laws taught by the wise Counsellor of Nations can the world achieve deliverance from its afflictions. Only so can we become “his people” who shall “surely stand” in the evil day; putting on the whole armour of God, having our feet shod with the preparation of this gospel of Universal Peace, and wearing, as a helmet, this supreme hope of Salvation. So, borne of our present trials, our present vision and courage, we may, in passing, bequeath to coming generations a more orderly and gracious heritage, a purified and nobler form of world civilization. For it is written that, in the long perspective of Time, all that past centuries have manifested is destined to appear but “as a drop of water in comparison with the ocean of this oncoming glorious age. Magnified is He, who hath crowned this century with the appearances of His Kingdom!”

FOLLOWING MARTHA ROOT

On a Pilgrimage of Peace and Good Will

CORALIE FRANKLIN COOK

THE hunger of the world for religious thought and teaching seems abundantly proven in the experiences of Miss Martha Root, world traveler and Bahá'í teacher.

A letter from her sent from Praha, Czechoslovakia, in the early part of the year, is so significant in its simple narration and so heartening in its glimpses of what men and women of other lands and other tongues are thinking and doing, that it seems altogether fitting to share its contents.

First of all Miss Root thanks her American friends for letters that have "meant more to me than I can express to you." Then quite in her own individual manner she continues: "We know for we have experienced it that the oceans do not separate our hearts; our friendships are eternal through all the worlds of God. . . . Also, do you think as I do, how much you wish to read and study, but you read a little, pray a little, meditate a little, and most of the twenty-four hours submerge yourself in service? And in doing that the words of Christ come true, 'He that loses his life shall save it.' In service to others the soul does draw near to God, does hear the Divine Guidance, does dream dreams, does see visions."

This letter is written just one year from the night when, on board the steamship Europa, our friend sailed away with Geneva and the Disarmament Conference as her first objective. Here in Geneva she was busy at the Disarmament Conference until May first. Then she "took part in the National Czecho-Slovak Esperanto Conference in Olomouc" speaking at the very opening. She had the good fortune to be present at the unveiling of the monument to Dr. Ludovik Zamenhof, creator of Esperanto, on the center of which she proudly writes, is engraved: 'La Baha Movado, Haifa, Palestine'. Thus the Bahá'í Movement is given as one of nine international movements whose aim is universal brotherhood.

Early in May our friend went on to Praha—the name given by the Czechs to that interesting city we Americans call Prague. There she had the great good fortune to secure from "one of the best Czech translators," a fine translation of Dr. J. E. Esslemont's book, 'Bahá'u'l-láh and the New Era.'

All who have read this informing book will rejoice to know that this translation has been liberally distributed among the libraries, public and private, of Bohemia. Touching proofs of its reception have been sent the translator; for example, a peasant laborer writes, 'This book is my treasure. I wish to learn all I can about the Bahá'í Teachings.' In contrast a scholar and lecturer of distinction has written important articles about the Bahá'í Cause in leading Czech papers and magazines, and to Miss Root's grateful surprise has translated one of Bahá'u'lláh's books, called "Hidden Words" into "beautiful and poetic Czech." Commenting upon them he wrote: "The thoughts of Bahá'ulláh are so noble, they must be translated as perfectly as it can be done, for this will be literature for future generations."

Throughout the summer months the subject of this sketch told of the Bahá'í Revelation wherever assembled willing listeners. At one time she holds forth in a parlor of a home where she is living, at another time the Message is given in a clubhouse. Everywhere she meets courteous and often eager listeners. Reporters come, people of high estate rub elbows with the lowly, and men of learning and wisdom enter with zest into the period of questions and answers following every talk. Leaders of other Movements are often present, and the Czech language and Esperanto are the media of communication.

After these group meetings invitations come to address larger groups and public lectures are given where contacts are made which mean an ever-widening circle of those who love to hear of the work and words of the Messengers of God who wrought so mightily from the "Prison Home" in 'Akká, Palestine. "I wish I could go," writes Miss Root, "to fifty cities and towns in Czechoslovakia and speak in the English clubs and in their schools for word comes from different cities asking about the Baha'i Movement."

And so, sometimes holding a tea, sometimes writing magazine articles, sometimes in a heart to heart talk with a single hungry soul, sometimes speaking to large audiences from platform or pulpit, Martha Root goes on her Sun-lit way. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of my brethren, ye have done it unto me," said Jesus of Nazareth.

"In the world of existence the greatest bestowals of God are His teachings. The other bounties of God are limited as regards their benefits and provision. . . . Therefore the teachings of God are the bestowals specialized for man. Although the divine teachings are truth and reality, yet with the passage of time thick clouds envelop and obscure them. These clouds are imitations and superstitions; they are not the fundamentals. Then the Sun of Truth—the Word of Truth—the Word of God—arises again, shines forth once more in the glory of its power and disperses the enveloping darkness. For a long time the divine precepts of the effulgent Word were obscured by clouds of superstition and error until His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared upon the horizon of humanity . . . and revealed anew the foundations of the teachings of God."*

THE BAHÁ'Í TEMPLE

Ye poor and needy of all nations,
Ye tried and taunted of the earth,—
See'st not—your sufferance is accomplished?
Another era comes to birth?

Behold! above the ruthless carnage,
Above its mute and moldering rage,
God's Temple rises into Beauty,
And brings to bloom the Promised Age!

“Nothing less than persistent and strenuous warfare against our own instincts and natural inclinations, and self-sacrifice in subordinating our own likings to the imperative requirements of the Cause of God, can insure our undivided loyalty to so sacred a principle [consultation]—a principle that will for all time safeguard our beloved Cause from the allurements and the trivialities of the world without, and of the pitfalls of the self within.—Shoghi Effendi.”

IN THE confusion which reigns throughout the world today, there is great need of leadership. “Where there is no vision the people perish.” It is in such universal crises as this that the true social structure of humanity and its mode of progress become apparent.

As in the moment of danger to a herd of wild animals all wait upon the action of some leader, some bolder, some more sagacious individual whose decisions the rest follow—so in the affairs of human kind the majority depend for guidance upon a gifted and relatively small minority.

The great majority of human beings are not capable, either by native genius or by training, of solving the major group problems of humanity; therefore the highest expression of wisdom and of action on their part is to choose shrewdly their leaders, and once having chosen and tested them, to uphold their hands.

But what has been the nature of these leaders, and in what way have they tended to exercise the powers of leadership inherent in them?

Leadership naturally gravitates to those who have great power of thought or action to offer to their fellowmen; unfortunately there is a kind of leadership, all too prevalent in the past, which plays unjustly upon the weakness and credence of the masses, exploiting them for the sake of private gain and power. This kind of leadership has been always with us. It has produced world conquerors, world financiers, social leaders,—who dominate by the power of their personality over all of their fellows, whether for good or ill. It is because humanity has been the victim of such leadership that most of its ills have come about.

YET, tragic as it is true, humanity cannot dispense with leadership. In order to get anything accomplished the masses must delegate, for good or for bad, their broad basic power to the narrow spearpoint thrust of incisive personalities.

Since this is the psychology of human nature it is well to be aware of it, in order that we may learn to choose our leaders wisely and with more reference to righteousness, integrity and wisdom than to that specious dazzling charm of personality which too often commands the allegiance of men.

Humanity as a vast social mass has therefore the primary duty of choosing in broad terms its goals, and as its rulers men who seem both capable and worthy of bringing to pass these goals. That is as far as the ability of the mass goes. Power thus delegated must then be applied from the top down by leaders of capacity and integrity.

What a vast responsibility rests upon these chosen leaders of humanity! They are the shepherds of the flock. Where they lead, all others follow. The highest wisdom and power of guidance is needed by these leaders, for if the blind lead the blind both shall fall in the ditch. And in addition to vision is needed also the ability to act decisively; for if leaders be characterized by inertia how helpless becomes that vast group of average humanity which waits in vain on leadership.

THE HIGHEST and most fruitful types of leaders are those men who have risen to greatness and to position chiefly through the development of powers in them so evident to the masses that their emergence to eminence has been through the confident will of the masses rather than through dominance gained over the masses by means of skill and force of personality directed by selfish ambition. Such ideal leaders were Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Jefferson,—men who were outstanding not only in the colonies but throughout the world for their qualities of wisdom, of integrity, of devotion to command good.

TRUE leaders, put in possession of affairs, find their chief strength to be the realization of their human weakness. It is when they measure most despairingly their human powers against the infinite needs of the time and in such weakness seek for divine power and guidance that they become most truly themselves, most worthy the authority of leadership and most capable of exercising it. It is when circumstances are most critical, most dangerous, most incomprehensible, that guidance is needed from a higher plane of intelligence than that of man. This guidance, sought by prayer or through intuition, brings to human affairs a clarity of judgment superior to even the greatest that human genius can afford.

When this seeking of divine guidance is absolutely followed by a ruler, we have a theocracy or government by Divine wisdom such as prevailed in the early period of Judaism,—a period characterized by simplicity; by righteousness; by equality of opportunity; by protection of the weak; by prevention of exploitation such as has been rarely known in the history of human government.

To THIS great principle of divine guidance on the part of leadership, the New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh adds another factor of great importance—that of consultation. Leadership is not to be restricted to one person or to two or to three, but to a larger group (yet not so large as to be unwieldy) which meet in consultation to decide all affairs. Here a definite group guidance is sought, to be added to the combined knowledge, wisdom and genius of the individuals who compose the group. Human thirst for dominance, for egoistic projection of pet ideas, must be sublimated into unselfish loyalty to the group and to the larger public. Thus expression of the ego is to be sacrificed and all effort is raised to a spirit of pure search for guidance for the sake of service.

This new form of group action which we may call consultation is something quite different from previous forms of group action derived at through conference. Wherever groups in the past have conferred together in order to arrive at some important decision the usual result has been that the more dominant personalities have been able to thrust forward their opinions and ideas, thus gaining prevalence by means of their force of personality. Opinions thus gaining ground due to the superior forcefulness of those individuals supporting them might or might not be the wisest, most judicious, the most intuitively guided. Thus the conference has not been true group thinking, since the power of thought of the group has been disturbed and distorted by the projection of individual wills.

IN TRUE consultation, on the other hand, it is expected that all effort after wilfulness will be annihilated on the altar of service and that the thoughts of each and all will be expressed and weighed according to the best wisdom of the group. Where there are strong differences of opinion, these are gradually lessened by discussion; by an earnest seeking for unity of purpose and decision; and if necessary by active prayer of the group for such unity. When a majority decision is reached, it is usually made unanimous by the group's desire for expressing unity; or if there still remains a minority vote, that is quietly expressed only in the spirit of service and persistent guidance and not in a spirit of criticism.

Once a decision has been made and promulgated, no criticism or discussion of it should continue. What a waste of vital energy, what a subtle means of disunity lies in this carping criticism of a minority. Bahá'u'lláh has said there must be unity. If a committee of consultation has by some accident made a wrong decision, it must be supported by the most absolute unity and God will then guide into the right path and correct the error made; but if no unity is attained, there can be nothing but a confusion and lack of success.

Thus The Baha'i Movement presents to the world the most marvelous form of government—a government based upon the broadest of powers of franchise, and upon a selective process of leadership guided by qualifications of ability, wisdom, unselfishness and a spirit of devotion and service. The arrival at governmental decision by the process of consultation as above described, and the absolute unity of the governed and governors through a loyalty that is given to the leaders by those who have chosen them for their sacred office,—this and this kind of government alone can lift the world out of the evils into which it has fallen—evils due to exploitation on the part of its leaders whether in the field of politics, economics or of industry.

THE BAHÁ'Í FAITH AND THE FORMS OF GOVERNMENT

HUSSEIN RABBANI

The author, a student at one of the large colleges in the Near East, has been contributing a series of articles or studies on certain phases of the Bahá'í Teachings, the object being, primarily, to present them as studies and to avoid personal comment. The article herein is a continuation of such observation. Mr. Rabbani does not attempt in any way to interfere in the domain of actual politics as this is a purely theoretical study and is to be so emphasized.

ALTHOUGH in the Bahá'í view all authority, irrespective of the various forms through which it is expressed, comes ultimately from God, provided that it is exercised with justice and equity, yet it is an indubitable fact that under present circumstances there are some types of governments which are more suitable to the conditions of our age. As a matter of fact, Bahá'u'lláh Himself has emphasized this fundamental truth that every institution, whether political or otherwise, has to be changed and adapted to the changing needs and circumstances of the time. Social evolution is a fact and, if not taken into consideration by those who are the responsible heads of society, will lead to disastrous consequences.

Indeed, the whole of Bahá'í philosophy is based on the fact of evolution. Truth itself is gradually revealed to mankind. This is why God has sent His Messengers from time to time to administer to the spiritual needs of men at a particular time or epoch. "Know thou," proclaims Bahá'u'lláh, "that in every age and dispensation all divine ordinances are changed and transformed according to the requirements of the time except the law of love, which, like unto a fountain, flows always and is never overtaken by change." And in this connection Shoghi Effendi describes as "The fundamental verity underlying the Bahá'í Faith—that religious truth is not absolute but relative, that divine revelation is not final but progressive."

It is, therefore, evident that since social evolution is an important factor in the life of peoples and nations, our political institutions should be modified in accordance with the requirements of the age. In such wise, many conflicts and wars will be prevented and humanity will be less subject to strong upheavals as in the past.

HAVING grasped this fundamental fact, namely,—the inevitability and the necessity of social evolution—we should not then wonder that Bahá'u'lláh has laid such an emphasis on the role which the hitherto subjected and passive people must needs play in the future life of the nation. For the age in which He appeared was one which had already witnessed a tremendous development along democratic lines. In most countries of Europe people had ceased to bear the yoke of absolutism and were championing their political rights. The individual was no more considered as a blind subject but was eager to control and direct within certain limits the affairs of his nation. The era of absolutism and tyranny had thus passed away and the dawn of a brighter day had appeared. And although Bahá'u'lláh had been living for so many years in an environment totally different from that which prevailed in Europe at that time, yet He recognized the necessity of the political transformation which the Occident was going through. He wanted people to throw off the bondages in which they were wrapped and vindicate their rights.

Bahá'u'lláh, therefore, in emphasizing the value of representative institutions was acting in full accordance with the spirit of the age in which He was living, and as in the field of religion He saw the necessity of a change in outlook, so also in the field of politics He advised all rulers to allow their subjects to play an active part in the organization and administration of their country. In His Tablet to Queen Victoria, Bahá'u'lláh reveals the following: "And we have heard that thou hast entrusted the reins of deliberation into the hands of the Commonwealth. Thou hast done well, for thereby the bases of the edifices of all affairs are made firm, and the hearts of those who are under thy shadow (protection,) both high and low, become tranquil. But it behooveth them to be as trustees amongst the servants of God, and to regard themselves as guardians over whosoever is in all the earth."¹

And in another passage He confirms and explains the same view:

"At present that form of government followed by the British nation seems good; for that nation is illuminated both with the light of kingdom and consultation."²

These few words demonstrate in an unmistakable language the form of government which Bahá'u'lláh favored. He wanted the rulers to come into a closer contact with their people, and to ask their advice and help. For Bahá'u'lláh has strongly emphasized the necessity of consultation and deliberation. In the "Tablet of the World" He says: "Hold fast to the rope of consultation, and decide upon and execute that which is conducive to the people's security, affluence, welfare and tranquility; for if matters be arranged otherwise, it will lead to discord and tumult."

Bahá'u'lláh favored representative institutions so much that He wished His own country not to be deprived of their manifold advantages. In addressing His native city of Tihrán He says: "Soon thy condition shall be changed, for thou wilt be governed by an assembly."³

AND YET, however advantageous representative institutions may seem to be, Bahá'u'lláh was fully alive to their imperfections. Taken alone by itself a popular assembly is inadequate and too unstable. It is easily led by the mob and so can produce disastrous results. In every government a permanent head is of major importance, for it acts as a symbol of unity and order and serves to check the extravagances of the parliament. This is why Bahá'u'lláh had a special admiration for the British governmental system because it combined kingship with representative government. In one of His important Tablets He says: "Although a republican form of government profits all the people of the world, yet the majesty of kingship is one of the signs of God. We do not wish the countries of the world to be deprived thereof. If statesmen combine the two into one form, their reward will be great before God."

Not only does Bahá'u'lláh recommend kingship but He gives it a special position. He considers a just king as being entitled to complete obedience on the part of his people. He, in fact, establishes the Divine Right of Kingship. For though a ruler may violate the rights of his subjects and is consequently to be dethroned, yet his position has a divine character.

Bahá'u'lláh, unlike the former champions of the Divine Right theory, does not give the king an authority which is inherently and necessarily superior to that of any other ruler. He clearly distinguishes between king and kingship. The latter is a manifestation of the Divine power, whereas the former may be an usurper, a tyrant. The two, therefore, are not identical. They may coincide. And in such a case the king, being worthy of the position he enjoys, is actually ruling by a divine authority. Concerning this very delicate point, 'Abdul-Bahá was once asked as to whether a hereditary monarch could be dethroned in case he proved to be unworthy of his position, and he replied in the affirmative, thus confirming the view that a king is not inherently entitled to rule over his subjects by divine authority. The distinction between the Divine Right of the King and the Divine Right of Kingship is, therefore, of a vital importance, for otherwise it may lead to some results which history has abundantly proved to be dangerous and to which every enlightened person cannot but strongly object.

THE BAHÁ'Í ideal of a good government is, therefore, a parliamentary monarchy, which attempts at a happy combination of the monarchical and the democratic elements in government. Unlike a government of a republican type it blends together the two forces of permanence and change, and thus gives authority a dignity without which it would lose its strength and power over the minds of the people. For respect towards the possessors of authority is essential for the maintenance of order and security in every nation. When the head of the state lacks such an important element he can no more exercise the influence which he is expected to have in times of emergency. He will be void of any prestige and becomes a mere figure-head.

It should not be forgotten, however, that the king, though influential, cannot interfere in a direct way in the legislation of the country. His function being executive he should not encroach upon the rights of parliament and assume the legislative power which belongs to the assembly. In such a way governmental despotism will be averted and the legislative and the executive powers instead of clashing will learn to cooperate for the promotion of the general welfare and happiness. Not that Bahá'u'lláh had a blind faith in democratic government at the exclusion of any other forms. It is true that He emphasized parliamentary government but at the same time He provided for some sort of a council which would represent the aristocracy of intellect, or the "intelligentsia" of the country.

Indeed, the Bahá'í scheme of governmental organization attempts at a combination of all the good elements that are to be found in the different governments. It is at once monarchical, aristocratic and democratic. It emphasizes the necessity of synthesizing as far as it is feasible the fundamental features of all governmental forms. This is why, as we have already seen, it has combined monarchy with representative institutions. It now remains for us to mention the element of aristocracy which is of no less significance than the other two.

To BEGIN with, it should be made clear that what is here meant by aristocracy is not a nobility of wealth or of birth. Social parasites, who live in idleness have no place in the Bahá'í social scheme. They are entitled to no rights and should, therefore, vanish. But an aristocracy of intellect, composed of highly-educated persons cannot but deserve our respect. Society is greatly indebted to their efforts, if these are spent in a profitable way. This is the reason why Bahá'u'lláh has given them such a high position, and there is no doubt that in the future they should be given some share in the administration of the country.

"The rightly guided men of learning, who engage in enlightening the people and are protected and preserved from the temptations of inordinate desire — such men are accounted of the stars of the heaven of knowledge, before God, the object of all the world. To respect them is obligatory. They are the flowing fountains, the shining stars, the fruits of the blessed tree, the signs of the divine power, and the seas of the eternal wisdom. Blessed is he who adheres to them."¹

And in another passage He adds the following: "But this oppressed one hath loved and loves the philosophers, that is, those whose philosophy has not been mere words, but who have produced lasting results and fruits in the world. To respect these blessed souls is incumbent on all. Blessed are those who practice! Blessed are those who know! Blessed are those who render justice in affairs, and hold fast to the rope of My sound equity."²

'Abdul-Bahá Himself was once asked as to whether it is beneficial to have a hereditary nobility in a country or not, and He gave the following answer³: "One who serves his country well should be rewarded by fitting honors, but no one should be able to claim that he must be honored because his father was, for example, a great general. A person who does not serve the nation will have no distinction conferred upon him. He may be respected because of his father's services but, so far as offices are concerned, he will have no preference."

In His Tablet called "Epistle to the Son of the Wolf" Bahá'u'lláh determining the repositories of authority, says: "The possessors of command are primarily the Imams (may God bless them). These are the manifestations of power, the sources of order, the depositories of knowledge, and the dawning places of the divine cause. They are secondarily, the king and rulers, or at least those who illumine the horizons of the world with the light of justice. I hope that H. M. the Shah will disclose this light which will envelop all the sects of the nations. Everyone should pray for his guidance in this Day."¹

And again He says: "But as for the Ulama who truly are equipped with knowledge and intelligence, these stand as heads to the world's body, and as eyes to the nations. The guidance of men has been, and always will be entrusted to such sanctified beings."²

What could all these words signify if not the vital role which the men of science and learning, who constitute the "intelligentsia" of a country, must needs play in its administration and welfare? They should cooperate with the king and parliament in the settlement of all the questions relative to the organization of the nation. In this manner, through a happy combination of these three above-mentioned factors—namely, the aristocratic, the democratic and the monarchic,—the government will assume a more universal character and its actions will be directed in a just and equitable way.

LETTERS HOME

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

This is the third installment of "Letters Home" from Persia describing the author's visits among the Bahá'ís of Persia and her pilgrimage to historic Bahá'í sites in that land which gave the Movement its birth.

THERE is only one appropriate title for a sojourn among the Bahá'ís of Mázindarán and that is, "Visiting Heaven." That such human beings should be alive in this world is inconceivable—until you have seen them. Their radiance, their self-effacement, their perfection of service, their spiritual beauty, their changeless joy, makes those of us who wear the drab garb of this life and its fevered affairs ragged beggars greedy for crumbs that fall from their celestial banquet.

Here is the perfection of consultation: no one pleased unless all are pleased; no desire for domination; no disregard for even the humblest and his ideas; a resultant energy and happiness in trivial tasks; the beauty of cooperation in great ones.

This soil has been abundantly watered with the sanctified blood of God's saints and from it has sprung up in supernal abundance

Mrs. Ransom-Kehler and the Sari Spiritual Assembly received by a delegation of Bahá'is from the village of Mafruzac, who had encamped several miles from their village, by the roadside, in order to greet her.

the seeds of love, of truth, of eternal loyalty and devotion, which they planted here and died to perfect.

My first objective was Sári, where Quddus¹ was confined when Bahá'u'lláh bade Mulla Husayn send for him.

Several farsangs out on the road the Spiritual Assembly came to meet and to convoy me; never again to leave me until they had, ten days later, delivered me safely to the Spiritual Assembly of Bár-farush, or Babul as it is now called.

We were housed conveniently and with great comfort in the Hazirat-ul-Quds² and one member of the Spiritual Assembly was in constant attendance upon us.

It seems as if I had been very premature in introducing my references to Sheik Tabarsi for I have a world of things to tell you before that memorable pilgrimage begins. I think that I shall find myself obliged to finish this letter before recounting that unique and piercing experience for many things contributed to its ineffacable effect that I must first write about.

THE ACCOUNT of my adventures centres in those delightful friends who accompanied me on my journey through Khurásán, Mázindarán, Gilán and Qazvin.

Mr. Vahid (nephew of Mirza Yahyi-Darabli, the hero of Nayriz) a man of great erudition and sound accomplishments was my interpreter; Rahmat'u'llah Khan Alai, the official representative of the National Spiritual Assembly was my major domo, efficient, energetic and tireless in my service; and Nay-miyyih Khanum, his charming young wife, graduate nurse of the American Hospital in Tabriz was detailed to safeguard my health—still in a precarious state from my prolonged illness. She is the epitome of Bahá'í love and kindness. In the length and breadth of Persia I could have found no group of traveling companions more superlatively attentive or more congenial.

In the course of our visit we made an overnight trip—by the newly finished section of the Caspian-Tihrán railroad—to the adjacent town of Bandar-Ajaz, (I don't know its official name).

An Oriental railroad station deserves a letter all by itself; Europe offers a faint prototype, but in America we have nothing like it. The constant surging of crowds to and fro for hours before the train is scheduled to leave (this one runs every other day); the bazar of effects that every one carries with him; the excitement and curiosity; the light-housekeeping that goes on generally, even in the most public places, the theatrical rush for tickets, the pandemonium as the train approaches, the sprawl and clutter and suffocation in the "hard" class, as the Russians say (there are only second and third, no first) the finality of good-byes, as friends and relatives launch those near and dear to them on this rather terrifying exploit—railroads are of very recent construction in Persia;—the pomposity of even the lowest officials are a great contrast to the sophisticated and orderly bustle of the American depot.

Do you recall that amusing story in Lord Curzon's "Persia" of the queue on the first opening of an Oriental railroad who, when the ticket agent quoted their fares, invariably offered him half the sum with the hope that a leisurely haggle might enable them to travel at a bargain?

In Sári, above the only waiting room was written, "Third Class, Men." When asked where the Second Class Women's waiting Room was, we were informed that this was the only waiting-room, which must serve for all alike. Can you bear it?

A large delegation accompanied us, and here at Bandar-Ajaz I looked upon water again for the first time in many months, when I sighted the Caspian Sea.

As the train pulled slowly in we saw people hurrying along to meet it: "the Ahbab¹ coming to see you," said Alai. And surely enough as we drew into the station all the Bahá'is of the community, with smiling radiant faces were waving me a welcome. Once more the glad salutation "Alláh-u-Abhá" arose from all sides as men, women and children pressed about me to emphasize their pleasure; once more I was wreathed in flowers; once more I felt the warmth and joy of this Bahá'í greeting, that they have given me wherever I have gone.

Making an aisle for me, I was led through the crowd and with the President of the Spiritual Assembly started toward his hotel, where we were to stop. The friends fell in behind, too large and exultant a group for the sidewalks, so down through the streets we tramped a joyous, eager band. Suddenly as we walked I felt a great thrill and throb of happiness and gratitude: the sound of those quick and buoyant feet; the sight of those glad and lovely faces; the sense of peace and security that they reflected; the unity of purpose; the expression of good will; the bounty of loving-kindness that flowed through this corps of peace, made me exclaim spontaneously, "This is like the marching of the army of the Lord of Hosts which is making ready, under His Supreme Command, to vanquish enmity, fear and oppression from men's hearts."

The telegraph-master wired the Governor of Asterabad, under whose jurisdiction is Bandar-Ajaz, that a mob was marching through the streets. He at once telephoned the Kalantar¹ to inquire the reason. His Honor, who had already been apprised, responded that it was merely the peaceful Bahá'is greeting a Bahá'i from the West.

The next morning he came to call on me, shortly before my departure, saying that a visitor from the West was most welcome, a Bahá'i teacher was most welcome, but to find the two combined in one person demanded a special welcome. The Friends in this community must have broken down Muslim prejudice for wherever I went, the Muslims greeted me with great respect.

In Sári there was the usual round of lectures, interviews with officials and dignitaries, teas, dinners, meetings, until those dream days were at last over and we started upon new adventures.

The village of Mafruzac about two farsangs² from Sári, is an old Bahá'i center dating from the days of the Báb. Its most hallowed memory is that of its glorious martyr, Mulla Ali Jan. The present Hazirat-ul-Quds was his former home. When he began to enclose his garden with a wall—the ordinary Persian procedure—he was reported to the government as building another fort like that of Sheik Tabarsi. The authorities, hysterically nervous as a result of their recent experience, condemned him to death.

His last request to the executioner was that he sever first his jugular vein, a request which was granted. Forming with his hands a chalice, Mulla Ali Jan caught the sacred wine of his heart, and elevating it aloft, exclaimed, "Let my blood attest to the Truth of this Revelation;" ere the executioner finished his grim and ghastly work.

I was profoundly moved by the spirit of this dear village. "Oh God!" I cried in my inmost heart, "here am I a poor, broken old woman with nothing to offer, no art, no achievement, a feeble vision, an inarticulate voice, no prestige, no authority with which to press Thy Word. But Thou canst, Oh God, through Thine all-enfolding and compassionate love elevate the most trivial and unworthy of Thy lovers to that exalted station where their very frailty bears witness to Thy Power and Truth. So purify the restless tides of my heart, that kissing to bless every thrust from life, they may at last attest the Truth of Thy Revelation."

We only stayed in this hallowed place long enough for luncheon. One of the beloved friends of Sári, the wife of the venerable Haji, had come a day in advance and sat up nearly all night to prepare appropriate food for me!

After the speeches of welcome and the replies, the hundreds of Bahá'is in the village assembled to bid me good-bye. I walked through the crowds clasping outstretched hands, embracing the elder women, patting the children. One adorable urchin, his beaming face shining like a brass kettle with soap and water, stood with his chubby hands pressed against his tubby stomach and extending at right angles from his dear little body like ventral fins. "I can't shake your hand this way, darling," I said. "He doesn't want you to shake his hand," explained Mr. Vahid, "he thinks you are just another teacher come to examine whether his hands and ears are clean. He is merely trying to make your inspection easier."

At nightfall, accompanied by the Spiritual Assembly of Sári and friends of Mafruzac, Bandar-Ajaz and other localities, we had reached Kafcha Kula, the nearest Bahá'í village to Sheik Tabarsi. And just as I predicted I shall have to leave you here for it is later than I am weary. So keep this in some convenient spot where you can piece together what I have to say about that historic spot; otherwise it will be fragmentary and incomplete.

WHY AM I A BAHÁ'Í?

A. M. NABILI

The editors solicited articles on why various religionists in Persia are now Bahá'ís, and the following is the first response to the request. We are pleased to have the author's interesting treatment of the subject. Mr. Nabilí's ancestors were Muhammadans.

THIS is the question every member of the Bahá'í Faith is faced with in whatever direction he turns.

Being a Bahá'í I read the question every day, every hour and every minute of my life on the forehead of every individual I meet, on the surface of every object my eyes fall upon, on every leaf of every tree I see and even in the heart of every atom of the very elements.

As often as the question is asked, so repeatedly and variously is it answered. The great Prophet Muhammad says, "The highway to God is as numerous as there are people on earth." So is the answer to this question. For each of us sees from his angle and looks through his own window of thought.

The answer I would give is found in the lines written by that nightingale of God, that man of wonderfully clear vision, that famous Persian Bahá'í poet Mirza Na'im in the following words,—

But ah, what a pity most of my readers are only those who are not privileged to know the language of roses and nightingales—the sweet Persian language. My reverie has taken me too far. I began these lines one decade before the end of the first Bahá'í century but was led by my thoughts far into the second.

When I began writing I was fully aware that to be understood I must write in English. But the subject being the Bahá'í religion and its supreme teachings, I naturally went so deep into the teachings and their perfection that I could not see how any human being possessing a sound reason could do otherwise than follow them. As one of these numerous teachings is the adoption of an international language I was about to quote from the late Mirza Na'im imagining I would be understood. But the change of script, the cold naked truth, arouses me from my reverie and I am once more brought back into a world the dwellers wherein still need to be told, "Peace is better than war. Love is better than hatred. A universal language annihilates many a trouble and misunderstanding. Prejudice is the greatest enemy of a happy life. The human energy used for the destruction of the sons of men is better spent on educating them."

Since I can not quote from Mirza Na'im I shall endeavor to base my answer to the question, "Why am I a Bahá'í," on his lines.

THAT human beings can no longer live in caves and pass a solitary life needs no proofs. Hence society. That society can not peacefully and regularly exist without laws needs still less proof.

Before proceeding further, answer must be given to many a reader who is sure to think we are grown up enough in our civil life to be able to make our own laws for society unaided by divine guidance. But, dear reader, let me warn you against this first and foremost stumbling block. You cannot see the danger at first sight but follow me for a little while and then I am sure you will agree with me.

We can make our own laws but shall we willingly follow the laws of our own creation? Shall we not, whenever our selfish interests dictate, overlook or change the laws thus made? Can such laws be our guardian in the secret as well as in the open? Unaided by divine wisdom can we make one set of laws that will guide human societies of various thought, of various temperaments, of various countries and of various regions? And if not shall we not have to vary them in different countries? And if varied shall we not get into discord with one another? And last but not least, will any such code of man-made laws be perfect enough to supply all the needs of all humanity? A law strong enough to control human society as a whole must do all these things.

Justice is the foundation of all law. In this new age the world has become one unit. Our laws in order to be just must establish justice for all in the world of whatever race, class or nation. The time is past when one nation can disregard the interests of other nations and still maintain prosperity for its own citizens.

WHAT IS RELIGION? Contrary to what modern civilization accepts, as a Bahá'í I believe that true religion embodies all that is required to establish laws adequate for the guidance of human society. Bahá'u'lláh tells us, "Religion is the greatest instrument for the order of the world and the tranquility of all existent beings." He has revealed the outer laws that are needed to bring order and tranquility in this new age and shed abroad the inner light of understanding which will make men gladly cooperate in obeying them.

When mankind becomes convinced and conscious that civil laws are based upon God's laws and are not simply man-made, that in obeying them they are obeying God, will they not offer willing and joyful obedience? "The Cause of Bahá'u'lláh has no arbitrary commands—every positive teaching and instruction emanating from its Spiritual Center carries a divine blessing which makes obedience not blind and meaningless but an act of devoted faith fulfilling our individuality."*

Such laws as these would guard us both in the open and secret. Such a consciousness would be a policeman always with us even where nobody sees us and we see nobody for he would be the very faith we have in our hearts. This unseen but watchful and mighty policeman would prevent us from trespassing the rights of others even where we know for certain they cannot reach us and can by no means detect us in our actions.

True religion is beneficial for all sorts of societies in every part of the world. It rises high above the entire law of human creation being able to supply in perfection every need of human society and of the individual. In our present day, laws are innumerable in every part of the world and yet we see human maladies are increasingly prevalent. Religion truly practiced will annihilate the evils of human society through the two pillars of the human tent called reward and punishment or hope and fear.

True religion prevents rulers from oppressing the ruled, and the ruled from creating disorder. Religion prevents the learned from becoming a menace to humanity by using their scientific information for harmful inventions. Religion prevents judges from being unjust in courts of law. Religion prevents the rich from being so selfish that there are millions of poor so deprived that they must needs gather into mobs to obtain their daily needs. Religion does all this and more but without using force or compulsion. It educates human beings to such an extent that they do what is right and refrain from what is wrong of their own accord.

This is religion; this is the law human society is in need of; this is the elixir called the Bahá'í Faith.

WHY OF ALL religions should the Bahá'í Faith be the one to be adopted by the world? Just as a wise doctor prescribes nothing for a patient suffering from a certain disease but what is actually good for the malady, so God the Almighty sends to His people, through His Messengers, the remedy for the ailments they suffer from at the time. The Messengers of the past each gave the world what the small and scanty human society needed then, or, in some cases, what the individual needed and upon which society could be founded by those coming long after Him.

Of the great Prophets of whom we have some records available Moses had to teach human beings how best they could feed on flesh, and other knowledge that wandering tribes needed. Jesus taught that man must have a heart which felt for others. Muhammad gave the people whom He taught a little lesson in organization. But at those times the human world and so society was small; its wants were few; its ailments limited; relations between its various parts almost none; its standard of understanding and ability low and so less capable of harming its members. Therefore simple laws and religions were required.

AND NOW? Now it is different for humanity has reached the age of maturity; its sphere of rule has vastly enlarged; its innumerable inventions have brought its divided and separated parts into one arena; like a mature man its ability to do both good and evil has increased; like a mature man its mental and physical maladies have become aggravated. These numerous inventions which under a strong law capable of controlling the human beings of this age, would have developed a fine civilization, have unfortunately, developed bad habits and serious diseases in the body of humanity.

In the past there were few social and economic problems to be solved; no aircraft to threaten millions of people with bombshells; no colleges to teach multitudes of students various sciences which could wrongly be used for the deterioration of the human race. In short all these problems which present themselves today did not exist in the past. Therefore the former religions and their great founders did not need to solve them. Today they exist and therefore there is the Bahá'í Religion to solve them.

So I am a Bahá'í because I am a member of human society; human society needs a code of law to guide it; no law is better able to perform this duty than religion; and the religion gifted with the ability to guide human society of the present age and to become a talisman for all ailments and defects of the soul and body of human individuals and societies is the Bahá'í religion. If you do not agree with me get the teachings and make a thorough study of them.

“WHAT ARE the fruits of the human world? They are the spiritual attributes which appear in man. If man is bereft of those attributes he is like a fruitless tree. One whose aspiration is lofty and who has developed self-reliance will not be content with a mere animal existence. He will seek the divine kingdom; he will long to be in heaven although he still walks the earth in his material body, and though his outer visage be physical, his face of inner reflection will become spiritual and heavenly. Until this station is attained by man, his life will be utterly devoid of real outcomes. The span of his existence will pass away in eating, drinking and sleeping, without eternal fruits, heavenly traces or illumination; without spiritual potency, life everlasting or the lofty attainments intended for him during his pilgrimage through the human world.”

“A man may be a Bahá'í in name only. If he is a Bahá'í in reality, his deeds and actions will be decisive proofs of it. What are the requirements? Love for mankind, sincerity toward all, reflecting the oneness of the world of humanity, philanthropy, becoming enkindled with the fire of the love of God, attainment to the knowledge of God and that which is conducive to human welfare.”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

THE TRUE SOVEREIGN

ALFRED E. LUNT

This article, of which the first installment is here published, deserves the most careful study of every reader. Herein is revealed the chief cause of the world's troubles today, and the only way of escape from them. Let us realize the truth, that man is basically an animal, yet has capacity to become a spiritual being. Only such transmutation can save him and the civilization he has established.

“Verily,—those who have denied God and adhered unto nature as nature is, are indeed void of both science and wisdom,—are they not of the erring?”—Bahá'u'lláh.

THE law of cause and effect, being divinely ordained as a basic law of creation, is inexorable and ever active. In these fateful years when the nations have fallen into evil times; when the wheel of suffering presses ever more heavily upon every soul; when a rude awakening has come upon a people (organized humanity) whose forgetfulness of God in years of seeming prosperity instilled selfish pride and isolation from their fellowmen to a degree unexampled in human history; there stand out again, in words as luminous and as final as those first written upon the wall of Belshazzar's ancient temple—“Thou hast been weighed in the balance and found wanting.”

Such a sweeping judgment could owe its origin only to deepseated and prolonged disobedience to the divine law itself. And with equal force it may be said that for these present evidences of wide-spread collapse there must have existed an anterior cause. No student of human destiny in the mass could fail to analyze in a true spirit of research what lies behind this stupendous change that has suddenly afflicted not one country or race alone but the whole world. This depression, or crisis, or panic, by whatever name it may be termed, exhibits symptoms radically different from those that have characterized the recorded depressions of other periods.

It is, in the first place, a universal calamity. Other depressions have resembled a local or functional disease of one part or member of the body of the race. But we are witnessing, today, something far more basic and deepseated. The infection has penetrated to every vital organ and function. The body of humanity, itself, is sick and infirm, as if its life-forces were withdrawn, and the confirmation of health and well-being secluded. And just as a man, seriously ill, yields up both will and confidence, so in the confusion of thought, the baffling nature of the disease, and the absence of physicians sufficiently skilled to diagnose the cause of this illness,—men of business, the so-called captains of industry, await day by day new disasters, impotent and incapable any longer of summoning the daring, the cocksureness upon which they have always relied to preserve and stabilize their affairs and the affairs of the people generally who, in blind faith, have always entrusted their investments to the care of these giants of the industrial realm.

The real truth is—what is going on is the collapse of the pillars of the temple of the old order. The powerful stimulus of the "new wine" that has been unsealed in this day of renovation, is rending the old structure with a force stronger than dynamite. This new wine cannot be safely put into the old bottles. Its effect upon the people has already stirred within them a distaste for the unsound and selfish system so long in control of their destinies, even though they, themselves, are still largely unaware of the source of this new impetus. A penetrating light has illumined the secret recesses and exposed the deeds done in darkness. Every plotter against the true welfare of humanity, suddenly, to his dismay and astonishment, sees this searchlight of the divine assayer uncovering his hidden schemes to the eyes of the world. Small wonder at his astonishment at what he may deem to be his betrayal at the hands of those business and political elements, now powerless, that have so long sheltered such practices. In this manner, the bulwarks of a rejected system are crumbling.

When the waters cease to flow the soil becomes arid, parched and dead. When a people perversely turn aside from the Fountain of Living Water, and are full unto repletion with the bitter water distilled by Nature in her laboratories of insensate forces, the health-giving life stream becomes diverted and ceases to invigorate and renew the mental and spiritual tissues. In such a process, humanity becomes a mere distorted image of the real man whose lineaments have been so vividly described by Bahá'u'lláh when He said,—“The true man ap-peareth before the Merciful One like unto the heavens; his sight and hearing are the sun and moon; his bright and shining qualities are the stars; his station is the highest one; his traces are the educators of existence.”

THAT MYSTIC and pregnant saying—“And when they forgot God He caused them to forget themselves,” illumines the picture with a profound wisdom, and is the keynote of our subject. One of its clear implications is that the reality of man, his true self, is always in the state of remembrance of God. So, also, one who is conscious of Him, forgetting and forsaking Him not, is ever conscious of that Holy reality within him, and is rightly guided. But the state of a people who have forgotten God, and turned to the false sovereign, is identical with that of one who is not himself but is lost in the wilderness of aberration and imagination. He has forgotten himself. False perspectives, misleading and fanciful conceptions of life, an utter failure of guidance characterizes him who has forgotten that “Essence of Life,” his true identity, placed within him by the Hand of Power. What more terrible penalty than to lose remembrance and contact with that luminous reality within can be imagined? Surely, this can only be the result of a deliberate and radical departure from the sweeping command of the Supreme Executive Power of the universe. In short, the quoted words themselves are the best pronouncement and definition, for they clearly state that this departure, this sin, was no less than forgetfulness of God. It is an arraignment of the idolators who by forgetting Him have denied His Sovereignty, and have thus disobeyed the first and greatest commandment.

The burning issue, beside which every ordinary problem becomes trifling, is the struggle in the breast of man between the sovereignties of the nether and the divine worlds. The Sacred Books of every people bear witness to the divine mandate on this question. "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me." "I, the Lord thy God am a jealous God". "O Son of Spirit! There is no rest for thee except if thou dost renounce thyself and turn unto Me." "O Son of Light! Forget all else but Me and commune with My Spirit". "Today is the Day wherein the Throne of the Lord calleth among the people unto all the dwellers of the earth and commandeth them to glorify and sanctify God". "And the Lord alone shall be exalted in that Day". "For the Day of God is He, Himself, who hath appeared with the truth". "Beware of hesitating to accept this Beauty after the Ruler of Might, Power and Glory hath appeared". "This Day is the Day of God and God alone is speaking in it, and none should be mentioned save Him". "This is the Day in which the inhabitants of all the world shall enter under the shelter of the Word of God".

THE coming of every major Prophet and Manifestation of God to the earth has been distinctly marked by this clarion call to the people to accept and be humble before the True Sovereign of the nations. With power and authority, as well as with love and pleading, these Holy Ones have commanded the people to forsake the idols and return unto the true King. Invariably, the advent of a Prophet has been at a time of great spiritual darkness. Invariably, the people have been found cleaving to the glittering counterfeits of reality, whether to gold, to fame and exaltation, to worldly absorptions, or to the water and clay. All these counterfeits, reared up as idols though not acknowledged as such by the people, are and have been the mirages of Nature, cleverly fashioned to resemble the true allurements of the divine reality, itself. Regardless of outer and claimed beliefs, of sectarian adherence to the form of a religion, of pharasaical conformity to the external requirements of traditional observance,—at the heart of the people, speaking generally and not failing to note individual exceptions, has reposed the hidden love and quest of the soul for the things that Christ declared to be strong barriers to entrance into the Kingdom of God.

The things or objects we love best, for those we sacrifice the most. What sacrifices, what energies, what life-long pursuits have been laid at the feet of these idols that men have preferred to God, the Author of their being? In such a life, God is essentially forgotten however much He is mentioned with the tongue.

Read the powerful utterances of Bahá'u'lláh with insight, and a great underlying motive and purpose is revealed as the re-assertion of the Divine Sovereignty, that that Sovereignty has in this Age re-entered the world with mighty power, and will and must be re-established in the consciousness of all men. Only the dynamic power of the Holy Spirit could accomplish this task which has baffled mankind for so many long ages. But the clear explanations of the Word of God regarding this supreme issue have been reserved for this day and hour and for the first time mankind as a whole is brought face to face with this eternal question. Victory in this matter could not have been achieved in former ages. Both capacity and destiny were lacking in the race only now entering into the dawn of its maturity. But the clear promise of the revealed Books of every prophetic cycle authoritatively pronounced this transcendent change to be certain and inevitable in the Day of Universal Manifestation, a day so startling to mankind as to be made synonymous with the "end of the world", a day whose transformation would be of a magnitude so stupendous as to cause even the memory of the old order to become a misty tradition and confused dream.

IN SUCH a day our generation came upon the earth. To the people of faith the events of this period, calamitous and inexorable as they outwardly seem, are the expected symptoms of a body racked by disease into whose vitals a powerful, alterative, healing elixir has been poured. Stimulated at first into restlessness and pain, the benumbed tissues which have become lethargic under the devastating toxins of the poisons ignorantly self-administered by the patient, are beginning to quicken. This elixir is none other than the Love and Knowledge of the Creator, the true diagnostician and physician for the ills of humanity. His prescription for health and wellbeing have been His Commandments, the chief of which is His Right to universal acceptance of His Sovereignty. Upon this recognition depend the receptivity and worthiness of mankind with respect to the merciful bestowals that ever flow to loyal subjects. The Love and the Knowledge of God, the divine assurances, the heavenly stations ascribed to the people of sincerity, the knowledge of the mysteries of the Kingdom, the order and welfare of the social, political and economic life of the race, the immortal and eternal life, are the rewards of the firmness and loyalty of a people, not of their disobedience and rejection. The Covenant of God is bi-lateral and mutual; its benefits cannot flow except to those who, on their part, perform faithfully the promises taken from them in exchange. And of these promises the recognition of His Sovereignty precedes all else.

Therefore, what is necessary? Is that sovereignty universally recognized and obeyed today,—and, if not, what sovereignty rules the people? We have previously commented on the fact that the masses of the people irrespective of class or origin have turned their faces to the idols emblematic of a false sovereign. This false sovereign is none other than the usurping power of Nature, whose qualities and characteristics, imitations of the real, instill attraction into the material images of life. Bahá'u'lláh in no unmeasured terms declares such worshippers to be of the "erring".

'Abdul-Bahá tells us that these erring adorers of Nature are enmeshed in the talons or claws of Nature. A moment's reflection suffices to prove the unworthiness of this sovereign possessed only of blind instinct, lacking intelligence and reason, a congeries of elemental forces deposited by the Creator in the pit of the universe as the womb of life, a sign of wisdom and also a testing ground for the development of divine consciousness and the achievement of human destiny.

AND yet, because these elemental forces are involuntary and in a certain sense automatic in their operation, they are deprived of the merciful qualities. Ruthless and cruel are they, when unrestrained. Sad it is that a being like man, endowed with the divine inheritance, with potentialities from the Hand of God so exalted above Nature as to be utterly incomprehensible to her, should bow the knee to that which has neither sense nor feeling. Fire has no sentiment and will destroy not only a great city but human life, itself. The tidal waves of ocean as they roll over the homes and fertile fields of man are impelled by a cause that knows no mercy. That instinctive hunger that animates the animal world fails to implant in the consciousness of a great fish either knowledge or concern that in one mouthful he swallows perhaps a hundred thousand and smaller fry. The tiger, obeying his natural instinct, has absolutely no awareness of the anguish of the man or beast into whom his rending fangs are plunged. And, astonishing as it is, many a victorious general, on the embattled fields of a war of aggression, misled by his imaginary patriotism and wholly dominated by the destructive, cruel principle of nature, is strangely unconscious that, by a single word of command, he has sealed the fate and consigned to death a hundred thousand men. While as a result the fatherland perchance obtains a few more square miles of territory, or, more likely, becomes involved in disputes as to indemnities ultimately resulting in misery for both victor and vanquished. For such inconsequential gains myriads are compelled to yield up life. Such are the mandates of sovereign Nature.

NATURE, in short, has no sense of values as we know them. A library of precious manuscripts is only fodder for her fire. The premature slaughter of those thousands of soldiers, ordained by leaders bereft of guidance, is heralded by the unthinking as a triumph befitting exaltation and commemoration. But let us not suppose that the men of war, possessed in common with all other men of the capacity to know God and to understand His law, are excused in comparison with the tiger who is deprived of that capacity. In such a comparison we see the vast gulf that lies between responsibility and the lack of it. The striking element in common, however, is the utter subjection of both to the dictates of the inferior sovereignty. As a consequence, these men although vested with reason and spiritual susceptibilities place themselves below the plane of the animal who, responsible only to his instincts has broken no law. For this human bloodthirstiness this violation of a higher, binding law, is it to be supposed that no retribution will follow?

“O Rebellious One! My forbearance hath emboldened you and My long-suffering made you negligent, in such wise that ye have spurred on the fiery charger of passion into perilous ways that lead unto destruction. Have ye thought Me negligent or unaware?”¹

IN THIS indictment of the darker aspect of Nature's sovereignty emphasis is laid solely upon those natural elements that inter-penetrate and mislead the minds. As was explained in detail in the article entitled “The Supreme Affliction”,² the other side of the natural duality, associated with the beneficent law of composition, with the fruitful bountiful provisions of aesthetic beauty, food and comfort, the growing crops, the sweet spring breezes, the refreshing rains and glorious sunlight,—constitutes an outpouring of the constructive forces of the universe that guarantees existence, and is a sign of the unchangeable, universal bestowal of the Creator. With this aspect of Nature we can have no quarrel. Its service is, on the whole, to the otherwise helpless physical structure of the race, and has less to do with our mental reactions. Even if to the unthinking these unfailing bounties tend to endear man to nature to the extent of veiling him to the menace of the forces of her “left” or sinister side, no fault can be traced to this merciful provision, for it is, per se, the “sine qua non” of life upon the earth.

THE REAL menace, however, which has imprisoned man in chains stronger than steel, and lulled him into a coma and a forgetfulness deeper than that set up by the most potent anaesthetic, is that serpentine phase of nature that pertains to the subtle, invisible emanations finding reception in the motivation of human conduct. For these have influence with the mind of man, and, hence, with the downward flight of the soul. Described by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in “Some Answered Questions” as one of the meanings of the serpent in the creational story of Genesis, and explained by Him to be “attachment” to the world, this interior, compelling natural power is, in fact, that hypnotic, miasmatic and counterfeit reality which has usurped, in the mind of man, the true sovereignty of the Merciful One. Concealing its real face in a mask of allurements, we have been unaware of its lineaments of horror and cruelty, its poverty of honor, worth or intelligence, its fiery, death-dealing lust, its fatherhood of lies and deceit, its instinctive unreasoning tyranny, or its evil suggestiveness. It is this sphinxlike countenance, traces of which we are led to believe men have attempted to enshrine in the grotesque, horrible idols common to certain nations lost in superstition, that exerts a paramount power over human destiny. This is because of the things we have in common with her, derived from the ancient inheritances. It is this benumbing and tyrannical power that, in the fulness of time, Bahá'u'lláh in the divine arena has challenged as the seducer and betrayer of mankind's ordained destiny.

Have not the songs of the prophets illumined this historic page of humanity's advancement with the glad tidings that in the Day of God this dragon should be cast into the pit? Granted that without the divine dynamic, lacking the penetrating power of the Word of God revealed to this generation, the people would be unable to achieve this victory and emerge from the prison of the self.

Admitting that the seeds of allegiance to natural sovereignty are implanted in the deep roots of our beings, nevertheless the revelation of knowledge from the Apex of Truth is the dispeller of superstition and ignorance. If the Divine Will has ordained this deliverance, as is clearly stated, nothing can withstand it. The regeneration of the human race is in large measure held back by ignorance of its hidden and latent powers. Largely, also, by the failure of the individual to investigate the reality and see with his own eyes. An understanding of the real produces invariably repudiation of and disgust for the counterfeit. The secrets of unity and its irresistible power unloose the supreme forces of the Realm of Might to destroy the armies of the nether world. And today the light of unity is breaking over the horizon. "Ye are all the leaves of one tree, the drops of one sea". Unity reinforced by the Divine Love, indeed synonymous with it, is laden with a mysterious power flowing from the Oneness of God and incorporated into the very core of creation. Informed and armed with this supreme weapon, humanity will find wings with which to rise above the water and clay and attain its true place in the boundless spaces of the Kingdom of God, the goal of its high destiny.

For Nature's selfish isolation and discord, the True Sovereign grants union and brotherhood. For her cruelty and unreason He establishes love and heavenly knowledge. For her dark and treacherous suggestions, her hypocrisies, her sanguinary wars, and her economic injustice, He bestows guidance, truth, order and that happiness that the exile feels when at last he has entered his real home.

"The exigencies of the world of nature are essential to it. One of the exigencies of the world of nature is war. Another of the exigencies of the world of nature is treachery. See how they are warring! Now the world of nature has no will power. Man acts according to the requirements of nature. In the world of nature there is treachery and deceit. Consider what the cat does with the mouse, and the fox does with its prey. In the world of nature there is separation, there is the struggle for existence. These are the natural tendencies. This is irresistible.

"That which saves man from the world of nature is the Power of God. It is faith. It is the fear of God and it will make man an angel—it transforms him. It acts opposite to that of nature. It breaks the sovereignty of nature and without this (power) it is not possible."

—'Abdu'l-Bahà.

This is the concluding part of the author's story of the Russian poet who gave to the world three celebrated writings about the Bahá'í Teachings. Herein we find reference to the poet's book on Bahá'u'lláh, her visit with 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Ramleh, Egypt, and further comment on the remarkable reception her books have received.

NOW I shall speak of the tragedy-poem "Bahá'u'lláh." Mrs. Grinevsky wrote me how she received the inspiration to write it. She said: "Among the many letters which I received from unknown people, all writing me about my play, 'Báb', was one from a gentleman who to my astonishment had a profound knowledge not only of the Báb but also of Bahá'u'lláh. Like the Báb, until 1903, Bahá'u'lláh was generally unknown even among the cultured classes, professors sometimes asking me who my hero was. Even one (Czarist) politician had once asked me, 'What is Bahá'u'lláh?' Not who, mind you, but what? So I was all the more impressed to hear from my Russian provincial correspondent the name of Bahá'u'lláh. He said in his note: 'I was fascinated by the poem Báb like a youth though I am not a youth in years. I have passed two faculties of the university and have in my library all the available works which appear in the literature of the world.'"

"He counselled me", Mrs. Grinevsky says, "to compose a tragedy about the life of Bahá'u'lláh. I myself had thought of it but had been so occupied I had never attempted it; now I determined to undertake this big work. I always remember with gratitude the memory of this Russian gentleman who was not a Bahá'í but a man of great heart. He passed on before my work was published, and I never met him. His name was Nicolas Zazuline; he, as I knew, was president of the nobility in Kishinef and the author of several philosophical treatises."

She continues: "When my work was finished and notices about it appeared in the press, a number of people who had assisted at the representations of my poem 'Báb', and had heard my conferences about that poem which I gave many times, asked me to prepare a lecture about my new composition. The first address about it was given in our summer capital Siestoretzk and afterwards I also lectured in the capital itself at the Society of Oratorical Arts' Hall, in the year 1910."

Mrs. Grinevsky explained that when her Bahá'í correspondent of Báku, Mirza Ali Akber Mamedhanly, read in the newspapers that the work was finished, (he had known from her that it was being written) he asked to have a copy sent to him. She mailed to him several excerpts from the poem. A few weeks later she was amazed to receive a telegram from him saying: "'Abdu'l-Bahá permits us to visit Him in Egypt.'" 'Abdu'l-Bahá was at that time making a short stay in Egypt.

She writes in her letter to me: "That had been my secret, my innermost desire, to see with my own eyes those people whom I had described, who, as my correspondent said, 'love all mankind'. I had thought it absolutely impossible, and yet, unexpectedly, wonderfully, it had come to pass that I could go to see even the greatest of those people! I started from Russia with my manuscript of the poem Bahá'u'lláh in December, 1910, my aim being to see the surroundings of my dreams, of my fancy, about which my former respectful correspondent and present fellow-traveler in that journey to Egypt had spoken—to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá!'

SEVEN years had passed between the appearance of the drama 'Báb' and the concluding of the tragedy 'Bahá'u'lláh' followed by this memorable journey. Mrs. Grinevsky spent two weeks in Ramleh, Egypt, as the guest of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. After she returned to Russia she had several letters or tablets from Him. In one of these He speaks of an article which He had just received about her poem 'Bahá'u'lláh'. From the Tablet (or letter) addressed to Madame Grinevsky and signed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, I quote:

"The article which was published in the Saint Petersburg Journal about thy recent book (Bahá'u'lláh) was in the utmost eloquence and fluency. It was an indication of thy praiseworthy services. The publication of such articles is very useful. They are conducive to the promotion of the divine Call. Praise be to God that thou art assisted in the service of the world of humanity and art spreading the summons of the Kingdom of God. Day and night thou must praise God that thou art assisted to perform such a great service. Rest thou assured that that which is the utmost desire* of thy heart shall come to pass concerning this matter.

"This seed which thou has sowed shall grow. If the means are not available at present, unquestionably they will become realized. I pray in thy behalf that thou mayest become confirmed in the uninterrupted service of the Kingdom of God."

The article which 'Abdu'l-Bahá mentions in His tablet had been published in the French newspaper "Journal de Saint-Petersbourg" January, 1912. The headline was "Bahá'u'lláh". I quote paragraphs from this review: "Bahá'u'lláh means the Glory of God—such is the title of the new tragedy with which Mrs. Isabel Grinevsky has enriched Russian dramatic literature. We must praise without restriction a work whose high, dramatic significance is combined with admirable form. The author of the drama 'Báb', that work of such strong thought, has never attained such a powerful conception as this poem.

"The mind of the reader, attracted by a rhythm of an unspeakably harmonious poetry, rises imperceptibly to summits where the most grave problems are discussed, problems over which thoughtful humanity bends with fear and despair, helpless to solve them. The characters are analyzed with great psychological insight.

"Bahá'u'lláh, the central figure, is depicted with the clearness and power of an antique high-relief. The complexity of that elect-nature is presented with the authority and truth of the great masters of the classical theater. What a lofty lesson, what eloquence sursum corda in that life of pure bounty, of selflessness in that wide desire to spread peace!

"How not to be moved, fascinated by the nobility of this Apostolic character?"

*In a footnote Mrs. Grinevsky adds that her utmost desire which she had expressed in Ramleh had been that her poems might be translated into European languages. The poem "Báb" has been translated into German and French, but the poem "Bahá'u'lláh" is still untranslated.

“As in the ‘Báb’, the events touch the great religious movement which roused the country of Persia in the middle of the last century. The historical part is exact. Mrs. Grinevsky did not limit herself to the studies of documents, the great quantity of which we can hardly imagine; she knows the country very well. Her knowledge gives to the characters an intensive life and a warm coloring.

“The origin of a faith analyzed with the help of true science is carried forward with great art beginning with the first thought which moves the heart of the Apostle, who loves mankind as He loves His family and His own country.

“The author gives a vision, a revelation of all that is hidden of moving, precious depths in that supreme struggle. The liberating pain, the majesty of effort, the active bounty—all these elements of that struggle remain ordinarily unattainable for the crowd which cannot fathom under their austere dogmas, one of the beautiful forms of human unity.

“The love, the deep necessity which lives in each human heart passes throughout the tragedy as an undercurrent, the fountain-head of which, never drying, remains hidden to the exterior world.

“That beautiful and bold work points a return to the school of majesty and aesthetic morality, the aspiration to the eternal truth, which are the indelible character of permanent works. We foretell for this book a most merited success. Humanity, be it to its credit, is tired of the histories of the impure which spoil the taste and soil the mind. It cannot but receive with enthusiasm a work of which the most civilized countries of Europe will be proud.”

MRS. GRINEVSKY, returning from Ramleh in January, 1911, gave interviews to the press at Odessa, the Russian port of the Black Sea, and as soon as she reached home she began her book, “A Journey to the Countries of the Sun”, which is an account of her visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. This was interrupted because in the summer of 1912 she was called to Paris by the French translator of “Báb”, Madame Halperin. When she came again to Leningrad she immediately began the publication of the drama “Bahá’u’lláh” so that it was not until 1914 that she completed the manuscript of “A Journey to the Countries of the Sun”. It is interesting to note that when she completed it, three Persians, Assad-Ullah Namdor of Moscow, Ali Akbar Kamalof of Táshkand and an old Persian Bahá’i friend whom she had met at Port Said came to call upon her and she read to them many parts from the “Journey”, the central figure of which is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. This book of 550 pages has not yet been published because at this time the world war commenced; neither has it yet been translated into other languages.

May this great Russian poet, Mrs. Isabel Grinevsky, who has made such a cultural contribution to literature and to the Bahá’i Movement some day see all her works translated into European languages! The English reading world eagerly awaits them, I know, for many inquiries come from the United States asking where it is possible to get these books in Russian, in French, or in German!

THROUGH THE VISTA OF A GENERATION

DR. ALI KULI KHAN

Mirza Ali Kuli Khan, descendant of an ancient and noble family of Persia, and formerly for many years chief diplomatic representative of that country to the United States, is too well known to the Bahá'í world to need any introduction to our readers. We appreciate this interesting and valuable statement of his earlier work—combined with that of the renowned teacher, Mirza Abu'l-Fadl—in planting the seeds of the Bahá'í Cause in America.

IN 1901 I arrived in Washington, D. C., in company with the great Bahá'í teacher and philosopher, Mirza Abu'l-Fadl, the author of The Bahá'í Proofs and other works on the interpretation of prophetic lore. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the great Master Whom I served in the Prison City of 'Akká, Palestine, for about fifteen months as amanuensis and interpreter, had sent me to this country to cooperate with, and act as interpreter and translator for, Mirza Abu'l-Fadl, besides carrying forward the translation of Bahá'í books, epistles and Tablets in the interest of the American seekers.

Previous to coming here, we had spent several months in Chicago in spreading the glad tidings of the new world religion revealed by Bahá'u'lláh.

In Washington a small group of men and women were drawn to our gatherings and meetings which were held for the public, besides the afternoon classes which Mirza Abu'l-Fadl conducted in our own living quarters.

I remember many a young mother and father with one or more infants, some in baby carriages and others holding the parent's hand. I cannot forget how those young mothers and fathers came to us as seekers, and when I would translate Mirza's words concerning the new Revelation, in some instances I would be surprised that my words met with, what I then thought, seeming indifference. But, as facts proved later on, those young people had, in their own words, been awe-struck by the overpowering announcement of the new Revelation for the awakening of mankind. That meant that in them the Message had struck fire. The rebirth which followed has since found language in life-long careers of service in the Bahá'í Faith in which those young seekers attracted their families and friends as coworkers in a field which now, after a generation, has numberless devoted workers not only in Washington and the United States but around the world.

These are but instances of the fire of conviction which was set ablaze by the eternal Truth—a Truth which creates a world-wide conflagration before which all else save true love and service is consumed. For the story of these individuals is but one of many which could be told with equal effectiveness in depicting the slow but steady progress of a Cause which knows no obstacles and penetrates all barriers.

How WELL DO I remember working with Mirza Abu'l-Fadl, that holy soul in his flowing Oriental raiment, walking with him on the streets of Washington while on the way to our weekly public meetings, or to our almost daily lessons.

In our walks Mirza Abu'l-Fadl related what he, in a prophetic vision, saw would come to pass, namely, that out of the seeds then sown amongst a few people of no apparent importance, in a worldly sense, would eventuate a harvest of noble and sincere men and women who would sacrifice all personal interests in their eager desire to contribute to the sum total of human happiness.

Today, thirty-two years after that time, I am again in Washington, and by invitation of the Bahá'í Committees of this city, I have the privilege of spreading the glorious message of Bahá'u'lláh in the nation's capital. I hardly dreamt, however, that while in Washington this time, I would be rewarded, too, with the vision of those devoted hearts in which my combined services with Mirza Abu'l-Fadl had sown the seeds so many years ago.

What I have seen since returning East has been truly miraculous. When arriving in Chicago last November, I was first shown the glorious dome of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár—the Bahá'í Temple of Light—which, during my first visit to that city, had no existence but in the Words of the Manifestation.

The miraculous thing about the development of a bountiful harvest out of a few seeds scattered at random by seemingly aimless hands, is the total absence of any material and temporal means and instrumentalities employed in all worldly pursuits. No man of wealth has contributed to the world-wide spread of the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, and nothing but the Power of the Word of God which found language in the pure lives of thousands of martyrs and early believers in Persia has created a spiritual foundation which according to the greatest impartial thinkers of the Orient, Europe and America, has had no parallel since the Man of Nazareth challenged the hosts of darkness and iniquity.

The Glorious Bahá'í Temple in Wilmette—the House of Worship for every member of the human race—is the inspiration of every visitor, and has come into being through the sacrifices of Bahá'í workers and humble believers all over the world who have contributed their mite for the erection of this noble structure.

To ONE uninformed of the real purpose of Bahá'í institutions, such a Temple and such gatherings of scattered multitudes in various parts of the world, known as Bahá'í workers, is of no particular importance, but to a student of world conditions who considers the dire calamities with which humanity is in this day beset as due to the universal departure from the path of spiritual guidance,—the appearance during the last eighty-five years of a community clad in the armor of a new spiritual conviction which proclaims the efficacy of spiritual Truth before a doubting world and supports this proclamation not only through the pure and regenerated lives of its members but by the blood of thousands of martyrs, is verily a unique world phenomenon which has far reaching results—for it embodies the principles of all the revealed religions besides possessing effectiveness and power which make those principles part and parcel of the life of every human being.

Thus to the man of vision this new phenomenon is—upon a more universal scale—the recurrence of the leavening process which, in the Words of Jesus, was destined to leaven the whole lump through a handful of disciples.

The world might consider such a claim as an exaggeration. But had the world seen what I saw, as a youth, in my long association with 'Abdu'l-Bahá and later during my many years of service,—witnessing the steady development of His noble spirit in the Bahá'í institutions everywhere—it would realize that marvelous as these achievements are, they are but the faint light of an early dawn as compared to the world-illuminating rays of the sun when reaching the meridian of its glory.

One word should suffice to support this forecast and that is that whereas all other world movements of every nature and type are centered upon the attainment of some personal aim and advantage, the Bahá'í community—under the guidance of its great Guardian—whether in the individual lives and pursuits of its adherents or in the collective efforts of its administration as expressed in its numerous local and national elective Assemblies—is the only world movement solely dedicated to the common weal and happiness of mankind.

In other words, according to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, all men are God's precious trust and are equally important in His eye; love for God and service to Him must find expression in love and service to man irrespective of race, religion or class; and "we must see the Face of God in every face, the beauty of God in every countenance."*

During the last few months since my return to the Eastern Coast I have seen the application of these noble principles in many gatherings of the friends in the most important cities where successive contact both day and night has given me the privilege of seeing with my own eyes the steady increase, not only in numbers but in soul quality of many devoted men and women in the Bahá'í communities who are the spiritual descendants of the early seekers known to us a generation ago.

AMONG THEM the Bahá'í youth are manifesting great seriousness and a vision of the future, and with these a reverence for the old believers who have weathered many tests in the years of storm and stress experienced by every true Bahá'í in his progress towards spiritual maturity. For the Bahá'í youth, far from being carried away by the zeal and virile aggressiveness which makes them so gloriously successful in the field of service, constantly bear in mind that the older friends are verily the link between the day of the Master 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and that of the Guardian

* From the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Shoghi Effendi, and constitute the bridge which spans the Day of Mercy—the Day of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá—and the Day of Justice, namely, the day of the Guardian who is to prepare the way for the universal application of justice tempered by grace. The Master used to say that that which in reality constitutes youth is not tender years but the capacity to adopt new Truths and apply them to life; and that which suggests old age is not length of years but lack of capacity to countenance new facts.

Under the guidance of the new Revelation the Bahá’i religion imparts a new spirit of faith and effects rebirth in young and old, and thus eliminates the chasm between youth and age.

It is a source of blessing to the world today that in Bahá’i communities old and young, humble and mighty have merged all distinctive and divisive features in the united aim to secure human redemption and effect the realization of the reign of universal consciousness.

“Praise be to God! in this century of illumination,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, “hearts are inclined toward agreement and fellowship, and minds are thoughtful upon the question of the unification of mankind. There is an emanation of the universal consciousness today which clearly indicates the dawn of a great unity.”

“This Cause has become world-wide. In a short space of time it has permeated throughout all regions, for it has a magnetic power which attracts all intelligent men and women to this center. If a person become informed of the reality of this Cause he will believe in it for these teachings are the spirit of this age.

“The Bahá’i Movement imparts life. It is the cause of love and amity amongst mankind. It establishes communication between various nations and religions. It removes all antagonisms and when this Cause is fully spread . . ., warfare will be a thing of the past, universal peace will be realized, the oneness of the world of humanity will be recognized, and religion and science will work hand in hand.

“The Bahá’i Movement bestows upon man a new spirit, a new light, and a new motion. It enlarges the sphere of thought. It illumines the horizon of the intellect. It expands the arena of comprehension.

“This is the ultimate goal of human life. This is the fruit of existence. This is the brilliant pearl of cosmic consciousness. This is the shining star of spiritual destiny.”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

LANGUAGE BARRIERS

IN THE BRIEF five years that have passed since the first commercial telephone circuit between Europe and North America was put in operation, great progress has been made toward the ideal of making it possible to talk from any telephone to any other telephone in the world.

The international telephone system is of importance to world understanding in the same sense that the postal system and the cable networks promote good will and commerce.

THERE ARE NOW thirty-seven intercontinental telephone circuits totaling 168,000 miles in length. All of them are radio circuits, all but one operating on short waves. But plans have already been made to supplement the important route between Europe and North America with a telephone cable. Wire instead of wireless links between the continents promise to be important in the future.

At present the following ocean-bound areas can communicate directly with each other; North America and Europe, North America and South America, Europe and South America, Europe and Eastern Asia, Europe and Australia and Java, North America and Hawaii, Eastern Asia and Java. The Americas communicate with Australia and Java by way of Europe. Proposed direct connections to be established in the near future include links between North America and Eastern Asia and between Europe and South Africa.

SOME OF the difficulties in intercontinental telephony are time differences and language barriers. Considering an eight-hour business day, for any city there is a third of the earth's surface on which the time is so different from that city that there is no overlap of the business day. Western United States has time differences of more than eight hours with a large part of Europe, Asia and Africa. Western Europe has few important centers in the world with which it cannot communicate within the business day because the Pacific Ocean conveniently swallows the third of the world which would be inarticulate during European business hours. However, during the waking day there is an overlap of any two world points.

OFTEN TELEPHONE operators at two distant world points cannot talk to each other directly, even if they are competent in several languages. The subscribers often have difficulty in conversing from distant localities because both may be using a language not their mother tongue. This causes the telephone engineers to strive to make standards of transmissions still higher in order that the difficulties of using unfamiliar languages may be minimized.

As world telephoning becomes more general, it may even be necessary to use some sort of neutral world language, like Esperanto, in the routine conversations between trans-continental operators. A relatively small vocabulary of several hundred words would probably suffice and this might be a powerful impetus to the adoption of an international auxiliary language.

The Completion of the Temple

SHOGHI EFFENDI

From letters of the author, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, to the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá'ís of the United States and Canada.

“Your Assembly faithful to its trust and conscious of its high calling, has sounded the call for a further and final effort on the part of the followers of Baha’u’llah in that land. It is for them, now if ever, to arise for the speedy consummation of a divinely appointed task . . . The American believers have made a splendid beginning. Let them bring to a speedy and successful termination a task which they have so nobly initiated and which they alone are destined to accomplish . . . I am acutely conscious of the unprecedented character of the depression under which you labor . . . But I realize also the uniqueness of the opportunity which it is our privilege to seize and utilize.”

“Would to God . . . that the multitudes who, from the remote corners of the globe, will throng the grounds of the Great Fair to be held in the neighborhood of that hallowed shrine may, as the result of your sustained spirit of self-sacrifice, be privileged to gaze on the arrayed splendor of its dome—a dome that shall stand as a flaming beacon and a symbol of hope amidst the gloom of a despairing world.”

No. 3

“Thousands of Mashriqu'l-Adhkárs, dawning-points of praise and mentionings of God for all religionists, will be built in the Orient and Occident, but this being the first one erected in the Occident has great importance. In the future there will be many here and elsewhere: in Asia, Europe, even Africa, New Zealand and Australia, but this edifice in Chicago is of especial significance.”
—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

INCREASING numbers daily are aware that there is being erected in the suburbs of Chicago a Shrine which is expressive of a great and grandiloquent emotion of the human heart, namely that of the brotherhood of man—an International Shrine dedicated to the oneness of mankind and the oneness of religion. This is the Bahá'í Temple or Mashriqu'l-Adhkár which is being erected on the shores of Lake Michigan in the beautiful suburb of Chicago—Wilmette, Ill.

There are many unique features of this monument to the Bahá'í Movement. The first is the marvelously beautiful and creative architecture in which it is phrased—an architecture described as “the first thing new in architecture since the thirteenth century.” The second, of still greater import, is the fact that this Bahá'í Temple expresses the longing dreams and spiritual aspirations of countless Bahá'ís among the different races and religions of this planet who look with eagerness to the completion of such a visible expression of their faith in this land of freedom, advanced civilization, high humanitarian ideals and tolerance.

Nor is the interest taken by the adherents of this Faith limited only to good wishes. In deeds of sacrifice, rather, is their cooperation manifested. Since the inception of this Temple, many countries and many religionists have contributed generously of their funds, even to the point of extreme sacrifice. The following are a few expressions of consecration out of the many on record:

'ABDU'L-BAHA has told the story of the widow of a Bahá'í martyr who was left with two young children to support. She provided for them by knitting socks; the proceeds from one sock she used for their support, and what she received for the other sock was her glad offering toward the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár. 'Abdu'l-Bahá then said, “It is this spirit which will build the Temple.”

“Truly, I say, the friends of God displayed wonderful generosity in regard to the contributions for the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár. They displayed magnanimity at any cost to such an extent that some of them sold portions of their clothing on the street.

“Praise be to God! that at this moment, from every country in the world, according to their various means, contributions are continually being sent toward the fund of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár in America. . . . From the day of Adam until now, such an event has never been witnessed by man, that from the farthest country of Asia, contributions were forwarded to the farthest country of America.

“Contributions for the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár are most important. Notwithstanding the miserable condition of Persia, money has poured in and is still coming for this purpose. Although many families are extremely poor, so that they have scarcely enough to keep them, nevertheless they give towards it. For many years the West has contributed towards the East, and now, through the Mercies and Bounties of God, a miracle has been performed, and for the first time in the history of the world the East is contributing to the West.”

THESE are only a few instances, but the stories of similar sacrifices could easily make many chapters if recorded. Suffice it to say that from Australia comes a regular flow of gifts for the Divine Edifice. From Persia, India, England, France, from Honolulu and Maui, Hawaii, and from groups and individual Bahá'is everywhere comes the evidence that unity in God is a living thing through the creative power of the Word of Bahá'u'lláh.

No less a personage than the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, Shoghi Effendi—who has said that “the specific Bahá'í institutions should be viewed in the light of Bahá'u'lláh's gifts bestowed upon the world”—has set an example in the divine art of real sacrifice when he forwarded the most precious possession from the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh to be sold for the Bahá'í Temple Fund in this country, and he has regularly contributed every month to the National Bahá'í Fund of America.

It is indeed the beginning of a new world cycle when the Orient actually contributes money to the Occident. Is this not the symbol of true love and brotherhood—knowing as all do the relatively impoverished condition of those people compared with that of America?

IN THIS TURNING of the thoughts and dreams of the Orient toward the New World and the awareness of the spiritual evolution going on in America, one finds the miraculous enlargement of the Asiatic consciousness which only true religion could have brought about. For to the illiterate peasant of Asia in general, the New World hardly has existence; or if any, but nebulous and unformed. Yet to the Bahá'is of Persia, Rangoon, and even of the jungles of India, America exists as an entity sufficiently to call forth their loving sacrifices. This is more than human education could have accomplished.

As witnessed in an article by A. H. Naimi on “Martha L. Root in Persia,” the Persian Bahá'is look with real vision toward America. The vision of what this dynamic rapidly evolving people of the New World will ultimately achieve for the Universal Bahá'í Faith, becomes the daily inspiration and stimulus to our brothers and sisters around the world.

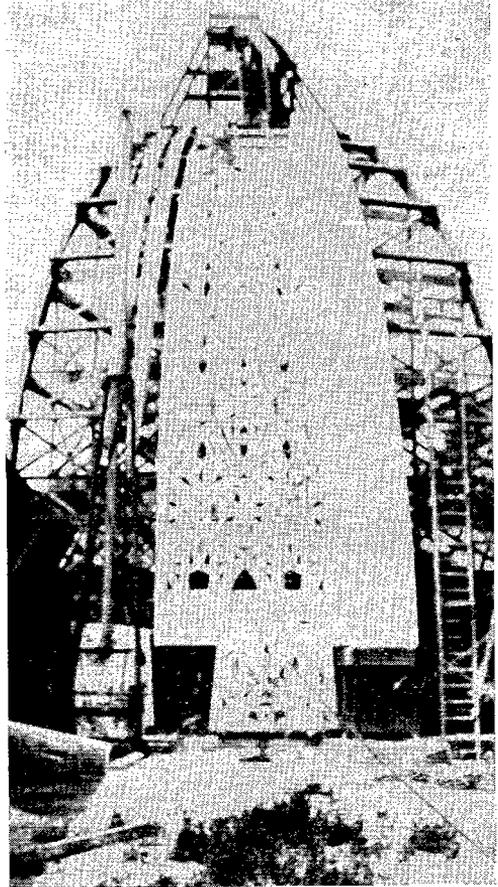

THE TEMPLE OF LIGHT

JOHN J. EARLEY

Mr. Earley was awarded the contract for the construction of the ornamentation of the Temple dome by the Temple Trustees, after a thorough study and investigation of his special architectural concrete by The Research Service and recommended by them.

TWELVE years ago last August two gentlemen came to my studio in Washington. They came unexpectedly and they brought with them only the photograph of a plaster model. They had been sent by a mutual friend, an engineer, deeply interested in the work being done with concrete by this studio, and who had suggested that we might offer a solution for their problem. One of these gentlemen was Mr. Louis Bourgeois, an architect, and the most unusual personality I had met in that profession; the other was Mr. Ashton, his friend; and the photograph which they brought was of a Temple, the most exotically beautiful building I had ever seen. It came up out of the earth like the sprout of some great plant bursting out to life and growth.

Mr. Bourgeois explained that he was the architect of the building and a member of the Bahá'í Faith. It soon became clear that this Bahá'í Temple was the dream of Mr. Bourgeois' life, that all his hopes and ambitions were centered in it, and that he believed himself to have been inspired to design a temple unlike any other in the world, so that it might be the symbol of a new religion in a new age. At that moment he was anxiously seeking a material with which to build it, someone with the ability to understand his work and who had the skill to execute it. He left the photograph with me after autographing it. I have it still. It marks the beginning of the project for me.

IN THE time which intervened between this meeting and the death of Mr. Bourgeois about two years ago, there developed between us an interesting and instructive friendship. We studied this Temple with all its ramifications of form, of treatment and of meaning as a preparation for the time when work on it would be begun. It was strange, in a way, that we of the studio should have given so much thought to it. We had no authority to do so, and as a matter of fact we were not commissioned to do the work until the summer of 1932. But somehow it always seemed to be our work. We understood it, we had the material and were equipped to do it.

The architect was interesting to us and we to him. And then there was the job itself, a thing to fascinate the imagination. A Temple of Light with a great pierced dome through which by day the sunlight would stream to enlighten all within, and through which by night the Temple light would shine out into a darkened world. When at night we look into the sky we see only the stars but could we see the orbits of the stars how wonderful it would be! Great curved intertwining in wierd perspective. Ovals, circles, and vesicas of endless variety twisted and woven into some great cosmic fabric. This is the theme of the dome,—the courses of the stars woven into a fabric. But this is not all; interwoven with the courses of the stars in the pattern of the dome are the tendrils of living things, leaves, and flowers, because no symbol of creation would be complete without a symbol of life. Lifted above the dome are nine great ribs, nine aspirations that mount higher than the courses of the stars. I wonder after all if it was strange that we of the studio should have given so much thought to this project?

THE DRAWINGS left to us by the architect adequately illustrate his ideas about the decorations of the dome but they do not pretend to show a method for making the dome nor for attaching it to the steel skeleton. Among his drawings are some of the most extraordinary full sized details of ornament. There is one of a panel in the field of the dome which is seventy feet long; another of the face of the great rib which is ninety feet long. Each of these drawings were made in one piece in a loft building on LaSalle Street in Chicago where he stretched out on the floor a great sheet of paper and with his pencil tied to the end of a long stick he drew in great sweeps—in a manner never to be forgotten—the interlacing ornament of the dome. One line through another, under and over, onward and upward until the motif was completed. Never have I seen a greater feat of draftsmanship nor a more interesting draftsman than was Mr. Bourgeois. Most surprising of all perhaps is the approximation to accuracy which he maintained in these great drawings in spite of the disadvantages under which he worked. He was obliged to stand on the drawing which he was making and his only view of the whole was from the top of a step ladder.

It became necessary, after the death of Mr. Bourgeois, for the Temple Trustees to carry these drawings further. This matter was put in charge of The Research Service of Washington, D. C., who allotted to our studio the development of the ornamental dome.

I cannot begin to tell you how many factors enter into such a problem and I am sure that we automatically give consideration to many without being able to recall or to name them—just as an operating surgeon might know the position and function of every vein and sinew, the names of which have long since been forgotten. So in discussing such a problem consideration can be given only to principles such as these—the decoration of the Temple must always be subservient to the architecture; the theme of the ornament must not be lost; the craftsmanship must be adequate, practical and economical; the materials must be suitable and enduring. This project as stated in many articles written about it, is a pioneer one in every sense of the word, structurally new and arresting, and involves the use of new methods, new processes, and the highest standards of materials and craftsmanship. The structure will be not only beautiful in accordance with the design but permanent and enduring through the ages.

“The first Mashriqu’l-Adhkár [Bahá’i Temple] in America was instituted in [Wilmette, Ill., suburb] of Chicago, and this honor and distinction is infinite in value. Undoubtedly out of this Mashriqu’l-Adhkár thousands of other Mashriqu’l-Adhkárs will be born.”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

THE TRUE SOVEREIGN

ALFRED E. LUNT

"Verily, those who have denied God and adhered unto nature as nature is, are indeed void of both science and wisdom, are they not of the erring?"

—Bahá'u'lláh.

In the first installment of this article, published in the May number, is pointed out the great truth that nature is in itself incapable of establishing values or achieving perfection. Therefore when mankind forsakes the path of revealed guidance for his upward climb and gives way to the forces of nature in him, he expresses, as a social group, confusion, chaos, degeneracy. This is what is happening in the world today. In this second and present installment, the author describes vividly the dual nature of man—the pivot of creation—a microcosm containing within himself the secrets of heaven and hell, a soul capable of upward and downward flights. Now is the destined time in the history of this planet for man to express his highest spiritual nature with the aid and stimulus of revealed truth and the power of the Holy Spirit by attaining the consciousness of the spirit of faith as contrasted with mere belief.

ARE these insidious enemies of our true welfare the inheritance of aeons of life when man was emerging from the slime of the waters, when Nature wholly dominated him, or are they the results of a gradual yielding to the natural allurements, the real fall of man enshrined in a mysterious tradition wherein he deliberately chose to dwell in the water and clay of the lower self and to forsake the heavenly delights of the divine provision? Certain it is that in the countless milleniums of his life on earth he has been brought face to face with the prophetic admonishments, and, flouting them, suffered the pains and punishments of disobedience. Nothing is clearer in the Sacred Books than that in a day concealed in the mists of creation he took a covenant with his Creator by which the infinite bestowals of God were promised him in exchange for his guerdon of obedience and acknowledgment of the True Sovereign.

If, now, these bestowals appear to be withdrawn; if in their place we are confronted with depression and unhappiness more widespread and more poignant than men have hitherto experienced; if the utmost ingenuity of our leaders is powerless to find the key to the solution,—can it be doubted that, if these premises are true, the reason for this deprivation is mankind's own default? Not the vengeance of God, but the unchangeable law of cause and effect operating in the arena of human affairs, has brought upon us these scourges. Long continued disobedience to the Command, forgetfulness and doubt of the True Sovereign have created in the heart of humanity a potent magnet of attraction for the indrawing of the destructive, death-dealing force of Nature which is ever ready to seize hold of those who madly stray from the impregnable stronghold and wander in the morasses of remoteness and ignorance.

AT WHAT point in its evolution the race became endowed with that capacity to know God that is commensurate with the assumption of responsibility, no record exists. Man has always stood at the forefront of the army of life, despite the unproved theories of certain anthropologists that he is merely a branch or descendant of inferior animals. Humanity is the main stem of the creational order. Concealed in the matrix of life as is the great oak in the acorn, his superior potentialities have slowly unfolded in the march of the centuries.* And in the long succession of aeons and ages, when civilization after civilization became buried and submerged by earthshaking cataclysms, who can say with accuracy that our present civilization surpasses or even equals the apex attained by former peoples, our remote ancestors? Man is very ancient. And the succession of divine teachers known as prophets stretches back to a period little imagined by the orthodox literalists. The building of these cycles of human existence, whose climax is to witness the entrance of all mankind into a universal era of brotherhood, peace and knowledge of reality, is the evident creational purpose indelibly recorded in the Word of God revealed to every nation. Herein lies food for thought. For it betokens the latent capacity of the race to evolve the supreme achievement of attaining a world-wide unity. As well to say that the oak tree, having reached the leafy stage is incapable of putting forth its seed-fruitage, as to insist that man is forever bound by the limitations, superstitions and prejudices he now exhibits. The little acorn, a mere pulpy mass, is in nature bound, once buried in the rich soil, to increase in stature and grandeur until its full fruitage bursts forth.

And, yet, many so-called leaders of thought upon whose conclusions the people lean, the materialistic philosophers, the shallow thinkers whose vision is veiled to the intangible, controlling power that governs the world of reality,—have taught that if there is a Creator He has absented Himself from His creation and forgotten it; that mankind is left wholly to its own resources. This is forgetting God, with a vengeance. Were it not for the redoubtable Champions of Truth, who resolutely arise amidst mankind in the time of need, revealing the Will and Word of God, such a philosophy might well attain a proud and irrefutable eminence, since all admit the evident truth that the Essence of God is unknowable. But the very existence of these divine intermediaries, dotting the pages of history at times most inconvenient to the oppressors of humanity, is and always has been an irritating, insurmountable fact to the materialists. Either must they deny their actual historical existence, or otherwise explain their enormous and unique influence upon the masses of humanity. Briefly, the materialist philosophers have endeavored to link man to the animal in such fashion as to deny to him and cause him to despair of the spiritual qualities and powers resident within him. But these qualities have ever been emphasized and certified by the Messengers who have ceaselessly called the people to awaken and put forth this glorious fruitage of the human tree of life.

LET US assume for a moment as true the definitions of the Manifestations of God concerning the true station of man. That in the sight of his Creator, he is, as it were, the pivot of creation, a microcosm containing within himself the secrets of heaven and hell, the divine and nether worlds. That he has been given dominion over every lesser plane of life including the elemental forces. That his soul is capable of both upward and downward flights. That he possesses powers unrivalled and unequalled by animal, vegetable and mineral realms, among them reason, spiritual susceptibility, the capacity of discovery and invention, and the ability to know his Creator, which implies a consciousness, amounting to certainty, of the realities of the divine world. That his heart is above all else the home of the Spirit of God, endowed with capacity to become the recipient of the Divine Love, than which no greater bounty is imaginable in the world of creation. That he is destined, through the establishment of unity in his own ranks, to uncover in this world the fragrant flowers of the Kingdom of God. That because of the free will of his soul he may choose the high or the low flight. That the ancient myth of the "devil" and all his works may be traced to man, himself, in his excursions into the dark caverns of Nature and his submission to her behests.

Not only this but, as a result, he becomes an emissary of that cruel sovereign, supplementing its impulses with his all powerful will, and registering its cruelties upon his fellow-beings with all the accumulated force of his (God-given) mind. Thus he has used gifts of which Nature is totally lacking, to refine and augment her blind forces. For this reason the "devil" has been reputed to be intelligent, capable of plots against the divine Sovereign, challenging His authority and His right to command humanity, and asserting in place thereof his own egoistic supremacy.

Such are the actual and latent glories and abasement of man described in the Book of Life. Can we doubt that the Will of his Lord, Himself the Creator, through His wisdom, of the natural forces, will become enacted and established on this planet? Already, glorious signs of this fulfilment are witnessed in the earth. The hour, concealed in the Book of Fate, has arrived when a new order is in process of institution. And the first and greatest step is the enthronement of His Sovereignty, through wisdom and explanation and the awakening of the new consciousness. "For every hour there is a fate," asserts Bahá'u'lláh. The destined hour for this consummation is here and now, consonant with the declaration of the Divine Decree.

“Beside Him, every one changeth by the will on His part, and He is the Almighty, the precious, the Wise . . . Nothing can move between the heaven and earth without My permission, and no soul can ascend to the Kingdom without My Command; but My creatures veiled themselves from My power and authority, and were of those who were negligent.”¹

“O, My servants! The Ancient Beauty commands: Hasten to the shadow of immortality, nearness and mercy, from the shadow of desire, remoteness and heedlessness . . . Be ye ablaze like unto fire, so that ye may consume thick veils and quicken and immortalize cold and veiled bodies through the heat of the divine love. Be ye pure like unto air, that ye may enter the sacred abode of My Friendship.”²

ONE OF the greatest superstitions of our race is the one held by the pessimists who insist that what is commonly regarded as human nature is unchangeable, that its manifest weaknesses are fixed and static. This view is ignorantly misleading and but panders to the suggestions of the inferior sovereignty. In the first place, the real human nature is by no means the powerless entity portrayed by the pessimist. Human nature is definitely associated with a world infinitely removed from the realm of instinctive obedience that characterizes the lower beings. The animal spirit, the highest of these lower orders, has been defined by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as “the virtue perceptible, resulting from the admixture and absorption of the vital elements generated in the heart, which apprehend sense impressions”. But the human spirit, He tells us, “consists of the rational faculty which apprehends general ideas and things intelligible and perceptible.” But the Spirit of Faith, the next stage above that of the human spirit, He explains,—“is the life of the spirit of man, when it is fortified thereby, as Christ (to whom be Glory) saith ‘That which is born of the Spirit is Spirit—’”. The human spirit then, according to this exact definition, possesses the power to acquire and reinforce itself by appropriating the eternal gifts of the Spirit of Faith. Thus the faculty of reason may become illuminated, rather united with that Spirit that confers the immortal existence.

In the face of these evident truths, human nature is seen as a distinct creation fully endowed with power, through the exercise of its unique rational faculty and the power of selection and choice resident in the will, to inhibit and ultimately render powerless the inordinate impulses of the lower phase of its nature. To do this, however, it must have recourse to a superior power. This power, happily, has affinity and connection with the noble reality of man, and is the goal of the upward flight of the soul. This power which is no less than the Divine Reality, the Conferer of true existence, has established the station of the Spirit of Faith as a center of Its outpouring, and beyond this yet other stations of Divine Nearness, in the journey of the soul toward its Creator. But since the station of Faith is nearest to man, it is the appointed place of his transformation from the world of nature, just as the vegetable realm raises and transforms the stony particles of the mineral. By attaining the consciousness of the spirit of faith, a consciousness identical with certainty—as contrasted with mere belief, we enter the only Fortress against which Nature’s onslaught is powerless.

ARE GOOD DEEDS ENOUGH?

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

"Is it not astonishing that although man has been created for the knowledge and love of God, for the virtues of the human world, for spirituality, heavenly illumination and life eternal, nevertheless he continues ignorant and negligent of all this? Consider how he seeks knowledge of everything except knowledge of God."

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

BACK in the fifteenth century Morality Plays were used to give religious and moral instruction to the unlettered masses. One of these, "The Summoning of Everyman", represents Everyman, a thoughtless and worldly young fellow as summoned by Death to go to the next world. Quite unprepared for this journey whence no traveler returns he seeks advice and comfort from his friends. First he turns to Good Fellowship who though sympathetic declares it quite impossible to go with Everyman on this journey. Worldly Goods is surprised that Everyman should even expect that he would take such a journey with him. Everyman in desperation calls upon his rather neglected companions Good Deeds, Knowledge, Beauty, Discretion, Strength and others. Good Deeds alone is willing to go with Everyman upon his journey, but she, alas, is at the point of collapse and exhaustion through neglect and utterly unable to go. However, acting upon the advice of Knowledge Everyman is able to revive Good Deeds and in the last scene we see Everyman fearlessly going down into the Valley of Death accompanied by Good Deeds alone.

SOME ONE once asked 'Abdu'l-

Bahá about those people whose deeds are good and actions praiseworthy—what need such had of the divine teachings? 'Abdu'l-Bahá answered that although such actions and efforts are most praiseworthy and approved, alone they are not sufficient. "They are a body of greatest loveliness", He said, "but without spirit".*

Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá explained that the first thing necessary is the knowledge of God and after that the love of God. "It is known," He said, "that the knowledge of God is beyond all knowledge and it is the greatest glory of the human world". Continuing He said, "Secondly comes the love of God, the light of which shines in the hearts of those who know God, for this is the spirit of life and the eternal bounty."

But there is a third thing necessary to bring a good deed to perfection. In the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "The third virtue of humanity is the good will which is the basis of good actions." By a simple illustration 'Abdu'l-Bahá made this point clear: "A butcher rears a sheep and protects it; but this righteous action of the butcher is dictated by desire to derive profit, and the result of this care is the slaughter of the poor sheep. How many righteous actions are dictated by coveteousness! But the good will is sanctified from such impurities". Just as a man is not perfect physically if his hearing, for example, is impaired, so a righteous deed is not perfect unless it possesses these three attributes, the knowledge of God, the love of God and the good will or sincere intention.

Bahá'u'lláh teaches us to say, "Thou hast created me to know Thee and to adore Thee," and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, as already quoted, says, "The fruit of human existence is the love of God". Simply to perform righteous acts then is for man to fall short of the purpose for which he was created. For the sun to shine and give warmth is doubtless perfection for the sun, but for a man to furnish warmth and food for another with no good will to man or love of God in his heart is an imperfect though a good deed.

There is a further note in this explanation of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's which leads us to see the source of all our good deeds. "Moreover", He said, "if you reflect justly you will see that these good actions of other men who do not know God are also fundamentally caused by the teachings of God; that is to say that the former Prophets led men to perform these actions, explained their beauty to them, and declared their splendid effects; then these teachings were diffused among men, and reached them successively, one after another, and turned their hearts towards these perfections. When men saw that these actions were considered beautiful, and became the cause of joy and happiness for mankind, they conformed to them. Wherefore these actions also come from the teachings of God". "But", added 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "justice is needed to see this and not controversy and discussion."

* * *

Do NOT these words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá help us to see why when we teach our children good morals without the firm basis of the knowledge and the love of God that not only is true religion lost but gradually morality itself becomes corrupted and chaos and confusion ensue? How can any of us be "strong to withstand all trials and temptations" except by the Strength that comes through the knowledge of God and how can we "bear all the swords of the earth" unless the love of God is firm in our hearts? Are we not too prone to be satisfied if we keep the second commandment reiterated by Christ? We forget that he said, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment".

The human race is now at the dawn of its maturity. No longer do we need to walk blindly by the half truths of morality plays. No longer is the truth hidden in parables. We have come to the age when He, the Spirit of Truth will guide us into all Truth. We have come to the dawn of the age when the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the Lord. Happy is he who whole-heartedly seeks the Source of all Truth in this day for he will surely find.

LETTERS HOME

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

This is the fourth installment of "Letters Home" describing the author's visit among the Bahá'is of Persia and her pilgrimage to historic Bahá'i sites in that land which gave the Movement its birth. Herein is described her memorable visit to Shaykh Tabarsi.

IN MY last letter we had been heartily welcomed by the Friends of Kafsha Kula, when I had to stop writing.

It was the end of a strenuous day, for before leaving Sári we had packed; gone to be photographed in the beautiful garden given by Abdul Molaki for the new Haziratu'l-Quds, been driven three times into the ditch by an inexperienced driver taking me over the new road built for my coming; met and addressed the Ahbáb of Mafruzac; commemorated the martyrdom of Mulla Ali Jan; said poignant good-byes, which is always a stirring emotional experience; greeted, in passing, the Friends of Shahid, and then participated in the welcoming ceremonies of Kafsha Kula.

The challenge to science today is to unlock the energies resident in the atom and release them for human utility. If some inspired person could find a method of utilizing the flea power of Persia, the land would become, over-night, the greatest producer in the world. But even the fleas, which made riot with our unaccustomed flavor, were unable to detract from the joy of this memorable meeting.

To our intense relief the rains were holding off although it was November; but when we arose to find a grey morning we were urged to make an early start for Shaykh Tabarsi, lest bad weather detain us.

IT IS THREE miles across a wide river ford and through barren rice-paddies (the crop had been long harvested) from Kafsha Kula to the site of the Fort so heroically defended against an entire imperial army by three hundred and thirteen men—not seasoned soldiers, not the grizzled veterans of many campaigns, like their opponents, but youthful students unaccustomed to arms and accountments, and long trained in the cloistered life of metaphysical argument and disquisition.

In the record of humanity we find no parallel to their accomplishment. Alexander's army of thirty thousand defeated the Persian forces of six hundred thousand fighting one to twenty; but they were a military organization, reared to "stratagems and sports." Quddus, Mulla Husayn and their followers, without previous training, without adequate supplies, with nothing but a flaming faith and an unquenchable devotion to their Lord, the Báb, repulsed not once, but again and again, one to a thousand, the forces arrayed against them.

Effie Baker, that intrepid and devoted servant of Shoghi Effendi, (whose exploits and experiences in photographing our historic Bahá'í sites in Persia to illustrate "The Dawn-Breakers" deserves the high appreciation and gratitude of the Bahá'í world), had come, in the course of her far-flung activities, to photograph this sacred place. My visit was of a very different nature.

I was the first Western Bahá'í who came, not to carry out an important commission such as hers, but to express, however feebly, that intense love and admiration that the followers of Bahá'u'lláh everywhere feel for these glorious saints and heroes.

IT WAS Friday the tenth of November that the "little town was emptied of its folk this pious morn'" to visit the Shrine, and a large cavalcade, including Bahá'ís from many places in Mazindaran, from several parts of Persia, together with the Spiritual Assembly of Sári, set out across the uncharted fields for this memorable journey to Shaykh Tabarsi.

In the darkest days of our oppression and persecution in Persia, when the word Bahá'í was barely whispered, Bahá'u'lláh promised that one day Bahá'ís from the West would freely and openly consort with their brethren in this sore-tried land. The miraculous fulfillment of this early promise was the thought uppermost in the mind of every Persian, today.

Some of the descendants of Mulla Ali Jan had arrived from Mafruzac, and since they had the gentlest horse in the community it was chosen for me. It is quite thirty years since my equestrian exploits, and being still very feeble from my recent prolonged illness, they mounted me on a great pack-saddle astride, with the owner leading his docile mare and Alai, a large and very strong man, literally balancing me by the hand, over rough land and winding roads for six long miles. Let anyone who considers this a mere polite gesture try it soon.

"Such a sight has never been seen in Mazindaran before," exclaimed Dr. Nadari. Sári, turning with a kind of awe to watch this new army of peace advancing in the footsteps of those aforesaid destined by the forfeiture of their lives to challenge the world to the contemplation of peace, gazed in wonder.

Our horses gallantly swam the river, bare-legged Bahá'ís guiding them safely to the steep bank opposite. It was in this very spot that the Mulla Husayn implored those who were unprepared for the unprecedented difficulties that lay before them to turn back. Those who finally crossed with him remained to the end.

Sometimes we swarmed afoot and ahorse over a big bare paddy, sometimes we went single file over a narrow bridge, but the sound of prayer and chanting never abated and at every turn we called upon the Greatest Name.

"Allah 'u 'Abha!" Allah'u-'Abha," cried the granddaughter of Mulla Ali Jan again and again as we wound along the narrow irrigation paths. "That must be our only thought today, our only utterance," she said.

*God is the Most Glorious.

Mrs. Ransom-Kehler and her cavalcade leaving Shaykh Tabarsi.

In due time we reached the village of Arfa, headquarters of the Imperial army besieging the Fort, and at a short distance we dismounted before the Shrine, left, because it is a Muslim tomb, when everything else connected with the Fort was demolished.

At my request, after we had recalled the magnificent history of the spot, the entire party went into the inner room where the world's greatest hero, the Mulla Husayn lies buried by the side of the old Islamic teacher, Shaykh Tabarsi. There they chanted the Tablet of Visitation revealed for him by the Báb.

Their devotions finished I was permitted to enter the Shrine alone. Who can estimate the meaning of a moment or who recount the miracle of a thought? Into the untrained mind of Brother Lawrence flashed the idea that spring would soon adorn the barren boughs at which he glanced, with verdure, and over him flooded the realization of the Presence of God in which he lived out his life with joy and assurance. No more elevating an incident than the light on a brass kettle reflected into the soul of Jacob Boehme his ecstatic reunion with his Lord. "Dante looked at Beatrice once and ten silent centuries sang."

My visit to that humble and neglected spot has pierced life with a purpose that it did not have before. To visit our sacred Shrines* in Palestine is indeed a shaking experience, for these Eternal Beings wring the soul with the appalling testimony of the cumulative horrors that man has ever heaped upon God's Messengers. But after all these occupy a rank and station apart from human kind. What They endured They endured with a superhuman equipment.

The Mulla Husayn was human like unto us and with every limitation of humanity attained to the station of divinity; in his ecstatic devotion, his unswerving fidelity, his utter self-immolation it would be hard to find his peer or likeness.

My heart nearly broke as in an abandonment of misery and repentance for all my negligence, unworthiness and arrogance, I fell prostrate upon this hallowed earth and besought God to teach me, at whatever cost, that sublime lesson of humility that had elevated this great devotee to a position of incalculable glory; to kindle within my breast, with the fuel of my very being, if necessary, this light of abandonment in His service that causes every personal wish to cast the shadow of death; to quicken in my soul that life eternal which alone can revitalize this earth into the promised Kingdom of God.

I see no humility, no fire, no life in myself since the utterance of this impassioned prayer. I still go my ways in arrogance, opinionation, and subverted purposes of achievement. But in an unused portion of my being, like a treasure hidden in a field, lies something tremulous and unforgettable, something with a wistful fragrance and tenderness, something that lures and stills me, something strangely startling and tranquilizing—the recollection of how the Mulla Husayn stood with folded arms upon the threshold, like a servant to the man who had been twice preferred before him, and rose from the dead, as it were, that no attention or respect might ever be lacking to that one whom he might so easily have regarded as a usurper of his position;¹ of how, though numbers wished to acclaim him, he remained indifferent to their adulation; of how, in every instance, before and after the Declaration of his Lord, his eye never deviated from that Figure of Divine Perfection upon which his life was stayed.

No one could kneel upon the Shrine of the Mulla Husayn and arise the same person. The world is still resounding with his challenge,² raised first, by his glorious namesake, the Imam Husayn: "Is there any who will assist me?"; the earth is still reverberating with the tread of his dauntless feet; leading now the armies of the Supreme Concourse he is still searching for recruits. And as I knelt there something buoyant and eager in me seemed to answer "Here" to his muster-call while ringing down a forgotten vista in my heart I heard the marching order "Mount your steeds, Oh heroes of God!"

Those who stayed behind were gathered in the square before the Haziratu'l-Quds when men and horses had once more safely crossed the river and we returned. The samovars were boiling; tea was passed.

"This day will never be forgotten." said Abdul Molaki of the Sári Assembly. "Babes carried in their mothers arms today will be tutored to recount this story to an unborn generation."

"This is what that celestial army died for." I said; "the unity of East and West, of men and women, of rich and poor, of young and old, of black, white, yellow and brown. Implore God that in that future when these children recount the story of our pilgrimage, if as you suggest it be brought to memory, my glaring faults, my childish frailties will have been effaced by time. We give no heed to Peter's violent temper, to the cold and narrow nature of James, to the complaints of Martha; for they are walking in a light that irradiates this gloom. And when my last toll is taken and my earthly pilgrimage complete may the infinite compassion of God—should I ever be recalled—decree that if my faults must live some remembrance of my great devotion to His Holy Cause, of my intense desire to serve the Guardian, may also live beside them."

BEFORE luncheon was finished a great stir and commotion announced the arrival of my convoy from Babul (Barfarush); sixteen automobiles conveying the Spiritual Assembly and a large group of Bahá'is. Together with the cars from Sári (for the Spiritual Assembly still continued beside me) we had a procession of nineteen automobiles—a nine day's wonder in Persia, where even the King is not so escorted. The streets were filled with gaping crowds as we passed; the square surged with an inquiring host when we arrived.

And thus ends one chapter and begins another,—my divine adventure in Babul and the adjoining villages.

I'd be ashamed to tell you how late it is—or how early, as the case may be. Reading this over I am still more ashamed of its egotistical tone; but the pilgrimage to Shaykh Tabarsi is a purely subjective experience.

Mulla Husayn, referred to in the foregoing article was surnamed the Bábu'l-Báb. He was the first to recognize and embrace the new Revelation. The following is one of the stirring statements about him in "The Dawn-Breakers":

"The circumstances attending his martyrdom evoked the Báb's inexpressible sorrow, a sorrow that found vent in eulogies and prayers of such great number as would be equivalent to thrice the volume of the Qur'án. In one of His visiting Tablets, the Báb asserts that the very dust of the ground where the remains of the Mulla Husayn lie buried is endowed with such potency as to bring joy to the disconsolate and healing to the sick."

"Quddus, with his own hands, laid the body in the tomb . . . He afterwards instructed them to inter the bodies of the thirty-six martyrs who had fallen in the course of that engagement in one and the same grave on the northern side of the shrine of Shaykh Tabarsi. 'Let the loved ones of God,' he was heard to remark as he consigned them to their tomb, 'take heed of the example of these martyrs of our Faith. Let them in life be and remain as united as these are now in death.'"

THE MARTYRDOM OF QUDDUS

FIRST and foremost among those pioneers of the Bahá'í Faith in Persia who were martyred at the fort of Shaykh Tabarsi stands Quddus, a disciple of the Báb and His chosen companion on His pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina. Nabil, in his Narrative of the early days of the Bahá'í Cause,* records the story of the martyrdom of Quddus in these words:

“By the testimony of Bahá'u'lláh, that heroic youth, who was still on the threshold of his life, was subjected to such tortures and suffered such a death as even Jesus had not faced in the hour of His greatest agony. The absence of any restraint on the part of the government authorities, the ingenious barbarity which the torture-mongers of Bárfurush so ably displayed, the fierce fanaticism which glowed in the breasts of its shi'ah inhabitants, the moral support accorded to them by the dignitaries of Church and State in the capital—above all, the acts of heroism which their victim and his companions had accomplished and which had served to heighten their exasperation, all combined to nerve the hand of the assailants and to add to the diabolical ferocity which characterized his martyrdom. . . .

“What pangs of sorrow He [the Báb] must have felt when He learned of the shameful treatment which His beloved Quddus had undergone in his hour of martyrdom at the hands of the people of Bárfurush; how he was stripped of his clothes; how the turban which He had bestowed upon him had been befouled; how, barefooted, bareheaded, and loaded with chains, he was paraded through the streets, followed and scorned by the entire population of the town; how he was execrated and spat upon by the howling mob; how he was assailed with the knives and axes of the scum of its female inhabitants; how his body was pierced and mutilated, and how eventually it was delivered to the flames!

“Amidst his torments, Quddus was heard whispering forgiveness to his foes. ‘Forgive, O my God,’ he cried, ‘the trespasses of this people. Deal with them in Thy mercy, for they know not what we already have discovered and cherish. I have striven to show them the path that leads to their salvation; behold how they have risen to overwhelm and kill me! Show them, O God, the way of Truth, and turn their ignorance into faith.’ ”

'ABDU'L-BAHA'S VISIT TO BUDAPEST

The following article, which was translated into Hungarian by Mrs. Irma Szirmai, appears as an introduction in the first Hungarian edition of Dr. Esslemont's book, "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era," recently published in Budapest. The translation of Dr. Esslemont's book into Hungarian was made by Mr. Georgy Steimer of Győr, Hungary.

THE readers of the Bahá'í Magazine will be interested to know of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's historic visit to Budapest, Hungary, from April ninth to eighteenth, 1913. Several distinguished statesmen, scholars and business men of Budapest hearing that 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Son of Bahá'u'lláh the great World Educator, was passing through Europe from the United States en route to His home in Haifa, Palestine, sent a most cordial invitation urging Him to come to the Magyar Capital and speak of His Father's Teachings for the oneness of mankind and universal peace.

When 'Abdu'l-Bahá, this great teacher belonging to one of the noblest families of Persia, the illumined expounder of the Bahá'í Teachings, arrived at the railway station with His party, He was met by Dr. Ignatius Goldziher, the renowned Orientalist; by Professor Julius Germanus, professor of Persian, Arabic and Turkish languages in the Oriental Institute of Budapest University; by Director Leopold Stark, a very well known engineer, and others. They escorted Him to the Ritz Hotel* where He took rooms facing the beautiful Danube River. With Him were His Persian secretaries, Persian interpreter and two or three other companions.

A few minutes after their arrival, a delegation of citizens came to welcome this Eastern Visitor officially and He met them in a most friendly way in the lounge. The group included Prelate Alexander Giesswein, one of the most honored and learned thinkers and pacifists of Hungary, then President of the Peace Society and of the Hungarian Esperanto Society, Professor Robert A. Nadler, the renowned painter, the family of Director Stark and several others, among them an American and an Indian notable living in Budapest. They addressed 'Abdu'l-Bahá saying: "In the name of all present we welcome the blessed Presence of Abdu'l-Bahá. We admire your great life and we offer You our thanks and deep gratitude, that at Your age, You take upon Yourself these long journeys for the sake of helping and comforting humanity. Such labours, such sacrifices as Abdu'l-Bahá endures are our great examples, that we may know how to live and to serve humanity."

This beloved Visitor responded that thanks be to God, He hoped all of them would be confirmed in the service to humanity! He said that we can render no greater service to man than to spread unity in the world of mankind, and to work for universal peace. He showed how, when the East was in black darkness and was surrounded on all sides by the gloom of fanaticism, Bahá'u'lláh arose like a sun from the sky of the East and proclaimed the unity of mankind.

Reporters were present and asked many questions about the Bahá'í Teachings for world understanding. Members of the Theosophical Society invited 'Abdu'l-Bahá to speak at their meeting the next evening, April tenth. Also, a joint invitation was extended to Him to give a public lecture April eleventh, the event to be under the auspices of the Theosophical Society, the Women's organizations and the Esperantists. 'Abdu'l-Bahá smilingly accepted.

EARLY the following morning 'Abdu'l-Bahá prepared tea Himself and praised the marvelous view from His window overlooking the broad, blue-glistening Danube with its immense and wonderfully ornamented suspension bridges, its gayly decorated steamers and the beautifully laid-out promenades. Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá took a walk across one of these large bridges to Buda. His personality and dignity attracted the attention of all who saw Him; many stopped to greet Him with reverence and to ask questions.

All day people visited Him in the hotel and He spoke with them about the spiritual unity of the East and the West. He voiced to them this remarkable thought that it was his hope that Budapest might become a centre for the reunion of the East and West, and that from this city the light might emanate to other places. He also said that thanks be to God the conception of spiritual life was alive in Budapest, that men search for truth, that they care for the Word of God and long to be guided to the Kingdom Everlasting.

When callers spoke to 'Abdu'l-Bahá about the buildings and the sights of the Hungarian Capital, He kindly replied to them that He came to Budapest to see the objects of interest and buildings of human hearts, and not the buildings of stone and of the city. He said to them speaking symbolically, that He knew of a Country in which there are glorious cities; that in that Country there is but one universal language spoken, and therefore, they would all understand one another without an interpreter. He said they would see There His Holiness Christ and the Prophets and would find good people There just as were around Him here. He told of the delicious fruits There and said they were for them. His visitors were astonished, but when asked if they would like to go with Him to that beautiful Land, they replied: "Yes, we will go with you willingly!"

PROFESSOR Germanus, a young but already celebrated Orientalist, brought a group of young Turkish students to call upon 'Abdu'l-Bahá and these youth presented Him with a letter of solemn welcome signed by all students of the Turkish language in Budapest. 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke to them in perfect Turkish. They marvelled at His eloquence and His command of this tongue. He told them that it was His highest hope that the East and West might be united completely. He made it very clear to them that in reality, East and West do not exist—that each point on this terrestrial globe is equal, with the same rights; that any point in relation to another point is either East or West; that all are points of one sphere, one country, one humanity. Therefore, He said, He was very happy to visit this country of Hungary which is the standard-bearer of progress to the East, and which unites with the Western culture the Eastern feelings of cordial hospitality to people of other countries. He blessed them and hoped they would, day by day, become more confirmed in service and progress.

Others called and in the afternoon 'Abdu'l-Bahá visited the homes of several families. He went, in the evening, to the Theosophical meeting where fifty people were awaiting Him. The Chairman greeted Him in these words: "We welcome 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the name of all our brothers and sisters, we are extremely happy that this blessed One has visited us. . . ."

"'Abdu'l-Bahá replied that He was greatly pleased to address such a noble spiritual assembly. He called them a noble, spiritual gathering because they were most diligent in their endeavors for peace and fellowship, and He spoke to them about the oneness of mankind. His words were so appealing that the Chairman again thanked Him and in the name of all present invited Him to come to them again on Saturday evening, April twelfth. (He did go to this second meeting and all present again felt His mighty spirit, especially when He prayed for the people of Hungary; in closing He prayed that God would give them heavenly strength, surround them with heavenly happiness!)

ONLY glimpses of events can be given in this brief introduction, but on the evening of April eleventh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke in the old Parliament Building to more than one thousand people. This great hall was formerly the Hall of the Parliament; it has two platforms, a higher and a lower, 'Abdu'l-Bahá stood on the higher one directly underneath the coat-of-arms of Hungary—those ancient, historical arms held by two white-winged angels. This great holy teacher was introduced to the audience by Prelate Giesswein as Dr. Goldziher stood at 'Abdu'l-Bahá's right. Suddenly the people, as if sensing the deep significance of the moment, burst into tremendous applause. They felt, if they did not understand, that 'Abdu'l-Bahá standing between the Catholic Prelate and the Jewish Orientalist represented the reconciliation of these two great religions.

Dr. Germanus who interpreted 'Abdu'l-Bahá's words into Hungarian said that he never saw a more interesting audience. He said that all seats were occupied while many stood in the gallery; aisles and corridors were crowded and a line extended even to the street! Members of Parliament, members of philosophical and philological societies, university professors, artists, Catholic priests, Protestant clergymen, representatives of modern religious movements, women's organizations, Esperantists, members of social and humanitarian societies, many nationalities, many races were present—in a word the gathering reflected the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh: one must unite everything that is good and precious in mankind, one must give equality to women, must help the ignorant and oppressed and must lead all humanity to mutual understanding!

After the lecture many approached 'Abdu'l-Bahá to express to Him their reverence and their delight in what He had said to them. His reply had in it one of the great truths of the Bahá'í Faith. He told these eager listeners that the influence of the words spoken and the confirmation from the Kingdom of God are two perfectly different things: the influence of spoken words on the soul, and the elevation of the soul which can be attained only by the blessing of the Heavenly Kingdom. Words alone cannot bring the great spiritual transformations, only Bahá'u'lláh's favor and help and the victory of the Holy Spirit can give that great spiritual experience.

After the lecture a dinner was given for 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Hotel Pannonia.

'ABDU'L-BAHÁ saw many friends at His hotel the following day, April twelfth. Mr. Alajos Paikert, founder and Acting Vice-President of the Turánian Society called and invited this great Visitor to give an address before the members of their society and friends, on Monday evening, April fourteenth, Mr. Paikert who is also one of the founders of the Society for Foreign Affairs and organizer of the celebrated Agricultural Museum in Budapest (also of the Agricultural Museum in Cairo, Egypt) praised 'Abdu'l-Bahá's high aims for peace. 'Abdu'l-Bahá told him He hoped that he would attain great spiritual power and do much to promote peace and universal brotherhood. He showed how many ways there are to unite souls but none has such a power as the Word of God.

This lecture arranged by the Hungarian Turánian Society took place in the majestic hall of the former House of Magnates in the National Museum Building. As Mr. Paikert told me: "'Abdu'l-Bahá was introduced by me, and as He ascended the tribune and began to speak, the entire audience of two hundred prominent gentlemen and their ladies, listened breathlessly to Him. He spoke in Persian and His thoughts were interpreted into English, and then Mr. Leopold Stark gave them in Hungarian language. 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke of the high culture of Turán about which He knew so well, and showed how it was destroyed by religious inharmony and conflicts. He outlined a constructive plan for enduring peace. When asked which place would be chosen for the centre of peace, 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied that it would be the country in which the standard of peace will be established first, that will be the centre! After the lecture 'Abdu'l-Bahá took supper in the home of Ali Abbas Agha Tabrizi, and the Turkish Consul was one of the guests.

" 'Abdu'l-Bahá, next day, accepted the invitation to honor my home in Budapest with a visit," said Mr. Paikert. "He came with His friends and we gathered in our reception hall in my villa on the slope of God's Mountain, overlooking the Hungarian Capital. He spoke with my family and friends in His mild, dear voice, about the high virtues of family life in the different countries, of lofty moral and spiritual ideals and of understanding among the nations. We listened, deeply impressed by the extraordinary spiritual personality of 'Abdu'l-Bahá."

Several visits were made by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He went to the homes of Professor Nadler and of Mr. Stark, and He visited the late Count Albert Apponyi in Buda. These two discussed the highest problems of mankind. The writer of this introduction interviewed Count Apponyi and heard him speak twice. He said that his aim too, is an assured peace, based upon justice, peace of soul not at the mercy of unforeseen political changes. He said: "Hungary has been, as it were, on the high road of the conflicts that have shaken the world for centuries past. If there is any nation to whose interest it is that a new order should be set up, based upon law and not upon force, upon concord and cooperation and not upon rivalry, if there is any nation to whose special interest it is that peace should be established and consolidated, that nation is Hungary. Peace is not an isolated problem. It is a central star around which all other social problems revolve, as the planets revolve around the sun."

PROFESSOR ARMINIUS VAMBERY, the outstanding Orientalist and erudite scientist, whom both Queen Victoria and King Edward of Great Britain distinguished for many years with their friendship, invited 'Abdu'l-Bahá to his home several times. In a subsequent letter of Professor Vambéry to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, one feels the heat of a flame breaking forth from the heart of a man who has always sought for the great Truth.*

Professor Robert A. Nadler who in 1913, was Professor of Painting at the Royal Academy of Art (and later became Professor in the University of Technical Sciences) has painted a wonderful portrait of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He said to the writer of this introduction: "When I saw 'Abdu'l-Bahá, He was in His seventieth year. I was so impressed and charmed with His Personality that I had the great longing to paint His portrait. He consented to come to my studio, but said He could not give me much time because He was so busy. I marvelled at His expression of peace and pure love and absolute good-will. He saw everything with such a nice eye; everything was beautiful to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, both the outer life of Budapest and the souls of all. He praised the situation of our city, our fine Danube in the midst of the town, good water, good people. Oh, He had so many beautiful thoughts! I was inspired, and I knew I did not have much time, so I concentrated very much. He gave me three sittings."

It will interest readers to know that 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself and His Persian companions said that the portrait was a success. Professor

*This visit will be described in a subsequent article on 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit to Budapest.

Nadler is one of only two painters who ever had the opportunity to have 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself sit for a portrait. This painting is not only a strong likeness of 'Abdu'l-Bahá showing His spiritual power and majesty, but every detail is pleasing. His hand which has blessed and helped so many thousands is shown full of tenderness, the whole portrait vibrates in harmonious colors. In the centuries to come, Hungary will be distinguished as the home of this historical portrait. It now hangs in the Studio of Professor Nadler in the University of Technical Sciences in Budapest, and he says that he is so happy to have the Presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá always with Him in his studio!

'ABDU'L-BAHA was ill for two days as the cold weather and a sudden snow storm so unusual at that time of year, brought on a severe gripe. However, He insisted on dressing and meeting all the friends who knocked at His door. All the friends, including several families, came. Among the many words that 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to them were these, that they must never forget the history of Bahá'u'lláh which He had related to them. He showed them how much Bahá'u'lláh's Teachings had spread in the past sixty years, how the Bahá'i Movement is known in the East and in the West. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said that since He had been in Budapest He had set a flame aglow, and the day would break when its light would shine visibly to everybody. He explained that the origin of a tree is only a small seed, but if it develops and begins to grow, it will bear a beautiful fruit. 'Abdu'l-Bahá told them that souls would come who would rejoice their hearts and the Cause of God would make great progress in Hungary. He assured them that if they arose in the service of the holy Teachings as they should, that the Hosts of the Omnipotent would come to their assistance and they would be victorious. When asked about meetings, He told them very clearly just how to arrange Bahá'i meetings.

On the morning of April eighteenth, 'Abdu'l-Bahá and His party went to the railway station to leave Hungary. A great number of devoted friends were there to bid them farewell,—many Hungarians and also some Turks, Americans, and Indians. They were very sad that He must go, but He consoled them and asked them to follow the Holy Teachings, spread the Glad Tidings and lead people to unity. Each one in his own language begged for a blessing in his endeavor to serve. Then as the train moved out, they continued to gaze at His holy countenance with their arms outstretched in longing!

GLIMPSSES OF THE NEW WORLD ORDER

Notes on a Visit to Haifa and 'Akká

MABEL AND SYLVIA PAINE

"In spite of all difficulties Bahá'u'lláh was ever in an exalted state; His face shone continually. He had the presence of a king. One cannot imagine any one with more majesty. One never thought of Him as a prisoner—on the contrary one would have said that He was enjoying the greatest triumph for He drew His strength from Divine Powers which always triumph."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

The first installment of these "Diary Notes" was published in the March number. Therein the authors told of their arrival in Haifa, their meeting with Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, and with members of the family of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The second installment published in the April number gave a description of their visit to 'Akká and the old prison quarters where Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá were incarcerated for so many years. Herein is a further description of the barracks at 'Akká and a brief description of Bahji the house in the country outside of 'Akká occupied by Bahá'u'lláh during the later years of His life.

FROM 'Akká we drove to the Garden of the Ridván, the garden which Bahá'u'lláh had made and which He frequented during all the latter years of His life after He had been freed from the strict imprisonment of 'Akká and when He occupied the house in the country known as Bahji.

He Himself describes this garden in one of His works:

"One day we repaired unto our Green Island. When We entered therein, We found its streams flowing, its trees in full foliage and the sun playing through its interstices." The vision which He there beheld was such that "the pen fails to describe." Later He beheld in holy vision in this garden, "one of the countenances of the Exalted Paradise, standing on a pillar of Light and calling out in the loudest voice saying: 'O ye concourse of heaven and earth, gaze upon my beauty, my light, my appearance and my effulgence. By God, the True One, I am trustworthiness, its manifestation and its beauty; I am the most great ornament to the people of Bahá; I am the greatest cause for the affluence of the world; and the horizon of tranquility to the people of existence.'"

With such associations is the Ridván Garden hallowed. The island which Bahá'u'lláh refers to is made by the separation and confluence of the river Belus. The flowing streams are little runlets of water from a fountain which plays at intervals. These runlets flow through the center of the garden under a large mulberry tree. It was here Bahá'u'lláh used to sit. Surrounding this central, most sacred portion are green lawns, borders of scarlet geraniums, lofty palms and other sub-tropical trees. In the gardener's house is the room which Bahá'u'lláh sometimes occupied containing His chair kept in a cedar box.

FROM THE Ridván we drove back to 'Akká.

The barracks where the Bahá'is were thrown on their arrival in 1868 are thus described by the sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

"The season was summer (1868) and the temperature very high. All our people were huddled together on the damp earth floor of the barracks; with little water to drink, and that very bad, with no water with which to bathe, and scarcely enough for washing their faces. Typhoid fever and dysentery broke out among them. Everyone in our company fell sick excepting my brother, an aunt, and two others of the believers. We were not allowed a physician; we could not procure medicine. My brother had in His baggage some quinine and bismuth. With these two drugs and His nursing, He brought us all through with the exception of four who died. These were two months of such awful horror as words cannot picture. Imagine it if you can. Some seventy men, women and children packed together, hot summer weather, no proper food, bad water, and a general attack of the terrible diseases of typhoid and dysentery.

"There was no one with strength to be of any general service but my brother. He washed the patients, fed them, nursed them, watched with them. He took no rest. When at length He had brought the rest of us—the four who died excepted—through the crisis and we were out of danger, He was utterly exhausted and fell sick Himself, as did also my mother and the three others who had heretofore been well. The others soon recovered, but Abbas Effendi' was taken with dysentery and long remained in a dangerous condition. By His heroic exertions He had won the regard of one of the officers, and when this man saw my brother in this state he went to the Governor and pleaded that Abbas Effendi might have a physician. This was permitted and under the care of the physician my brother recovered."

Bahá'u'lláh was confined in a separate room in these barracks and this room is now much altered and used as part of a prison hospital. Over the door is a brass plate with a statement of Bahá'u'lláh's confinement there from 1868-1870. One might think of the change in this scene of suffering as symbolic of the kindly action of the hand of time, which so often covers and beautifies a place otherwise too horrible for weak human hearts and minds to contemplate. But surely the sincere soul cannot gaze upon the scenes of such dire sufferings and recall that they were endured patiently and even joyfully, without becoming very thoughtful concerning a faith thus cradled.

After two years spent in the barracks the Bahá'is were removed to a fairly comfortable house with three rooms and a court. The Governor of 'Akká had been so impressed with their lack of resentment, their kindness and uprightness, and their sorrow at being unable to meet the Bahá'í pilgrims who were constantly coming from Persia in order to meet Bahá'u'lláh that He allowed them this change and freedom to go and come in the city. To this first real dwelling place of Bahá'u'lláh in 'Akká we now directed our footsteps. Here we saw the room where Bahá'u'lláh wrote the Aqdas or Book of Laws.

Although the others had the freedom of the city Bahá'u'lláh was confined to the house. Here He remained for seven years. One day He remarked "I have not gazed on verdure for nine years. The country is the world of the Soul, the city is the world of the bodies." When 'Abdu'l-Bahá heard this remark He felt moved, in spite of the strict imprisonment, to prepare a place for Bahá'u'lláh in the country. This He accordingly did, renting a large house on the plains of 'Akká from an absentee landlord at a very low price, sending laborers to put the garden in order and repair the house and finally, in spite of the strict injunction to the contrary, walking out through the city gate.

Father and Son both seemed possessed of the same kind of power that shone out from Christ, the power that the people felt when no one dared to lay hands on Him for His hour was not yet come. At first Bahá'u'lláh was reluctant to use this power, but finally yielded to the entreaties of a certain Muhammadan Shaykh, who loved Him very much and pleaded persistently that He go out from His long imprisonment. There the rest of His days were spent in that "world of the soul" He so loved.¹

It was to Bahji the second house He occupied on the plain of 'Akká that we next drove. This house has within a few years come into the possession of the Bahá'is and has been restored by Shoghi Effendi to the condition in which it was during the time of Bahá'u'lláh. Here we spent the evening and night. Near Bahji is the shrine in which lie the remains of Bahá'u'lláh. Its court contains an indoor garden of fresh greenness, trees pushing up to the open skylight which lets in the gentle motion of outdoor air, vines embroidering all with luxuriant leaf and blossom. Between the shrine and the house are broad stretches of lawn, lofty trees, flowered borders. Everything shows signs of perfect care and cultivation, such care and cultivation as come from deep devotion. About all is an atmosphere of deep, creative peace. One is reminded involuntarily of the scriptural lines with their beautiful symbolism: "the Valley of Achor² (shall be) a place for the herds to lie down in, for my people that have sought me."³

In these beautiful gardens and lawns around the shrine one sees a new and unique kind of place of worship, one which extends the atmosphere of the sanctuary to the surrounding out-of-doors. The spiritual charm of this arrangement at Bahji is that the brilliant and stately beauty of the surrounding gardens gently woos the soul away from earthly thought and prepares it for the yet more intense spirituality of the shrine itself. Just in front of the shrine are many interlacing paths where one may prolong the time of preparation before stepping from the kindly beauty of nature to the more lofty and searching worship which the shrine itself inspires.

¹ See "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era" by J. E. Esslemont, for a full account in the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá of this beautiful incident. ² Spelled also Acca and 'Akká. ³ Isaiah 63:10.

It was in the house at Bahji that Bahá'u'lláh received Prof. Edward G. Browne the distinguished orientalist from the University of Cambridge who was the first person to come from the Western world to investigate the Bahá'í faith. Before entering the room in which this significant event took place, the visitor may pause and read from the framed copy hanging beside the door Prof. Browne's account of this meeting. The large apartment with its low divan and few chairs is just as it was on that memorable occasion. Fresh jasmine blossoms strewn on a white square of cloth mark the place where sat the wondrous and venerable figure of Bahá'u'lláh. Of this meeting Prof. Browne wrote: "The face of Him on whom I gazed I can never forget, though I cannot describe it Those piercing eyes seemed to read one's very soul; power and authority sat on that ample brow; while the deep lines on the forehead and face implied an age which the jet-black hair and beard flowing down in indistinguishable luxuriance seemed to belie. No need to ask in whose presence I stood, as I bowed myself before One who is the object of a devotion and love which kings might envy and emperors sigh for in vain."

As we entered the room we seemed to realize somewhat the tremendous power which sustained those early followers of Bahá'u'lláh, the power which centered in Him placing Him among those few who, as Carlyle puts it, "through having a higher wisdom, a hitherto unknown spiritual truth are stronger than all that have it not."

The words which Bahá'u'lláh uttered on this memorable occasion reveal this higher Wisdom which He possessed. They have been often quoted but are so great and timely that they should ring in the ears of every one in these disastrous days, spurring us on to attain a new world order!

"We desire but the good of the world and the happiness of nations—that all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers; that the bonds of affection and unity between the sons of men should be strengthened; that diversity of religion should cease, and differences of race be annulled—what harm is there in this? Yet so it shall be; these fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away, and the 'Most Great Peace' shall come. Do not you in Europe need this also? Is not this that which Christ foretold?"

"Oneness of the world of humanity insures the glorification of man. International peace is the assurance of the welfare of all humankind. There are no greater motives and purposes in the human soul."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

PETER OR PAUL?

DALE S. COLE

THE question, are we our brother's keepers, is assuming insistent dimensions. It is a modern query in that it is at least four dimensional. It is deep. It is widespread. It has scope, and time is of the essence of the problem.

Whenever a question presents itself in such magnitudes, it commands attention for it manifests itself in absence of equilibrium, in agitation and want. You and I may not be willing to admit that we are our brother's keepers but we can hardly escape being his banker, his baker, his doctor, or his candlestick maker. We either buy from or sell to him. We either serve him or he serves us. We are his colleagues or his competitors. These inter-relationships are inherent in our present social and business pattern. They bespeak a basic community of interests which is not apparent in the administration of our affairs.

We have learned, quite recently, that no individual, corporation or state can be "splendidly isolated" and altogether self-sufficient. There are always "entangling alliances." Society, as we have it, is predicated upon a certain degree of cooperation. Just where to cease cooperating and begin competing has been one of the disturbing dilemmas of the past. Now we are wondering just where to stop competing and begin cooperating.

There is a great difference in these two attitudes. The philosophy which sacrifices cooperation to competition is one of acquisition at all costs. It has been the philosophy of the period of business inflation. It is the philosophy of the jungle, survival of only the strongest, "Devil take the Hindmost", and "Might is Right." Its actions are based upon the premise that what is best for the few is, perforce, best for the many. It has functioned, so far, to concentrate wealth, as represented by money and credit, in the hands of the few. These few joyfully accepted the custodianship of this wealth, not as trustees, but as outright owners. Assuming administration of wealth carries with it an obligation, one that has not yet been assumed—that of social responsibility.

Can anyone contemplate social responsibility without being confronted with the question, am I my Brother's keeper—and to what degree?

It seems that we are answering this question in the affirmative as evidenced by the tremendous relief programs in effect the country over. But we have been forced to these measures by the exigencies of the times. We cannot let our brothers actually starve, for aside from humane considerations, we need them as consumers.

THE OBJECT of life seems somehow to have skewed itself around to the aim of having everyone consume as much of everything as possible. What cross-eyed conception of life can this be? Consume things mightily or let the malevolent forces of a badly adjusted and poorly managed way of life consume our substance, our equities, our hopes and our faith in that vaunted theory "that all men are created free and equal."

To live to consume! Carried to its ultimate this procedure breeds wars which consume human lives. Such action contains the seeds of its own destruction. To consume more than one actually needs becomes a task and carries a penalty. If we eat too much, we are uncomfortable. If we use wastefully too much coal, future generations will pay for our profligacy.

This, by the way, brings in our brother's children as well as our own. Is it right to force them to pay in the future for what we use now? Many there be who answer an emphatic "No" to this question. Furthermore, knowledge may advance so rapidly in the immediate future as to make long range planning seem not only foolish but futile, unless such planning deals with the fundamentals of life leaving methods and institutions flexible enough to meet changing conditions.

All of these anomalies and many more arise in an atmosphere of exaggerated competition. In an industrial society, when our brother consumes recklessly, he is an asset. When he does not, he is a liability. We are willing to be our brother's keepers at least in that we want to keep him consuming. Whether we like it or not, we are keepers, for we either keep ourselves and our brothers at work or in want. In our civilization, just now, there seems to be no "Golden Mean." Life's relationships are too closely knit for us to escape responsibility. In our own bodies, the liver cannot be diseased without affecting the whole, even our thought processes. One sick industry handicaps others. One infected state may endanger the world.

The scientists have found that in dealing with individual electrons and protons, a certain set of laws apply. A single electron seems to have a large degree of "free will." It may do almost anything. But in dealing with matter as we know it, that is, with large aggregates of electrons and protons, another code of laws applies, and that code is more or less deterministic, so that electrons and protons associated in large numbers, lose free-will, as it were, and are subject to deterministic regulation.

Similarly, an individual as an individual may exercise a large measure of free will in many respects, though bound by some laws of course, but as a member of a society of his kind he lives under a code of laws and one of the obligations he cannot escape is his responsibility to his fellows to contribute his utmost to the general welfare.

Refer to the preamble of our constitution. What were the explicitly expressed purposes of the framers?

"... in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, . . ."

Is justice established? Is tranquility insured? Has the general welfare been promoted? Have we secured the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity? Rather we seem bound to the wheel of a faltering economic and social system. Was it not the intention of the constitution framers that citizens should cooperate with each other in order to advance the common weal? And in so doing would not each one be his brother's keeper to a degree not apparent in our relationships this day?

Is it not more difficult and expensive in every way to compete than to cooperate? If not then why the mergers and trade associations, and why any division of labor at all? Why do we choose the thorniest path?

Competition may have been and may be, at times, the "Life of trade", but when poison-tipped with greed and selfishness it is also a lethal weapon. We have had an overdose of it individually, commercially, nationally and internationally, and it may take some time to get the poison out of our systems—but it can be done.

But the cooperative attitude cannot be legislated. It can be achieved by mutual agreement among the parties concerned—by "covenants openly arrived at", individually and collectively. Often the urge springs full-blown from some contingency. A quarrelsome crew will man the pumps when the ship is in distress without benefit of executive coercion. The instinct of self-preservation is a potent energizer. Perhaps we are approaching the situation where it will function in economic, political and social problems to clear the way for better understanding.

But the objection is voiced that these idealistic theories, if such they be, cannot be applied in an industrial civilization. 'Tis true that they have never been practiced, but is it equally true that they cannot be? Are we not fast approaching the crisis where we will be willing to try? As other expedients prove inadequate, perhaps we will learn to attack our problems at the roots. Where are these roots found? Surely in the hearts of men.

Let us be honest. Either practically or idealistically is there any justification in our scheme of life for want in the midst of abundance? For greed, envy and hatreds throttling our business, social and economic progress? When and where in the history of mankind has injustice ever paid? After all there is great wisdom in the question. "What doth it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

By WHATEVER name you call it the society of the future will be more cooperative and less competitive. We will stop "robbing Peter to pay Paul." By all the signs and portents we are our brother's keepers, and in keeping our brothers we are keeping ourselves, either in poverty or well-being. Which shall it be? Is it not always wise to be wise? Words of wisdom have often been spoken. For instance—a new note of wisdom in Bahá'u'lláh's teachings:

"Let not a man glory in this that he loves his country, let him rather glory in this, that he loves his kind."

"O My Servant! The best of men are they that earn a livelihood by their calling and spend upon themselves and upon their kindred for the love of God, the Lord of the Worlds."

Both Peter and Paul are our kind. They are our kindred.

“No matter how much man may acquire material virtues, he will not be able to realize and express the highest possibilities of life without spiritual graces . . . it is evident that man is in need of divine education and inspiration; that the spirit and bounties of God are essential to his development.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

ONE OF THE most fundamental facts concerning human nature is the variation in personalities and talents as between individuals. A wide range exists between the child born with such a low grade of intelligence that it can hardly be expected to provide successfully for its own life and welfare, and the child born with such an intellectual and creative dowry that it is plainly destined to become a leader.

What about this latter group of individuals, who from birth seem destined not only to successful management of their own lives but to the expression of such powers as will lead to the management, the direction, or the influence of many other lives? How are such great gifts to be used?

Too much in the past have such individual talents been considered as so much capital for the use of which humanity must pay good interest. If the field of operation is that of politics, of military power, of commerce,—the individual possessed of great capacity for leadership has considered it his privilege to wrest from the world all that he could in the way of reward, of power, of luxury of living.

The artist has, it is true, a more generous impulse toward the expression of his talents—an impulse to bestow upon the world something of everlasting beauty and of joy. Yet here, too, the native power of intelligence or spiritual influence has often been debauched.

There are certain lines of human endeavor where altruism is the expected thing. In the fields of religion, of medicine, of education, and of science we expect the individual possessed of great powers and gifts to have some conscious motive of altruism, some willingness to use his energies and abilities for the benefaction of the human race. Leaders in these fields of endeavor have not failed, in many cases, perhaps in the majority of cases, to live up to this expectation. Whatever of personal, of human ambitions there has been, has been sublimated by ideals of service.

BUT WHY should a few professions only be the restricted field of altruism, of benefaction? What a wonderful world it will be when in all fields of human effort the high principals and ideals will prevail which hitherto have served to guide only the more unselfish professions above described.

And in such a thought we are not voicing a mere utopian wish, but a matter of grave necessity to the human race. The time has plainly come when powers of leadership in every field of action must be dedicated to human welfare, must be, or else the race will perish from fratricidal discord. With the spread of education and the awakening of the intellect, the masses will no longer endure exploitation from those whose powers make them natural leaders in the fields of politics and of commerce. Not only will they not endure it, but it will not be economically possible for them to endure it; because, as the present economic collapse has demonstrated, powers of industrial and commercial leadership, when misapplied through greed and lust for power, produce such cataclysmic chaos as to threaten the very existence of civilization. The world cannot go on supinely as the helpless prey of war lords whether of guns or of dollars. The adjustments of economic machinery are too delicate to be any longer the object of personal ambitions and exploitations.

For those who cannot bring themselves to limit their own designs upon humanity and express motives more beneficial, there must be definite limits placed by society; else the world will perish as the prey of chaos and disintegration.

THE PLACE to begin this change as regards the application of gifts and powers to human endeavor is not with the adult world however, but with the child. From the very beginning the child must be taught that his genius is a gift from God and not a thing which he has himself created or which he is entitled to selfishly use. Every individual whose gifts are above the ordinary has for that very reason a grave responsibility to society. These gifts are created for useful service, and not for exploitation.

Education should develop these gifts in children without concurrently developing pride, self-esteem, and selfish ambition. In the modern type of "progressive schools" where rivalry is never awakened as between individuals, where prizes are not given, nor attention called to marks or to gradations of scholastic ranks, the egotistic factors of human nature are thereby sublimated if not eliminated. Much can be accomplished by the mere process of secular education—much is indeed being accomplished in schools of the higher type where the whole emphasis is upon social rather than individual development; where service to group achievement for the sake of the group is the ideal rather than personal prowess and prestige.

BUT THIS is not enough. We can never perfect human nature in the child merely by leaving out those factors which tend to produce egotism, or by encouraging with high social motives a spirit of helpfulness and of group-consciousness.

All this is good, but it is not enough. Nothing short of the spiritual training and enlightenment of the child can perfect his nature to the point of real social altruism. The ego is too deeply seated in us all, too dominant a personality factor to be overcome by mere negations or even by redirection. This fundamental egoism can only effectively be overcome by spiritual direction; by the awakening in the child of an intense desire and aspiration toward the development of the angelic potentiality which all the prophets have insisted is innate in man, yet waiting for development. "Man has two aspects—the physical which is subject to nature, and the merciful or divine which is connected with God . . . if the divine and spiritual should triumph over the human and natural he is verily an angel."

When children are definitely trained in these spiritual principles; when they are made to realize that they have a dual nature; that they have that in them which will tend to the exploitation and selfish domination of their fellows while at the same time they have that within them which will enable them to rise to spiritual and social perfection,—then they ought to know what is before them. All but a few will aspire and endeavor to attain that spiritual perfection of their nature which is needed both for their own development and for the sake of a perfected society.

WHEN I came into the Presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Paris in 1913 and He inquired about my educational work with children, He said, looking searchingly at me, "Do you teach them the spiritual things?" Alas! the answer had to be, "No, there is no place for it in the curriculum." The meaning of His question has grown larger with every succeeding year, until now it stands apparent and open as the day.

What help is there for the world unless children are taught spiritual things? Shall we train and develop minds to exploit and destroy the human race? Of what avail is education if it is to produce recurrent catastrophes and chaos such as exists today throughout the world? Shall we sharpen the sword of egoistic ambition so that it will penetrate the vitals of our planet? Is that what education is to do? Or must it redirect human energy into paths of spiritual effort and attainment, sending out into the world a body of youth dedicated to service as well as to personal advancement?

Do not misunderstand me. I do not mean to imply that even by such spiritual training all personal ambition will be effaced and nothing but motives of service prevail. When such a condition exists, this world will be inhabited by angels. With such a culmination there would be no need of any further evolution upon this planet.

No, even spiritual education will not make angels of human beings in one or two generations. All that we can ask is a proper balance between self-seeking motives and altruistic motives. Even the Prophets of God do not ask of us the utter negation of the self-seeking motives, except in those planetary crises where apostles and martyrs are necessary for the spread of a great Cause. In the ordinary phases of human progress man may seek,—is indeed justified in seeking personal advancement, professional success, and financial security for himself and for his family: "O My Servant! The best of men are they that earn their livelihood by a profession and expend on themselves and on their kindred, for the love of God, the Lord of all worlds."¹

It is no chimerical dream that we are proposing, but something within the range of possibility and practicability—the harmonizing of the egoistic motive with the altruistic, the awakening in the individual of the sense of his responsibility to society for two definite and weighty reasons: first, because he owes to society an immense debt which he can never individually repay, the bequest to him of the rich gifts of modern civilization, gifts which came from the unselfish labor of those who have previously existed upon this planet; secondly, because God has given him whatever gifts are his for the purpose of service, not for the purpose of exploitation. When therefore the individual is using his gifts for the purpose of exploitation he is denying his real nature; he is sinning against God and man; he is incurring a spiritual debt which if he could see in terms of reality he would realize that ages of suffering might be needed to expiate.

The creative powers in us are, we are told, the gift of the Holy Spirit, the functioning of that great Creative Force which built the universe and which constantly vitalizes it into progress. When these gifts are used blasphemously, so to speak, for egoistic purposes only, contact is gradually cut off from the great Source of Power, and we find these gifts either failing or misdirected with consequent tragedy to the individual. When on the other hand these gifts are used for the benefit of the world, the contact with this Central Power, remains unobstructed the gifts increase in force and magnitude, guidance remains perfect, and the individual prospers and is able to aid humanity in an ever increasing degree.

In the light of this reasoning it is apparent that the greatest success even of the individual is through the path of service. This is a truth which humanity needs to deeply study and acquire, and every child should be taught it as the most fundamental axiom of living. We shall have a different world when this spiritual principle is applied to all fields of human endeavor.

“There is no greater result than bonds of service in the divine kingdom and attainment to the good-pleasure of the Lord. Therefore I desire that your hearts may be directed to the kingdom of God, that your intentions may be pure and sincere, your purposes turned toward altruistic accomplishment unmindful of your own welfare; nay, rather, may all your intentions center in the welfare of humanity and may you seek to sacrifice yourselves in the pathway of devotion to mankind.”

AN INTERVIEW WITH 'ABDU'L-BAHA

MARY HANFORD FORD

The author, a pioneer American Bahá'í, has made the teaching of the Bahá'í Cause her life work.

IN these difficult days when the entire economic system of the world is in confusion, and when ordinary life has become so hectic as to be almost unbearable, I am reminded again of the memorable visit I made to 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the prison of 'Akká, Palestine in 1907. He had been held there as a prisoner ever since He was incarcerated with the family of Bahá'u'lláh after their exile from Persia.

The great story of the Bahá'í Cause was just beginning to be recognized at that time, and very little of its spiritual and economic teaching was translated and known in the Western World. People who heard the strange tale of the distinguished prisoner of 'Akká often hastened to visit Him. He was held there by the Sultan of Turkey because He taught ideas out of harmony with the prevailing creed of Muhammadanism though in perfect accord with the system of Muhammad Himself.

These people returned to the Western World with such strangely varying accounts of their interviews, so evidently colored by their own previous conceptions and theories, that one felt confused and realized that any sacrifice was desirable through which one might visit the prison of 'Akká and speak face to face with its illumined inmate.

So like many others I journeyed across the seas and presented myself at the door of 'Akká on the date upon which 'Abdu'l-Bahá had given me permission to come. I did not know then, what I only learned some time later, that at this very moment, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was enduring especially rigorous persecution. He had been living for some years as a political prisoner in His own house within the walls of the town and was even permitted at times to visit Haifa and the Bahji, where was the tomb of Bahá'u'lláh. But the powerful Muhammadan priesthood of Persia and Turkey had long been determined to accomplish His martyrdom and, enraged at His continued escape from this, they finally sent the police to His home, just one month before my arrival, commanded every guest to leave the place instantly, and forbade 'Abdu'l-Bahá to receive any western friends henceforth. Meanwhile a questionnaire was drawn up to be sent to 'Akká by a special committee. According to its plan if 'Abdu'l-Bahá filled out the questionnaire His answers would be so incriminating, that there could be no difficulty in obtaining the Sultan's signature for His sentence of death. All these danger threats were in the background of my rendezvous with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but I knew nothing of them.

AT THAT time I had heard various histories of the emotional experiences of those who came into the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá at 'Akká.

Some had fainted, some had fallen at His feet in uncontrollable weeping, all of which behavior I was sure disturbed Him greatly. So I considered carefully how I might avoid such calamitous exhibitions. I was familiar with the story of Victor Hugo and his antagonists of the classic drama in 1830. I remembered that the young Romanticists selected the word Iron as indicative of their invincibility and self-control in contact with their classic opponents. Cold, impenetrable as iron, they met their enemies, successfully. So I decided when I came into the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, if my lips began to tremble and my knees to shake, I would mentally repeat the little word Iron, Iron and become unimpressionable as its black substance. Of course had I prayed at such a moment the emotional disturbance would have been intensified instead of eliminated.

Sure enough as the wonderful figure of 'Abdu'l-Bahá appeared in the doorway the expected result arrived with Him, but I gazed upon Him, squaring my shoulders, while my mind fastened itself purely upon the black little word Iron, Iron! Can I ever forget how He looked at me with laughing eyes, and began to relate all the tortuous journey that had brought me to 'Akká, meeting plague and quarantine at every port, and pouring out the contents of my thin pocket book, until it seemed as if nothing would be left in it if I ever reached the bleak walls of the ancient town.

He laughed at me saying: "Many people come here in a gala journey. They stop at the best hotels. They come here when they have nothing to fear, they travel in a company of friends and are a gay crowd! They do not realize they are on a pilgrimage to a holy place—and that they must pray much before they can understand it. If they do not pray before arriving, they must pray after they come here, but you have been forced to pray for guidance during the entire route, and so you are filled with the sense of prayer. You have lived and attained only through prayer."

Then he went on telling one amusing story after another, perceiving all the perturbation of my poor nerves, until my knees no longer shook and I was at peace.

But one thing was registered disconsolately in my mind: This radiant and powerful person, this centre of wisdom and love! I knew that I could never ask Him a question, and how should I ever discover all the facts I wanted to know about His great teachings, those teachings which were not yet in printed words for the world to study, but the realities of which were constantly pouring into my consciousness.

Then began the marvelous days which followed, days which transformed and rebuilt, creating certainties from doubts, and eternal realities from ephemeral possibilities.

Can I ever forget the setting of this phenomenal drama? A little gallery ran all around the second story upon which the family of 'Abdu'l-Bahá lived, and each chamber opened upon the gallery. Also the door of each room was a different and gay color. There were pink, yellow, green and white doors, but no black ones. I asked once why the doors were all different colors, and was told it was because the family never had money enough for more than one door at a time in those dark and dubious days of imprisonment!

The little room in which I stayed and in which the significant conversations with 'Abdu'l-Bahá took place, was of the simplest description. The floor was covered with matting, the narrow iron bed and the iron wash stand with larger and smaller holes for bowl and pitcher were of that vermin proof description with which I had become familiar. Everything was scrupulously clean, and there was an abundant supply of sparkling water for bathing and drinking. A wide window looked over the huge town wall upon the blue Mediterranean and before this stretched a divan upon which 'Abdu'l-Bahá sat when He came to see me.

UPON MY arrival in 'Akká my mind was filled with pain caused by the vivid description I had heard in Paris of another terrible martyrdom of Bahá'is that had occurred in Persia. These martyrdoms continued from the period of the Báb's Declaration until the advent of the present Shah of Persia, who put an end to all religious persecutions. The description of these particular atrocities was so detailed that finally I could bear no more and cried out my protest, exclaiming "but don't you realize that the martyrs are in a state of bliss from the moment the torture begins, and feel none of the pain inflicted upon them?"

Where upon the assembled company turned upon me in deep disgust, and reproached me severely saying: "How dare you say such things! You are taking away all the glory of martyrdom!"

I remained abashed but not convinced, and felt that I must ask 'Abdu'l-Bahá for the settlement of this disturbing question, but I never asked it. The first morning that He came into my little room He did not sit down, but walked back and forth in the narrow space and presently remarked, while I listened with awe, "There are many kinds of martyrdom. How many times have I prayed for it, but instead of that I have lived on in prison as if with the sword of Damocles suspended by a hair over my head! Each morning as I waken I feel that before the day ends I may be dragged to the public square and shot to death. But nevertheless I have been very happy in this long martyrdom, for no victim suffers from the cruelties inflicted upon him. The instant the torture begins he is in a state of bliss, and feels nothing but the joy of Heaven which surrounds him."

He paused, looking out through the wide windows at the blue Mediterranean, the view of which beyond the huge walls seemed to eliminate their imprisoning power. Then he added, "So Christ never suffered upon the cross. From the time the crucifixion began His soul was in Heaven and He felt nothing but the Divine Presence. He did not say, speaking in Aramaic: 'O God; O God why hast Thou forsaken me?' But this word Sabaethani is similar in sound to another which means glorify, and he actually murmured, 'O God! O God! How thou dost glorify me.'"

Then He repeated to me such a story of martyrdom as I have never heard elsewhere and which I have not time to relate here. But I can never forget its dramatic expression of joyous deathlessness.

OF ALL these hours spent with 'Abdu'l-Bahá however, the most memorable and eloquent were those in which He described the economic future of mankind. At that period, in 1907 the labor saving machines had not yet affected the labor market to a serious extent, nor produced what must be generally recognized as a high degree of permanent unemployment but the change was working and 'Abdu'l-Bahá well understood its righteous conclusion.

Sometimes He sat still as He discoursed, speaking in that marvelous, colorful voice, such as none has used I am sure since Christ talked upon the mountainside or in the homes of His friends. Then He would rise in the excitement of what He portrayed, and walk back and forth conscious of nothing but the ideals which possessed Him.

He said: "Today the dynamic energy of the Holy Spirit has poured in such volume through the Messenger of God that even the masses of men have received it, and that was not possible before. Always in the past specially sensitized souls received the influence and acted upon it. But today for the first time the minds of all people have been touched by the spirit, and the result is that the designs of labor saving machines have been clearly revealed to them. It may seem strange to you that the Holy Spirit should give designs for labor saving machines," he added, "but in reality every creative impulse of the brain can arise only through contact with the spirit. Without that the brain is merely capable of conventional and traditional action.

"The civilizations of the past have all been founded upon the enslavement of mankind and the poor working class has suffered every oppression for the sake of the enrichment of the few. This limited wealthy class has alone had the privilege of developing individuality. The down trodden worker after laboring long hours each day, has not had sufficient mental capacity at the conclusion of his task to do anything but eat and sleep.

"That all mankind might have opportunity, it was necessary to shorten the hours of labor so that the work of the world could be completed without such demand of strain and effort, and all human beings would have leisure to think and develop individual capacity.

"The labor saving machines were given to create leisure for all mankind." 'Abdu'l-Bahá repeated this several times. He was so deeply impressed with this fact that as He spoke He arose and walked back and forth in the little room, His face and eyes shining with joy over the happy future into which He gazed.

"The first decided shortening of the hours will appear," He declared, "when a legal working day of eight hours is established," and this of course took place in 1917 when Woodrow Wilson enacted the legal day of eight hours for all federal workers, and really for the workers of the United States.

"But this working day of eight hours is only the beginning," went on 'Abdu'l-Bahá. "Soon there will be a six hour day, a five hour, a three hour day, even less than that, and the worker must be paid more for this management of machines, than he ever received for the exercise of his two hands alone."

Speaking in 1907, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "You cannot understand now, how the labor saving machines can produce leisure for mankind because at present they are all in the hands of the financiers and are used only to increase profits, but that will not continue. The workers will come into their due benefit from the machine that is the divine intention, and one cannot continue to violate the law of God. So with the assurance of a comfortable income from his work, and ample leisure for each one, poverty will be banished and each community will create comfort and opportunity for its citizens. Education will then be universal at the cost of the state, and no person will be deprived of its opportunity." All these eloquent words and many others which I have not time to note here, were spoken to me by 'Abdu'l-Bahá without the asking of a single question. His utterance, as always, was directed toward the inner urge of the mind He addressed, and He was perfectly aware that the mentality seeking Him at the moment was deeply interested in the problem of banishing poverty.

THERE IS not space to mention many incidents connected with this visit to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. One was very curious. Invariably as I sat with Him I was conscious of a growing lightness of body, so that I said to myself, if He stays much longer, I shall not be able to keep my feet on the floor, I shall float up to the ceiling! Invariably then He rose and swiftly left the room with that rapid gliding movement which made one feel He was flying rather than walking. On the last day of my visit He left me in this fashion, and I stood by the little table in the centre of the room. As I gazed after Him the words flashed through my mind, "I have been here, I have seen Him, and everything is just as I knew it would be." 'Abdu'l-Bahá paused on the threshold, looked back at me with His eyes full of laughter and repeated the words that had in the same instant passed through my mind: "You have been here, you have seen me and everything is just as you knew it would be!"

The wonderful words He said to me in farewell I can never forget. In expressing my profound appreciation for all His gracious kindness to me and the wealth of knowledge and illumination he had given me, I finally cried out, "O 'Abdu'l-Bahá! Why cannot all the world come here to see You as I have done and receive this understanding of life and its meaning, this light of the Spirit!"

He looked at me for a moment with a sort of sadness, and then replied, "Dearly beloved, many people cross the ocean and cross the desert and come here to see me. They stay sometimes a week—a month—a year and then they go away. They have not seen me at all." He paused a moment with a far away look in His eyes and added, smiling as He took my hands—"It is better to meet me in the worlds of love!"

CHURCH AND STATE IN THE BAHÁ'Í SOCIAL ORDER

HUSSEIN RABBANI

This gifted author, a graduate of one of the large universities in the Near East, has been contributing a series of articles in The Bahá'í Magazine on certain social phases of the Bahá'í religion, all of which have been read and studied with great profit. Herein he presents a vivid picture of the Bahá'í State of the future and how its religious character becomes clear and practical.

THE problem of the relations between Church and State is one of the oldest and the most delicate problems in the whole field of political history. It has aroused many important issues and given birth to innumerable complications from the beginnings of medieval history down to the present time. The solutions offered by various writers throughout the centuries are diverse and often incompatible with a realistic view of social phenomena. Some have thought to settle the whole issue by admitting that Church and State—both being essential and divine in character—should stand on an equal basis, while others have minimized the role of the State and attributed to the Church an unlimited authority over its members. We need not enter into a detailed study of these different theories, for such an attempt would be beyond the scope of this essay. Suffice it to say that the problem of Church and State attained its highest pitch during the Middle Ages when the Pope and the Emperor came into conflict over the question of their respective jurisdiction and authority. For many long centuries this struggle continued until it culminated in the final victory of the papal over the imperial power during the thirteenth and the two following centuries. With the Reformation the international supremacy of the Church was not only reduced but utterly abolished.

The State now made its appearance and was destined to assume the leadership. The call for universalism was at last stifled and it gave place to the new ideal of national independence. Europe, instead of forming a united Christendom under the spiritual and temporal jurisdiction of a single Church, was divided into a series of national and territorial sovereign states. Gone were the days of Gregory VII and Innocent III before whom emperors had to bow and ask for mercy. The state had, indeed, through the working of innumerable forces succeeded in vindicating its rights and prerogatives, and established itself on firm foundations. It had won the challenge and thrown off the yoke of an absolute and intolerant ecclesiastical power. It was now the turn of the Church to suffer persecutions at the hands of her age-long enemy which she had so ruthlessly combated. And ever since that time the State, unforgetful of the past, has always looked with suspicion towards the Church. In many countries it has refused to give it legal recognition, while in some others it has severely shaken its organization and persecuted its followers. And still in some others it has allied itself with it, only to persecute other churches and religious bodies.

IN THE Bahá'í political system all these sources of trouble which have for so long sapped the energies of men and prevented every peaceful cooperative undertaking are once for all banished and people are trained to forget their religious prejudices and fanaticism and to strive for the realization of their common welfare.

For under a Bahá'í social and political regime the two institutions of Church and State, which are today so widely separated, are united into a single whole and are blended together in such a wise as to make every possible friction in the future highly improbable. Not only so, but the very problem of Church and State will cease to exist. The State being religious, and religious in the Bahá'í sense of the word, will organize itself along lines which are at once practical and broad. For the Bahá'í Faith is fundamentally a social force. It conceives of religion not as a mere individual phenomenon but essentially as a means whereby the entire community can find its way towards a better social order. Thus considered religion can no more be dissociated from man's every day life. And how could it be separated from the State since it is its very purpose to carry out what every political organization attempts to do, namely to maintain peace and order and to enable the individual to realize the best that is in him? This is why the Bahá'ís condemn asceticism and favor a life which is at once fruitful and progressive. Theirs is a religion practical in its aims and all-embracing in its scope. It is even more inclusive than the State itself, having in view not only man's external and public life, but directing and moulding the private life of the individual as well.

BUT HOW will such a fusion between Church and State take place? And to what results will such a sort of combination lead? The Bahá'í state we have said will be religious and religious in the deepest sense of the word. For the Bahá'ís believe that religious and political phenomena have some common ground; and that any attempt at creating a gulf between them is not only superficial but disastrous in its results.

But religion under this new dispensation will have features that are alien to practically every existing religious sect today. For the Bahá'í principles are of two kinds. There are those which are specifically Bahá'í in character and concern. To such a category belong all the various ordinances such as prayer, fasting, etc. No one has the right to impose them on any person. For such an act would be tantamount to an interference in his personal beliefs. To the second class belong all the social and humanitarian teachings such as universal peace, universal language and other various sociological principles which are of general concern.

These humanitarian teachings constitute the nucleus of the Bahá'í social and political program which the Bahá'í state of the future will attempt to carry out. These principles, being broad and universal, can in no wise contradict at least in a general way the doctrines and creeds of any group living within the confines of the Bahá'í state. They stand at the basis of every social, political, and religious system of thought in this age and are advocated to a large extent at least by all peoples irrespective of their creed, race or language.

With such a point of view, what we have already remarked concerning the Bahá'í state of the future and its religious character becomes clear and practical. Since the Bahá'í Faith has no elaborate creeds and dogmas and no complicated system of theology and possesses no sacerdotal hierarchy, it becomes easy to conceive of its evolving one day into a political² and social organization adequate to cope with the needs of a highly complex society. It is also obvious that under such a system the problem of separation between Church and State can find no place. As a certain writer puts it: "The separation of Church and State can only be temporary—a momentary stage in the march of societies. If, at a time when the sovereign did not affiliate the spiritual and temporal power under his sway, history shows us that with the old sectarian religions the State has seen the formidable power of the Church (with which it has had to reckon and sometimes to struggle) take shape in face of it, and often against it, it could not be thus then in the future city founded on Bahá'í principles. The absence of all religious ceremonies, and consequently of the clergy and priestly hierarchy, does not admit of there ever being a question of separation of Church and State. . . .

"In the presence of religious unity, the State will be religious; not that it must give to all its acts a mystical appearance, which could not be in keeping with their material object But, religion being put into practice in all acts of life, from the minister of state down to the humblest official, each one will be penetrated by the sacred character of his responsibility and of his mission which he is bound to fulfill in conformity with divine law."¹

In every country, the majority of whose inhabitants are fully recognized Bahá'ís, the establishment of a Bahá'í government is an easy matter. They will be called upon to take hold of the reins of government and to carry out their program and to enforce it in so far as it will be deemed feasible. The minority of the people are under the strict obligation to obey the injunctions and wishes of the majority, provided that such an obedience on their part will not entail a violation of their essential rights and duties.

For let there be no misgiving as to the true nature of the Bahá'í state. The minorities, whether religious or otherwise, living within its boundaries can in no wise be afraid of being persecuted or suffer their freedom of action to be curtailed. For the corner-stone of the Bahá'í state is the principle of toleration, without which no real life is possible. While it is true that a government representing the wishes of the majority is entitled to obedience by the minority, yet the latter should not be suppressed or its rights violated by the majority. Men should develop a sufficient breadth of view which would enable them to tolerate views and ideas that are different from theirs. They should try to widen their horizon and to realize that truth is not the monopoly of any single party or group. The more deeply one goes into a given problem the greater becomes his conviction in the relativity of human knowledge and experience.

LETTERS HOME

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

This is the fifth installment of "Letters Home" describing the author's pilgrimage to historic Bahá'í sites in Persia and her visits among the Bahá'ís of that land. In her own words, "There is nothing so lovely as the face of a Persian Bahá'í." Herein is a beautiful description of her visit to Babul, Bahnamir and Arabkhayl.

IN Babul (Bárfarush) I stopped in the home of dear Dr. and Mrs. Faruk Bassar. In order to insure my perfect comfort and quietude, the Bassar family had moved out bodily; the doctor had even changed his office and dispensary into another house. Every provision had been made for my happiness and repose.

It requires "a pen far abler than mine" to begin a recitation of the epic glory of the Bahá'ís of Babul. Theirs is a poor community; there is no really rich person amongst them, but their charities and tender care of those from nonBahá'í communities is a perfect exemplification of the command of Bahá'u'lláh to make the poor amongst us our trust, and of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to make the enemy the true brother.

The idol of Babul a few years ago was a dervish who preached a crusade of extermination against the Bahá'ís. Falling at last the victim of a most loathesome disease he was abandoned by his followers and left in filth and agony to die alone. It was then that the Bahá'ís came to his assistance, (being careful always to have with them Muslim witnesses to attest the innocence of their ministrations) and proved the only friends to ease his dying days.

DUE TO having my talks interpreted, the meetings are twice as long as if I could speak directly. Naturally people get tired and restless elsewhere after sitting for two hours; but in Babul they were as eager at the end of the meeting as at the beginning and always gave the impression of wanting me to talk two hours longer.

"Ah happy boughs that canst not lose thy leaves. Nor bid the Spring adieu."

Again and again they have accumulated money to build their Hazirat-ul-Quds¹ only to have it swept away in the face of some crying human need.

There is a freshness, a spontaneity, a simplicity, a beauty about the true Bahá'í life that searches the core of the heart, wringing the essential drops of its distillation, in a perfume that haunts the memory and purifies the soul. So it will ever be as I look back upon my days in Babul.

The rains were still bravely holding off as if nature herself, so purblind to human needs and wishes, could not deny me the joy of my visit to two Bahá'í villages.

The villagers came at once, on my arrival, to invite me to Arabkhayl and Bahnamir about ten and twelve miles distant, but the Babul Assembly said that they feared to have me undertake the journey lest I be imprisoned by the rains.

The next day to my utter amazement—and humiliation, that such a thing should happen to one so unworthy—I was summoned to the salon to meet eight women from these dear villages who, fearing that my visit would not be accomplished, had come four farsangs¹ on foot to see me. They were not young and vigorous, but middle-aged like myself. It touched me profoundly and I determined that come what would, I must certainly go to those places.

The Babuli are very witty. I mentioned, with tears, to a group of women who called later, how deeply this evidence of Bahá'í devotion had moved me. "Think of their walking ten miles or more to see me," I exclaimed. "If they had come fifty miles on their heads it might be worthy of comment," was the reply, "but to walk ten miles to greet a western friend sent by the Guardian is of no consequence whatever."

When we announced to the invitation committee that I would spend two days in the villages they posted topspeed back to build a road for me. By the time a few more western Bahá'ís visit Persia there will be a great network of new highways.

Through the bounty of God the day was radiantly sunny. You can't imagine what sod and shrubbery and trees and verdure really mean until you have lived in the desert. It was like paradise.

Two deep streams divide the villages from Babul. The first ferry took our car with no difficulty, but the second was leaking badly. We were obliged to abandon mechanical locomotion and to leave the new road yawning for use.

Since they had expected us to ride up in state in our automobiles there were no horses to accommodate our party, so we sat on our luggage by the river bank until the villagers came galloping a herd of horses to convey us.

And once more our cavalcade started, and once more the unparalleled cordiality of a Bahá'í reception awaited me. Scattered from the river's brink to the outskirts of the first village were increasingly large groups waving me welcome. Again the ringing cry "Alláh-u-Abhá" proclaimed its unifying power.

The countryside filled me with an ache of longing. I had been so continuously in deserts, jungles, spice islands, barren regions and exotic climes, that the quiet beauty of the ferns and grass and shrubs and trees of my childhood brought a happy nostalgia and gratitude.

Mounted, literally, on a high-horse (which was no great change for me) my long-suffering Rahmatullah once more balanced me across these fertile fields, filled now with hosts of joyous faces.

¹A farsang is about three miles.

As usual the Muslims ran to their hedge-rows or crowded to the roadside, eager to witness for themselves whether there was any truth in the fantastic suggestion that this despised Bahá'í religion had actually conquered the sea, planting its Standard in distant alien lands.

It certainly was the Bahá'ís' day of triumph; for though what they had to display wasn't much to see—only a tired old woman astride a tall horse—nevertheless it was a proof of their contention that, out of the fire and blood of their persecutions and torments, a flame of belief and devotion had encircled the earth.

In all my life I have never been more stirred and touched than when, approaching the Bahá'í school-house, the lilt of children's voices reached me and then into full view came these adorable tots singing me a rousing welcome. It was as if some angelic Joshua had bade me heart and mind to stand still, leaving my spirit to soar with their voices. We stopped until the ringing song was finished and then rode on to the hospitable home where luncheon was served.

THE VILLAGE life of Persia is uneventful and archaic. Between farm work and preparation for the weekly fair every one keeps busy with a changeless routine.

The women weave a very charming material out of the pith of a kind of pampas grass or reed. Intertwining silver threads or bright woollens, they produce an actual work of art. Later when I write you of our enforced stay in a Muslim village to escape the floods, I shall speak in greater detail about the glimpse of rustic Persia that I've caught there.

Today the villages made holiday. Before leaving for Bahnamir several hundred of the Friends gathered in the garden of the Hazirat-ul-Quds, the Muslim women coming with their children to share the excitement. Rugs were spread in abundance and as at the miracle of the loaves and the fishes the men, women and children "sat down in companies."

How much more miraculous to feed hungry souls with the bread of life than to feed hungry mouths with bread of grain. Once again Báha'u'lláh has reiterated the sanctity of peace and love and joy and self-sacrifice, and once again "the common people hear Him gladly."

When I had finished speaking, the same school-boy chorus delighted me, and then round me pressed the same shining host of happy Bahá'ís that I had seen throughout my joyous and eventful journey.

I had arisen very early to breakfast with the Governor-General before leaving and now it was nearing sunset and I must spend the night in the adjoining village. So I said farewell until the morning, for I would pass this way again on my return.

THROUGH vista after vista, as we wound among lovely lanes and hedge-rows, I would catch first a glimpse and then a picture of a crowd of gaily clad men and women with their little ones raising the holy greeting "Allah-u-Abha" as soon as they beheld me.

We were nearing Bahnamir, and, entering a little copse, I heard for the first time in many years the swooning song of the nightingale for it is always Spring in Mazindaran the province of Bahá'u'lláh. Even Keats could not adequately describe that melody though what lovelier lines could be suggested than "The self-same song that found a path Through the sad heart of Ruth when, sick for home,

She stood in tears amid the alien corn."

A party of incense-bearers and villagers of Arabkhayl and Bahnamir greeting Mrs. Keith Ransom-Kehler and her escort who rode on horseback to visit them.

The first trill rends the heart asunder and then the essence of the soul starts flowing from a thousand wounds where each fresh note has pierced it. I felt again the agonizing joy of watching a sunrise in the Bruner pass; I knew the same rapt ecstasy as when first I heard the Message of Bahá'u'lláh. Now to reread the Tablet, "Lo! The Nightingale of Paradise singeth upon the Tree of Eternity," starts a sweet and overwhelming tumult in my breast. One note from a tiny, feathered creature sets the heart aglow: how much more does the heavenly song of that eternal Nightingale quicken the lifeless soul.

We did not pause, for the whole village was eagerly drawn up awaiting our arrival. As we neared it the glorious refreshing sound of men's voices—a well trained chorus—singing a vigorous song of praise, was sweeter to me than the nightingale.

I passed through a veritable hail of flowers and blossoms flung from every side.

At the next turn of the road the school boys were singing, and then to my profound delight the school girls. Women in Persia are generally so repressed and timid that any evidence of their activity always gives me great pleasure.

Proceeding through this shower of flowers and petals I witnessed a ceremony peculiar to Persia. Women bearing bright brass trays with offerings of fruit, perfume, flowers and incense, continuously sprinkled me with rose-water and tossed their fragrant smoking spices in my path. It is hard to reproduce the gay festivity of the scene. The beautiful voices; the intoxicating odors, the bright flowers, the gala attire, but above all the kind and eager faces lent a great spirit to the fete. In this whole earth I think that there is nothing so lovely as the face of a Persian Bahá'í.

GATHERED for the evening meal Dr. Bessar told of how he and a Bahá'í companion barely escaped death in this village at the hands of assassins hired to murder them. Whereupon I recounted the exceedingly interesting story, written for The Bahá'í Magazine by Siyyid Mustafa Rumi, of a similar experience in Macassar.

I had intended to go to bed at once but, as usual in Bahá'í gatherings, we sat late talking of the Cause and of the Teachings.

The next morning we were early astir to speak to a group before the Bahá'í school-house similar to the gathering in Arabkhayl. At parting there were prayers and flowers and gifts; and then far out on the road from Arabkhayl a concourse of incense-bearers drew near to greet me. They anointed us with rose-water, strewed flowers and incense in our path and drew up as a kind of bodyguard at the place where our leave-taking had been arranged.

The mere recollection of that fragrant sojourn animates my spirit and inspires my heart. The simple goodness, the extreme generosity, the radiant kindness of these dear villagers will ever remain a happy benediction.

At least twelve reliable witnesses can be summoned to attest the truth that from the time we left Bábul no drop of rain fell until we had crossed the first dangerous ferry on our way back and were safe in the car; then it poured; stopped abruptly when we had to leave the car to cross the second ferry; began again when we were safe inside. Stopped once more when we reached Bábul until we were properly disposed, and then rained on and on; this later put us in danger of life and limb. But that story is for another midnight.

Dear, quiet little towns! Kind, gentle folk! You "tease me out of thought as doth eternity." Your blossoms will strew my way, your song will gladden my breast, your perfume will stir my heart, your incense will lift my prayers, your welcome will refresh my dreams as through bleak and barren days to come, again and again reliving that gracious interlude, I wander along the fern-fringed paths of Mazindaran.

"Through the moon-dappled groves of memory
Fling out your soul-drenched song, oh nightingale."

"True religion is the foundation of spiritual union, the union of thought, the union of susceptibilities, the unity of customs, and the ideal chain binding together all the children of men. Through its practical realization, the minds and souls will receive development by divine instruction; they will become assisted to investigate reality, attain to a lofty station of wisdom and establish the basis of a divine civilization.

RELEASING FORCES

Reflections from the Twenty-fifth Bahá'í Convention.

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

FORTY years ago the Columbian Exposition was held in Chicago. At that time it was considered a matter of marvelous progress that by pressing a button in Washington President Cleveland could release forces in Chicago which would start a fountain playing on the exposition grounds and set the wheels in motion which opened the exposition.

On May 27, 1933, the great Century of Progress Exposition was opened in that same city. As a symbol of progress in science and invention that has been made in these forty years the idea was conceived of using the energy from the brilliant star Arcturus to release the forces for inaugurating this exposition. This star (or sun) is so distant that the light which left there forty years ago is just now arriving at the earth. By means of the marvelous photo-electric cell, unknown forty years ago, by means of amplifiers and relays the small amount of light that reaches the earth from this far-off body is caught at the Yerkes Observatory (or some other if it is cloudy there) and transformed into forces which illumine the 424 acres devoted to the exposition with the brilliance and beauty of many colored lights. The imagination is caught by this conception and plays around the symbolism involved. This spectacular display of the release of hidden physical forces is marvelous indeed.

One cannot cease to wonder at the ingenuity and profundity of man's mind which thus brings forth nature's secrets or to go even further and ask—what power behind man's mind enables him to discover and invent such magic wonders? And yet in spite of his achievements in the physical world, or perhaps because of them, man is still undeveloped in the spiritual realm. For most are unaware that in close connection with both these world occasions, events occurred of far greater import to the future of mankind, when spiritual forces were released which are destined to bring about greater changes than have ever been known in recorded history.

Forty years ago at the Parliament of Religions held in Chicago in connection with the Columbian Exposition already referred to, the name of Bahá'u'lláh was first mentioned on the American continent and these prophetic words from His lips were quoted:

"These fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away, and the 'Most Great Peace' shall come. . . . Let not a man glory in this that he loves his country; let him rather glory in this that he loves his kind."

Hardly a handful gave heed. No one understood then and the world at large is still unaware of the forces liberated on that occasion, or of the connection which the coming of Bahá'u'lláh to earth has with the inventions of progress that have caused such great changes and such great catastrophes during these forty years.

On June first, five days later than the opening of the exposition and less than twenty miles away on the shores of the same lake, in the foundation hall of a temple dedicated to the oneness of humanity, the oneness of all religions, the harmony of science and religion and to universal peace, a temple which when completed will be, perhaps, the most delicately and exquisitely beautiful architectural thing ever yet conceived by the mind of man, two or three hundred people gathered, drawn together by unseen forces to meditate and consult in regard to the Divine Plan for the New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh and things pertaining thereto. This gathering was, as far as the world at large is concerned, unheralded and unproclaimed.

DURING THE first morning of the convention a letter was read from Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Bahá'i Cause. In this letter were reviewed the outstanding events of the history of this Cause in America for the forty years just past. It pointed out the achievements which the small number of American Bahá'is have accomplished, in spite of great reverses, in establishing the Cause in this country, in helping to spread it through the world and in relieving difficult situations in other countries. In its entirety it gave evidence of the creative forces brought to man's consciousness by the advent of Bahá'u'lláh and released again and again through the bounty of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. At the end were pointed out some tremendous tasks yet to be accomplished.

The mingled feelings caused by the Guardian's letter, feelings of gratitude for things accomplished, of humility for failures and of great responsibility for future developments of the Bahá'i Cause were intensified by the reading of the Guardian's cablegram in the first afternoon of the convention. The long letter in a measure prepared its hearers for the dynamic concentration of its message in the cablegram. It was the message for which all waited, the latest word which would put the delegates in tune with the Guardian and with the forces of the unseen world. It called upon the American Bahá'is to "seize the opportunity to release forces which will usher in (an) era whose splendor must outshine (the) heroic age of our beloved Cause."

What were these forces? Could these delegates rise to the now present opportunity? The forces are spiritual forces, unseen yet all-powerful. It is these forces which change the current of human thought, which indeed change human nature.

How are spiritual forces released? Is there any other way than by getting into harmony with the will of God? And then through love which engenders severance and self-sacrifice by rendering "instant, exact, and complete obedience?" The spirit finds expression through material means. The commands given by Bahá'u'lláh must be understood, unity must be completely established in order that unified action may result. The art of taking counsel together is one of the means that Bahá'u'lláh has established for bringing forth the shining spark of truth.

Quietly then, though stirred to the depths by the Guardian's message the delegates proceeded to take counsel together concerning the numerous problems that face Bahá'is and concerning activities that constantly increase as the Cause grows.

THE ALL-IMPORTANT subject, the first to be discussed, was the Temple. Indeed the convention cannot be considered apart from the Temple. One mighty challenge was to release forces which will beautifully clothe its dome. The feelings of peace, love and harmony and the lofty aspirations that filled the hearts of those assembled for worship under the dome each morning, give but a hint of the mystery of this Temple which, 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said, "is great and cannot be revealed", and of the forces that will be released upon its completion.

The signs of activity about the Temple, the workmen erecting scaffolding and raising the great steel arms that were to lift the units of ornamentation to the dome; the actual molding of the ornamental covering of the base of one of the great ribs of the dome; the simple ceremony of unveiling the first exquisitely designed and executed, and dazzlingly white units for covering the sections of the dome; the illustrated talk by Mr. John Earley, in whose laboratories these marvelous ornaments are being produced, revealing the combination of artistry, skill, and mathematical accuracy required to produce these works of art; the talk by Mr. Allen McDaniel, the chairman of the Temple committee, which made known among other things the fact that the skilled workmen who helped to produce these works of art voluntarily reduced their own wages as well as worked overtime; other instances related showing the hand of divine guidance in the erection of the Temple; the many words quoted from 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Guardian setting out the primal importance of building the Temple; the stories of most touching sacrifices of Persian and other Eastern friends and of many in America; the gifts from every continent and from the most distant corners of the earth; the inspiration received from the Unity Feast Friday evening when by song, chanting and reading of the inspired words the thoughts were directed to the spiritual realm;—all these quickened the determination to arise with new vigor for the early completion of the all-important work of ornamenting the dome. By common consent the subject came up again and again, all things giving way when any one was moved to speak on this subject or to present an offering, or to account some sacrificial deed of one not present.

The gifts flowed in steadily, many of them, even as last year, representing great power in their sacrificial value. The feeling that there was need of a deepened devotion that should cause a steady flow of funds equal or greater than the high crest was voiced. Another delegate reminded the hearers that the words of the Báb to His first disciples, "I am preparing you for a mighty Day", applies equally to the humble followers of Bahá'u'lláh of the present day. That the Bahá'is in America must release the spiritual forces of twenty thousand martyrs in Persia if we would arise to seize our great opportunity, was pointed out by another. Many practical suggestions for saving and economizing were made. A resolution embodying all these inspiring and suggestive remarks was formulated requesting the National Spiritual Assembly to organize and distribute them among all the believers.

Among many other subjects discussed, the most important were: the nonpolitical character of the Bahá'í Faith; local Assembly problems; the teaching program; and the Bahá'í Summer Schools.

A larger number of young people was in attendance than ever before and more than once a few clear words from one of them served to clarify a situation and revealed deep spiritual insight. At their dinner conference Sunday ninety-nine were in attendance.

Is it too much to hope that at this convention forces were quietly released through the uniting of the true and loyal followers of the Faith which will enable America to come into that place of spiritual leadership indicated by 'Abdu'l-'Bahá? In his last letter Shoghi Effendi quotes these words from 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "The American continent gives signs and evidences of very great advancement. Its future is even more promising, for its influence and illumination are far-reaching. It will lead all nations spiritually."

YOUTH'S DOOR OF HOPE

MARION HOLLEY

THese are testing days for the young of America. These are times to try what measure of patience is theirs, what resilience of hope is at call. For the latest generation to come of age has been launched by its sponsors upon a sea of chaos unexampled in the memory of our race. What employment can the college man find? Where will a boy with an eager talent exercise and mature it? What couple dares choose the adventure of children without economic stability?

Yet these are not the matters of greatest import. The pocketbook touches the spring of many actions, but a thorough chaos presses still further. Young persons of today are at war not only against a disintegrating economic life; they must surmount as well the disappearance of all of those basic relationships and customs which make today enough like yesterday that a man may feel comfortable and at ease. For here is the problem: the order into which this generation was born does not appeal to it. Indeed, the principles of that culture seem positively to be lacking in sincerity and integrity. Therefore those principles cannot take hold; they cannot guide behavior. They cannot cement a defunct family tie, outline a normal ethics, or steer bizarre night life into the channels of sane recreation. The world looks on at the flaunting of everything it knows, quite impotent to interest or direct these alien offspring. For young people today do not belong. They are strangers to their native land, and, like strangers, unimpelled to accept its duties or assume its obligations. And when they would ask for a responsibility, the world has none to give them. Is it any wonder that "the song of life has lost its virility,"* and that only the soundest mind preserves its energy and ambition?

THE FOREGOING is indeed a dark picture, but of late years Bahá'ís have discerned upon it a streak of light. For among their own young people a contrast is mounting. There has been no clearer epitome of that contrast than the dinner meeting held during the recent National Convention of the Bahá'ís of the United States and Canada.

Imagine, if you will, a large hall, where are seated ninety-nine persons. The appearance is of youth; an enthusiasm and brightness, an undercurrent of joy pervades the room. The program begins. Seven speakers, in quick succession, rise to emphasize some aspect of the Bahá'í Faith. They talk with an unconscious eloquence which grows from the heart of deep conviction. The group listens intently. Opportunity, courage, intelligence, responsible administration, prayer—these are the brilliant facets of the Cause which they hold up before their fellows. Often they speak of Shoghi Effendi. A sense of the gravest affection and respect animates them as they direct attention to the Guardian of the Faith. Here is a leader whose judgment they accept, whose example they intend to emulate, whose oneness with them as citizens in the new world order they appreciate. The last speaker is finished. Someone in the group rises to respond. And there succeeds for a half hour an interchange of belief and urgent ambition for service, so vibrant in sincerity that the whole group seems stirred to thrilling motion. Here is a meeting which must energize not only those who form it, but every young Bahá'í who hears of and understands it.

Is it possible that these are members of the unlucky younger generation? Where is the cynicism, the weariness of spirit, the prevalent despair? There can be but one answer. Here is a group of youth which has found its creative opportunity. These are persons charged with a peculiar task; these are the builders of the new society.

THERE ARE times in the history of man when undoubted impulses appear, when the idea of an order more equitable in design takes hold of minds, when a new will enters the social body. These are the times of great religions, of the efflorescence of moral vigor, of purpose and power to change the very bases of life and the characters of men. Such epochs draw their strange strength from men of extraordinary stature,—from Moses, from Jesus, from Muhammad, from

* 'Abdu'l-Bahá in "Divine Philosophy."

Bahá'u'lláh. For we live in such a period, and it is our destiny to witness the shaping of a new culture unique and inevitable. Bahá'u'lláh has, in His own words, "seized the lives and has begun a new creation."

Now the joy of Bahá'i young people derives itself from this very sense of captivity. Their lives have become vehicles of responsibility. Their endeavors are promised to the construction of a magnificent ideal. Their abilities are awakened in the arena of necessary effort. Their powers find release through the discipline of obedience to a recognized leader. And in Bahá'u'lláh they touch that Center which organizes, unites and fires their every motion. They have become the "celestial warriors" of a new world order!

Bahá'i young people, quite like their contemporaries, do not belong to today. The cramped scope of nations, the prejudices of mind, the outmoded techniques for the conduct of affairs, have no appeal for any of them. Rather do they envision the idea of an ordered society which shall include the resources of the whole world. Thus their object is not disdain for a weak today, but intelligence and loyalty placed at the service of a sturdy tomorrow. Bahá'i youth is animated youth. Young Bahá'is are already citizens of the future.

From this attitude proceeds the possibility of adjustment to our present chaos. Here is balance in the tumultuous stream of events. Here, in a renewed Faith, young persons may attain vitality and health. For Bahá'u'lláh has brightened old inadequacies with a new way of living, and opened to this shopworn world a "door of hope."

The Friend of Understanding Love

None but Thee can understand our hearts,
O Friend of Love Divine!
Tho we seek thru all the world for friends,
Whose love will be like Thine!
None but Thee can understand our failures,
And know our deepest need;
Only Thou canst lift us from ourselves,
Our burdened souls relieve.

None but Thee can satisfy our longing,
Our Father and our God!
None but Thee can understand our problems,
The road that we have trod.
Only Thou canst lead us out of darkness
And light in us increase;
Only Thou canst raise us from our death
In self, and give us peace!

THE TRUE SOVEREIGN

ALFRED E. LUNT

Verily, those who have denied God and adhered unto nature as nature is, are indeed void of both science and wisdom, are they not of the erring?"

—Baha'u'lláh.

The first and second installments of this article were published in the May and June numbers respectively and pointed out the great truth that nature is in itself incapable of establishing values or achieving perfections, also the author brings out vividly the dual nature of man. In this third installment he affirms the necessity of the recognition and acceptance of the True Sovereign to save man from the world of nature.

MANY of the natural impulses, rightly used and under the control of man's reality, are by no means destructive. The perpetuation of the race, the satisfaction of the requirements of food, shelter and warmth, the physical zest of exercise and manly sports, the struggle against injustice, the ambition of achievement in the fulfilment of the individual destiny, the urge of work, and many other phases of life upon the earth are more or less primitive impulses quite outside the destructive, prohibited category.

The Command in this New Age is, on the other hand, directed against the plain sources of unhappiness and disorder now rampant in human society. Among these are disunity and discord in the religious, political and economic life; selfishness and treachery; living unto oneself; race prejudice; hypocrisy, lies and deceit; cruelty; slander, gossip and backbiting, (this last trinity of sin being sternly forbidden by the Divine Law-giver of this new cycle); oppression in every form; becoming a cause of sorrow to others; war; supinely following the beliefs and practices of ancestors by failing to investigate for oneself the reality of every matter; mendicancy; parasitism; the separation of humanity by virtue of class, religious and racial barriers; making religion a cause of hatred and animosity between divergent sects; discrimination against womankind; the captivity of the world of Nature; political and industrial corruption; belief in those dogmas and imitations of truth that are not acceptable to both religion and science; departure from the Divine Foundations established by the Prophets of God and cleaving to man-made systems; denial or rejection of the True Sovereign.

Without exception, these seeds of unhappiness are emanations from the natural, contingent world. Without exception they are prohibited and condemned by God at this time. Human society has become so infiltrated with these poisons that our old friend, the pessimist confidently says—"The burden of proof lies with those who dispute my conclusions."

As against this, we would, with the right degree of modesty, refer to the fundamental structure upon which this exposition is based. And to the differentiations and demonstrations thus far made we would add, very briefly, this: Life is a process of emancipation from the grosser limitations into the refinements of true existence. All these proofs are sufficiently contained in the structure of creation, itself. The mineral substance shakes off its inertia by becoming absorbed into the expanding life of the plant. The cells of the plant, in turn, its roots firmly imprisoned in the earth, take on locomotion through assimilation into the swiftly moving animal, as well as into the perfected atoms of the human body. There, these lowly cells meet and contact with a being animated with the mysterious power of thought. This process is the emancipation and progress of the uncouth mineral atom to an infinitely high station.

This law of physical advancement is not reversed in the realm of mind and soul. The unity of arrangement uncovered by science in the atom is affirmed by the scientist to be the same as that disclosed in the great stellar systems. And since the law of unity is basic, and evidently an essential part of the celestial plan, we discover it, likewise, in the world of mind and spirit. Consequently the advancement of humanity, inspired by the mental and spiritual susceptibilities, must ever be in the direction of new conquests over the hampering shackles of its outgrown consciousness. This, in order that the new freedom may be availed of. Note, too, that the very nature and quality of the mineral cell is lost and transformed in its upward ascent.

EMERGENCE from the fog-ridden swamps of Nature presupposes and is conditioned upon the acceptance of the True Sovereign. For this task requires fortitude, faith and understanding without which the capacity necessary to attract, as a magnet, the divine confirmation cannot appear. So great a salvation requires recognition of its Source; such a sweeping emancipation can be viewed only in the light of the mercy and forgiveness of God, like unto the heavenly table set before the returned, repentant prodigal.

“In this Day, a great banquet is celebrated in the Supreme Concourse; for all that was promised in the divine Books has appeared. This is the Day of the most great rejoicing. All must direct themselves to the Court of Nearness with the utmost joy, happiness, exultation and gladness, and deliver themselves from the fire of separation.”¹

“O Son of Man! My majesty is My bestowal to thee, and My grandeur the token of My Mercy unto thee. That which beseemeth Me none shall understand, nor can any one recount. Verily! I have treasured it in My hidden storehouses and in the tabernacles of My command, as a token of My loving-kindness unto My servants and mercy unto My people.”²

Finally, let it not be supposed that we fail to recognize the real battle-ground as resident in the very soul of man, for these elemental forces are very flesh of his flesh, fabric of his texture, interwoven into the fibres of his being and implanted in his consciousness as with barbed hooks of steel.

Yet, it is man who embodies these forces. It is he who supplies the intelligence to convert them into deeds. These intangible proclivities embedded within him find expression only through his entity and his instrumentality. So tenaciously do these tendencies cling to our every-day thoughts that were we to analyze our lives wholly from the point of view of the lower self, the problem would appear hopeless. In this dilemma, the pessimist is entangled. The attachment of the soul, through its downward flight, to the nether elements is encouraged by inheritance, tradition and example, as well as by its own mistaken hunger. But in every man whose departure from the divine command has not become habitual to the point of callousness, the consciousness of sin sets up the ever recurring fire of remorse. What secret and hidden agonies, what real suffering goes on in the hearts day after day throughout the length and breadth of humanity's domain, as the voice of conscience, the stinging reproach of our inner reality and identity calls us to account. What despair and sense of bafflement oppresses us as we again and yet again submit to forces seemingly impossible to control. What sacrifice could be too great for deliverance from that taskmaster, that false guide, obedience to whose suggestions has brought upon us both the past and the present calamities. Sin, in this sense, is used as the equivalent of remoteness from God.

Our sense of shame is because the nobler element within us, the divinely bestowed reality, is fully aware of the surrender of the conscious ego to inferior and wholly mortal snares. The transfer of consciousness to the plane of reality, however, unfurls the wings of the human spirit and through this union with the conscious self, the fortification is perfected. Then are the words of the saying made manifest:

“Love does not accept a soul alive to its own desires; a falcon preys not on a dead mouse.”

HEREIN is foreshadowed the Divine Purpose and the reason of existence of the human race. The field of nature is the battleground; the contending forces are the dual human elements each striving to control the flight of the soul; both opposing ensigns bear the insignia “Reality” but one is true and the other is false; the battle slogans are, respectively, “Know thy Lord”; and “Exalt thyself”; the rewards of victory are the immortal and eternal life, on the one hand; and, on the other, mortality; the sovereigns, the True One, and the usurper. Through the infinite wisdom of the Creator, this dramatic setting for the enactment of humanity's salvation has been established. That the century and cycle in which we are fortunate enough to live marks the advent of the decisive struggle as well as the victory of the True Sovereign through the enlightenment of the race, none who are even slightly informed of the meanings of the Holy Books, or of the almost miraculous changes now taking place in human psychology, can doubt.

The Divine Love which is the heart and center of the Holy Spirit is warming the frozen hearts, stirring them into that restlessness and pain previously mentioned as the clear sign of entrance into the New World Order. The Messianic outpourings are flowing once again. The Commands of God and the Divine explanations of this problem are a living water to the wanderers in the arid desert. The mirages of the desert, its vanishing oases, its clear but bitter water are revealed as gross counterfeits of that pure, refreshing stream one drop of which dissolves the phantasmagoria of Nature's age-old drama.

IN AN ADDRESS to the Theosophical Society in New York, December 4th, 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá touched upon this problem in these words:

"—The human reality stands between two grades, the world of the animal and the world of divinity. Were the animal in man to become predominant, man would become even lower than the brute. Were the heavenly powers in him to become controlling, he would become the most superior being in the world of existence. Consider, in man there is rancor; in man there is struggle for existence; in the nature of man there is propensity for warfare; innate in man there is love of self; in him there is jealousy, and so on with all the other imperfections found in the animal. For instance, in the animal there is ferocity; there is also ferocity in man. In the animal there is what is called hypocrisy or slyness, like unto that in the fox; and in the animal there is greed—and there is ignorance. So, we find all these defects in man. In the animal are injustice and tyranny; so, likewise, in man. The reality of man, therefore, is clad, one may say, in its outer form, in the garment of the animal, the garment of the world of nature, of the world of darkness; that is, the world of imperfection, the world of infinite baseness."

"On the other hand, we find that there is justice in man; there is sincerity, faithfulness, wisdom, light; that there is mercy and pity in him; that there is in him intellect, comprehension, the power to grasp the reality of things, the ability to discover the reality of existence. Consequently we say that man is a reality that stands between light and darkness, possessing three aspects, three phases; one is the human aspect; one is the divine, heavenly aspect; and one is the natural or animal aspect. The animal aspect is darkness, the heavenly aspect is light in light."

"To return to the point: The holy Manifestations of God come into the world in order to effect the disappearance of the physical, the animal, dark aspect of man, so that the darkness within him may be dispelled, his imperfections eradicated, that his spiritual, heavenly phase may become manifest, his Godlike quality become paramount, and his perfections become visible; that his innate, great power may become known, and all the virtues of the world of humanity potential within him may come to life. Thus, the holy Manifestations of God are the educators and trainers of the world of existence, the teachers of mankind. They liberate men from the world of darkness and of nature. They deliver him from gloom, from error, from hideousness, from ignorance, from imperfection, and, likewise, from all the evil qualities. Then they cause him to be clad in the garment of perfection and high virtues."

GLIMPSSES OF THE NEW WORLD ORDER

Notes on a Visit to Haifa and 'Akká

MABEL AND SYLVIA PAINE

"O ye people of the world! The virtue of this most great Manifestation is that We have effaced from the Book whatever was the cause of differences, corruption and discord, and recorded therein that which leads to unity, harmony and concord. Joy unto those who act in accordance therewith!"

—Bahá'u'lláh.

In this fourth installment, the conversation of Shoghi Effendi to the pilgrims is on the subjects of international government and education, especially with reference to an important letter written by Shoghi Effendi to the American Bahá'is, later published under the title "The Goal of a New World Order." The first and second installments of these "Notes" were published respectively in the March and April numbers, and told of their arrival in Haifa and the meeting with Shoghi Effendi and the members of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's family; also of their visit to 'Akká and the old prison quarters where Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá and Their followers were incarcerated so many years with unspeakable hardships and sufferings. The third installment which appeared in the June number gave a further description of the barracks at 'Akka and a brief description of Bahji.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 17th. Shoghi Effendi told us a little of the last and happiest part of Bahá'u'lláh's life spent at Bahji, visited by us the previous day. It was there that He wrote the Epistle to the Son of the Wolf in which He summarized His former writings. He died in that same room in which He met Prof. Browne. His death was the peaceful ending of a life Whose constantly extending influence our generation but faintly comprehends when it comprehends at all.

The conversation dwelt a little on prayer and Shoghi Effendi emphasized the importance of an unconstrained approach to God. Pour out your heart freely and fully. Then do something. God cannot work through you unless you act. Of prayer for health he said that prayer helps, but we must not lose sight of the fact that ill health may be good. Suffering, he thought very helpful both to individuals and nations. What is important is to pray always with a willingness for God's will to be done.

Apropos of the recent death of Dr. Forel, the distinguished Swiss scientist, and the publication of his will, in which he declared himself a Bahá'i, we discussed Dr. Forel's idea of God and the Bahá'i idea of God. Bahá'is believe in a personal God. This of course does not imply an anthropomorphic God, but a conscious God.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 18th. At tea with the ladies the talk was about our plans to go to Nazareth, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine. The ladies told how 'Abdu'l-Bahá always longed to go to Jerusalem but never was able. One time He asked some one who was going to Jerusalem to touch its walls for Him, to touch the walls of that city made sacred by Christ's sufferings. I have heard a Bahá'i returned from a visit to Haifa in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's life time tell how 'Abdu'l-Bahá told him when he was in Jerusalem to walk the Via Dolorosa. This Bahá'i said he never could describe to any one the depth and the poignancy of the experience as he trod that way.

But today all who had been to Jerusalem agreed there was another side to it. One said she always felt oppressed with another sorrow when she came near Jerusalem, a sorrow caused by the strife of the sects. Not so different a sorrow after all from what pierced the heart of Christ as He walked His Via Dolorosa, for did He not pray that same night before He parted from His followers, "Not for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one?" The strife of the sects, not the oneness for which the world is sick unto death, we found in Jerusalem.

But the open country with its simple villages, its vineyards, the survival of ancient modes of travel and labor, its rugged hills, still are the ideal setting for Hebrew and Christian story and many a cherished phrase from the Psalms and many an incident from the life of Christ came vividly to mind as we drove from Nazareth to Jerusalem, Bethlehem, the Jordan River, and the Sea of Galilee.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23RD.—Shoghi Effendi is writing a general letter* to the Bahá'í friends of the Occident. We have the privilege of getting glimpses of its growth. Evidently it will emphasize political conditions of the world at large, show their inevitable progress toward another world war, after which will emerge the new world state. He spoke of Bahá'u'lláh's prophecy revealed in 1878, in which He refers to the turmoil and agitation of the world, its waywardness and irreligion, as it hastens to a plight too grievous to be disclosed. The prophecy ends with a beautiful promise of the unfurling of the Divine Standard.

At last appears on the horizon the "parliament of nations" the "federation of the world." Americans particularly should be much interested in two passages in this great document which has just come from the pen of Shoghi Effendi: one giving the interview between 'Abdu'l-Bahá and an American congressman, in which 'Abdu'l-Bahá answers the congressman's question, "How can I best serve my country?" with the reply, "By striving in your capacity as a citizen of the world to assist in the eventual application of the principle of federalism underlying the government of your own country to the relationship now existing between the peoples and nations of the world," and the passage in which Shoghi Effendi compares the formation of the future world state to the unification of the states of the North American continent. "It would be no exaggeration," he writes, "to say that the absence of those facilities which modern scientific progress has placed at the service of humanity in our time, made of the problem of welding the American states into a single federation, similar though they were in certain traditions, a task infinitely more complex than that which confronts a divided humanity in its efforts to achieve the unity of all mankind."

In this latter passage one sees the

*Later published by the Bahá'í Publishing Committee under the title "The Goal of a New World Order."

dominant spirit of faith which animates the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause as it did 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Who replied to those "few who, unaware of the power latent in human endeavor, consider this matter (true civilization, universal peace through a federation of the governments of the world) as highly impracticable nay even beyond the scope of man's utmost efforts." "Such is not the case, however. On the contrary, thanks to the unfailing grace of God, the loving kindness of His favored ones, the unrivaled endeavors of wise and capable souls and the thoughts and ideas of the peerless leaders of this age nothing whatsoever can be regarded as unattainable. Endeavor, ceaseless endeavor is required—an indomitable determination. Many a cause past ages have regarded as purely visionary, yet in this day has become most easy and practicable. Why should this most great and lofty cause—the day star of the firmament of true civilization and the cause of the glory, the advancement, the well being and success of all humanity—be regarded as impossible of achievement? Surely the day will come when its beauteous light shall shed illumination upon the assemblage of man."

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23RD. The conversation at tea this afternoon was about schools. The Bahá'í teachings emphasize universal education and the equality of men and women. As these principles are new to Oriental Bahá'ís and difficult for them to apply, the women of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's family feel an especial obligation to observe them conscientiously by giving their children a very complete education. This often means sending them to Europe, as educational opportunities there are greater than in the Near East. Often these young people have to transfer from one school to another. These transfers are difficult, as there is not even so uniform a curriculum as in Europe and America. One of the interesting points in the Bahá'í educational program is that it calls for "a standard, universal system of instruction." This will certainly make for greater convenience as well as furthering the attainment of the more important ideals of mutual understanding, sympathy and unity among different nations, races and between the sexes.

"He is a true Bahá'í who strives by day and by night to progress and advance along the path of human endeavor, whose most cherished desire is so to live and act as to enrich and illuminate the world, whose source of inspiration is the essence of divine virtue, whose aim in life is so to conduct himself as to be the cause of infinite progress. Only when he attains unto such perfect gifts can it be said of him that he is a true Bahá'í. For in this holy dispensation—the crowning glory of bygone ages and cycles—true Faith is no mere acknowledgment of the Unity of God, but rather the living of a life that will manifest all the perfections and virtues implied in such belief."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

EDUCATION

Three Cardinal Principles

(Excerpts from a statement made by 'Abdu'l-Baha to President Bliss of the American University of Beirut, Syria, at Haifa, Palestine.)

THE universities and colleges of the world must hold fast to three cardinal principles:

“First: Whole-hearted service to the cause of education, the unfolding of the mysteries of nature, the extension of the boundaries of science, the elimination of the causes of ignorance and social evils, a standard universal system of instruction, and the diffusion of the lights of knowledge and reality.

“Second: Service to the cause of morality, raising the moral tone of the students, inspiring them with the sublimest ethical ideals, teaching them altruism, inculcating in their lives the beauty of holiness and the excellency of virtue, and animating them with the graces and perfections of the religion of God.

“Third: Service to the oneness of the world of humanity; so that each student may consciously realize that he is a brother to all mankind, irrespective of religion or race. The thoughts of universal peace must be instilled in the minds of all the scholars, in order that they may become the armies of peace, the real servants of the body politic—the world. God is the Father of all. Mankind are His children. This globe is one home. Nations are the members of one family. The mothers in their homes, the teachers in the schools, the professors in the colleges, the presidents in the universities, must teach these ideals to the young from the cradle to maturity.”

"The first teachers of children are the mothers. Therefore they must be capably trained in order to educate both sons and daughters . . . the mothers must not think of themselves but of the progress of their children because upon the children of today—whether boys or girls—depends the moulding of the civilization of tomorrow."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE VENERABLE philanthropist August Heckscher on his 84th birthday says; "Nothing counts except what you do for others. . . . Marconi's discovery of how to send short wave lengths may be the outstanding recent scientific achievement, but the best investment on the face of the earth is the Child! It is to make the earth a more habitable place for others to stay, rather than to provide a palace in some state of life beyond in a celestial residence, that age best employs itself. The Kingdom Come is, after all, the child."

The future belongs to the child, that is evident. But the world will not be a better place to live in if the child merely grows up absorbing the current psychology of the age—irreligious, egoistic, aggressive, full of antagonisms and prejudices. No, if we are to have a more perfect world we must plant the idea of perfection in the minds of the young. Here is a fertile field for idealism. At this tender age when the individual is most susceptible to stimuli of all kinds, it is of the utmost importance that he receives inspiration of a moral and spiritual nature. The soul in the child responds with all seriousness and earnestness to humanitarian suggestions of kindness, of charity, of justice, of brotherhood.

And what is as potent a force for the moulding of character as that exercised by religion? Morality divorced from religion is lacking in motivation. Maxims may be inculcated and repeated by the children, but the zeal necessary for carrying them out can be derived only from the ideals and inspirations of religion.

UP TO THIS present generation all children had in the course of their training, a thorough grounding in the spiritual truths composing the religious idealism of their day. They were made thoroughly acquainted with the great books of the Bible: with the practical maxims of Solomon, the glorious uplifting psalms of David, the cryptic stirring paradoxes of Christ, the illuminating practical religious and ethical psychology of Paul, the mystic splendor of Revelations. All this study and memorization of Bible verses left a deep effect on the subconscious mind; left a beauty and a moral force which subsequently motivated life and guided it, on the plane of the subconscious even if not on the plane of the conscious. Today what takes the in-fluent place of such religious training? What in the present psychological environment of youth most conditions it?

The ribald ballads of radio crooners; the savage sensualism of singers of the "blues"; the suggestive salaciousness of movies; the sexually disturbing stories in magazines and books,—these are what is forming the subconscious background of the average child of today. Have we here any possible foundations for a better world?

When we say the hope of the world lies in the child, can it be that it lies in a child formed according to this pattern? No! The hope of the world lies in the child, only when the new child is an improvement on the child of the generation which has gone before.

WHAT CAN modern parents do in the way of religious education for their children? Having outgrown the traditional limitations of dogmatic theology, they hesitate to inflict this upon their children. They do not like to send them to Sunday School to have them filled with dogmas which they later must reject. They are in fact deeply puzzled and anxious concerning their impotency to adequately care for the religious needs of their children.

What the world needs today is a reasonable religion thoroughly in accord with modern science, containing the minimum of creed and dogma and the maximum of practical idealism. Such a religion we providentially have in the Bahá'í Movement—the logical fulfillment and completion of all the religions of the past, the harmonizer of science and religion, the solver of the world's economic and political problems.

To the youth of all races and religions the New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh offers a modern up-to-date religion, free of traditions and senseless dogmas, attuned to the present tempo and needs, satisfying the intellect as well as the spirit. And everywhere youth is turning to it as a solution to their own religious needs.

One young man, an actor, recently said to me, "We modern youth need some religion, some philosophy of life. We cannot be satisfied with a life of denial and scepticism. The Bahá'í Movement seems to satisfy our need better than anything else today." And this is what the youth of today are discovering not only in America but in Europe, in Asia, in Africa, in South America, all over the world wherever earnest thought and searching is going on.

WHAT IS the effect upon youth of this divinely illuminating teaching of the Bahá'í Cause? To study the effect in its most outstanding form one must see it in action where it has covered a period of two or three generations. The children brought up with these ideals from birth represent indeed a new race, and give vivid promise of a new civilization.

Recently I met a Persian youth representing the third generation of Bahá'í belief and practice. His grandfather had been one of the pioneer Bahá'ís of Hamadan, Persia. This youth, Halil, has been studying engineering in this country for the purpose of helping reconstruct his own backward country. Here we find not only a vivid personality, such as might exist also in other religions and cultures, but an outstanding quality of world sympathy and world understanding. Here is a citizen of the world devoted to international idealism in its highest form, sympathetic toward all, strongly grounded in his moral nature, living daily according to high spiritual principles, dedicated to lofty aims both as to career and as to altruistic service. When such a quality of youth becomes predominant the world's problems will solve themselves, because the motivation of action will be entirely different from that which prevails today.

Such spiritual training must be begun very young. Each year the child forms habits of action and thought; each year it acquires ideas, judgments, motives of one kind or another from the world around it. At adolescence there begins to appear a more or less definite personality.

The ideal time, therefore, to begin to elevate the child to an ideal height of motivation and character is at the very first age possible for the child to understand speech and to formulate thought. Then is when the child should be saved from the evils inherent in its own nature and from the evils openly expressed in the world around it. If this training is properly carried out, the personality which begins to form at adolescence and becomes fairly fixed by the age of majority will be a glorious personality scintillating with spiritual light, well grounded and established in moral principles.

Indeed, we must give the youth of today every possible aid in order to equip it to meet successfully the materialistic and sensual environment which prevails throughout the world. It is foolish to talk optimistically about mere youth saving the world. There is no quality of salvation inherent in youth "per se". The only salvation which youth can offer is that of progress and improvement and that must be inspired in youth by implanting ideals.

The passage of time, the biological development of the child into maturity does not guarantee greater achievement in the world or a higher civilization. It is perfectly possible for civilization to go backward as well as to go forward. The youth of imperialistic Rome did not help Roman civilization to advance. On the contrary, caused retrogression.

O GENERATION of adults, let us face facts! The youth of today are what we cause them to be by our training and inculcation. With them the ideals of tomorrow with which they are to serve the world will be what they have learned through the illumination of childhood and youth. They will express in speech and action the truths which we teach them.

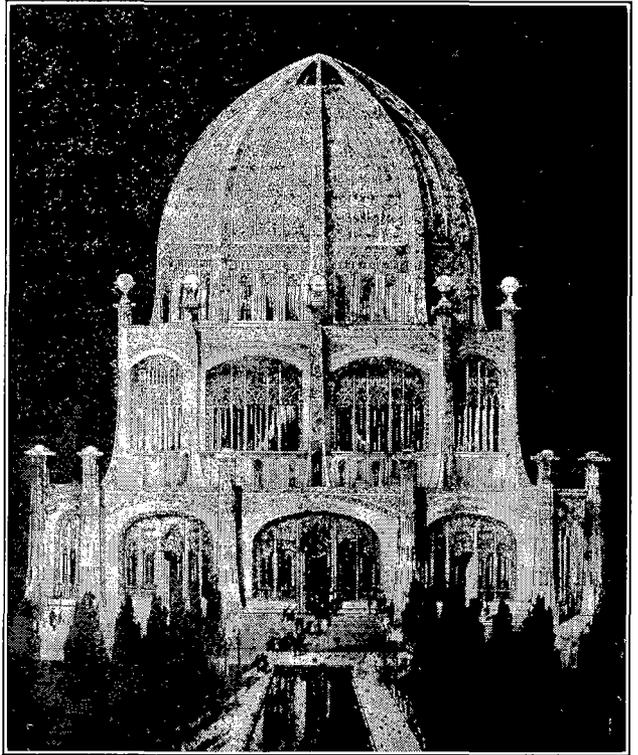

We cannot dodge this responsibility, or shift it onto the shoulders of the children merely because they are children. We ourselves must begin to re-make the world, and we must begin with the child in the cradle.

FORTY YEARS OF PROGRESS

IN a long letter* addressed to the followers of Bahá'u'lláh in the United States and Canada, by Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, we read in the first paragraph these words:

“Forty years will have elapsed ere the close of this coming summer since the name of Bahá'u'lláh was first mentioned on the American continent. Strange indeed must appear to every observer, pondering in his heart the significance of so great a landmark in the spiritual history of the great American Republic, the circumstances which have attended this first public reference to the Author of our beloved Faith. Stranger still must seem the associations which the brief words uttered on that historic occasion must have evoked in the minds of those who heard them.”

IT WILL BE OF interest to both Bahá'ís and non-Bahá'ís to learn that “this first public reference” to the Bahá'í Cause in America was made by Dr. Henry H. Jessup, President of the American University at Beirut, in his address at the Parliament of Religions convened at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago in 1893. Dr. Jessup quoted the following words taken from the statement of Bahá'u'lláh to the distinguished Orientalist, the late Professor Edward G. Browne of the University of Cambridge, who visited Bahá'u'lláh in 1890:

The Bahá'í Temple as it will look when completed

“We desire but the good of the world and the happiness of the nations; yet they deem us a stirrer-up of strife and sedition worthy of bondage and banishment. . . That all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers; that the bonds of affection and unity between the sons of men should be strengthened; that diversity of religion should cease and differences of race be annulled—what harm is there in this? . . . Yet so it shall be; these fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away and the Most Great Peace shall come. . . . Do not you in Europe need this also? Is not this that which Christ foretold? . . . Yet do we see your kings and rulers lavishing their treasures more freely on means for the destruction of the human race than on that which would conduce to the happiness of mankind. . . . These strifes and this bloodshed and discord must cease, and all men be as one kindred and one family. . . . Let not a man glory in this that he loves his country; let him rather glory in this that he loves his kind. . . .”

These significant words have been widely quoted all over the world and will continue to be quoted down through the succeeding ages.

IN 1933, FORTY YEARS from that historic year of 1893, the Century of Progress Exposition is being held in Chicago; and in Wilmette, a suburb of Chicago not very far distant, the followers of Bahá'u'lláh are finishing the dome of the great Bahá'í Temple (known as the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár)—which has attracted widespread interest, not only because it is considered the first thing new in architecture since the thirteenth century, but primarily because it is the outer expression of the Divine Reality in this New Age, and, as stated many times, from its very foundation consecrated to the Ideal of Unity, “It is the first nucleus of the divine civilization.”

“Its doors will be open to all the nations and all religions. There will be drawn absolutely no line of demarcation. Its charities will be dispensed irrespective of color and race. Its gates will be flung wide to mankind; prejudice toward none, love for all.”*

*A more detailed account of the Temple in its spiritual and material appeal, will appear in the September number.

A WORLD AT PEACE

Bahá'í Administration as Presented to a Group of Free-Thinkers

Part I. Religion as the Foundation of Civilization

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

"The greatest bestowal of God in the world of humanity is religion; for assuredly the divine teachings of religion are above all other sources of instruction and development to man. Religion confers upon man eternal life and guides his footsteps in the world of morality. It opens the doors of unending happiness and bestows everlasting honor upon the human kingdom. It has been the basis of all civilization and progress in the history of mankind."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

IN this day when

“A creeping murmur and a pouring dark,
Doth fill the wide vessel of the universe;”

when “men cry ‘peace, peace’ and there is no peace,” when the world is desperately grasping at wisps and invoking old sanctions and securities in vain, the Message of Bahá'u'lláh sane, cogent, reconciling, practical and uncomplicated is challenging and arresting the attention and the interest of those who seek a solution of our overwhelming problems.

An attitude unprecedented in history has appeared only recently as a result of the present crisis; a deliberate attempt to shape life to our needs and desires, not by self-effacement and conformity before its demands; not by reverting to the practices of the past; but by scrutinizing our tendencies, and foreseeing their outcome.

Bahá'u'lláh in 1863-3, while the world was separated and alien, formulated a complete and invulnerable plan based upon the present-day status: a plan for a world mechanically, materially and informationally united as today but still sundered in its psychology, its objectives, its purposes and its spiritual outlook. Before the modern world existed He advanced the methods for healing its ills and contriving its liberation.

Previous efforts to efface life's menace and solve its problems have been based, like some of the economic panaceas, upon erroneous estimates of human nature, wherein the efficacy of the plan depends upon fundamental traits of character that are conspicuously absent in man: or upon the alternative, that has never been lacking in history of attempting to surmount the problems of the present by returning to the past.

To solve the problems of sectarianism, antagonism and misunderstanding within the religions of the world we are urged to return to the pure teachings of our Founder; thereby forming still another sect whose aim is to return to the pure teachings of the Founder. To reduce political entanglements a large group of Dictators in Europe suggest returning to the days of Metternich. To relieve the economic strain we were urged, until very recently, to return to Victorian practices; while no less an Olympian than Oswald Spengler has written one of the most provocative, penetrating and erudite treatises on the thesis: let us return to Junkerism.

Today, with our tardy Economic, Disarmament and Religious Reconciliation Conferences, we seem finally to be awakening to the fact that the logic of history is not only inexorable—it is irreversible, and that the practices of the past, no matter how heroic and efficacious in their day, cannot be shaped to evolving purposes and to changing ideals.

BAHA'U'LLAH SAYS, "All things are made new by the desire of God, but only a new eye can perceive and a new mind can comprehend this station."

His program is based upon principles never before revealed and involving an ardent departure from outworn practices. He has put into our hands the weapons whereby we can master life, needing neither to conform to its ruthless biologic, historical and ethnic tendencies on the one hand, nor to engross ourselves with futile efforts to escape its demands on the other.

The basic social relation is man's relation to his government, for it involves the relation of man to man. Race, class, economic, religious and personal attitudes obviously spring from the regulations, requirements, standards, laws and ordinances of the state wherein he dwells whether it be the savage tribe, or the enlightened republic.

For that reason Bahá'u'lláh has laid down, as primary to the unification of the world and to the abolition of its prevailing evils of sectarianism, partisanship, conflicting interests and warfare, a plan for political confederation, that leaving each country free in the management of its internal affairs, superimposes a powerful centralized state to regulate the relation of land to land.

LET US CONSIDER only this one phase of the all-encompassing program of Bahá'u'lláh—His relief for the world's political unheaval and His Plan for universal peace. In order to envisage His proposals it is necessary to review briefly the existing condition of world government.

Up to and including this present, all government has been based upon conflict and contest. In an absolute monarchy or despotism where the ruler can impose his will on his subjects, to whatever degree it may differ from theirs, intrigue, the cabal, favoritism takes the place of party strife and opposing allegiances. The civilized world is built on a partisan consciousness and automatically erects catagories, thinking in terms of exclusive loyalties and of biparty antagonisms.

Governing is often conducted in spite of its agitating minorities; the accredited attitude being that if majorities are not watched, cramped and hounded they will inevitably wreck the ship of state: while questions of a nonpolitical nature are submitted to untrained and irrational hordes for decision.

Many of the advanced nations of the world are governing on the basis of the old, simple, easy, uncomplicated methods of a century or two ago. Most of the matters to day that are still retained in the sphere of politics are economic, legal and psychological. At a recent election, a western city was plastered with signs, "Vote yes on the $1,000,000 bond issue." Certainly no intelligent and informed person would consider himself capable of determining the status of such a question without an exhaustive and painstaking survey of the facts. And still on election day I saw crowds of the most ordinary and uninformed people casting their vote on a subject that only well-trained minds and impartial observers were capable of discussing.

In spite of all the pros and cons of the Intelligence Test discussions, pros and cons are agreed that the average level of intelligence even in enlightened countries is not beyond the adolescent period. Professor Huff puts the interesting query, if school boys and girls were asked to vote on whether there should be no school and free candy, what would the ballot indicate?

And so in the question of the bond issue: Some voted for it with the hope of getting a job, others because it was proposed by their party, still others because they were not tax-payers and wanted to see property-owners properly chastised for getting on in the world; while numbers voted against it for equally childish and invalid reasons.

In our present government by factions and contest, things that require clear thinking are precipitated into the realm of the emotions; issues demanding detachment are submitted to the passions of the crowd; and such basic moral questions as peace, the protection of childhood and physical welfare are part of a general system of controversy, exploitation and party machinations.

BEFORE DISCUSSING Bahá'í Administration or the Political Program of Bahá'u'lláh certain historical data must also be brought to mind as the foundation of His Teachings.

One outstanding fact of history cannot be explained away: the fact that from epoch to epoch in human affairs there appears a Being peerless and unique who changes the course of destiny and through endless centuries commands the loyalty and adoration of those who follow Him. It may be argued that statesmen, generals, orators, saints have changed the course of history; but no one surely would argue that the laws and ordinances laid down by any of them had been followed from age to age and that men would readily die rather than apostatize their commands.

Every existing civilization in the world today traces back to a religious foundation—to the teaching of some one of the Founders of the great living Faiths of the world. Whenever and wherever He has appeared He has weaned His followers from outworn traditions and customs, has produced a sharp break with the past, has instituted drastic reforms and unused practices, has "troubled the souls and changed the hearts of men." Not for a life-time; not for a century; but from the moment of His Utterance to this present the Names of all of these Messengers of God are revered and worshipped. Bahá'u'lláh in teaching the unity and validity of each of these Manifestations of God has laid the firm foundation of religious reconciliation.

It would be entirely outside the scope of the present argument to adduce those proofs and evidences of Bahá'u'lláh* as next in succession to these Divine Predecessors, but this underlying fact must be taken into consideration in a conspectus of His Teaching: that His followers assign to Him a station similar to that occupied by the Founders of the world's great religions; that His commands exercise over them the same profound and transforming influence; that the contagion of His Message conforms in every way to the spread of the great religious revivals of the past; and that His Program, formulated seventy years ago, is today exerting upon the world, even though it has never heard His Name, an authority so vital that every important objective toward which humanity is converging can be readily shown as a mere reflex of His Plan, proposed when nations were a law unto themselves and human exploitation, whether for military, economic, or social reasons, went unrebuked among men.

Therefore the basis of Bahá'u'lláh's Political Program is religious, and whatever our attitude may be toward religion, be we rational, skeptical, atheistic or what not, we are constrained to admit that religious authority is the most readily exercised, the most widespread and the most binding authority recognized by human beings.

Since the unique promise of Bahá'u'lláh is the unity of mankind in His Dispensation we ask ourselves how this great strife and welter of nationalistic aspirations, pretensions and contests can possibly be unified; how these conflicting interests can be reconciled; how these hereditary enemies can be marshalled for the great adventure of peace?

As the student of elementary political science knows there have never been but three forms of government: monarchy, aristocracy (meaning government by the select few), and democracy. Nothing new has been added since Aristotle gave these divisions and called attention to their forms of corruption: tyranny, oligarchy and demagoguery or mob-rule.

Bahá'u'lláh has united in His Plan all three of these forms of government—an entirely new departure.

*Given by the writer from the Christian viewpoint, in a series of articles entitled, "The Basis of Bahá'í Belief," published in The Bahá'í Magazine, beginning in November, 1929.

“Religion is the outer expression of the Divine Reality. Therefore it must be living, vitalized, moving and progressive. If it be without motion and non-progressive it is without the divine life, it is dead. The divine institutes are continuously active and evolutionary; therefore the revelation of them must be progressive and continuous. All things are subject to re-formation. This is a century of life and renewal. . . .”

'Abdu'l-Baha's Hope for America

THE BODY of the human world is sick. Its remedy and healing will be the oneness of the kingdom of humanity. Its life is the Most Great Peace. Its illumination and quickening is love. Its happiness is the attainment of spiritual perfections. It is my wish and hope that in the bounties and favors of the Blessed Perfection (Bahá'u'lláh) we may find a new life, acquire a new power and attain to a wonderful and supreme source of energy so that the Most Great Peace of divine intention shall be established upon the foundations of the unity of the world of men with God."

* * * *

"The United States has in reality made extraordinary progress; day by day they are advancing toward the ultimate goal. The material virtues of the people are many; now they must think of the ideal virtues, so that the highest of the perfections of humanity may illumine the regions of America.

Among the highest virtues are universal peace and the oneness of humanity. The chief ailment of humanity today is international strife; this militates against the advancement of the material and ideal virtues. . . .

But, praise be to God! the American government is no warlike government; the American democracy is not founded upon warlike doctrines. Hence it becomes this democracy to uphold international peace and spread it throughout the world. Through the promulgation of this doctrine will be distributed the greatest blessing. . . . My fervent hope and fond desire concerning the American people is that through their instrumentality the scope of this project will be enlarged and that earnest concerted action between the nations of the world will result therefrom."

* * * *

"Like unto a spirit, this ideal (Universal Peace) must run and circulate through the veins and arteries of the body of the world. . . . There is no doubt that this wonderful democracy will be able to realize it and the banner of international agreement will be unfurled here to spread onward and outward among all the nations of the world."

CHURCH AND STATE IN THE BAHÁ'Í SOCIAL ORDER

HUSSEIN RABBANI

The first part of this treatise on the Bahá'í State of the future and how its religious character becomes clear and practical, was published in the July number. Herein the author concludes his treatment of the subject and clearly explains the Bahá'í attitude of cooperation, toleration and absolute concord, and the peaceful methods used in the organization of society.

UNDER a Bahá'í regime the rights of the minorities will be wholly safeguarded and they will be given the widest possible freedom compatible with the safety of the state. In such a wise the defects of over-centralization will be avoided and the state will cease to be looked upon as the sole association having a role to play in the organization of society. The state instead of imposing a crushing weight over individuals and groups will rather seek their cooperation and aid for the fulfillment of its aims. The idea of force will thus gradually give place to a nobler ideal, namely that of social solidarity and social interdependence. Men will learn that despite all their differences they are in the last analysis not rivals but fellow-workers, not competitors but laborers in a vast cooperative enterprise. Racial, linguistic and national differences will cease to bring war and conflict but will be used to further the common weal.

Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá have both emphasized the necessity of toleration, of concord and amity. They have recommended their followers to consort with all the peoples, kindreds and religions of the world, to refrain from every action which may in the slightest degree violate the rights of any group or individual and not to use force and compulsion for the spread of their teachings. "Injure no one," says Bahá'u'lláh, "verily we have come to reconcile and to unite men, for most of them misunderstand each other."¹ And again: "Beware lest you shed blood. Unsheathe the sword of your tongue from the scabbard of utterance, for therewith shall you conquer the citadels of men's hearts. Thus we have taken from you the command of murder (religious war)."² "This order needs no arms, for all its efforts incline towards peace. Its armies are noble actions, its weapons good habits, its generals the love of God."³ "O people of the earth. The first glad tidings which is conferred in this Most Great Manifestation on all the people of the world . . . is the abolishing of the decree of religious warfare from the Book."⁴ "We have decided that the holy war in the path of God shall be waged by the armies of wisdom and of explanation, and by good habits and kind actions. So has it been decreed by the Powerful, the Almighty. There is no glory for him who spreads disorder over the earth after it has been organized; fear God, oh ye peoples, and be not among the oppressors."⁵

And 'Abdu'l-Bahá confirming

Bahá'u'lláh's sayings makes the following appeal in His last Will and Testament: "O ye beloved of the Lord. In this sacred Dispensation, conflict and contention are in no wise permitted. Every aggressor deprives himself of God's grace. It is incumbent upon everyone to show the utmost love, rectitude of conduct, straightforwardness and sincere kindness unto all the peoples and kindreds of the world, be they friends or strangers. So intense must be the spirit of love and loving-kindness, that the stranger may find himself a friend, the enemy a true brother, no difference whatsoever existing between them. For universality is of God and all limitations earthly. Thus man must strive that his reality may manifest virtues and perfections, the light whereof may shine upon everyone. The light of the sun shineth upon all the world and the merciful showers of Divine Providence fall upon all peoples. The vivifying breeze reviveth every living creature and all beings endued with life obtain their share and portion at His heavenly board. . . .

"Wherefore, O my loving friends! Consort with all the peoples, kindreds and religions of the world with the utmost truthfulness, uprightness, faithfulness, kindness, good-will and friendliness; that all the world of being may be filled with the holy ecstasy of the grace of Bahá, that ignorance, enmity, hate and rancor may vanish from the world and the darkness of estrangement amidst the peoples and kindreds of the world may give way to the Light of Unity. Should other peoples and nations be unfaithful to you show your fidelity unto them, should they be unjust toward you show justice towards them, should they keep aloof from you attract them to yourself, should they show their enmity be friendly towards them, should they poison your lives sweeten their souls, should they inflict a wound upon you be a salve to their souls. Such are the attributes of the sincere. Such are the attributes of the truthful."

All these words eloquently confirm the view that the Bahá'í Faith believes in toleration and condemns fanaticism and religious warfare. It believes in toleration as a principle rather than as a mere expediency. It cherishes no hatred towards peoples who profess a different religion or preach a different gospel. It will not force them to abandon their social and religious traditions, although it will attempt, through peaceful methods, to convince them of the sublimity and the uniqueness of the Bahá'í teachings. "The Revelation, of which Bahá'u'lláh is the source and centre, abrogates none of the religions that have preceded it, nor does it attempt, in the slightest degree, to distort their features or to belittle their value. It disclaims any intention of dwarfing any of the Prophets of the past or of whittling down the eternal verity of their teachings. It can, in no wise, conflict with the spirit that animates their claims, nor does it seek to undermine the basis of any man's allegiance to their cause. . . . Its teachings revolve around the fundamental principle that religious truth is not absolute but relative, that Divine Revelation is progressive, not final."¹

ALTHOUGH under a Bahá'í system politics and religion will combine, yet, such a fusion is not easy to carry out in these days for many reasons, the most important of which being the relative numerical weakness of the Bahá'ís themselves. The Bahá'í Faith is still in its infancy and its adherents are yet of slight social significance. For, however zealous and enthusiastic they may appear, yet, they are powerless to undertake any system of reform on a really large scale. They are hampered by the lack of an organization vast enough to cope with the highly complex problems of the day. Their chance has not yet come.

Meanwhile, they are instructed to keep apart from the political movements and agitations which are springing so profusely in most parts of the world. They are taught to refrain from participating either directly or indirectly in matters which affect the policy of the government under which they live and to show forth under all circumstances their whole-hearted loyalty to the governmental authorities of their country.

Such a separation between the religious and the political domain cannot but be of a temporary measure devised to meet a particular situation. As soon as the circumstances will prove to be suitable for a new change such a separation will come to an end and the new world order as anticipated and formulated by Bahá'u'lláh will be carried out in the most effective way.

IN HIS well-known treatise written some thirty years ago entitled, "Politics", 'Abdu'l-Bahá, explaining the history of Turkey and Persia, demonstrates how the calamities and misfortunes which have weighed upon these two countries during the last century are most of them attributable to the interference of the divines in the political affairs of the country. He goes on to show that unless religion and politics are separated under present-day conditions no peaceful and progressive life is possible. For the ecclesiastical authorities are ready to take hold of the reins of government and to perpetrate in its name such acts of fanaticism and intolerance as are wholly subversive of the very foundations of society.

In one of his recent communications to the Bahá'ís of the West, Shoghi Effendi has again emphasized the point that the Bahá'ís should in no wise associate themselves with the political activities of their country, and that, however temporary such a principle may be, yet it is of incalculable advantage to the nascent institutions of the Faith. "Let them refrain," he proclaims, "from associating themselves, whether by word or by deed, with the political pursuits of their respective nations, with the policies of their governments and the schemes and programs of parties and factions. In such controversies they should assign no blame, take no side, further no design, and identify themselves with no system prejudicial to the best interests of that world-wide Fellowship which it is their aim to guard and foster.

Let them beware lest they allow themselves to become the tools of unscrupulous politicians, or to be entrapped by the treacherous devices of the plotters and the perfidious among their countrymen. . . . Let them affirm their unyielding determination to stand, firmly and unreservedly, for the way of Bahá'u'lláh, to avoid the entanglements and bickerings inseparable from the pursuits of the politician, and to become worthy agencies of that Divine Polity which incarnates God's immutable Purpose for all men. . . .

"Such an attitude, however, is not dictated by considerations of selfish expediency, but is actuated, first and foremost, by the broad principle that the followers of Bahá'u'lláh will, under no circumstances, suffer themselves to be involved, whether as individuals or in their collective capacities, in matters that would entail the slightest departure from the fundamental verities and ideals of their Faith. Neither the charges which the uninformed and the malicious may be led to bring against them, nor the allurements of honors and rewards, will ever induce them to surrender their trust or to deviate from their path. Let their words proclaim, and their conduct testify, that they who follow Bahá'u'lláh, in what ever land they reside, are actuated by no selfish ambition, that they neither thirst for power, nor mind any wave of unpopularity, of distrust or criticism, which a strict adherence to their standards might provoke."

GLIMPSSES OF THE NEW WORLD ORDER

Notes on a Visit to Haifa and 'Akká

MABEL AND SYLVIA PAINE

This installment will conclude these "Diary Notes" which have appeared from month to month consecutively beginning in the March number. We regret that we were not able, for lack of space, to publish these informing "Notes" in full.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 24TH. A young pilgrim asked advice about studying the Bahá'í literature. Shoghi Effendi recommended an intensive study of the Iqán by Bahá'u'lláh and Some Answered Questions by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. These books will repay thorough study, mastery, even to the point of memorizing certain passages. It is well, too, to read contemporary books, selecting the best, dealing with the same subjects, in order to become thoroughly acquainted with the subject and be able to clarify the Bahá'í teachings. The Dawn-Breakers, a narrative of early events in the Bahá'í movement recently translated by Shoghi Effendi will also repay careful study. This book was written between 1890 and 1892 with the encouragement of Bahá'u'lláh, Who made some suggestions to the author, Nabil.

'Abdu'l-Bahá revised certain passages in the book. It shows that the Bahá'í faith has already its noble army of martyrs and the parts which introduce Bahá'u'lláh and the Báb are priceless material translated with extreme beauty and power.

Someone asked whether Bahá'is should support the League of Nations and Shoghi Effendi replied that the League is not on the foundation that it should be to be the ultimate league, but that it will develop into that. As far as possible, without becoming involved in politics Bahá'is should support it.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH.—Today we talked a little about food and health. In Some Answered Questions 'Abdu'l-Bahá shows that health is a matter of proper balance of the numerous elements in the human body. When this balance is disturbed disease enters. The readjustment can be effected by foods or by medicines. When the science of medicine becomes perfected, doctors can supply the missing element through foods. But in the meantime, Shoghi Effendi pointed out, we are in a confused and transitional state. Consequently it is better not to be dogmatic on the subject. The Bahá'í teachings, in this as in other matters, stress loyalty to science. Thus 'Abdu'l-Bahá always advised people in ill health to consult an expert doctor.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 27TH.—This is the tenth anniversary of the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. About six p. m. we went across the street to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house. We were to enter His room, the room whence

His spirit passed to the heavenly realm. A group of women were gathered outside the door, waiting to go in. They went in one by one and knelt with beautiful reverence at the bedside where the tired body of the great Servant of God and of mankind last lay. Little incidents of His last days came to my mind. How full of generous kindness and servitude, though the body was well nigh exhausted! His insisting on gathering the garden fruit with His own hand, though He ate it, seemingly, largely to please the gardener. How having eaten of the fruit He turned to the gardener and asked, "Do you desire anything more?" Then with a pathetic gesture of His hands touchingly, emphatically and deliberately said:—"Now, it is finished, it is finished!" His receiving visitors and showing them extraordinary courtesy on the last evening of His life, giving them presents, going with them to the door.

As 'Abdu'l-Bahá passed away at one-fifteen in the morning, the memorial service held each year occupies the evening and night up to about two. About eight-thirty we walked up the side of Mt. Carmel to the shrine. It was a night of full moonlight with many soft white clouds. Across the bay 'Akká looked like a diadem in the heavens. We found gathered around the shrine and on the broad south terrace a considerable group of Bahá'is. This terrace, we were told, was a favorite walk of the Master's. Soon all went within the shrine and listened while different Bahá'is, one at a time chanted prayers. One of the most beautiful prayers chanted was the one revealed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to be chanted at His shrine beginning: "He is the All-Glorious! O God, my God! Lowly and tearful, I raise my suppliant hands to Thee and cover my face in the dust of that Threshold of Thine, exalted above the knowledge of the learned, and the praise of all that Glorify Thee. . . ."

After coming out from the shrine all sat on benches and chairs on the terrace and listened to the chanted recital of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's last days and His funeral, as related in the touching account written by Shoghi Effendi and Lady Blomfield. The funeral, we recalled, had drawn together an immense concourse of mourners from all over Palestine from the High Commissioner and other officials and heads of various religious communities to the vast multitude of all sorts and conditions who revered and loved Him. For 'Abdu'l-Bahá had been a kind father to all in that region.

After this long and beautiful chant on the terrace, beautifully lighted both with electric lights and with the soft moonlight, all went again into the shrines and, during exquisite chanting of prayers, felt again the mighty power of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of God, Who through His supreme and lifelong exemplification of the spirit of ser-vitute made plain to the world the very heart of the Bahá'í teachings.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 1ST.—At luncheon today Shoghi Effendi spoke of the great future which lies ahead of Germany and Russia. . . . A reaction will come eventually in favor of religion and against democracy.

Touching upon the main idea of his letter to the Bahá'ís of the West, called the "Goal of the New World Order" that "the principle of the oneness of mankind, the pivot around which all the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh revolve," is more than "the enunciation of an ideal" and "stands inseparably associated with an institution adequate to embody its truth, demonstrate its validity, and perpetuate its influence", he spoke of the necessity for a new world order. This new world order cannot rise while national sovereignty is still so strong.

The immediate future for humanity, he said, is indeed dark, but in the not very distant future shines an infinitely better social and political order. Thus our last days at Haifa gave us bright glimpses of "the New World Order visualized by Bahá'u'lláh, a World Order that shall reflect, however dimly, upon this earthly plane, the ineffable splendors of the Abha Kingdom."

"Honesty is the foundation of all human affairs."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF KNOWLEDGE

DALE S. COLE

EVEN though our interest be focused hopefully on the future, let us "turn the clock backward" for a short while and enter the audience, listening to Sir Josiah Stamp, the eminent English economist, as he addresses the graduating class at Northwestern University. The time is June, 1933.

Speaking on the subject "University Education in the Present Crises" he confronts us with the challenging statement that "the compelling problem of the moment is the immediate emergency and the future of civilization."

As trained minds of rising generations leave their years of academic preparation and class room problems, they step into a world, as he points out, "committed for the most part to government by democracy."

This, on first thought, does not seem to be a disturbing situation, for democracies have existed for many, many years, without serious threat to civilization. But, he explains, there are contributing influences, at this time, which command attention. Although a democracy may be fitted "for dealing with problems of religion, political liberty, public expenditure and important problems of the past" there are new considerations in that the "great issues of the day are in the main economic and international."

This statement is of peculiar interest to those familiar with the Bahá'í Revelation, for, as 'Abdu'l-

Bahá said, the economic problem is basically a spiritual one, and international peace, good-will and understanding essential to the continued progress of civilization.

The speaker further suggests that in the economic and international aspects of the situation, democracy is meeting a "crucial test", and that the problems confronting us today "are dependent upon mass psychology." There is no satisfactory international economic control, nor even "easy means of international inquiry" or decision. This, in the face of the facts that "national boundaries are obsolete; that "the distribution of economic goods has no relation to existing political areas; that "the world has become internationalized by a network of established export industries . . . by overseas investments, . . . by financial obligations."

He believes that the academic responsibility in relation to these problems "is enormous"; that "the problem of recovery and regained balance is mainly an intellectual one" as is also "the proper ordering of economic forces and tendencies."

"The place of education in this scheme leaps to the eye."

CERTAINLY the situation he portrays calls for a new technique, a technique that is at once practical and potent, a technique with a spiritually dynamic power, for by what other means can mankind hope to cope with forces, which someone has said, are not understood and hence seem to evade control?

Under democratic forms of government, future generations will be at once the governors and the governed and they "must therefore know how to judge facts and the technique of many kinds of proof."

"Let every student make some trial excavation to the footings of some structure of human knowledge, and he will have a glimpse into the responsibility of knowledge and the formation of well attested opinions which are the best bulwark against the superficialities of democratic conviction." What an inspirational appeal there is in these words of Sir Josiah Stamp! Investigate! Appreciate the "responsibility of knowledge"—that is one of the obligations imposed upon the rising generation of trained minds, and it is a great privilege as well as a responsibility, for upon them will fall most of the burdens and rewards attendant to the establishment of the Most Great Peace.

Where can any technique unearth such "well attested opinions" as in the messages of those great Manifestations of God, which He, in His pure bounty has sent to illumine the intellects and purify the souls of mankind?

SIR JOSIAH STAMP'S appeal to these graduates, to investigate "the responsibility of knowledge" synchronizes with that tremendous clarion which the Bahá'í revelation has sounded and is sounding for every individual to investigate truth, to assume social responsibility, to apply the divine remedies given by Bahá'u'lláh to those difficult and profound problems now threatening the foundations of human institutions.

"For judgment is more and more dependent upon common sense synthesis, and the convergence of different attitudes toward life and its qualities." In "the convergence of different attitudes toward life" is he not suggesting the need for a greater unity of thought and action than mankind has ever yet experienced? Is this not another way of emphasizing the "fundamental oneness of humanity"?

He continues, "We have to break down the triple reliance upon, first, the aimless or formless knowledge of democracy, the experts' 'unearthly ballet of bloodless categories' as Kant calls it, and the journalist's feeble flutterings between the two. We can do this if every graduate has a trained and original mind. . . . Originality consists, as Fitzjames Stephens reminded us, rather in thinking for ourselves than in thinking differently from others, and a trained mind is one which does not get either paralyzed with inferiority or hot and bothered when it strolls into the next room of knowledge and experience."

"Every university student should, therefore," Sir Josiah Stamp admonishes, "be an expert in the subject he has chosen. But there are three qualities that are beyond and around this attainment, —a knowledge of the real nature of fact, familiarity with the processes of proof, and lastly and most important, some glimpse of the over-riding nature of wisdom. That grasp of life's problems by the whole mind as distinct from the apparatus of any particular field of knowledge, where any addition to the apparatus of facts and logic, and all the sensitiveness of every instinct for beauty and goodness go to make the mind much greater than the sum of its parts."

AS WE PASS slowly out of the building, does it not seem as if we are all, at this moment, in a graduating class? Are we not being forced, by new and hitherto unexperienced forces to abandon many old and familiar attitudes towards life? Trained in the schools of our past lives, of tradition, prejudices and superstitions, are we not now being ejected from these class rooms, from these campuses of complacency into unfamiliar circumstances and situations?

Many of the admonitions of Sir Josiah Stamp, so ably voiced at Northwestern, apply to us individually and collectively and many of them are capable of expansion into an amazing comprehensiveness.

Consider the three qualities which he mentioned: first, "a knowledge of the real nature of fact." Is it not increasingly important that everyone know and feel the tremendous rightness of the oneness of mankind, of the fundamental oneness of religion, of the necessity of unity among the sons of men?

Secondly, "familiarity with the processes of proof" for if we do not know how to sift the false from the true how can we acquire any real knowledge whatsoever? Is this not echoing the great instruction of Bahá'u'lláh that everyone investigate truth for himself? For, in the last analysis, proof of spiritual facts and events is felt in the heart, it is a conviction not so often acquired by intellectual assaying as by spiritual susceptibility to that which is true and lasting, right and eternal—by the bounty of God.

Third, "Some glimpse of the over-riding nature of wisdom." What greater wisdom could one hope to find than the universal words of Bahá'u'lláh, the profound and loving instruction of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Guardianship of Shoghi Effendi?

Life is a school. Often it seems to be a very hard one. We pass from one phase of life, from one set of conditions to another, graduating as it were, into higher and higher courses of training and experience, —always yearning to attain "tranquility and peace", that haven which is reached only through spiritual education.

IN CONCLUDING his address Sir Josiah Stamp said:

"No man seems to me to be educated who has not a definite attitude ranging from wistfulness to spiritual certitude towards the universe of the unseen and the infinite, in which all our greatest mental achievement is insignificant."

What a great bounty it is that God has ordained that long and toilsome schooling is not always necessary for the attainment of "spiritual certitude." It is within the reach of all who seek sincerely.

As we pass through the stages of spiritual education, the only kind of education which is adequate, can we not try to hasten that "spiritual renaissance" cheered by the prophetic words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá regarding the West—"Then will the hearts of its people be vivified through the potency of the teachings of God and their souls be set aglow by the undying fire of His love."

Forty years have passed since the Bahá'í Revelation was first mentioned in America, forty years of education. We graduate from this period into the next, confident in Faith, piloted surely and wisely by the Administration of the Guardian.

Knowledge of Bahá'u'lláh's Divine Plan confers a great responsibility—which is at once an obligation and a privilege. In acknowledging the responsibility of this knowledge we have the assurance that "God will assist all those who arise to serve Him."

A GOOD GATHERING

THE SOUVENIR OF 'ABDU'L-BAHA*

"You must manifest complete love and affection toward all mankind. Do not exalt yourselves above others but consider all as your equals, recognizing them as the servants of one God. Know that God is compassionate toward all; therefore love all from the depths of your hearts, prefer all religionists before yourselves, be filled with love for every race and be kind toward the people of all nationalities. Never speak disparagingly of others but praise without distinction. . . . Turn all your thoughts toward bringing joy to hearts."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

EACH year, on the last Saturday in June, a group of a few hundred gathers in the beautiful pine grove surrounding Evergreen Cabin, at West Englewood, New Jersey. The occasion is the annual commemoration of the Souvenir of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The habitual readers of this magazine know that twenty-one years ago 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself gave a feast in this same place to some three hundred of His friends and followers; and that every year since it has been celebrated at the same place and date. More and more it grows to be a happy and festive occasion not only for Bahá'í friends from the cities round about but for the dwellers in and about West Englewood.

This year a new bond has been created between the Bahá'í Assembly and the citizens of West Englewood, for during the winter the Bahá'í friends had given public entertainments and concerts and made over the entire proceeds to the welfare committee of West Englewood for unemployment relief. This is one of the reasons why an unusually large number of people from the immediate vicinity were present.

A special feature of the day this year was the placing of a marker at the spot in the grove where 'Abdu'l-Bahá stood on that memorable day in June, 1912, when He addressed the friends assembled at the feast which His bounty had prepared. Beneath the marker,—a small granite stone,—was placed a sealed copper box containing a paper signed by all those present on this occasion who were also present in 1912. The West Englewood Assembly offered this marker as a means to indicate and preserve this hallowed spot pending the erection in the future of a more permanent and adequate expression of loving memory to the one who in 1912 instituted this "good gathering", this most happy annual occasion. Brief talks recalling the original event were a part of the simple but beautiful ceremony of placing the stone.

This annual gathering not only commemorates the feast given by 'Abdu'l-Bahá but it exemplifies the principles which He taught and the spirit which radiated from Him. For 'Abdu'l-Bahá taught the Oneness of Humanity and the Oneness of all Religions, and on this occasion come together peoples of different races, religions and nations in unity, love and harmony.

The program, too, bore witness of unity and the release from racial, national and religious prejudice—such release as gladdens every heart illumined by Bahá'u'lláh's teachings for those taking part in it were from different races and nations. Gifted members of the Negro race rendered music and gave talks conducive to understanding and amity between the races. A native of far off Persia, distinguished in diplomatic service, gave the principle address of the evening. Thus the unity of the East and the West was evidenced. The addresses, also, helped people to understand how important and far-reaching is this principle of the Oneness of Mankind. In the afternoon the speaker called attention to the Scriptural background of the Bahá'i Message, showing that the coming of Bahá'u'lláh fulfills prophecy; that the Bahá'i administration which is being established in Bahá'i commu-

THE TRUE SOVEREIGN

ALFRED E. LUNT

"The Prophets of God have come to show man the way of righteousness in order that he may not follow his own natural impulse, but govern his actions by the light of Their precept and example. . . . The imperfect members of society, the weak souls in humanity follow their natural trend. Their lives and actions are in accord with their natural propensities; they are captives of physical susceptibilities; they are not in touch or in tune with the spiritual bounties."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

This series of articles began in the May number and has been continued monthly. In the three installments already published the author explained the dual nature of man; that nature in itself is incapable of establishing values or achieving perfections; and emphasized the importance of the recognition and acceptance of the True Sovereign to save man from the world of nature. In this number the author describes the misconceptions of true religion, the real reason for the appearance of the Prophets, and the happiness and peace in store for a mature humanity when they make a practical application of the realities to the daily living.

IN this clear exposition of the dual or rather triune characteristics of our race, and the basic purpose of the appearance among us of the Divine Messengers, the reader will not fail to note a new, and, to some, possibly startling departure from the accepted understanding. For many centuries, the followers of His Holiness, Christ, have rested their faith mainly upon acceptance of His appearance as Savior and Lord. This, in its pristine simplicity and beauty, was a recognition of the sovereignty of God altogether praiseworthy. The divine purpose, however, in His Manifestation gradually came to be obscured or, perhaps, never widely understood. The greatest proofs of His Divinity were declared to be His miraculous deeds. And from these as well as from the other astonishing and tragic incidents of His wonderful life, dogmas and interpretations emerged which, in turn, tended to become the principal emphasis of His glorious existence, as taught to the people.

It may well be that the true emphasis could not be expressed or understood, pending the arrival of the first traces of humanity's maturity, just now dawning. Perhaps this understanding was one of the hidden matters of which He spoke when He told His disciples that they could not then bear the things He could have revealed. But, whatever the reason for the war-strewn pages of human history of these past centuries, for the deeds of cruelty and tyranny that have up to now marked the pathway of mankind with hideous monuments of needless suffering,—the divine purpose stands out in clear illumination, today, revealed in a clear and irrefutable text: that the aim of the Holy Ones, the purpose of the loving Father of all mankind, has ever been the emancipation of humankind from the qualities, the ignorance and the slavery of the world of nature.

Not merely to be worshipped and adored, not merely to be believed in, but, primarily, that the people shall know that Their (the Prophets) words are the Words of God, and that Their mandates are alive with power and with healing for the deliverance of men from the ancient yoke, have They come. And, through this outpouring of a new knowledge the Word of God calls mankind to bestir itself, to utilize for itself this power and this knowledge that has flowed from the Center of Reality, and, thus, become its own liberator.

It is no longer enough to rest content with belief, leaving all else, including personal redemption, to God. No longer does it suffice for us to evade our individual responsibility to that light that dwells within our inmost hearts. For "he whose words exceed his deeds" is unacceptable. We are now informed that "deeds show the station of the man." It is through deeds, deeds of service, deeds of overcoming, deeds illumined and fortified by the new knowledge, that the enemy is to be routed. But the basis of this is the new consciousness awakened by this revelation of the Divine Purpose that has overspread the world in this new cycle of human redemption.

IN THE confusion occasioned by past misconceptions of what the purpose really is, what constitutes man's real salvation, the identity of the enemy has become obscured in the thick mists of sectarian dogma. These dogmas have, in the main, tended to concentrate the attention of the believers of all the religious systems upon the outer rather than the inner phase of religious faith. But the religion of God, the original divine foundations revealed by His Manifestations in the great spiritual springtimes of humanity, has always brought with it two outpourings, a greater and a lesser.

The first is the surging ocean of the divine love, alive with the Holy Spirit, the greatest need of humanity in its periods of gloomy skepticism, coldness and materialism. The second, equally authentic but relatively less essential, embodies the ordinances adapted to the existing requirements (in any age) of mankind's social order.

One is the Holy of Holies; the other the outer court of the temple. One is the spirit and the life; the other the body for that spirit. And since the body without the spirit is purposeless and dead, so, long continued over-emphasis upon the outer ordinances, to the exclusion of the moving power of love, gradually dims the vision of the soul to the precious jewels of Divine Revelation.

When the people of faith enter the sectarian realm, they are dwelling in the winter-time of their spiritual cycle. Fixing their eyes mostly upon the outer symbols, the warmth of the Holy of Holies flees from them, for love cannot abide in the chill coldness of a spiritless body. With this withering of the spiritual tissue of civilization come, hand in hand, the inevitable effects. Lacking the guidance of the spiritual realm, dispossessed of the enkindling heat of divine love humanity exhibits the hardness and coldness of the world of nature like the iron withdrawn from the fire.

Then follow the days of suffering, wherein the weak and unfortunate are oppressed by the strong, the flames of war madness devastate the earth, and the idols are set up. Religion is arrayed against religion, denomination against denomination, race against race, rich against poor, while separation and prejudice clog the arteries of the body of humanity. Is not this what we have witnessed?

Then the spiritual springtime gently unlocks the frozen channels. The Holy of Holies is renewed. The warmth of the Love of God becomes focused upon humanity's heart. The outer courts are reconciled; plurality and division yield to the majestic toll of the Divine Bell that peals forth the eternal truth of the Oneness of God, the Oneness of His Prophets, and of all men.

Without the true King and the enthronement of His Sovereignty, the Kingdom is unthinkable. Can there be a Kingdom without an acknowledged King? For this, Christ taught men to pray. Consequently, we may expect that coincident with the breaking of the veils and the restoration of vision, the gulf that divides the divine from the nether world will be seen outlined in clear perspective. Dissipating the fogs and mists that had seemed to confer upon the false countenance the beauty of the true, it is certain that the radiant face of the True One will shine forth in unmistakable splendor.

The laws and ordinances having to do with the outer courts of the temple will gradually tend to assume their proper relationship to the new inrush of spiritual life. Content and honored to become once again the vehicle or body through which the Holy Spirit expresses, the false glory they have assumed in the past is stripped from them.

IT IS, NO DOUBT, not generally realized that the multiplicity of sects and denominations in the world owes its origin almost solely to the conflict and differentiation between the ordinances of the different religious systems. The outer courts have been in dissension with each other. Each succeeding Prophet has established those best suited to the needs of His people. But since the followers of a particular Messenger have failed to accept His Successor and the new ordinances decreed by Him, they have carried on their original religious laws into the succeeding dispensation, and, finding the new laws in conflict with that which they adore, denounced the new as heresy.

Thus, the field of divine ordinances, designed to provide guidance for a people throughout but not beyond a prophetic cycle, became a battle-ground of diversity, and, hence, plurality. In the sea of plurality swim the fishes of discord. This condition ultimately resulted in religious warfare, when fanatical armies, led astray by hatred, sought to wreak vengeance upon each other in the belief that, since the ordinances differed, so likewise must the inner foundations of the Prophets in whom they respectively believed. This is only another way of saying that since the ordinances differed, the Prophet who had introduced the change must necessarily be an impostor and false. To such an extreme degree as this were the people wedded to the laws of the outer court. Such an attitude barred the congregations from any impartial examination of the foundation upon which the new Prophet, Himself, stood. Even as the people in the days of Christ cried out: "our sacred books inform us that when the Messiah comes it will be from an unknown place, whereas this claimant to the Messianic station has come from Nazareth; he was to be seated upon the throne of David, but this one is in the utmost state of poverty and deprivation; He was to promulgate the law of the Bible but this man has changed that holy law" (ordinances).

The sectarian vision is, unfailingly, a literal one. This literal interpretation of the divine symbols resident in the law and in the prophetic assurances in which a people believe, is an infirmity arising from attachment to the outer ceremonies and the ancestral traditions. From this point of view, the Holy of Holies, the universal law of love and brotherhood is wholly excluded. The thick veils thus interposed over the luminous pearls of Divine Revelation have two results. First, they dim the vision of the people to the Reality of their own Prophet; and, secondly, this blindness automatically deprives them of the ability to weigh the truth of the new foundation revealed by His Successor.

The final result, then, is division and discord. The oneness of Truth is shattered by the plurality of the changing ordinances. Only in this way does plurality enter the religious field. And since plurality in a series of divine outpourings is impossible and unthinkable, because God, the Truth, is One and not multiple, every religious war, every division in human society arising from the seeming conflict of ordinances or the faulty interpretation of the symbols of truth, must be relegated to the field of irreligion. In that field, the passions and hatreds of opposing groups have been expressed in full measure. And since these destructive qualities are plainly derived from the world of nature, it is at once perfectly clear that neither they, nor the motives underlying them, have any essential connection with the Law of God whose Alpha and Omega is Unity through Love.

Rather are they evidences of the common bond that connects the degrees of fanaticism with the very elements in man that correspond to the natural destructive urge. Such a dire penalty as this comes upon the nations who, by forgetting the law of love have consequently forgotten God; who by ignoring the primal Word of His Revelation deposited in the inner court of the temple of His command, have exalted the mere body or vehicle of the Holy Spirit, i. e., the ordinances and dogmas to a forbidden height. It is the worship of an unlighted lamp; the pursuit of an enchanting figure bereft of soul.

OUT OF THESE mirages, these fateful human errors, our race is, nevertheless, even now, emerging into the clear light of the dawn of reality. The discouragements of the present, bitter as they are, are mitigated by the new vision they have awakened. The mad thrill of the recent period of inflation, with its exaltation of gold and the money power as an idol, was at least one of the symptoms of the unreality that has so long dominated the race. Bahá'u'lláh has assessed for us the true value of suffering in this penetrating saying, based upon the all-embracing laws of the unseen kingdom:

"O Son of Man! My calamity is My providence; outwardly it is but fire and vengeance, yet inwardly it is naught but light and mercy. Hasten thereunto, that thou mayst become an eternal light and an immortal spirit. This is My command unto thee, do thou observe it."

Through the fire of suffering, the pure gold of men's hearts is refined, and the dross removed. Primarily, it is the development of a capacity to distinguish the true from the false. The proud ego, wallowing in its superstitions and fancies, loses its firm hold upon the individual destiny. In vain, it applies the old formulas and the shibboleths it has learned at the feet of mother nature, only to find them strangely impotent. As in the case of the unfortunate Dr. Jekyll, the once powerful chemical reagent cannot be reassembled, since it was, even in the beginning, impure, a hideous anomaly.

AND IF, because of the stored up seed of disobedience mankind has sown so plentifully, yet other and greater calamities are to befall; if, in other words, the present shaking of the pillars of existence in the economic and social fields proves to be insufficient to inhibit us from succumbing yet again to world-wide conflict, the unspeakable crime of human fratricide, let us hope that such a renewed violation of Divine Law will not cause the very earth, itself, to turn and rend us with its cosmic shudderings.

Little do we, as a whole, realize the vast forces that are unloosed when man, the pivot of the creation, disclaims his responsibility to the Establisher of the law of love and brotherhood, and plunges into the weltering abyss of war. Through this, he unlocks the sealed gate behind which lurks the hidden force of decomposition. Through this, he causes an acceleration in its destructive mission, uncovering his nakedness to its weapons of death. This is peculiarly true today when a new order has been instituted; when the law of human unity has been promulgated, and the command to peace registered and confirmed.

THAT MANKIND is standing at the cross-roads is the firm opinion of many profound students of the historical trends of the race. Out of the mists of past prophetic admonishments, ominous events are foretold that were to occur at the dawn of the New Age, contemporaneous with the "end of the world" (expired cycle). Are we, as a race, to be overtaken by these universal woes? If so, it could only be because of the inexorable working of the law of cause and effect, and perhaps also to our failure here and now to rightly assess the significance of the storms that are impending.

And, yet, should these events descend upon us, we may still be assured that even in so great a calamity, the Light and Mercy that dwells at the heart of every suffering will become revealed. That from the red fires of woe will shine forth a new and permanent happiness for the race; that the Divine Unity will become established on the earth, the new order attain a universal acceptance, the oneness of race and of religion become a living reality in human consciousness, and the True Sovereign enthroned.

THE BAHÁ'Í SUMMER SCHOOL AT LOUHELEN RANCH

ORCELLA REXFORD, D. SC.

"Religion is the greatest instrument for the order of the world and the tranquility of all existent beings."—Bahá'u'lláh.

ABDU'L-BAHA, known as Master by those of the Bahá'í faith, continually urged His followers to be happy and ever sounded the admonition: Be ye happy! If you be not happy in this day, for what day are you waiting to be happy? I declare a moment in this glorious century is greater than all past centuries.

An onlooker standing on the shady lawn of Louhelen Ranch in Eastern Michigan and watching the arrival of the "Friends of God" could not help but be impressed with the fact that the followers of 'Abdu'l-Bahá are the embodiment of these words. Many of them had given up an opportunity to visit the Century of Progress Exposition in order to attend summer school here. Those who had arrived ahead of the others greeted the newcomers with beaming faces and expressions of joy and affection. Sometimes there would be a moment of deep realization as two friends who were very close met after a year's separation. From far distances they gathered—from Maine and Seattle, from Montreal and Florida. Verily, they "came from the east and from the west, from the north, and from the south to sit down in the kingdom of the Lord."

The greetings of the Bahá'ís and their love for one another is very impressive even to those accustomed to that love. A new comer when asked for her impression of the summer school remarked with enthusiasm, "I never have received such a welcome from my own family. I don't believe any of my relatives would express as much delight at seeing me as these friends of God do when they get together. It is wonderful to belong to such a spiritual family. I feel for the first time that I have really come home." This celestial vibration set up was one of the outstanding impressions that we took away from the third Bahá'í summer school at Louhelen Ranch, where we spent nine glorious days. Many voiced the sentiment, "It is like living in Heaven for a little while. How we dislike to go back to the world, but since we must, how splendid that we can carry this inspiration to others and share this heavenly bounty with them." It gives one just a glimpse of what life will come to mean when all the peoples of the world adopt the Bahá'í program of the Oneness of Humanity and live according to the Bahá'í ideals of the Most Great Peace.

Many improvements for our comfort had been made since last year,

Some of the friends attending the Bahá'í Summer School, Louhelen Ranch in Michigan that were a delight to us. A large barn had been converted into a roomy and airy assembly hall, and the space above into two stories of bedrooms for the comfort of the increased number of guests.

THE GUARDIAN of the Bahá'í Cause, Shoghi Effendi, has laid a great deal of stress on the importance of these summer schools for they embody that new and vital feature of Bahá'í administration, consultation,—the gathering of the friends to talk together of ways and means for promoting the Bahá'í Cause. They offer, too, a means of making new friends and cementing the bonds of unity and love for each other. Ideas are exchanged that furnish new inspiration and experience in the teaching field. These shared are of great assistance to those who teach. It was a delight to observe that many of the same people who were present last year had returned this summer. A practical business man observed, "I would not miss this summer school. I arrange my vacation so as to bring my family here each year, for the inspiration I receive stays with me throughout the year."

How shall we convey the spirit and the power of this brief session to one not present? It is difficult—impossible. The mornings were taken up with classes, each giving information and inspiration in its own way. The period combining meditation and Iqán¹ studies opened the daily program, turned the thoughts upward, and showed what new fields may be explored and higher thoughts released by meditative study.

The daily lessons in Bahá'í Administration reached a new depth of meaning in what had seemed to some mere routine and showed that the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh makes clear God's plan from the beginning

—a plan culminating in the New World Order which is evolving from Bahá'í Administration. The talks on the Influence of Religion on Society linked into those on Bahá'í Administration and developed convincingly the idea that there is no adequate explanation of Society apart from Religion. The stories and incidents from the "Dawn-Breakers"¹ interwoven with and illustrating the great and eternal truths which give life to the soul lifted us into the world of the spirit as they flowed from the lips of the speaker in a truly inspired manner. The afternoons were thrown open to the public and an hour was devoted to a lecture on some aspect of the Bahá'í Cause.

OF GREAT import is the fact that almost a third of the summer school were the youth of the Bahá'ís, radiant young people, many from schools, colleges and universities, and some who had gone out from schools into the working world, eager to study the precepts of the new age of which they will be a vital part. Most of them had attended the summer school last year and had so thoroughly enjoyed themselves that they eagerly looked forward to assembling together again this year. The intense earnestness in spiritual matters shown in their morning study and discussion group did not prevent, indeed enhanced, their enjoyment of the swimming, hiking and other amusements in the afternoons. A balanced life is the ideal Bahá'í life.

The evenings were turned over to the young people, and they planned interesting programs for the rest of the group. One evening was devoted to music, for 'Abdu'l-Bahá often remarked, "Music is the language of the heart." Another evening was devoted to the personal experiences of those who had made pilgrimages to Haifa. One evening was just for fun when each was asked to write a poem about the person whose name was drawn by lot. These poems were read aloud, while the audience tried to guess who was being described. Another evening was given over to the methods by which the young people may teach the Bahá'í Cause and they told of their experiences in that field of activity. One could not help feeling that with such unprejudiced and scientific minds attacking the problems of a sick and ailing world that the remedies will be applied in a wise, efficient, and intelligent manner.

Such glorious days spent in the pursuit of spiritual wisdom! How we wish that all the world might have shared them with us for every one was striving to translate these words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá into deeds:

"Religion is an attitude toward God reflected in life."

"The greatest gift of man is universal love, for this love is the magnet which renders existence eternal, attracts reality, and diffuses life with infinite joy. If this love penetrates the heart of man, all the forces of the universe will be realized in him, for it is a divine power which transports him to a divine station and man will make no real progress until illumined by this power of love. Strive to increase the love-force of reality, to make your hearts greater centers of attraction, to create new ideals and relationships.

"Alas! Alas! The world has not discovered the reality of religion hidden beneath the symbolic forms."

The Divine Physician

WHEN Christ appeared with those marvelous breaths of the Holy Spirit, the children of Israel said, "we are quite independent of Him; we can do without Him and follow Moses; we have a Book and in it are found the teachings of God, what need, therefore, have we of this man?"

* *

It is possible for a man to hold to a book of medicine and say, "I have no need of a doctor; I will act according to the book; in it every disease is named, all symptoms are explained, the diagnosis of each ailment is completely written out and a prescription for each malady is furnished; therefore why do I need a doctor?" This is sheer ignorance. A physician is needed to prescribe. Through his skill the principles of the book are correctly and effectively applied until the patient is restored to health.

* *

Christ was a Heavenly Physician. He brought spiritual health and healing into the world.

Baha'u'llah is likewise a Divine Physician. He has revealed prescriptions for removing disease from the body politic and has remedied human conditions by spiritual power.

“What a wonderful century this is! It is an age of universal reformation. . . . The foundations of human society are changing and strengthening. Today sciences of the past are useless. . . . Ethical precedents and principles cannot be applied to the needs of the modern world. . . . All conditions and requisites of the past unfitted and inadequate for the present time, are undergoing radical reform. It is evident therefore that counterfeit and spurious religious teaching, antiquated forms of belief and ancestral imitations which are at variance with the foundations of Divine Reality must also pass away and be reformed.”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

THERE HAS been a great change in religious thought, as in all other departments of human thought, during the last one hundred years. Not all of this change is in the form of progress for religion, though it may be all regarded as part of the universal evolutionary progress of humanity.

THE MOST marked change which has come upon Christianity is due to the comparative study of religion. This analysis of religion from the scientific point of view, taking into account origins, developments, adaptations and results, and including in its sweep all the great religions of the world, has started a transformation in the traditional Christian theology which is revolutionizing the attitude of educated, intelligent Christians toward other religions.

This comparative study of religions has occurred almost wholly within the last one hundred years. In fact, the comparative, scientific attitude toward all forms of human expression and progress is relatively new. It was not until the middle of the Eighteenth Century that leaders of thought began to seek to evaluate civilization and to think of it in terms of progress. It seems strange, that humanity should have existed during all this previous period in the unconscious, uncritical stage of preadolescence, so to speak.

The Greek philosophers, it is true did a considerable amount of such comparative thinking, but it did not then become a habit of the race. It was not until the French savants of the Encyclopedist group challenged contemporaneous human society to measure itself that Occidental nations began to form the habit of thinking in terms of progress, looking back to appreciate past achievements, looking critically at the present stage of civilization, and looking forward to envision possible improvements in the human race.

When the doctrine of evolution began to dominate human thought about the middle of the Nineteenth Century, it introduced or accelerated the comparative study of every expression of human thought or energy. In the present epoch it is so customary to think of progress in every line in terms of evolution, that without such an approach to existing things adequate understanding of life and of civilization seems inconceivable.

THE EFFECT of the doctrine of comparative study and of the doctrine of evolution upon religion, especially upon theology, has been enormous.

The previous Christian theology had been very naive, to say the least:—that the world was made by fiat instantaneously and perfect; that the Christian religion was similarly made and was similarly perfect, not only in essence but in expression; that the Christian religion was the only Truth given by God to man; and that, in consequence of this last assumption, all religions outside the Judaic dispensations were either pure chicanery and deceit or else the invention of the devil.

What was the effect upon this Christian theology of the comparative study of religion? Its first effect was to stimulate a sincere admiration for the best in other religions. Voltaire, Lessing, Goethe, and many other great leaders of thought, began to admire, and to openly express admiration for, what seemed fundamentally good in other religions. Carlyle, Olympian hurler of thunderous words, in his "Heroes and Hero Worship" came forth with a dissertation on Muhammad that presented Him as a great leader of Truth. This attitude of tolerance—of more than tolerance even, of appreciation—has been growing until it is now the typical attitude of all highly educated thoughtful people who take interest in things religious.

As a corollary to appreciation of other religions, of belief in their sincerity, authenticity and effectiveness, there has come about a momentous change in advanced Christian theology. No longer do progressive leaders of Christian thought claim that Christ and the Hebrew prophets brought the only Spiritual Truth which has come to earth. Other teachers in other climes were also channels for God's grace and power.

Is it true, then, that Christ was the Only-Begotten Son of God? Belief in the Trinity itself is tottering. In fact, the whole scheme of traditional Christian theology is being shattered to bits by the inroads of modern scientific thought.

THE FIRST steps toward a progressive Christian theology were made over a hundred years ago by the Unitarians and Universalists. In their beginnings these movements were deemed so heretical as to be dangerous to society. My grandfather, leader in the Universalist movement, was discharged from his first teaching position by the school board because his religion would cause him to be "a harmful influence to youth." Another relative told me that when she was a little girl her parents compelled her to avert her face when passing the Universalist church of her town because it was "the abode of the devil."

It was a Unitarian who wrote the first important book treating on the world's religions from the point of view of sincere appreciation. Since James Freeman Clarke's "Ten Great Religions of the World," many books have been published on the world's different religious systems, some appreciative, some critical in tone, but all tolerant. We no longer call Buddhism the invention of the devil because many of its teachings, ceremonies and pictographs so closely resemble those of the medieval Christian church. We no longer accuse Muhammed of being a charlatan, realizing as Carlyle did that no charlatan can create and retain the allegiance of hundreds of millions of people; and because, too, we find much to admire sincerely in the individual and organized expression of Islam.

BUT now let us look upon the result of this progress of religious liberalism in so far as it concerns the depth and warmth of spiritual life. Here the results have been the opposite of progress — a corresponding falling away in faith, in earnestness, in sincerity of expression of the religious life, in exact proportion to the gains in religious tolerance and liberalism.

This concomitant weakening of the religious life was inevitable. It has always occurred when great religious systems have met in rival claims before a tolerant audience. Such a situation is bound to produce the attitude of latitudinarianism and eclecticism. "Man is the measure of all things," said the Greek sophists. "I shall choose from the rival claims of existing religions that which suits me best," said the cultured Roman citizen of the period of the Empire. "I will believe what I like best to believe," declares the cultured citizen of the Twentieth Century.

This liberalism is good in so far as it involves a sincere search for Truth, but harmful if it eventuates in the denial of all authority in religion. For if we remove the factor of Authority and Revelation from religion, we really have no religion left, we have only philosophy.

And so we perceive today,—that liberal people tend to be philosophic in their breadth of thought, but not religious in the essential meaning of the word. They lack reverence, the habit of obedience to God, the effective use of prayer. While they have gained in breadth, they have lost in depth. While they have grown in tolerance they have waned in zeal. And exactly the same transition is occurring in Islam, in Buddhism, in Judaism, in Confucianism, wherever contacted by Western scientific thought.

NOW HERE is the resultant problem—the greatest religious problem of the day. How are modern religionists to retain the broad universal attitude which is characteristic of the age, and yet at the same time preserve that deep inner Fire without which no religion is worthy of the name?

May we suggest that the evolutionary development of religious tolerance and eclecticism during the past hundred years has been but a preparation for a new and universal World Religion? It has been the clearing away of the debris of the past—the fabric of human thought built over and concealing the great foundations of undying Truth brought by the Prophets. It has been a preparation for a new Construction — an Edifice under whose roof all mankind may join in unison, in praise and prayer to God.

Such an Edifice exists in the New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh. And its outward symbol is already taking form on the shore of Lake Michigan—the new Bahá'í Temple the architecture of which is inspiring to all lovers of the beautiful, as its spiritual exercises are inspiring to all lovers of the Spiritual.

THE SECOND CENTURY OF PROGRESS

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

"There is one God; mankind is one; the foundations of religion are one. . . . Men have always been taught and led by the Prophets of God. The Prophets of God are the Mediators of God. All the Prophets and Messengers have come from one Holy Spirit and bear the message of God fitted to the age in which they appear. The one light is in them and they are one with each other."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

MY friend and I spent many days studying the exhibits of the Century of Progress Exposition going from building to building, from exhibit to exhibit,—truly marvelous exhibits arranged with the modern mastery of art and skill to appeal to the eye,—the last word in visual education.

Finally we came to the Hall of Religion. Here too we studied thoughtfully the plan and exhibits, listened to a talk, then sat down to meditate. Questions arose. What connection has this building and what it stands for with all the rest? I recalled a certain talk by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, found the place and reread it. "From every standpoint," He says, "the world of humanity is undergoing a re-formation. The laws of former governments and civilizations are in process of revision, scientific ideas and theories are developing and advancing to meet a new range of phenomena, inventions and discovery are penetrating hitherto unknown fields revealing new wonders and hidden secrets of the material universe; industries have vastly wider scope and production; everywhere the world of mankind is in the throes of evolutionary activity indicating the passing of the old conditions and the advent of the new age of re-formation."*

What greater illustration of a part of these words could there be than this Century of Progress Exposition? Here they are—the inventions and discoveries "revealing new wonders and hidden secrets of the material universe," all gathered together in these vast buildings so that he who runs may read. And then we asked ourselves if there was some meaning to all these wonders that was not so easy to read, an inner significance which those who planned this enterprise and the great masses of observers had not penetrated. We thought too of conditions in European and Asiatic countries, of China, India, Russia, Germany and how truly they bear witness to the words "The laws of former governments and civilizations are in the process of revision." Surely there is a connection between the seeming decay and disintegration of governments, the stagnation of business and industry in our own country as well as countries all over the world and the great progress in science and invention shown here in Chicago's great World Fair. What is the meaning of the words "everywhere the world of mankind is in the throes of evolutionary activity indicating the passing of the old conditions and the advent of the new age of re-formation?"

FARTHER ON in this talk already referred to, 'Abdu'l-Bahá says, "This is the cycle of maturity and reformation in religion as well."

*Promulgation of Universal Peace, p. 434.

Perhaps if we understood better the true significance of religion we would understand better the seeming contradiction between great scientific advancement and the chaos and confusion in the world, perhaps we would better understand the "advent of the new age of re-formation." We recall the words of Bahá'u'lláh, "Religion is the greatest instrument for the order of the world and the tranquility of all existent beings."* Can it be the fading of religion that is the cause of so much disorganization and at the same time a re-formation and renewing of religion that is giving birth to new scientific discoveries and inventions? This is the explanation that the Bahá'í teachings give and the only one that adequately explains such seeming contradictions in scientific advance and governmental, industrial, and economic retrogradation. The old age is dying at the same time that a new one is being born. We find evidences of both. And the Bahá'í teachings assure us that the basis of the new age is religion, a powerful influx of new spiritual life.

WHAT DO we find in the Hall of Religion suggesting re-formation in religion? What that we would not have found in such an exhibit a century ago? Adorning the walls of the octagonal rotunda are murals representing some of the great religions of the world. These lead us to reflect upon the universality of religious desire and aspiration and suggest that God has sent many Holy Messengers to the world. The exhibits of the many sects and denominations seem to emphasize the divisive elements in Christianity, but here is a large exhibit made by the cooperation of some six or eight Christian denominations who have forgotten their differences in creed in working for a common end. Religious welfare organizations both Jewish and Gentile tell "the services which religion has recorded in the past century, and the continuing service which the next century may be expected to open to religious bodies." Exhibits of hospital and mission work in various fields show the great growth in the socialized efforts to obey Christ's injunction, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye have done it unto me." An exhibit showing the development of church architecture attracts and interests us. This is international and in spirit seems to reach out in an aspiration for unity. A "Chapel of Meditation" invites people of all and every faith to take time for quiet communion or meditation. Yet what thrilling and overwhelming events have taken place in the world of religion in the past century of which this exposition takes little account.

What could be added to these interesting exhibits in the Hall of Religion to give people an opportunity to get a glimpse of and grasp this great Truth, that the dying of an old religious era explains the chaos and degeneration, and the coming of a new Messenger of God, giving birth to a new or renewed religion explains the awakening in science, art, inventions and other fruits of the human mind. Institutions, creeds, forms of government die slowly. Individual minds react more quickly to spiritual forces, often unaware though they be of the Source. When enough souls are awakened to cooperate, new governments and new social orders are formed.

So THESE two Bahá'ís, after meditating in the chapel of the Hall of Religion, planned together several exhibits which they would like to add to those already in place. By pageant or picture would be represented the life and teachings of the radiant youth, the Messenger of God, the Báb, Who declared His mission in 1844, a little less than a century ago; Who stated that that mission was to usher in a new age and to prepare the way for One greater than He. Could justice be done to that brief, eventful life, so full of dramatic as well as spiritual interest, in a series of pictures? No, but the facts must be made known to the world. Already a powerful drama¹ has been written setting out this brief life, tragic yet victorious.

Similarly would be depicted the life and teachings of Bahá'u'lláh Who came as foretold by the Báb, Who radiated the spirit of life, Who changed men's lives so that they were filled with spiritual life; Whose life, like that of the Báb, followed the path of sacrifice, and Who taught people by His precepts and His life how to bring in the new age, the age of peace and justice. Even the outward events of the long life of this Messenger of God, the exiles, the imprisonments, the years of privation, the endurance, the boundless love and signs of infinite power cause men to give heed.

His claims were stupendous. He claimed that the words which He uttered were the words of God, powerful, creative. By His life and teachings He has shown us how to use all these material bounties, these marvelous inventions so as to bring necessities and comforts to all. "Bahá'u'lláh has announced that no matter how far the world of humanity may advance in material civilization, it is nevertheless in need of spiritual virtues and the bounties of God. The spirit of man is not illumined and quickened through material sources. It is not resuscitated by investigating phenomena of the world of matter. The spirit of man is in need of the protection of the Holy Spirit. Just as he advances by progressive stages from the mere physical world of being into the intellectual realm, so must he develop upward in moral attributes and spiritual graces. In the process of this attainment he is ever in need of the bestowals of the Holy Spirit. Material development may be likened to the glass whereas divine virtues and spiritual susceptibilities are the light within the glass."²

THAT MEN may understand the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh and so learn how rightly to use God's bounteous material bestowals, the basic principles which He taught must be visualized. The as yet little understood principles of the Oneness of Mankind and the Oneness of all Religions must be pictured and the principles which grow out of these and are the crying needs of the world today: Universal peace; the establishment of a Universal League of Nations, of international arbitration and an International Parliament; the adoption of an international auxiliary language taught in all the schools of the world; compulsory education all over the world—especially for girls who will be the mothers and first educators of the next generation; equal opportunities of development and equal rights and privileges for both sexes; work for all, no idle rich and no idle poor; work in the spirit of service is worship; abolition of the extremes of wealth and poverty; care of the needy. All these should be depicted with such skill and art as to bring home to each thoughtful observer that they are the outgrowth of an awakened consciousness of the oneness of mankind and the oneness of religion, and that they form the firm foundation on which the new age must be built.

Then let a great chart show a shining Sun of Truth sending forth rays of truth and power which flood the earth with light and knowledge and are received in the mirrors of men's hearts and minds and are reflected to others of mankind. Some minds catch the rays which are reflected as scientific discoveries, others those which produce art, and many others those which produce all forms of learning, knowledge, wisdom, justice and divine virtues. On this chart would be printed these words of Bahá'u'lláh:

“Its light (i. e. the light of the Sun of Truth) when cast on the mirrors of the wise gives expression of wisdom, when reflected from the minds of artists, produces manifestations of new and beautiful arts; when it shines through the minds of students, it reveals and unfolds mysteries.”

WOULD SUCH a series of exhibits help people to unify this Century of Progress Exposition, help people to understand that all truth comes from the great Sun of Truth and is at source one; that there is a great unity and not a conflict between true science and true religion since all is truth and truth is one; that the world needs a divine inspiration in order rightly to use the bounteous gifts of material progress developed in the last century and so marvelously set out in this Exposition; that “no matter how far the world of humanity may advance in material civilization, it is nevertheless in need of spiritual virtues and the bounties of God.”

We look around again. These dreamed-of exhibits are not here. But is not mankind nearly ready to measure up to the standards Bahá'u'lláh has established? Surely at the end of the next century those principles will be accepted, the “new age of re-formation” will be well established, and this Century of Progress Exposition will be looked back upon as just a beginning of progress.

“To accomplish this great and needful unity in the reality, His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared in the Orient and renewed the foundations of the divine teachings. His Revelation of the Word embodies completely the teachings of all the prophets expressed in principles and precepts applicable to the needs and conditions of the modern world; amplified and adapted to present day questions and critical human problems.”—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

A WORLD AT PEACE

Bahá'í Administration as Presented to a Group of Free-Thinkers

Part 2.—*Election of Administrative Bodies

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

"In the election of the members of the Spiritual Assembly no political tactics shall enter. They [the Bahá'ís] must be free from self, nor anxious to further their own personal ambitions. . . . As soon as political plans are introduced in the Cause, the spirit is killed. . . . This Cause is pure spirituality."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

EVERY Bahá'í of the age of twenty-one and over has the voting privilege, men and women alike: they vote for those who are to administer the affairs of the Cause locally and they vote for delegates who elect their national administrative body.

The manner of voting is unique. There are no parties, no candidates, no nominations. Canvassing and electioneering are strictly forbidden. On the first day of the Festival of Ridván each year the Bahá'ís gather for their elections. Presumably in towns where there are large numbers there will be several polling places.

To be eligible for the administrative body, called in Bahá'í terminology an "Assembly", the first requirement is honesty of purpose; this is a matter of character—integrity, frankness, truthfulness, reliability. Then, in whatever order, comes loyalty to Bahá'u'lláh, His provisions and teachings; this means faith, spirituality, humility, self-effacement. Equally indispensable are knowledge and enlightenment, while experience in affairs completes the first essentials.

At a designated hour the groups gather. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the oldest son of Bahá'u'lláh, appointed by Him to interpret His Words and administer His Cause, promises that when the Bahá'ís so gather, united in heart and purpose, and turn in prayer toward the glorious Kingdom of God, the Holy Spirit will guide and direct them in their choice of an Assembly.

Those who do not believe that there is such a thing as a Holy Spirit or a Kingdom of God must clearly recognize, from historical and sociological evidence, the astonishing influence which these ideas have always exerted over those who do accept them. It is not my purpose here to discuss metaphysical questions, but to exhibit a scheme wherein men may administer without conflict, strife or alienation.

At present the Assembly consists of nine members but as the Cause grows its numbers must necessarily increase for it conducts local legislation—(the National Assembly, national; and the International House of Justice, international law-making, except as provided in the teaching of Bahá'u'lláh)—as well as exercising the executive and judicial functions. It will probably require in future very large numbers to carry through all of these requirements in the great centers of population.

The elections have now been accomplished without contest, majorities or minorities. The nine names with the largest number of votes are declared elected—a plurality process. For if the Holy Spirit be governing and directing the elections, as every Bahá'í heartily believes, to ballot several times for a majority of votes would clearly disturb the first guidance; not that the Holy Spirit could not continue to guide through any number of ballots, but it would entail unnecessary delay and complication, and would lose the spontaneity of the first choice.

*Part of this article, published in the August number stressed the importance of religion as the foundation of civilization. Bahá'í Administration, p. 10.

In advance of the election not only have no names been mentioned, no preferences asserted, for this would not represent the spiritual guidance promised at a definite moment under definite circumstances; but since no one is nominated previously there can be no platform, no campaign promises, no control by this or that interest.

Delegates meeting in an annual convention elect in a similar manner the nine members of the national administrative body, while the members of these secondary groups elect in turn the International House of Justice.

IN SCIENCE and in philosophy we have “emergents,” elements which suddenly appearing change the whole trend of past conditions. Man, homo sapiens, is an example on the one hand; inductive reasoning, on the other. Bahá'u'lláh has released an emergent comparable to these in His government by consultation. For the first time in human history man is equipped with a method whereby he can rise above the strife and antagonism of party conflicts. According to the requirements of consultation no personal prestige is sought, there can be no effort to uphold this opinion at the expense of that, no desire to suppress that man or measure, because these Assemblies are seeking neither individual aggrandizement nor the approval of constituencies but—odd, simple and startling as it may sound—are disinterestedly seeking to find the Truth.

‘Abdu'l-Bahá outlines the mechanism of Bahá'í Administration, through these consultative bodies, in the following words:

“In this day, assemblies of consultation are of the greatest importance and a vital necessity. Obedience unto them is essential and obligatory. The members thereof must take counsel together in such wise that no occasion for ill-feeling or discord may arise. This can be attained when every member expresseth with absolute freedom his own opinion and setteth forth his argument. Should any one oppose, he must on no account feel hurt for not until matters are fully discussed can the right way be revealed. The shining spark of truth cometh forth only after the clash of differing opinions. If after discussion, a decision be carried unanimately, well and good; but if, the Lord forbid, differences of opinion should arise, a majority of voices must prevail.”

“The first condition is absolute love and harmony amongst the members of the assembly. They must be wholly free from estrangement and must manifest in themselves the Unity of God, for they are the waves of one sea, the drops of one river, the stars of one heaven, the rays of one sun, the trees of one orchard, the flowers of one garden. Should harmony of thought and absolute unity be non-existent, that gathering shall be dispersed and that assembly be brought to naught.

“The second condition:—They must when coming together turn their faces to the Kingdom on High and ask aid from the Realm of Glory. They must then proceed with the utmost devotion, courtesy, dignity, care and moderation to express their views. They must in every matter search out the truth and not insist upon their own opinion, for stubbornness and persistence in one's views will lead ultimately to discord and wrangling and the truth will remain hidden.

“The honored members must with all freedom express their own thoughts, and it is in no wise permissible for one to belittle the thought of another, nay, he must with moderation set forth the truth, and should differences of opinion arise a majority of voices must prevail, and all must obey and submit to the majority. It is again not permitted that any one of the honored members object to or censure, whether in or out of the meeting, any decision arrived at previously, though that decision be not right, for such criticism would prevent any decision from being enforced. In short, whatsoever thing is arranged in harmony and with love and purity of motive, its result is light, and should the least trace of estrangement prevail the result shall be darkness upon darkness. . . . If this be so regarded, that assembly shall be of God, but otherwise it shall lead to coolness and alienation that proceed from the Evil One. Discussions must all be confined to spiritual matters that pertain to the training of souls, the instruction of children, the relief of the poor, the help of the feeble throughout all classes in the world, kindness to all peoples, the diffusion of the fragrances of God and the exaltation of His Holy Word. Should they endeavor to fulfill these conditions the Grace of the Holy Spirit shall be vouchsafed unto them, and that assembly shall become the center of the Divine blessings, the hosts of Divine confirmation shall come to their aid, and they shall day by day receive a new effusion of Spirit.”

Thus we see why there can be no platform, no prearranged program, no pledges, no campaigns, no nominations, no constituencies. Any or all of these imply the curtailing of absolute freedom in the expression of opinion, and the guidance, not of God, but of human whims, desires and passions.

BUT THE PRACTICAL man at once inquires, “Where are these beings to be found, who have freed themselves from opinionation, bias and a desire for domination? We read ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s requirements but is it possible that one such person can be found in the Bahá’i or any other community at the present time, far less nine?”

Of course there is not a superabundance of such people in the world. If there were we would have no need for Bahá’u’lláh and His Message. But ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says that the nucleus of a new humanity is forming (which is evident in innumerable social attitudes) wherein are these two elements: the fundamental verity of cooperation, unity, harmony and accord seeking, as it has sought from the beginning of the human experiment, to assert itself; and the earnest desire of men to extend to these attributes asylum and hospitality. These conditions can create an untried and unknown synthesis of progress, assurance and protection in the world.

SIGHT and light have climbed the ladder of biological and physical experience side by side. That first tiny faintly sensitive pigment spot upon which the hosts of radiance were beating for ages in their search for reception and recognition, finally became the exquisitely developed function of sight in the human eye. So at last Bahá'u'lláh has presented to Unity and Truth, the twin builders of whatever success or security has been attained historically, that minute organ whereby, through the development of Bahá'i consultation, they may pervade and quicken our consciousness as through the eye light pervades the whole personality.

By truth I mean the pragmatic function of achieving the greatest good for the greatest number in the full significance of the word "great;" by unity, the harmonious action of innumerable different groups, classes, nations, individuals in voluntary allegiance to a common method of seeking an exalted goal. It is now a mere platitude to say that unity does not involve uniformity and that Truth is not a rigid, static datum, but a process whose rich content yields more abundantly to those who serve its exacting requirements.

Even admitting that Truth is a Platonic Idea; that it has an aloof and independent existence; so far as we human beings are concerned Truth is only so much of a new conception or ideal as may be incorporated into the bulk of existing experience or annexed to the criteria of judgment or offered as a practical test and standard of action. The growth of science has been solely commensurate with the growth of Inductive Reasoning, for example. The degree to which science has brought release and enlightenment to mankind is the degree by which we test the truth of inductive reasoning.

“Not until we live ourselves the life of a true Bahá'i can we hope to demonstrate the creative and transforming potency of the Faith we profess. Nothing but the abundance of our actions, nothing but the purity of our lives and the integrity of our characters, can in the last resort establish our claim that the Bahá'i spirit is in this day the sole agency that can translate a long-cherished ideal into an enduring achievement.”

—Shoghi Effendi.

The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár

HOWEVER inspiring the conception of Bahá'í worship, as witnessed in the central Edifice of this exalted Temple, it cannot be regarded as the sole, nor even the essential, factor in the part which the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, as designed by Bahá'u'lláh, is destined to play in the organic life of the Bahá'í community. Divorced from the social, humanitarian, educational and scientific pursuits centering around the Dependencies of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, Bahá'í worship, however exalted in its conception, however passionate in fervor, can never hope to achieve beyond the meagre and often transitory results produced by the contemplations of the ascetic or the communion of the passive worshipper. It cannot afford lasting satisfaction and benefit to the worshipper himself, much less to humanity in general, unless and until translated and transfused into that dynamic and disinterested service to the cause of humanity which it is the supreme privilege of the Dependencies of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár to facilitate and promote. Nor will the exertions, no matter how disinterested and strenuous, of those who within the precincts of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár will be engaged in administering the affairs of the future Bahá'í Commonwealth, fructify and prosper unless they are brought into close and daily communion with those spiritual agencies centering in and radiating from the central Shrine of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár.

Nothing short of direct and constant interaction between the spiritual forces emanating from this House of Worship centering in the heart of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, and the energies consciously displayed by those who administer its affairs in their service to humanity can possibly provide the necessary agency capable of removing the ills that have so long and so grievously afflicted humanity. For it is assuredly upon the consciousness of the efficacy of the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, reinforced on one hand by spiritual communion with His Spirit, and on the other by the intelligent application and the faithful execution of the principles and laws He revealed, that the salvation of a world in travail must ultimately depend. And of all the institutions that stand associated with His Holy Name, surely none save the institution of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár can most adequately provide the essentials of Bahá'í worship and service, both so vital to the regeneration of the world. Therein lies the secret of the loftiness, of the potency, of the unique position of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár as one of the outstanding institutions conceived by Bahá'u'lláh.

THE SPELL OF THE TEMPLE

ALLEN B. McDANIEL

"And finally who can be so bold as to deny that the completion of the superstructure of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár—the crowning glory of America's past and present achievements—has forged that mystic chain which is to link, more firmly than ever, the hearts of its champion-builders with Him Who is the Source and Center of their Faith and the Object of their truest adoration?"—Shoghi Effendi.*

 NE hot afternoon in August, 1921, two men entered the office of the Earley Studio in Washington. They arrived unannounced and presented to John J. Earley, the head of the studio, the photograph of a model of a beautiful building. One of these gentlemen, a man of rather distinguished appearance, introduced himself as Louis Bourgeois, the architect of the building shown in the photograph. He stated that he had been sent to the studio by an engineer, a mutual friend.

Mr. Bourgeois explained that the model was the accepted design for a universal Temple, which the followers of Bahá'u'lláh all over the world were going to erect on a slightly location on the shore of Lake Michigan about fifteen miles north of Chicago. Soon it became evident that the design was the dream of this architect's life, a vision that had come to him. At that moment he was seeking a material with which to build this unique and beautiful structure and someone with the sympathetic understanding, ability and experience to put this design into material form. The architect left the photograph of the Temple with the studio and thus began an eleven-year study by Mr. Earley and his assistants of one of the most remarkable building projects in all history.

Meanwhile, the Temple Trustees, the national organization in charge of the building of the Temple, started construction work with the sinking of nine great concrete caissons to a depth of 136 feet to bed rock, and the erection of a circular foundation containing a domed hall which has been used for meetings since its completion.

Nine years passed and funds became available for the building of the superstructure of the Temple. During this period an almost continuous investigation was carried on to solve the problem of what materials to use in building a structure, the design of which seemed to be a "lacey envelope enshrining an idea, the idea of light, a shelter of cobweb interposed between earth and sky, struck through and through with Light—light which shall partly consume the forms and make of it a thing faery."

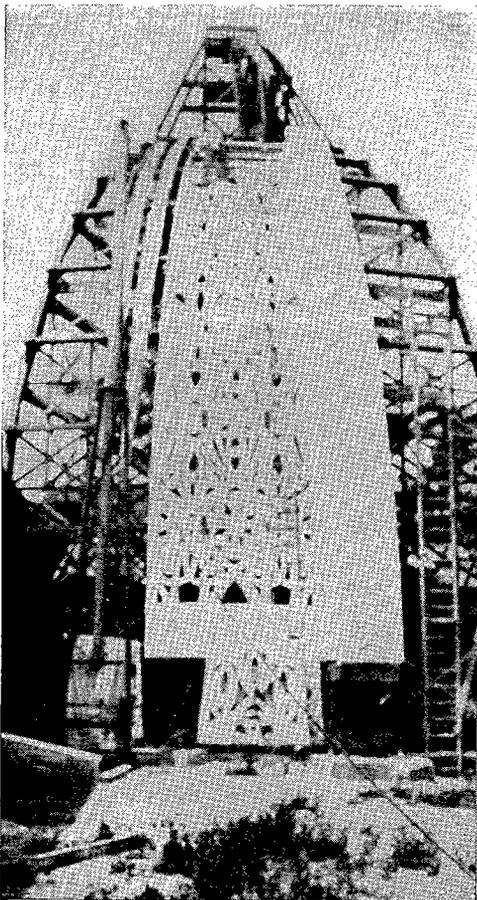

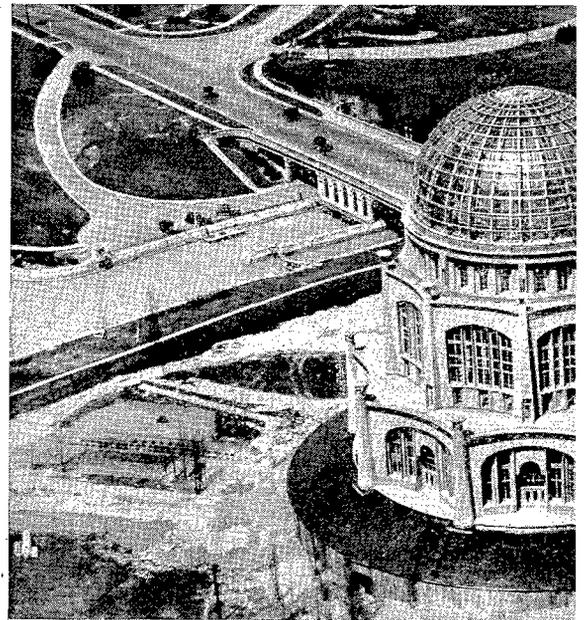

MR. BOURGEOIS and the Temple Trustees had originally planned on erecting the Temple in sections, story by story, as funds became available. And so in 1930, when $400,000 was on hand for the resumption of the building work, it was decided to build the first story complete and cover it with a temporary roof, until further funds made it possible to build the first gallery story, and so on until the dome was finished. But a careful analysis indicated the desirability of constructing the entire superstructure framework for an amount well within the available resources. This plan was adopted and carried out within a year's time. So efficiently and economically was this done that it was possible to install the entire plumbing system and part of the heating and lighting systems thus affording a completely enclosed and usable building.

Just before the building of the superstructure of the Temple began in September, 1930, the architect, Mr. Bourgeois, died in his studio home on the Temple property. But he had completed his design including full sized drawings of all of the exterior ornamentation, great drawings of remarkable beauty and accuracy, and details for the dome reaching a length of 109 feet. With these detailed data and with the results of years of consultation with the architect, we believe that we know the problem and have a clear conception of his vision,—a Temple of Light with a great pierced dome having ribs extending toward the heavens like great arms lifted in supplication,—a gleaming white building through which the sunlight would stream to illumine all within, and through which by night the temple light would shine out to enlighten a darkened world. The vision of the architect penetrated the sky, where he saw not only the stars and constellations, but their orbits, circles, ovals and vesicas of endless variety weaving in and out like a great celestial fabric. This is the theme of the dome ornamentation, the courses of the firmament. But to give life to this fabric, tendrils, leaves and flower forms were added. Interwoven in this fabric are the symbols of the great religious movements of the past and present, the swastika used in many ancient faiths, the six-pointed star of Moses, the cross of Christianity, the star and crescent of Muhammadanism, and the nine-pointed star of the universal religious faith of the followers of Bahá'ulláh (Glory of God).

WITH THE architect gone, and with the fruits of his years of devoted service in hand, the Temple Trustees turned to The Research Service of Washington, D. C., an organization of specialists in the fields of engineering and construction, men who had been associated with some of the great works in America and abroad, and requested this concern to determine on the material or materials and the methods to be used in clothing the Temple superstructure with "the lacey envelope" that would complete the building and materialize the dream of Bourgeois.

And so nearly eleven years after the Earley Studio received its first call from the architect, two engineers called on Mr. John J. Earley and informed him that his studio had been selected, after two years of intensive investigation, to prepare the exterior ornamentation of the dome of the Temple of Light.

Fortunately the Earley Studio had available a plant at Rosslyn, Va., that was especially adapted to the construction of the dome ornamentation. This plant was assigned to the project and early in July, 1932, the preliminary work was started. This involved the layout and construction of a full-sized wooden model of one panel of the structural outer framework of the existing dome structure that would finally support the concrete ornamentation. An analysis quickly indicated that it would be more efficient and economical in the end to make the dome ornamentation at this plant rather than on the Temple property, as originally contemplated by the architect.

The principal purpose of this model of the dome panel was to serve as a standard of measurement from which the dimensions of the various sections of the field and the ribs of the dome could be taken off later and used. Also this model was used for the purpose of studying the plaster of Paris casts of the dome ornamentation.

It was necessary to study the dome ornamentation, which is unique in having about one-third of its area perforated. If these perforations were too large they would destroy the architectural continuity. Were they too small they would not be apparent. All of the exterior surfaces of the ornamentation were carefully modelled and this modelling studied so as to secure the proper lights and shades and thus give character to the surface, especially when seen from a distance. It was necessary to study every ornamentation detail over a period of several months, so that it would fit into the design, as the brush strokes of the painter fit into and form a part of his masterpiece.

THE FIRST step in the preparation of the ornamentation was the modelling and carving of the original clay model for each and every section. The sculptor made a tracing of the architect's original full-sized drawing for each surface and then transferred this design on to the clay surface. From this outline he modelled and carved out the full-sized clay model. Plaster of Paris impressions were taken of the clay surfaces and from these the plaster of Paris model was prepared. These models were well reinforced with hemp and jute and rods. The rough plaster of Paris model was carefully carved to give the final surface texture and modelling. From each plaster cast or model a plaster of Paris mould was made and this represented the negative of the final cast section.

The unique feature in the casting of the concrete sections is the use of a mat or framework of high carbon steel rods which forms the reinforcement, serves to give high early strength to the casting for handling and subsequently makes of each section a structure which is designed to resist the highest possible pressures produced from wind, snow, ice, etc.

After the concrete casts are taken out of the moulds a group of skilled laborers scrape the mortar from the outer surfaces and thoroughly clean these surfaces down to the exposed aggregate. This leaves the entire outer surface of a white radiant quality. The vision of the architect involved a structure that would be indeed a Temple of Light. His design called for an outer surface that was radiantly white at the dome and graded to a light buff tone at the base of the building. The contractor and the engineer spent several months in a search through the eastern section of the United States to find just the right material for the aggregate of the concrete. After visiting many outcroppings of native stone and quarries it was decided to use two qualities of quartz—a pure white opaque quartz from Kings Creek, S. C., and a crystalline quartz from Moneta, Va. This material is quarried and shipped in large pieces to the plant where it is passed through a jaw crusher and a series of rolls until it is of the required size for the coarser aggregate. The waste is then taken and again passed through the rolls and crushed finer for the sand. These aggregates are mixed with white cement and water to form the plastic concrete which is carefully poured and tamped in the moulds. The casting is allowed to set for from eighteen to twenty hours depending upon temperature and moisture conditions before it is removed from the mould.

The scraping and finishing of the outer surfaces of each cast requires a little less time than an average working day. After the cast has been scraped and cleaned, it is then removed to a large room where the air is kept moist. The concrete casts are allowed to remain in this moist chamber for a period of at least two weeks. They are then removed to the storage yard and subsequently loaded in freight cars and shipped to the Temple for erection on the dome.

Inserts are imbedded in the four corners of each concrete casting. These provide a means of bolting the ornamentation to the structural steel skeleton of the dome.

An interesting feature of the ornamentation is its division into the two hundred and seventy sections of the field of the dome and the one hundred and seventeen sections of the great ribs. These sections are separated by a space of a half inch to allow for deflection and temperature changes in both the steel structure and concrete material of the ornamentation.

THIS ENTIRE project is unique in the history of building construction. It does not mean simply the building of another church or temple. Continuous study and investigation extending over the past decade has evolved the new idea of constructing a framework and then building and placing on this framework the design which in itself is a superimposed structure. Even to the layman it is apparent that this method of construction is simple, direct and economical. It is believed that it is the only practicable method for a building of this unique and ornamental nature. The estimates of the engineers for the construction of this Temple, in accordance with the ordinary methods of stone masonry and with the use of white marble, would have involved an expenditure of about ten times what this building will cost. Even a building laboriously carved out of white marble and requiring a long period of years for execution would not have met the architect's requirements of a radiantly white building of a permanent and enduring material.

The development of the work of the ornamentation has developed a spirit among the workers which is known as "The Spell of the Temple." Many delightful little stories of personal interest could be told of the workers who are largely craftsmen of long experience. The man who had the final carving of the plaster of Paris casts insisted on doing all of this work. Several of the workers, when learning that the Temple was being built by voluntary contributions made largely by poor people all over the world and on the basis of sacrifice, voluntarily suggested a reduction in their pay. Mr. Taylor, Mr. Earley's associate, personally laid out and superintended every part of the work involved in the construction of the wooden model of the dome panel, the casting shed and other parts of the job. The design and supervision of this work involved an endless amount of time and effort.

And thus the work goes on and on. The spirit of the project seems to involve devotion and selfless service. The "Spell of the Temple" has inspired everyone connected with the work to heights of craftsmanship, to degrees of ingenuity and a sustained enthusiasm that recall the days of the cathedral builders of the Middle Ages.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS OF SCIENTIFIC THINKING

GLENN A. SHOOK

Professor of Physics, Wheaton College

"God has conferred upon and added to man a distinctive power, the faculty of intellectual investigation into the secrets of creation, the acquisition of higher knowledge, the greatest virtue of which is scientific enlightenment." 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

ALTHOUGH we are too close to fully comprehend it, the last hundred years has wrought greater change in scientific thought than any thousand years in history. Contrary to popular opinion, this movement has not been confined to the West, the birthplace of modern science, but has touched every race, every nation, of the world. In the world of science "no man liveth unto himself"—his findings are the property of mankind. The academies of science of any one country gladly welcome the researches or the research workers, of any other country. Despite the drastic changes in man's mode of living, due largely to the rapid advance of the sciences, we are told that this is only the beginning. Let us pass over the more obvious contributions such as the radio, the automobile, etc., that have expanded our material culture, and see what has actually taken place in the realm of scientific thought.

We have witnessed an unparalleled activity in applied science, a correlation of irrelevant phenomena within the various sciences and a correlation of the sciences themselves, the rise and fall of a perfect system (in the physical sciences) upon which all future work was to have rested, and finally an heroic struggle of scientific men, to arrive at the truth—not to reconcile the old system to new facts.

This period, which includes the theory of evolution, the theory of relativity and the mechanistic theory of behavior, to mention only a few of the outstanding contributions, has produced a profound effect upon philosophy and religion. No scientific discovery ever affected the fundamental concepts of life like the evolution theory. To be sure, Galileo shook the foundations of the universe but he left Man, the highest form of creation, intact. No theory was ever more disturbing or disconcerting to science itself than the theory of relativity. No result of scientific investigation ever robbed man of hope and aspiration, simultaneously driving him to an investigation of his own reality like the mechanistic theory of behavior. Unlike a political or religious upheaval here was a bloodless revolution—a revolution without hate. It is natural therefore that the Century of Progress should stress the results of physical science for it is the physical sciences that have done the most to unite the world.

A HUNDRED years ago the atomic theory was generally accepted but the atom of that day was simply an exceedingly small bit of matter having the properties of an aggregation large enough to be studied. As investigations developed it was necessary to attribute electrical properties to the atom and at the end of the period, as the result of the research of Thompson, Rutherford and Bohr, it was discovered that all matter could be reduced to electric charges. The only difference between iron and hydrogen is the number and arrangement of the, so-called, electrons and protons. Not only is all matter thus simplified but no distinction need be drawn between electricity and matter.

Prior to this period electricity and magnetism were considered separate and distinct and then it was shown that a charge in motion, i. e., an electric current, always produced a magnetic field and finally it was discovered that a moving magnetic field would produce a current. Magnetism and electricity were thus correlated, and this correlation is responsible for most of the principles utilized in our great electrical industries today.

During the middle of the Nineteenth Century Maxwell demonstrated that light was an electromagnetic phenomenon and therefore it ceased to exist as an independent entity.

Rumford and Joule proved that heat was a form of energy and another scientific merger was completed, incidentally putting the old caloric theory out of business. As a result of this correlation the most important generalization of physics, namely the law of conservation of energy (which states that energy can neither be created nor destroyed) was firmly established. Some time earlier the law of conservation of mass had been "proven" experimentally so that up to the present century no one doubted the validity of these two important laws. Near the end of this period, however, theoretical investigations seemed to indicate that when the sun radiates energy, i. e., heat, into space it loses mass and within the last few years a few scientists have been seriously considering the reverse process, namely—the change of radiation back into mass. Taken together these two laws will probably stand, but separately they may fall. And here we have the most remarkable of all correlations; ponderable matter the essence of all material things becomes energy the physical quantity of which has no material attributes.

THE RADICAL change that has taken place in scientific thinking during the last one hundred years may be made clear by considering a few theories in detail.

At the beginning of the last century, Young proved beyond doubt (i. e. in view of the experimental facts then at hand) that light was a wave motion. But if light is a wave phenomenon and not a stream of material particles, as Newton supposed, there must be some kind of medium in which the waves travel. This seems reasonable and for nearly a century no one could escape the logic of a medium. The first medium that was created, ether, was an elastic solid but it turned out to be more of a liability than an asset for it constantly raised more questions than it solved. It had to be more elastic than steel in order to transmit the short waves of light and at the same time objects were known to move through it without being retarded. When Maxwell proposed his famous electromagnetic theory of light it was adopted at once as all these difficulties were eliminated. Indeed the theory was so complete and flawless that Hertz declared, near the end of the century, that it would hold for all time and then he proceeded to make a discovery that threw doubt upon the wave idea in any form. Planck and Einstein made similar observations and ever since physicists have been laboring to develop a satisfactory wave theory, that would include all the facts. This does not mean that Maxwell's theory is obsolete but rather that it is inadequate. But to return to the ether—probably fifty per cent of the physicists today believe in an ether and fifty per cent do not and yet they both mean the same thing. As far as we know to date, light exhibits both the wave aspect and the particle aspect. We may imagine some kind of an ether for the waves but we are not much concerned about the reality of its existence.

A British physicist recently remarked—"We are getting quite used to theories which are 'right' in the sense that they predict all sorts of unexpected things correctly, but which remain themselves unintelligible, or even self-contradictory, when one tries to 'understand' them". People who have difficulty in accepting some of the tenets of religion because they seem unscientific might do well to get the modern view which takes into account our limitations.

The evolution theory furnishes another illustration of the fact that while a materialistic viewpoint seemed necessary and sufficient in the Nineteenth Century it is inadequate today. The theory was developed by Darwin at a time when the scientific world was materialistic, when explanations were reduced, as far as possible, to mechanical models. A thing was 'explained' when a model could be imagined that would duplicate the phenomenon. The pressure of a gas can be explained by assuming that a gas is composed of elastic spheres in rapid motion, for if a gas were an assemblage of rapidly moving elastic spheres, it would exert a pressure. This kind of explanation was so real to the scientists of the last century that they did not find it necessary to penetrate beyond the models. Of course the theory does not claim to explain the origin of life. At most it merely attempts to picture the successive changes in life from a simple to a complex organism. Its weakness lies in the assumption that Natural Selection is a kind of mechanism that works automatically. The paradox, as we now realize, is staggering. Life evolves unconsciously without a guiding intelligence, like a machine in operation. But where will we find a machine that will operate by itself, producing other machines like itself, with variations in order that the new machine can function with the result that the final product will be more highly organized than the original machine? This must be true if the evolution theory is followed to its logical conclusion.

To the mass of people, even educated people, the theory explains life, it is an entity, a first cause. If society has evolved, evolution is a sufficient explanation. On the other hand evolution is one of the greatest aids to the understanding of life that science has discovered. If man did not evolve he must have been created spontaneously and all the evidence we have points to evolution. It is not necessary to leave out the guiding intelligence—on the contrary it is far more scientific to include it. The nature of this guiding principle we may leave to prophetic religions but it would be unscientific to exclude it.

MANY ILLUSTRATIONS of this nature indicate that the scientific mind has undergone a radical change; perhaps it is developing like science. The great triumphs of science in the last century led many to believe that its position was invulnerable. Provision was made for additions, to be sure, but the system, the way of thinking and even the fundamental concepts of force, energy, mass, time, space, etc., were supposed to be fixed, once and for all. Its first great blunder and we hope the last, was the dogmatization of the Newtonian physics. Fortunately the way of thinking has changed, and while we have more confusion about fundamental concepts we have no less real progress. Perhaps the child has come of age and is regarding the physical world with less assurance and more penetration. Today we realize that a thing can be real without being concrete, that sometimes we must have faith in things scientific that cannot be explained by mechanical models nor even by logic, and that science is as prone to anthropomorphism as religion when it defines force as something that pushes or pulls. We are concerned here primarily with scientific development during the last one hundred years, but the real significance of this sudden outburst of creative energy must lie beyond its intrinsic value.

After Newton explained the laws of the solar system men realized that the God of prophetic religion, the active living God of history could function in a universe controlled by dynamical laws. When evolution was established we had to admit that the same God could develop an organic world through natural laws. Finally when psychology threw some light on the operation of the mind it became evident, after some struggle, that God could manifest Himself to us through psychological laws. In each instance however no attempt is made to describe the nature of God—that is left to revealed religion.

The cause of this unparalleled activity in science, like the reality behind the physical laws, eludes scientific search but we cannot overlook the historical fact that this same period has also witnessed a universal spiritual awakening.*

A CENTURY of PROGRESS in EDUCATION

GENEVIEVE L. COY, Ph.D.

"Education holds an important place in the new order of things. . . . Baha'u'llah has announced that inasmuch as ignorance and lack of education are barriers of separation among mankind, all must receive training and instruction. Through this provision the lack of mutual understanding will be remedied and the unity of mankind furthered and advanced. Universal education is a universal law."—'Abdul-Bahá.

EDUCATION in America in the early 19th Century was based, to a large extent, on the idea that the school was an institution which should supplement the home, the shop, the church. What these institutions could not give the child, the school must provide. The home was expected to supply training in manners and morals, and simple vocational preparation. Work in stores, small factories, on boats, in stables, gave other types of experience in earning a livelihood. The church cared for the spiritual education of children and young people. Education of the body was a by-product of playing ball, climbing trees, and other free play activities in the out of doors. The duty of the school was to fill in certain gaps in the vocational, social and religious training of the child.

To read and write the English language, to solve simple problems with numbers, to know enough geography for purposes of commerce and travel—these were considered necessities which could be best acquired in the school. The more intelligent and well-to-do parents also wished their children to have other subjects of instruction which were felt to have cultural value, and the study of literature, history and foreign languages was included in the curricula of higher schools. As the ideal of educating a child as a future citizen in a democracy was gradually developed, the study of history, especially the history of the United States came to be considered an essential part of each child's education in the elementary school. Later the study of physiology and hygiene was introduced, in order that the country might have citizens of sound body, as well as those who were informed concerning national ideals.

Such a conception of the purpose of formal education resulted, in practice, in the widely accepted conviction that the school should concern itself with the training of the minds of children and young people. "To learn" was to acquire skills and knowledges of the intellect. The child's brain was given into the keeping of the school. His body, his emotions, his soul were sufficiently cared for elsewhere,—and the school was intruding on the sacred rights of home and church if it attempted to do more than educate the mind.

Progress in education in the 19th Century therefore consisted chiefly in more and better development of the mental capacities of pupils and students. More courses in history, literature and languages were added to the curriculum. As modern scientific knowledge developed, more and more sciences were studied in higher schools. Physics, chemistry, botany, zoology came to be considered appropriate subjects for study. Along with the addition of fields of knowledge, emphasis was placed on the development of better and better techniques of teaching. The problem of how the pupil would learn more in a shorter time became the object of careful study. Standardized tests were developed in order to determine just how much each pupil did learn under a given method of teaching. As a result of these emphases in education, the curriculum for the average child has been widened far beyond that of the early 19th Century. Better methods of teaching have helped make it possible for the pupil to assimilate this increased subject matter. The lengthening of the school year and the increase in the number of years of formal education have also assisted the school in its task of giving young people a more complete mental training.

The curriculum of schools in the latter half of the 19th Century was further complicated by certain concepts of the psychology taught in the colleges. "The mind" was considered to possess certain faculties, "the reason", "the memory", "the imagination", etc. Certain subjects "trained the reason", and the student thus acquired an ability to think logically which could be transferred to the problems of everyday vocational and social life. Courses were therefore included in the curriculum which had no apparent value in supplementing the life of home, community or business. Latin, Greek, algebra, geometry were taught primarily because of the belief that they gave mental training which would later be transmuted into the ability to think more clearly about the problems of everyday life.

One of the effects of this conception of training the faculties of the mind was to fix more deeply in public opinion the idea of the school as an institution which concerned itself only with mental training. In the elementary schools and high schools, the text-book was the most important tool in education. The child was in school to learn the contents of the book. Critical comparison of the contents of various texts was not encouraged—in fact, such a procedure simply did not present itself as a possibility to most teachers. The result of this in the minds of children was the development of an attitude of non-critical following of the leadership of any book or teacher speaking with the tone of authority. To be obedient, punctual, industrious, to follow the established authority, was the whole duty of pupils.

THE RESULT of an education such as we have described has, of necessity, forced the attitudes of our adult citizenry into certain clear-cut channels. Two of these are of especial importance. (1) The average citizen tends to be non-critical of those in authority, whether in business, politics or religion. He prefers "to leave well enough alone", except in those cases where the status quo deprives him of food, shelter and clothing. Even then he often lacks the initiative to attempt to remedy the causes of the undesirable situation. (2) The idea of the school as a narrowly specialized institution for training the mind has strengthened a tendency found in other aspects of society,—that of conceiving of the home as something separate from the state, of the church as unrelated to business life. This psychology of division and separateness has increased in society until our national life has become so chaotic that almost the only level on which we can achieve unified action is that of providing for the need of food. Within the individual this division of outlook tends either toward a disintegration of personality, in which the life is torn to pieces by the conflict of competing loyalties, or toward a completely one-sided existence in which all loyalties but one are suppressed in favor of the strongest urge. It is obvious that both of these tendencies impair the efficiency and happiness of the individual, and thus are a factor in retarding the development of a progressive society.

IN SPIKE of the crystalization of the purpose of the school, as an institution for the training of the mind, other types of learning gradually crept into the curriculum during the later years of the 19th Century. As the population became more concentrated in cities, and children had fewer opportunities for free play in fields and woods, courses in physical training and athletics were provided to take the place of the out-of-door play of rural communities. When the home ceased to manufacture its own cloth, and much of its own food, the school study of the skills of cooking and sewing began to take the place of the domestic training of kitchen, garden and weaving room. Courses in music, drawing and painting, which could not be justified on the grounds of mental training, were introduced for a variety of reasons, and were considered educational luxuries. The fact that courses in home economics, music and art are still described as "fads and frills" in newspaper reports, and that these subjects are among the first to be eliminated in an economy program indicates that they have never really been integrated into the public idea of the purpose of education.

It was not until the beginning of the 20th Century that thinking educators began to express an ideal of education that was in marked contrast to the prevailing practice. This change in outlook has had two sources. On the one hand sociologists and philosophers presented an ideal of a consciously evolving society, in which the varying aspects of human experience might find a unified and integrated expression. On the other hand, students of psychology and psychiatry began to extend their studies beyond the purely mental activities of the individual, and to emphasize the need of studying the physical constitution and emotional patterns and habits. An outgrowth of these studies is the mental hygiene movement, which stresses the fact that only through the balanced and integrated functioning of body, emotions and mind can a normal individual be developed.

THE PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION movement has drawn its ideals and purposes from both of the above sources. The school as an institution for mental training has failed to develop truly happy and effective individuals. It has too often produced a person who is divided against himself. The school must therefore widen its function and do its best to "educate the whole child". No one aspect of a human being can be adequately developed if other aspects are ignored. Thinking parents and educators have therefore banded together in many communities to provide for children an environment in which boys and girls can develop their potentialities of body, heart and spirit, as well as those of the mind. Books are not ignored, but they are not worshipped as the source of all value. In such schools, teachers are more concerned with the quality of the evolving human being than they are with the number of facts the pupil can quote. They desire to help a child to develop better interests and desires, and to guide him in planning and acting so that he can more effectively attain his goals.

From the social standpoint, progressive educators are not content with acceptance of the status quo. They believe that a society can be evolved which will not only give greater physical security but which will also foster emotional stability, higher standards of artistic appreciation, and the spiritual values, such as loving-kindness and true brotherhood. One major purpose of the progressive school thus becomes that of helping the child to become critical of the society in which he lives, and to plan ways of improving the present situation. A second major purpose concerns itself with the development of attitudes which are needed in a progressing society—cooperation, initiative, freedom from prejudice, etc. These attitudes are not thought of as “moral ideas” to be taught through courses in ethics, but as ways of responses which grow thru use in the situations which arise daily in the varied community life of the school.

In the actual carrying out of its ideal, progressive education has found that one of its greatest needs is that of study courses for adults. Many parents regret the limited fields of their own schooling, and wish to supplement their own experience. It is common to hear visitors in a progressive school remark, “How I wish I could have had such and such work when I was in school!” Other adults who are dissatisfied with the present state of society need encouragement and guidance along lines of constructive criticism and planning. It is therefore becoming common for progressive schools to organize courses and round table discussions for parents.

The ideals of progressive education are spreading rapidly in some communities; in other districts they are anathema, especially to those who sincerely believe the “old times were better than the new”, and to those who have something to gain from the continuance of an uncritical, routinized majority. There are therefore groups who are convinced that the last thirty years have shown more real progress in education than the preceding seventy years of the century,—while others are equally certain that the changes introduced since 1900 have been definitely harmful.

The present writer is convinced that progress in education must follow the trail blazed by the progressive educational movement. Society must be reconstructed, and in order to do this children must have an education which will help them develop into well-balanced, effective, unprejudiced and cooperative individuals.

Changes in conditions of living have made a return to the individualistic and laissez faire ideals of the late 19th Century impossible. The home has ceased to be a center of industry and a miniature community. The development of labor-saving machinery has entirely changed the pattern of industry and commerce. The church no longer serves as a dynamic agency for unifying the social and spiritual lives of the majority of our citizens. Nations are so closely linked in economic interdependence that isolated national existence has become impossible. The world must move forward with assurance and faith into a civilization which shall unify into one powerfully moving stream the conflicting tendencies of our present life.

There exists today, fortunately, in the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh a guide to a reconstruction of society which is in full accord with the needs of civilization today. In the Bahá'í Faith are discovered ways of developing characteristics of heart, mind and spirit which produce happy and effective living. Bahá'is conceive of progress in education in terms of the development of individuals who will work together for a new social order which will actually produce on this earth "the oneness of mankind."

AWAKENING TO REALITY

LOUIS G. GREGORY

"In a short time the relationship between the colored and white people will still further improve, and by and by no difference will be felt between them. . . . The most urgent requisite of mankind is the declaration of the oneness of the world of humanity—this is the great principle of Bahá'u'lláh. That which will leaven the human world is a love that will insure the abandonment of pride, oppression and hatred. . . . In the sight of God color makes no difference at all. He looks at the hearts of men."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE measure of progress from the beginning to the end of the century of progress would possibly be the contrast between midnight and sunrise. Those dismayed by the trials of today have but to consider past and present and so by comparison perceive the vast changes that have come.

A century ago, in human minds, a clear division and impassable boundary separated the races of mankind. This border was fixed by inherent, distinct, easily discernible traits, related to each race and absent in the others. Such a belief although but superstition and fancy was the foundation for many prejudices upon which the minds of youth and age were fed. The dominance of one race by another was accepted as the sine qua non of intelligence. The scientist of that day proved it to his own satisfaction. The politician proclaimed it from the stump. The pious believed it as a tenet of faith and salvation. Institutions of culture were founded upon it. It was further buttressed by the organic law of the land, hundreds of state and federal statutes, thousands of social customs and usages and ten thousand times ten thousands of human chattels whom it held in durance vile the world over. Human slavery in some form prevailed among all the nations. Here and there some poet or seer would raise a voice of protest, but this was soon lost in the general clamor prompted by gain. Heretics, if taken seriously, were regarded as the foes of God and man. The creeds of that day were on a par with its social outlook and program. Today sees slavery overthrown, women emancipated, science diffused, quackery exposed, laws humanized, civil liberty advanced, creeds broadened, and a growing number of people turning to religion for the removal of human ills. Assuredly there is some strange power at work!

The dogma of racial inequality is now discredited by scientists east and west. But a short time ago it was regarded as the holy of holies of all racial adjustment. Such sweeping changes have meant discovery and evolution in education, revolution in government and growth and expansion in the more subtle realm of human hearts. A century ago and long afterward people commonly vaunted their prejudices. Today practically all intelligent people are ashamed of their prejudices. Those who would justify aversion to another group or race seek to put it upon other grounds. This fact alone is one of the signs of a mighty transformation in the psychology of the times.

CONDITIONS today are still remote from the ideal. That any considerable number of people should be evaluated socially by color rather than capacity and that such a limitation should extend at times even to civil rights is a grotesque shadow from the old order. Idealists, like the valiant Saint George, combat this dragon today as they did those of former days. The modern and more effective weapon is teaching. It is both stimulating and encouraging to find how many people are now ready for the message of the equality of the races.

The late Theodore Roosevelt who in his high station held with inflexible courage to his way of extending social amenities to all races, was one day entertaining and being entertained by the Fisk University Jubilee singers in his home at Oyster Bay.

"Quite a number of whites", he assured them, "are now ready to receive the colored people socially. But my advice to you is, do not run toward it. Walk!"

So great and good a friend, with his insight into human nature, probably meant by this advice to convey his belief that apparent anxiety on the part of a minority group to claim rights justly theirs, would retard rather than speed the attainment. Perhaps the former president recalled his own futile effort to impress his belief in racial equality upon the people through his dinner with Booker Washington. Yet he did not fail entirely. It cannot be denied that his action influenced some people to greater breadth in social life.

Today the number of those who take a similar stand is greatly increased. Some frankly seek in their association with other races not only service but cultural growth. The mingling of all races upon a social plane is far from complete happiness if dictated on the part of some only by patronage and charity. The true plane of social intercourse is what each can give to the common weal. The talents of a people long arrested by limited opportunity, now gloriously blossoming forth, their literature, art, music, invention, social graces and spirituality, all of which increasingly shine with the new freedom, can enrich with many treasures the combined culture of the human race. Far greater radiance and charm are found in interracial gatherings than in those composed of but one race or class. Does not God smile upon them?

GLORIOUS and effective are those instruments of service known as interracial committees which function north and south. They are like dynamos in the machinery of social progress. No wholesome endeavor is unaffected by the spirit of the New Age which makes all races one.

Although much good has already been done, greater by far is the task ahead. Many are the ills which environ mankind. On one hand is the greatest menace; on the other the greatest blessing. The great upheaval of world war threatens; yet the Heavens are telling us their secrets. The sole relief of a stricken world is the unity of all its peoples. This is the program acceptable to God in whom there abides security and peace. The majestic Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh with its simplicity, wisdom, love, effectiveness and power is the greatest marvel in this day of wonders. It is light to the eye, music to the ear, solace to the heart, life to the spirit of man. Chief amongst the Bahá'í teachings is the oneness of mankind. In this all races merge, assisted by the heavenly power. It is a new spiritual teaching and a new scientific law, ideally adapted to the needs of the hour. Its activities are motivated solely by the spiritual might. This is the crowning wisdom of the century of light, lifting men above the plane of division and strife into the heaven of divine consciousness which alone is real. Men seek peace. Victory rests with God.

THE CENTURY OF PROGRESS EXPOSITION

A FEW IMPRESSIONS

SYLVIA PAINE

The author is a graduate student at the University of Illinois, and a well known member of the Bahá'í Youth Group.

AS the Chicago Fair really succeeding?" is the question most frequently asked of those who have visited Chicago in recent months. For people hardly can believe that any vast new undertaking could succeed in a year which so manifestly spells failure and economic ruin. Yet every visitor agrees, I think, that in attracting an average daily attendance of well over one hundred thousand people the Chicago Exposition is a most noteworthy success. Strange as it may seem, it is true that the Century of Progress Exposition held in a year of unprecedented economic stress has attracted larger crowds and from a far wider area than did the Sesquicentennial Exposition in Philadelphia in the prosperous year of 1926. This success is due partly to the excellent advertising the Chicago Fair has had for several years before 1933 and through extended use of radio during the months of the Fair.

But there is another more fundamental reason for the outstanding success of this Exposition. It is distinctly a product of the Twentieth Century, a Fair which is centered on facts of our life today, and hints of what civilization may bring us in the next fifty years, whereas previous Fairs have centered largely on facts of past centuries. The World's Fair of 1893, the St. Louis Exposition of 1901, and even the Philadelphia Sesquicentennial were distinctly Nineteenth Century products which could not use to so large an extent the features of Twentieth Century civilization which recently have been perfected as a result of the great scientific and intellectual awakening of the past seventy-five years.

THE MUCH criticised Fair architecture is perhaps the best expression of this central note of the whole Exposition. Colorful, yes, to some eyes even garish, these rather pleasingly angular buildings are burdened with no heavy or superfluous ornamentations and give one the impression of size and completeness without the burden of minute details. The size of the Fair is typical of the present day spirit of expansion and of desire to excel all previous records.

A typically Twentieth Century Fair must almost necessarily stress the physical sciences rather than the arts. People are fascinated to learn how a car is assembled; what are the modern factory processes in making a shirt; and just how the organs of the human body function. Moving tableaux and dioramas supplement the diagram and lecturer in making facts and processes more graphic and interesting. There is a building also where the importance of the social sciences today is brought to the visitor's attention. Here with the aid of maps, simple charts and graphic pictures social changes in the past hundred years are recorded and the lines of future progress indicated. The work of the League of Nations and other organizations for furthering international cooperation and world peace is shown. To the thoughtful person this is a hint of the more essential and fundamental aspect of the progress in human civilization during the past century. For instance it is noteworthy that social service has grown during the past centuries from the indiscriminate distribution of alms to the establishment of carefully organized institutions which not only give financial aid to the needy but try to help them to avoid such difficulties in the future.

ALTHOUGH there is a Hall of Religion in which world activities of Protestant organizations and of Judaism are shown, the field of religion is receiving rather less attention than in the Chicago Fair of 1893 when the famous World Parliament of Religions was held. This, too, although a disappointment to the more thoughtful and spiritually inclined visitors is perhaps more befitting a typically early Twentieth Century Exposition held at the culmination of a machine age. The Century of Progress which this Exposition represents is one of progress in material ways. From the Bahá'í writings, however, one catches a fuller glimpse of the spiritual Source of these unprecedented scientific developments. Bahá'u'lláh has said:

"The East, dazzled with the brilliancy of Western civilization, became so engrossed and occupied with its visible achievements as to fail to recognize its true Source and Origin. Remarkable and fascinating as the intellectual and industrial accomplishments of the leaders of thought have been in modern times, yet to every discerning observer it is clear and manifest that they have derived the greatest part of their knowledge from the sages of the past. . . . These sages of old in their turn acquired their knowledge from the Prophets of God, for these verily were the Manifestations of divine wisdom and the Revealers of heavenly mysteries."^{*}

May we not see, in the next fifty years an even greater development in a spiritual way to parallel our present material achievements?

“Among the results of the manifestation of spiritual forces will be that the human world will take on a new social form; the justice of God will become manifest * * * New Remedy and solution for human problems must be adopted * * * The government of a country must make laws which conform to the divine law.”—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE AMAZING paradox implied in the present world economic crisis, is that the chief cause of the present economic depression—the power of machinery to do the work of man—can be made the foundation of universal prosperity.

It is not possible that humanity properly organized can suffer economically from the magic productive capacity of machinery, whether applied in the manufacture of goods or in the raising of agricultural products. Human ingenuity and human labor applied to the production of the necessities and comforts and luxuries of life, multiplied a thousandfold by the advantages of machine power, can only be a blessing to the human race provided results of such industrial and agricultural enterprise be properly distributed. There is no need of hunger, of lack of shelter or clothing on the part of any individual, now that agriculture and industry can so easily produce beyond all possibility of consumption. Man's scientific power, directing human and machine labor, can meet all the needs of man abundantly.

The above statements, in the light of present day history, are axiomatic. Also it is axiomatic that the clue to world prosperity lies in the problem of distribution. This truth is so evident as to need no argument. But how to create and firmly establish the proper and necessary modes of distribution is another problem, calling for a different type of thinking than that which made multiple production possible. It calls for a new social conscience, a new type of cooperative organized endeavor. This is the crux of the whole problem. Unless these requirements can be attained by humanity the machine will be a curse instead of a blessing, for it will simply increase the power of the few to exploit the many.

THE DIFFICULTY in organizing humanity along new social and economic lines is due to the fact that humanity is made up of different types of individuals, some of whom are cooperative and unselfish by nature while others are extremely individualistic, self-seeking and exploitive.

In the animal world these two opposite types do not exist in the same species. Some varieties of animals and many varieties of insects live on a cooperative basis, the interests of the individual being merged in the interests of the group and the group serving as a means of protection and resource to the individual; while other predatory types of animals like the wolf and tiger are individualistic. But in humanity we find these two types mingled, "the predatory and the pacific, the individualist and socialist, the self-sufficient and the associative."*

Here is the chief problem which confronts any attempt to organize humanity along truly cooperative lines. Side by side we may find individuals who are predatory by nature and individuals who are cooperative by nature. The existence of these two variant and opposite types in the same mass presents grave obstacles to the proper organization of humanity. But worse still is the fact that the predatory type is fiercer, more aggressive, more subtle, more unhampered by conscience or by a strict sense of justice than is the cooperative type. When to these qualities are added the advantages of a keen intellect, a powerful physique and a strong nervous organism, we have a situation which is as difficult to manage for the interests of the many as were the battles of the Middle Ages where physical giants of knighthood fully armored and riding armored steeds could easily prevail against masses of unarmored and poorly armed peasant infantry.

HOW ARE the intellectual leaders of humanity, who are aware of the imperative need of a new cooperative form of society,—how are they going to succeed in sequestering the predatory type or in subordinating it to the general welfare while at the same time permitting necessary individual enterprise, invention and progress?

The power of government is not sufficient to accomplish this. The constant evasions of law on the part of the shrewd and powerful, the constant corruption of government through largess and bribery, make democracy ineffectual to control the will of the exploitive type. And a dictatorship, while it may prevail for the moment, is only as effective as the life of the dictator; at his death all may be undone since in a dictatorship everything hangs upon the will of one individual and not upon the development of the plebiscite.

We must search with desperate zeal for a power capable of solving this critical situation. Exploitation magnified a thousandfold by the potency of machinery will with its titanic force destroy humanity itself unless an immediate solution is found. We have seen that the solution cannot be found within the field of economics itself, and that only partial solution can be found within the field of politics. Where shall we turn then but to the field of religion, which is in its most potent periods capable of exerting a force greater than all other forces that move upon the human heart and will.

RELIGION is strong enough to harness even the predatory to common ends. It operates in two ways: first, in raising human nature to higher levels so that a large proportion of the exploitive type are sublimated into types of voluntary service; secondly, in establishing an ethics so clear-cut and definite and final that the percentage of those who remain predatory are not able with all their subtlety and force of persuasion or aggressiveness to corrupt the standards and requirements of the age. Thus it is that religion, in its periods of greatest power, has always succeeded in organizing human groups into cooperative, gracious and successful forms of economic and social living. This successful organization has persisted so long as the dynamic power of religion was great enough to hold ethical standards strongly to the front and create as heroes in the eyes of communities the men of greatest service instead of the men of greatest exploitation.

THIS IS just what is needed today—a renaissance of religion, a clean breath sweeping from infinite heights to purify the world conscience; to show right as right and wrong as wrong; to remove indefiniteness and confusion from the consciousness of man; to give an imperial divine authenticity to righteous modes of conduct, whether in the life of the individual or in the life of economic and political communities. There need to be heroes who stand for the right with all the power of their being, and with the added power that comes to them from the Unseen.

There needs to be a growing moral conviction on the part of the populace; a clear understanding of what is socially, economically and politically right and wrong; a burning fire of zeal; a steadfast allegiance to principles of divine truth and guidance; a faith in and obedience to those hero leaders who on the plane of unselfish service seek to guide humanity into successful ways of corporate living.

The populace must be deaf to the siren calls of self-advancement and of greedy gain; rather must their ears be open to the voice of justice, of charity, of mutual consideration.

JUST AT the time when humanity needs it most, there has arisen such a religion of power—a religion which is fast spreading over the whole world, pervading every civilized country with its lofty ideals of social, economic and political justice. The World Order of Bahá'u'lláh presents the perfect pattern for humanity—the pattern which will solve every social, economic and political difficulty—a pattern towards which the most advanced secular thought of the world is miraculously tending.

But the mere pattern is not enough. There must be the acceptance and conviction, the obedience of humanity to these divinely appointed laws. It is here that the idealists, the leading thinkers of the world who are superbly progressing in vision and power toward a new world order, need the support of a great spiritual movement which has the potentiality of harnessing the vast majority of humanity to noble ends and of subordinating to the larger needs of the common good the rebellious and exploitive few who still remain self-seeking.

This cannot be accomplished in a moment, in a decade. But the beginnings of the new World State are destined to occur within the century. Its consummation, its perfect working out must be the aim and effort of humanity for many centuries to come. Here is a vision, a task, large enough to command the admiration and zeal of every human being; large enough to absorb all human energy and lead it into the glorious achievement of a perfect civilization.

WHEN PROGRESS FAILS

A Critique of the Century of Progress Exposition

LEROY IOAS

"The advancement of civilization, material perfections and human virtues will bear no fruit or result unless joined to the spiritual perfections, merciful qualities and sound morals; and the happiness of the human world—which is the original goal—will not be attained. . . . Therefore this civilization and material development must be led by the Great Guidance."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

PROGRESS is cyclic and not continuous forward movement. Periodic release of energizing forces carry humanity to a wider application of cultural ideals. During the time it takes for our social practices to catch up with the new ideals of a people, there is apparently a relapse. This relapse itself perfects the instruments for the further progression.

If this were not so, the ray of light which left the star Arcturus just forty years ago, at the time of the opening of the Columbian Exposition would have found America leading the world in the consolidation of the forces for unity and peace, when it reached here to open the Century of Progress Fair.

World Fairs, and there have been three major ones in the past one hundred years, come in forty year cycles; are conceived in times of prosperity, and are born in times of serious adversity. They thus mark the dawn of a new period of progress toward world solidarity.

From Prince Albert's proposal of an international exposition in 1849, there developed the first World's Fair, which opened in London in 1851, attracting some six million people to see an international collection of fourteen thousand exhibits. It is more than a coincidence that at the very time God had opened the Door to Universalism and its spiritual heritage was being vouchsafed to the world through the glorious deeds and sacrifices of the Báb and His Letters of the Living,* that this first effort toward a wider appreciation of world civilization was being made in the most liberal and developed country of the world; and consummated coincident with the Báb's martyrdom.

Forty years later, notwithstanding strong competition among American cities, the Congress of the United States selected Chicago as the site for an international exposition in 1893, to commemorate the discovery of America, four hundred years previous.

On May 1st, 1893, the Columbian Exposition opened, attracting some twenty-eight million people to view the greatest collection of international exhibits ever gathered together. Its Philippine village, its Borneo tribesmen, its lagoons, its replicas of world famous structures, exhibits of far and near, etc., brought within the vision of the average American, the world without his boundaries. It introduced the world to America—and America to the World.

Sorely in need of architectural ideas, the Exposition, following the classic architectures of the world, became an architectural renaissance to America. The eyes of a little traveled populace were turned to the beauties of Europe and antiquity, and classic architecture became our standard of design.

America was weaned from provincialism. The prejudice of isolation gave way to friendly and appreciative intercourse. Travel, study, and the increasing spirit of justice, caused America to enter directly as an harmonizing influence into the councils of the world.

The most significant event of the Exposition, and the source of the release of the most powerful forces, was the spiritual birth of America, through the announcement for the first time in this far western clime, of the appearance of the universal Manifestation of God for this dispensation. Rev. Henry H. Jessup, Missionary from Beirut, Syria, at the Parliament of Religions, held as a part of the Columbian Exposition, presented the message of Bahá'u'lláh's appearance, in the following touching words:

"This then is our mission; that we who are made in the image of God, should remember that all men are made in God's image. To this divine knowledge we owe all we are, all we hope for. We are rising gradually towards that image, and we owe to our fellow men to aid them in returning to it in the glory of God and the beauty of holiness. It is a celestial privilege and with it comes a high responsibility, from which there is no escape.

"In the place of Bahji, or Delight, just outside the fortress of Acre, on the Syrian coast, there died a few months since a famous Persian sage, the Bahá'i saint, named Bahá'u'lláh—the 'Glory of God'—the head of that vast reform party of Persian Moslems, who accept the New Testament as the Word of God, and Christ as the deliverer of men; who regard all nations as one, and all men as brothers. Three years ago he was visited by a Cambridge scholar, and gave utterance to sentiments so noble, so Christ-like, that we repeat them as our closing words:

"That all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers; that the bonds of affection and unity between the sons of men should be strengthened; that diversity of religion should cease and differences of race be annulled; what harm is there in this? Yet so it shall be. These fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away, and the Most Great Peace shall come. Do not you in Europe need this also? Let not a man glory in this, that he loves his country; let him rather glory in this, that he loves his kind."

IN THE FORTY years since the Columbian Exposition, the great forces liberated at that time have enabled America rightfully to stand as the great hope of the nations in this most deplorable relapse from the unifying spirit that was sweeping the world. It appeared through the leadership of America, after the World War, that the basis for a world federation had been laid, and an era of cooperation, unity and peace had dawned. But alas, the forces of human relationships released through the message of Bahá'u'lláh "let him rather glory in this, that he loves his kind" had been lost in the complete reliance on the scientific achievements. In the world economic crisis, the spiritual consciousness of the people became apparent, in the widespread practice of the "survival of the fittest"; rather than the realization that none can prosper or succeed, if all do not prosper and succeed.

At such a time, the Century of Progress Fair opened in Chicago. Ideally located, the Exposition grounds about half a mile wide, run for about three miles along the shore of Lake Michigan. The natural beauty is enhanced by lagoons, colored fountains, and at night by the thousand and one electrical displays reflecting themselves in the placid waters. For the first time electric lighting has been used as a part of building ornamentation. Replicas of famous buildings from many parts of the world, surrounded by native settings in the foreign villages bring the attractions and customs of almost every country. The greatest variety of international exhibits has been collected. Processes of life are depicted; whole industries conducted before one's very eyes; while all the mystic wonders of the mechanical and electrical age are presented for the education of, and to the amazement of the visitors. Such are briefly, the attractions that were intended to bring enthusiastic bewilderment to the multitudes visiting the Fair. They must have an attendance of fifty-six million if it is to succeed financially.

And yet! Why is there so little enthusiasm on the part of the thousands returning from the visit to this, the largest and most spectacular of all World's Fairs?

WHEN 'ABDU'L-BAHA was traveling in America in 1912, He continuously warned that we were lost in a sea of materialism; that we were blinded by the unvalued prosperity brought through the almost unbelievable scientific discoveries; and that unless our spiritual civilization were brought quickly to the same level of achievement, the structure we had so laboriously built on sand, would tumble.

Through the mists of the great depression, there had gradually dawned the light, that the solution of the world's problems lay in social adjustment and control, not further mechanical invention, engineering, nor even increase in funds. This was the dawn of divine civilization. Now, just as people are recovering somewhat from the shattering blows of the material collapse, comes the Century of Progress Exposition, bringing severe spiritual shock by its embodiment of this material progress in its architectural presentation.

The Architectural Commission of the Century of Progress Fair, consisting of eight of America's foremost architects, after long study and planning, proceeded to develop a style of architecture, crystalizing the great progress of the past one hundred years. That which man had achieved in the realm of science was to be symbolized in structures conceived to increase man's physical comfort and convenience. Utility was the underlying motive. The mass formations this necessitated were broken up by colors and lights. This modern style of architecture was presented as the reformation of American architecture, and the mode to be adopted by the world.

Mr. Harvey Wiley Corbett, Chairman of the Board of Architects, of the Century of Progress Fair, writes:

"Instead of turning the eyes of America on Europe, we felt that the eyes of Europe should be turned upon America, that our contribution, if we had any to make, should be one looking into the future and pointing out thereby the direction in which we as a nation are moving. This was not an easy thing to attempt. Because of modern science and invention we were forced to work without precedent. We realized that beauty if so largely a matter of association of ideas, that setting up new standards of form, detail and color would be a highly risky undertaking. . . .

"A Century of Progress will present ideas in architecture and plan arrangement which will not only be new in America, but new in the world as a whole".

Architecture is born in the attempt to crystalize in physical form the strong spiritual forces surging in the hearts. This is why each new religion releasing anew the power of the Holy Spirit, develops the new architecture for the new age. From this new structural design, representing the renewed relationship of God and man, develops the other expressions of spiritual endeavor; and thus architecture becomes the "mother" of the arts.

When a person views a structure, which is the embodiment of the highest ideals of a people, great spiritual emotions are awakened, as the mind is lifted up to the inspiration behind the form. Similarly when viewing a structure, perverting the true spirit of architecture, and representing materialistic ambition; the result can only be one of emotional depression and spiritual shock. This is why people do not and cannot become enthused over the Century of Progress Fair. While the spiritual shock is perhaps not yet recognized, it has opened the heart to the reception of the spirit of the age.

How supremely important then is the Bahá'í Temple, conceived under the inspiration of the most dynamic diffusion of the Holy Spirit the world has experienced, and symbolizing the noblest conception of human development ever bestowed on man. The resplendent dome, carried to completion during the Century of Progress Fair, through the united and sustained sacrifices of the body of devoted followers of Bahá'u'lláh in all lands, will call to life the spiritual seeds now lying dormant in the hearts of the thousands disappointed and discouraged by the materialistic motivation of the Fair. The inner unrest of the people will be calmed by the graceful lines and alluring beauty of the Temple, while the spirit disseminated through it will bestow eternal life. This glorious dome, indicative of the final and complete triumph of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh, "shall stand as a flaming beacon and a symbol of hope amidst the gloom of a despairing world".¹

WELL MAY we consider the trend society will take under the forces released at this Century of Progress Fair. Revolted by the materialism which it represents, all will readily agree that a continuation of the old practices of individualism will lead only to complete destruction. The institutions of man, created for his protection and development through the necessary periods of nationalistic development, are now the very instruments intensifying his suffering. Statesmen, no matter how sincere and altruistic can do little to alleviate the alarming difficulties. The scientific age, while increasing the physical comfort and facility of living, has lead humanity away from the way of living; and because of its throwing out of adjustment the practices which it at first encouraged, leaves society guideless. Only in the appearance of a dynamic spiritual power, giving value to the actions of men, can a leaderless people find guidance into an order of living that will permit the attainment of unending peace and world unity. Thus we may be assured that the underlying trend of the next period of development, in American life at least, will be the most thorough search for the true spiritual values of life. Humanity will struggle for a world order based on the relationships contemplated by the Oneness of the World of Humanity and the Fatherhood of God.

There is only one such order in the world, and that is the World

Order of Bahá'u'lláh! "It is towards this goal—the goal of a new World Order, Divine in origin, all-embracing in scope, equitable in principle, challenging in its features—that a harassed humanity must strive."

WHAT HATH GOD WROUGHT!

DALE S. COLE

"There is an emanation of the universal consciousness today which clearly indicates the dawn of a great unity."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.*

WHEN on May 24th, 1844 there flashed from the United States Supreme Court Room to Baltimore the first inter-city telegraphic message, it was the successful culmination of years of labor and discouragement on the part of Mr. S. F. B. Morse, the inventor. Little did those witnessing this epoch-making achievement appreciate the import of that first message. It has been ringing down the years until the present time—the year of the Century of Progress Exposition—and will continue to sound the ever increasing wonder of the sons of men at the progress made and being made since that memorable date.

That first message was "What Hath God Wrought!"

One wonders in how many hearts and minds this question rises, as millions view the exhibits at the exposition, standing in consternation before some miracle of science. Certainly there is much conjecture as to what the future will bring forth. How fortunate if in these many hearts the question of "what can yet be accomplished" lead to a realization that mankind is beholden to the Power of the Holy Spirit in all that has been done and for all that can be undertaken.

Undoubtedly the accent of the exposition is upon what has been achieved in the physical world, and the results are an inspiration for future endeavors. The greater the obstacles overcome, the more mysterious the instruments, the more wonderful the results obtained, the greater should be our gratitude and our determination to understand the bounties of God. If out of this great exposition, which is giving pleasure and providing education for so many, there arises in many hearts a realization that spiritual forces have been released and are being released and that it is man's paramount obligation to align his activities in conformity with these forces, the exposition will have far-reaching and lasting results.

FOLLOWING the progress of science since 1844, knowledge and experience acquired point more and more surely to an underlying unity. Following the experimental method which has been so productive of results, certain facts or phenomena are discovered. These are reduced to a mathematical expression consisting of symbols, but often the ultimate meaning of the very symbols employed is obscure. There remains the eternal question—Why?

Many thinkers realize now that we seem to be able to go so far and no farther in our intellectual analyses and that behind or beyond or above there is some force or power which lies outside the ken of men, outside the realm of the physical sciences, and that this power is the same regardless of many diversified manifestations in the physical world. There is an underlying unity.

SEEING the results of the operation of this unity in the physical world, are we not lead to inquire as to what has been accomplished towards the unity of the sons of men in the world of the mind and the spirit, and how this phase of progress is represented at Chicago? Should we endeavor to base a great exposition on the progress made towards accomplishing unity of thought, action and feeling among races, nations, groups and individuals, would it not be a difficult task? Despite the fact that means of transportation and communication have been vastly improved, despite the fact that there are common political, economic and social questions involved, is it not true that advancement towards universal peace has lagged lamentably behind achievements in the physical and engineering fields?

In the years ahead is it not true that the emphasis must be directed towards all those things which have to do with better understanding, with amity, with concord, with harmony, with the abolition of prejudices and superstitions, with love? Must we not recognize the unity of mankind, the unity of religion, the unity of God, before we can expect to know much about that mysterious unity, which is the foundation of natural law?

'Abdu'l-Bahá has said that "Love is the highest law in this great universe of God. Love is the law of order between simple essences, whereby they are apportioned and united into compound substances in this world of matter. Love is the essential and magnetic power that organizes the planets and the stars which shine in infinite space. Love supplies the impulse to that intense and unceasing meditation which reveals the hidden mysteries of the universe. Love is the highest honor for all the nations of men."

Since love is the "highest law" and the "highest honor", does this not suggest the line of action which will lead to the greatest benefit to mankind?

'Abdu'l-Bahá has also said, "Love is the cause of the manifestation of truth in the material world. Love is the essential bond of union which exists between God and all things in their ultimate reality. Love is the source of the greatest happiness of the material and the spiritual worlds. Love is the light by which man is guided in the midst of darkness. Love is the communication between truth and man in the realm of consciousness. Love is the means of growth for all who are enlightened.”²

CERTAINLY it is the common wish of mankind to grow, to progress, to advance. Perhaps our course has been charted, as far as we are concerned. Yet man has not yet evolved any world plan for the advancement of all. But in our present state of progress, the recent economic stress has been evidence sufficient that there are great common interests which cannot be ignored and which affect all nations and peoples, great and small. With our facile means of communication and transportation, boundary lines have lost at least some of their significance. World trade demands mutual covenants. For the first time in the history of the world, it is possible to think and to endeavor to apply universal measures.

Since “love is the means of growth for all”, since it is “the light by which man is guided in the midst of darkness”, the course of action for the future is clearly and unmistakably indicated, it is directed towards universal peace. The application of the law of love to human needs is not a thing too difficult to achieve, for the “connection of commerce, art, agriculture is now evident, and has absolute sway. Therefore union and harmony are possible to be produced among all. These means of connection are the wonders of this glorious century and great epoch. Former centuries were deprived of this possibility, for this enlightened century has another power, another splendor, another condition. That is why you see it daily bringing forth some new wonder. Finally it will ignite shining lights in the gatherings of the world. Like the aurora of the morning, the signs of these great lights are already apparent on the horizon.”²

“For this enlightened century” is a phrase which explains why the Century of Progress Exposition is possible, why the mysteries of nature have, one by one, been available to mankind. It also explains why we may look to the future with hope and courage, hope that the years to come will achieve even greater progress in the realm of the spirit than has been accomplished in the material world.

Thus we may look forward to another exposition, a glorious one, in which great progress will be evident in the application of the law of love among mankind. At this exposition there will be wonder and thankfulness for what has been accomplished. Again the thought will flash through the minds of many, “God works in a mysterious way His wonders to perform.” The ever-recurrent question will touch the hearts of men with awe and gratitude for His Bounties.

The question stirring humanity to the very core of its being may well be—“What hath God Wrought!”

“TA TUNG” OR “UNIVERSALISM”

As Expounded by Wang Tse-ping, A Chinese Scholar

TRANSLATED BY Y. S. TSAO

The following exposition of an extraordinary humanitarian and universal movement that has sprung up in China is here described specially for The Bahá'í Magazine by one of its adherents, written at the request of Dr. Y. S. Tsao, the translator. Dr. Tsao, well known to the readers of The Bahá'í Magazine, is one of the leading Bahá'ís of China. The Bahá'í readers will find some similarity between the Bahá'í teachings and these grand principles of the ancient Chinese philosophy as practiced during the reigns of Yao and Hsun over two thousand years before Christ and here revived as a modern philosophy. May we not see here a marvelous instance of how the divine power is stimulating world thought into channels harmonious to the coming World Order of Bahá'u'lláh.

IN an article entitled “The Bahá'í Cause in China” which appeared in the March number of the Bahá'í Magazine of 1932, the writer made a statement to the effect that any religion which claims that the central truth of all religions is the same and that belief in one does not preclude belief in another, will be acceptable to the Chinese people. While discussing the teachings of the Bahá'í Cause, the writer came into contact with some old Chinese scholars who have been expounding the “Ta Tung”* principles as based upon the teachings of Confucius. There is some similarity between the ethical principles of the “Ta Tung” Cause and those of the Bahá'í Cause. One “Ta Tung” scholar said that he was in full agreement with the twelve principles of the Bahá'í Cause, and he would undertake to write an article to prove how the Bahá'í principles could be substantiated in terms of Confucianism.

The principle of “Ta Tung” or “Universalism” is based upon the humanitarian concept. It preserves the people by teaching that all energy is not for one's self, all produce is not to be kept to one's self. There must be living together and preservation for all; there must be mutual sympathy and mutual love. This is distinct from the ways of the animals which devour the weak and mutually exterminate one another.

Its grand teachings of ruling the family, governing the state and pacifying the world is based upon the foundation of regulating the person first. That is what is meant by self-help to help others. It is in agreement with the benign concepts of loyalty and forgiveness. All these teachings are in direct contrast with the imperialistic desire of enriching one's own country by impoverishing other countries or strengthening one's own race by destroying other races.

It lays an even emphasis upon the individual, the society, the state and the world. There is no partiality. There are states in the world, but the state must not injure the world; there are societies in the state, but the society must not injure the state; there are individuals in society, but the individual must not injure the society. That is what is meant by "growing together without mutual injury; working together without mutual conflict".

The final object of "Ta Tung" is to benefit mankind, so it has been said: "The old dies in ease, the strong has his work, the young is nurtured; and the widower, the widow, the orphan and the aged are all cared for".

The "Ta Tung" procedure is peaceful and conclusive. It elevates the virtuous and able. It emphasizes sincerity and friendliness. It avoids unrighteousness and pardons the innocent. The "Ta Tung" rule is public-spirited and unselfish. It follows the golden mean and absolute justice. There is no distinction between races, religions, parties and classes. It embraces the whole human family.

During the last few decades of human history, the nationalistic spirit has been transcendent. After the World War, there was a rude awakening. Nevertheless, the nationalistic concept still controls politics. The conflict between capital and labor persists and international oppression is on the increase. A second World War looms on the horizon and class warfare spreads far and wide. The bankruptcy of nationalism is apparent.

What will be the remedy? It must be the message of good-will and propriety. It must be the principle of harmonious cooperation. The new principles in vogue are individualism, communism, socialism and Facism. They all emphasize the materialistic side to the neglect of the spiritual side. They follow the old track of competition and brute force. Although they are not so intense in spirit as imperialism, yet they are far from the "Ta Tung" goal of "growing together without mutual injury". The "Ta Tung" principles of loyalty and forgiveness emphasize both the material and spiritual aspects of the case.

It is suggested that in teaching the "Ta Tung" principles, it will come into conflict with many other religions. There will be no opposition if the principles are properly understood, (as has been proved by the acceptance of the Bahá'í Cause by all peoples). "Ta Tung" is the extreme wisdom of humanity. From it is derived law, politics, education, virtue and customs, and it forms the standard for the regulation of person, ruling of family, organization of society, governance of state and pacification of the world. Confucius concentrated upon the human element, and all religions have humanitarian principles.

Again, it has been asked, that if all nations persist in pursuing their nationalistic policies in fighting and oppressing one another, it would be disadvantageous for any nation to adopt the "Ta Tung" principles of peace and good-will all alone. Such a supposition is a misapprehension of the real "Ta Tung" or Universal spirit. "Ta Tung" believes in saving one's self before saving others, it is not self-abandonment. Society is the aggregation of individuals, therefore anything that injures the society also affects the individual, so society is to be saved through the salvation and not abandonment of the individual. In a similar manner, the state is to be saved by saving the society first; and the world is to be saved by saving the component states first.

If the people of the world understand the real meaning of “Ta Tung”, they will be in a position to work for the peace of the world. All nationals in each state could require their governments to pursue a peaceful policy towards other nations. In case one nation should obstinately pursue a wrong policy, then all nations could combine to correct it. Should several nations combine to carry out a policy injurious to others, then earlier or later there will be a great conflict again. Racial and class warfare would destroy many human institutions, but in the task of reconstruction, the world will again seek a solution in universal principles. Of the three alternatives as stated above, namely, conscious adoption of Ta Tung, combined coercion for Ta Tung, or reconstruction according to Ta Tung after destruction, Ta Tung, that is, a peaceful solution of problems, will necessarily be the future order of the day.

The days for nationalism are apparently numbered and the tendency of the world is toward universal principles, so it behooves us to develop a universal consciousness and catch the tendency of the times by the forelock. After the period of Ta Tung of Yao and Hsun,* more than two thousand years ago, the Chinese rulers have abandoned that principle, nevertheless, China still adhered to the spirit of Ta Tung to a certain extent, so that even during the most prosperous periods of Han and Tang dynasties, when Chinese culture spread its influence to Korea to the east, to Persia to the west, to Siberia to the north, and to the South Sea Islands to the south, the people in the outlying districts of that vast territory were neither oppressed or exploited, but were allowed to live in peace, which was in direct contrast with the condition which obtained in other parts of the world.

The light and truth of Ta Tung have been beshrouded for many centuries, and it is high time that a movement is set in motion to declare it to the world. It aimed to save mankind from the horrors of modern cut-throat conditions. Since the whole world is envisaged as the sphere of activity, it is not to be limited by states, races, religions, parties and classes. The central truth is one, although the approaches might differ.

*The Golden Age of China.

“There have been many holy Manifestations of God. One thousand years ago, two hundred thousand years ago, one million years ago the bounty of God was flowing, the radiance of God was shining, the dominion of God was existing. . . . The foundation of the divine religions had become obscured . . . consequently it was necessary that the fundamental basis of all religious teaching should be restored, therefore His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh appeared from the horizon of the Orient and reestablished the essential foundation of the religious teachings of the world. . . . We can consider Bahá’u’lláh to be all the Prophets, no matter by what Name He chooses to call Himself, for all their meanings, perfection and qualities are manifest in Him. Bahá’u’lláh is the Center of all their perfections.”

APPRECIATIONS FROM YUGOSLAVIA

His [Dr. Esslemont's] book an abiding monument to his pure intention, will, alone, inspire generations yet unborn to tread the path of truth and service as steadfastly and as unostentatiously as was trodden by its beloved author.—Shoghi Effendi.*

THE Bahá'í Cause is making progress in Yugoslavia where the book "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era" by Dr. J. E. Esslemont has just appeared in Serbian. The frontispiece is a quotation from President Thomas Garrigue Masaryk of the Republic of Czechoslovakia who is very loved in this neighbor-country, Yugoslavia. The introduction is by Professor Bogdan Popovitch, the well known Serbian scholar who is Professor of Comparative Literature in the University of Belgrade. Professor Popovitch, Bahá'í in spirit, is a co-worker for a better world. His translation of the little Bahá'í booklet giving the universal principles for this new age has charmed and interested all who read it; it is in purest classic Serbian. The Serbian translation of "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era" too, is most poetic, gives the spirit of the Teachings and delights the readers. This latter translation is by Mrs. Draga Ilitch, a poet and journalist of Belgrade who has spent a number of years in Paris and London first studying, then doing journalistic work and lecturing.

The introduction is herewith presented to you translated from Professor Popovitch's words in the Serbian language. Following this I shall give you an appreciation which Mrs. Ilitch wrote. Thus you may glimpse the soul of the Serbs and read what they think of the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh.

THE INTRODUCTION

"Five years ago, Miss Martha Root, the very deserving and active American magazine writer and journalist, an adherent of the Bahá'í Movement, brought to Belgrade a tiny blue booklet "Twelve Basic Principles of the Bahá'í Teachings"; this book was translated, anonymously, into our language by the undersigned. Full of wise thoughts and noble feelings were its pages! It was printed here in a limited number of copies and sold for the benefit of one of our humanitarian institutions.

"This year, 1933, Miss Root brought with her a larger work written by Dr. J. E. Esslemont, in which the Bahá'í Teachings are set forth much more extensively. This is the book which is now presented to the reader in an excellent translation by Mrs. Draga Ilitch.

"The book speaks for itself and is its own interpreter; each reader must form his own opinion about it; he may accept everything that is said in this volume, or may dissent from it in some particulars. However, in the opinion of the undersigned, even in the case of such a partial disagreement, the book will lose very little of its beneficial influence. It will not fail to be profitable even to him whose personal views would in some particulars differ from the general Bahá'í Teachings.

“OUR PRESENT considerable external civilisation has not helped us, and cannot help us, to secure that glorious age. We have built gigantic cities with immeasurable streets and magnificent palaces, we have filled them with all possible contrivances of our perfect modern technics, we have raised buildings that reach the clouds, we fly over oceans, dive under the seas, we send messages and drawings and sounds from one end of the earth to the other with the quickness of lightning . . . and meanwhile men are hating and murdering one another like wild beasts; whole legions of healthy men eager to work are obliged to starve, sleep on the benches, live by begging as never before. Political injustices increase; insolent and stupid luxury vaunts itself; thefts, embezzlements, robberies, murders, brigandage, kidnapping, are the fashion of the day; even children steal and attack; the very churches are plundered; wicked passions of every kind blaze up on all sides; and mammon lures and rules in an unbounded way with high and low, sowing envy, hate, fury, and madness.

“What is needed, is to change the inner man. A philosopher said once: ‘by no political alchemy is it possible to get golden conduct out of leaden instincts;’ and Dr. J. E. Esslemont, who quotes him, adds: ‘it is equally true that by no political alchemy is it possible to make a golden society out of leaden individuals.’ It is necessary first to change men, of whom society is composed and who create conditions; it is necessary making one’s influence felt in every way: from the pulpit, in meetings, through books, through the school, through the press, through societies, by example and by punishment—to make men understand that their egoism, their irrational egoism, is the cause of all evil; to make them understand, as the writer of this book says: ‘that selfish views and selfish actions inevitably bring social disaster, and that if humanity is not to perish ingloriously, each must look on the things of his neighbor as of equal importance with his own.’

“Humanity has perhaps never been further away from these ideas than it is today, but this is a good sign! It means that we have arrived at the culminating point of the crisis; after which, whenever there is a question of mankind and not of individuals, there must inevitably follow the recovery. The education of mankind is very seldom if ever, achieved by theoretical arguments alone, much more often and more successfully through an appeal to the feelings, but always by events. Even if everything else should fail to help us, the sad events we witness around us on all sides, the distressing crisis which oppresses mankind, will bring, in a more or less near future, the change which this humane book foresees and expects, and which it desires to hasten. In its scope and contents this is a good, wise and noble book which comes at the right time!—Bogdan Popovitch.”

MRS. ILITCH'S WORDS

“When I received the book ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Talks in Paris’ in the spring of 1932, while I was still in London, it was as if subconsciously I had known Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and Their teachings from my childhood. Since then the book has been precious to me, I never parted from it, but read it often. Reading it again and again in September last, I had the wish to translate it into Serbian, not knowing the richness of Bahá’í literature and that there are many Bahá’í books that can be translated.

“Then in February, 1933, out of the blue, destiny sent me a true Bahá’í apostle, Martha Root, who asked me to translate ‘Bahá’u’lláh and the New Era’ into our language. This book helped me to have a clear understanding of the Bahá’í Movement which I consider to be the best renewal of religion and the one just needed for this universal age. It is not only a faith, but it is a social religion in which is found the solution of present day problems, and especially it contains the new conception of the oneness of mankind. Despairing Yugoslavs who have come through the Great War and attained their cherished ideal of Yugoslav unity, now have a deep longing for unity spiritually at home and then with all mankind. So I think these Bahá’í Teachings will be accepted, because for a long time they have been yearned for in our country.

“Personally I can say that this Bahá’í teaching came to me in just the time of my life when I needed it most. Although all my life I have been wishing to help others, sometimes there was bitterness in my heart because those for whom I sacrificed so much were not conscious of the price I gave in order to bring them happiness and success. Also, I felt that those whom I loved and who loved me, in the most important moments did not understand the purity of my feeling and the unselfishness of my actions. This realization always brought me great torment and loneliness. Now that I am a Bahá’í, the feeling of bitterness has wholly passed from my life, and I am happy that I have done what I did for others. Now that I turn to God, I never feel alone; I have the company of Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! My life is filled with happiness and I have serenity in my heart.—Draga Ilitch.”

TWO WORLDS BECKON

Comments from the Geyserville Summer School

MARION HOLLEY

LET no man weak in constitution or mind expose himself to the Bahá'í Faith. The attraction of God weaves so mighty a spell, a fascination so certain in its effect, that none but the unwise will risk its charms and contemplate escape. Bahá'u'lláh has said, "We have seized the lives and have begun a new creation." We who have lived under His dominion will answer for His truth and praise Him. But others had best understand the meaning, before seeking to come in, for to be a Bahá'í is to live in two worlds, and, like a bridge, to have one's feet upon opposing shores. There are stresses involved in the position!

The village of Geyserville, seat of the Bahá'í Summer School, lies not more than two hours distant from San Francisco. A few stores, postoffice, the wineries which bespeak older times, and a rich valley of farms comprise a community which, in its rural life, epitomizes the basic genius of America. Here is a world familiar to our fathers, simple, honest, industrious, local, reaching to the horizon. But not farther.

Strangely enough, into the midst of this quiet locale—where the activities of men have long crystallized into unquestioned patterns, and the spirit of desire and revolt has never penetrated, nor cosmopolitan chaos sounded even a faint response—a humorous destiny has chosen to precipitate its most potent yeast.

For seven years now the Bahá'ís of the western United States and Canada have gathered here in an annual Summer School, with their purpose to prepare minds and hearts as carriers of a new energy. They bring a spirit restless, eager, determined in its pursuit of a brilliant vision. It is a curious fact, this cradling of vibrant motion within a changeless scene.

NEVER BEFORE, in its brief history, has the Summer School so fully attained the objectives set down by the Committee. From the first Feast, when long-separated friends allayed their hunger in the precious communication of love, and one after another arose to speak of his gratitude and joy in the meeting, there were manifest the characteristics which possess and animate a true Bahá'í group. Some alchemy of inter-action operated to set up those conditions of affection, understanding and radiance which strangers discerned as peculiar to the occasion. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said, "Should one soul from amongst the believers meet another, it must be as though a thirsty one with parched lips has reached to the fountain of the water of life, or a lover has met his true beloved."¹ How thoroughly did these friends, unthoughtful of their actions, spontaneously fulfil the divine injunction! In this manner, with a Feast under the great tree which has come to symbolize Geyserville, the ¹Bahá'í Scriptures, p. 542.

Bahá'is have always chosen to inaugurate their program.

In the scope of study and intensity of application the Summer School surpassed all previous effort. Indeed, the work of other years finds its proper level as the preparatory course for the maturity of this real Bahá'í university. The course on the Influence of Religion on Society approximated a survey and interpretation of the forces behind the history of the world, while the other courses on Bahá'í History and Administration opened up depths of thought never suspected by most of us. The results, while salutary in their revelation of unguessed ignorance, left cause for wonder in some minds. In what books may these things be studied? Where is religion's influence upon culture told? The questions, although justified, were left unanswered; for the history which Bahá'is study has not yet been written. A whole development of scholarship must come before we can speak with intellectual assurance of things we truly know. In these preliminary days of the new cycle, we cannot estimate too highly the impetus Bahá'í theories will bring to learning, theories which, like the explanation of prophetic cycles, are pregnant with unsuspected content.

It was in the pursuit of this prophetic interpretation of history that the School gained perhaps its most vivid concept of the Cause. The approach was objective and clear, with results too obvious for question. Before our eyes a mighty vista of culture took shape and wheeled into motion. Vast aggregates of individuals, caught in the grasp of religion, were unified and moulded into vital societies. Masses, through a new will, changed into acting groups. And from the bodies of dead men, out of a tangle of fruitless humanity, the spirit of faith was able to produce that most admirable of all bodies, a powerful and expressive unit of men. Label the unit Israel, medieval Europe or Islám: the impulsive principle remained the same.

From past to future is a leap as easily imagined as it is quickly done. Coming events are but the unrolled portions of history's scroll. And whether the Prophet came yesterday or today, His effects will live after Him, His spirit like a current flow through and illumine His followers. Bahá'is must learn to appreciate these facts; otherwise they underestimate their Cause.

For the Bahá'í Faith is not a new belief. Nor is it a cult for which we must apologize to practical men. The love it enjoins can never be described in abstract terms. Its ideals chafe in the dim vaults of Utopian minds. Yet to equate it to worthy social plans, however timely in their applications, is to misjudge its character. All plans, all hopes, all remedies are old-world and rooted in despair, except this remedy which, since it springs from eternal energy, brings vigor to fashion a future and create in careless men an urge to act. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said: "Now in the world of being, the Hand of Divine Power hath firmly laid the foundations of the all highest bounty and this wondrous gift. Whatsoever is latent in the innermost of this Holy Cycle shall gradually appear and be made manifest, for now is but the beginning of its growth and the day-spring of the revelation of its signs. Ere the close of this century and of this age it shall be made clear and evident how wondrous was that springtide and how heavenly was that gift!"¹

GEYSERVILLE saw a world within a world. In the Summer School a laboratory was set up, where principles of a new mechanics of society were proposed and tested in group life, while curious minds traced down the theoretical support from past experience. Whether in theory or in fact, those principles proved sound.

Thus a "new model of the universe", the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, has sprung to being, posed securely on the groundwork of devoted lives. It matters little if, for some time to come, its proponents find themselves straddling the void which separates their true world from the one which gave them birth. Bahá'ís will accept with gladness this precarious, none too graceful task, being assured and made courageous by the knowledge that their faces are set in the line of necessary growth, and that their forward feet rest on a firm and cheerful homeland. No one who has learned to love that homeland under the wise tutelage of Geyserville, where aspirations have been shaped to deeper study and more joyful play, and where affections flowered under the bounty of incomparable hosts, will doubt its possibility or weary in the effort to make real, for every man, this most real of all discovered worlds.

MEMORIALS OF THE FAITHFUL

1.—Mirza Muhammad-Ali, the Afnán

‘ABDU’L-BAHA

Translated from the Persian by Marzieh Nabil Carpenter

This series of brief biographies of the leading followers of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh was composed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 1915 and published in Haifa in 1924 in Persian. These translations into English have been made by the request of Shoghi Effendi. The aim has been to render them into colloquial English rather than to follow a literary translation. This work was done specially for The Bahá'í Magazine. The translator states that she does not consider these translations final.

ONE day I was up on the roof of the caravansary; some of the friends were there and I was walking up and down; it was sunset. All at once I looked along the shore and far away there was a carriage coming. I said “Gentlemen, it seems as if some very spiritual person were in that carriage.” It was very far away. I said, “Come along and let us go to the city gate; although they won't let us go out, we can wait there till the carriage arrives.” I took two or three people with me and went. . . . The gatekeeper brought a chair for me and I sat and waited. By that time the sun had gone down and they had shut the big gate but the little gate was open. The gatekeeper stayed outside and the carriage arrived with the traveler.

What a radiant face the Afnán had! He was nothing but light from head to foot. Even to look at him made one happy, because he was staunch and sure and smiling. He was a very blessed person; he went forward every day; every day his faith and fire, his spiritual passion grew, so that in those few days that he spent in the Great Prison¹ he made extraordinary progress. It is clear what sort of man he was if one could sense the power of his spirit when his carriage was still far away on the road between 'Akká and Haifa. At all events, bounties without end were accorded him, and then he left the presence of Bahá'u'lláh and went to China, where he spent some time in serving the Cause of God; afterward he returned to India and there he died.

THE AFNANS and other friends in India planned to send his holy remains to 'Iráq, ostensibly to Najaf to lie near the City of God, because the authorities would not give him burial in the Muhammadan cemetery. His sacred body had been held in trust, and Aqá Siyyid Asadu'lláh, who was in Bombay, took charge of it and brought it with all reverence to 'Iráq. Some Persians, enemies of the Cause, who were on the ship, spread the news through Bushir that the body of Mirza Muhammad the Bábi was being brought for burial in Najaf so that a Bábi should lie near the holy places, and they aroused the town; they tried to cast the body out of the ship, but they were forestalled; see what the Invisible Will accomplishes!

The remains reached Basra, and since caution was essential, Siyyid Asadu'lláh was obliged to act as if he were taking them to Najaf in the hope that he could somehow get permission to bury them there. Now although Najaf is a blessed place and always shall be, the friends had longed to have the grave elsewhere, and it was providential that enemies forbade the Najaf burial. They besieged the quarantine office to lay hold of the body and bury it in Basra, or throw it into the sea or expose it in the desert. The affair became so notorious that in the end it was impossible to carry the body to Najaf and Siyyid Asadu'lláh was forced to bring it to Baghdád. In Baghdád he could find no grave where the remains would be safe from enemies and he finally decided to take the body to the shrine of Salmán-i-Pák, the Persian, at about five farsangs (miles) from Baghdád, and bury it in Madá'in near Salmán's tomb, beside the palace of Persia's ancient kings. He took this holy trust there and with great reverence laid it to rest in a sure place near the palace of Nawshiraván; and this was destiny—that thirteen hundred years after the throne-city of Persia's kings was battered down, when nothing was left of it but ruins and sand hills, and the walls of the palace were cracked and half fallen away, pomp and splendor should be given it once more. It is really an amazing structure, and measures fifty-two feet across the entrance.

IN THIS way heavenly powers seconded the old Persians, that their ruined capital might be rebuilt; with divine aid this sacred body was buried there, and undoubtedly the place will become a famous city. I wrote a great many letters about this, until it was arranged that the body should come to rest there.

Siyyid Asadu'lláh would correspond with me from Basra; there was an official in Basra who was much attached to us and I wrote him to further this. Siyyid Asadu'lláh wrote me from Baghdád that he was at his wit's end and could not tell where to find a grave, because wherever he should bury the body enemies would unbury it. At last by the grace of God it was laid to rest in this place where the Blessed Beauty [Bahá'u'lláh] had walked, where He had revealed tablets and the believers of Baghdád had gathered in His presence—in this very spot where the Most Great Name had paced. Surely this was due to the devotion of the Afnán; otherwise it could never have happened: "For God is the Mover of heaven and earth." I loved him very much; I was very happy because of him. I wrote a long visitation tablet for him and sent it with other papers to Persia. . . .

How amazing the story of Nawshiraván's palace, that was so richly decorated once; it is hung with cobwebs now instead of cloth of gold, and owls hoot where the king's music played; it has become "The house of the echoes, where nothing is heard but the shadows of voices." When we came to 'Akká the barracks were like that; a few trees grew there and all night long the owls would perch on them and call!

In short, from early youth till old age the blessed, radiant Afnán shone like a candle amongst men, until finally he rose to the realm of everlasting glory and was drowned in a sea of light. May the breaths of his merciful Lord be upon him, the compassion and good pleasure of God; may he be plunged in the ocean of grace and forgiveness.

A WORLD AT PEACE

Bahá'í Administration as Presented to a Group of Free-Thinkers

Part 3.—Bahá'í Spiritual Assemblies

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

In this concluding article on Bahá'í Administration, the author describes with great clarity and power the amazing new type of government which Bahá'u'lláh has set in motion—a form of government so perfect as to hold one in breathless astonishment as to whether such a government could ever be. Its perfect functioning depends of course on a spiritualized humanity, for government after all can rise little higher than the spirit of its peoples; but in the Bahá'í world of the future spiritual earnestness and progress will go hand in hand with and support the evolution of the divinely perfect type of government here described.

HIS seeking after the Truth then, the sine qua non of Bahá'í consultation, is not a vague, wistful, metaphysical process: it is a quite valid and demonstrable method to which the most exacting of all tests may be applied: its practicability—the test not only of whether it will work but of whether it will work with universal satisfaction to remove the ancient evils of man's life.

The first criticism is that the kind of people necessary to operate this new social mechanism do not exist. The answer is that these people are evolving. In the thirteenth century in England or France the people necessary to operate a mechanistic and technological society did not exist; in ancient China or Italy those able to operate a democratic state might not be found; in Persia or Japan, generally speaking, women capable of political, social and civic equality with men are absent, but that does not argue that such a status has not nor cannot be reached.

All over the world today are millions of ardent, earnest, steadfast men and women devoting themselves to the necessary restrained freedom and discipline of consultation. To invoke it means at the same time absolute candor and straightforwardness, scrupulous consideration and good-will, utter truthfulness, the banishment of every vestige of secrecy and intrigue and a healthy disregard for the fate of personal opinion. Surely this conquest of self under the powerful religious impulse of the Bahá'í teachings can be considered no more difficult of accomplishment than conquering the material universe is to science.

Still another objection might be that this presupposition is quite as contrary to human nature as the assumptions in other social panaceas, already mentioned. In no nation anywhere are there a preponderating number who think as much of unknown people in distant lands as they do of their own immediate families, the presupposition of communism, for instance; but in many nations lying, falsifying, intriguing are highly discreditable and are internationally so regarded among civilized men. There is a definite and formulated tendency among mankind toward frankness, honor, truthfulness. Any dispassionate and scholarly inquiry must take into account the undeniable power which the religious mandate exercises over men's souls and minds and actions. For centuries the most absurd and antisocial dogmas prevail. How much more rational then to imagine that a command in accordance with our nobler aspirations and ideals can become a common practice.

The next objection is that without a system of checks and balances, with no platform, no constituency to direct and coerce, the basest oligarchy would result.

It is true that Bahá'í Assemblies are not responsible to constituents, for there aren't any; are not bound to a platform, (for the whole technique of consultation requires minds free and open to the promised inspiration of the Holy Spirit, not closed through preconceptions and allegiance to mere human plans); are not accountable to the group. We see the consistency of this when we recall our Bahá'í belief in the directive voice of God wherever hearts are united, minds receptive and souls attuned in the consultation of our duly elected representatives. The right of human beings to challenge the results of consultation would mean our right to question the voice of God. Therefore Assemblies are not responsible to Bahá'í communities but are accountable only to God.

"How delightfully simple," the critic here exclaims. "You can do anything you want, get away with almost anything, and blame it on God." But just the contrary is the condition. Recalling the previous quotation from 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

"Should they endeavor to fulfill these conditions the Grace of the Holy Spirit shall be vouchsafed unto them, and that Assembly shall become the center of the Divine blessings, the hosts of Divine confirmation shall come to their aid, and they shall day by day receive a new effusion of Spirit," and "should the least trace of estrangement prevail the result shall be darkness upon darkness."

Here is a norm of measurement that requires no investigating commissions, no certified accountants, no checks and balances, that the most ignorant and untutored can "behold and see with his eyes." "Things done in secret shall be cried from the house-top" and responsibility to God becomes far more exacting than allegiance to man.

IN BAHÁ'Í consultation Bahá'u'lláh for the first time lifts thinking to the status of a group activity. Our emotions have been socialized. Every rightminded individual, whether millionaire or ditch digger has a uniform reaction to desperate human need; if a man be run over each has the same voluntary impulse to afford relief, to call assistance; but there is no intelligent person who can't reach sane workable conclusions far more satisfactorily and rapidly than a group. With the form of consultation promulgated by Bahá'u'lláh, man begins the long, slow climb to the heights of universal concerted analysis and reason.

Local Assemblies have complete jurisdiction in local administrative matters, but the National Assembly determines what is local in cases where appeal is made to them for a definite ruling on any special subject. The National Assembly of a country correlates all national Bahá'í activities not only bringing them into an harmonious relation but acting in national affairs as the Primary Assembly in parochial matters.

The tertiary Assembly, the International House of Justice¹ has only a legislative function; it alone can enact those universal laws that apply equally to all mankind, which are not already established by Bahá'u'lláh in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas.² According to the explicit text of the "Testament and Tablets of 'Abdu'l-Bahá" it "is under the care and protection of the Abha Beauty under the shelter and unerring guidance of His Holiness, the Exalted One."

Qualification in any of these bodies includes "knowledge and enlightenment." An enthusiastic group of uninformed individuals is not permitted to govern by guesswork. "Directed by God and freed from all error," not only must the most advanced, enlightened and spiritually-minded constitute its membership, but expert opinion and advice must be sought in all matters of a special or technical nature. Bahá'u'lláh in human affairs, exalts intelligence, reason and enlightenment. Universal education is obligatory.

WITH THE modern world shrunk to a neighborhood, the most crying problem of the hour is how to adjust international affairs in a neighborly manner. Cooperation amongst the nations of the world has proven inadequate. A League of Nations, created by the states that comprise it, from which they can withdraw at will, exercises no final authority, and can call to its support only moral sentiment and public opinion in such an exigency; both equally impotent in the face of powerful propaganda and nationalistic pretensions at home. Uniformity is not only revolting to healthy patriotism but is utterly impossible.

The Bahá'í Super-State offers neither cooperation, nor uniformity. It represents political unification, exercising final authority in all international affairs, while leaving every state sovereign in the administration of internal affairs.

There is no desire to efface patriotism or to crush national life; love of country is a basic human virtue; but the appalling aspects of present-day nationalism wherein love of country implies hatred of other countries will be extirpated and forgotten when a tribunal of international justice is established.

The International House of Justice will make all required world laws and regulations. Any nation refusing to submit to its commands must be immediately suppressed by a combination of all other nations. As Dr. Esslemont³ points out, today all the nations stand idly by letting those involved destroy each other: then all nations will immediately arise to crush the oppressor.

Events since the World War demonstrate that there can be no guaranteed peace until every government in exchange for the security of an international governing body with final authority, yield something of its sovereign power. It may require the attenuation of suffering to bring this to pass, but the present status is so fraught with potential disaster and disruption as to bring that quotidian of suffering nearer and nearer to human experience.

Certainly when such an unchallengeable body is incorporated it is self-evident that there can be no more war.

The third form of government, monarchy, is provided through the Bahá'í institution of the Guardianship.¹

ANY CLEAR thinking on the subject of religion shows its weak point always to have been on the matter of interpretation. With no one in authority to give definite information as to what the words of the Founder actually meant, every religion has in the course of time broken into innumerable fragments, each with its own interpretation, each following its own self-appointed leaders. Though every religion has unity as its basic teaching² every religion passes through the debilitating process of sectarianism, division and internal strife.

Bahá'u'lláh has made with His followers a great Covenant that in His Day these schisms and misunderstandings will be impossible. He says that One Whom He appoints to administer His Faith holds the key to the interpretation of His Words and that all personal interpretation is absolutely forbidden. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the first son of Bahá'u'lláh, was this divinely appointed Interpreter. A man might interpret the Words of Bahá'u'lláh as much as he choose, but if he do so there is no way in which he could possibly be called a Bahá'í. By this means the Bahá'í community is protected from this most fertile source of discord and disruption.

'Abdu'l-Bahá in turn extended the Covenant of Bahá'u'lláh to a succession of Guardians, the lineal descendants of His Father and Himself, entrusted with this same interpretive power, thereby insuring the unity and integrity of the Bahá'í faith forever. For immediately there is the slightest difference between a Bahá'í and the Interpreter the former automatically puts himself outside the Faith.

Again the objection will be raised, "The idea that any one can definitely state what was in the mind of another person is quite fantastic. There can be no final reliance in such a matter." This is entirely beside the point. Bahá'is believing that Bahá'u'lláh completely manifested and reflected the Reality of God, accept this Covenant of the Interpretation and Protection of His Words not only without question but with inestimable gratitude that such a provision will in perpetuity protect His Cause from disintegration and the "darts of doubtfulness." However, for purposes of argument grant to the objector that interpretation is impossible (which no Bahá'í could accept). The fact remains that if every one believes it possible, conducts himself as if it had actually been accomplished, subjects himself to its results, exactly the same end is accomplished as if it were possible, and as if the voice of the Interpreter were the Voice of the Founder. From the pragmatic point of view even to the atheist this method, whether it have any actual basis in reality or not, accomplishes precisely the same results of unity, coordination and reconciliation, as if it had such a basis.

The only test for religion or anything else is its fruits. If a me-

¹Why describe the government of the future by any single name? It might well be called a constitutional monarchy, a spiritual democracy, etc., etc. But no existing term can quite describe a government which will be different in form from any yet known—Editor. ²By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another, John 13:35.

thod has been devised whereby quarrelsomeness, ambition, intrigue, and decay are eliminated, then the method is part of an eternal process of truth and righteousness.

Today Shoghi Effendi, the first of that mighty succession of Defenders of Faith, has proven, by the efficacy of his administration, the divine origin of his office. Harmonizing and consolidating the followers of Bahá'u'lláh in lands as distant and socially opposed as Japan and Turkestan, Germany and Persia, America and Egypt, he is demonstrating the marvel of Bahá'u'lláh's Covenant that there will be no strife and division in His Dispensation, but that all men will work harmoniously for the achievement of their sublime destiny.

THIS THEN constitutes the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh: the democratic election of competent rulers for short periods; their legislating and administrating by consultation, not conflict; and the continuous presence of one divinely constituted, as all Bahá'is believe, to interpret the Words of Bahá'u'lláh and to keep His Cause integrated around the sublime ideal of His teachings of peace, unity and justice.

Whatever our belief or bias, whether we be spiritualists¹ or atheists, history and psychology alike force us to observe: first how, under the irresistible commands of a great Teacher old practices have been discarded, while new, difficult and totally unprecedented attitudes have been assumed; how, impelled by religious belief, men have erected social structures that have defied the roll of time; how, whether these ideas have been true or false, they have produced the most far-reaching results and have exercised the profoundest influence in human affairs.

The Bahá'í teachings exalt those of the greatest virtue and most apparent spirituality; they intensify and increase through the powerful adjunct of public support and admiration, truthfulness, freedom, honor and reliability; the reward of positions of trust is reserved for the self-effacing, the humble, the courteous; for no matter how gifted or enlightened one may be these qualities are essential. They include an advanced social program² including universal education, a universal language, the reconciliation of religion with science and reason, the conquest of prejudice, the equality between men and women, universal peace, a universal tribunal, the solution of the economic problem, etc., etc., which offer the highest objectives of human endeavor. Unified by a Guardian, restrained and directed by an international tribunal, protected from the personally ambitious or irresponsible by the method of consultation, this movement has already brought within its fold followers of every religion and creed, members of every race and nationality, exponents of every class, a typical cross-section of humanity who are united in the stupendous task of sweeping aside superstition and ignorance, strife, greed and self-seeking, and of establishing, through the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh and under the direction of His Guardian, God's promised kingdom on earth.

¹Not to be confused with "Spiritists"—those who believe in the presence of disembodied spirits. ²Enunciated by Bahá'u'lláh between 1868-8.

THE EVOLUTION OF A BAHÁ'Í

Incidents from the Life of Mother Beecher*

Chapter 1.—Finding the Purpose of Life

DOROTHY BAKER

"The wisdom and purpose of their [the Prophets] training is that man must pass from degree to degree of progressive unfoldment until perfection is attained. . . . Man must walk in many paths and be subjected to various processes in his evolution upward."—Abd'ul-Bahá.

IN the year 1844 a four year old child sat rocking her doll in the little village of Wilksbury, Connecticut. She sang her song, the only one she knew,—“Jesus loves me, this I know”, and as she rocked and crooned to her little wax child, she explained at length just what it all meant to be loved by Him. This to the secret horror, it must be confessed, of the dear New England Presbyterian mother, who felt that talking about the Lord was something of a desecration.

At ten Nellie felt strongly impressed by two facts: hell-fire and the golden streets of heaven. Sitting in the dim old church by the side of Mother, who preserved, in uncomfortable black taffeta beside her, a distant silence, she trembled and tried hard to think about the little song; and when the hell-fire raged too close, she closed her eyes and whispered, “He does love me”.

In her middle teens Nellie discovered that one could crowd out fears to a degree, by moving briskly with the crowd down tinselled lanes of festivity and laughter; and where the laughter was, there was Nellie, original, lively, full of life and vigor, and possessed of an urgent desire at all times to be “the life of the party”.

Now it chanced one day that an itinerant preacher passed that way, an old hunch-back with a silver tongue, the pride of New England. He would talk, it seemed, about the evils of alcohol. What boy or girl could afford to miss this golden opportunity! In the complete absence of motor cars and moving pictures, joys of the later born, an opportunity like this could not be lightly overlooked.

Nellie's mother was not easily won, but at last gave her consent. Dressed in flowing voiles, Nellie and her friends proceeded to the church. They would sit in the last row, and the boys would sit decorously across. After the service they would meet and discuss the evils of alcohol! Strange thing, circumstance. The church was filled to overflowing. They were led to the front row, and there they sat, viewing in horror the ashes of their plans.

The hunch-back rose and prayed. Then fastening his kindly old eyes upon a youthful face in the first pew he said calmly, “I have changed my mind, I shall not talk about the evils of alcohol. My text will be, ‘Our God is a consuming fire’”.

Nellie forgot her surroundings.

*Mrs. Ellen V. Beecher, universally called “Mother” by the Bahá'ís.

She forgot everything except the words that poured from the old preacher's lips. When the young people in disgust filed out past her, she knew nothing of it. But when a gentle hand was laid upon her shoulder, she looked up in startled amazement to find the church quite empty.

"God has asked you a question, my child," said the old man. "You have the gift of choice. Will you sign a contract with God or with the world?" Then softly, "I will pray for you".

Something had happened to Nellie of the tinsel. It was all shabby. She rose and shook herself like a little dog. Was it rebellion in her young eyes, or possibly the fire of new desires not quite understood? She walked home quietly, and very quietly proceeded into the library of the great, old-fashioned house. Mechanically she called to Mother that she was home. Mechanically she seated herself in the comfortable recesses of the old arm-chair, and began to look at life. We raise our eye-brows tolerantly and smile at youth. Yet Jean Valjean, taking the blessing of a Bishop into such a solitude experienced no greater soul-searching than this. At such a time life turns a corner. Hannibal at nine, kneeling at the altar in Carthage, pledged his undying hatred of Rome, and lived to march victorious across the snowy Alps. Lincoln, the boy, watched for one hour the unmatched brutality of a slave market, and gave to that afflicted race an unwritten promise; and Lincoln, the man, issued the Emancipation Proclamation forever freeing the slaves. The small lad who became our greatest Christian missionary gazed into the pictured eyes of a ragged Hindu boy, and chose in that hour a life of sacrifice in his behalf. We can never quite understand the business of being young, its faith, its courage and its complete honesty.

THUS HAD Nellie come upon the parting of the ways. A new vision possessed the upper chambers of her imagery. Life had purpose, definite and rich in meaning. In the early hours of the morning she knelt beside the old arm chair and gave her life, all, everything she had, to God, knowing full well that it would not be easy. When she arose she said simply, "It is finished, I have signed the contract and I believe that God will guide me. I, for my part, will follow. I am a Christian".

In the morning Nellie fought with the desire to keep her deep and moving experience from her dearly loved mother. She combed her long hair and looked steadily into the mirror. "Afraid", she asked. "No", said the reflection, "only Mother might not understand".

Nellie's mother was beautiful, devout, sincere, respected. Let it not be thought for an instant that she was hard and unsympathetic. She was simply the cultural product of her time.

Nellie, accosting her in the hall said, "Wait, Mother, I have something to tell you".

Mother waited, smiling.

"I gave my life to God last night, and I am a Christian".

Now the old idea of religion was scarcely provocative of expressive comment, but of all the social errors in the category of churchly things, the expression of religious conviction was indeed the most unforgivable. One said (if asked, which was doubtful) "I am trying to be a Christian". But one never said, "I am".

Mother drew herself to her full height, her brown eyes flashing, and allowed her gaze to travel in deliberate scorn from head to foot of her errant daughter. At last she spoke. "It would be far more becoming for you, my daughter, to first learn to control your temper."

At breakfast Nellie was pale and more than ordinarily quiet. After breakfast she became ill with chills and fever, a common ailment in that day of questionable sanitation. Nellie returned to bed and accepted medicinal ministrations with detached meekness. Then, turning abruptly to her mother she said, "I want to see Dr. Dorrence".

Mother looked in consternation at her unruly child. "Surely, she said, "you will not presume to tell the pastor what you have told me!" Unthinkable heresy! But at last he was called.

The doctor seated himself beside Nellie, saying, "What do you want to tell me, my child."

"Doctor," she replied with no hesitation, "I want to tell you that I am a Christian".

The doctor appeared surprised and slightly startled. "What do you mean?" he asked. "None of us can know that."

Nellie looked into his stern old face and smiled. "I know how unworthy I am", she replied, "but God promised me last night that He would guide me, and I promised always to obey."

After a brief silence, Nellie looked up and saw that his eyes were closed, and tears were running down his cheeks. Turning then to her mother, he said, "I have been in this church for fifty years, and in all that time I have not seen such faith as this. She is a Christian."

Looking back with her through years that spanned almost a century, the writer traversed pages streaked with age—pages revealing old secularism, pages redolent with feeling, stalwart pages, quaint, musty, foolish pages, covering years that brought unexplainable changes to the world and to the child, Nellie. The evolution of one soul from childhood to old age during that amazing period is worthy of more than a passing glance. Looking backward at ninety-two, keen of eye and radiant, and with a capacity to love and expand and believe that gripped the heart, she traced her life in its graceful, fearless line back to its beginnings. Youth, suddenly conscious cries, "I am", and life begins.

"Briefly, the journey of the soul is necessary. The pathway of life is the road which leads to divine knowledge and attainment. Without training and guidance the soul could never progress beyond the conditions of its lower nature which is ignorant and defective."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

HOW TO ATTAIN SUCCESS

IN THE world of nature the greatest dominant note is the struggle for existence—the result of which is the survival of the fittest. The law of the survival of the fittest is the origin of all difficulties. It is the cause of war and strife, hatred and animosity between human beings. In the world of nature there is tyranny, egoism, aggression, overbearance, usurpation of the rights of others and other blameworthy attributes which are the defects of the animal world. Therefore, so long as the requirements of the natural world play paramount part among the children of men, success and prosperity are impossible. For the success and prosperity of the human world depend upon the qualities and virtues with which the reality of humanity is adorned; while the exigencies of the natural world work against the realization of this object.

“The nobility and glory of man consist in the fact that, amidst the beings, he is the dawning-place of righteousness. Can any greater blessing be imagined by man than the consciousness that by Divine assistance the means of comfort, peace and prosperity of the human race are in his hands? How noble and excellent is man if he only attain to this state for which he was designed. And how mean and contemptible if he close his eyes to the public weal, and spend his precious capacities on personal and selfish ends. The greatest happiness lies in the happiness of others. He who urges the matchless steed of endeavor on the race-course of justice and civilization alone is capable of comprehending the wonderful signs of the natural and spiritual world.”

WEEP YE NO MORE

Men sought Him in the market and the street,
Some sought with eager eyes, on eager feet,
And some with desolate hearts and patient tears Saying, "He is not here. Oh, nevermore shall we Hear as of old the beautiful tales and sweet
Nor dream those dreams were true. These are the empty years.
Nor shall we hear again the Voice that brake
Upon the peasant ears of Galilee.

Faith has grown old and tired, or has grown afraid.
And we shall never hope that wisdom came
To kneel at the folded quiet feet of a child.
Gone is the faith that once was true. Vain are the creeds."

There came a Voice from the great East, and Spake Crossing the gulf two thousand years had made:—
"Oh, piteous, mutilated, blind and dumb
Bearers of pain—lift your rejoicing eyes,
Weep ye no more! The Comforter hath come!"

“ . . . for commerce, industry, agriculture and general affairs of the country are all intimately linked together. If one of these suffers an abuse, the detriment affects the mass.”—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

ONE ECONOMIC evil which the depression has exposed is the tendency of industrialists and commercialists to seek unlimited expansion in obedience to that urge of insatiable desire which characterizes all humans. Ambition for greater achievement and for continued progress in one's career is normal and wholesome; but the extent to which this ambition has been exploited by the madness of modern desire for wealth and for luxury expenditures has kept the individual in an unwholesome chronic condition of overstrain, of abnormal concentration upon the tasks of the business day, with corresponding loss to the domestic and cultural life of the business man.

“The men in this country,” said a business man who has been exceedingly successful in acquiring material wealth, “are waking up to the fact that they have been giving their lives to providing for their families (who would be much better off without them) four or five bathrooms, endless automobiles, and all the accessories which these things mean; and that there is a vast rich side of life which most men never touch. They are beginning to feel that this struggle is not worth while, and that there is something better, something which makes for far greater happiness than these material things can ever bring.”

THE EVILS of this unwholesome push of ambition are not confined, however, to the individual and social life of the community. This system of ruthless competition, with the aim of unlimited expansion of the individual's business or industry, has in it the seeds of our present economic debacle. For it is mathematically certain that the various business organizations and industries cannot all go on expanding infinitely. The craze for expansion carries in its trail inevitable failures of those who are crowded to the wall by successfully expanding aggregations. And worse even than that, it induces an enormous over-production of goods which in turn brings about an economic crash. There are other causes, it is true, for the present depression; but the habit of unlimited expansion characteristic of America is quite sufficient cause for recurrent cycles of panics. When we view the incredible disasters which a panic causes—the want, the deprivation, the physical and psychological miseries, the pauperization of well-to-do families, the death and suicides from undue strain—we may well conclude that

“the game is not worth the candle.” We must find some way to prevent these recurrent tragedies which we have up to now supinely accepted as acts of destiny, much in the same way as the Chinese have accepted periodic floods and famines.

To ONE who has had the privilege of living intimately both in the Occident and the Orient, the contrast in the psychology expressed in these two great civilizations is most interesting and valuable. In the young and pushing West, we find the development of insatiable wants and the thirst for illimitable expansion. In the East, we find a quietude, a philosophy of living, a contentment with few things, a satisfaction in continuing one's business or one's work up to the level, but not beyond it, of past achievement. I have often stopped in front of Turkish bazaars to admire the business atmosphere, so different from that which prevails in the Occident. The Turk is carrying on a bazaar which is the business his father had before him. He is carrying the business on successfully. But he has not the slightest thought of buying up the bazaars of his neighbors on the right and left, of enlarging his business and ultimately building up a vast emporium. No, there is no such thought in his being. He sits there on the platform surrounded by his rugs and antiques like a king upon his throne. If you wish to inspect his wares he is happy to show them to you. Whether you buy or not, he is most kindly courteous and attentive. One feels that he has not bartered his soul for gold. Though a commercialist he still remains the master of his destiny, superbly philosophical, self-contained and self-respectful.

But, you may say, this attitude of quiescence has kept the East from progressing; whereas the Occidental attitude of advancement and expansion has developed a vast new world.

It is true that expansion has inevitably been the keynote of America up to the present. But we have already expanded until we have reached the further ocean. We have settled and developed our uninhabited lands until we are now raising more agricultural products than we are able to consume. We have built all the railroads and factories that we seem capable of profiting from. And now it would seem that progress has at last reached the point of a less rapid flow, and that the currents of industry and commerce are bound to become more peaceful. Destiny calls for a new economic psychology, one in which the desire for progress—praiseworthy, normal and wholesome though it be—is tempered with the philosophy of contentment. This philosophy of contentment we need sadly for the happiness, welfare and sanity of the individual lives; and need it sadly for our economic organization if we are to establish any stable system of economic and social living.

MOST TRAGIC of all, is the fact that the mad desire for expansion, when it has exhausted the confines of its own country, reaches out for fields of conquest in other parts of the world. Here again there is the mathematical certainty that with many nations each seeking to expand either territorially or economically there are bound to come clashes that will lead to war. The desire for imperialistic expansion is the very root of war. And while there have been ample historic precedents to encourage this natural thirst for expansion since it has proved the means of prosperity and of great achievement to the successful nations, we must also realize that it has entailed untold misery and degradation to the other nations that have become the objects of conquest.

It were idle to declaim against this imperialistic ambition on the ground that it is selfish to seek to bring success to one nation at the cost of other nations, to seek to exploit the rest of the world for one's own people. No! Nations would never stop making war against each other because of such moral arguments. But the trouble with the imperialistic urge today is that there are so many strong and powerful nations capable and perhaps even desirous of expressing imperialism, that with the modern destructive processes of war available what will happen will be not the success of one nation over against another but the complete obliteration of all the nations that take part in war.

Aggressive imperialism which seeks unlimited national expansion is today simply a form of national suicide. We are told by Dr. Gertrud Woker, a specialist in chemistry and head of the Institute of Physico-chemical Biology of the University of Bern, Switzerland, "that one hundred gas-generating airplanes could in one hour cover a city the size of Paris with a gas cloud twenty meters thick, that would annihilate the city's population. She tells of the deadly results of white phosphorous bombs, of the use of bacteria, widely being prepared for, of electric incendiary bombs, or recently invented bombs with time fuses, of the effects on civilians and soldiers alike of the Green Cross, the Blue Cross and the Yellow Cross gases, effects so horrible that even to read of them is sickening, and she quotes a chemical authority as declaring that the chemical industry is now in a position to destroy unlimited areas completely in a very short time."

WHAT REMEDY for ruthless competition can be found, then? What substitute for expansion-desire? What cure for war?

Is it not true that expansion is a biological as well as an economic and political urge? Is it not true that the evolution of commerce and industry as well as of political entities has been in the direction of larger aggregations and combinations? Could we or should we reverse this process? No, deeply desirable as we may be on moral grounds of avoiding the disasters and evils that come to humanity because of the expansion-desire, we must not seek remedies that are totally contrary to human nature and to natural trends and movements of destiny.

There is, however, one mode of expansion which is both ethical and stable, which leaves no trail of evils and misfortunes in its path, which satisfies all concerned, which brings only happiness and prosperity,—namely, voluntary cooperative com- binations for mutual advantage. The most familiar of such combinations known to history is the amalgamation of thirteen separate colonies into the United States of America. This union has produced nothing but good for all concerned; has been the source of universal prosperity and advancement; has brought no evils, no misfortunes in its trail.

In the economic field of today we find a striking example in the Fruit Grower's Association of California. This voluntary combination has improved the quality of fruit grown and marketed; has aided the individual farmer in the marketing of his products; has by means of wide publicity increased markets all over the world for these products; and has been a source of guidance and manifold benefits to the individual participants.

DOES IT NOT seem clear to unprejudiced examination of all the facts above stated that the desire for growth and expansion can find legitimate and happy expression in voluntary combinations? Does it not seem that all that is valuable and harmonious in human ambition can find room for outlet and achievement in such cooperative enterprise? The very genius of the human race will not begin to adequately express itself until the whole world is bound together in some such form of voluntary combination—a World State in which politics and economics are managed with all the capacity of human genius, but for the welfare of the whole rather than for the welfare of the part. Is it not true that in so far as we seek the welfare of the part only, we endanger the welfare not only of that part but also of every part? Whereas on the contrary if the part would but seek the welfare of the Whole, the Whole would establish and stabilize the welfare of each individual part.

“All the infinite beings exist by this law of mutual action and helpfulness. Should this law of joint interchange of forces be removed from the arena of life, existence would be entirely destroyed. . . . The greatest foundation of the world of existence is this cooperation and mutuality. . . . The base of life is mutual aid and helpfulness and the cause of destruction and nonexistence would be the interruption of this mutual assistance. The more the world aspires to civilization the more this most important matter of cooperation and assistance becomes manifest. Therefore in the world of humanity one sees this matter of helpfulness attain to a high degree of efficiency; so much so that the continuance of humanity entirely depends upon this interrelation.”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

THE LABORATORY OF CIVILIZATION

KENNETH CHRISTIAN

The author of this article is a student of journalism at the College of the State of New York. He gives us here an excellent bird's-eye view of the causes of our present economic disaster and of the new economic order established by Bahá'u'lláh now spreading through the world.

WE may say that the world of humanity is a vast laboratory in civilization where new ways of organized living, suited to changing conditions, are worked out carefully before being generally accepted.

The Bahá'í interpretation of civilization is that of a reciprocal duality comprising the material and spiritual aspects of life. The material phase is the sum of all man's inventions and discoveries in the physical realm. Spiritual civilization deals with those high qualities of mind and soul which differentiate man from the animal. For lasting happiness and contentment these two aspects must be equally and harmoniously developed.

THE INDUSTRIAL revolution plus our multifold scientific discoveries have raised the level of humanity so suddenly, have changed the outlook of people so completely, that chaotic conditions follow as a natural course. Wild speculation, ruthless exploitation of natural resources in backward countries, and heartless competition are characteristics of a period dominated by selfishness and greed.

The mechanistic phase of civilization is centuries ahead of the ethical. And humanity, like a bird with one wing developed more than the other, flounders helplessly. Great spiritual strides must be taken to compensate for, and equal, the material advancement.

In this manner Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá interpret world conditions. But they do more than offer a plausible interpretation. They have definitely outlined the spiritual and material advances and adjustments that will straighten out our problems and lay the sure foundations for unparalleled future progress.

The disastrous economic dilemma which is our heritage from the World War was clearly foreseen by Bahá'u'lláh over seventy years ago. At that time He wrote:

"How long will humanity persist in its waywardness? How long will injustice continue? . . . the strife that divides and afflicts the human race is daily increasing. The signs of impending convulsions and chaos can now be discerned, inasmuch as the prevailing order appears to be lamentably defective."

THE ECONOMIC program given to the world by Bahá'u'lláh and expounded by 'Abdu'l-Bahá is a modified capitalistic system. It goes neither to the extremes of communism nor of socialism. Classes in society are recognized since inequality is a law of nature. Private ownership of property and the means of production will continue, but cooperation and control will replace competition. Trusts will be eliminated by a series of regulatory measures.

A reciprocal relationship will be established between employer and employee. A minimum wage must be agreed upon. Also, a definite number of shares in each business must be given to the workers over and above their weekly wages. Fewer hours of work will open to the masses of the people unprecedented opportunities for education and culture.

'Abdu'l-Bahá, speaking in Paris on the question of the distribution of wealth, said:

"Certainly, some being enormously rich and others lamentably poor, an organization is necessary to control and improve this state of affairs. It is important to limit riches as it is also of importance to limit poverty. Either extreme is not good."

Wealth is to be limited by a graduated tax on large incomes with the result that at a certain limit all additional income will go to the government. This is not done to bring about economic equality but to keep money in a constant state of flux. It will be impossible under this system for huge sums of money to be amassed and withheld by selfish individuals.

Agriculture is the basic industry; and the solution of its problems presupposes economic recovery. This will be aided by a decentralized taxation system. All taxes will be paid into a local storehouse from which local, national, and international appropriations will be met. The graduated tax will bring extreme surpluses of wealth into this community center. Those whose income will only meet expenses are free from taxation. Those who cannot meet their daily needs may have them supplied from the storehouse. Instead of a false national or international standard of living, the community will thus set its own standard according to its economic ability.

The local controlling board will prevent lazy and indolent individuals from taking advantage of the resources of this general storehouse. The failure of similar schemes in the past has been due to the application of the principle of supposed equality. The storehouse is a community protection not an indiscriminate source of charity.

Concerning the foundation of true economics, 'Abdu'l-Bahá has written:

"The disease which afflicts the body politic is lack of love and absence of altruism. . . . The secrets of the whole economic question are divine in nature and are concerned with the world of the heart and spirit."

The Roman civilization collapsed when indolence and selfishness replaced the vigorous characteristics of its people. History reveals that civilization has reached its greatest heights under races of strong character and high ideals. A spiritual revival capable of recreating men and women the world over is a prime necessity of our times.

THE FEATURE which is rapidly bringing the Bahá'í teachings to the attention of the world and which is uniting the Bahá'ís of the five continents is the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh. This system of administration based on Bahá'u'lláh's instructions has been inaugurated by Shoghi Effendi since he became the Guardian of the Bahá'í Faith. The individual Bahá'ís in each locality elect annually a local assembly of nine and also send delegates to a national convention. The national convention in turn elects a group of nine who constitute the National Assembly. This Assembly sends delegates to an international convention which selects the International Assembly or Universal

House of Justice of which the Guardian is the permanent head. This body will both enact and enforce legislation in accordance with the exigencies of the times. The form of administration being erected by the Bahá'is for the management of their affairs will be the example to be followed by the governments of the world.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's advice to an official high in the service of the United States government was: "You can best serve your country if you strive, in your capacity as a citizen of the world, to assist in the eventual application of the principle of federalism underlying the government of your country to the relationships now existing between the peoples and nations of the world."

Shoghi Effendi writes:

"Let there be no misgivings as to the animating purpose of the world-wide Law of Bahá'u'lláh. Far from aiming at the subversion of the existing foundations of society, it seeks to broaden its basis, to remould its institutions in a manner consonant with the needs of an everchanging world. It can conflict with no legitimate allegiances, nor can it undermine essential loyalties. . . . It calls for a wider loyalty, for a wider aspiration than any that has animated the human race. . . . It repudiates excessive centralization on one hand, and disclaims all attempts at uniformity on the other. Its watchword is unity in diversity."

Now, HAVING reviewed the fundamental concepts of this Bahá'i experiment, let us consider the conditions under which the Movement is working. We discover that it is not confined to one continent, one race, one class, or one country. It is truly universal, finding adherents from all classes, creeds, and nationalities. It is not exclusively economic, or exclusively religious, or exclusively social; for all these aspects are intermingled in its sweeping vision.

In 1910 Tolstoy foresaw the potency of the Bahá'i Faith when he wrote: "We spend our lives trying to unlock the mystery of the universe, but there was a Turkish Prisoner, Bahá'u'lláh, in 'Akká, Palestine, who had the key.'" From its unobtrusive beginning in Persia, the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh have permeated, in less than a century, all parts of the earth. Nine National Assemblies have been created, and the Universal House of Justice will be formed in the near future.

The translations and printing of the Bahá'i writings have gone forward with great speed. Books are now available in more than sixty languages. The statesmanlike letters of Shoghi Effendi are attracting attention of leaders of the world over. The Bahá'i Temple at Chicago, acclaimed by architects as superior in beauty and design to the famed Taj Mahal, is attracting thousands as its construction proceeds.

Stanwood Cobb, one of the founders of the Progressive Education Association, recently summed up the present progress of this experiment thus:

"The time is rapidly approaching when this new structure based upon divine foundations will give evidence to the world of its power to house the culture of the future. More and more, as men and women despairingly realize the lassitude and effete-ness of present culture modes, will they turn for illumination and inspiration to the new modes being created by the potent message of Bahá'u'lláh to humanity."

So, in the laboratory of humanity, a new era of civilization is taking form.

THE EVOLUTION OF A BAHÁ'Í

Incidents from the Life of Ellen V. Beecher

Chapter 2.—A Working Christian

DOROTHY BAKER

"May you help those sunk in materiality to realize their divine sonship, and encourage them to arise and be worthy of their birthright . . . Work! Work with all your strength, spread the Cause of the Kingdom among men; teach the self-sufficient to turn humbly towards God, the sinful to sin no more. . . ."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

[The incidents narrated in this episode constitute one of the most astounding spiritual adventures ever recorded in the history of Christian mysticism.

In the first installment of this life story of her who became affectionately known to numerous friends as "Mother Beecher", was narrated the great spiritual experience she had in her childhood when she decided not only that she would try to be a Christian but that she was definitely a Christian in the sense that she gave herself unreservedly to God.]

MOTHER BEECHER fastened the little white shawl around her shoulders and seated herself in the old cane chair that had followed her through the years. No one in the house called her "Mother Beecher". She was "Grandma" to all, as befitting one into whose sympathetic ear had been poured by three generations the arduous details of youthful living.

"Grandma", said I, "did your contract with God make you happy?" Perhaps I had a notion, bolstered by a sentimental desire to supply to all young people a short cut to earthly joy, that having made such a decision, one lived happily ever after.

Grandma smiled. "Let not that young man or young woman make decisions however great, who is faint of heart", she said, "for decision draws to itself natural tests."

"Tell me what came out of your decision, Grandma", said I briskly.

"One cannot churn it out like butter," said Grandma with a wry little smile. "There are no words to express the reality of those things. I can only tell—a story."

"Good," said I, settling down on a stool at her feet. "Begin".

"Shortly after my momentous decision that I must give my life to God, we changed our residence and a new chapter in my life opened. My brother, who had been poisoned by the use of calomel during an attack of typhoid fever, had to be placed in the sanitarium of the famous Dr. Foster of Clifton Springs, N. Y. Dr. Foster was widely known, not alone for his medical knowledge, but for his extraordinary benevolence. It is to this lovable and forceful character that much credit may be given for the shaping of my life, so newly started on the high seas of Christian endeavor. Here, in this famous little village, we lived for six years.

"Soon after our arrival I was sent one day to report to the doctor on the condition of the patient. After a brief exchange of words I rose to go.

"'I understand,' said the doctor, following me to the door, 'that you are a young Christian.' To this I gave assent.

"'What kind of a Christian do you propose to be?' he asked suddenly.

"This took me by surprise, but I managed to stammer that I hoped to be a faithful one.

" 'I have no doubt of it,' said the doctor, 'but I should like to know whether you propose to be just a good church member or a working Christian.'

"This was a new idea. I toyed with it for a moment before replying. Then I realized with a rush that he had touched upon my heart's desire.

" 'Yes,' I cried. 'I want to be a working Christian.'

" 'Very well,' he replied with a smile. 'I will help you to become one. First you must learn to depend entirely upon the guidance of the Holy Spirit working within you.'

"I walked slowly home, turning his words over in my mind. His remark impressed me deeply. Conscience, the great umpire of the game of living, said, 'This is right,' or 'That is wrong.' Was that not enough? Life might become involved. The Holy Spirit might demand of one things inconveniently removed from the common groove. Moreover, it troubled me deeply to know how to find such guidance and recognize it. At last I sought him out again.

" 'Doctor,' said I, 'how can I hear the voice of the Holy Spirit?'

" 'By turning your heart always away from self and toward God,' he said gently, 'and by never closing a door that He has opened.'

" 'Life guided by a vision! What high destiny was this. 'What would you do', he asked abruptly, 'if a very wicked dying man asked you to pray with him, and your heart told you to do so?'

"After a terrific struggle within my young New England trained soul, I made reply.

" 'I would go'.

"MONTHS passed. One Sunday morning as I sat surrounded by my Sunday School class, the superintendent approached me, looking troubled, even pained. Bending low, he whispered, 'A dirty, ragged child outside insists upon seeing you. I'll take your class while you send her away'.

"At the door stood a child so forlorn and unkempt that I caught my breath.

" 'My pop's a-dyin' and he wants to see you', she sobbed.

"Without a word I took the dirty little hand and sped through the deserted village streets. Well I remembered the father, the town drunkard who 'hadn't drawn a sober breath for over twenty years'. Well I knew the impropriety of the thing that I was doing. By every standard I had ever been taught, the thing was unthinkable. For a fleeting moment my mother's lovely face flashed before me.

"We found him at last, lying on a pile of dirty rags in a hovel outside the confines of the village, looking with pathetic eagerness at the door. The stench and filth unsteadied me. This was living, too, then! I knelt beside him, taking his hard hand in mine. Though I had never witnessed the passing of a human soul, I knew that death was upon him.

" 'Has your priest been here?' I asked. He shook his head.

" 'Why did you not send for him?' I asked, feeling greatly troubled.

“I sent for you because you are the only one who has smiled at me in twenty years’, he whispered. ‘I’ve been pretty bad, but if you ask God to forgive me, I know He will’.

“Still holding his cold hand, I asked God to call him home to the mansions Christ had promised to those who believe. When I looked again he was gone, and I was conscious not so much of death as of peace”.

“How wonderful, Grandma,” said I when she had finished. “It was really a birth rather than a death, wasn’t it? Do you suppose that Dr. Foster sensed the whole affair intuitively and prepared you for it?”

“Not necessarily”, she thoughtfully replied, “though I feel very sure that he sought and found constantly the guidance which he taught me to follow.

“Sometimes he was a bit sudden,” she continued with a laugh. “One particular Sunday morning comes back to my mind as if it were yesterday. We were seated around the breakfast table; my mother, my younger brother and sister, two visiting New England cousins of my mother’s, and I. Suddenly Dr. Foster appeared without warning in the doorway. Walking straight toward my chair, he said, ‘Take your Bible and go to the Caldwell house. Tell them what the Lord has done for you, and pray with them’. So saying he turned, and without further ado, walked out as he had come, gently closing the door behind him.

“Now the Caldwell house, almost directly across the street from our home, was a fine old residence which had some time before been bought by the man Caldwell and turned into a veritable den of iniquity. For numerous reasons, the people of Clifton Springs had failed in their efforts to abolish it, and it remained their one menace to young manhood.

“To say that consternation took possession of our dining room following the departure of the kindly doctor would be putting it all too mildly. My mother promptly had hysterics. Bursting into tears, she walked the floor in a most agitated manner.

“‘He has grossly insulted me,’ she cried, ‘by commanding my little girl to go into a place like that! How could he? Oh, how could he?’

“In vain the cousins sought to calm her. Said one, ‘I cannot see why you allow yourself to become so disturbed. You know the child isn’t going.’ Said the other, ‘She hasn’t taken leave of her senses, you know!’

“I left them after that, and slipped away upstairs. No one in all the hub-bub had directed so much as a word or look at me. I felt like an idea in a book, about which a great many people were suddenly arguing. One would hardly consult with an idea, you know. Closing the door of my room, I hastened to the side of my bed and knelt down.

“‘You promised to guide me’, I said softly, ‘and I don’t know what to do. The Bible says that we must honor our parents. Surely it would not be right to deliberately disobey my beloved mother. What shall I do?’

“The answer did not come immediately, but when it did, I became aware of a definite assurance, as positive as if a voice had spoken, saying, 'Take your Bible in your hand and go down. Pass through the room in which your mother is sitting. If even a word is spoken to detain you, do not go. If no word is spoken, go quietly out of the house, speaking to no one on the way'.

"This I did. As I approached the front parlor, the murmur of voices ceased. I walked slowly through the room, saying no word and hearing none. The silence, in fact, was as thick as a fog hanging over us all. I went out, feeling strangely unreal, and crossed the street. As the Caldwell gate clicked behind me, however, I became real enough; so real, in fact, that my knees shook violently and I swallowed hard.

"The old fashioned knocker resounded and echoed. It did not help the quaking of my limbs. And when I heard heavy footsteps coming through an uncarpeted hall, I thought I could not stand. The top half of the old oak door swung open a few inches, held by a chain. A bewhiskered face peered out.

"What do you want?" asked the face. To my horror, the eyes traveled from my head to my feet and back again, with a kind of rolling leer.

"I have come to tell you a beautiful story", said I. An amazed silence greeted this, after which the lower half of the door opened and the chain was removed from the upper. The man seemed only half as dreadful when seen full length, and I allowed myself to look past him into the cavernous depths of the dark old house. He led me to the parlor, a musty, closed-off room which presumably had not been used since the last funeral. Motioning me to a stiff, uncomfortable chair, he stood in evident embarrassment before me.

"May I see your family, too?" I asked with growing assurance. He appeared to be somewhat surprised at this, but departed without a word into the cavernous hall again. I heard him shuffling about. Then in a muffled roar, 'Mom, come in here. Somebody t' see you'.

"Mom appeared, followed by a youth and two unkempt girls of uncertain ages. They arranged themselves about the room in stiff silence. When they were all assembled, I began my story quite fearlessly, saying that God had made me very happy. After telling the story of my conversion, I read to them from the Bible, explaining the verses with an ease quite beyond my ken, and dwelling always on the wonderful love of God in sending a Saviour to the world. Then I asked if I might pray with them. To this Mr. Caldwell laconically responded that he supposed I could if I wanted to. Kneeling down in their midst, I uttered a simple prayer, asking God to make them as happy as He had made me. When I had finished, I saw that they were deeply moved, though no one spoke a word. After shaking hands with each one, I quietly slipped away.

"Not long after this, I met Mr. Caldwell on the main street of the village. He was shy but determined. Stepping forward and touching my arm, he looked earnestly into my eyes.

"Miss Tuller", he said, 'would you be ashamed to talk with me a moment?'

"'No indeed', said I, trying to speak reassuringly.

"'I was just wondering', he continued, 'whether you would teach my wife and me to pray. We'd like to do it the way you do'.

"'A rush of joy swept through me. 'Yes', I replied, 'I should love to pray with you'.

"'May we come to your house some Sunday?' he asked eagerly.

"'Certainly', said I, 'but come after Sunday School hours'.

"'I must say that at the time I had many misgivings about my mother's reception of my strange guests, but as the week was a busy one, all mention of it was forgotten. Sunday afternoon came, and as usual we seated ourselves by the big bay window in the parlor.

"'Why, Nellie', said Mother, looking out with some curiosity, 'do look at that strange procession of people coming up the street! Perhaps it is a funeral. There must be forty people walking in this direction'.

"'Now funerals of those days were conducted for the most part without carriages, and as I gazed in horror at the straggling band of on-comers, I was struck at one and the same time with a sense of the ridiculous, for it did have the semblance of a funeral. I held my breath.

"'There seems to be no coffin, Nellie', continued Mother, 'nor any pall-bearers. Why—why Nellie, they are turning in here!'

"'Oh Mother', I gasped, 'I forgot to tell you that Mr. Caldwell and his wife are coming to learn how to pray'. Then, a bit faintly,

'They seem to be bringing a few friends'.

"'Mother rose, her eyes flashing. She left the room and started up the winding old stairs. At the landing she turned. 'The rag-tag of the town', she said. 'I wash my hands completely of such goings-on. You will be the death of me yet, my child!' With this last despairing remark, she swept out of sight. Nor did she reappear that afternoon, nor on any Sunday afternoon for six weeks thereafter.

"'I went to the door and opened it to the wide-eyed, silent company. Mr. Caldwell was wreathed in smiles, and acted as a sort of major general, ushering his friends to chairs, cushions and available places on the floor. When all were seated, I opened the Scriptures and read, telling them quite simply what I felt it meant to be a Christian.

"'Now', I concluded, 'we shall all kneel down and just ask God for what we most want. All Christians must first learn to talk with God and listen for His answer. And this we call prayer.

"'The experience will never be forgotten, for their prayers were quite shocking. In their childlike simplicity they appealed to God as if He were a neighbor, and their requests were pitifully mundane. However, the meeting over, each one arose feeling highly pleased with himself and the Almighty. As they prepared to leave, Mr. Caldwell turned smilingly to me.

"'And may we come again next Sunday?' he asked.

"'Certainly', said I without hesitation. And so it happened that they came every Sunday for six weeks and I was led to turn it into a Bible study class. Mr. Caldwell, at about this time, closed his house of ill fame and opened a grocery store.

“And now the Methodist pastor opened a series of prayer meetings to all denominations, and it was observed by the amazed population of Clifton Springs that Mr. Caldwell and his friends not only attended the meetings, but joined the church.

“Toward the close of these meetings the pastor asked for personal confessions of faith. Mr. Caldwell arose and walked deliberately to the front of the church. Then clearly and distinctly, though without emotional display, he told the story of how a young girl had dared to come to him and to his family, to bring to them the secret of her great joy, the joy that had in turn changed their lives.”

“The spirit became so intense that a revival sprang up in that place, and spread through the surrounding country, becoming at last almost national in character. It is impossible for the Holy Spirit to work in a human heart without having a far-reaching effect, for it is like a great fever, magnificently contagious”.

I THOUGHT, as she finished speaking, of our littleness in the scheme of things. Left to themselves, our lives reflect only futility. Yet God denies to no one that eternal spark, the river of life more abundant, that is a living, breathing force, and makes it, even to the unworthy, “magnificently contagious”.

“Dear Grandma”, said I, taking her wrinkled old hand in mine, “you have spent your long life in spreading that contagion. Are you tired?”

“I am ninety-two,” she said simply, “and I am a little tired. But I am happy.”

THE UNSEEN ASSASSINS

MARGUERITE MCKAY

IN *The Unseen Assassins, Norman Angell discusses certain conclusions he has reached concerning the relation of education to public opinion and of public opinion to international relations from both the political angle and the economic. The first part of the book sets forth a few theories which part two, “A Book of Cases,” applies to specific instances, chiefly within the British Empire and the continent of Europe. From first to last the author dwells on his fundamental thesis, that the evils of our civilization are due not to the deliberate intention of man or to lack of knowledge, but to their failure to apply the well-known facts of everyday life to social relationships, especially in the field of international relations. “We disregard knowledge which we possess, though we are unaware of that disregard.”

The average man advocates policies that bring results he does not really wish, simply because he does not bring his own experience to apply in larger fields; and these unperceived implications Angell calls the "Unseen Assassins of our peace and welfare." He believes in the first place that the opinion of the ordinary man, however created and played upon by powerful interests, when once created generally determines public policy; in the second place, that education can do no good by giving more knowledge but only by teaching the social truths that underlie experience; in the third place that it is possible to change what may seem to be instinctive reactions, as instanced by changing attitudes in such matters as savage taboos, witchcraft and religious fanaticism. The purpose of the book is to help the ordinary man to see just where one of the "intellectual assassins" has crept into some generally accepted principle or policy.

A striking example of failure to apply known experience to new problems lies in the field of international relations. In his simple community life, John Smith expects to have a police force responsible to the community at large to keep order and maintain justice between individuals; he expects that in addition to the need of courts for criminal cases, courts are also needed for civil cases where differences of opinion will be settled by a third party and the judgment accepted; he knows that government is necessary to regulate daily life, because man's primitive instinct of pugnacity and the tendency to differences of opinion make it impossible for a group of human beings to get along together without regulations, especially in large communities. All this applies to local and national groups without question.

But when it comes to international relations, the average citizen suddenly throws overboard all his personal experience in government and says that community regulation stops at that point. In the international field he adopts the principle of anarchy, though his commonsense should tell him that since anarchy will not work on a small scale nor on a national scale, it cannot be expected to work as between nations. He has not learned from his education that all societies must have an organization through which to function, and this Angell calls the "sovereign assassin." Some say that it is useless to expect peace because it is inherent in human nature to fight, but still no one suggests giving up police and the safeguards of community life because people are quarrelsome. The fact of man's antisocial instincts is a reason in favor of organizing social institutions to preserve peace, not a reason against it. If people were naturally peaceful and considerate of others' rights and points of view, anarchy might serve in place of government, but since they are not, institutions are necessary.

THE CONCEPT of nationalism, with its strong attendant sentiment, and the principle of the sovereignty of nations, that makes for international anarchy, are due, so says Angell, not to any inborn tendency of the mass of ordinary people to evolve such ideas, but to the education given by the philosophers, teachers, historians and poets. If this were a biological trait, change would be very slow and perhaps doubtful, but since it is rather an intellectual concept, there is great hope that it may change. For while, for example, it is true that men have a biological tendency to fight, it is also true that what they fight about changes considerably from one period to another.

Another self-evident truth that men overlook in international affairs is the nature of justice. It is realized in private life that there are honest differences of opinion between individuals and that a third party judgment is the fairest to all concerned. Why not in international relations? We must come to look on justice as a means of insuring equality of right for both parties, not merely as a means of protecting the rights of one side only. When it comes to international conflict, the idea that we should fight for our "rights" and impose our own interpretation of our rights on another country means that justice is disregarded.

The greatest obstacle to international cooperation Angell sees to be the desire for power and the preference for a position where one country can impose its will upon another instead of forming a partnership. This he thinks is due to the fact that the older and more primitive instincts are assets in a struggle to dominate but have to be restrained when men cooperate. In cooperation we must consider the point of view of the other party and this requires thinking, which is biologically our most recently acquired trait. We are not yet used to thinking and dislike the doubts that thought brings, but through thought and perhaps particularly through consideration of the economic futility of war, we may finally turn to other motives besides the desire to dominate, and develop a new political tradition.

IN THE second part of the book Angell discusses the dangers of the spread of the principle of self-determination for nationalities, the sense of conflict of interest created by tariffs, the disintegrating effect of rampant nationalism, the blindness of the policy that prefers separatism and poverty to unity and an adequate supply of the necessities of life. In taking up the relation of India to Great Britain, the present tendencies in Germany, the increasing of armaments and tariff barriers, the attitude towards peace conferences, the League of Nations and the Briand-Kellogg Pact, he shows again and again the application of his underlying theme, that we do have access to the knowledge of common experience that, if applied, would obviate our international difficulties.

THE FOREGOING discussion leaves untouched many points worth noting; the book is full of penetrating comments on the fallacies that provoke national animosity and competition and these subjects must be emphasized again and again if a healthy international attitude is to prevail. However, though the book deals with basic principles, it leaves one feeling that it does not go as deep as possible and does not point the way to a power strong enough to accomplish the desired end. As is so often the case, the difficulties are presented much more clearly than the remedy. It is rather in such a work as Shoghi Effendi's, "The Goal of a New World Order," that one finds a really satisfying and complete exposition of the solution of nationalism and imperialism by world federation. The principle of the Oneness of Mankind, the fundamental teaching of Bahá'u'lláh, provides, both in its Divine origin and in its applicability to every phase of personal, national and international life, the real answer to all the problems set forth in The Unseen Assassins. It gives both the touchstone with which to test all policies and the spiritual basis that leads to action and in short is the deeper synthesis that with all his thoughtfulness, Angell does not perceive.

MEMORIALS OF THE FAITHFUL

2.—Shaykh Salmán

‘ABDU’L-BAHA

Translated from the Persian by Marzieh Nabil Carpenter

This series of brief biographies of the leading followers of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh was composed by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in 1915 and published in Haifa in 1924 in Persian. These translations into English have been made by the request of Shoghi Effendí. The aim has been to render them into colloquial English rather than to follow a literary translation. This work was done specially for The Bahá'í Magazine. The translator states that she does not consider these translations final.

SHAYKH SALMAN, the devoted messenger, heard the call of God in India in 1266, A. H.,* and was made unutterably happy. He was so bewitched that he hurried out of India on foot and went to Tihrán . . . where he secretly associated with the believers and became one of them. Then one day when he was walking through the bazaars with Aqá Muhammad-Taqi-y-i-Káshání, some policemen followed him and found out where he lived. The next day watchmen and policemen came to look for him and finally succeeded in arresting him; they took him to the town constable, who asked him who he was. Salman answered:

“I am an Indian and have come to Tihrán on my way to Khurásán, as a pilgrim to the shrine of His Holiness Imám Ridá, upon whom be peace.”

The constable asked: “What were you doing yesterday with that man in the white coat?”

He answered, “I had sold him an ‘abá the day before and I was asking for payment.”

The constable said: “What a strange fellow you are! How could you trust him?”

He answered, “The money-changer vouched for him”.

By this he meant Jináb-i-Áqá Muhammad, known as the money-changer. The constable ordered a policeman to go to the money-changer’s with Salmán and investigate. When they got there the policeman went in ahead, and asked what was the story of the ‘abá and the guarantee; the money-changer said he knew nothing about it. The policeman said to Salmán:

“Come along—we’ve found out that you’re a Bábi.”

SHAYKH SALMAN was wearing a turban like those worn in Shushtar. As they passed by a cross-roads, a man from Shushtar ran out of his shop, threw his arms around Salmán and cried, "Why Khájih Muhammad-'Ali! Where have you been? When did you get here? Welcome!"

Salmán answered, "I came here a few days ago and I have just been arrested."

The man said to the policeman, "What do you want with him? Leave him alone."

The policeman answered: "He is a Bábi."

The man from Shushtar said, "Heaven forbid! I know this Khájih Muhammad-'Ali—he is a God-fearing Muhammadan, a good Shi'ih of 'Ali."

Then he gave the policeman some money and Salmán was freed. They went into the shop and the man asked him how he was. He replied, "I am not Khájih Muhammad-'Ali."

The shopkeeper was amazed and said, "Good heavens! You look exactly like him, without any difference whatever. Now that you aren't he, give me back the sum I gave the policeman." Salmán immediately gave him the money, went out to the city gate and left for India.

Later when Bahá'u'lláh went to Baghdád, the first messenger to reach His presence was this same man, who then returned to India with a tablet for the friends there.

EVERY YEAR this worthy individual would come on foot to Bahá'u'lláh, and would return with tablets which he delivered to many cities throughout Persia, such as Isfáhán, Shiráz, Káshán, and Tih-rán. From the year 69 A. H., till the days of Bahá'u'lláh's ascension in 1309 A. H., Salmán would come; he would bring letters, take tablets back, and deliver each one safely to its owner.

Eager and happy, he made the journeys on foot during that long period, from Persia to Iráq or Adrianople or the Greatest Prison¹ and back again.

He had an extraordinary power of endurance; he would walk the whole way, and usually his only food was onions and bread. During the entire period he moved so fast that he was never held up; he never lost a letter or a tablet; every letter was delivered; every tablet reached its destination. Although time and again in Isfáhán he was troubled and weary, he was always thankful. Nonbelievers gave him the title of "The Bábi's Angel Gabriel."

Salmán rendered an important service to the Cause of God his whole life long, because he spread the teachings, gladdened the friends, and brought messages from Bahá'u'lláh to cities and villages of Persia every year. He was favored in Bahá'u'lláh's presence and received especial bounty; tablets were revealed in his name. After the ascension of Bahá'u'lláh he stayed firm in the Covenant, and exerted every effort to serve the Cause; as before he would come to the Greatest Prison every year with letters from the friends, and then would take the answers back to Persia. At last in Shiráz he rose into the All-glorious Kingdom.

From the dawn of history until this day, there never was such a trustworthy messenger.

ELEGY

FLORENCE E. PINCHON

"What is poetry? It is a symmetrical collection of words. . . . Poetry is much more effective and complete than prose. It stirs more deeply, for it is of a finer composition."
—Abdu'l-Bahá.

IAR from the madding crowd"—the clamor, heat and rush of a great modern metropolis—one has been transported within an hour to this peaceful corner of old-world England, and into the tranquil atmosphere of the long-past centuries which enfolds this little grey church, enshrined in its garden of roses and remembrance.

One enters through the quaint lich-gate, and approaches the sanctuary along a trim pathway, bordered by velvet turf and adorned with a wealth of roses, just now in all their glory of color and fragrance. A perfumed rosary indeed for those who lie sleeping so well beneath the grassy mounds! And—with due respects to the author of the Rubaiyat—although, perhaps, no "lovely heads" rest here, or "buried Caesar bled", these rich red roses bloom, and their petals fall none the less tenderly over the humble peasant women and the rude tillers of the neighboring fields.

It is to this quiet and intimate spot that visitors come from all over the world, and especially from the United States. For here also sleep the two sons of America's revered Quaker Father—William Penn—the Founder of the province of Pennsylvania; also, an English poet, known wherever our tongue is spoken or literature read, and who, linked by his "Elegy" to this little churchyard, has thereby made its name, and his own, immortal.

Thomas Gray, like Him who made friends of fishermen, knew and understood the lowly. With the insight of poetic genius, he could feel what poverty imposed upon men—its frustrations, wasted sweetnesss, undeveloped latent abilities, its "mute inglorious Miltons."

One imagines how gladly he would have listened to that great Lover of the poor Who said: "The poor in your midst are My trust; guard ye My trust, and busy not yourselves wholly with your ease."* For in his verse the poet has portrayed these human flowers "born to blush unseen" with so tender and familiar a touch, that time has only enhanced its beauty and literary judgment has pronounced it one of its purest gems. In fact, its charm made such an appeal to a certain professor of the University of Tokyo that he has recently translated all Gray's writings into Japanese. For poetry, like beautiful music, can make the whole world kin binding with spiritual chains of delicate harmonies and chords of deep, common emotions all the varied families of mankind.

ONE WONDERS if this ancient tree, facing the fourteenth century timber porch, remembers the slight figure that once sat in lonely contemplation beneath its shade; or recalls the devoted mother who sometimes came with her son to worship in the cool, red-tiled church, and between whom there existed a mutual affection probably unsurpassed in the records of famous men. For it is, of course, to the unrecognized heroism of women like Gray's mother, that men so often owe their greatness of character or their chances of achievement.

The evening, itself, is a poem for all who can read. A tender darkling sky with rose-lit clouds; a sense of indescribable peace descending upon the spirit. The moon, a golden disk, peeps between the elm-trees, gilds the sombre yews, and falls with shining feet upon the grass, its dear, friendly face piercing one with a moment of poignant remembrance for all those whom one has "loved long since, and lost awhile."

AND THERE, across the park, one catches a glimpse of the memorial raised to the poet of this old world by the pioneering sons of the new. While yonder in the noisy city, at this very hour, the fellow-countrymen of both anxiously wrestle with the tangled problems of two continents, and seek to discover a common pathway to the sanctuary of peace and safety for all.

Alas! though it may be the lot of the delegates to the World Economic Conference to "read their history in a nation's eyes"—in spite of all their efforts, they have not yet found the secret of how to "scatter plenty o'er a smiling land," or even the solvent for that cruel paradox of the age—an earth of lavish abundance, the greater part of whose inhabitants suffer in hopeless restriction or actual want.

Maybe, if these baffled representatives of the nations could bring their pilgrim burdens of finance and currencies, tariffs and conflicting national policies to some such "cool sequestered vale" as this—they might be able to stand so still that they could hear the voice of God's Messenger speaking to them, at evening, in the garden, saying, "This is the way—walk ye in it!" Then might they realize, beyond a shadow of doubt, that no sea of separation could forever flow between two great nations who shared so ancient and spiritual a heritage; and with clearer vision perceive that the whole world is hastening onward to an inevitable hour of reunion and ordered cooperation.

THE TEMPLE OF LIGHT

As reported in current magazine and newspaper articles.

IT IS noteworthy that at a time when the building industry is virtually at a standstill, two construction projects of first rate importance are going forward in Wilmette. One is the waterworks, the cost of which is to be defrayed from water revenues. The other is the Bahá'í temple, financed through freewill offerings of adherents of that faith in every country on the globe. The former of major local interest, the latter of a broader influence that embraces the entire western world. One designed to surpass in appearance and mechanical appointments any similar plant in the Chicago metropolitan area, the other to achieve in the grandeur of its setting, the originality of its design, its sublime beauty, its symbolism and spiritual interpretations one of the structure marvels of all time.

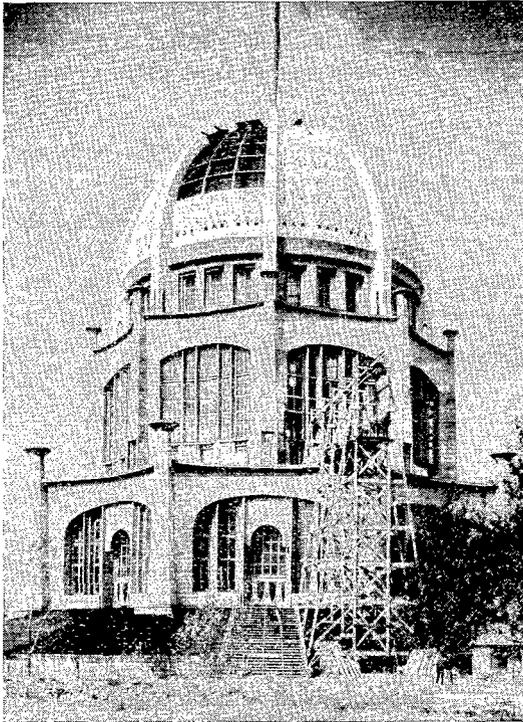

If one imagines that in driving by the Bahá'í temple and viewing it from the windows of a moving automobile he has really seen that imposing creation in steel and stone and concrete, one glimpse of the inside will demonstrate his error. For the exterior gives but a faint conception of the marvelous beauty and thrilling immensity that the interior reveals—an interior in which the mystic arts of the orient have been superbly joined with the structural skill of the occident.

Although interpretative of a religious principle as old as religion itself, it is ultra-modern in all its architectural details, bringing into effective and pleasing harmony an exemplification of the golden rule with today's practical necessities in heating, lighting and ventilating. Every feature of construction and equipment represents the most advanced scientific thought of our time. A point in illustration is the lighting effects. The architect's conception called for a particular kind of light—light that would approach, as nearly as possible, natural sunlight, and yet possess a peculiar quality conducive to spiritual uplift. It was found that no such lamp existed. Therefore

The Dome of the Bahá'í Temple As It Nears Completion

the largest electric company in America was commissioned to produce it. It is interesting to note that the exact light desired has been discovered, and efforts are now being directed toward developing the lamp to a point where it will be economically usable.

Everything about this structure, which is to be the shrine of all followers of the Bahá'í faith on the western hemisphere, is so entrancing in its appeal to the finer sensibilities and to that love for the artistic that is inherent in every nature that no words of ours can adequately portray it. We suggest that a pilgrimage to this house of universal worship while it is in process of erection will aid to a more complete enjoyment of its beauties when completed. — Wilmette Life.

ON THE Michigan Lake Shore near Chicago is being erected, not as a part of the great Century of Progress Exposition but for all time, a building dedicated to worship, unique in design and purpose — the Bahá'í Temple designed by a French architect now deceased, Louis Bourgeois. It is called a "Temple of Light" and is so constructed that the light from within will always be seen from without. It is nine-sided, two stories in height, surmounted by a great dome with clere-story windows. As this building ascends gradually from the base the dome becomes a part of the structure, as though the whole were but an elongation of a single theme. In style it has no relation to the past, no prototype. It is not Roman or Moorish; it does not savor of the Far East or of the West; it is modern and yet closely linked to the past.

In the building itself and in the ornamental concrete for the dome there is a vast amount of symbolism, but to the average onlooker it will be the beauty of the work rather than the symbolism that appeals. The whole surface of this great dome will be covered, when completed, by open-work designs in concrete having the appearance of stone in a lace-like pattern, through the openings of which will shine forth the interior light.

The engineer of this building—and such buildings are to a great extent engineering feats—is Mr. McDaniel.—Leila Mechlin, Washington (D. C.) Sunday Star.

TWELVE years ago, last August, two gentlemen came to my studio in Washington. They came unexpectedly and they brought with them only the photograph of a plaster model. They had been sent by a mutual friend, an engineer, deeply interested in the work being done with concrete by this studio, who suggested that we might offer a solution for their problem. One of these gentlemen was Mr. Louis Bourgeois, an architect, and the most unusual personality I have met in that profession. The other was Mr. Ashton, his friend, and the photograph which they brought was of a Temple, the most exotically beautiful building I have ever seen. It came up out of the earth like the sprout of some great plant bursting out to life and growth.

Mr. Bourgeois explained that he was the architect of the building and a member of the Bahá'í Faith who believe themselves to be the children of a new era, who believe that they have received a new Manifestation. It soon became clear that this Temple was the dream of Mr. Bourgeois' life, that all his hopes and ambitions were centered in it, and that he believed himself to have been inspired to design a temple unlike any other in the world, so that it might be the symbol of a new religion in a new age. At that moment he was anxiously seeking a material with which to build it and someone with the ability to understand his work and the skill to execute it. He left with me the photograph, after autographing it. I have it still. It marks the beginning of the project for me.

In the time which intervened between this meeting and the death of Mr. Bourgeois about two years ago, there developed between us an interesting and instructive friendship. We studied this temple with all its ramifications of form, of treatment and of meaning as a preparation for the time when work on it would be begun. . . . A temple of light with a great pierced dome through which by day the sunlight would stream to enlighten all within and through which by night the Temple light would shine out into a darkened world. . . . Great curves intertwining in wierd perspective. Ovals, circles, and vesicas in endless variety twisted and woven into some great cosmic fabric. This is the theme of the dome, the courses of the stars woven into a fabric. But this is not all, interwoven with the courses of the stars in the pattern of the dome are the tendrils of living things, leaves, and flowers, because no symbol of creation would be complete without a symbol of life. Lifted above the dome are nine great ribs, nine aspirations that mount higher than the courses of the stars. I wonder after all if it was strange that we of the studio should have given so much thought to this project?—John J. Earley, Journal of the American Concrete Institute.

THE TRUE SOVEREIGN

ALFRED E. LUNT

Herein is the concluding part of this remarkable series in which the author has so appealingly treated the subject of accepting and obeying the True Sovereign. The series began in the May number.

WE return, in conclusion, to our underlying proposition. We, you the reader, and I, have analyzed together the controlling factor that has operated to turn man's gaze to the counterfeit sovereignty rather than to the reality. It is impossible that one turn his face steadfastly to one orb and at the same time have any real knowledge of another. If we persist in gazing at the candle, we can never know or appreciate the sun. In fact, we come to doubt there is any sun.

Similarly, the worship of an idol precludes a comprehension of the true object of worship. There is no escape from the conclusion that surrender to the inferior sovereignty has plunged mankind into grave doubt of the actual existence of God. This unbelief is instanced by the attitude of countless millions who have drifted from the churches, and by those likewise countless millions who have never affiliated themselves with any form of religious worship whatever. We are referring here to all the nations and races of men. Among these are many upright-living men and women, in whose hearts are the germs of faith in the existence of God, but who are deprived of that conscious certainty of the fact that is so sorely needed when calamities appear in the daily life.

Without this certainty, the buffetings and disappointments of life take a terrible toll,—for this conscious knowledge of the imminent

Presence and Love of God is the only solvent of human suffering, when the great tests rear themselves in the individual life. For these, the spurious remedies of nature are as “sounding brass and tinkling cymbal”. Only a knowledge of the Divine Physician and His unailing medicine can allay the pain of the heart and restore the vision, at such times.

This knowledge, which is conscious and definite, is the outgrowth of an awakening of the capacity within, the highest capacity we possess, to know God. And this awakening is, in turn, dependent upon the revivification of the heart and soul by acquiring understanding of the shining reality of the Lord of the Age, the Messenger and Manifestation of that secluded Essence, Who has ever caused “luminous Gems of Holiness to appear out of the realm of the spirit, in the noble form of the human temple, and be made manifest unto all men—that they may impart unto the world the mysteries of the unchangeable Being, and tell of the subtleties of His imperishable Essence. These sanctified Mirrors, these Day-springs of ancient glory are one and all the Exponents on earth of Him Who is the central Orb of the universe, its Essence and ultimate Purpose.”¹

It is the knowledge and acceptance of this greatest of life's mysteries that constitutes true belief; that arms mankind with the power of the Divine Realm; that reveals the ineptitude and illusion of nature's forces; that brings forth the hidden, human reality from its strong prison and clothes it with power to control and spiritually enrich the individual life, and to serve humanity; that confers happiness, order and equilibrium upon human society; and unfurls the victorious standard of Universal Peace.

¹Bahá'u'lláh, The Book of Certitude, p. 99.

For this reestablishment of the essential relation between the Primal Reality and the reality of the human spirit unlocks the flood-gates of Divine Love into the human world. This flood cannot flow except to its counterpart, which is the conscious, active human reality. It has nothing to do with the vagaries and illusions of that outward personality that is enmeshed in the natural spider-web. For Love, the Royal Falcon, as was quoted, "preys not upon the dead mouse."

Can it be doubted that this all-healing flood is, today more than in any other day, the greatest need of our race? Every economic and social upheaval we are now witnessing depends upon this Love for its adjustment. Man's relation to man is the supreme problem of the hour. How will it be solved? We have exhausted the resources of the natural law to curb this threatened destruction. And we have almost come to realize that even the human brain, unguided and unilluminated by the Divine Torch, must confess defeat, in the face of the gathering darkness of this mysterious and unaccountable array of baffling elements that stubbornly resist our best meant efforts. May it not be that this hour is an hour of destiny for mankind that will not relent, unless and until the lesson it carries in its brooding wings strikes home to our hearts, and is humbly and fully accepted through the creation of a new consciousness of our relation to one another?

This consciousness will be the offspring, the fruit of the Love of God, which is the universal solvent. How sorely, how desperately, the world, whether consciously or unconsciously, is reaching out to that bright visitant from on high. For He comes—"with healing in His wings", and is in truth the real Physician for our ills. We have, too long, submitted to the unskilled ministrations of pretended physicians, "blind leaders of the blind," whose vision of the cause and the remedy is veiled beneath the thick covering of superstitions and fancies; whose self-centered, ambitious leadership has colored the pure water of reality into an unrecognizable substance.

IF, THEN, the state of "forgetfulness of God" is evidenced and proved by the existence of a widespread doubt concerning the fact of His Being, it becomes increasingly plain that the greatest task of mankind is the investigation of reality. For the reality exists and with it the capacity to uncover it. The revelation of the reality has been consummated in an age fitted to its reception. The theme of this article, throughout, is that this reality, and its understanding, is contingent, so far as the human race is concerned, upon seeking, finding and recognizing, with genuine fealty, the True Sovereign of the nations. To recognize Him is to open the doors of the Realm of Might and Power to the outpourings of inconceivable blessings to our race.

The impotent sovereign we have hitherto obeyed, in whose service we have consumed both body and soul, possesses no eternal gifts for us, can confer no honor or nobility, grants neither peace nor happiness. Rather does it bestow war and death; its fires are the fires of remoteness from God. That sovereign is the veritable core of unreality, deprived of the capacity to know God, and shrouded in intense darkness and blindness. It is the antithesis of guidance and vision.

But the resplendent Reality of the True Sovereign has direct relationship with the world of vision and enlightenment. His supreme gift to man is the connection He has established with the hearts. The human reality, once attuned to the central Orb of Truth, comes in touch with an Existence which causes it to enter the pathway of true unfoldment and divine service. From the mirage, it comes into the pleasant pasture. It becomes conscious that the real fruitage of human existence is the acquirement of the Love and Knowledge of God. This condition, when realized, is equivalent to the establishment of the pillars of the Kingdom of God in this world. And this condition, despite the gloom of our old friend, the pessimist, is now possible for the first time in human history and is much nearer in point of actual realization than is generally supposed.

HAVE WE sufficiently understood the application of the saying of His Holiness Christ, concerning this consummation of the Divine Will for mankind? Let us ponder upon the meaning of His Word, realizing also in that which is about to be quoted, the striking agreement as to the meaning of the mysteries of life contained in all the Holy Utterances.

In a Tablet to an American Bahá'í, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said:

"This is why His Holiness Christ said that unless one is baptised with the spirit he cannot enter the Kingdom. That is, unless through the power of the Holy Spirit he is detached from the world of nature, he cannot comprehend the invisible realities. Not only does he remain ignorant of the World of God, but also he cannot imagine it."

"Like unto the embryonic child, until he is freed from the obscurities of the pre-birth stage he can neither see the brilliant sun, nor observe the roses of the garden, envision the clear sky nor perceive the stately trees, nor understand the resplendent bounties. When, however, he is delivered from the darkness of the embryonic condition, he beholds these lights, discovers these traces, and comprehends the mysteries of existence.

"Likewise, until the human souls are detached from the world of nature; in other words, be born again, they remain ignorant of the World of God and obtain no share and portion of the Bounties of the Merciful."

This is a light shining amidst the darkness. Its beams penetrate the innermost recesses of human life. Its unerring finger probes into the very depths of humanity's chronic affliction. For it discloses to our understanding the bewildering truth that attachment to the world of nature is identical with that of the foetal state; that in that state of attachment man is incapable even of imagining the existence of the world of God, much less of comprehending the reality of life. Can we escape the conclusion, when we look upon the present disorganized state of humanity, that the masses of our race slumber in a consciousness that is unreal? And that because of this, this doubt of the existence of God dwells side by side with the enslavement of natural law? This truth is certified to, beyond refutation, by the Divine Manifestations.

MERE repression of the natural impulses of selfishness, cruelty and lust, as is instanced in the lives of many ascetics, without comprehending the underlying significance of the world of reality, is of little avail. Knowledge of the real meaning of the words "be born again" is essential. This pregnant phrase has become veiled in a mysticism that has confounded the souls. So much so, that most of us have looked upon it as impossible of attainment. But, preeminently, we have not realized just what it is that we must be born out of, and into what state the new birth ushers us. This has resulted in a more or less fixity of thought that this blessed state was not of this world, and must be postponed, somehow, to the life to come. Nevertheless, Christ commanded His followers to establish the Kingdom of God in this world. Today, the picture, like a developing camera print, reveals all the lights and shadows, and stands out with clear demarcation in all its wholeness (or holiness).

Instead of fleeing from an imaginary Prince of Darkness, we now see that essence of evil as the alliance we, ourselves, enter into with the sinister, cruel elements of the natural forces. That the "balance of power" created by that unholy alliance is, in effect, a veritable Armageddon of the armies of unreality, warring through the ages, against the hosts of radiant truth. While, saddest of all words of tongue or pen, we are only depriving ourselves of the infinite blessings of a loving, all-knowing Father, Whose bestowals cannot reach us so long as we persist in remaining in the foetal state. The unborn babe itself assists in the process of physical birth. But when confronted by the eternal mystery of entrance into the second birth, the will of man has been stubbornly set against this, so necessary, effort. We can only say that this stubbornness is largely born of ignorance of the true facts now made known in this hour of fulfilment by the Ancient Pen, in this Day of God. The enemy and the Friend have, for the first time, been truly depicted. The light and the shadow are intensely revealed.

LACKING even the power of imagining the invisible realities of the Kingdom of God, while in the state of attachment, how, then, can we gather the force and strength to conquer that attachment, which the revealed Words state is the first essential to being born again? 'Abdul-Bahá tells us this strength is engendered "through the power of the Holy Spirit". Reference has already been made, in these articles to the mysterious power that converts the mineral into the vegetable forms, changing both the nature and status of the former existence. Also, to the transforming power of the emanations from the Spirit of Faith, the plane nearest and superior to the natural man. Faith, then, which is ever associated with an intense yearning for emancipation, is the first step. But Faith implies a definite turning to, and recognition of the True Sovereign.

This recognition is, above all, essential, because it is through the Holy Manifestations of God, (our only means of attaining to the knowledge of that secluded and indefinable Essence of Reality), that the power and strength of the Holy Spirit is focused. Through the outpourings of that heavenly power, the Divine Love reaches humanity. In this sense, the Holy Spirit and the Love of God are one and the same. Consequently, the recognition of God, through realizing the proofs and evidences of His Manifestation, confers upon the possessor of Faith the supreme bounty of His Love, and the soul-refreshing stream of His Knowledge.

In these divine gifts, innately and inherently the repositories of spiritual power and strength, he who has turned his gaze to the True Sovereign finds that reinforcement of the Holy Spirit that has been declared to be essential to deliverance from the claws of nature and the breaking of the ancient attachment. This deliverance is synonymous with "redemption" and "salvation".

We can thus, perhaps, more clearly understand why the Chosen Messenger of every spiritual cycle has taken to Himself, among other names, that of Savior; since through Him, and within Him, flows that Fountain of Living Water that we call the Holy Spirit, which, alone, conquers the exigencies of Nature, and redeems man from his supreme affliction. How great, then, is the importance of this Recognition.

AN APPRECIATION

WALTER WELLER, PH.D.

Translated from the German by Florence King

THE hot afternoon sun lies heavily and inertly over everything, as though nothing were unusual. Yet today is the most marvelous and dreamily improbable day of my life. For the duration of a few hours I allow the experience of the new part of the world and the greatest city of the world to exercise its influence over me, for I am from Central Europe and have just arrived in New York to travel on from there to the city where I shall begin my professional career.

As I look about me I see tall buildings which extend far into the sky, elevated railways thunder past, automobiles rage, and crowds of people rush before me. Behind me is the blue-green Hudson river with its freight boats, passenger boats and ferry boats swarming in confusion and all active and industrious under the watching eyes of the Statue of Liberty.

So this is the new world, so entirely different; the land of freedom, work and industry.

But one cannot live on enthusiasm alone, and my companion, who is an American and used to the uproar here, is more interested in a good meal. After that we plan a visit to the barber's shop to further celebrate the day, and in order to experience still more the feeling of the newness of the new beginning. To this end I wish to enter a spotlessly clean barber shop whose revolving red, white and blue colors have already beckoned to me in a friendly manner from the distance.

But my companion suddenly holds me back. It seems he has a prejudice against being shaved by black hands.

A sudden almost painful sense of disappointment comes over me. Is this indeed the America which I have looked forward to seeing with joyful expectancy, where every one who works is a free man and respected regardless of what his work may be?

And this sense of alienation produces a further effect—it opens my eyes so that I see much that perhaps I would not have noticed otherwise in my enthusiastic prejudice.

Yes, it is true: work does not dishonor one here in this country. Here they do not know the prejudice of Europe that is erected as an insurmountable barrier between those who work with their hands and those who work with their minds; but in place of that they know another one, a much more inhuman one—race prejudice—crueler because race is a simple matter of fate and not a matter of one's own merit or guilt.

BY CHANCE I come in contact with cultivated colored groups. I learn to know and esteem them, and also to understand what it means to stand under the onus of a prejudice which does not allow one to be simply a human being and an individual personality.

Does the average white American really know that there is a highly cultivated class of colored Americans? Hardly. And if he has heard anything about their universities and their thousands of conscientious, hard-working students, he usually closes his eyes and will not admit the cultural results. His contact with the colored race has been almost entirely confined to the class whose circumstances have deprived them of educational opportunities, the same as corresponding groups among other people.

Are not all vocations honorable? But are other Americans or any Europeans judged only by representatives of such classes?

Herein is a worth while and vital problem for the followers of the Bahá'í religion to deal with, and I have observed that their fearless struggles against religious and racial prejudices have already brought about great blessings. One of the fundamental principles of the Bahá'í Movement is the Oneness of Mankind, and with a deep conscious realization of what the establishment of this principle would mean to mankind in so many ways, the Bahá'ís are whole-heartedly promoting friendly social relations between all the races.

However, it is by no means true that all the colored race need to be educated to fit in to the society of the white race. No, on the contrary, if any one should be educated, it is members of the white race, who should learn to free themselves from outworn prejudices. If earlier beliefs about the colored race were correct, they certainly are no longer so. The white people should see and hear for themselves; and after discovering that the colored people are human beings quite like ourselves, it will not be difficult for them to realize the great intellectual and emotional capacities and unfolding possibilities of these people when some poet among them reads aloud his deep sad poetry, or when the beautiful harmonious tones of a spiritual resounds.

And is that not the best thing we can learn—to perceive and overcome our human faults and thus in the future see only human beings and so advance further toward true humanity?

NEW VISIONS OF HUMAN UNITY

Interracial Amity Work at Green Acre

Compiled from reports supplied by Louis G. Gregory and Harlan F. Ober.

AN institution" as has been said, "is the length and shadow of a man," or it might have been said, of a woman. Such an institution is Green Acre*, one of the most remarkable centers of the interchange of thought and the stimulus of spiritual vision that exists in the world today. Sarah J. Farmer, who founded it and devoted to it her wealth and even life itself, intended it to serve as a platform for the tolerant and kindly interchange of religious and social ideals. From the first she gave it an atmosphere of fellowship, of kindness, so that all who came there were drawn into a comradeship such as is seldom known in gatherings of unrelated and unacquainted people.

Miss Farmer, with her sunny smile, as she presided on the platform, illumined both speaker and audience; and her spirit of generosity and friendliness permeated the whole summer colony with an atmosphere of harmonious sociability which made it a unique caravansary of thought and of higher life.

After the death of Miss Farmer, Green Acre became the Center of the Bahá'í Summer School of Religions, and still maintains its atmosphere of universal kindness and comradeship.

Here we find the different races meeting and mingling in a real unity of sincere sympathy and understanding, not a mere fictitious unity based upon an attempt at tolerance. It is perhaps this absolute reality in the quality of friendship which makes members of races ordinarily discriminated against absolutely happy in the atmosphere of unity which they find there.

WHAT AN ideal spot, then, for the holding of conferences for racial amity. Such conferences have been held annually at Green Acre for many years arranged by the Bahá'í National Committee for Interracial Amity and furthered by the efficient services of its Secretary, Louis G. Gregory.

During this last summer one of the most successful of all these conferences was held. A brief description of this conference is interesting:

"The difficulties in the way of this Amity Conference in view of the depression and other obstacles loomed larger than those which confronted any previous and similar gathering. That they were met and overcome is certainly due to nothing less than Providence whose ways are ever marvelous in our eyes. Many of our visitors and workers traveled under such handicaps as to make their presence seem well nigh a miracle. Thus the mystery of sacrifice was attained and the devotion of hearts was freely given in service to the one true God. It was an effort which commanded the united support of the Bahá'í friends, those from afar and those near at hand. The power of these meetings was most impressive.”

One of the speakers told how he first came to Green Acre in 1900 at the invitation of Miss Farmer. He related several stories of those early days and of his association with the founder of this spiritual enterprise whose great heart made possible the program she loved. People of all races and religions found welcome in her home and Green Acre became a center of hospitality. Her dignified presence and genial spirit charmed everyone and she was able to fuse conflicting viewpoints and clashing personalities through her serene and spiritual calm. Her statue grows with the years. Her fame belongs to the ages. This brilliant daughter of a great inventor dedicated all her powers and resources to the ideal that all men are brothers.

On Sunday afternoon a reception and tea was held for all delegates and visiting friends at the beautiful country estate of two well known Bahá'ís. The beauty of the surroundings and the spirit of hospitality shown made a very deep impression.

The speakers and members of the Conference had gathered from practically every state east of the Alleghany mountains, with visitors from many points further west and south. The attendance was the largest of any conference at Green Acre in many years and the Inn and surrounding properties bustled with activities.

The speakers and the chairman of each meeting reviewed the whole subject of prejudice and averred the need of the Divine Power to lift humanity to a new plane of understanding. The reality of man is noble, fearless, open-minded, loving and intelligent. Today countless souls are showing forth this reality, scrapping ancient superstitions and prejudices and revealing in this way the foundations of human brotherhood. Every Divine Teacher of the past has unified races and nations. He has displaced hatred and prejudice with love and justice. Now in this day antagonistic peoples are finding ideal unity through the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. This is a Light which shines for the whole world.

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S THANKS- GIVING MESSAGE

“May we on this day in our churches and in our homes give humble thanks for the blessings bestowed upon us during the year past by Almighty God.

“May we recall the courage of those who settled a wilderness, the vision of those who founded the nation, the steadfastness of those who in every succeeding generation, have fought to keep pure the ideal of equality of opportunity, and hold clear the goal of mutual help in time of prosperity as in time of adversity.

“May we ask guidance in more surely learning the ancient truth that greed and selfishness and striving for undue riches can never bring lasting happiness or good to the individual or to his neighbors.

“May we be grateful for the passing of dark days; for the new spirit of dependence one on another; for the closer unity of all parts of our wide land; for the greater friendship between employers and those who toil; for a clearer knowledge by all nations that we seek no conquests and ask only honorable engagements by all peoples to respect the lands and rights of their neighbors; for the brighter day to which we can win thru by seeking the help of God in a more unselfish striving for the common bettering of mankind.

‘ABDU’L-BAHA’S PRAYER FOR AMERICA

“O God, Almighty Protector! O Thou Who art the confirmer of every just power and equitable empire in eternal glory, everlasting power, continuance and greatness! Strengthen with the abundance of Thy mercy every government which acts with equity towards its subjects, and every dominion under whose flag the poor and weak find protection.

“We ask Thee by Thy holiness and bounty to pour out Thy blessing upon this government which has stretched its tent over citizens from every land, that its inhabitants, its industries, its territories may be penetrated by justice.

“O God! Strengthen its executives, give authority and influence to its word and utterance, protect its territories and dominions, guard its reputation, make its ideals to echo throughout the world, reveal its traces and exalt its principles by Thy conquering power and wonderful might throughout the kingdoms of creation.

“Thou art the confirmer of whomsoever Thou willest. Verily, Thou art the powerful and the mighty!”

"We say His Holiness Christ is the Word of God. . . . The reality of Jesus was the perfect meaning—the Christhood in Him—which in the Holy Books is symbolized as the Word. 'The Word was with God.' The Christhood means not the body of Jesus but the perfection of divine virtues manifest in Him. . . . The reality of Christ was the embodiment of divine virtues and attributes of God. For in Divinity there is no duality."—Abdu'l-Bahá.

IN THE MODERN reaction against theological concepts of the past that have become untenable in the light of today, the tendency has been to unduly minimize the station and influence of Christ. Intellectuals are prone to classify Christ as one of a group of spiritual geniuses who have dedicated their lives to the progress of humanity, differing only in degree of spirituality and devotion from the rest of us humans. There are three aspects or factors, however, in the nature of Christ which sets that nature off not only in degree but also in kind from human beings on this planet.

FIRST, CHRIST was a destined channel for pure truth, for the revealed Word of God sent to enlighten the knowledge and the conduct of humanity. Such a Messenger is different not only in degree but also in kind, and His utterances are different from the utterances of other human beings; for only from the Revealers of God's Word do we get pure Truth. All other utterance upon this planet, no matter how high its degree of wisdom and of vision, is mixed with an inferior quality of human judgment and opinion. No message, however deeply inspired and inspirational it may be—of thinker, teacher, philosopher, or humanitarian—can or should be followed implicitly by mankind; for here we cannot find absolute Truth.

But in the utterances of the Manifestations of God we find nothing but Truth. The Message of Christ has not come down to us in all its original purity; we receive it already adulterated by its passage through the personality and temperament of those who recorded it. But in its original form here was a pure light from God sent to illumine the world and to guide its progress toward perfection. This is the first point in which Christ differs from other human beings.

SECONDLY, CHRIST exemplified in absolute perfection the truths which He declared. The quality of His life and His love for humanity was not like that of the rest of us—contingent upon efforts toward self-perfection. It was from birth absolute and final. The Manifestations of God bring to earth a capacity for mirroring perfectly the attributes of God. The wisdom, the love which They display have a more than human, they have a divine quality.

The Manifestations set an example which is one hundred percent perfect, unalloyed by any human frailty. And the glorious altitudes of conduct which they manifest, in and by means of their lives, become goals for all humanity to strive toward; goals unattainable upon this planet, it is true—but for that reason all the more impelling, since there are none who can say: “I have reached the limit; there is no more perfection for me to strive toward.”

THIRDLY—a factor supremely important as regards the influence of the Christ upon subsequent humanity—is His ever-living presence in the hearts of all who devotedly believe in Him and turn to Him for spiritual help. “I know that my Redeemer liveth,”—is a glorious impelling thought resuscitating hearts and lifting up weak souls to altitudes of conduct otherwise unattainable.

If Christians had no other aid and inspiration to nobility of soul than the fact that there had once appeared upon this planet a spiritual genius who uttered sublime sentiments on conduct and living, we may be sure that there would be missing from the history of human morals a vast amount of lofty ethical living which in reality has appeared as a consequence of Christ's influence.

It is not the historical Christ so much as the indwelling Christ that has been the cause of saintliness; of divine infinite love manifested by human beings who strove to follow in His footsteps.

“I am with you always . . . Where two or three are gathered together in My Name, lo! I am with you.” It is this eternal Christ who is worshipped; this miracle of the Holy Spirit which Christ mediates to earthbound creatures—now, as then in the days of ancient Palestine.

THERE WAS a time when I, like a majority of the intellectuals of today, believed that man's own intelligence, striving for good, with the aid and inspiration of noble utterances from the world's great religions, was sufficient for right conduct. But from a deep study of the pages of history and of the lives of human beings with whom I have come in contact I am convinced that no human conduct can approach in nobility that of saintly people who owe their inspiration to the experience of the indwelling Christ (or to similar spiritual phenomena in some other world religion).

Nowhere can we find in human experience such divinely forgiving and self-sacrificing love, such utter devotion to the service of their fellows, such entire severance from worldliness, such complete sincerity of motivation, such purity of conduct, such freedom from the passions and from those little besetting sins which spring upon us out of our animal selves,—as in the lives of saintly people who have owed their saintliness to their devotion to Christ and to their experience of union with this spiritually charged Center from which emanate electrically vibrant and vivifying forces of the Holy Spirit.

Let us study unprejudicially and dispassionately the history of the human race since the days of Christ, and we shall be forced to conclude that His influence differs not only in magnitude but also in kind from that exerted by ordinary beings as we know them in this world. The station of Christ is not only lofty but unapproachable. It is a beacon light set to guide us from the world of the finite to the World of the Infinite.

CHRIST . . .

“The grand aim of the religion of Christ was to draw the hearts of all men nearer to God’s effulgent Truth.”—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

THE advent of Christ on this earth was a blessed day for it was the day on which the Sun of Reality dawned; the day on which all beings were revived. In the world’s calendar, it was the beginning of a Heavenly Spring.”

THE reality of Christ, that is to say the Word of God, is the cause of spiritual life. It is a quickenning spirit, meaning that all the imperfections which come from the requirements of the physical life of man, are transformed into human perfections by the teachings and education of that spirit. Therefore Christ was a quickenning spirit, and the cause of life in all mankind. The position of Christ was that of absolute perfection; He made His divine perfections shine like the sun upon all believing souls, and the bounties of the light shone and radiated in the reality of men. . . . The Reality of Christ was a clear and polished mirror of the greatest purity and fineness, and the Sun of Reality, that is to say, the Essence of Oneness, with its infinite perfections and attributes, became visible in the mirror. . . . The Christ sacrificed himself so that men might be freed from the imperfections of the physical nature, and might become possessed of the virtues of the spiritual nature. This spiritual nature, which came into existence through the bounty of the Divine Reality, is the reunion of all perfections, and appears through the breath of the Holy Spirit; it is the divine perfections, it is light, spirituality, guidance, exaltation, high aspiration, justice, love, grace, kindness to all, philanthropy, the essence of life. It is the reflection of the splendor of the Sun of Reality.”

THE Cause of Bahá’u’lláh is the same as the Cause of Christ. It is the same temple and the same foundation. . . . In the coming of Christ, the divine teachings were given in accordance with the infancy of the human race. The teachings of Bahá’u’lláh have the same basic principles, but are according to the stage of the maturity of the world and the requirements of this illumined age.”

CHRIST was a heavenly physician. He brought spiritual health and healing into the world. Bahá’u’lláh is likewise a divine physician. He has revealed prescriptions for removing disease from the body politic and has remedied human conditions by spiritual power.”

OMNIVEROUS READERS OF JAPAN

SHIO SAKANISHI, PH.D.

The author of this article, Director of the Japanese Division of the Library of Congress, gives us a very informing article based on the outstanding research she has accomplished in her particular field of professional work. The enormous literary culture of the Japanese, the large number of books and magazines they publish, will be a revelation to those who have not given this subject definite consideration. It is valuable to Americans to help them understand the great cultural achievements of the Japanese, measured in terms of journalistic and literary progress.

WHEN Ansai Yamazaki (1618-1682), one of the greatest philosophers of Japan was a mere boy, his grandmother said to him: "Your body is worth one sen, while your eyes are worth one hundred yen. Therefore you ought not to injure them, but if you do not learn to read, you will be as one who is blind." This impressed young Ansai so much that he learned to read the most difficult Chinese classics before he was ten years old.

Not all the Japanese children are so fortunate as to have such a wise grandmother as Ansai's, but their parents teach them very early to love and respect books. A Japanese baby is given a book, not the kind with linen leaves which he cannot tear, but an ordinary paper book, and he is taught not to tear its leaves. Any child who handles his book roughly or disrespectfully must go to bed without his supper. He is taught to take up a book with both hands, sit up straight, and then open it to read. With such training he soon finds his books the most loyal friends and wise counsellors throughout his life.

The books in Japan, then, seem to fare better than some of their kind elsewhere. Since so little is known in the Occident about book production in Japan in either ancient or modern times, will it not be interesting to look into its history and the present condition?

IN ONE of the earliest dynastic annals we find the following entry: "In the fourth month of the year 770, after the eight years of civil war had been brought to an end, the Empress Shotoku made a vow and ordered the production of one million pagodas, within which were placed the charms printed from wood blocks. When this work was finished, they were distributed among various temples." To the Empress Shotoku the world owes its first certain and clearly attested record of printing with wooden blocks upon paper. A number of the original impressions are still preserved, and in the United States the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C., and the Art Institute of Chicago are fortunate in possessing some of these rare specimens.

As the motive of printing was to obtain merit, the early Japanese works were all Buddhistic. For example, Otomo no Akamaro was a governor of the province of Musashi. In the second year after his death, a calf with black markings was born on a temple estate. These marks were interpreted as an inscription designating the name "Otomo no Akamaro" and were said to reveal how the latter had secretly appropriated temple property, but having died without punishment, was now suffering retribution by being reborn as a calf. The family mourned and feared, and had the sacred writings of Buddha carved and printed for distribution.

Thus it took nearly five hundred years to secularize the art of printing. Gradually a few scholarly works came to be printed, but they were so expensive that only noblemen and lords of feudal provinces could buy them, and poor scholars and students borrowed and copied them. In some cases a student committed the whole book to memory.

The introduction of metal movable type through Korea in 1597 marks another epoch in the history of book-making, but the Japanese language was such that they soon found the block printing was cheaper than the metal movable type. By the close of the 18th century the government press was printing over 1,000 volumes yearly, and the private presses in Kyoto, Edo and even in provinces under the patronage of the powerful and intellectual feudal lords made a tremendous headway in the matter of book production. Unfortunately there is no way of determining the exact number of books printed by them. About this time there were 1,141 licensed book dealers in Japan. But the matter of licensing was by no means strict, and it is more likely that the number quoted above is very much smaller than the actual book dealers then in existence. In 1932 the Japanese Book Dealers' Association had 14,867 members.

SINCE THE Restoration of 1867, the book industry in Japan has made a phenomenal development. An increase of 800 percent in the total annual output of new books and pamphlets has taken place in the last fifty years so that in 1932 there were 22,000 new books and pamphlets published. Indeed, while the United States has been falling off in the last three years in new bound publications, Japan as well as Great Britain has been gaining. And this in spite of the fact that owing to lower wages in Japan a Japanese pays much more for a book in real money than does an American. Recently the one yen book corresponding to the American dollar book has appeared in Japan.

As to the subjects in demand in Japan—text books and those on educational subjects lead, as everywhere as a matter of course, and fiction comes next, but sociology and economics which are comparatively new subjects in Japan are in great demand. Another significant change is in the interest in religious books. Books on religion had never exceeded the 600 mark in the heyday of prosperity but have begun to increase since the advance of depression and reached the thousand mark in 1932, proving the validity of an old proverb, "Man will pray to the gods in trouble."

Just before and after the publication of the Report of the Lytton Commission, the market was flooded with books and pamphlets on the Manchurian and Mongolian crisis.

It may also be informing that translations from foreign languages in 1928 were over 2,000, and there has been every indication that they have been increasing with astonishing rapidity but no accurate figures for the last few years are available.

Not only this but the Japanese are omniverous readers of foreign publications in their original languages. According to the report of the Custom House over a million volumes in foreign languages, English, German, French, Chinese and Russian, entered Japan in 1931. Scientific and technical books made up by far the largest number of these.

IF THE Japanese are prolific readers of books, their capacity for magazines is still more astonishing. Today there are over 10,000 magazines. They are increasing at an average rate of 20 a month, and occupy 70 per cent of the total figure of book production. In 1932 the Tokyo Publishers' Association took a census of the sales figures of eighty-three leading monthly magazines and found that twenty-eight journals had an annual sale of more than a million and a half issues. Therefore, it is not considered at all strange that any popular magazine should have 100,000 circulation every month.

Japanese journalism dates back nearly four hundred years, and it is not an importation of the West as some claim. Single news sheets were issued from time to time informing of a great battle or an earthquake or any other significant event of the nation. Some of them were illustrated with crude woodcuts, and in some sense they were the forerunner of the tabloid journals of the West.

Today there are 11,118 newspapers throughout the country, but the comparatively small area of Japan limits the growth of great newspapers outside Tokyo which is the political capital, and Osaka, the commercial capital. In their method of news gathering, organization, and plants, these metropolitan newspapers can be compared with the leading papers of the United States. In circulation, too, the million mark has been passed by several papers, and in fact the Tokyo Asahi has a million and a half circulation. The rustle of newspapers is an integral part of Japanese daily life, and an English writer once commented: "Even the scavengers pause for that daily drug which is taken through the eyes."

AN UNIQUE phase of the Japanese news gathering is that the use of the modern telephone and telegraph is often supplemented by carrier pigeons. Correspondents on a difficult assignment in an out of the way place go armed not only with pencil and paper but also with pigeons which fly home with the necessary report.

There are 3,081 public libraries and 1,456 private libraries open to the public. They are always crowded and in Tokyo we often see a long line of men and women outside waiting to be admitted. Indeed we need another four thousand of such institutions. For the rural communities the government has organized a special method of traveling libraries for the winter use. For example a box of books will be shipped to a village where it is put in charge of a school teacher or a policeman or even a citizen. It will remain there three weeks. At the end of its stay another box with new titles appears, and the old box goes to the next village. This method has proved to be very effective in educating and entertaining the rural residents during the dull winter season.

Censorship of the press has been one of the bitter questions in Japan. Publishers and authors consider the Census Office of the Police Bureau under the Home Department as their worst bug-bear. When a book or a magazine is ready for the market, two copies must be sent to the Census Office for inspection and registration and a book can be suppressed for either of the following reasons: (1) Being injurious to public morals; (2) Disturbing the public peace and order. Under the first head come all the erotic literature and prints. Under the second comes that with socialistic and communistic tendencies, the so-called dangerous thoughts. An average of 2,000 items out of 80,000 deposits which consist mostly of unbound material, are suppressed annually by the government.

MORE THAN any one else, the Japanese realize that to fathom one's wisdom and knowledge by pages or volumes he devours, is ridiculous. The modern so-called education consists too much in reading and swallowing the material he cannot comprehend or digest. Keenly aware of such danger, the Japanese educators are trying their best not to stuff young minds with information, but rather to draw out the mental power and create a capacity for each to think for himself. For, they believe, intellectually speaking, very few die of hunger, but many die of mental indigestion.

NIGHT ON THE PLAIN OF 'AKKA

Across the plain of 'Akká¹ blow the winds
Of evening, soft, caressing, from the sea.
They bear the scent of orange blossoms sweet,
And fragrance from the bloom of lemon tree.

Above a silent world, a crescent moon
Transfigures with her light each common thing,
So that a shepherd on a nearby hill,
Becomes a symbol of the Shepherd King!

Across the bay, the Shrine² on Carmel throws
Its light afar, and guides the ships at sea;
But, O beloved, it shines beyond these shores,
It lights the path of life for you and me!

DESTINY OPENS THE DOOR

GITA ORLOVA

The author, a talented tragedienne and the widow of one of the distinguished members of a noble Russian family—most of whom lost their lives in the revolution—herein gives very briefly the story of her search for Truth. She may at some future time give further details and a more intimate story. However it is clear in the picture she presents that her heart was prepared through a multitude of tragic events to recognize “the way of life” when the path was opened and made accessible to her in the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh.

SPENGLER says that “Destiny is an organic necessity.” When we realize the necessity for the tranquility that a real faith in religion brings to the human heart and mind, then the words of Spengler take on their true significance, for it is destiny to find the attitude of thinking that brings one nearer to spiritual peace.

The materialist may ask “why spiritual peace, why not mental?” Because mental peace is a quality of reasoning, and spiritual peace is a quality of detachment, or severance from the storm of human problems and disillusionment of childish belief in the truth and heroic qualities of the persons who make up ones everyday contact with society.

My father was a scholar whose library was a treasure-house of classic literature. Here I came at a very early age in contact with the philosophers, and so sympathetic was my father that he did not make it seem strange to me that at the age of fourteen I was discussing Plato, Socrates and Aristotle with him. If my deductions amused him he was far too gallant a gentleman to embarrass me with his smile. When, however, I told him that I did not wish to go to church any more because I did not believe what the preacher was saying, my blessed and understanding father did not insist upon my going to church again. His own faith in God was so simple and yet so profound that it greatly influenced my whole worship, not thru form or creed, but by an intimacy with God thru all creation.

In 1892 I remember very distinctly father's reading an article in an English newspaper about the death of a great Persian prophet who had made a claim to Messiahship, and whose message was for the abolishment of racial, national and religious prejudices. I remember that father discussed this message and its effect upon human relations for some time during the dinner hour. I also remember that the beautiful and rhythmic name of the Messenger impressed me. I was moved by the plea that He made for a universal language that we might understand each other's words, instead of becoming confused by translations.

So DESTINY began its subtle work of organic necessity. The seed had been planted, and tho many years were to pass before it became conscious of its urge for growth, it perhaps was not lying dormant entirely all thru the years that followed.

In 1915 a strange whim of Destiny took me to San Francisco. The war and German raiders caused a boat upon which I was a passenger to go into the port of New Orleans, a destination far removed from my intention. Other events led me to San Francisco.

It was Mrs. Spreckles I think, who one day in San Francisco several years later handed me a large volume, and said, "Here is a book of some religion that is causing quite a stir I hear. I know nothing about it, but you are always interested in religions and especially in all the religion and philosophy that comes from the East. You may have the book." I accepted the large volume, and read the title, "Bahá'i Scriptures."

One of the griefs of the yesterdays is that I did not respond to that first gift of Destiny, in the moment of her giving. Undoubtedly Spengler would say that at the moment when Destiny opened the door the organic was not yet strong enough to make me conscious of the necessity of my forgetting all else to enter the door. Perhaps the necessity was vital enough but Life was still a translucent thing to me, and the irons had not yet burned deeply enough.

WELL THE large book began its adventure. First it traveled to New York, thence to Italy, Switzerland, France, England, Russia—thru the turmoil of tragic experiences. It then voyaged to Siberia, Mongolia, Manchuria, Korea, Japan and China, across the Pacific to Canada, many times across the United States from coast to coast, finally to find a resting place in my home near New York.

One evening a little over a year ago, I had been working all day with my out of door theatre, and was very weary, so that I sought the couch, but first searched the library for something to read while I awaited the solace for my weariness. Search as I would, I could find nothing which had not already been read except one book. That was the large volume, Bahá'i Scriptures, now worth its weight in gold because of its many journeys by express. Many times my hand had hesitated in packing it with others which I loved, but in the end I always included it with the idea of some day, in the world turned upside down, I would find the leisure to read the book whose pages I had never opened. At this moment I laughed and said, "Well, old friend whom I have neglected, and yet to whom I have shown a strange faithfulness, you are about to come into your own."

I OPENED the book to some page at haphazard, apparently, and began one of the most thrilling and dramatic episodes in human history, the story of the martyrdom of the Báb. All my senses as a tragedienne were in flame over the superb grandeur of that episode. I cannot think of any drama of Greek tragedy, no matter how classic its climax, not even the death of Oedipus Rex that can touch this scene for sheer magnificent tragic theatre. Needless to say, I spent the night in wrapt reading of the long neglected book. It never dawned upon me to doubt the reality and divinity of Bahá'u'lláh, nor the miracle of His great plan for the unifying of contending forces in the practical as well as the ethical world. I knew then that the organic necessity had become my Destiny.

I had steadily refused to "belong" to any sect or society, always saying that if I were anything definite it was a Buddhist because that was a religion of beauty and particularly suited to the need of an artist's soul. More and more as the days passed the words of Jacob Boehme became poignantly real to me: "Not until I lost faith in all humanity and found refuge only in faith of the eternal Light did the Sublime send me help through humans." My deepest longing had been crystalizing into a tangible desire to enter an ashrama or refuge for meditation in Mongolia or Manchuria, to be completely detached from the world which contained so much of heartbreak, ugliness and disillusionment of the most sacred ideals.

Now, as though made to the full measure of such a human need, the answer had come in a form at once practical, tangible, and yet divine, leaving one in the world and yet freed from its attachment. Here was an ideal or religion for this sad hour in the history of mankind, that interpreted the realities of science, of history, of races and cultures in a way both rational and spiritual; which gave a satisfying explanation for the six mysterious days of the Creation of Genesis.

I had been carrying the solace for my spiritual ills like a ruby in my possession, and had kept it hidden, but now it glowed and shone.

I was just finishing the reading of the Scriptures for the third time when a real estate woman called me from New York, and asked if I would be at home that afternoon at three o'clock. I answered that I would, and asked who her clients were who wished to see our property. She answered, "Some people from a religious group called Bahá'is."

Destiny had caught me by my flying feet.

That afternoon at three o'clock, an auto stopped before the door and a gentleman and his wife descended. As I looked into the face of the man, I said, "You are my spiritual brother;" and without answering he turned to his wife and said, "Dear, a new teacher has come."

Later, I asked this Bahá'í teacher how he came to be looking at a three hundred acre estate, and with lovely guilelessness he said that the real estate agent had long entreated them to visit the property, and finally on this lovely day they had consented, the idea being the possibility of using the place as a Bahá'í center, on account of its proximity to New York.

So THE happy days of instruction began, days of divine illumination for the spirit, but full of problems in my practical life for during this period I lost the beautiful estate, and found many tests and trials. But the words of the Beloved were a song that rose above all cries of the world, "A single breeze of His affluence doth suffice to adorn all mankind with the robe of wealth."

And so I became a Bahá'í.

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

A Brief Sketch of a Dynamic Personality

MARIAM HANEY

"On Persian soil, for Persia's sake, she encountered, challenged and fought the forces of darkness with high distinction, indomitable will, unswerving, exemplary loyalty. The mass of her helpless Persian brethren mourns the sudden loss of their valiant emancipator."—Shoghi Effendi.

"The days of human existence are like vanishing shadows: compared to the world of Reality they are brought to a close with extraordinary rapidity. . . . From the king to the servant all walk in this fleeting path and live in this circle."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

* * *

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER, at the sacrifice of energy, health and even life itself, remarkably fulfilled a mission which will go down to history as new and unique in the annals of the evolution of religion. It was a mission not undertaken for the sake of proselytizing Orientals into a religion of the Occident, but for the sake of creating and cementing ties of friendship already inherent in the miracle which rallied peoples of the East and peoples of the West around one unifying Center, Bahá'u'lláh.

Mrs. Ransom-Kehler had a great and dynamic personality "ripened by the Holy Spirit." If we wish a concrete example of the power of the Word of Bahá'u'lláh to effect a transformation in the life of a distinguished scholar, we have it in the spiritual rise of Keith, as she was affectionately known by Bahá'is round the world.

When in May 1921 she heard the Bahá'i Message for the first time, it was as if she had actually listened to the Divine Voice calling, "Come, give me your life for this Cause." She arose whole-heartedly, as thousands of martyrs already had done in Persia cementing the foundation of this great Bahá'i world religion with their life's blood. She heard of this universal message and ascended to heights of achievement through her marvelous services to the world Cause of Bahá'u'lláh.

LET US review briefly a few pages from the life of this dynamic character. Born in Kentucky around 1878, she received most of her pre-college training in a private school in Cincinnati, and there prepared for Vassar. She graduated from that well known college. Later she did graduate work and eventually received the M. A. degree.

Her years at Vassar were spent at a time when the securing of higher education was a progressive if not a radical thing for a woman. She manifested continually those qualities which foreshadowed future events in her life; always a leader of thought and expression she was an outstanding student. Her bold and original discussions in the classroom won her distinction and the just praise of her classmates as well as her professors. Subsequently she held the chair of English in a western college.

Her multiple gifts and strong enthusiasms led her into many occupations. Each one she fulfilled vigorously, giving all her energy and attention, manifesting at all times a characteristically great dynamic personality—Hull House settlement work, prison reform at Sing Sing, interior decorating, professor of English. How versatile she was!

BUT WHAT is of the most interest to the readers of this magazine is to ponder over the varied aspects of her active life from the time she accepted the Bahá'í Teachings and began to travel "the path paved by Bahá'u'lláh." How swift and marvelous were her growth and attainments once she dedicated her life to the study, the application and the promulgation of the new World Order of Bahá'u'lláh. The pride of a powerful and well trained intellect tempered by her deep study of the revealed Word of God became sublimated into a superb and dynamic quality of spiritual life. Her penetrating mind led her in this study to a deep knowledge of the mystical side of life without at any time destroying or minimizing the practical quality of her achievement on the outer plane, but rather strengthening it with an inner fire and force.

Possessed of a keen incisive intellect and great gift of analysis—a thinker, a writer, a lecturer of outstanding ability—she dedicated all these great gifts to the dissemination of those marvelous principles given to the world by Bahá'u'lláh for the healing of the nations. Freed by a small income from the necessity of earning her living, Keith was able to devote her whole time to the work of the Bahá'í Cause. She traveled extensively, making invaluable contributions to the organization and promulgation of the Cause.

Soon her outstanding ability and services were recognized in an official way by the National Spiritual Assembly of the United States and Canada, and she became their official representative in her work and travels.

IN 1926 she made her first visit or pilgrimage to Haifa and 'Akká in Palestine. She had longed to meet in person the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, Shoghi Effendi, and learn from him how to tread more devotedly the highway of service; she wished to visit the Shrines of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá on Mount Carmel, and the Holy Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh at Bahji near 'Akká; she wished to lay her forehead in the dust of those Divine Thresholds and try to empty herself of all human conditions which she felt were still the dust on the mirror of her heart. This was undoubtedly the greatest intellectual and spiritual experience of her life, a holy benediction. Some of her experiences in this pilgrimage she wrote for the Bahá'í Magazine under the title Excerpts From My Diary.¹ And in these Diary Notes we believe are to be found one of the most beautiful and stirring pictures of a sacred visit to the Holy Land ever published. Keith touched the heights in this series. That they were both brilliantly and spiritually written is testified by the fact that Shoghi Effendi himself chose them for reproduction in The Bahá'í World.

Keith had indeed great literary talent, and one of the most vitally significant services that she rendered the Cause was her brilliant work as a contributor to the pages of the Bahá'í Magazine—a splendid monument to her loyalty and devotion. Her first article appeared in October 1924, entitled The Questing Soul. From it we quote the following important paragraph which so distinctly demonstrates how the seed of Bahá'í Truth had germinated in her heart and was influencing her mental processes:

"Suffocating humanity can only be revived from the noxious atmosphere of greed, selfishness and discord to which earthly standards and strivings subject it, by the gale of God's call through His Messenger to throw wide the portals of heart and mind to the purifying air of the spirit.

"The real giving up of the self, constituting the only release from struggle that the soul can ever know—is not possible until men firmly grasp the essential paradox that to think of the self, its preferments, its inordinate ambitions and crude vanities, brings no happiness; to forget the self and be caught up in the unlimited joy of a great ideal, the ineffable adoration of a Divine Guide and Seer, brings a security and radiance that no self-seeking, no fulfillment of personal ambition could ever know."

IN THE summer of 1931 she started on a trip which was to carry her around the world, never again to settle down in her native land. Her journey led her from Chicago to the Pacific Coast, visiting all Bahá'í Assemblies enroute—a teaching tour of great importance. Colleges, universities, clubs, associations of various kinds, churches, etc., opened their doors to her. And right here, perhaps it is important to state that her gifts and talents, both intellectually and spiritually, as referred to in this article, made it possible to serve all types of people, for she could meet inquirers on their own level of thought.

She sailed from San Francisco in the early winter of 1931. Her first visit was in Japan.¹ While she was in that country she visited the Keith just before she left Tihrán. She had been weeping, but tried to smile for the camera man.

Bahá'ís; and through Miss Agnes Alexander, resident Bahá'í teacher, she made many important contacts. While there she also wrote a significant series of articles on the Bahá'í Teachings for the Tokyo Nichi Nichi which were later published in the Bahá'í Magazine under the title Religion and Social Progress.²

From Japan she went to China and visited Hong Kong, Canton, Shanghai—devoting herself to the work of furthering the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh. The first sentence of her Letter about this visit, all Bahá'is who have traveled to other countries of the world will appreciate:

"What a glorious thing it is to be a Bahá'i and know that wherever you go there will always be those who extend a loving welcome; what a moving experience to see the eager smiling upturned faces of Bahá'is waiting to greet you as you sail into the ports of the world."

Keith's travels then led her to New Zealand where she made a significant study of the native Maoris. Her contacts were of an extremely important nature. She described some of them in her Letters Home.

Next she went to India, visiting the various Bahá'i communities throughout this great country. In her Letters Home on India there is this concluding paragraph:

"What but the power of Bahá'u'lláh can blot from men's recollection their outworn superstitions, their paralyzing dogmas and emancipate them for the sublime adventure of making of 'this world another world that will be filled with the holy ecstasy of the Grace of God?'"

SHE FINISHED this first part of her world tour by a second visit to Shoghi Effendi in Haifa, Palestine. Here she enjoyed a brief rest and the inspiration and communion with the Guardian of the Bahá'i Cause, to whom she was greatly devoted. But this rest did not last long, for Shoghi Effendi, fully appreciating her great gifts for service to the Cause, decided to make use of these talents in the land which gave birth to the Bahá'i Cause, Persia itself.

In the March 1933 number of the Bahá'i Magazine began the moving, heart-appealing, dynamic story of her visit to historic Bahá'i centers and her sojourn among her Bahá'i brothers and sisters in Persia—that land which is destined to occupy a central place in the religious history of the world. Starting with her visit to the Bahá'i village of Sisán, arranged for her by the Spiritual Assembly of Tabriz, she gives a record of such human and spiritual relationships that, as we live over again the scenes so vividly described by her, we are impelled to use her own words to express our feelings: "A triumphal progress so extravagant that it will remain forever—not an episode, but an acute emotional experience. . . . The real meaning of Bahá'i solidarity suddenly penetrated me. Here were Persians, speaking Turkish, fixed in a tiny town in the mountains of Adhirbáyján, and I an Occidental, cosmopolitan; but we were bound together by ties 'more lasting than bronze and higher than the exalted Pyramids.' For knowledge of the coming of Bahá'u'lláh and knowledge of His All-enfolding Covenant is not a question of locality, education or preferment but an unshakable spiritual reality that welds those who know it into an indissoluble human brotherhood. Here is a true solidarity that can withstand all the forces of disruption in the about Persia continued through the April, May, June and July, 1933, numbers of the Bahá'i Magazine. The continuity, thereafter, was interrupted, at her own request, so that precedence might be given to her three brilliant articles on Bahá'i Administration which she wrote at the command of Shoghi Effendi.

To do justice to her historic visits in Persia, to such places as Shiráz, the birthplace of the Báb, to the Shrine at Sheik Tabarsi "where first 'The Dawn-Breakers' of our Revelation gave 'the last full measure of devotion,' ' to Khurásán, Mazindarán, Tíhrán, and other places, is impossible in this brief account and also all too vastly important to the history of the Bahá'í Cause to be recorded in any other way save with the greatest degree of accuracy in regard to every detail. The Letters about Persia above referred to as printed in the Bahá'í Magazine give only those pictures which would be of interest to both Bahá'is and nonBahá'is alike. Intimate details, lacking in such accounts, will be given as the history of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh in Persia is written by official historians.

Letters from Bahá'is in Persia tell of the never-to-be-forgotten scenes as she bade farewell to them in every place she visited. She had left Tíhrán with the most affectionate and touching farewells from all—hundreds of Persian men and women crowded to see her departure, with tears in their eyes expressing their gratitude for the noble and valuable services she had rendered. They would be remembered by all, not only during this time, but by generations yet unborn for she served the Cause with a spirit of sacrifice, devotion and faithfulness.

Mrs. Ransom-Kehler had left Tíhrán on her return journey expecting to visit the southern cities of Persia. She stopped first in Isfahán, and while there was taken ill with smallpox and passed away in October, 1933. Her remains were interred near the place where well known martyrs of the Cause as well as other notable Bahá'is are buried.

THE MARVEL of the magnificently brilliant services of Keith in Persia is the fact that a western Bahá'í woman, born and raised in the United States, surrounded with all the luxuries of modern life as we know it, should be sent to the land of Bahá'u'lláh as an apostle of the Bahá'í religion to serve the Bahá'is and others in this capacity. She rendered such signal services as can only be adequately evaluated by Shoghi Effendi himself. Her goings-forth in that land where over twenty thousand Bahá'is had shed their blood in the path of this Cause in the early days of its history, can only be termed an overwhelming miracle; the mystery of it and the outer and inner meaning of it will be known in its true worth only as time passes.

NOT YOUNG, not strong physically, used to the refinements and even luxuries of life, with her type of capacity intellectually, she could have earned for herself a marvelous place in the world of letters and journalism, but she chose instead to give her all to the Bahá'í Cause. To even a very strong person the rigors of travel in unfrequented places, even in the great cities of the world, the numberless changes to which she was subjected, would have been difficult, and, in many instances, a hardship. In her magnificent services there was the element of daily sacrifice, and without this real and true sacrifice, a service has not been touched with the heart response.

Such souls have been known in past religious history, in the early days of a Manifestation, as saints—but today that does not mean the piousness of a religious recluse, but rather one who sacrifices everything that a material life holds dear to that greater type of life which becomes a reality to a Bahá'í when the creative effect of the Word of God recreates, transforms and transmutes the intensely human life into the life dominated by the spirit.

Just as she was known around the world for her brilliant Bahá'í services, so she will be mourned around the world. Her going seemed untimely, tragic, pathetic, sad beyond human words, but at the same time a great glory. As she slipped through the gate into the city of eternity we can be assured that “death was as glad-tidings to her,” and that in the life eternal and radiant she will continue her wonderful services.

There is one God; mankind is one; the foundations of religion are one. Let us worship Him, and give praise for all His great Prophets and Messengers who have manifested His brightness and glory.

Truth is one and without division. The teachings of Jesus are in a concentrated form. Men do not agree to this day as to the meaning of many of His sayings. His teachings are as a flower in the bud. Today the bud is unfolding into a flower. Bahá'u'llah has expanded and fulfilled the teachings, and has applied them in detail to the whole world.

THE PORTRAIT OF 'ABDU'L-BAHA

MARY HANFORD FORD

THE magnificent portrait of 'Abdu'l-Bahá painted by Sigismond Ivanowski at the request of Mrs. Frances Esty of Buffalo, N. Y., was on exhibition recently at the Bahá'i Center in New York City, and attracted widespread interest and universal admiration. It is noteworthy for its exceeding beauty of color and technical treatment which render it marvelous as a work of art, but more than this, it is so perfect a portrait of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that its presence seems to restore Him to the world.

After a number of experiments the artist decided that he must paint his subject in the open air surrounded by a landscape, which could not be recognized as local, and could not be designated as either oriental or occidental, because, he said, 'Abdu'l-Bahá belongs to the world and His spiritual power is felt everywhere. So the environment is a broadly painted landscape with a glimpse of blue sea, flowers, shrubbery and a great tree under which 'Abdu'l-Bahá is seated.

Mr. Ivanowski had never been in Palestine, he had never seen 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He had learned something of the Bahá'í Movement and was attracted toward it.

Mrs. Esty said to him, "Could you paint a portrait of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, never having seen Him?" He hesitated a moment, and then replied, "I could only do such a thing, Mrs. Esty, if I could come into the consciousness of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. I could not paint the portrait from a photograph."

So he returned to his studio armed with such copies of the Bahá'í literature as Mrs. Esty believed would be useful to him.

EVERY GREAT artist has the power of visualization, so that as he paints his subject he sees him with the inner eye, not merely the outer one. Such a power is almost unlimited, and is intensified by tranquility and meditation.

For six months the artist gave himself to his noble guest, and at the end of this period, he began to have definite designs for his portrait, out of which the beautiful final one emerged.

The artist felt that the personality of the figure must be definitely given, because it must be recognized by those who had known and loved Him, and must remain to posterity as a veritable portrait of the widely known and loved Prophet figure. Thus the portraiture is unquestionable in this wonderful painting. The features, the unforgettable eyes, the posture, the singularly vivid life of the painted form, so that one feels as if at any moment He would speak. All these characteristics create a masterpiece such as one seldom sees. Moreover through that marvelous faculty of visualization, Mr. Ivanowski has painted 'Abdu'l-Bahá seated on the low wall which separates his garden from the highway of Haifa, where He often sat a moment before leaving for the City or Mt. Carmel, or when He returned to His home surrounded by eager questioners who could not let Him go. The artist unintentionally caught a veritable moment from 'Abdu'l-Bahá's daily life, and preserved it for us.

Mr. Ivanowski says, "This is my masterpiece. I can never create anything like it again."

Sigismond Ivanowski is a distinguished Polish-American artist whose portraits have been cherished and sought on both sides of the Atlantic for many years.

"Can you paint upon the page of the world the ideal pictures of the Supreme Concourse? The pictures which are in the ideal world are eternal. I desire you to become such an artist. Man can paint those ideal pictures upon the tablet of existence with the brush of deeds.

"The holy divine Manifestations are all heavenly artists. Upon the canvas of creation, with the brush of their deeds and lives and actions, they paint immortal pictures which cannot be found in any art museum of Europe or America. But you find the masterpieces of these Spiritual Artists in the hearts."

THE FUNDAMENTAL CAUSE OF WORLD UNREST

IT would be idle, however, to contend that the war, with all the losses it involved, the passions it aroused and the grievances it left behind, has solely been responsible for the unprecedented confusion into which almost every section of the civilized world is plunged at present. Is it not a fact—and this is the central idea I desire to emphasize—that the fundamental cause of this world unrest is attributable, not so much to the consequences of what must sooner or later come to be regarded as a transitory dislocation in the affairs of a continually changing world, but rather to the failure of those into whose hands the immediate destinies of peoples and nations have been committed, to adjust their system of economic and political institutions to the imperative needs of a rapidly evolving age?

Are not these intermittent crises that convulse present-day society due primarily to the lamentable inability of the world's recognized leaders to read aright the signs of the times, to rid themselves once for all of their preconceived ideas and fettering creeds, and to reshape the machinery of their respective governments according to those standards that are implicit in Bahá'u'lláh's supreme declaration of the Oneness of Mankind—the chief and distinguishing feature of the Faith He proclaimed? For the principle of the Oneness of Mankind, the cornerstone of Bahá'u'lláh's world-embracing dominion, implies nothing more or less than the enforcement of His scheme for the unification of the world—the scheme to which we have already referred. “In every Dispensation,” writes ‘Abdu'l-Bahá, “the light of Divine Guidance has been focussed upon one central theme. . . . In this wondrous Revelation, this glorious century, the foundation of the Faith of God and the distinguishing feature of His Law is the consciousness of the Oneness of Mankind.”

A STOREHOUSE OF WISDOM

"The gift of God to this enlightened age is the knowledge of the oneness of mankind and of the fundamental oneness of religion."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

SIGNIFICANT at this time when, on the one hand, a great exposition and continual new inventions have centered attention upon the scientific progress of the last century and, on the other hand, conditions throughout the world are causing us to question the meaning of true progress, is the appearance of Dr. Hume's book, "Treasure-House of Living Religions".* Such a book does not command wide acclaim but it shows a change in attitude more deep-seated and more important for true progress than more widely heralded inventions and discoveries. And changes in attitude are nothing less than changes in human nature, that so-called static thing which the fearful and hopeless regard as incapable of change. The material in this book covers not a century but thirty centuries, yet a hundred years ago no one would have thought of making and publishing such a collection. A freedom of mind which enables us to see the strength, beauty and truth in all religions is a great step in advance.

The crust of our religious prejudices is beginning to crack. The comparative study of religions has been seriously undertaken only within the last fifty years and even now is largely concerned with the differences rather than the likenesses of the great religions of the world. Such a study paves the way for religious tolerance, the first step towards religious unity. How important religious unity is in bringing about that condition of world unity, peace and justice which is the crying need of the world today may be seen by reflecting upon the dissension, war and bloodshed that have been brought about in the past by religious intolerance and hatred.

WHILE THERE have been other collections of sacred scriptures this one we believe is unique in arrangement. The systematic classification of the extracts under headings and sub-headings makes it easy for anyone to compare for himself the teachings of eleven living religions. The complete annotations, references, indices and bibliography make it valuable as a book of reference and basis for further study.

But here we are concerned with the book as a source of inspiration and knowledge. May we linger long enough as we turn the pages to glean from this storehouse of wisdom a few bits of what the great ones of the ages have to say on the fundamental questions of life. Through countless ages "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God", while others a little less foolish have said, there are many gods. What do the scriptures say? In the Hindu we read:

"He is the God in every way supreme.
He the Lord of prayer, encompasseth all."
in the Christian Bible:

"There is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things and we in Him."

*Treasure-House of Living Religions. (Selections from their Sacred Scriptures), Robert E. Hume, Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

in the Qur'án:

"Shall I seek any other Lord than God, when He is Lord of all things!"
in the sacred book of the Sikh's:

"The greatness of the great God cannot be expressed.

He is the Creator, the Omnipotent, the Bounteous."

For ages, too, men have asked, Is this life all? And those of knowledge have always answered in such words as these from the Zoroastrian scriptures:

"The Wise Lord with dominion and piety
Shall give us welfare and immortality
In accordance with right by His holy spirit
And by best thought, deed and word."

or these from the Sikh:

"It is they who know not God, who are always dying.

It is they who die in divine knowledge, who are immortal."

or these from Taoist holy books:

"Life is a going forth. Death is a returning home."

or these from the Qur'án:

"Small the fruition of this world.

But the next life is the true good for him who feareth God.

And ye shall not be wronged so much as the skin of a date-stone."

or these from Confucius:

"But the spirit issues forth, and is displayed on high in a condition of glorious brightness."
