THE MASHRIQU'L-ADHKÁR

HOWEVER inspiring the conception of Bahá'í worship, as witnessed in the central Edifice of this exalted Temple, it cannot be regarded as the sole, nor even the essential, factor in the part which the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, as designed by Bahá'u'lláh, is destined to play in the organic life of the Bahá'í community. Divorced from the social, humanitarian, educational and scientific pursuits centering around the Dependencies of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, Bahá'í worship, however exalted in its conception, however passionate in fervor, can never hope to achieve beyond the meagre and often transitory results produced by the contemplations of the ascetic or the communion of the passive worshipper. It cannot afford lasting satisfaction and benefit to the worshipper himself, much less to humanity in general, unless and until translated and transfused into that dynamic and disinterested service to the cause of humanity which it is the supreme privilege of the Dependencies of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár to facilitate and promote. Nor will the exertions, no matter how disinterested and strenuous, of those who within the precincts of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár will be engaged in administering the affairs of the future Bahá'í Commonwealth, fructify and prosper unless they are brought into close and daily communion with those spiritual agencies centering in and radiating from the central Shrine of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár.

Nothing short of direct and constant interaction between the spiritual forces emanating from this House of Worship centering in the heart of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, and the energies consciously displayed by those who administer its affairs in their service to humanity can possibly provide the necessary agency capable of removing the ills that have so long and so grievously afflicted humanity. For it is assuredly upon the consciousness of the efficacy of the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, reinforced on one hand by spiritual communion with His Spirit, and on the other by the intelligent application and the faithful execution of the principles and laws He revealed, that the salvation of a world in travail must ultimately depend. And of all the institutions that stand associated with His Holy Name, surely none save the institution of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár can most adequately provide the essentials of Bahá'í worship and service, both so vital to the regeneration of the world. Therein lies the secret of the loftiness, of the potency, of the unique position of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár as one of the outstanding institutions conceived by Bahá'u'lláh.

"Thousands of Mashriqu'l-Adhkárs, dawning-points of praise and mentionings of God for all religionists, will be built in the Orient and Occident, but this being the first one erected in the Occident has great importance. In the future there will be many here and elsewhere: in Asia, Europe, even Africa, New Zealand and Australia, but this edifice in Chicago is of especial significance."
—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

REW are aware that there is being erected in the suburbs of Chicago a Shrine which is expressive of a great and grandiloquent emotion of the human heart, namely, that of the brotherhood of man—an International Shrine dedicated to the oneness of mankind and the oneness of religion. This is the Bahá'í Temple or Mashriqu'l-Adhkár which is being erected on the shores of Lake Michigan in the beautiful suburb of Chicago—Wilmette, Ill.

There are two unique features of this monument to the Bahá'í Movement. The first is the marvelously beautiful and creative architecture in which it is phrased—an architecture described elsewhere in this issue, and universally recognized as "the first thing new in architecture since the thirteenth century." The second, of still greater import, is the fact that this Bahá'í Temple expresses the longing dreams and spiritual aspirations of countless Bahá'ís among the different races and religions of this planet who look with eagerness to the completion of such a visible expression of their faith in this land of freedom, prosperity, advanced civilization, high humanitarian ideals and tolerance.

Nor is the interest taken by the adherents of this Faith limited only to good wishes. In deeds of sacrifice, rather, is their cooperation manifested. Since the inception of this Temple, many countries and many religionists have contributed generously of their funds, even to the point of extreme sacrifice. The following are a few expressions of consecration out of the many on record:

'ABDU'L-BAHA has told the story of the widow of a martyr who was left with two young children to support. She provided for them by knitting socks; the proceeds from one sock she used for their support, and what she received for the other sock was her glad offering toward the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár. 'Abdu'l-Bahá then said, "It is this spirit which will build the Temple."

"Truly, I say, the friends of God displayed wonderful generosity in regard to the contributions for the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár. They displayed magnanimity at any cost to such an extent that some of them sold portions of their clothing on the street.

"Praise be to God! that at this moment, from every country in the world, according to their various means, contributions are continually being sent toward the fund of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár in America. . . . From the day of Adam until now, such an event has never been witnessed by man, that from the farthest country of Asia, contributions were forwarded to the farthest country of America.

“Contributions for the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár are most important. Notwithstanding the miserable condition of Persia, money has poured in and is still coming for this purpose. Although many families are extremely poor, so that they have scarcely enough to keep them, nevertheless they give towards it. For many years the West has contributed towards the East, and now, through the Mercies and Bounties of God, a miracle has been performed, and for the first time in the history of the world the East is contributing to the West.”

THESE are only a few instances, but the stories of similar sacrifices could easily make many chapters if recorded. Suffice it to say that from Australia comes a regular flow of gifts for the Divine Edifice. From Persia, India, England, France, from Honolulu and Maui, Hawaii, and from groups and individual Bahá'is everywhere comes the evidence that unity in God is a living thing through the creative power of the Word of Bahá'u'lláh.

No less a personage than the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, Shoghi Effendi—who has said that “the specific Bahá'í institutions should be viewed in the light of Bahá'u'lláh's gifts bestowed upon the world”—has set an example in the divine art of real sacrifice when he forwarded the most precious possession from the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh to be sold for the Bahá'í Temple Fund in this country, and he has regularly contributed every month to the National Bahá'í Fund of America.

It is indeed the beginning of a new world cycle when the Orient actually contributes money to the Occident. Is this not the symbol of true love and brotherhood—knowing as all do the relatively impoverished condition of those people compared with that of America?

IN THIS TURNING of the thoughts and dreams of the Orient toward the New World and the awareness of the spiritual evolution going on in America, one finds the miraculous enlargement of the Asiatic consciousness which only true religion could have brought about. For to the illiterate peasant of Asia in general, the New World hardly has existence; or if any, but nebulous and unformed. Yet to the Bahá'is of Persia, Rangoon, and even of the jungles of India, America exists as an entity sufficiently to call forth their loving sacrifices. This is more than human education could have accomplished.

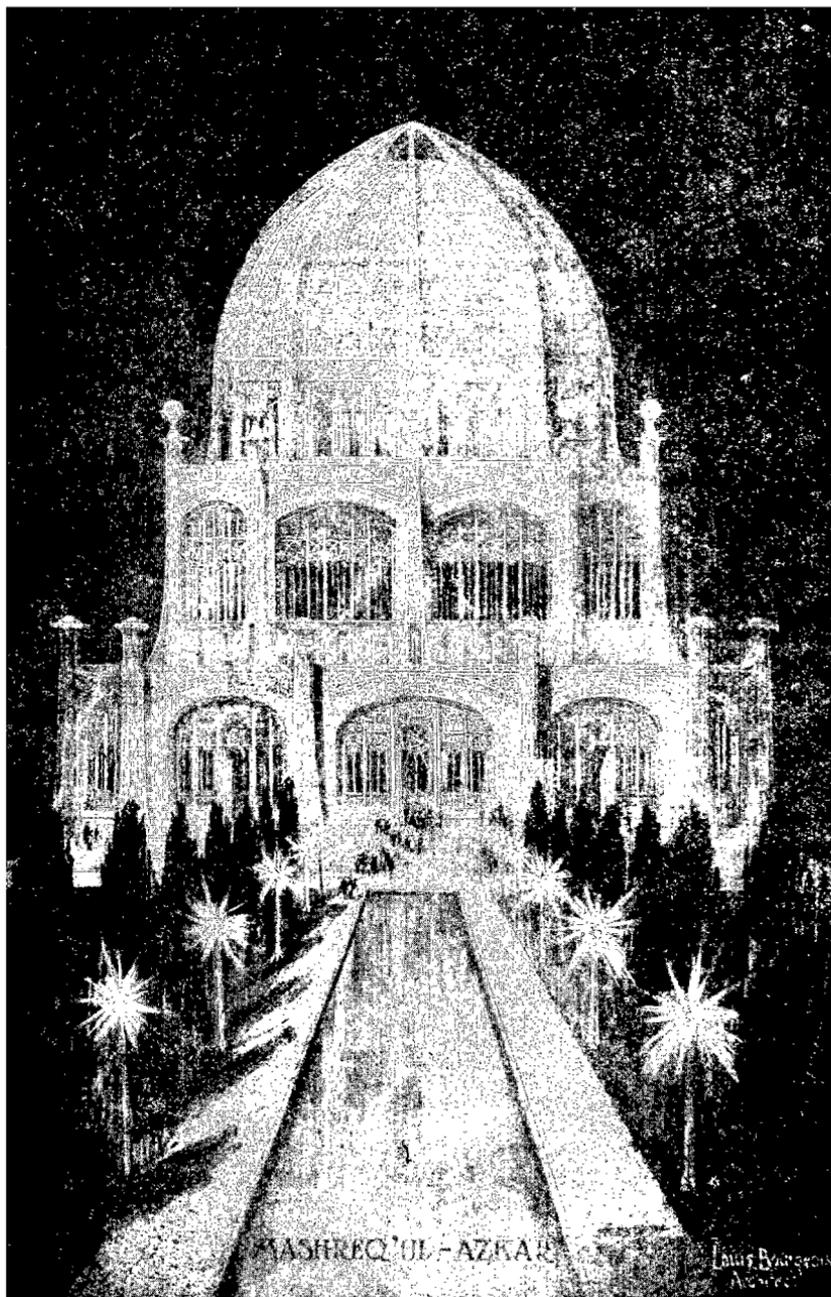

As witnessed in the article in this issue by A. H. Naimi on “Martha L. Root in Persia,” the Persian Bahá'is look with real vision toward America. The vision of what this dynamic rapidly evolving people of the New World will ultimately achieve for the Universal Bahá'í Faith, becomes the daily inspiration and stimulus to our brothers and sisters around the world.

WHEN THE DIVINE SUN SHINES

IN the divine Holy Books there are unmistakable prophecies giving the glad-tidings of a certain Day in which the Promised One of all the Books would appear, a radiant dispensation be established, the banner of the Most Great Peace and reconciliation be hoisted, and the oneness of the world of humanity proclaimed. Among the various nations and peoples of the world no enmity or hatred would remain. All hearts were to be connected one with another. These things are recorded in the Taurat or Old Testament, in the Gospel, in the Qur'án, in the Zend Avesta, in the Books of Buddha, and in the Book of Confucius. In brief, all the Holy Books contain these glad-tidings. In all of them it is announced that after the world has been surrounded by darkness, then radiance shall appear. For just as the night, when it becomes excessively dark, precedes the dawn of a new day, so likewise when the darkness of religious apathy and heedlessness overtakes the world, when human souls become negligent of God, when materialistic ideas overshadow idealism and spirituality, when nations become submerged in the world of matter and forget God—at such a time as this shall the Divine Sun shine forth and the Radiant Morn appear.

“During the years when the darkness of heedlessness was most intense in the Orient and the people were so submerged in imitations that nations were thirsting for each other’s blood, considering one another as contaminated and refusing mutual association—at such a time as this His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh appeared. He arose in the Orient, uprooting the very foundations of superstition and brought the dawn of the Light of Reality. Various nations became united, because all desired the Reality. Inasmuch as they investigated the Reality of religion they found that all men are the servants of God, all are the posterity of Adam, all are children of one household, and that the foundations of all the Prophets are one. For inasmuch as the Teachings of the Prophets are Reality, their foundations are one. . . . Through Bahá’u’lláh the nations and peoples grew to understand and comprehend this. . . . After centuries of hatred and bitterness the Christian, Jew, Zoroastrian, Muhammadan and Buddhist arose for amity—all of them in the utmost love and unity. They became welded and cemented because they had all arrived at Reality.”

THE MASHRIQU'L-ADHKÁR IN AMERICA

HOW ARCHITECTURE IS EXPRESSING THE RENEWAL OF RELIGION

SHAHNAZ WAITE

There is now building near Chicago the first expression on the material plane in America of the Bahá'í Movement for universal peace and the brotherhood of man. The Bahá'í Movement, dedicated to the great task never yet achieved by humanity of bringing to pass the Kingdom of God on earth, is fittingly expressed in the uniquely new type of architecture considered by leading authorities to be the first absolutely new creation in architecture since the Gothic.

IN approaching the great subject of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár* one feels the inadequacy of human words or terms—so great is it, so mystical and holy, and yet so practical that it “rises above words and letters, and transcends the murmur of syllables and sounds.” In its isolated beauty, its deep spiritual significance, its mystical symbolism and its perfect reflection of a Divine Reality—it stands unique and alone in the world today. It is something which must be felt and realized in the heart. It cannot be comprehended by the mind alone.

LET US DESCRIBE the Temple not by our own definition but rather in the words of prominent journalists and notables who have expressed themselves eloquently concerning it in our leading newspapers and magazines, therefore we will briefly review some of the Press notices which appeared at the time the model of this sacred edifice was exhibited in the Kevorkian Gallery, New York City, in the year 1921. The New York “Tribune” and “Sun” reproduced it in their roto-gravure sections. The New York “American” gave it the major portion of its art page, with a long comment beginning with the words, “Many persons who have seen the model for this building say that it will be the most beautiful structure in the world. Some go so far as to say it will be the most beautiful structure ever erected.”

Sherwin Cody, writing a charming article in the magazine section of the New York “Times” said, “Americans will have to pause and study it long enough to find that an artist has wrought into this building the conception of a Religious League of Nations.”

The New York “World” gave the Temple a full page article. The “Evening Post” twice granted it most generous notice and appreciation. The magazines were equally impressed. The “Prompter” published a full page article with illustration. “Architecture,” one of the most sumptuous magazines of art and architecture in the country, devoted a page to comment and illustration of the model, reproducing among other appreciations the criticism of H. Van Buren Magonigle, President of the Architectural League, who said of the model, “It is the first new idea in architecture since the thirteenth Century. I want to see it erected,” *“Mashriqu'l-Adhkar means literally “Dawning-place of the mentioning or worship of God.” It is an inclusive term, referring not only to the Temple proper but the accessory buildings surrounding it.

The "Architectural Record," one of the most esteemed of the architectural journals, gave great space to the Temple saying, "It is singularly beautiful; it is bristling with a charming symbolism in which is found the suggestion of all the religions of mankind, and to the psychologist it is startling because the creator frankly declares "It is Bahá'u'lláh's Temple, I am only the channel through which it came."

The "Underwood Press" sent out designs of the model and comments which appeared in practically every paper in the country, even the weekly papers of tiny villages printed reviews. The "Literary Digest" reproduced it with most favorable comment. "Art and Architecture" gave it an extended mention with beautiful reproduction, saying, among other things, "So beautiful is this model and so different from anything man has ever before designed, either as an abode, or as a place of worship, that it has caused much discussion among architects and sculptors and in the newspapers."

The "Outlook" gave a reproduction of the completed Temple and sections of the beautiful dome with description.

The San Francisco "Chronicle," the newspapers of St. Louis, Kansas City, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia,—all have published long articles commenting on the beauty of the architecture of the Bahá'í Temple in glowing terms.

In the "Christian Register" appeared an article under the caption, "A Wonderful House of Worship. Description of the New Bahá'í Temple said to be the Greatest Architectural Achievement of Modern Times." The writer comments first upon the religious purpose of the Temple, enumerating the Universal Principles which are the firm foundation of the Bahá'í Movement. Most appreciatively he dwells upon the exquisite, original architectural details of the Temple, and the historical attention given the Bahá'í Movement in all encyclopedias, together with the great central figures, the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

"Wonderful as the architectural design of the Temple is," says this same writer, "those most concerned in its erection, see in the universal service it will render to mankind its supreme importance. The Bahá'í Message is primarily a Message of Unity. It recognizes the divine elements which underlie all great world religions."

In the Japan "Times and Mail," Tokyo, February 16th, 1921, appeared the following: "Bahá'í Temple is Art Revelation. Modeled by Louis Bourgeois. Combines the Essence of all Schools. Marvel of Century Verdict of Experts. It is a Temple of Peace whose Portals will Welcome Members of all Creeds.

"A new creation of transcendent beauty has dawned upon the horizon of the architectural world. The model of the great Bahá'í Temple, now on exhibition at the Kevorkian Gallery, 57th St., New York, is being visited by increasing throngs and it has been an object of professional, artistic and general interest since its installment there in April of this year. Like many—indeed most—of the great art productions, this has come from one who has endured struggle against discouraging deprivation and deferred hopes, but the universality of the praise bestowed upon the model finally evolved must bring the fullest degree of recompense for years of battling against depressing odds.

“Louis Jean Bourgeois, the architect and sculptor, is the designer of this marvelously beautiful model of a Temple, to be erected as a demonstration of the teachings and precepts of the Bahá'í Movement at Wilmette, Ill., on the shores of Lake Michigan, to occupy a central location in a beautiful tract of nine acres, already purchased, skirted by the Lincoln Highway.

“It is a Temple of Peace, whose broad portals of welcome and encouragement to devotees of any religion, and all religions, shall be always open. From a total of many different designs on exhibit at a recent Convention of Bahá'ís in New York, the Bourgeois model was the one accorded unanimous acceptance. Beside its Spiritual appeal the famed beauties of the Taj Mahal grow strangely pale.

“It has been interesting to note the effect of this Twentieth Century creation upon those who have devoted a careful study to its in-describable loveliness. Professor Luigi Quaglino, ex-professor of Architecture of Turin, Italy, has been a recent visitor in New York. He visited the exhibit for a brief survey, but he remained fully three hours, and for two hours without speaking. His study resulted in the declaration, ‘This is a new creation which will revolutionize architecture in the world and it is the most beautiful I have ever seen. Without doubt it will have a lasting page in history. It is a revelation from another world.’”

George Grey Barnard, the most widely known sculptor in America, declared by London critics the “greatest sculptor America has ever produced, and a famous Archeologist,” pronounced it “the greatest creation since the Gothic period and the most beautiful he had ever seen.”

Mozo Samuel, one of the foremost writers on religious drama, the author of the play, “Esther,” said: “Prior to this time no architecture has made any deep impression upon me, but this Temple model has thrilled me and I desire to visit it again and again, and to be alone with this marvelous creation.”

Musicians, artists, poets and editors have fallen victim to the lure of its spiritual beauty, and masses of the lay public have been enthralled by its magnetism.

Mrs. Mary Hanford Ford, a Bahá'í teacher, who spent much time at the Kevorkian Gallery in New York and the Art Institute in Chicago at the time the Temple model was exhibited in these respective places, writes of her experiences with the Temple as follows:

“New York: Since the Temple model has been on exhibition at the Kevorkian Gallery, its history has been very interesting. The model has a distinctive personality; to see it is like having an interview with a Holy and Magnificent Personage. For instance, one day the editor of a theatrical magazine came in. He was something of a scoffer, and had evidently heard unpleasant things about the Bahá'í Movement. So he began to criticise the Temple. "It is a very pretty thing," he remarked in a superior tone, "but it is over-decorated; it will be an absurdity in its full size." So the caretaker of the Temple model very gently began to show him the significance of the decoration, how each line and curve was an expression of a great thought or a noble principle, so that all the spiritual traditions and future aspirations of the human race seemed embedded in this Temple. His face changed and grew soft. His eyes began to shine; then and there the Spirit penetrated him and, though he came to stay five minutes, he was in the heavenly presence two hours and left it regretfully. Now he has opened his magazine to articles on the Bahá'í Movement.

"A boy of eleven came rushing up the stairs one day and stopped suddenly on the threshold with a 'Gee!' He had been studying architecture in school and wanted to see this 'new thing.' He could not repress his enthusiasm. I heard him talking about it next day to some children on the street, and he brought in a little girl friend to share the treasure he had discovered.

"The colored people came in and sat quietly drinking in the lovely Presence, which makes realities of love, brotherhood, the immortal life and sympathy. No one leaves this Presence cold and critical, and no one can utter gossip or criticism or scandal within its lovely radiation.

So one can imagine what the great Temple will be when it rears its stately head in the blue heaven and all men feel it.

"From Chicago: The first week the Temple was on exhibition there at the Art Institute, thirty-four thousand people visited this magnificent gallery. They crowded around the glorious model spell-bound. One woman said, 'It is like our dreams of fairyland, its tracery is so ethereal.' Architects exclaimed, 'It is a marvel of engineering.' An artist fresh from Paris stood before it perhaps an hour in growing wonder as though a light were kindling within him. As he walked away, awed as by a heavenly vision, he said, 'It is the most beautiful building I have seen in all the world.'

"None of these people knew about the Bahá'í Cause. But, as one woman said, 'Just to enter the Temple will bring the peace which passeth understanding.' She went out of the room with a new light in her eyes as though she had looked into the unseen kingdom.

"Some stand before it for hours studying every detail. Then they ask: 'What does it stand for? Tell us about it.'

"A Bahá'í saw it for the first time in the quiet peace of the evening. She said, 'That Temple came from heaven. What marvelous lines! What celestial beauty! Just to stand before it is a spiritual experience. It is so pure! So holy! Like the worlds of God.' If the model so gloriously proclaims the Cause of Unity, what will the Temple itself accomplish? It will attract the people by tens of thousands to the New Kingdom of God which has descended among the nations.”

So much for the comments of press and individuals regarding the marvelous beauty of the model of the Temple, exhibited nine years ago. Since that time articles upon the Bahá'í Temple and pictures have appeared from time to time in nearly every newspaper of America, and various magazines, both national and international.

Of his model, the architect has written: “The Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh unify the religions of the world into one universal religion, and as we know that all great historic religions developed a new architecture, so the Bahá'í Temple is the plastic symbol of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh.

“As the essence of the pure original teachings of the historic religions was the same (though they have grown apart because of additions which have resulted in dogmas and rituals—the real cause of separation) in the Bahá'í Temple is used a composite architecture, expressing the essence in the line of each of the great architectural styles, harmonizing them into one whole.” Their decorative motifs the architect omits, for to him they represent theological differences and dogmas. Instead, he has used for his decorative motif a mathematical combination of lines which permit him to harmonize all the great architectural styles into a harmonious whole. In the Bahá'í Temple is the essence of the Egyptian architecture, the Greek, the Roman, the Arabic, the Gothic, the Renaissance. Mathematical figures crown the Temple dome, representing the orbital curve of the planets around the sun.

Mr. Bourgeois then refers the reader to the article on the “Symbolism of the Bahá'í Temple,” by Mary Hanford Ford, which appeared in print some years ago when the model was on exhibit at the Art Institute in Chicago, from which we quote in part: “The great Bahá'í Temple, the construction of which has really begun in Chicago, will interest every one in the beauty of its symbolic story as soon as its walls rise into the air. The symbolism may be read, of course, with perfect clearness in the perfection of the Temple's model, which is the completed Temple in miniature. We have been accustomed to declare in New York, ‘The Temple model is a personality, it talks,’ or, as some prefer to say, ‘it sings,’ but no one would apply to it the term ‘frozen music’ because its musical impression is so warm and vibrant that it is impossible to think of anything frozen in its presence.

“All who are familiar with the building of the Temple model through Louis Bourgeois, its architect, are aware that it is purely a work of inspiration. Louis Bourgeois is an architect of wide experience, culture and learning. He has been for years first an eager student of spiritual truths and then a follower of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. So he is naturally familiar with the religious symbology of mankind. But he did not create the remarkable symbolism of the Temple model. He recognized it with joy, after it appeared through his gifted fingers in the intricate and beautiful tracery of the Temple model's ornamentation, or structural combinations. But he did not say, 'Here I will put a triangle, there a circle, yonder a nine-pointed star.' In each case there would have been merely an awkward juxtaposition of significant forms without beauty, for beauty—which the Temple model expresses in such entrancing degree—is the gift of God and comes only from God.

"The structure of the Temple is such that at night all of its surface will be a blaze of light. Its decorations are cut completely through the structural material, which is to be lined with transparent glass, so that at night each column and buttress ornament, as well as the stars and crosses and the 'milky way' of the dome, will shine forth like an embroidery upon the darkness.

"The nine ribs joined above the surface of the dome are 'like hands clasped in prayer,' Bourgeois says, and in the space between their union and the rounded top of the dome proper will shine a great electric light, sending forth nine rays into the darkness of the night, and forming a glorious illumined climax to the beautiful nonegon structure. So the Temple will be veritably a temple of light in this day of resurrection, of brotherhood, and new civilization."

EVEN A PHOTOGRAPH of the Temple is far reaching in its effects. The writer recalls a meeting held in her home some time ago for the promulgation of the Bahá'í Message. The president of the Theosophical Society of that city was present. The subject of the Temple was not mentioned during the presentation of the Bahá'í Principles. All during the talk this lady sat spellbound, her eyes fixed upon the picture of the Temple which hung upon the wall. At the close of the meeting she turned to the writer and exclaimed, "O, do tell me what building is that a picture of; is it not a Temple?" "Yes," was the reply. "Where? Where is it?" she eagerly asked. When told it was a picture of the model of the Bahá'í Temple which was in process of building in Wilmette, near Chicago, she arose and went up to the picture and stood in silence with clasped hands and bowed head before it. Soon the tears ran down her cheeks. For a moment or two there was absolute silence in the room, then she turned and with a radiant smile exclaimed, "I never was so deeply moved in all my life. As I sat looking at the picture a great something seemed to flow forth from it, like powerful emanations from a Divine Presence within. Emanations that were the essence of divine love, the essence of unity and peace, such peace as I have never felt before but dreamed of, that peace upon which all unity depends and upon which the brotherhood of man alone can be established, that peace which is oneness with God."

It has been said: "The Bahá'í Temple is more than an abstract symbol, even though a true and faithful reflection of the Spirit of the Age. It is a concretion of that spirit, an organ by which that spirit is enabled to contact, and hence influence social life at all points. It is the Body of the Cause of God, the material Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, visibly and in- visibly causing the social organization to progress. It is the first nucleus of the divine civilization, the focal point around which that civilization will grow to full world stature. The spiritually-minded person who desires a true index to the progress of reality in this age may well adopt the Bahá'í Temple as that index, for this Temple will not and cannot be constructed merely by financial contributions. It will come into being materially step by step, according as the new cosmic reality is felt in the minds and hearts of men. Already the Bahá'í Temple has this distinction; contributions have been made to it by representatives of a greater number of races, classes, and nationalities than have ever united to further any other plan. Its appeal triumphs over every false distinction and division imposed upon mankind by the limitations of the past.

“The Bahá'í Temple comes into being unprejudiced for or against any existing group, free from historical limitations, and from its very foundation consecrated to the Ideal of Unity. And what is Unity but the very triumph and vindication of spiritual love? When the Bahá'í Temple is completed we will have a holy place where members of every race, creed and class can gather in oneness to worship the one true God.”

No other Temple in the world had a Manifestation of God stand upon its grounds and dedicate them; hold up His Blessed Hands in supplication to God, standing upon that Holy Spot, made so by His Presence, and pray for those who arose to help build this Temple and for all who should in the future enter it. To have seen 'Abdu'l-Bahá so standing; to have seen Him loosen the first shovelful of earth; to have seen Him symbolically lay the cornerstone by placing a stone in the ground (which stone is now in the Foundation Hall, awaiting the actual laying of the outer cornerstone, in which this spiritual one will be placed)—to have heard His address in the tent set up on the grounds for this occasion, and to have heard the benediction sung at the close of this never-to-be-forgotten service—was to realize that not until the coming of another Manifestation of God to this earth could such a divine event occur again. That is why this Temple is called the “Mother Temple” of all the others that will, in all the years to come, be built, and that is why to have sacrificed in any way, or to have served in any manner in the building of this Temple of Temples will become a crown of everlasting glory, and future generations will look back to this Great Day of God, when the Manifestation of His Glory stood upon this earth, and the Branch of His Planting built the “Temple of the Lord” and will envy all those who were privileged to be a part of it. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said they will say, “Gladly would I give all I have in this world could I but be of those who were so blessed.”

* * *

LET US CONSIDER the following words written or spoken by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to different Bahá'ís at different times regarding the Temple's deep inner significances, and what it represents to the world of humanity. At the time of its inception He wrote, "Now the day has arrived in which the edifice of God, the divine sanctuary, the spiritual temple, shall be erected in America."

"Its building is the most important of all things. This is the spiritual foundation; for that reason it is the most important of all foundations; from this spiritual foundation will come forth all manner of advancement and progress in the world of humanity, therefore how great is its import."

To another Bahá'í 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote, "The Temple is the most great foundation of the world of humanity, and it has many branches. Although the Temple is the place of worship, with it is connected a hospital, pharmacy, pilgrim's house, school for orphans and university for the study of higher sciences. Every Temple is connected with these five things. The Temple is not only a place of worship; nay, it is perfect in every way."

In view of these facts, the following words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá have a profound meaning. He said, "In the Bahá'í Cause, arts, sciences and all crafts are considered as worship"; and "service is prayer." We see from these glorious ideals for which the Temple stands that to enter it and worship and pray is not enough. Faith without deeds is dead. What one receives in moments of exaltation and heavenly inspiration within its sacred walls must be translated into actual service to the world of humanity, hence the material means of this service must surround this House of Worship, this "Holy of Holies" wherein the soul of man may be "recharged" with divine power from on high and go forth and prove his contact with the "Heavenly Beloved One" in deeds of love and helpfulness to His humanity, for our love of God is only in proportion as we love His creatures.

Further, 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote, "Today the establishment of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is of paramount importance. . . It is an expression of the elevation of the Word of God. Particularly the arrangement of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is such that it will exert the greatest effect upon the civilized world for it has many accessories. Among them are the following: a school for orphans, a college for higher scientific education—(or higher knowledge)—a hospital, a home for cripples, a hospice.

"When the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár with its accessories, is established in the world, aside from its religious or spiritual influence, it will have a tremendous effect upon civilization. Aside from the religionists who will feel its influence, materialists will not be exempt therefrom. Moreover it contains divine wisdoms, spiritual effects upon the intellects and thoughts. Subsequent to its erection these will become evident."

REGARDING THE contributions which have come in from all over the world, which have paid in full for the land and for the erection of the Foundation so far, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "These contributions are most important.—Notwithstanding the miserable condition of Persia, money has poured in and is still coming for this purpose, although many families are extremely poor, so that they have scarcely enough to keep themselves, nevertheless, they give towards it. For many years the West has contributed to the East, and now through the mercies and bounties of God a miracle has been performed and, for the first time in the history of the world, the East is contributing to the West."

It was the writer's privilege to have been a guest in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's prison home in 'Akká, Palestine, and to have heard Him say these words; and shortly after, on her return voyage, she met on shipboard while sailing from Port Said, Egypt, to Naples, Italy, a most charming young Hindu, an architect, then living in London. He had been a Muhammadan, but had accepted the Christian Faith. In describing the sad conditions in the Holy Land brought about by religious and racial prejudice, the writer said, "But such conditions will soon be over; it is the Dawn of the New Day of Universal Brotherhood."

He answered, "That is but a poet's dream. I was raised in a Muhammadan home, and a Muhammadan by faith, and my childhood memories are painfully tainted with religious prejudice. It was emphasized continually, and now that I am a Christian I am cut off from my family. I have become, in their sight, an 'infidel.' Religious unity will never come on this earth I feel sure."

"What would you think of a Universal Temple built to the one God, through contributions from every religion, class and race?"

"Such an edifice will never be built. The ideal is glorious, but the fulfillment of it impossible," he answered.

"Well," replied the writer, "it surely will for the ground is nearly paid for, and when fully paid for the contributions will then be given over to the building fund of this divine sanctuary and, in time, this glorious Temple will arise like the fulfillment of Tennyson's beautiful vision, 'I dreamed that stone on stone I reared a sacred fane; a Temple—neither Pagod, Mosque, nor Church; but loftier, simpler, always opened doored, to every breath from heaven; and Truth and Peace, and Love and Justice came and dwelt therein.' Such," said she, "will be the Bahá'í Temple."

The young Hindu's eyes grew wide with wonderment and he said, with evident amazement, "Can this be possible?"

"Yes; it is gloriously true."

With marked reverence and realization he answered, "Then God has indeed performed a miracle."

"Ah, my friend," the writer replied, "it is a miracle, the miracle of the ages, brought about by the power of God, manifested through Bahá'u'lláh and His Word, to unite the hearts of His children and establish the Reality of Unity in the world."

TO AN AMERICAN Bahá'í, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "Draw your inspiration from the Taj Mahal."

All that have seen the Taj Mahal who are spiritually-minded testify to a marvelous spirit, a "mystical something" which emanates from it and which touches the heart and soul and transcends words to describe. Its beauty seems of another world. And yet by critics it is said: "Beside the appeal of the Bahá'í Temple the Taj Mahal grows strangely pale." Up to the present day the "Taj" has reigned supreme in the realm of architecture, and is generally conceded to be the most beautiful Temple now existent. What is the secret of its divine beauty, and the mystic spell it exerts over those who behold it?

"Where lies the secret of its spell, which thousands of men and women from every land and clime, through successive generations have attested? To say that it lies in its literally unique architectural perfection would be true, but one must carry the quest further. That miracle itself must be accounted for.

"Perhaps the ultimate explanation is to be found in the domain of mystic truth, rather than in that of material design. Is it not true that of all the great and historic monuments of the world the "Taj" alone was inspired by, and raised to love?

"The world's palaces are the witness to human vanity; its commemorative pillars and arches to human glory; its cathedrals and mosques and temples to human piety. But the Taj Mahal was designed as a memorial to an eternal love—at once human and divine. It is an epic of undying faith in immortality and unending devotion. Its motive was not egotism but adoration. It was dedicated—not to self, but to spirit. Hence its unending splendor and grace."

"DRAW YOUR INSPIRATION from the Taj Mahal"—for the Bahá'í Temple. How may we apply this instruction? Might it not mean that as the "Taj" is a monument to the eternal love of two wedded hearts, joined in that "eternal union which endures throughout all the worlds of God" (as 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said) that the Bahá'í Temple is a monument to the eternal love and union of the East and West? The "Taj," an individual expression, the Bahá'í Temple a universal one?

The East symbolizes the receptive, negative, spiritual and feminine aspect of Spirit, while the West symbolizes the positive, creative, mental and masculine aspect of Spirit. The East—the Spiritual bride. The West—the bridegroom of creative mental power. The East the heart—the West the mind, and only as heart and mind are united, each equally developed and in perfect harmony and balance, can the child of the new civilization come forth.

'Abdu'l-Bahá has said: "Praise be to God; the Infinite Bounty of God hath resuscitated the whole world and the East and the West have become united with the bond of the summons of God. This is the teaching for the East and the West, therefore the East and the West will understand each other, and will reverence each other, and embrace like long parted lovers who have found each other."

"From the inception of the world until now there have been no uniting bonds between Persia and America, and communication and correspondence never transpired between these two countries. Now consider what a joy and bliss have united these two regions in the shortest space of time. What a real and ideal tie hath bound them together. What spiritual communications have been revealed; and now is only the beginning of this early dawn. Soon will the star of unity shine forth and flood all the horizons with the Light, and perfect connection and real oneness be obtained in all regions of the earth."

May not this great union be consummated in the building of the Divine Temple?

May this not be the mystery of the Temple? "Its mystery is great and cannot be unveiled yet," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá. "In the future it will be made plain." And may not those who kneel to pray in this divine sanctuary say with understanding hearts, "O God! Turn our faces toward the beauty of Thy oneness and gladden our bosoms with the signs of Thy divine unity. Adorn our bodies with the robe of Thy bounty and remove from our eyes the veil of sinfulness and give us the chalice of Thy grace; that the essence of all beings may sing Thy praise before the vision of Thy grandeur. Reveal then Thyself, O Lord! by Thy merciful utterance and the mystery of Thy divine being, that the holy ecstasy of prayer may fill our souls—a prayer that shall rise above words and letters, and transcend the murmur of syllables and sounds, that all things may be merged into nothingness before the revelation of Thy splendor."

A MONUMENT TO LOVE and to the "mystery of sacrifice." Bahá'u'lláh sacrificed all that this ideal might become manifest to mankind. Consider these words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Bahá'u'lláh was a prisoner for twenty-five years. During all this time He was subjected to the indignities and revilement of the people. He was persecuted, mocked and put in chains. His properties were pillaged and His possessions confiscated. First banishment from Persia to Bagdad; then to Constantinople, then to Adrianople; finally from Roumelia to the prison of 'Akká. He bore these ordeals, suffered these calamities and difficulties, in order that a manifestation of selflessness and service might become apparent in the world of humanity, that the "Most Great Peace" should become a reality . . . that heavenly miracles would be wrought among men; that human faith should be strengthened and purified, that the precious, priceless bestowal of God, the human mind, might be developed to its fullest capacity in the temple of the body; and man become the reflection and likeness of God, even as it hath been revealed in the Bible—"We will create man in Our Own Image."

Bahá'u'lláh bore all these calamities and endured all ordeals and suffering through selfless love and service—the very essence of all love—that His Revelation might be given to the world. Thus the Bahá'í Temple is a symbol of the Invisible Temple not made by hands, eternal in the heavens—a symbol of the Body of the Manifestation and His Message to humanity, and of the body, or human temple of man, and its relationship to God. Great is its glory! Great is its mystery! It can arise alone through love and through sacrifice.

PHYSICAL FEATURES OF THE MASHRIQU'L-ADHKÁR

ALLEN B. MCDANIEL

The author of this article is a member of The Research Service, an engineering firm in Washington, D. C. Mr. McDaniel has given much attention to the construction problems of the Bahá'í Temple, the design of which calls for wholly new methods of technique in construction. The difficulties to be overcome are herein explained.

THE design of the Bahá'í Temple, which has been so well described by the architect, Mr. Louis Bourgeois, is extraordinary. The more one studies it, the more one realizes its uniqueness. It is a new style, symbolic of the universality and spiritual significance of the Revelation of this Age.

Even a casual inspection of the Temple design impresses one with the elaborateness and ornateness of the exterior surface. Of so apparently a complex and exotic character, one wonders how and of what material or materials such a structure can be built. A further study reveals the unappropriateness and impracticability of using natural stone for the surface material. The expenditure of time, effort, and labor would be prohibitive, physically and financially, and the natural stone tracery would not have the necessary strength to resist ice and wind storms prevalent in that locality (on the shores of Lake Michigan, near Chicago).

The very nature of this remarkable design calls for the use of a plastic, universal character of material. What is more universal and adaptable than concrete, a form of stone which is plastic when placed in the building and can be molded to any desired form, and any specified color effect can be produced. Upon setting, concrete becomes as hard and durable as the best quality of natural stone.

The durability and permanence of concrete is demonstrated by history and scientific research. The ancient peoples of Egypt, Assyria, and Babylonia used massive masonry with mortars containing cementitious material. Rome still contains the remains of concrete structures which were built about 2000 years ago and are still in an excellent state of preservation. Among these are the stadium of the Palatine, the Temple of Castor and Pollux, the Baths of Caracalla and the Pantheon. Research has developed, especially since the World War, better materials for and methods of making concrete. Concrete members are reinforced to carry the loads as effectively as a steel bridge or timber framework. The recent development of the methods of selection, mixing and placing of the component materials makes it possible to produce today an artificial stone of any desired strength and quality. Thus it is possible to use concrete in the production of the curved lines and intricate tracery of the Temple.

The use of concrete for the surface material of the Temple will be economical, as the component materials are available universally, and low in cost. As there is a great deal of duplication of tracery and ornamentation, the same forms can be used repeatedly to cast the surface structure in place.

Recent examples of the use of concrete in buildings with curved lines, perforated tracery, and varied color, are the Church of Notre Dame, Le Raincy, Paris; the Church of St. Therese, Montmagny, Paris, France; the Catholic Church, Bishofsheim, Germany; the Church of the Sacred Heart, Washington, D. C., and the Primavera Building, Paris Exposition, 1925.

Another plastic material which will undoubtedly be used in the exterior wall construction of the Temple is a metal alloy. In recent years several non-ferrous metal alloys have been developed, and a few, including alloys of aluminum, have come into use in building construction. These alloys are strong, light, and highly resistant to corrosion. In the new Koppers Building in Pittsburgh, over one hundred thousand pounds of cast spandrels were used. In the sixty-eight story Chrysler Building, nearing completion in New York City (March, 1930), the wall spandrels, copings and window sills are of an aluminum alloy. This type of material may be used in such sections of the building as door and window frames, sills, and some details of the ornamentation.

The existing foundation of the Temple was built of reinforced concrete and was completed seven years ago. The top of this structure is the first floor level. Around this circular foundation a flight of nineteen steps will rise from the gardens to the main floor of the Temple.

The superstructure has three principal divisions or parts; the first story (the construction of which will begin as soon as contracts are let as the Fund for the work has been completed)—the second or gallery story, and the dome.

The exterior walls are largely tracery, which will give ample light to the interior of the building in the daytime, and afford a brilliant luminous effect when lighted at night.

The height of the Temple structure from main floor to top of the dome is one hundred and sixty-one feet. The extreme diameter of the foundation structure is two hundred and two feet. The diameter at the top of the steps is one hundred and fifty-two feet. The height of the first story will be thirty-six feet, while the pylons or minarets at the intersections of the nine faces will rise to a height of forty-five feet above the first floor.

The central portion of the Temple will be a single space extending from the main floor to the inner shell of the dome. Around this space are nine rooms between the nine entrance-ways and the exterior walls.

The crowning feature of the structure will be the dome, which will be built in three sections; the outer shell, which will be perforated, an intermediate shell of wire glass, and the inner shell of perforated material. This beautifully proportioned dome will be pure white in color, and at night radiate light like a great illumined globe.

The Temple structure will be erected in two parts; the skeleton of steel and reinforced concrete, and subsequently the exterior wall covering. The latter is largely tracery combining with plant-like forms, the symbolism of the religions of the world.

The construction of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár involves many new and unique problems. Unlike an office building, apartment house, or residence, there are no precedents and it is not possible to schedule the building and predict just when certain parts of the structure will be completed after construction of the superstructure begins. Probably no one alive today could state the proper way to construct the outer shell of the dome, which is designed as a perforated structure.

Thus the Temple, the ornamentation of which constantly suggests life and action, must develop as a constructive organism, and evolve through experience, step by step.

The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár and its accessories: "When these institutions, college, hospital, hospice, and establishments for the incurables, university for the study of higher sciences and giving postgraduate courses, and other philanthropic buildings, are built, its doors will be open to all the nations and all religions. There will be drawn absolutely no line of demarcation. Its charities will be dispensed irrespective of color and race. Its gates will be flung wide to mankind; prejudice toward none, love for all. The central building will be devoted to the purposes of prayer and worship. Thus for the first time religion will become harmonized with science and science will be the handmaid of religion, both showering their material and spiritual gifts on all humanity. In this way the people will be lifted out of the quagmires of slothfulness and bigotry."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE BAHÁ'Í COMMUNITY OF THE FUTURE

HARLAN F. OBER

In this article is depicted the Bahá'í Community of the future as it will exist functioning through its central organization, the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár. The Temple and its accessories will be to the Bahá'í Communities of the future what the heart is to the body,—a source of vital, life-giving forces. The way in which the power of the spirit functions through its Temple, transmuted into life service as befits the common needs of humanity, are well conceived by the author in this forecast. To our knowledge there has never before in the world's literature been presented such a concept of this marvelous thermo-dynamic cycle in which the Sun of Reality translates Itself into energy and life of the world. It must be understood that the Bahá'í Community as depicted here is in no sense exclusive, it is rather a cross-section of humanity, for the Bahá'í Movement is very definitely an inclusive Movement.

“The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár has important accessories, which are accounted of the basic foundations. These are: school for orphan children, hospital and dispensary for the poor, home for the incapable, college for the higher scientific education, and hospice. In every city a great Mashriqu'i-Adhkár must be founded after this order. . . . Open ye the gates of the Temple to all mankind.”

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is the perfect body for the spirit of this age. It is a unit—a symbol and evidence of the unity of the body politic. It is a means for the protection of humanity by the Holy Spirit.

It is a means of stabilizing the forces of the world, and of bringing into existence that spiritual and material equilibrium which is the foundation of peace and the spiritual evolution of mankind.

A symbol of the interdependence existing between men, it opens the doors to the ideal community life.

In the center of this ideal community is the Temple, a dream of beauty, which, like a rare and delicate bird, has found a resting place amidst the flowers and the fountains. It calls the soul to prayer and meditation, and to those voyages in the world of the spirit which bring comfort, solace, understanding and victory.

Around it are the accessory buildings, which cover the entire field of human needs. They provide the means for satisfying the search for knowledge, and for social recreation, as well as the means for maintaining or regaining health. They also meet the needs of the aged and the poor, as well as the helpless children. In this ideal community, a wonderful spirit is manifest. The basis of every community or individual action is love. As the Holy Spirit is recognized as the vital center and creative power working in and through the Temple, it is also known that the divine reality, the brilliant light, is the center of each individual in the community. The educational plans, the economic program, the social service agencies, revolve around this principle.

Behold a community vigorous with spiritual health, at every instant active and alert, poised like a delicate instrument conscious of itself as an entity, realizing its divine obligations, radiating eternal joy and happiness, its members embodiments of that exhortation of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that a Bahá'í is one who possesses all the human and divine attributes in activity.

At all times during the day people are entering the Temple. The names stranger and foreigner have ceased to exist, because that which they formerly described has ceased to exist. The world knows itself as one home and one family. Members of this family from Persia, Japan, China, Australia, Germany, Italy, Russia, join with those who live in the city in praise to God; and drink from that Eternal Spring that alone satisfies the thirst of the soul of man. It is an Edifice for divine and holy thoughts. From time to time those who possess the spirit of detachment and beautiful melodious voices chant or recite the words of God. From the nine doors issue souls with faces illumined, with voices vibrant, with spirits soaring, with hearts overflowing with love because of the gifts of conscious knowledge and the indescribable bounty of the outpouring of God.

This city is a happy city because the Sun of Truth is shining brilliantly in the hearts, and its warmth is radiating to the uttermost parts of the community.

The terrible disease of poverty which afflicted humanity like a scourge for ages has been eliminated through the application of the economic program of Bahá'u'lláh. The foundation of this program is "that man shall love his neighbor."

That there are differences in capacities and abilities among men is recognized; but it is also realized that these are not sufficient to justify great extremes of wealth or poverty.

Each person brought into the community by the permission and bounty of God possesses certain inalienable rights. One of the most fundamental of these is that during his life he shall always be entitled, as a right, not as a charity, to his share of the means of subsistence and protection.

While some may consider that such a plan would encourage indolence, it should be realized that this new order is constructive; and that both by precept and by example man is taught the joy and happiness of the life of service.

Since the world is at peace for the first time in this cycle, each city is free to devote all its energies to the constructive developments of civilization. As a result, extraordinary progress has been made in the fields of education, of economics, and of science.

EACH child born into the world is considered as a divine trust, first of the parents but also of the community. All the protective, helpful, creative forces in the city are made available for him, because it is not known what unique services God may have destined for him. He becomes the object of the prayers of all, and every protection is accorded to him that he may develop perfectly in body and in mind.

Since it is realized that happiness is like the shining of the sun, everything is done to bring happiness to the father, the mother and the child, so that no coldness shall wither its tender being, nor sorrows bring blight and burden to its spirit. In this way it grows to normal, vigorous childhood, and toward maturity.

The mother, as his first teacher, is trained to turn his soul toward God and to disclose to him the beauties of the new world to which he has come.

As soon as he is old enough to associate with other children, his training is shared by a teacher who now plays a most important part in his life. Like a beautiful flower in a garden, he comes under the care of one who by capacity and training is qualified to train the faculties, to unfold the hidden treasures, to teach the spirit of cooperation with his comrades. In the atmosphere of love and affection, and with growing confidence, the child of the new race becomes increasingly aware of his spiritual heritage and feels the throbbing urge of destiny.

He is taught a trade or art so that he may attain the most perfect coordination of mind and body, also so that he shall throughout his life be capable of earning his livelihood, no matter what vicissitudes may come. His horizon is the universe, his aspiration—to attain the good pleasure of the Blessed Perfection (Bahá'u'lláh).

How happy is he after his period of travel by airplane to all parts of the world, where he associates intimately with all the important peoples on the globe, to enter into that field of service that he has chosen after considering the guidance of his spirit and the consultation of his teachers and his near ones.

One of the most interesting parts of the work of the community relates to the maintenance of a proper standard of living, and to continuity of employment.

Since it is known that each soul deserves the privilege of creating new things in the field of art and science, since the spiritual, mental, moral and physical health of the city depends upon the health of each individual in it, every means is seized to protect the health of all.

The mainspring of this plan is mutual love. It is also recognized that if some are spiritually illumined and others are dark; if some are well trained in mind and others are ignorant; if some are following high moral standards and others are negligent; if some are strong of body while others are weak and subject to disease—there is then a serious condition, resulting from these extremes, which will ultimately bring difficulty to that community. Therefore none are permitted, by the love of the community, to fall below this accepted standard of means and of health.

HE inventions of this new age have brought wealth to the entire world, so that no longer is it necessary to struggle for a mere existence. It is no longer necessary to work so many hours that the body is exhausted, and neither time or strength is left for spiritual and mental unfoldment.

Peace has not only made possible the release of untold billions of wealth for the benefit of all, but best of all it has turned the minds of men away from destructive thoughts and conditions.

In the same way that medical science has made possible longer and healthier lives and eliminated the destructive plagues and scourges of former times, so has the divine science of God prevented periodic outbreaks and collapses that have in past times disturbed the world of government and finance.

One of the great gifts of Bahá'u'lláh has been the elimination of those fears that formerly afflicted humanity. The fear of poverty, of dependence upon others, the fear of loneliness, the fear of unemployment, the fear of inability to pay for the best medical service when ill—all of these fears have disappeared, first because of the spirit of love and mutual cooperation, and secondly by the carrying out in law and custom of the provisions of Bahá'u'lláh's economic plan.

Upon completion of his or her training the individual joins the particular field of employment and service which his abilities and the needs of the community require.

From the beginning he is a partner in the business, receiving a stated wage and his proper percentage of the business. His ideal is to embody that guidance of 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Work with such happiness and joy that people seeing you will exclaim: 'This is the work of all the work in the world that you would desire to do.'"

In this community, work in the spirit of service is accepted as the highest form of worship.

Religion, not of exalted words only, but of deeds, pure, simple, direct, permeates all.

Now that the world has discovered itself and its treasures, every community is world-conscious. Man has so transcended the laws of nature that he has been able to establish a stability of order, of government and of economic conditions that prevents the extremes that in former times brought distress and destruction.

As great reservoirs collect water and protect cities during the periods of drought, so do the economic and financial storehouses in each community protect against the extremes of poverty and unemployment.

The spirit of man is more vigorous, more alert, more penetrative, more courageous, more fearless, than in the past times. The field of his endeavor is now a higher one.

As wonderful machinery and homes of beauty have superseded the crude instruments and caves or tents of primitive man, so greater spiritual susceptibilities, wonderful consciousness of the spirit of service, and deep penetration of the mysteries of love between men have superseded the crude emotions and the primitive understanding of former times.

WHEN men's minds and hearts became universalized and were freed from destructive tendencies, then for the first time God opened up the flood gates of knowledge and stirred the entire world with the creative power. The result has been a deepening of life that only the dreams and visions of pure hearts could possibly have conceived.

Men, women and children walk about under the blue skies, but they are a new race, the essence and fruit of mankind. They are the epitome of the noblest thoughts that have stirred the race. They are the fulfillment of the dreams of the poets and seers of past ages. They are the radiant lamps of the Kingdom of God. In their lives, their thoughts, their deeds, their actions they embody the instructions of all the prophets and the divine educators of humanity. They are the redeemers of the past time, the perfected fruit on the tree of humanity.

Some men have dreamed of them, but most have denied that they would ever be. Yet here they are, revealing those latent powers that from the beginning have existed in all men.

The gloomy night has passed, the conflicts between the higher and lower natures of men have ended in the victory of the spirit. Though living on the earth, man flies in the world of the spirit, he transcends limited boundaries, and claims the world to be his home and all men to be his brothers. His spiritual susceptibilities are extraordinary, his sympathies include the universe, his only fear is that he will not attain his divine destiny in a world of love and unity.

Man is the microcosm of the macrocosm. He is a brilliant flame in the midst of the universe when he has attained unity with God, through recognition of the divine station in every man, and has bowed down at the threshold of that station.

It is this spirit, this love, that has built the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, has made it the "dawning point of praises," and the throbbing, pulsating heart of this community.

Its accessory institutions are the first recipients of its love, its necessary means of spiritual and material expression.

The intensity of the ray is so great, that it is as strong in these abodes of service as in the heart of the worshipper in the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár.

Happy is he who lives upon the earth in the Day of God.

Happy is he who becomes conscious of His Glory, recognizes His station, and inhales the fragrance of that spiritual garden, drinks of that heavenly water, partakes of the divine bread, and offers up his life in the Divine Pathway.

For he has entered the real Temple which is the very Law of God, the collective center, the Point of Unity for all mankind.

"The greatest gift of man in universal love—that magnet which renders existence eternal. It attracts realities and diffuses life with infinite joy. If this love penetrates the heart of man, all the forces of the universe will be realized in him, for it is a divine power which transports him to a divine station and he will make no progress until he is illumined thereby. Strive to increase the love-power of reality, to make your hearts greater centers of attraction and to create new ideals and relationships. . . . It is the fire of the love of God which renders man superior to the animal. Strengthen this superior force through which is attained all the progress in the world."

THE MODERN SANCTUARY

THE MAKING OF THE TEMPLE

BY JANET BOLTON

What Hand arrayed the Hopes of all the Ages
In this bright Shape—this many-pointed Star?
What Architect designed this firm foundation
On which to build Love's templed Avatar?

What Wisdom set the waning Lights of Jesus
Above the centuries for evermore;
Emblazoning across a mystic portal
Those everlasting words, "I am the Door!"

What Master-mind conceived these Gates of Splendor, Nine golden Doors encircling roundabout;
That it should be "A Dawning-Place of Praises," Claiming the true, the faithful and devout?

Here God is One! O Master of the Temple!
In Thee we trust and all the world is kin,
Thus, by Muhammad, "Seal of all the Prophets,"
By Moses and by Buddha—let them in!

By every Cup that frees from sin and sorrow,
Enter, ye tribes and nations, and be blest
Here each hath life beneath its healing shadow,
And thus God made the Temple of His Rest!

OUR TEMPLE

BY LORNA B. TASKER

Our Temple—dawn of our dreaming,
Dawn of our golden dreaming,
Brighter become each day
At the core of our life's endeavor,
Born like a glory of sunlight,
Or a music of wondrous singing,
Built of our hearts' deep passion,
Woven of song and fire.

Our Temple—secret of gladness,
Secret of all earth's gladness,
Lovlier grown each day
With the beauty of song and laughter,
Built of many a handclasp,
Arms of lovers entwining,
Holding the whole world's tenderness,
Folded in God's Desire.

Our Temple—symbol of yearning,
Symbol of all our yearning,
Loftier grown each day
At the heart of mankind's endeavor.
So shall it grow to-morrow,
And beyond the drift of the ages,
Stream with the joy of the Vision,
Higher—forever higher!

TEMPLE OF GOD

BY PHILIP AMALFI MARANGELLA

O flowing fountains, sing Love's praise to me,
O beckoning paths, urge faltering feet to thee,
O portals wide, embrace entirely
The Self that nears this blessed sanctuary.

O glowing torches, flame from wisdom's seat,
O luminous dome, thy hands in prayer complete
This shrine where Faith shall never know defeat;
This mystic heart where soul with God may meet

THE TEMPLE BEAUTIFUL

BY SHAHNAZ WAITE

O! Temple of the Beautiful!
O! Temple of the Lord!
That for God's Oneness e'er will 'stand,
And for His Holy Word;
Thy radiance shall shine afar,
As shines the sun above;
A Refuge thou to weary hearts,
A Fortress of God's Love.

O! Temple that doth symbolize,
God's Word made flesh to man;
Thou art the Body of His Law,
Revealing His great Plan;
All nations shall in thee rejoice,
And gather from afar,
Shall hold aloft the Glorious Name,
That Name—Baha'u'llah.

O! Temple of true Unity,
Of Knowledge and of Light,
O! Temple of the Living God,
Of Day—that knows not night;
Thou art a Mystery Divine,
But one that all may read,
Who enter in with "hearts made pure;"
With faith—and loving deed.

O! Temple of the Beautiful!
O Miracle Divine!
In thee the nations join as one,
From every land and clime;
Thou art the symbol of God's Peace;
Which cometh from above;
The symbol of God's Word Divine;
His Manifested Love.

THE BASIS OF BAHÁ'Í BELIEF

CHAPTER 3. THE ORDER OF MELCHIZEDEK

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

THE Bahá'í Message, which seriously demands the conscientious investigation of every fair-minded person who believes in the spiritual order of the universe, was enunciated by Bahá'u'lláh, the Founder of the Movement. Briefly stated, His characteristic teaching, which gives us a new philosophy of history, is based upon the periodic appearance here on earth of a sublime Being, a great Super-Personality. Through Him men arise to the recognition and expression of new and unprecedented activities and relations; through Him savage and anti-social practices are reformed; through Him life takes on a larger scope and higher significance; through Him "every mouldering bone is quickened."

It is historically true that every thousand years, more or less, there appears in the world a Being of unique capacity. Without any exception the Founders of the great sacred religions of the world have announced themselves as possessed of a Divine Power delegated to Them from the Supreme Source. They have never left men to guess or infer whence they derive their authority, but all, in one form or another, paraphrase the statement, "Thus saith the Lord."

Within the century since the birth of Bahá'u'lláh, history has been welded into a single instrument, that fulcrum upon which the mind of man has removed the mystery that shrouded the world. To the scientific temper which has ushered in "the new earth," this magnificent procession of the Mighty Prophets walking with periodic regularity through the great drama of life, is entirely in accord with the regularity and precision of the cosmic order.

To ask the modern mind to accept the idea that there has been a single unprecedented and incomparable event in the world—a unique occurrence—is to place before it a conception entirely alien to the course of nature or to the course of history. To ask informed men and women, enlightened by a thousand years of inquiry and discovery, to believe a story quite plausible and acceptable to the ancient mind, is to turn them toward materialism and skepticism.

But when we clearly descry in the movement of history a mighty event not unique but recurrent, a glorious Personage, not solitary but repetitive, a reviving influence leading always to better social practices, to greater emancipation and aspiration, here we have a condition that immediately relates itself to our experience in every other field of observation.

Accepting this fact as inquirers into the Bahá'í Teachings are constrained to do, even with no other evidence than that of history, the objection is often made that, while these men are exceptional, outstanding, great geniuses even, to claim for them any powers beyond the purely human is at once to fall back into the dogmatic and irrational attitude from which we have just extricated the uncritical thinking of the past.

When the Bahá'í teacher counters with the question, "How do you account for the profound changes that take place as a result of His appearance if He does not produce them?" the answer, in one form or another, reduces back to the zeitgeist, or time spirit. The answer is that, in the course of evolution, certain things are constrained to appear at certain times. This presupposes a perfectly mechanical universe, already complete and determined; a motion picture that is merely being run through a projector. Herbert Spencer was the last fashionable sponsor for this conception, his theory of organic evolution being that all we had to do was to breed enough generations of men, finally to produce the perfect human being, the goal of evolution, who would stand upon the earth without either the assistance or the opposition of outer circumstances.

Neither psychology, biology, ethnology nor sociology know anything about such an assumption.

In the first place, where does the Zeitgeist come from? Either it is itself an efficient cause and therefore of spiritual origin, or a mere ethnic phenomenon, which has never shown itself capable of producing new polities and changed ideals.

But if it be an Efficient Cause, how does it make itself known to man? Through what channel does it issue those directions that enable men to change existing conditions? There is no accredited means of communication between God and man direct, for, left without interpretation, each individual offers a different answer as to what the Voice of God is saying to the soul. To say that the Zeitgeist appears from humanity and then becomes its guide is like saying that the automobile produces its driver, or that species produce evolution, or that springtime causes the return of the sun. In that case the Zeitgeist is not a cause but an effect and effects without causes, either in science or philosophy, are so generally lacking, that it would be difficult to convince even a high-school boy that the Zeitgeist was the effect of a cause and at the same moment the cause of that effect.

Predestination and foreordination were all very well in Augustinian Rome and Calvinian Geneva, but they won't stand the scalpel of Pavlov, the scrutiny of Adler, the prestidigitation of Einstein or the inquiry of Bergson and Spengler.

This universe is not a rigid little buttoned-up mechanism, according to the findings of biology and physics; there isn't a small prearranged cog in it called a Time Spirit (Zeitgeist) that makes men tick out certain prearranged reactions to prearranged events. The changes in men's hearts do not come through some tool situated there that from time to time produces the expected change. The unpredictable adjustments that take place in animal life through change in environment, nutrition, mixed heredity and the like; the half dozen geometries, mutually contradictory and all equally possible, in the new physics, show conclusively the fallacy of the Zeitgeist. It is neither logical nor scientific to say that periodic fermentation and flowering that occur in history from age to age can be produced of itself without some apparent cause.

But granted that the objector accept this conclusion, he still does not see that it establishes the super-human status of the cause of human progress, the Manifestations* of God. This in itself does not so establish Him; but it does establish the necessity for some reason beside an outworn evolutionary theory to account for human progress.

On what basis do we rest our claim that the Founders of the great religions of the world are a special order of Being, differing from the world of humanity as the human differs from the animal, the animal from the vegetable, or the vegetable from the mineral?

Our first argument is drawn from history, and based upon the obvious and inescapable fact that no one except these Beings ever accomplish the regeneration of peoples and nations. No monarch, no general, no philosopher, no scientist, no plutocrat, no priest, is ever able to extend his influence beyond a few generations—if as far as that.

But let us, for illustration, take one single example of the great Prophet, Moses. In a conflict with the Egyptians He murdered a task-master* and was forced to fly for his life. When the hour came that His Mission was to be assumed, He was clothed in the mantle of Divine Authority. Stepping from that cleft in the rock where He had stood face to face with the Almighty, He descended from the mountain (of spiritual communication) to the plane of humanity and delivered the Will of God to man. It is not astonishing that a man should say He had spoken with God—the asylums are full of them—but that for three thousand years we should continue to believe that through Moses we have heard the Voice of God, and for three thousand years continue to be guided by it, is a phenomenon unparalleled in history.

Why is it that throughout Christian and Jewish communities we are unable to barter and exchange, to buy and sell on the Sabbath? It is because three thousand years ago a Man descended from a mountain top bringing with Him as an ordinance from God, the fiat that every seventh day men must rest. It was a perfectly arbitrary order so far as His followers were concerned: why not every fourth day or every fifteenth day? But so great was His Power and so unchallengeable His Authority that millions upon millions of people living and dead submit and have submitted to His decrees as a sacred trust.

Certainly there is no race at all comparable with the Jews historically; in truth, they alone have been the witnesses of history. China, India, Persia—nations synchronous with them—are parts of history, the Jews alone, in spite of exile, dispersion, persecution, expatriation, retain their racial characteristics, their national ideals, their distinguishing ethnic traits, defying absorption, extinction or modification. Scattered amongst the nations of the world, despised and outcast, they have watched their captors disintegrate, their spoilers perish and the mighty of the earth become the “companions of pebbles.” Egypt, Phoenicia, Babylon, Assyria, Persia, Greece, Carthage, Rome, the Caliphates of Baghdad and Cordova, Spain, the Holy Roman Empire, the Holy Inquisition—these they have seen decay, while they have passed over dry shod from the pursuing army of human corruption and historical oblivion. With no land in which to perpetuate their aspirations, with no hereditary leader to keep alive the traditions of their racial ideals—to what can we rationally attribute this unheard of protection and survival except to the influence of Moses, Who taught them that they had entered into a special covenant with God and were under His immediate and merciful supervision?

In our introduction we noted the similar miracles of socializing influence exerted by Jesus and by Muhammad; the latter taking a thousand warring tribes of barbarous idolators and elevating them to a pinnacle of high culture, education and urbane practice in two or three hundred years: the former, planting the germ-seeds that resulted in democracy: both from their graves and from remote historical epochs exercising over their followers a greater influence than all living men combined.

The next proof lies in the manner in which the Manifestations of God establish their mission. Immediately They announce Their Station and purpose, immediately men not only shrink away from Them but by every conceivable means connive to thwart and to circumvent Them. The return of Napoleon from Elba may be cited as an example of secular success in rising above human opposition, but pushing the analogy only a step further, we find him in a few years on Saint Helena, while the influence of Jesus grew greater and greater as the centuries passed.

The Manifestations of God establish themselves not only without human assistance, with no prestige, position or public recognition, but against stubborn sinister and tragic opposition. To have revolutionized His world and the subsequent era of history in three brief years, as Jesus did, cannot be assigned as the work of an ordinary man, no matter how largely gifted.

If sometimes this astonishing accomplishment were effected by a ruler, sometimes by a philosopher, sometimes by an artist, it would be entirely unjustifiable to say that the Saviors of the world are a special order, specially endowed. But the results noted have never anywhere or at any time been produced by any other than those announcing themselves as Messengers of God, and as revealing His Will to man.

MARTHA L. ROOT IN PERSIA

A. H. NAIMI

The following letter of appreciation of Miss Root's services by a Persian Bahá'í brother is here published as it so definitely expresses that bond of oneness and sympathetic and loving relationship born of the spirit through the creative Word of Bahá'u'lláh. Articles by Miss Root recording her experiences in Persia will appear in forthcoming issues of The Bahá'í Magazine.

IT WILL be readily realized that for a young Persian Bahá'í with scanty experience in writing in general and writing in English in particular, it is a somewhat difficult task to write upon any subject for Western readers. But, prompted by the powerful feelings and the enthusiasm aroused by the visit to Persia of our dear and beloved sister, Miss Martha L. Root, I feel that I cannot leave the event unmentioned.

I really think that a proof which makes a Persian Bahá'í even more steadfast in his catholic doctrine of real attachment to the Cause is for him to witness with his own eyes the impression left by the Cause on the Western mind—that mind so romantically held in deep reverence by all Easterners. My Persian readers will perhaps better discern my meaning.

Our Persian Bahá'í brothers can hardly associate in their minds a Westerner with belief of the Cause of such a warm and fervent character as the Easterners are so apt to manifest in general.

But to see our dear and splendid spiritual sister, Miss Martha L. Root, so vehemently and wholeheartedly devoted to the word and spirit of the Cause much in the fervent Eastern manner at once fills a Persian Bahá'ís heart with those feelings of exalted pride in his religion and rapturous devotion to his creed. This is exactly what has happened everywhere since this illustrious servant of the Cause has set foot in this country.

The innumerable meetings, the throng of eager visitors, the zeal with which all sought to attend conferences held by her, the wholehearted welcome that everybody, rich or poor, each community, big or small, gave to her can only be described as a remarkable tribute to her zeal and wholehearted enthusiasm in this Great Cause. The records of the Bahá'í Cause do not indeed furnish many examples of such public and universal welcome and exalted sentiments of brotherly love as extended to, and reciprocated by, this dear visitor.

The writer has had the honor to listen on more than one occasion in the various conferences to the smooth flow of sustained spiritual language of Miss Martha recording in simple but impressive words her insignificance in the immense realm of the Spiritual Kingdom but expressing full confidence in the protection and confirmation of Bahá'u'lláh, Who promised to help with the Heavenly Hosts those who served in His field. I have been deeply touched, and have seen the whole audience touched—literally moved—to tears of joy and exaltation when she gave in a few but expressive words a narrative of her various trips in the service and especially spoke of her successful meetings with Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania, how her simple and spiritual devotedness to the Cause won that royal heart and how Her Majesty was interested in the service.

In truth, when one comes to think how in this dark and material world men strive for worldly gains and how they incessantly struggle even with their own countrymen for material ends, denying each other the least mercy, indulging whole-heartedly in feelings of hatred and resentment towards their brethren, entangling themselves in innumerable hardships, terrible difficulties, financial, political and religious troubles over which philosophers and philanthropists vainly brood but cannot alter, we feel the more the immense comfort, mental, material and spiritual, which Bahá'u'lláh has so graciously offered us in His Cause, the eternal bounty of the Almighty who chose us—without manifest superiority over others, we must confess—from among various sects in the struggle and turmoil of this materialistic age and invited us to this well-served divine table of brotherly love to all. We cannot help feeling vividly and clearly the burden of the heavy task and sacred duty incumbent upon us all to serve Him in recognition of His undeserved bounty and to call our brethren to the divine and royal banquet to the advent of which generation after generation of mankind has so fervently prayed.

Blessed be His maidservant, Miss Martha, who has so gloriously and valiantly served in His various fields of service, and blessed be America, that land so dear to all Persian Bahá'ís, which sends out such fervent believers and true servants of the Cause. Heartfelt greetings to our brethren throughout the world.

THE BAB

Immortal Man!

Forerunner of amazing things,
Of things but shadowed by our puppet-Kings!
How could'st Thou know the King of Kings was near?
Thou had'st not seen nor heard
And yet did'st see and hear?

* * *

It was not in ambition's cause thou gavest Thy body;
Not glory called Thy spirit to be brave.
Was it for pleasure's use
That Thou did'st welcome venom and abuse?
Could aught of happiness remain
In days passed in persecution and in pain?
What goal of gain was that which beckoned
To the martyr's grave?

* * *

Ah no!—such music played upon thy mystic lyre
As unsensed thee to wind, to earthquake and to fire.
How low Olympus must have seemed,
How plain Parnassus!
How vain the utmost man attains
Which man's ambition mars?
What wonders, therefore, met Thine eyes
In the envisioned countenance
Of Him who Reigns
Crowned with the jewelled splendor of the Stars!
How gladly did'st Thou then proclaim Him
With full sacrifice!

His Holiness the Báb, the Forerunner of Bahá'u'lláh, "imparted divine education to an unenlightened multitude and produced marvelous results on the thoughts, morals, customs, and conditions of the Persians. . . . The appearance of such wonderful signs and great results, the effects produced upon the minds of the people and upon the prevailing ideas; the establishment of the foundations of progress, and the organization of the principles of success and prosperity by a young merchant, constitute the greatest proof that He was a Perfect Educator."—Abdu'l-Bahá.

THAT A UNIVERSAL religion meeting all needs of the modern world should spring up in one of the most sequestered, fanatical, and backward countries in the world, is a strange paradox. Yet it is plain, upon reflection, that Persia, by its very physical and spiritual isolation, furnished a sympathetic soil for the sowing and maturing of a new revelation. The Persian mentality—brilliant, fanatical, mystic—was as suited to receive and develop the Message of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh as was Israel two thousand years ago to receive the message of Christ.

In Persia, as in Palestine, the pious were accustomed to the idea of continuous spiritual revelation and fervently awaited the arrival, according to religious prophecy, of a special Manifestation of God's purpose to man. And great as was the clamor and persecution raised against the Báb as well as the Christ, bringing martyrdom to themselves and to many of their followers, the fact must not be overlooked that among the same races that inflicted these persecutions were certain souls of great spiritual receptivity and steadfastness, who, by their discipleship and apostolic missions, made possible the spread of their Master's teaching.

Israel having been dispersed, nowhere else was there to be found, in the nineteenth century, a people so susceptible to Messiahship, and of sufficiently obstinate and fanatical a temperament, to foster the startling announcements of the Báb. Among a too tolerant and worldly a community this great Message could not have been received with the reverence which it deserved, and which in backward Persia it did not fail to receive.

The Báb definitely announced Himself as the Prophet of a New Day, and the Forerunner of a Manifestation.

To the eternal honor of the Land of the Sun and the Lion this challenge of the Glorious Youth found willing hearing in the highest intellectual and spiritual circles of Persia. Many great scholars and divines, falling in adoration before this pure spiritual Vehicle of Truth, accepted His message and became His most devoted and zealous disciples. It was these great souls who, during the imprisonment of the Báb, continued to spread and to direct His teaching.

As in the time of Christ, so under this dispensation of the Báb, there was little realization, among the disciples, of the universal scope of the message they were accepting.

A reformed Islam, a fulfillment of prophecy for the greater glory and perfection of Persia, a nearness to God's love and purpose vouchsafed them through His special Messenger—this was what the early followers of the Báb were kindled to.

DID ANY ONE BUT THE Báb foresee at that time the triumphal spread of this new Gospel over all the world, in the Cause of Peace, Brotherhood, and World Unity?

Within less than a century from the announcement of the Báb, how the scenes have changed! A new dynasty is establishing justice, tolerance, and enlightenment in Persia. For the first time Bahá'ís can freely and safely associate in public. And the power of the Bahá'í Movement, permeating the people, has stimulated the whole race toward progress and world civilization.

A new Persia is being born. Education is being extended to the common people, the Government is sending picked youths abroad for study, and the general mentality is now awakened and progressive. A railroad is being built to run the whole length of Persia, from Tih-rán to the Persian Gulf. Automobile traffic is rapidly increasing; and air routes link Tih-rán with Baghdád and with other Persian cities. The age-long isolation of Persia is disappearing and the whole country is being united by a progressive nationalism.

In this movement of liberalism and progress the Bahá'ís are playing an important part, both within the government and as private citizens. Wherever numbers permit, Bahá'í communities are founding their own schools for the modern education of Persian youth; especially in the education of girls are the Bahá'ís doing a most notable work far surpassing anything as yet achieved by the government.

The growth of the Bahá'í communities of Persia will be a unique source of study for the economist and sociologist, as well as for the student of religion. For gradually these communities, as numbers and opportunity occasion, will regulate their community life, as they have already been regulating their individual life, in accordance with the laws of Bahá'u'lláh. This movement is in fact already begun.

When Persia will have become preponderantly Bahá'í and the whole country is intent upon constructing foundations for the divine civilization revealed by Bahá'u'lláh,—that hitherto backward country will become, so we are told by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the expression of the most perfect culture, and the gem of the world.

PERSIA HAS ALSO great natural advantages for the creation of a brilliant civilization. The high plateau climate of the north is conducive to intellectual vigor, a trait which has always characterized the Persians; and the mineral resources promise, when developed, wealth and prosperity. The Persian race, when freed by the strict religious laws of Bahá'u'lláh from their besetting curse of opium, and inspired by the exaltation of work and action in the Bahá'í teaching, will move on to great achievements.

More important even than nationalistic progress, will be the part that Persia will play in the progress of humanity. For from the richness of her spiritual heritage will come the great blessings of world peace and brotherhood.

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE DECLARATION OF THE BÁB

MAY twenty-third is the anniversary of a blessed event. On this day in 1844 His Holiness the Báb was sent forth heralding and proclaiming the Kingdom of God, announcing the glad tidings of the coming of His Holiness, Bahá'u'lláh, and withstanding the opposition of the whole Persian nation. Some of the Persians followed Him. For this they suffered the most grievous difficulties and severe ordeals. They withstood the tests with wonderful power and sublime heroism. Thousands were cast into prison, punished, persecuted and martyred. Their homes were pillaged and destroyed, their possessions confiscated. They sacrificed their lives most willingly and remained unshaken in their faith to the very end. Those wonderful souls are the lamps of God, the stars of sanctity, shining gloriously from the eternal horizon of the Will of God.

His Holiness the Báb was subjected to bitter persecution in Shiráz, where He first proclaimed His mission and message. A period of famine afflicted that region and the Báb journeyed to Isfáhán. There the learned men rose against Him in great hostility. He was arrested and sent to Tabriz. From thence He was transferred to Máku and finally imprisoned in the strong castle of Chihriq. Afterward He was martyred in Tabriz.

His Holiness the Báb was the Door of the Reality . . . the Morn of Guidance . . . the Morning Star heralding the glorious dawn of the Sun of Reality. The Báb gave the glad tidings concerning the appearance of the Manifestation of God, and His Holiness, Bahá'u'lláh, was the Promised One of all the nations and religions.

The Báb and Bahá'u'lláh had no professors . . . The sun emanates from itself and does not draw its light from other sources. The divine teachers have the innate light; They have knowledge and understanding of all things in the universe; the rest of the world receives its light from Them and through Them the arts and sciences are revived in each age.

THE BASIS OF BAHÁ'Í BELIEF

CHAPTER 3—PART 2. THE ORDER OF MELCHIZEDEK

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

AT this juncture the orthodox are likely to say, "What greater proof of the Divinity of Jesus could we ask than His miracles?" But Bahá'u'lláh does not admit of miracles as a legitimate proof of the Station or of the Mission of the Manifestation of God. Miracles are valid only for those who witness them or who are their beneficiaries. The Jews deny the miracles of the Christians, the Muhammadans those of the Buddhists, the Christians those of the Muhammadans and so forth.

As serious inquirers, which do we consider of greater moment? That Jesus changed the constituent chemical elements of water into those of wine, or that those invited to the eternal marriage banquet of the Lord exchanged their troubled and unstable lives through His Presence and His Teachings for the spiritual ardor and the joyous enthusiasm of divine intoxication? Do mature thinkers assign a higher importance to walking on the waters of a lake and upholding one who is about to perish in them, than to treading underfoot the restless cares of storm-tossed lives and rescuing men and women from doubts and superstitions?

Which is the nobler and more convincing? To feed a hungry multitude material bread and fish, (for within a few hours they would hunger) or to fill them with the bread of life, with the knowledge and love of God, with faith, with courage, with assurance: an everlasting portion? As to inducing the physical resurrection of a man from somatic death,* he has but to die again; but to assist him to rise from the death of self-seeking, hatred, malice and prejudice to restore a view of spiritual reality to those who have remained blind to life's mystery; to enable lame and faltering minds to leap into spiritual certainty; to penetrate those deaf to higher yearnings with the call of the Kingdom; that sinners should become saints, and cowards, heroes—these are miracles before which the petty manipulation of physical laws becomes the shadow of a shade.

"It was witnessed that souls before attaining to the wonderful and new favor of God would protect their lives with a hundred thousand plans and schemes from threatenings of destruction, until, for instance, they would flee from a fox and avoid a thorn. But after being honored with the Mighty Security and Great Providence they would voluntarily expend a hundred thousand lives; nay, rather, their blessed souls despised the cage of the body and a single one of these hosts would fight against a multitude * * * Their agitation was changed to composure, their doubt turned to assurance, and their fear transformed into courage.”* We do not by any means deny that miracles are performed by these Supreme Bestowers of Life. Many such instances are known of El Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and are as well attested as any of the accepted facts of history. But these things in themselves are not convincing. Mesmer and Houdini seemed to defy natural law. If a man like Napoleon performed a thousand miracles no one could mistake him for the Mouth-piece of God.

*"Were ye to taste a little of the clear water of Divine Knowledge ye would know that the real life is the life of the heart and not the life of the body; for both animals and man share in the life of the body." Baha'u'llah, "Book of Assurance," 3rd ed., 1915, p. 85.

To control and to direct the destinies of men, to administer to them that Divine Elixir that enables them to conquer themselves, is far more unmistakable evidence of Divinity than to control all the forces of nature.

THERE is a second proof that the Manifestations of God are peerless and unique. It is what the modern investigator might call the Behavioristic proof: that by contact with the Holy Breath of these Lofty Beings a new and entirely unprecedented form of life appears.

They teach, without exception, that the purpose of this life is to leave it to attain another life, to be born again while still enduring the vicissitudes of this earth. We cannot calculate what energies were expended in lifting the inorganic matter of the world up to the station of the organic; the stupendous miracle of making substance that had lost the power to burn, burn again, attests to an energy resident in life that reckons the far-sprinkled systems of the phenomenal universe as the fine dust of the balance. The inorganic cosmos is that in which hydrogen and carbon, the elements essential to fire, are so combined that they no longer support combustion. By the cunning and baffling mechanism of the chlorophyl which acts under sunlight as a minute blast-furnace the plant draws the inorganic universe up into its body and restores to the ashes of a cosmic conflagration the lost glow and warmth of a reviving fire.

So with the Divine Manifestations: humanity having reached the nadir of “the arc of descent” has become so immersed in materialism and brutality that it has lost its spark of spiritual fire; it has taken on the inorganic aspects of selfishness, greed and oppression; until from era to era this Mighty Order sending the irresistible roots of Their Love and of Their Redemptive Power down into the cold earthly hearts of men elevate them into a new world, a new life, a new consciousness; restore to them the rapturous capacity to burn once more with the fire of the Love of God; change the inorganic world of the self into the organic life of the spirit.

Our blessed Lord Jesus expressed it for them all, when He said: “And I, if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me.”

We are constrained to admit when we view the astonishing spectacle of the disciples of Jesus alone (not to consider the parallel performances of the followers of other Manifestations) that nowhere else in history, in psychology nor in ethnology is anything of cognate importance adducible.

To take a group of simple, ignorant men and women, untutored and unknown, and lift them to that degree of spiritual attainment that would enable them to establish a new social order, and completely to overthrow the superstitions of mythology, so that as they rose the decadent procession of the confined gods rumbled along the ancient sky to sink forever into desuetude,—this irrefutable influence has never been exercised by any other than the Order of Prophethood, and has always been performed by Them whenever or wherever They have appeared.

 OUR last proof is ethnological. Great ethnic movements revolve around the Religious Hero. Up to the threshold of the present century the great artistic, social, political, legal and educational institutions of history have been the outgrowth of the laws, ordinances and principles laid down by the Prophet to the era or people who produced them. Naturally we cannot speak of those mythologies that lie without the confines of history, but there can be no doubt of this influence in those historical instances that can be authenticated.

The vast scheme of enlightened and humanitarian administration introduced by King Asoka when he embraced Buddhism, the miraculous and dramatic energy of Gothic architecture, the educational enterprises under religious sponsorship in Arabia, India and Europe, the interdependence of church and state as one of the most firmly established aspects of history, the evident influence of religious doctrine in the codification of Justinian law, are only a few of the many instances that come to mind as illustrating the ethnic effect of the Great Prophets of the world.

The degree to which men rally round Their standard, leaving their obsolescent beliefs and ideals to contribute to the establishment of the New Order, is the degree to which we can mark the advancement of the politics, peoples and communities whom the Manifestations of God summon to Their Teachings. And it is the only form of advancement that we do see: not the founders of new systems of philosophy, not the conquerors of vast territories, not the enlightened scientist, not the monarch no matter how humane,—can accomplish these great ethnic movements over more than brief periods and sporadically.

To annul the ancient barriers of fear, suspicion, ill-will and exploitation amongst men, bringing barbarian, slave, patrician, emperor, Asiatic, European, Jew, Gentile, learned, ignorant, within a single communion as Jesus did, as Bahá'u'lláh, in a world-wide community, is doing today, remains the unique accomplishment of the Prophet of God.

“By their fruits shall ye know them.” Since our search for the peer of these Great Educators of mankind, remains unrewarded by a single example of any other being comparable to them in power, authority or uplifting influence, Bahá'is are surely justified in claiming that the Prophets occupy a distinct and separate position from mankind in general, that each as He appears to lead and guide us onward is “a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek;” not a human being, but the member of an entirely different order of life.

AN INTERVIEW ABOUT PERSIA

HIS Excellency, Mr. Memdouh Chevket, the Turkish Ambassador at Tihrán, received me in his office this morning, February 10, 1930. He served me real Turkish coffee and we spoke of Persia. He is a very intelligent, cultured man under the fifties; his eyes speak sincerity and fearless honesty. This statesman has a keen grasp of all Asiatic affairs and he is an expert in history. Before becoming Ambassador he was a distinguished Professor of History in Constantinople.

I asked him if he could say anything about Persia, and he responded: "Why not? I take the greatest interest in Persia and I am eager to see this nation go forward to a great progress." He, as did every other man whom I have met here, praised His Imperial Majesty Pahlevi Shahanshah, and said that this phenomenal evolution and new spirit in Persia are due entirely to him. "Before His Imperial Majesty the present Shah became head of the government there was no safety, no security in this Land of the Lion and the Sun," he went on to say. "In all parts of Persia the chiefs of the nomad tribes, which are many and powerful, really surrounded and closed in the vast plateau which is Persia. Each chief was a little king, a fiery despot in his section. They had not been obeying the central government, and they menaced all the caravan routes, plundering the merchandise, robbing the travelers and they were not too careful to save human life. Now since His Imperial Majesty Reza Shah has governed the country, these nomad tribes have almost all been conquered; they are quiet and obedient, one can truly say that now there is safety in Persia. Foreigners can come and live in this country without fear. The last vestige of the nomad life is not entirely vanquished, but the government is doing its best absolutely to control every tribe, to put an end to their wandering existence, to settle them in proper homes with lands to cultivate, and to educate their children."

His Excellency the Turkish Ambassador said that His Imperial Majesty the Shah has opened a new epoch in this country. "There is an incomparable difference," said he, "between this time of the present Shah and the times of those Kajar dynasties when there were no roads, no railroads, no motor cars, no army, no security and but very few schools and those not worthy to mention. Now His Imperial Majesty Pahlevi Shahanshah has a most powerful army, the government has made remarkably good roads and policed them so that there is no danger to travelers. Railroads are being built and His Imperial Majesty has himself superintended this work. Special attention is given now to building schools and introducing modern methods and new text books, sending large groups of students each year to Europe and to the United States. If this progress continues for the next ten or twenty years, I am perfectly sure that Iran will advance extraordinarily. This is my belief, and I sincerely wish the great development of this country. I have much admiration for His Imperial Majesty Pahlevi Shahan-shah, for he has created a totally new life here."

His Excellency also declared that liberal and democratic men can see the fulfillment of all their wishes in Persia.

It is interesting to note that before the time of the present Shah, it took three months to bring merchandise from Dozdab in the south up to Tihrán. Now it only requires four or at most five days. The country is so large, nearly one-fifth as large as the whole United States and its population is so small, only about fifteen millions, that it is only by railroads, motor roads, telegraphs and posts that the great provinces can be connected.

The question of prejudice came up and the writer asked the Turkish Ambassador how best this can be overcome. Mr. Chevket answered that the Persian government is solving this problem of prejudice in a very wise way. They have increased the gendarme power, the mounted police, to insure the safety of the roads. They are sending hundreds of pupils to Europe and to the United States to be educated, and they are opening many schools for boys and girls in all parts of the country. Perhaps not all people understand this, but the purpose is to overcome prejudice through education. Schools have been opened among the nomads and the government is bringing children of the chiefs of these nomads to be educated, free of charge, in Tih-ran. They are giving special attention, too, to increasing the number of girls' schools. The results of all this tremendous effort will not be seen in one or two years, but later prejudice will pass and a great tolerance will prevail.

During the conversation we spoke of the League of Nations; the writer said that as Persia has taken her honorable place in the League of Nations, it is necessary for her to stand solidly for freedom of thought and conscience. The Ambassador replied, "Yes, she cannot live without this, but even if this were not one of the principles of the League of Nations at Geneva, Persia would insist upon it. To prove this: if the League of Nations, for example, should give an order that we must not have tolerance and freedom of thought and conscience, the Persian representatives would go against it. Why? Because His Imperial Majesty Reza Shah like our own Ghazi Kemal Pacha, wants to govern his country and uplift his nation. If the prejudicial powers, the mullahs, are in the ascendancy, then the government certainly is not free to work for the progress of the country. The mullahs could come to the Shahanshah and say, 'Building railroads is a sin, it is against religion. Opening schools is against religion.' The government could not live if it did not fight against and overcome the power of prejudice. It must establish tolerance."

from many lands, residing in Tih-rán, and with the Persian statesmen too, convinces one that Persia is going forward into a new great civilization. For twenty-five hundred years Iran has kept her nationality and her country, this is a long period for any country; at times she has had historic eras of progress and world influence. Now she is ushering in a new cycle of tolerance and progress.

A BAHÁ'Í TRAVELER IN PALESTINE

WALTER B. GUY, M. D.

AKKÁ; We are on our way to 'Akká. We pass along the seashore "the way of the sea." The billows roll in ceaselessly, their white-topped crests flashing white against the deep blue of the Mediterranean sea and sky.

We are going to the White Spot, the city of most ancient story, with fortress and immense walls that shine vividly in the afternoon sun: yet at one time, not long past, was the spot of cruelty, shame and unsanitary conditions. Here in this once pestilential spot lived the scourings of Turkey, its criminals and outcasts, sent to linger and die, unfit for human society.

We view the fortress, its citadel where the "One whom God should manifest," Bahá'u'lláh, with His family and loved ones were imprisoned. We see outside the fortress, yet still within the ancient city wall, the houses and homes of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. We can not today see the squalor and filth of the past, for a New Day has come—not here alone—but all over the world: a New Sun has arisen, and here and there, and everywhere, civilization is advancing with rapid strides. Ignorance and superstitions are fading away. Truly a New Era has dawned for the children of men. In place of ruined fortress and dismal abode in which the Beloved One was immured, we see instead a beautiful hospital where the prisoners of society are healed, and in the old home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, a municipal headquarters, with beds, and sick ones in the very rooms in which the Master lived.

We pass along the winding streets and through the tunneled ways, among the oriental bazaars, and look under the fortress walls through ancient windows, and see the arched groins and pillars of that ancient Crusaders Church now being slowly emptied of the debris of the centuries.

To me it is a most wondrous symbol—how the coming of Glory has cleansed the city of man, its streets of commerce and trade; transformed the ways and by-ways into paths of cleanliness; and the debris of centuries is being removed from this ancient church, its pristine splendor and beauty in time will be recalled.

So shall it be. "The Most Great Peace shall come"—the churches of the Prophets shall likewise surely emerge from their accumulated debris, and their glorious truths shine again in the light of this Glorious Sun of Truth.

We leave the city and drive to Bahjí, see its gardens and now empty palace, and then place our heads amidst fragrant blooms upon the threshold of this sepulchre, praying that we with our loved ones abroad may prove valiant and true servants in forwarding the splendor of this New Day; that His presence shall be ever with us, and that at last we may ever live with Him in His eternal Home of Glory.

We start once more for the Garden of Ridván, where the Hope and Light of the World used to sit by the flowing stream, write His messages to His servants, and pray that the Most Great Peace would speedily come into the hearts of all mankind. We see the flowers and eat of the fruits of this garden, then we return to Haifa; we pass again the foaming breakers, rolling eternally on the shore, and they again remind us of the wonderful power of our Great Creator Whose waves of Love, Light and Truth eternally roll over the world, grinding into powder the things of man that are not in harmony with His ancient plan—forever fructifying the deeds of loving service and giving eternal joy and life to struggling pilgrims seeking to do His will, who are traveling to that Golden City Eternal in the Heavens of His Command.

 AIFA: It was November, 27, 1929—the anniversary of the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá from this world of sorrow and struggle, achievement and joy. All day long groups of women and children had been coming and going at the home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

At six p. m. I joined a group of men in the courtyard that led to the main door of the house. They were dressed in various costumes, some in European clothes, others with fez of crimson hue, a few with white cloth and double rings on their heads in the desert Bedouin style. Presently we passed into the large entrance hall and here all shoes were removed before entering the Master's room from where He had ascended to the celestial world of the Spirit.

In the corner of the large room was a tall narrow bed with high posts and white coverings. On a pillow rested the Master's white oriental headdress or fez. The group constantly grew larger until the room was filled, but still others came, forming a group in the large hall outside. Some wore beards, white or gray, others were young or in full manhood and strength. These men were the exiles or prisoners of 'Akká and their descendants who had shared the imprisonment with the Master. As each one entered, he knelt at the side of the Master's bed and doubtless prayed that he might worthily follow in the footsteps so nobly and faithfully trod by their Lord. Sobs and moans filled the room, tears coursed down the cheeks of those grey-bearded men, exiles from far off Persia, their homeland; how poignantly they realized the void in their hearts made by the passing of their loved Master, who, for so many years in prison and at last in freedom, had been ever their leader, master, guide, protector, and friend. Rising from their knees, they kissed passionately the bed, its posts, and some the Master's fez.

Soon all who could get in the room had made their prayer. The sobs were stilled and at a word all sank to the floor. One of those present in the chamber raised a melodious chant, it was the sublime prayer of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, used always at His shrine. Others chanted in and outside the room; one by one we again knelt at the side of the bed, asking that the light, love and power that had upheld, inspired and sustained the Center of the Covenant of God through long years of exile, prison and struggle, might be ours; that we, too, might carry forward to ultimate victory the Kingdom of God in the City of Hearts; and that in some glad day the goal may be won, and all mankind be a unity in love, truth and eternal brotherhood.

ARMEL: It was night on the Mountain of God. The stars shone brightly; a chill wind swept down the mountain sides; the beautiful gardens with their flowers, stately cypress trees, fruits, and graveled walks were in densest shade, dimly outlined by electric bulbs moving to and fro in the gusts of an impending storm.

There were many men and boys, also a few women gathered there, to spend the hours of night in prayer and devotion, in commemoration of the Master of 'Akká, Who had ascended to the Eternal Realms eight years ago.

All were not residents of Haifa, for some had come from far off Persia, Jewish and Muhammadan Bahá'ís, others were from Egypt, Syria and the desert.

It was my privilege to represent the Bahá'ís of the West. Japan and Australia were represented by people of those countries.

Soon all had gathered in the Holy Shrine. Shoeless, on rich carpets, two by two, each had knelt at the threshold of the sacred tomb—first in the shrine of 'Abdu'l-Bahá; next in the tomb of the Báb. Sacred and holy prayers were chanted in each shrine. Here for the first time I heard the Guardian, Shoghi Effendi, in stately, measured cadences, chant the prayer of his Lord.

It was a deeply spiritual occasion, an experience that can never be effaced from memory's scroll. It was particularly Oriental in setting. All heads but mine were covered by the Oriental fez—the deep yellow of the Persian coats made a contrast with the dark suits of European design. The soft lights, the fragrant flowers, rich-hued rugs and carpets, the lamps and ornaments in the tomb chamber, and, to me, the strange chanting of the prayers—beautiful, appealing and intensely spiritual—made a scene of simple but holy splendor.

No preaching, no talking or praising; nothing but prayer. It was a promise of that New Day, its dawn already beaming on this mountain of the ancient prophets, when man no longer shall tell God what He shall do, but instead, with resigned wills and joyous hearts, hasten to His Courts, rendering all to Him Who gave all, and in return receive the influx of His Divine Reality that alone brings ineffable joy, peace and assurance of an eternal life in the celestial world.

Later all were gathered around the beautiful lawn and drank hot tea; more chanting was rendered, and finally in the large Eastern Pilgrim House, nearby, the Guardian said to me: "Tomorrow you travel early and far; it is my wish that you go to the Shrines and pray alone. There I will bid you farewell." Turning to his cousin, the grandson of the Master, he said, "Go with him."

It was midnight when we together knelt at the holy thresholds, strewn with petals of white fragrant flowers, damp with the tears of the believers and followers of the Divine Friend and Teacher. The Shrines were empty and silent; the lamps, however, still illumined the beautiful adornments. I could but offer myself as an unworthy servant, one who, however, desired to become worthy, and to serve in such a mighty work; and ask that a portion of His Spirit might descend upon me: "that God might be my portion and strength"; and kneeling together we waited for the answer; for are not all such requests answered?

As I recall this scene I am reminded how the prophet Elijah, three thousand years before, had made that memorable cry: "I am the only one left in all Israel to worship Thee." Did not the still small voice after the thunder and mighty wind, speak in his heart the words of comfort and assurance?

As Ruhi Afnan and I waited (he in Persian garb and I in Western clothes—a symbol of unity between the East and West), into my heart the answer came out of the depths of space and through the thousand veils that intervene between us and infinite love which ever surrounds and seeks to enter into our hearts and souls. It was a word of promise and assurance, comfort and joy, that my sacrifice on the altar had been accepted and His Presence should be always with me.

The time of departure had come. The Guardian gave me the three-fold embrace and words for the friends. Faithful Fugeta holding my hand, we went together down the narrow way through the straight gate on Carmel's slope that leads to the Shrines which speak so eloquently of Life Eternal. We passed over barren rocks and through dark ways till we came to the Western Pilgrim House, a home of sacrifice and loving service; from thence early next day to travel homeward to service and work in the vineyard of human hearts. The Pilgrimage ended and work begun.

DYNAMICS OF PRAYER

RUTH J. MOFFETT

THE archeologists have discovered that before the dawn of recorded history, even the earliest primitive man has worshipped a super-being and has believed in immortality. The Neanderthal Man, which is represented in the newly placed group at the Field Museum, Chicago, existed 50,000 B.C. With the discovery of those skeletons was found indications of primitive worship and belief in immortality. Mr. Henry Field, director of the Field Museum, says that a very recent discovery indicates that a great flood occurred at about 4,000 B.C. and still earlier at 12,000 B.C. The flood at the time of Noah, referred to in our Bible, was probably only about 3,000 B. C. A recent discovery reveals this interesting inscription: "In the land of Kish (which was the first capital after the first flood) there are legends of earlier races 30,000 years before our inscriptions begin."

From different excavated art pieces and implements, from crude frescoes on the walls of caves, from the skeletons found in various places is clearly indicated that inherent in the very center of man's being, there always has been an inner urge impelling him to look beyond his sense perception, beyond his consciousness to a Creator, an urge to implore that Creator for help in time of trouble, and guidance in time of danger. Our ancestors worshipped this Creator in the storm, the lightning, the famine, the sun, moon, comets, eclipses—in anything that inspired awe and wonder. Gradually throughout the panorama of cycles, man's conception of this Supreme Being has unfolded as his consciousness has expanded. Although the methods of worship have changed through every conceivable form, yet the keynote of all, throughout this stupendous symphony around which all the melodies, discords and harmonies weave in mystical upliftment—is prayer.

WHAT is prayer? There are many beautiful definitions by the Prophets of God. "Prayer is loving service." "Prayer is the soliloquy of the beholding soul." But the one I like is, "Prayer is the practice of the Presence of God."

A careful analysis reveals that there are nine ways in which man turns his heart to God, or tries to practice the Presence of God. The one with which we are most familiar is:

SUPPLICATION. This is an humble, earnest entreaty, with a sense of dependence upon what is greater than ourselves. We remember the words of Paul, "God is an ever present source of help in time of trouble." We have all lifted our consciousness many times by this impelling motive to prayer. And also;

COMPUNCTION. This is an uneasiness of mind arising from wrong doing. It is the sting of conscience, or a sense of remorsefulness. This feeling of unworthiness we find in many of the Psalms: "Feed me O Lord with the bread of tears, and give me plenteousness of tears to drink." Psalms 140:5. Compunction also compells us to prayer, as does:

ASPIRATION. This is the longing, usually unexpressed, for what is above one's present attainment, a somewhat vague longing for what is pure, noble and spiritual. Alger says, "It is not aspiration but ambition that is the mother of misery in man." We all have these vague longings and aspirations within us, which lead us into the prayer life. The next is,

INTERCESSION. This has been described as entreaty in behalf of others. We remember these familiar words of the Prophets of God, "The service of others is perfected by prayer," ('Abdu'l-Bahá) "Let your light so shine before men that they, in seeing your good works will glorify your Father which art in Heaven." "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me." (Christ). "Withhold not from my servant in whatsoever he may ask of thee, for his face is My face, and thou must reverence Me." (Bahá'u'lláh.)

GRATITUDE. Gratitude is also we know the cause of lifting the heart upward. It is the sense of appreciation for favors or bounties received. Gratefulness wells up in the heart and finds expression in prayer, as for example the words of David, "Oh give thanks unto the Lord for He is good, for His mercies endureth forever." Also the words of Bahá'u'lláh, "Praise be to Thee O God of Names and Creator of Heaven, Praise be to Thee for that by reason of which Thou hast made known to Thy servants, Thy Day, wherein the River of Life hath flowed from the Finger of Thy Generosity, and the Spring of Revelation and Unity hath become manifest through Thy Manifestation to whomsoever is in the earth and heaven. Praise be to Thee, O Desire of the world! Praise be to Thee O Beloved of the hearts of the yearning!"

MEDITATION. Meditation and prayer are not exactly synonymous. We are told that meditation is the continued thought about those things beyond the physical world. Both meditation and contemplation are necessary as one develops in the practice of the Presence of God. Meditation begins with continued reason, we are told, merging into a state of calm reflection and devotional pondering on statements of thoughts, ideas and principles about God. This seems to be a high intellectual process, while contemplation might be described as beginning with continued attention, merging into a state of beholding, a looking to God, resulting in spiritual perception. This seems to be a combination of the highest intellectual and emotional processes. Matra Williams in his book "Hinduism" says, "A true Buddhist never prays, he only meditates on the perfections of Buddha, and the hope of attaining Nirvana."

OBULATION. May be described as the act of offering something as a sacrifice in worship. As man's ideas of God have changed, the form of oblation has changed from the offering of burnt offerings of many kinds of animal and human flesh, to the offering of fruits and grains with prayers. Later, sweet smelling incense was used until the more advanced souls have learned to sacrifice the self-consciousness to the God Consciousness, and to give the self in hallowed consecration and joyous dedication. As in the words of Bahá'u'lláh, "Draw me unto Thee O My Divine Center, by the secret springs of my existence, and all my powers and senses shall follow Thy potent magnetism."

ADORATION. Adoration has quite a different heart motive. It is the act of rendering divine homage, of rendering veneration and reverence to the Divine Being. It is a joyful, spontaneous uplift of deep feelings of love, admiration, awe and devotion. We the servants of God have much to learn of the way to turn our hearts to God in adoration and to learn the real meaning of the words of Bahá'u'lláh as expressed in the daily prayer, "O God Thou hast created us to know and to adore Thee."

COMMUNION IS THE combination of several of the foregoing urges. It is the interchange or inter-communion of spirit, or the spirit's conversation with God. There is the longing on the part of the soul to receive wisdom, guidance, light and the opening of the soul, not to receive the answer to this or that minor question, but to receive illumination, the Christos or the Logos. "As the heart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God." (Psalm 42:1). "My love is in thee. Seek, and thou wilt find Me near. I have placed within thee, a spirit from Me, that thou mightest be My lover." "Love Me that I may love thee; if thou lovest Me not, My love can in no wise reach thee." (Bahá'u'lláh.)

We can learn a valuable lesson from the little girl who, when she was asked why it took her so long to pray, said, "You see, I always like to wait to hear what God has to say back to me."

These nine urges to prayer—supplication, compunction, aspiration, intercession, gratitude, meditation, adoration, oblation and communion, are all necessary for the practice of the Presence of God. Some religious groups emphasize and practice one or two to the exclusion of the others. Each urge is important and all are essential, though all need not be used at the same time. Any one without all the other steps is incomplete. The expression of each urge indicates the progress the soul is making on the path of God.

P RAYER may be expressed in four ways, the Thought Prayer, with more or less definite thoughts and ideas; the Heart Prayer, which is a vague, high, emotional aspiration. The Will Prayer, which is expressed in various forms of affirmation. And last the Uttered Prayer which is the expressed thought, idea and aspiration of the one praying. These are best expressed in the words revealed by the great Prophets of God. There is great power in the spoken word, and there is great wisdom in using the words revealed by the great World Teachers, all of whom have revealed prayers for the upliftment of the people. The Bahá'í Revelation contains the most abundant and richest material for prayer life.

WHILE in Haifa, the beloved Guardian of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh, Shoghi Effendi, gave to the writer, the most concise, complete and effective formula she has ever seen, for the Dynamics of Prayer. After saying to stress the need of more prayer and meditation among the friends, he said to use these five steps if we had a problem of any kind for which we desired a solution, or wished help. (First Step) Pray and meditate about it. Use the prayers of the Manifestations as they have the greatest power. Then remain in the silence of contemplation for a few moments.

(Second Step) Arrive to a decision and hold this. This decision is usually born during the contemplation. It may seem almost impossible of accomplishment, but if it seems to be an answer to prayer or a way of solving the problem, then immediately take the next step.

(Third Step) Have determination to carry the decision through. Many fail here. The decision, budding into determination is blighted and instead becomes a wish or a vague longing. When determination is born, immediately take the next step.

(Fourth Step) Have faith and confidence, that the power will flow through you, the right way will appear, the door will open, the right thought, the right message, the right principle or the right book will be given you. Have confidence, and the right thing will come to your need. Then as you rise from prayer take at once the fifth step.

(Fifth Step) Then he said, lastly, Act! Act as though it had all been answered. Then act with tireless, ceaseless energy. And, as you act, you, yourself will become a magnet which will attract more power to your being, until you become an unobstructed channel for the Divine Power to flow through you. Many pray, but do not remain for the last half of the first step. Some who meditate arrive at a decision, but fail to hold it. Few have the determination to carry the decision through, and still fewer have the confidence that the right thing will come to their need. But how many remember to act as though it had all been answered? How true are those words—"Greater than the prayer is the spirit in which it is uttered," and greater than the way it is uttered is the spirit in which it is carried out.

Now out of a few simple words by our wise Guardian, a great light has shone. Out of this light has grown an effective method of practicing prayer, out of which has grown a long trail of prayers answered and problems solved, and out of this method of practicing prayer has grown a new life in the most ancient of human acts of worship.

MANY have asked to whom shall we pray? All the Manifestations have taught the same answer,—to God—through that great Cosmic Focal Point that stands between the finite and Infinite absolute station of Unknowableness. That is the way taught by all the Messengers of God. The Manifestation is the Way of Prayer.

In conclusion may we add these thoughts. He who is in need will pray. He who hesitates to supplicate God is standing in the station of pride, or has not awakened to his own need, or has not realized the great value of prayer. He is therefore deprived. Therefore let all our business be to—know God. The more we know of Him the more we shall desire to know Him, and as knowledge is the measure of love, the deeper and more extensive our knowledge is, the deeper our love is. "The root of all knowledge is the knowledge of God."

The Presence of God is realized within, but is evoked by something from without. When these two streams meet on the fifth step enunciated by Shoghi Effendi, the exterior life becomes an act of worship, and we have learned—the Dynamics of Prayer or the Practice of the Presence of God.

A GERMAN BAHÁ'Í TEACHER IN FRANCE

DR. HERMANN GROSSMANN

We are pleased to publish an article sent us by an earnest thinker, our Bahá'í friend of Germany, Dr. Grossmann. Here he gives us a bit of philosophy such as could come only from one who had been through the deep travail of war. At the request of Dr. Grossmann the article has been kindly translated for us by his friend, Mr. H. G. Pauli, of Brooklyn.

A B D U 'L - B A H Á has many times pointed out how useful and how necessary it would be to travel for the diffusion of Unity.

As a matter of fact, Bahá'ís travel a great deal, frequently under great financial sacrifices. Is it the result of a desire to undertake journeys which urges us on? Many are attracted, it is true, to study new landscapes, new people, their habits and customs, because these are interesting. But only for that reason? No, the Bahá'í has not the time to pursue his interests only. Are there not endless duties to perform? Does there not rest upon each single one of us the heavy responsibility of a new and better age? Are we to think that because others are working for this great purpose, we may now and then take it easy? But did 'Abdu'l-Bahá ever permit Himself to take leisure and leave others to do the work?

The world exists for our happiness. O surely, that is one of the most beautiful of the Bahá'í Teachings, this sincerely wished for joy. We would and we should be joyful! But joyful in giving thanks to God and in feeling that we are united with Him. That is the specific in the Bahá'í happiness. And that is what I mean when I say that the Bahá'í has no time for enjoyment only.

To be united with God in every hour, in every moment, to love Him, to give thanks to Him, means to love His creatures, to show our thankfulness to Him in showing kindness to them. That is the first duty of a Bahá'í, that is his constant duty. Everything we do should attest our love, that it comes from Him.

It does not help us much to familiarize ourselves with other people and to learn of foreign customs, if we do not possess the right spirit and if this knowledge does not lead to understanding and to prayer.

“O God, I thank Thee, that Thou hast taught me to see when my eyes were blind. I give Thee thanks, that Thou hast taught me not only to recognize matter, but the spirit in matter. The Spirit cries for humanity, that we surrender prejudice and that we enlarge our hearts and open them. The Spirit cries for unity, for love, and understanding. O GOD suffer me to be filled with this spirit, suffer me to be a tool for the sake of Holy Peace amongst nations and humanity.”

Should you travel thus, then obey the command as a Bahá'í in foreign countries and go to other peoples.

BUT duty does not exist only in regard to the distant lands. Perhaps it may be more easy for us Occidentals to find unity with the Orient since the Orientals appear to us to be so distant and so foreign, that we find ourselves attracted to learn to know them. But are we also ready to love and to learn to know those more like our own people, those near to us whose names are familiar? Can we also welcome these nearer neighbors with an open heart and without prejudice?

Are the Germans ready to try to feel for the French in every respect as for their brothers? Are the English ready to receive the Americans as sons of their own people?

Not only with outward politeness and acceptable and obliging manners, but from the very heart? Let us be honest. Maybe it would be better to travel less, and to supplicate for the Spirit of God as a companion on our journeys. We can do that, even as business men and in the midst of the world.

AND another thing: let us not always believe that we have to perform an educational mission as we journey through other countries. Admitted, that our particular country has a great culture. But whatever our country may have, other countries also possess a great culture. And we shall find at least in every country something that is of value for us to acquire. Is it the result of pride, that we so readily put our country above all the others as regards its customs and achievements? Let us observe with an understanding heart. We love our country. Its customs, and its peculiarities are familiar to us. We have recognized its usefulness and its purpose and its orderliness. Therefore we believe that in our country everything is the best possible. But just so other nations are of the same opinion. Is not that a reason to become more thoughtful? God has created a world of diversities, and of a purpose not only just one correct type.

In Germany the telegraph-poles are in a straight line on the railroad beds. That appears to us to be correct and intelligent. In France the poles incline in the opposite direction of the curves of the roadbed in order that they may resist the better pull on the wires. Does not that appear as self-evident? Which is the better? Every country has its experience and will insist that its way is the best! And perhaps both are right. Therefore, we must not insist that we are right in every instance. That is also tolerance and appreciation.

Humanity has been guilty in the past,—they knew not what they did. But since the war humanity has, as it were, matured. And there rests upon us a terrific obligation: to work, work, work, that never again war should be, not here nor anywhere on earth. Do we recall how we stood facing each other in arms; do we remember how the shells furrowed the earth at Verdun, in the Champagne, in Flanders? How it seemed when comrades cried out under the splinters that tore them to pieces? How we stood by, bit our teeth together and shuddered within: "Lord, Lord, help." But we could not help and were forced to look on while their lives ebbed out in contortions!

In front of me in the railroad train compartment a French soldier is asleep. He wears the uniform against which I stood in the field out there to fight; and the scenery through which we pass is the same in which we years ago—not so very long ago—had dug ourselves in and to which earth we clung when the machine guns let their hail fire sweep over us so low.

Did we not all of us do our duty? At least we were told that it was our duty. Today we recognize another duty, and it is a peculiar feeling of brotherhood which overcomes me, a feeling that would cause me to weep for joy as I walk through the streets of Paris and read and hear so much about the constructive work for peace.

Many of us in Germany are beginning to realize in the quietness an unintentional protection in our forced defenseless state by the Versailles Agreement, which will protect us, we hope, from the taking part in a possible war-like complication. We are happy, therefore, that we may pursue the path of freedom without interference instead of to be obliged to turn our penetrative mind and our strength to the means of war in the first instance. A new war of the great nations will draw all countries into sufferings and is it not our kind that would then destroy itself? Let us desist from the narrow point of view to visualize the happenings of the past. War is horror for humanity, even so wherever it is furious. We must ban the ghost of war, or we shall never be master of it. For even while we are resting in the sleep of peace the torch of war may enkindle our home again in flames.

Should we not as 'Abdu'l-Bahá instructed, concentrate all of our thoughts on love and unity? . . . "A thought of hatred must be destroyed by a more powerful thought of love." Should the workers for peace be less inspired and less active, less steadfast, and less convinced than the devotees of war? Should we wait until a new and more horrifying world war demolishes humanity, with all kinds of horror, before we cry for peace?

Before us appears Father Time as a sage, who says: "Under my toga I hide both war and peace—choose!"

THE ONLY PICTURES OF THE BÁB

THOSE who have seen the beautiful painting of His Holiness the Báb in Haifa and gazed upon that pure Face will be interested to hear from whence came this painting. On the evening of January 26, 1930, just before I was to arise and speak to one hundred and fifty friends in a great drawing-room in Tíhrán, I suddenly caught sight of a large photograph which looked like the Báb. I asked my interpreter, Mr. Valiyyu'llah Vargá and he said: "No, that is not an authentic photograph of His Holiness the Báb, it may have been drawn from memory of the one in Haifa. But on the way home after the lecture I can tell you about the only paintings there are of His Holiness the Báb."

So coming back to the hotel he told me this thrilling story: "You asked about the painting of the Báb: I begin at the beginning. When the Báb was captured by the Persian Government, he was at last taken to Urumiyyih near Tabriz. There when He wanted to go to bathe, the Governor of the city sent Him a most spirited horse which no one could manage. He thought that the Báb would try to ride it and be thrown and killed. However, in the presence of the Báb the horse became very quiet and even bent for the Báb to mount it. The people, all non-Bahá'is, who saw the Báb go and come on this horse shouted that it was a miracle, and He was a holy man. They ran to the bath and collected the water in bottles, considering it blessed water. One of those who saw the people come in crowds and came, too, to observe, was the painter to Muzaffaru'd-Din Sháh (though at that time he was still the Crown Prince). This painter was engaged only to do his work.

"This painter, some years later, became a Bahá'í under my father's teaching (my father was 'Ali Muhammad Varqá). Then the painter told my father about going with the crowd to see the Báb in Urumiyyih before the time of martyrdom. This painter told father that at that time he conceived the idea of painting the Báb without the latter's knowledge. He prepared paper and pencils for a sketch and went into His holy presence. People were listening to the Báb Who was seated on a rug on the ground. One corner of the 'abá was thrown back. As soon as the artist entered, the Báb drew the 'abá into place, folded His hands one upon the other and looked at the painter as much as to say that He was ready! The painter studied the Báb's Face and then went out and drew. He returned again and again and each time the Bab took His original position, thus the sketch was made.

The painter showed this sketch to my father, and father asked him to make a colored painting from this sketch in order that it might be sent as a gift to Bahá'u'lláh in 'Akká. This was done, and when Bahá'u'lláh received this painting, He was very happy and said, 'This is the Báb!' In those days photography was not known and that sketch had been the only one made of the Báb during His lifetime. Bahá'u'lláh called one of the uncles of the Báb, showed him the painting and asked, 'Do you know this face?' Instantly the uncle replied, 'Yes, it is the Báb!'

"Bahá'u'lláh at once sent one of His 'abás to my father asking him to give it to the painter. My father, at the time he had sent the painting, had asked permission from Bahá'u'lláh to have nine paintings made and sent to nine important cities in Persia to be kept by believers in special places. In answer Bahá'u'lláh had given permission for the painter to make only one more and that was to be given to my father. No more were to be made. This painting of the Báb which my father had was confiscated by the Government with other papers, but when I was in the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá He promised me that sometime this will be given back to our family. Seyid Assadullah found the sketch made by this painter in the home of a Bahá'í family in Persia and he sent it to 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 'Akká. Thus the painting of His Holiness the Báb and the one sketch are now preserved in Haifa, the other painting is lost for the present, and aside from these there is no other authentic painting or photograph of the Báb."

Such is the interesting story told to me by Mr. Valiyyu'lláh Varqá. American friends will remember him for he came to the United States with 'Abdu'l Bahá in 1912.

THE BAHÁ'Í MESSAGE—"A MAGIC CASEMENT"

LESLIE R. HAWTHORN

LMERRILL ROOT, writing as one of the many contributors to "Pacifism in the Modern World,"* expresses some ideas which are captivating to a follower of Bahá'u'lláh. In an unusual way he delves into the problem as to why the average man does not oppose war when it comes, but, as often as not, actually welcomes it. At the sound of the bugles and the beating of the drums, all the horror of battle, the deprivation, the mud and filth, the wounded comrades, the poison gases, and the utter irrationalism of it all are forgotten, and only the thought of adventure and an absence from the monotony of life are uppermost.

In an intriguing poetical manner, Root says: "The man in the street . . . accepts war not so much because he is a fool, as because his life is foolish. He wants adventure and poetry; and he has a quaint passion for dragons; he feels a divine despair for unicorns; he longs for magic casements opening on the foam. . . . Man does not live by bread alone, but—as the symbol of the sacrament tells us—by bread and wine. Bread (or prose) is necessary; wine (or poetry) is just as necessary. Men sometimes turn to war because they have only half rations of the bread; but they often accept war with a desperate joy because they have no rations of the wine . . .

In this antithetical way Root describes the horrors and disillusionments of war. Later he pictures in a similar manner the drab existence of the average human life.

“The great wrong of our civilization is its dullness—the dullness of the day-by-day. The great hope of our civilization is the possible romance of the day-by-day. What we need is a world where men can truly enjoy the lilies of the field and the many mansions.

“Consider industry. The spirit of man asks for a fairyland and is given a factory. . . . Industry is dull: that is its worst crime. It gives little bread—but it gives no wine. Instead of the lilies of the field fairer than Solomon in all his glory, it gives us the bobbins of the factory. . . . It is not a merry-go-round, but a dreary-go-round.”

Root finds the same dreariness in education.

“Education should be a magic casement opening on the foam of that shore where Sir Isaac Newton walked. . . . It should be a unicorn, carrying us into ultimate lands of poetry. . . . It should fascinate the mind with ‘the fairy tale of science and the long result of time.’

“ . . . Instead of education we get paraphernalia: million dollar dormitories . . . halls, laboratories—and stadiums. . . . Education is a dull department store where you buy science by the yard (or inch), Shelley-chops by the pound, or history by the quart. The whole affair is a factory for the manufacture of intellectual pemmicans, of spiritual dried beef.”

Dullness Root finds everywhere—in shop, school, home, religion. “Civilization is endurable only to cigar store Indians.” His remedy however is constructive. He sums it all up in one poetic paragraph.

“We must, in short, provide the aesthetic equivalent of war. We must make art and philosophy ‘magic casements opening on the foam of perilous seas in fairy lands’ that are not forlorn. We must make science a unicorn to carry us nearer to the heart’s desire. We must challenge youth with real dragons: disease, militarism, ignorance, capitalism, war, the dullness of the mob. Let us sign our letters (and our lives) ‘Yours for magic casements.’”

As one reads this arresting presentation of a problem in which more people are interested than there ever were before, there comes almost like a flash the thought that those who have been attracted to the Bahá'í Cause do have a “magic casement” through which to look. What do they see? Low in the heavens is a clear and brilliantly shining Sun heralding in the Dawn of a New Age. Stretching long and dark are ominous shadows, which to the observant watcher in this beautiful morning hour are slowly, but surely, growing shorter. Here and there in the deep recesses of the garden, darkness still holds sway and the air is cold and foggy. The clearer and more sunny spots, still moist with dew, reflect in myriad rays the light from that dazzling orb, which, although slowly climbing to the zenith of its course, is still unseen by those creatures clinging to the shadows of the night just passed.

It is a beautiful scene to the watcher looking out and down from the magic casement, because in it he can anticipate so much. From his vantage position he sees the Old Day struggling against the New, yet the assertion of the latter irresistibly increases. The eyes of the watcher dilate and shine brightly, reflecting perhaps some of the rays of the Sun at which he dare not look directly. He is thinking of Jesus the Christ in Whose teachings he was reared. "How like that Day," he murmurs. Yes, like the coming of Christ, only much more significant. "And from this magic casement I see this New Day, praise be to God!"

Almost two thousand years ago Jesus the Christ walked and talked upon this earth of ours, but today the Promised One of all nations has brought to the world Christ's message again, together with its adaptations for this era. And now that the Sun of this New Day has cleared the horizon, we in the magic casement see wondrous things. The fascination of the scene before us calls us to action. Our daily work has a new meaning, for Bahá'u'lláh says, "We have made this—your occupation—identical with the worship of God, the True One." With such a thought the drudgery of work diminishes.

There is much to attract our attention and to give us food for thought. Around us everywhere are signs of tremendous material progress. One can probably safely say that the advances in scientific discovery during the last century and their application to the material world are more than equal to all the progress made in the last nineteen centuries. Today man has hundreds of aids and comforts unheard of a hundred years ago. To us who have grown up in this atmosphere and taken most of these things for granted, it is often hard to grasp the significance of this wonderful, awe-inspiring progress. Imagine, however, if one had been a spectator looking down on the life on this planet throughout the centuries of time. With such a perspective the last century would seem hardly more than a moment. When regarded in this light, these events acquire a new significance.

Not only are the people of today benefited by these remarkable material advantages, but many are conscious of the spread and realization of new ideals. Imperialism and militarism are tottering and in their places democracy and internationalism are rising. Prejudices are being removed. The very material progress, of which we have just spoken, is among other things making the world smaller, and as in days of long ago small adjacent states came to know each other better through the improved transportation and intercommunication of those times, so today, greater and farther separated states are exchanging hospitality with one another. Although the great urge is to look forward, one cannot be conscious of the history of the past without realizing that it will, in a sense, repeat itself, although on a scale at one time thought impossible. To those looking from the magic casement of this age, the many struggles which are going on between the adherents of the past and the forerunners of a new era of human civilization can be understood, and while some of the brave souls who stand for these refreshing ideals might themselves look askance at the watchers in the casement, the latter are conscious of the rising sun, whose progress to the zenith of the heavens is inevitable. Then all will be bathed in the glorious noonday light! What a stirring thought! What an antidote for the "dullness of the day-by-day" that Friend Root sees only too well!

As in the day of Christ, spiritual life is again receiving a revivification in this day. The watcher in the magic casement has the advantage of seeing in better relationship to each other the essentials of all religions, and can distinguish with better understanding the unessentials. From his position of advantage he is conscious that the sun has risen before, and a longing to explain his realization to those still existing in the long shadows of the dawn, comes over him, for they only know by tradition of a previous day long ago, and are sceptical of a repetition of such a glorious event. His face glows with excitement. This is the dawn and ahead is the long fullness of the day. Fading are the terrors of the night, prejudices, self-interests, materialism, class discrimination, hatreds, national patriotisms, strife, war. In the bright places bathed in sunlight here and there, the watcher is conscious of the happy midday hours ahead, for there he sees signs of understanding, wide human interests, spirituality, absence of class distinctions, love for humanity, neighborliness, and peace.

The words of Abdu'l-Bahá come to mind: "The greatest need of the world of humanity today is to receive the efficacy of the Holy Spirit. Until the Holy Spirit becomes effective, interpenetrating the hearts and spirits, and until perfect, reasonable faith shall obtain in the minds of men, it is impossible for the social body to be inspired with security and confidence. Nay, on the contrary, day by day enmity and strife shall increase among men and the differences and divergences of the nations shall augment."*

There is yet far to go, but the watcher high in his magic casement feels "The heat of the Sun of Truth." Never was there such a day as this! Life's cup is full and overflowing. The hours fly by, and time is too short for all the things we want to do. If only the great majority could look through the magic casement, and become absorbed with what they saw, Father Time would travel a long, long way before some reminiscent person, old in years, would say, "Why, we've had no wars of late!" And his young companion would answer with inquiring look, "Wars? What are you talking about? What are wars?" "Why, haven't you read in the old history books about wars? They were terrible things, in which hundreds of people went mad and tried to kill each other." "Can that be possible? I've never read any history books like that, and I honestly don't believe I want to. Say, we folks certainly have enough exciting things to occupy our minds today without even contemplating such terrible events as wars."

If E. Merrill Root's diagnosis of the problem of the allurements of war for man in the street is correct, and there seems no real reason why it should not be, then it would also seem that we who have been privileged to hear the Great Revelation of this Day have a wonderful opportunity to help in the solution of the problem by presenting to the seekers of Truth in this Age, Bahá'u'lláh's Teachings as the "Magic Casement" through which they may look. For what can be more exciting than to see and realize (only partly, to be sure, but none the less deeply) the changes taking place in the world today? In the material, social, and spiritual planes of current history tremendous forces are at work. Everywhere there is bewilderment, the old resisting the new; and yet, stimulated by the rays of the morning Sun, the new concepts of life are gaining ground, and the old, holding fast to the shadows of the past, are losing those things to which in the darkness of the recent night they clung so tenaciously and surely. The Bahá'í Cause offers a magic casement through which one can see the unity of science and religion and become conscious of the remarkable order of the universe from the ultra-microscopic electron up to the concept of galaxies of heavenly bodies in which our earth is comparatively a speck. As one is stirred through repeated reading—by the consciousness of further meanings of the words of Bahá'u'lláh, a glimmering of understanding of what life really is, and what the purpose of it may be, seeps into the mind. Life becomes full, and an excitement which "surpasses understanding" dominates the one privileged to look through the magic casement.

DISCIPLES OF THE BÁB

FATIMIH KEANUM

The author of this dramatic narrative was the wife of Haji Mullah Ali Akbar—known by the title Haji Akund, a follower of the Báb and later of Bahá'u'lláh. The Tablet of Tajalleyat, familiar to all Bahá'ís, was revealed for him by Bahá'u'lláh. Haji Akund was one of the early well known and very distinguished teachers of the Bahá'í Cause whose long suffering and repeated imprisonment is a story covering pages of the tragic history of the Cause. The article as printed herein has been translated from the original Persian and sent to us by Dr. Susan I. Moody. It has been put into literary form by Marzieh Nabil.

MY name is Fatimih; my father was Muhammad Báqir, my mother Begum Áqá. Our family descends from the Safavi Kings of Persia, and from the Navabih's family of Isfáhán, and we lived in Isfáhán on Ábbás Mirzá street.

When I was eleven years old, my father passed away. My two young brothers, then seven and eight, my mother and myself were left alone. We could not stay in Isfáhán any longer, in the streets where my father had walked and in the gardens where we had been happy together. And so it was that my mother took us away, on a pilgrimage to the Holy city of Mashhad, and after that we traveled to Tihrán and settled there.

We were lonely in Tihrán at first because we knew no one in the city; however we had some acquaintance with the family of two Bahá'í martyrs, Sultanu'sh-Shuhadá and Mahbubu'sh-Shuhadá (the King of Martyrs and the Beloved of Martyrs), and one day Mirza Áli Khán, a member of this family, called upon us with a friend and inquired after our welfare. As time went on he called again, and eventually it was through him that we came in contact with the man who was destined to be my husband. One day Mirza Áli Khán told my mother of a distinguished friend, Háji Mullá Áli Akbar, who had recently arrived from the Holy Land, and suggested that she make his acquaintance. My mother was interested and a meeting was arranged at the home of Siyyid Abdu'l-Hádi, and later the Háji called upon us. My mother was most favorably impressed with this upright and high-minded believer, and it came about that when Siyyid Hádi told her that the Háji was a widower and proposed on his behalf that she give me to him in marriage, she was delighted to accept. I was then a girl in my early teens.

Soon afterward the Háji came to my mother and told her frankly that, because he was a Bábi, he might at any moment be thrown into prison, or exiled, or put to death. He said, too, that his future bride might also suffer imprisonment, or worse. But because my mother was sympathetically disposed toward the Bábis, she bravely accepted these conditions, and preparations for our marriage were set under way.

The wedding day arrived, and our house was bright with guests and flowers. I remember well that among those present were Jináb-i-Hud-Hud and the wife of Jináb-i-Attár, Shamsi-Ján Khánum. I can still see before me the radiant faces of the friends, and the little tables piled with sweets and sherbets. I can hear the chanting and the hum of voices. But alas! Our happiness was not to last. On the third day of our marriage my husband was arrested and imprisoned by order of Prince Ná'ibu'saltanih, the son of Násiru'd-Din Sháh, and the wedding gaiety was changed to bitter weeping. In that dark hour there were some whose hearts were not touched. They were unfriendly to the Cause, and they said, "These people have turned away from the religion of God (Islam) and that is why they are exposed to such awful misfortunes, which indeed they richly deserve."

My husband was taken by the authorities and tortured until he was at the point of death. He was confined in a narrow, underground cell; his feet were fastened into the stocks; his neck was galled with heavy chains. This lasted for seven months, while I waited and prayed, struggling with my despair.

One day Násiru'd-Din Sháh went out for a ride, surrounded by the nobles of his court. On that same day I went to the prison to see my husband. He spoke words of comfort to me, encouraging me to stand firm and to accept our sufferings with resignation, and he added, "God is able to set prisoners free." I had hardly reached home when news came that the Shah had set all the prisoners at liberty. It seems that as he was riding he was thrown from his horse and fainted away. When he came to himself his courtiers urged that he let the prisoners go, saying that perhaps their sighs and lamentations had caused the accident. In this way my husband was set free, and after staying two months in Tíhrán and traveling to Mázindarán, he went on a pilgrimage to 'Akká, where he remained half a year in the presence of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh. He returned to Tíhrán and was again arrested, in company with a number of other believers.

At this time Siyyid Mihdi, a Bahá'í, arrived from the Holy Land. Ná'ibu'saltanih, the Shah's son who had issued the order for imprisonment, commanded my husband to find Siyyid Mihdi and bring him to his presence; he threatened my husband with death and warned him that many calamities would befall the Bahá'ís unless Siyyid Mihdi were brought to him. The Háji therefore went in search of Siyyid Mihdi, who declared himself ready to go to the Prince, and asked for a safe conduct; whereupon the Prince swore upon his oath that the Siyyid should come unmolested. And so it was that Siyyid Mihdi went to the Prince and conversed with him until after midnight, and was sent home in safety. But some days later he was again summoned, and this time, sensing danger ahead, he made his will and took leave of his family. By order of Ná'ibu'saltanih, a photograph of the Siyyid was taken and sent to the Shah. Soon after the Shah decreed his imprisonment.

For two years Siyyid Mihdi and my husband were wretchedly confined with their shoulders bowed down by chains and their feet bruised in the stocks. During this long period the strain and anxiety of myself and all the friends was beyond description.

At last my husband was again set at liberty and, having received permission from His Holiness, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, he went on a pilgrimage to 'Akká and remained there one year. A Holy Tablet was revealed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá at this time, in honor of my son, Mirzá Áli Muhammad, in which He expressed compassion and consolation for the adversities which had befallen my husband. When this Tablet reached Tíhrán, permission was granted my husband to return to Persia.

Shortly after his arrival the Háji was arrested for the third time and taken to Prince Ná'ibu'saltanih. The beloved Jinab-i-Háji Amin was also arrested and imprisoned. The two were cast into the same dungeon and submitted again to iron chains and the torture of the stocks. Once a week I had access to the prison. I remember asking my husband why he should suffer such disgrace and misery, and he replied that he had done no wrong other than accepting the religion of God. I was told that they had been arrested on the charge of supporting the republican party, whereas it was conclusively proved that they had entirely abstained from interference in politics. Under this false accusation, they were arrested together with some political criminals, among whom were Mirzá 'Abdu'lláh Hakim, Mirzá Haydar-'Ali Zarduz, Mirzá Muhammad Áli, Háji Sayá, Mirzá Nasru'lláh Khán and Mirzá Faraj-'u'lláh Khán. Upon investigation the Prince declared the charges unfounded and said that he would release the prisoners, but the next day we learned that they had been removed to Qazvin in the night and imprisoned in the strictest confinement. Our anxiety was unbearable, and we sent my husband's brother, Háji 'Abdu'l'Azim, to Qazvin, hoping for news. But he was not allowed to see the prisoners and was only told that they were safe and desired him to return to Tíhrán and protect their families. We received no further word. The confinement in Qazvin lasted two years.

Suddenly a greater calamity befell us for news came of the ascension of His Holiness, Bahá'u'lláh, and we forgot everything else in mourning for our Lord.

While my husband was imprisoned in Qazvin the cholera broke out. I feared for my children—my two sons and three daughters, Munirih, Ali Muhammad, 'Abdu'l-Husayn, Foruqiyih, Akhtar,—and it was not long before my son 'Abdu'l-Husayn fell sick of the disease and passed away. The child had wept and longed for his father, but he died without seeing him again. The next day word came from my husband that he had dreamed an ominous dream about 'Abdu'l-Husayn and wished to hear of him. It was a sorrowful reply that we sent.

Two years passed slowly by and at last the Shah ordered that the prisoners be released. Prince Ná'ibu'saltanah had them brought from Qazvin to the Amiriyyih, his palace in Tíhrán, and there he kept them imprisoned. I took our children to the palace to see their father, and this reunion was unforgettably pathetic. Nasiru'l-Mulk, one of the gentry who was present, burst into tears at the sight.

When the Prince decided to release the prisoners he demanded a ransom of two hundred tumáns for each of them, but their relatives refused to consider this because these prisoners were not criminals, to be liable for ransom. At last the demand was waived, and our loved ones were set free. My husband left almost immediately on his fourth journey to the Holy Land, and a blessed Tablet was revealed for him by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. When he returned to Persia he was no longer molested and devoted all of his time to the Cause of God. He established a meeting for the teaching of women, which was held twice a week in our home, and among those attending these classes for the study of the Word of God were Jinab-i-Thamarih Khánum and her daughter, near relatives of His Holiness, Bahá'u'lláh, who were both prominent Bahá'í teachers.

A few days before his death, my husband told me that he was more than content with life and that he no longer had a single desire for this world. On Friday the 15th of Safar, 1328 (Feb. 25, 1910) after his return from the bath he complained of feeling unwell. He seated himself on a cushion and suddenly passed away. Three years later our family received permission from His Holiness, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, to journey to the Holy Land, and it was in visiting our Lord and in praying at the Holy Shrine that we found consolation.

THE WORD MADE FLESH

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

WHO was Christ Jesus? For nineteen hundred years this question has been asked and answered. The quest continues and the answer varies now as when the question was first asked.

“Who do men say that the Son of Man is?” asked Jesus of His disciples. “Some say John the Baptist; some Elijah; and others Jeremiah or one of the prophets,” was the reply.

“But who do ye say that I am?”

“Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God,” answered Peter.

A little book has recently come into the hands of the writer in which this question is again answered. The book is too theological to be popular but is valuable because it shows a sharp turn in religious thought and because the answer to this ever-recurring question takes us back not only to Calvin and Luther but to Peter's straightforward reply and to the more philosophical answer in the first chapter of John's Gospel, “The Word became flesh and dwelt among us.” In this book, “The Theology of Crisis,”* the author has set out for English readers the beliefs held by the group of European leaders in religious thought known as the Barthian School. This and a book by Professor Barth entitled “The Word of God and the Word of Man,” are the only ones of many written in German that have yet been rendered into English.

*“The Theology of Crisis,” by H. Emil Brunner. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

“The Word of God and the Word of Man,” by Karl Barth. Published by the Pilgrim Press, Boston.

It is not the purpose of the present writer to attempt a careful review of the book but to call attention to the fact that here once more is a positive gospel of faith in Jesus Christ as the Divine Revealer. The Reality, Christ, was the Word of God. Prof. Brunner emphasizes divine revelation, the Messianic consciousness of Christ, that natural man is sinful and must needs be saved. We find such statements as these:

“Any doctrine of Jesus that says less than this, that the Word of God became man, falls below the true fact of revelation.”

“Christian faith . . . must abide by the assertion: ‘Jesus Christ, the incarnate Word, God become man.’”

May we say reverently and with rejoicing that here in this group of modern thinkers Christ again comes into His own. These scholars, recognizing the decay of Christianity, go straight to the heart of the matter. Prof. Brunner says: “Christianity is either faith in the revelation of God in Jesus Christ or it is nothing.” And again: “An age that has lost its faith in an absolute, has lost everything. It must perish; it has no vitality left to pass the crisis; its end can only be—the end.”

The Barthian school of thought has grown up since the war as a reaction to the extreme modernist view which would do away with all revelation and finds that man, in the course of his evolution, has become so good and so great that he either needs no salvation or can save himself. But while their doctrine is a positive reaction from the wavering, unanchored thinking of the modernist, it does not, like the fundamentalist doctrine, ignore the truths of modern science or the need of a progressive social program. Chapters entitled "The Problem of Ethics" and "Progress and the Kingdom of God" deal with some of our present day problems.

Another fact that is of significance in connection with this movement is the increasing interest which students are showing in it. We are told on the jacket of the book that "Professor Brunner, in order to accommodate the students who are now crowding his lecture room, has had to move his classes to one of the largest halls the University of Zurich affords."

Does this interest indicate that young people are ready, even hungry, for a religion with a firm foundation, that the trained modern mind is willing to consider whether a gospel of revelation may not after all be in accord with reason and science?

These questions are of moment to all of us. When men begin to see once more the Reality of Christ our hearts respond with answering hope for a better world. For we believe, as is so clearly and simply stated by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that "the Reality of Christ, that is to say, the Word of God, is the cause of spiritual life. It is a 'quickenning spirit'."

'Abdu'l-Bahá helps us, too, in an illuminating talk given in New York, to put meaning into the profound words, "The Word became flesh." "Why was Jesus the Word?" asked 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Answering His own question, He says: "In the universe of creation all phenomenal beings are as letters. Letters in themselves are meaningless and express nothing of thought or ideal as, for instance, 'a,' 'b,' etc. Likewise all phenomenal beings are without independent meaning. But a word is composed of letters and has independent sense and meaning. Therefore, as Christ conveyed the perfect meaning of divine reality and embodied independent significance, he was the Word. He was as the station of reality compared with the station of metaphor. There is no intrinsic meaning in the leaves of a book, but the thought they convey leads you to reflect upon the reality. The reality of Jesus was the perfect meaning, the Christhood in Him which in the holy books is symbolized as the Word."

Who, then, was Jesus Christ? 'Abdu'l-Bahá answers this question most wonderfully in these words: "Jesus was a Manifestation of God. Everything of Him pertained to God. To know Him was to know God. To love Him was to love God. To obey Him was to obey God. He was the source of all Divine qualities. In this Mirror the light of the Sun of Reality was reflected to the world. Through this Mirror the Energy of God was transmitted to the world. The whole disk of the Sun of Reality was reflected in Him."

He who would honestly solve the question as to "Who was Christ?" is confronted in this day with the question, equally momentous, "Who was Bahá'u'lláh?" The same cycle of manifestation evolving brings again the concrete expression—renewed revelation of the Word. It is true today as it was in the time of Christ that "those who seek shall find."

RELIGIOUS UNITY

HIS Holiness Bahá'u'lláh has said that if from each of the varying religious systems one intelligent member be selected, and these representatives come together seeking to investigate the reality of religion, they would establish an inter-religious body before which all disputes and difference of religious belief could be presented for investigation and discussion. These questions could then be weighed and settled from the standpoint of reality and all imitations discarded. In this way all religious sects and systems would become one.

Do not question the practicability of this and be not astonished. It has been effected and accomplished in Persia. In that country the various religionists have gathered together to investigate the reality and have united in the utmost fellowship and love. No traces of discord or differences remain; the utmost love, kindness and unity are apparent. They are unified and live together like a single family in harmony and accord. Discord and strife have passed away. Love and fellowship now prevail instead. Furthermore those souls who have obeyed Bahá'u'lláh and attained this condition of accord, fellowship and affiliation are Muhammadans, Jews, Christians, Zoroastrians, Buddhists, Nestorians, Shiites, Sunnites, and others. No discord exists among them. This is a proof of the possibility of universal unification among the religionists of the world through practical means. Imitations which have held men apart have been discarded and the reality of religion envelops them in its perfect unity.

“God’s creation is perfect. Every part of the universe has its connection with every other part, according to a Divine system.”

’Abdu’l-Bahá

HAVE THE EARTH and the human life upon it come to be what they are by a form of evolution which is purely an accidental configuration of matter, or have they followed a Design which the people of religion call the Will of God?

The Bahá’i teaching definitely supports the concept of a vast Design which not only has patterned life, but has also impelled it to evolve. “It hath been made evident and proved,” said ’Abdu’l-Bahá, “that interaction, cooperation and interrelation amongst beings are under the direction and will of a Motive Power which is the origin, the motive force and the pivot of all interactions in the universe.”

Scientists, on the other hand, successful in finding material causes for material things, have tended to conceive a chain of cause and effect which precludes a Divine purpose or will. Comte, French scientist and philosopher of a century ago, asserted the dogmatic position of science in the classic words, “We have now ushered God across the boundaries of the universe.” In other words, the scientist no longer felt any need of causes outside the phenomenal universe.

This materialism has continued to dominate scientific thought from Darwin till today. But now, for the first time, the open-minded scientist is beginning to confess himself baffled before the ultimate mystery of matter—and its kaleidoscopic transformations. The solidity of the atom, firm ground and foundation for a materialistic concept of the universe, has already disappeared into thin air, and with it the cocksureness of the positivist. Leading physicists of today, such as Michelson and Eddington, see the possibility of explaining ultimate matter in terms of spirit.

And now comes a remarkable statement from the physicist Arthur H. Compton of the University of Chicago, Nobel Prize winner of 1927, to the effect that the world and mankind have not developed at random out of an atomic chaos. On the contrary, he believes there is evidence of a directive intelligence or purpose back of everything, with the creation of intelligent minds as its reasonable goal.

“The old-fashioned evolutionary viewpoint,” says Professor Compton in an interview to the New York Times, “was that the world as we know it developed as a result of chance, variations of all kinds occurring, some of which would be more suited to the conditions than others, and therefore surviving.

More recent thought has found this viewpoint increasingly difficult to defend.

"To the physicist it has become clear that the chances are infinitesimal that a universe filled with atoms having random properties would develop into a world with the infinite variety that we find about us.

"This strongly suggests that the evolutionary process is not a chance one but is directed toward some definite end. If we suggest that evolution is directed we imply that there is an intelligence directing it. It thus becomes reasonable to suppose that intelligent minds may be the end toward which such an intelligent evolution is proceeding."

Not only does this modern-minded physicist believe in a Purpose underlying and impelling all existence, but he doubts if the human mind and soul, greatest and most important of all creations, becomes annihilated at the death of the body.

"If in the world scheme conscious life is the thing of primary importance, what is happening on our earth is thus of great cosmic significance, and the thoughts of man, which have come to control to so great an extent the development of life upon this planet, are perhaps the most important things.

"On this view, we might expect nature to preserve at all costs the living souls which it has evolved at such labor, which would mean the immortality of intelligent minds."

The growth of man's character, through the trials and tests of the years of earthly life, does all this come to naught at death? Such an idea is unthinkable says this physicist.

"It takes a whole lifetime to build the character of a noble man. The adventures and discipline of youth, the struggles and failures and successes, the pains and pleasures of maturity, the loneliness and tranquility of age—these make up the fire through which he must pass to bring out the pure gold of his soul. Having been thus far perfected, what shall nature do with him? Annihilate him? What infinite waste!"

Thus we see that science is more and more tending in the direction of harmony with the deeper spiritual truths.

And in the world of economics we have such a leader as Roger Babson urging the teaching of the spiritual verities to all school children, for it is more important than any other knowledge. The existence of God and the soul, the use of prayer, and the immortality of the spirit—these are subjects which he would have the public schools inculcate.

Certainly the time to acquire the foundations of religion is in childhood. The present generation are managing to live without religion because they are still using spiritual momentum acquired from their parents. But what have they to hand on to their own children? Here is one of the greatest problems that face modern parents who have themselves lost faith in religion because of its entanglements with dogmas impossible of reconciliation with known truths of science.

Just at this time when devotion to traditional religion is weakening—and this trend is almost as strong in Japan, China, India, and the Near East, as it is in America and Europe—humanity is presented with a solution which is marvelously satisfying to the most advanced thought, and which bridges the gulf between religious progressives and religious conservatives. The Bahá'í Movement, strongly practical in its humanitarian message and appeal, also harmonizes spiritual truth with the truth of science. From the old dogmas and traditions, man-made in an epoch of humanity's childhood, emerges once more religion pure and undefiled.

Such truth is no more hostile to science than is the universe itself. For truth cannot be disparate. There can be only one truth—whether it be approached from the viewpoint of the scientist or of the religionist. Religious dogma which opposes truth as revealed by science is pure imagination, the product of man's emotions rather even than of his intellect—and certainly not truth as divinely revealed.

Bahá'u'lláh says the universe hath neither beginning nor ending. He has set aside the elaborate theories and exhaustive opinions of scientists and material philosophers by the simple statement "There is no beginning, no ending." The theologians and religionists advance plausible proofs that the creation of the universe dates back six thousand years; the scientists bring forth indisputable facts and say "No! these evidences indicate ten, twenty, fifty thousand years ago," etc., etc. There are endless discussions pro and con. Bahá'u'lláh sets aside these discussions by one word and statement. He says "The divine sovereignty hath no beginning and no ending." By this announcement and its demonstration he has established a standard of agreement among those who reflect upon this question of divine sovereignty; brought reconciliation and peace in this war of opinion and discussion.

Briefly, there were many universal cycles preceding this one in which we are living. They were consummated, completed and their traces obliterated. The divine and creative purpose in them was the evolution of spiritual man, just as it is in this cycle. The circle of existence is the same circle; it returns. The tree of life has ever borne the same heavenly fruit.—Abdu'l-Bahá.

NEW ATTITUDES ON COLOR

LESLIE R. HAWTHORN

ABDU'L-BAHÁ in His writings and when in this country had much to say concerning the oneness of the world of humanity, and the relationships of peoples of different color to one another. On various occasions he referred to the color problem in the United States, where, unfortunately, it presents itself from time to time in acute forms. To one who is at all acquainted with this great problem and with 'Abdu'l-Bahá's remedy, it is refreshing to read in "Pacificism in the Modern World,"* edited by Devere Allen, a chapter by the editor, entitled "The New White Man." In it he depicts the beginnings of a New Age in which he already sees changes of attitude towards the darker skinned citizens of the world on the part of some of the more progressive white men.

To truly appreciate his point of view one needs to read the chapter itself, for it exposes to view some of the real reasons for the attitudes of the white race towards the peoples of darker color, and likewise shows the readjustments that sooner or later are bound to come. Briefly, the new white man is the person who has acquired the fundamental idea of the brotherhood of man and practices that ideal.

"The new Negro, the new Chinese, the new oppressed and submerged colored peoples everywhere, are reaching out for higher and higher achievements and more abundant opportunities for self-realization. The world around, almost, new is the word which describes the stirring of thought among those sections of mankind which have hitherto been looked down on by believers in Anglo-Saxon superiority."

Such statements naturally raise the question as to whether there is any possibility of a new white man. Allen evidently thinks there is.

"The new white man will soon become articulate. . . .

"The new white man will have to burst the bonds of ignorance." Allen, after enlarging this statement by saying that the new white man will become aware of the accomplishments in many lines of not only the Negro, but peoples of other pigmentation, too, adds: "He will know so many Negroes personally, if he has the good fortune to deserve their friendship, that the experience of association alone will render him immune from the foolish phrases of traditionalism."

"The new white man will burst the bonds of superstition." Allen explains that if the colored people are superstitious the white are also. Their superstitions pertain to the darker skinned folk, and are usually very unrelated to scientific fact. Allen hastens to say, however: "Yet it is questionable how far we shall get ahead by appeals to science and by too learned discussions. This is one field of human contact where unspoiled fraterniza-tion of children belonging to different races is a guide fully as reliable as laboratory studies or dissertations in anthropology."

"The new white man will burst the bonds of economic dependency. . . . In the ranks of organized white labor, which for the most part refuses to admit the colored worker, will some day yet be heard the voice of the new white man, crying out the sound principle of all-inclusive labor solidarity."

Elsewhere Allen says regarding the solution of the race problem, "Is there, indeed, any way at all short of complete justice, complete equality, complete freedom for friendship?"

"Almost uniformly the great saints and prophets have pointed toward a unity of the races transcending any immediate hope we may dare entertain for our present caste-ridden society."

To the new white man, however, he gives the vision, when he says: "Looking down the far aisles of coming centuries he can hardly fail to see increasing interracial oneness."

Such thoughts are stimulating, and when we turn to the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá we find "One of the important questions which affect the unity and solidarity of mankind is the fellowship and equality of the white and colored races. Between these two races certain points of agreement and points of distinction exist which warrant mutual consideration. The points of contact are many; for in the material or physical plane of being both are constituted alike and exist under the same law of growth and bodily development. Furthermore, both live and move in the plane of the senses and are endowed with human intelligence. There are many other mutual qualifications. In this country, the United States of America, patriotism is common to both races; all have equal rights of citizenship, speak one language, receive the blessings of the same civilization and follow the precepts of the same religion. In fact, numerous points of partnership and agreement exist between the two races; whereas the one point of distinction is that of color. Shall this, the least of all distinctions, be allowed to separate you as races and individuals? In physical bodies, in the law of growth, sense endowment, intelligence, patriotism, language, citizenship, civilization and religion you are one and the same. A single point of distinction exists—that of racial color. God is not pleased with, neither should any reasonable or intelligent man be willing to recognize inequality in the races because of this distinction."

In discussing the present attitude of the white man and his dominance of the race situation Allen makes the following interesting statement concerning the white American: "Despite the legend of the Civil War, he has allowed himself to be sold by his desire for dominance into a spiritual slavery. . . . It is because thus far we whites have not had our spiritual renaissance that we pay any heed to oracles who but bolster up our prejudices. . . ."

'Abdu'l-Bahá tells us, "There is need of a superior power to overcome human prejudices; a power which nothing in the world of mankind can withstand and which will overshadow the effect of all other forces at work in human conditions. That irresistible power is the love of God.”

The new white man will have the love of God. So undoubtedly will the new man of the future, whatever his color. Although, perhaps, in this country it will be the white man who will have to change his attitudes more than any others; it is also true that the New Age will see a greater feeling of unity on the part of those whose color is different from our own. History shows that subjugated races when opportunity is given them usually exhibit an attitude of superiority, presumably in retaliation for the wrongs they suffered. Such an attitude, without the love of God, is rather natural. To avoid repetition of such events it would seem as though those now exhibiting the attitude of race superiority should be the first to take advantage of the new standards for this Age and hasten the development of the new white man.

Allen makes this startling statement: “. . . For the avoidance of interracial conflict on a titanic scale in the remaining years of the Twentieth Century the white man, because of his long dominance, is chiefly responsible.

white man can prevent catastrophe. Nothing affects the situation very much unless the new Negro, the new peoples of the new East, the new white man, can begin now to live a new life more adventurous by far than war and exploitation.”

To those who have read the words of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdul-Bahá and have caught the spirit of the Age which is upon us, and who, with Their help, are conscious of the tremendous forces now at work throughout the world, and who can see the far-reaching changes going on in all phases of human life, it is stimulating as well as enlightening to come across such a book as “Pacifism in the Modern World,” and to read therein such a chapter as “The New White Man.” Such statements as are quoted above, and coming from such an authority, should awaken us more fully to the problems around us and before us, and cause us to devote all our efforts towards the fulfillment of those ideals which are fundamental in the Bahá'í cause, and which were proclaimed many, many years ago by Baha'u'lláh. The most important of all the principles is The Oneness of Mankind, for until this oneness is understood and accepted peace is impossible of accomplishment.

“Originally mankind was one family, united and compact; later on the members of this happy family were divided and subdivided through ignorance and prejudices. Now the time has come again for their final unification.”—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE NEW WORLD SPIRIT

"What is the spirit of this age, what is its focal point? It is the establishment of Universal Peace, the establishment of the knowledge that humanity is one family. . . . This is the day in which war and contention shall be forgotten. This is the day in which nations and governments will enter into an eternal bond of amity and conciliation. This century is the fulfillment of the promised century."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE PEACE MOVEMENT no longer depends on a few so-called intellectuals. It has arrived at a point where it not only challenges some of the brainiest statesmen in the world, but where great parties dare to endorse it.

Twenty-five or thirty years ago, people regarded it as based on pure idealism, as righteous in theory, but hopeless in practice.

Now they realize that it was shaped by the necessities of modern civilization, that the twentieth century world could not afford to ignore it, and that instead of being a romantic dream, it was rooted in the fundamental needs of hard-headed progress.

Nations are beginning to understand that they cannot live by the law of the jungle, that world-wide trade and intercourse calls for world-wide order and that they must recognize the common interests if they would enjoy the common benefits of civilized life.

In this respect, humanity is merely applying on a grand scale those ideas which it has found necessary to apply on a small scale since the dawn of consciousness.

Time was when each family lived unto itself and looked to its own strength for protection, and time was when each tribe claimed the right to make war at its pleasure.

Unrestrained sovereignty, as we call it, has bowed to the laws of relativity and compromise.

In the beginning it was exercised by the individual; later by the family; still later by the clan, and then by the nation.

Each step upward has led to its subordination.

Right now there are only fifty-five governments who pretend to enjoy it, and the vast majority of those have yielded to the extent of joining the League of Nations, entering the World Court or subscribing to the Kellogg pact.

Humanity has not been following a poet's fancy in this expansion of ideas, but has found virtue in what was profitable, in what paid, in what was indispensable to the growth of intelligence. — M. E. Tracey in the Washington News.

TURKEY, the new Republic, under the powerful courage of the Ghazi Kemal Pasha, has contributed a mighty forward impulse to world understanding, to the union of East and West. Turkey, situated in both the Orient and the Occident, the onetime head of the Muslim world, is today watched by the eyes of millions of Muslims throughout the different continents. And Turkey has astonished even Europe and the rest of the western world by her most frank democratic attitude. She has gone a generous half-way to stretch out her hand of good will to western Christian countries. Let not Christian Europe, in its self-esteem walk by on the other side of the road,—it, too, has broken faith and committed atrocities.

One knows that before there can be a New World Order, the crumbling old dogmas and fanaticisms, the prejudices and jealousies must be torn down, and efficient tools provided for building a new unity of humanity. This the great Ghazi Kemal Pasha has done. He has the reputation of plunging into all the hardest tasks that no one else would attempt and carrying them through to remarkable success. He is doing his part to make the world safe for peace; differently to be sure from Mr. Kellogg and his pact, but nevertheless very important.

Kemal Pasha has substituted the Latin character for the Arabic, so that now western literature will be easier for the millions of eastern-ers to learn, and in turn western nations can more quickly grasp the Turkish language and through it understand the religion, the philosophy, the culture of the Oriental. This must come about if the East and the West really are to understand each other. Man as man can never hold up his head in honor until the East and the West are real friends for until then he is the universe's greatest failure.

The Ghazi has also separated the religion and the state in Turkey, which was a much harder task than it was for Europe to throw off a similar yoke a few centuries earlier. Now in the Orient, liberty of thinking and freedom in choosing one's belief will be realized more and more for Turkey's present tolerant far-seeing outlook undoubtedly will be studied and adopted by many other Asiatic countries.

MUHAMMAD NEVER taught the wearing of the veil. Muhammad's own daughter, called "the Lady of Paradise" spoke to large audiences of Arabs with her face uncovered. It is said that Zeyneb, the great and very beautiful woman professor in the University of Baghdad wore no veil when she taught. It is the Ghazi Kemal Pasha in this twentieth century who has had the superhuman courage to take the veil off Turkish Islam and to do away with polygamy in Turkey. In this new republic of Turkey the marriage law is the same as it is in Switzerland and in the United States.

IF ANY ONE visits Turkey and sees how these Young Turks have suffered, been persecuted and exiled, how they have fought to hold the "homelands" of their once vast empire, and how necessary it is now to guard their spirit of nationalism in these first foundation years, one is not surprised that nationalism is cherished almost as their religion in this new Turkey.

If Turkey can be left to develop her rich resources, expand to the full her modern education, and if the world will give to Turkey courteous consideration and unquestioning trust, Turkey may stand a glorious Republic, a model to the East and a glory to the West.

Now her great President (and he is the same man who as Commander of the Army blocked absolutely the Dardanelles to a warring world) has opened wide the mental dardanelles so that the East and the West may come and go, so that there may be Arabic-Latinized script, so there may be co-education, great freedom and progress for women in this eastern-westernized republic, and so there may be genuine free thinking and freedom for all religions.

So before leaving this table of thought, O reader, I lift my glass and pledge a toast to Kemal Pasha, President of the Republic of Turkey.

"From every standpoint the world of humanity is undergoing a re-formation. The laws of former governments and civilizations are in process of revision, scientific ideas and theories are developing and advancing to meet a new range of phenomena, invention and discovery are penetrating hitherto unknown fields revealing new wonders and hidden secrets of the material universe; industries have vastly wider scope and production; everywhere the world of mankind is in the throes of evolutionary activity indicating the passing of old conditions and advent of the new age of re-formation. Old trees yield no fruitage; old ideas and methods are obsolete and worthless now. Old standards of ethics, moral codes and methods of living in the past will not suffice for the present age of advancement and progress. . . .

"While this is true and apparent, it is likewise evident that the Lord of mankind has bestowed infinite bounties upon the world in this century of maturity and consummation. The ocean of divine mercy is surging, the vernal showers are descending, the Sun of Reality is shining gloriously. Heavenly teachings applicable to the advancement in human conditions have been revealed in this merciful age. This re-formation and renewal of the fundamental reality of religion constitute the true and outworking spirit of modernism, the unmistakable light of the world, the manifest effulgence of the Word of God, the divine remedy for all human ailment and the bounty of eternal life to all mankind."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE UNIVERSAL RELIGION

HOOPER HARRIS

"In this century of illumination hearts are inclined toward amity and fellowship and minds are thoughtful upon the question of the unification of mankind. There is an emanation of the Universal Consciousness today which clearly indicates the dawn of a great unity."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

RELIGION which leads the way to God through Prophets can alone furnish the authority necessary to provide the laws and institutions in accordance with which the social, intellectual and spiritual evolution of mankind must proceed. For religion must be not only for that rare company of highly developed people whose souls aspire to God, must be not merely a more or less successful effort by individuals to find and know God, but it must be able to change laws and customs which stand in the way of progress and enlightenment, remove superstitions, furnish a conclusive proof and argument, and provide us with a sufficient sanction for government, so that the foundations of society may be made firm, and the world saved from sinking into gross materialism and perhaps from that back into barbarism, for history teaches us that barbarism may easily exist under all the outer forms of culture and civilization.

Just as life can only be known through its manifestations, so God Who is the Author and Creator of life, can only be known through His Manifestation, Who is "the life, the truth and the way." The question whence we are, what we are, and what is our final goal and end, neither science nor philosophy has been able to answer. Such an answer as the soul will accept and profit by, can be furnished by religion alone. But any answer which religion gives, to be satisfactory to the educated and intelligent, must be supported and attested by facts, confirmed by reason and justified by experience. Otherwise there is nothing to show that religion is anything more than mere aspiration of the soul toward the Unknowable.

True religion, according to the Bahá'í teaching, is something more than soul aspiration, and rests upon something far more substantial than psychic phenomena or miracles, which in themselves are not sufficient to constitute any proper or satisfactory basis for real faith. True religion does not deny any of these things, but it does not depend upon them. It stands firmly on divine revelation, and affirms that the only real proof of God and soul and eternal life is a provable and demonstrable revelation of the spirit of God to men, and that such a divine revelation must come to man through Man used as the Mouthpiece of God.

While the Invisible Essence of God is unknowable and above "ascent or descent, height or depth, sign, description or definition," so that we cannot say what He is or what He is not, yet the Revelation of God is knowable and provable. The Prophets of God are therefore His real and substantial proof, for in Them His spirit becomes manifest.

The Spirit of God has been at work in humanity, which is its true temple, from the very beginning; and its Manifestations to men in the various cycles and epochs with signs and proofs which cannot be denied is to be clearly traced in the history of the human race. Through the different cycles this mighty and wonderful spirit in man has not been working aimlessly, but on the contrary, for the progressive development of man to an end and goal worthy of his creation. Carlyle has well said, "Man is a wonderful creature, mysteriously endowed, with such a life within him and such a world about him as defies successful analysis."

Individuals may be insignificant, with only their few short years to live. But when we consider man as a race; view him in the light of the one great spirit in him which is continually driving him forward along the road of civilization and progress, and see his great accomplishments—how he has changed the face of the earth, subdued and conquered nature and harnessed the very elements to his use,—it is easy to understand that there must have been a great purpose in his creation. As the poet has so beautifully expressed it: "Towards one divine event, the whole creation moves." We cannot more fitly describe that event than in the language of the Hebrew prophets as the Day of God, "when the knowledge of God would cover the earth as the waters cover the sea; when the great Deliverer would arise with healing on His wings; when God's holy ones would reign on earth; when the Most Great Peace would become manifest; and when there would be one Lord and His Name One."

THE ONE GREAT spirit, the Spirit of Truth, has at different times in the social and spiritual development and progress of the human race, manifested itself with signs and with power and authority. It is the will of God in humanity continually striving to uplift man to a higher level of divine knowledge, of morality and of spirituality. Its Manifestations men have known as Zoroaster, Abraham, Moses, Buddha, Christ, Muhammad.

Men cannot know the Essence of God, but those in whom His Primal Will becomes manifest, are known as the Prophets of God; and the great error of humanity has been the worship of Their personalities, instead of the Light which shines from Them, and is apparent in Them.

We should always try to see the Light and not merely the Lamp in which it is shining; for while the Light is always one, the Lamps may be, and have been, of different forms and colors. It is the Spirit which manifests through Them, and the instructions received from Them—the life and teachings—which are important; and Their human personalities, instead of being a help, may become a veil and a hindrance unless through the spiritual eye we continually look at Their Reality which is God.

Since the advancement of the human race is a progressive development, no Prophet has ever claimed His revelation to be final, but each has prophesied of another to come after Him. Each one has His year or cycle, with its spring, summer, autumn, and winter. And in the gloomy clouds of the winter time of His revelation when "darkness covers the earth and gross darkness the people," the Light for the New Cycle appears and the New Dispensation is born.

Hence in the Bagavad Gita, it is written, "Whenever religion goes down and irreligion prevails, I am born among men to reestablish it again." And so in the Gospels, it is prophesied that the Son of Man would come in the clouds and at a time when the people would have the forms of Godliness but would lack the power of the spirit. Buddha said that after Him another would come who would have thousands of followers where He had had hundreds. And in the Ambatha Sutta, the ancient Brahmin scriptures are referred to and summed up as prophesying the coming of "the Great Man who is to conquer the sea-girt earth without a rod and without a sword and sit enthroned."

In each cycle the True One appears to bring men back to the one true God, He Who is the creator and sustainer of all life; and to free the human mind from soul-chilling superstitions and from customs inherited from ancestors which prevent enlightenment and progress.

However much we may boast of our enlightenment, in one way or another all of us allow the past to put chains and fetters on us. We need first of all to realize that we must be men, and to be men means that we must not be afraid to stand alone, face to face with the Truth, and to use the great faculties of reason and judgment wherewith God has endowed us in reaching our conclusions. To be free means to stand masters of ourselves, within ourselves, cutting away from the tales of the past, working out our own problems, and freeing ourselves from customs and traditions which had their own reason for being, but which in this age stand in the way of progress.

A great lecturer has said the two great principles necessary to success are discipline and sacrifice. By discipline is meant self-discipline, for one who cannot govern himself is not fit for freedom. And by sacrifice is meant that the individual must be willing—for the good of his community, of his country, of the world—to surrender the petty interests of self and customs and prejudices which prevent unity and cooperation.

Discipline and sacrifice certainly may be found in the Bahá'í religion. Here we see a record of heroic devotion, of restraint of self, of obedience and of self-sacrifice. Countless Bahá'ís have not only had to face the opposition of family and social ostracism, but they have been compelled to surrender in the way of God all that men hold dear, even life itself; and this they have done cheerfully, uncomplainingly and without resistance, suffering martyrdom by thousands.

ALL OF THE divine books teach the same Truth, and it is beautiful to note the similitude between the Rig Veda, perhaps the most ancient book in the world, and the Gospels, as to the creation. In the Rig-Veda, we read, "In the beginning there arose the source of Golden Light. He was the only born Lord of all that is. He established the earth and this sky." In the Gospels we read, "In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God, and the Word was God . . . all things were made by Him and without Him was not anything made that was made." Thus from both the Rig-Veda and the Gospels we see that the creation is through this Word or Creative Will, Who is the source of Golden Light and the only born Lord of all that is.

But creation through Him is a spiritual creation or renewal of the Truth of God in the world of humanity, the coming of a manifestation of that Light which "lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

The distinct claim of the Bahá'í revelation is that this is the Day of a New Creation, and that the Primal Will has again manifested Itself in the world in Bahá'u'lláh for the reestablishment of faith and the rebuilding of the fallen temple of God. And as the first dawning of the Truth was in that Paradisian country beyond the Himalayas—the home of the ancient Aryan race—so today He Who is called the First and the Last, the Beginning and the End, has reappeared to man as the dawning of a New Day, in Iran or Persia, His original birthplace.

The Bahá'ís claim that as in times past God spoke His creative Word in Buddha, in Moses, in Muhammad, and in Jesus Christ,—so today He is speaking It for the new dispensation in Bahá'u'lláh. The proof of this tremendous statement is found in the very record of the Bahá'í Cause, with its narrative of heroism, devotion, self-sacrifice and martyrdom. To this must be added the inspiration and divine powers shown through the three great personalities—the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá—Who constitute the Bahá'í trinity of the Herald, the Revelator, and the Interpreter and Spreader of the cause, the Center of the Covenant, an actual and not a metaphysical trinity, and one which does not interfere with the oneness and singleness of God the Creator, being a trinity of Manifestations of one and the self-same Spirit.

'Abdu'l-Bahá was released from His long imprisonment, by the Young Turks Party in 1908, and thereafter He journeyed to Europe and the United States where for several months His proclamation of the Bahá'í Teachings was heard by thousands for He spoke in churches and synagogues and before Peace and Scientific Societies, as well as many other organizations. He proved to all those who were truth seekers how the Bahá'í Teachings meet the needs and requirements of the age and is becoming more and more essential to humanity as world problems constantly increase.

'Abdu'l-Bahá passed to the Supreme Kingdom November 28, 1921 at Haifa, Palestine. In His last Testament He appointed His eldest grandson, Shoghi Effendi, as Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, which means that the Teachings revealed by Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá will be protected, that is, never become subject to human interpretation; and will insure the proper coordinating of the activities of the Cause and a true spiritual administration of its affairs.

IN CONCLUSION the fundamental teachings and the great principles of the Bahá'í Faith may be summed up as follows:

That God, the One, the Impregnable, is in His Essence above ascent or descent, height or depth, sign, description or definition. He reveals Himself through a succession of Prophets Who are the Manifestations of His Names and attributes, of His commandments and Will in the world of creation. The inner truth and reality of the teachings of all of these Prophets is one, but the method of teaching and the outer commandments change in accordance with the requirements of the people of the age in which They appear. Just as we, individually, have our infancy, our youth and our maturity, so humanity has its infancy and youth and maturity.

Today the world is prepared for and needs a universal Manifestation of Truth suitable to the requirements of the intelligence of the age, and accordingly such a Manifestation has come. The purpose of His coming is to spiritually unite mankind and to show the oneness of all things in God,—not only the Oneness of God as a Name, but the oneness of man with God, and the oneness of man with man in true and real brotherhood, and consequently the annulment of differences of race and religion; the oneness of true religion and science; of religion and social evolution, development and progress; the oneness in fact of all truth which cannot contradict itself and must proceed from one Source. Generally, to paraphrase the language of Bahá'u'lláh, the objects which are to be attained are: that all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers; that the bonds of affection and unity between the sons of men should be strengthened; that diversity of religion should cease and differences of race be annulled; that fruitless strife and ruinous wars should pass away, and the Most Great Peace should come; that kings and rulers should spend their treasures on that which will conduce to the happiness of their subjects instead of on means for the destruction of the human race; that all men should become as one kindred and one family; and that a man should not glory in this, that he loves his country, but should rather glory in this, that he loves the whole world.

"THERE ARE some who believe that the divine bounties are subject to cessation. For example they think that the revelation of God, the effulgence of God and the bounties of God have ended. This is self-evidently a mistaken idea, for none of these is subject to termination. The reality of divinity is like unto the sun and revelation is like unto the rays thereof. If we should assert that the bounties of God are not everlasting we are forced to believe that divinity can come to an end whereas the reality of divinity enfolds all virtues and by reason of these bounties is perfect. . . . Hence revelation is progressive and continuous. It never ceases. It is necessary that the reality of divinity with all its perfections and attributes should become resplendent in the human world."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

A BAHÁ'Í TRAVELER IN PALESTINE

WALTER B. GUY, M. D.

JERUSALEM is the Mecca of many hearts and minds, the city of holy memories and legends, the city of the Passion, the city of the Crusader's hopes and ideals, the centre of Muslim victories and the shrine of Omar.

At dawn I was awakened by the cry of the muzzien from the lofty minaret nearby, calling the people to prayer, that Allah was Allah, the only One; arise and pray. Soon the clashing, jarring tones of the numerous bells of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre proclaimed that it was Sunday morning, and from the many church towers, other bells added to the din.

A walk through the busy, noisy bazaars took me to the Jaffa Gate and the citadel, where I found the military band adding its music to the din of the many bells.

I followed behind the soldiers into the cool, restful spaces of Christ Church and listened to the military band playing the hymns and the responses of the service of the Church of England. But in spite of holy chant and sound of bell, I felt a sense of strife in this holy city.

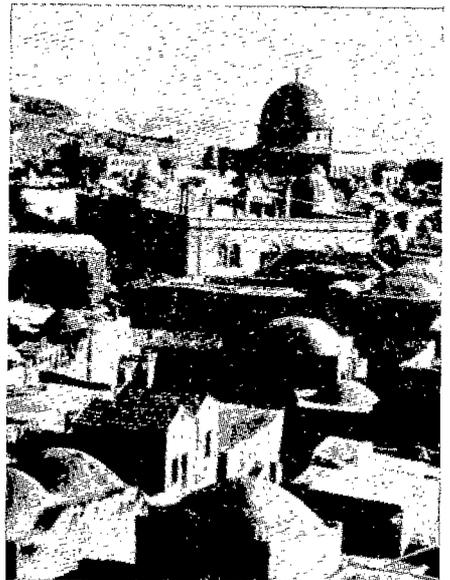

What shall be said of Jerusalem on earth, the city of numberless sects, religions and creeds—people from all Eastern lands, in many garbs and costumes? Can peace come unto her borders, and love and amity reign in her homes?

The question of peace and brotherly love for today, to me seemed hopeless, yet if we despair, we no longer trust in the Divine Plan, no longer have faith in the Divine Power and Love, which is mightier than man.

In years to come peace, love, and the beauty of holiness shall radiate from the hill of Zion; its problems, when solved, will point the way to the rest of a weary, war-torn world, for the solution of the woes of Jerusalem is the remedy for all mankind.

The Mount of Olives stands radiant on the side of the hill. Towards the east is the valley of the Dead Sea, beyond, the Mountains of Moab. The Mountains around the city are barren and dry, yet we know that some day peace and righteousness will reign in place of prejudice, poverty and pride, and people will come to worship God in this place with joy and the fragrance of holiness.

Jerusalem—Old City

Jerusalem, once seen, can never be forgotten: its narrow, winding streets, its many mosques and churches, its odorous, busy bazaars, its donkeys and camels, its clanging bells, its ecclesiastical priests, its guides and its beggars, its armed police and numerous sentries, its castellated walls, its citadel, its rock of Omar and Pool of Siloam, are impressed on every mind.

Its wondrous legends of the story of the lowly Nazarene, its Tower of David, the many gates, its subterranean places.—all bring memories of long ago.

Let us leave the future of this wondrous city in the hands of the Divine Architect, whose Word never becomes void, whose plans never fail, knowing that as in the past, the shame and agonies this city has repeatedly witnessed, will yet bring to full fruition a wondrous centre of peace and love, for Zion shall yet reign triumphant over her present darkness and despair.

CANA.—The sun was sinking toward the west as we rode into Cana of Galilee. It was the little village, never to be forgotten, whose inhabitants saw the first miracle of Jesus. It is the common type of village: the well of necessary life-giving water, the straight-limbed women carrying on their heads those clay immemorial water pots, whose shape probably remains the same as were in use two thousand years ago, the white stone houses with flat roofs, its walled streets with its gardens hidden away from view of the passing traveler.

Yet an aroma of sacred import lingers there. On that spot the lowly Nazarene had walked and talked; those memories of His life remain to hallow those stones and village streets so dusty and white in the blazing sun.

It matters little today as to the actuality of the miracle or legend. The juice of the grape, the wine that exhilarates and cheers, that makes glad the heart of man, is always for the East a symbol of the Divine influx we call today the Holy Spirit. It may have been wine which Jesus of long ago gave to the thirsty wedding guests, but to me it must have been those life-giving Words, those soul-stirring thoughts that dropped from His lips in strands of pearls, and the Divine love that radiated from His dynamic personality.

The wine of those days is spilt, the bottle burst into many fragments; in the Holy Land alone there exists on every hand a medley of Christian sects and creeds; but still the wine of the Love of God ever issues from the eternal fountain, and is always ready to bubble up in loving hearts and kindly deeds.

Somehow, somewhere, in many lands we shall find again, if we seek, the six water pots of clay that, whole, intact, and strong, still hold the wine of the Love of God, so that thirsty souls may seek and find, and having once tasted the life-giving potion, shall thirst no more; but have life and joy eternal bubbling up in their hearts to soothe and heal the souls of this sorrowful world.

BUILDING THE TEMPLE AT THE 1930 CONVENTION

"In this Cause consultation is of vital importance; but spiritual conference and not the mere voicing of personal views is intended. . . . Therefore true consultation is spiritual conference in the attitude and atmosphere of love. . . . Love and fellowship are the foundation."
—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

 NE enters by a straight path and a narrow door into the embryonic structure of the Bahá'í Temple at Wilmette. The grey concrete base rising from the lake-side site on Sheridan Drive has been the subject of inquiry from many passersby. Could those hurrying multitudes have entered the simple doorway and stepped into the Foundation Hall, in which for three years the Bahá'í Conventions have been held, the casual voice of curiosity would have taken on a deeper note in the hearts of the spiritually susceptible. For hidden within the enigmatic exterior there lies a vast circular room designed with such moving beauty that the newcomer can but stand, devoid of words, stirred by the response of his own heart to having found its abiding place.

At ten o'clock of the morning of April 25 the sun poured in golden splashes of light through the square panes of the skylight to irradiate the scene of the 1930 Convention. One who has lain in summer in the tall grasses of some hill and gazed into "the blue bowl of the sky" has been aware of the spaciousness in which God has set His creation. Something of that feeling has been captured in the structure of this room, with its high, domed ceiling accentuated in its appearance of height by panels converging toward the central skylight. The sidewalls, paneled, too, are hung with glowing oriental rugs from the sacred shrines of Bahá'í history. The room had been transformed into a garden of spring flowers. Masses of tulips, daffodils, and spirea bloomed against a background of graceful palms. Light, color, form, fragrance, contributed to the spell of this convention setting. Delegates and friends sat in semi-circular rows, their bowed heads caught in a wide, inclusive nimbus by the rays of descending light. This twenty-second annual convention of the Bahá'ís of the United States and Canada was felt by those present to mark the outpouring of a new and special bounty upon the friends of God. The searching sacrifice of years had found its fruition in the sum needed to resume the building of the Temple. The inspiring conception of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár — Dawning-place of the Mention of God—was no longer merely to exist in the lines of graceful drawings, nor in the intricate beauty of plaster models nor in the endless detail of architectural design. This was the point long heralded of its emergence in the world of actuality; and in the inmost hearts of those who sat in the hush of introductory prayer was to be found the sense of preparation for building, building the Temple of the Lord therein, that the world might see the Plan of the Master Builder, Bahá'u'lláh, arising from its foundations with dignity and power.

From the hilltop the firmament is wide. The convention opened with the reading of a cabled greeting from Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Cause. Telegrams were read from absent friends whom distance had prevented from being present, including messages from London, Australia, South Africa, Geneva, Switzerland. The benign presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá was felt as the chairman read the prayer for "whenever ye enter the council-chamber"—

"O God, my God! We are servants of thine that have turned with devotion to Thy Holy Face, that have detached ourselves from all beside Thee in this glorious day. We have gathered in this spiritual assembly, united in our views and thoughts, and with our purposes harmonized to exalt Thy Word amidst mankind. . . . Make us signs of Thy Divine Guidance . . . standards of Thy exalted Faith amongst men . . . resplendent stars shining upon all regions . . . Make our souls dependent upon the verses of Thy Divine Unity, our hearts cheered by the outpourings of Thy Grace, that we may unite even as the waves of one sea and become merged together as the rays of Thy effulgent Light; that our thoughts, our views, our feelings may become as one reality, manifesting the spirit of union throughout the world . . ."

IT IS ALWAYS of engrossing interest to listen throughout the business sessions of the Bahá'í

Convention and to convince oneself that through the growing Bahá'í activities, limited as they have been by the necessity for rigid economy, "a new spirit, a new light and a new motion" is becoming apparent in the world. Especially was this felt in the report of the Inter-racial Committee with the inspiring message of its accomplishment of glorious meetings for the bringing together of the white and colored races. It was borne in upon the attentive listeners that here is a channel through which the unseen forces flow with incredible swiftness—here waits the opportunity for the demonstration of the divine Word, that the eyes of the world may perceive and be convinced.

The business of the convention is not by any means confined to those intense, seven-hour sessions where one sits unconscious of self and the passing of time. The yearly event consists in the opportunity for representatives from the various Bahá'í centers throughout the country to meet and flow together in the exhilaration of expansive and universal love. What occurs during this unique experience is an augury and a promise of the attainment of that supreme unity which is in a special and mysterious way the Cause of God.

SATURDAY NIGHT, at the Feast of Ridván, three hundred people were fed beneath the dome of heaven. On their faces were happiness and exultation, they associated together "in joy and fragrance" and the perfumed ties of friendship were strengthened. A transformation had occurred. The band that had yielded itself to the sanctified atmosphere of the Temple on the opening morning, had been hushed, reverent, but waiting as if for a release. The passing of the hours had brought with extraordinary power and sweetness the renewed sense of the corporate body of the Cause, animated by the beating of one Heart, pumping the stream of abundant life through the arteries of the Administration to the remotest cells. "Fellowship, fellowship! Love, love! Unity, unity!—so that the power of the Bahá'í Cause may appear and become manifest in the world of existence."

So we came to the last day of the Convention. That Sunday afternoon, business having gone its systematic way, we met to partake of the piece de resistance of the spiritual feast—the session for the discussion of the Temple.

The greater part of the afternoon was devoted to listening to the plans rendered by expert structural engineers and architects, and also to a narrative by the inspired originator of the Temple design, Mr. Bourgeois. This was a story that led back into the past and which in the future will forever be part of the lore of the New Kingdom. It is no wonder that we all dreamed dreams backed by certainty and envisioned the glorious structure which is to arise and proclaim to the world the Bahá'í challenge to the oneness of religion and the brotherhood of mankind.

It was the last evening and the next morning we were to separate in order to carry to our respective corners of the American continent the divine Fire that had set ablaze the hearts and minds. Once more we sat in the now familiar environment of the Foundation Hall, inhaled the fragrance of the flowers, looked into the shining faces of countless lovers. Raised on a platform in the center of the hall was displayed the exquisite silk rug, enormous in its proportions, a flower-garden in its design which had been the gift of the Guardian to the Temple which is to be. Exquisite and precious and sacred with the most holy associations, it was the jewel that night for which we were but the setting. People of many nationalities were present. Representatives of the various races were chosen—Negro, Indian, Jew, Scandinavian, German, Hawaiian, Persian, Arab, French, and others—they stood beside the rug and laid reverent fingers upon it. We listened to music, to our heightened hearts almost unbearably beautiful; the Word of Bahá'u'lláh was read. We sat in prayer, and then—this great Convention came to an end in reverent silence more eloquent than any words.

Man possesses two kinds of susceptibilities: the natural emotions which are like dust upon the mirror, and spiritual susceptibilities which are merciful and heavenly characteristics."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE GLORIOUS YOUTH

AN ALLEGORY OF THE BAB

LORROL JACKSON

NEAR to the north of the City of Light, amidst the Mountains of Intolerance, lay the Valley of Indifference. This valley was hemmed in on every side by high mountains so that the light of the sun reached it for only a few short hours each day.

To the north stretched the Mountains of Hatred and Envy, whose cruel ice-covered peaks bore no vegetation. To the south gleamed the Mountains of False Pride and Superstition; often alluring to the eye but full of treacherous cliffs, deep chasms and dangerous pitfalls for the unwary. To the west the almost impassable crags of Racial Superiority and Race Hatred loomed in forbidding grandeur. But in the East lay the beautiful Mountains of Hope.

A small stream meandered lazily through the valley; it was called the Brook of Knowledge; its source was in the Mountain of Religion far to the eastward of the Mountains of Hope and it lost itself in the marshes of Dogma and Creed at the foot of the western mountains. On rare occasions the shining pinnacles of the Mountain of Religion had been viewed from afar by some daring soul who had scaled a peak in the Mountains of Hope to obtain a broader vision: marvelous were the descriptions given by those who had glimpsed it, but few of the people of the Valley paid heed to the Adventurer and many scoffed at him as a dreamer of dreams.

Altho the Brook of Knowledge was small, as streams go, yet it sufficed for the simple needs of the inhabitants of the valley. It provided water for the meager gardens, kept alive the cattle and supplied the simple household needs. But few gave thought from whence it came or for what purpose it had been sent into the Valley.

In the evening, when the days work was done, the villagers gathered in the market place or around the hearth stones content to review the gossip of the day. Then it was that the elders taught the children the lore of the valley; tradition handed down to them by some forgotten race. Tradition told them that only in the valley was there safety—that the lofty mountains were the only barriers which saved them from complete destruction. Beyond these protecting peaks lived races of people waiting and eager to destroy them: there, also, were wild beasts horrible beyond description.

No youth was allowed to question the wisdom of what he was told, or to seek to know aught but what was handed down to him by tradition—for tradition was law, and for those who broke the law there was punishment; the leaders of the Village saw to that. The bones of those who had dared to defy tradition lay bleaching on the cliff near the opening through which the little stream entered the valley. Shunned by the "Good people" of the Village and driven from its shelter by the priests, they had perished ere they could find the way through the Mountains of Hope to the world beyond.

Hence, the weapon of the leaders was fear; for the one overwhelming desire of the people of the Valley was to live and all individual welfare must be sacrificed that the Village might continue to be. No individual could survive the dangers of the mountains alone, hence, the law must be obeyed that all might survive.

Vague stories were whispered at eventide, of some who had dared to question the ancient lore: the youth who had seen the gleam of light upon the Brook of Knowledge and had dared to seek its source. Stories were told of those who had gone forth from the valley, seeking wisdom but who had never returned, or returning, had been taken by the priests and publicly stoned before they could more than hint at the mysteries which lay beyond the mountains.

Tradition told of one Glorious Man, who, in bygone ages, had come down to them from beyond the mountains toward the rising sun and had attempted to lead them out of the valley to pleasant pastures and noble cities on the heights beyond; but tradition also told that He had been slain by the priests for teaching the people contrary to their law. Some there were who had followed the path He had laid down and had sought the heights, but they had returned to the valley no more and their names were forgotten by all save a few. So dwelt the People of Heedlessness in the Valley of Indifference.

Then, again, from the mountains toward the Rising Sun came a Noble Youth treading the pathway by the Stream of Knowledge toward the village of the People of Heedlessness. He paused, ere He passed the place, at the foot of the cliffs, where lay the bones of those daring souls who sought the source of Knowledge, and He seemed to be in prayer. As He came near to the village, all marvelled at His beauty and when He spoke all were spellbound by the power of His words.

He told them that He had come from beyond the mountains, from the City of Light beyond the Mountain of Religion, whence flowed their trickling Stream of Knowledge. He told them of a Mighty King who had sent Him forth as a messenger to guide them out of the narrow valley to fertile fields and broad pastures where fear and want need never again dog their footsteps. He told them of other races of men, their brothers, servants also of the great King, who were waiting with eager welcome for those who were brave enough to rise up and follow Him. He bade them prepare for the time when the Great King himself should leave His dwelling in the City of Light and come forth to destroy the Mountains of Intolerance and establish in all the earth His reign of Love and Peace and Brotherhood. Far into the night the people listened with burning hearts to His words of wisdom and some there were who prepared to follow Him.

A little apart, unnoticed by the people, the priests and leaders of the Village shook their heads and whispered together. They had no thought of injustice, only of safeguarding the people of the Valley; but blinded by prejudice and superstition, they had not caught the vision of the fuller life which the words of the Youth had painted before the eyes of the pure of heart. They saw only one who dared to teach contrary to their traditions and who must be brought to trial. Tradition was Law and Law must be obeyed.

When morning came the villagers were aghast to see this Noble Visitor led to the market place for trial and they followed in humble silence. Upon His persecutors the Youth turned His back and thus spoke to the people, "Harken, O People, and rejoice! All I have told you is true. I am the Messenger from the City of Light and I am come to lead you out of the Valley of Indifference into the land of Unity and Peace. Leave these mountains and prepare to meet the Great King when He shall come. When I am gone follow the trail which I have made plain and you will come at last to the Land of Unity, wherein dwell the people of every nation and race and tongue ruled by the Great King. There you will find better homes, abundant pastures, and marvelous cities where all men shall be your brothers and live with you in love and fellowship." A cry of joy and thanksgiving rose from the people, but it was quickly turned into a cry of horror. "He speaks blasphemy," cried the leaders, "he deserves death! He has dared to put laws to naught!"—and they led Him away to be slain.

There was then great commotion in the village. None who had caught the vision of the fuller life, pictured in the glowing words of the Glorious Youth, could stand passively by and see Him slain by the leaders in their blindness. Many there were who willingly sacrificed their lives in His defense, but, alas, in vain! Again the Bringer of Light was slain by the People of Heedlessness in the Valley of Indifference; and again the people of the village cowered in fear—their only passion, still, the desire to live.

According to the lore of the Valley the days following the martyrdom of the Glorious Youth were holy days and he who touched a dead body thereon was defiled. Hence, the body of the Youth was placed without the confines of the Village until the time of prayer was past. Then it was that one whose heart burned with the fire of a great love went forth and rescued the blessed remains and secreted them until they could be taken from the valley and placed in a tomb befitting so noble a martyr.

As the days went by, a few left the village to find the trail of which the Youth had spoken, but they returned no more and the village folk settled again into the old ways amid the shadow of the Mountains of Intolerance.

Years rolled by, then the little stream of knowledge ran dry and a great drouth came upon the valley. The gardens withered and died, the cattle perished in the fields and hunger stalked in the Valley of Indifference. Strange beasts crept down from the mountain caves and lothesome reptiles reared their venomous heads even at the hearth stones of many a cottage. The mountains reverberated with the roar of thunder as the lightening rent the craigs and split the mighty oaks in twain. It seemed as if the very elements were bent upon the destruction of the people of the Valley of Indifference.

The priests, however, were not dismayed,—“only wait, they said, “the stream will again fill its banks,—wait and obey the law!” “To leave the Valley is madness—destruction awaits you beyond the protection of the mountains. Wait and obey the law."

But the Stream of Knowledge flowed no more and despair gave birth to courage until the people, at last awakened to the danger, harkened no longer to those who would dissuade them but prepared to leave the valley. Then it was that they remembered the fiery words of the Glorious Youth and knew that their only hope of safety lay in following the trail He had blazed for them long years before. The opening to the trail was difficult to find, some thought it was up one valley, some were certain it was up another; so many fell by the wayside ere the true way was reached. But those who had courage and vision came at last to the opening amidst the craigs and, as they proceeded, found the way grow plainer with every step, until they emerged upon the plain and stood transfixed by the beauty which they beheld.

On every side, as far as the eye could see, stretched a beautiful country, flooded with sunshine, dotted with villages and cities and fair gardens. In the distance could be seen the Mountain of Religion whose eternal beauty bespoke the loving care of the Great King, whose first gift to the people of the earth is religion.

Not far away was a village and as they made their way thither, the inhabitants came forth to greet them with words of welcome, and lo, here were many who had been their neighbors in the Valley below.

As they gathered at eventide, around the fire, their talk was all of the Noble Youth who had perished that they might live more fully. "How can we atone for our blindness?" they asked. The one, on whose lips were words of wisdom, spake, "O, people, follow the example of the Glorious Youth who was a messenger unto you and heed His words. Devote your lives to the service of mankind; live in peace and harmony with all men of whatsoever race or creed or color and purify your hearts that ye may know the great King when He shall come." So the people of the Valley built for themselves a fair city to which they welcomed all who came unto them.

To all they told the story of the Glorious Youth, of His words of wisdom and of His martyrdom. To all they told of His promise regarding the coming of the Great King.

As their hearts filled with love they learned to use wisely the abundant streams of Knowledge which flowed from the Mountain of Religion and broad highways were started through the Mountains of Intolerance. As the understanding of the life and message of the Glorious Youth became more clear, a great longing grew among them to rescue the earthly body and build for it some fitting shrine, wherein it might rest forever amidst a garden of flowers tended by the loving hands of the faithful.

But none, save a few, knew the place where those blessed bones lay hidden, for many were the enemies who yet surrounded them, and these faithful few knew that, in the fullness of time, one would come to whom the Great King would entrust the building of a fitting shrine. To them was it given to keep the hiding place a secret until His coming.

So the people of the valley heeded the words of those who were wise among them, devoting their lives to the service of mankind and preparing their hearts that they might know the Great King when He should come.

SONGS OF THE SPIRIT

THE CAUSE IS REAL

LORNA B. TASKER

It is real! It is!
 Shout, shout, O cold, gray, heart
 And dull, complaining mind!
 The Cause is real!
 There is a fire that burns and does not die,
 There is a beauty that can never fade,
 There is a love—
 Arise, leap, let your dreams burn!
 Let all your life a dream
 Blaze up in splendor to the love of God
 Like flame into the sun!
 Ye shall be winged with fire
 And tipped with crimson,
 And all the dawns and sunsets of the world
 Shall pale before your joy.
 It is real! It is!
 O you, who moan and creep—
 Fly, love, laugh, worship, sing!
 And die as did the Viking king who sailed
 At sunset forth into an unknown sea,
 Riding a ship of flame
 To find his God!

THE LIGHTHOUSE

SOPHRONIA AOKI

I toiled to make my structure tall;
 I wrought in hope, full earnestly,
 And that my watch-tower might not fall,
 My corner-stone was sympathy.
 I laid foundations deep and wide
 Of tolerance, broad-mindedness;
 The rule of reason was my guide,
 No stone was laid in carelessness.
 By day it stood against the sky,
 Severe in symmetry of line,
 But darkness hid it from the eye,
 As nought without a lamp divine.
 I knelt down in the silence there;
 I asked for faith, to know the right,
 And oh! He heard my sincere prayer:
 My watch-tower is a house of light.

MYSTERIES

WILLARD P. HATCH

What mysteries these humans do contain,
 Who stand between the unseen and the seen,
 Thoughts invisible to proclaim by deed—
 Translations that the winged angels read,
 Through clouds of negligence, above the rain,
 Thy Perfect Law of greatest Good, between
 The tests doth shine, Truth's Sun benign,
 That they, who steadfast are in love of Truth,
 May to Thy Will the humbled self resign,
 And trust Thy love in Wisdom's Mighty Sign.

THE PURPOSE

JANET BOLTON

Ten thousand Suns on clouds of glory came,
 Ten thousand Cycles in their orbits spun
 E'er the Eternal in Love's Greatest Name
 Could make earth's warring gods and peoples one.

TRUE VISION

SHAHNAZ WAITE.

The world is full of discord and strife,
 And war-clouds arise in the sky;
 There is greed, and nation gainst nation doth stand,
 While foes in the ambush oft lie;
 But Dawn is breaking—God rules from on high,
 And war shall forever-more cease,
 No matter how dark the hour may seem,
 Look not at it—but through it—to PEACE.

There are hearts that are weary, broken and torn
 And injustice seems most to hold sway,
 The poor are down-trodden, the weak are oppressed
 While the struggle grows harder each day;
 But a New Era dawneth—with heart-hopes fulfilled
 There's a Light from the heavens above;
 No matter how dark the hour may seem,
 Look not at it—but through it—to LOVE.

There are souls that are held by strong prison walls,
 Of fear—in a darksome place,
 While prejudice manacles heart and mind,
 Against class, religion and race;
 But Freedom is coming—and souls must awake,
 Else pass neath the chastening Rod;
 No matter how dark the evil may seem,
 Look not at it—but through it—to GOD.

WHAT IS DEATH?

F. W. S.

There is no death!
 'Tis but an opening of the door;
 A crossing o'er the threshold into wondrous Light;
 An entering into joy and sense unspeakable;
 A welcoming by those we've loved before,
 An instant change to nobler more abundant Life!
 There is no death!

THE DIVINE TRACES IN PERSIA

The following brief account of some of the gatherings attended by Miss Martha Root during her memorable visit in Persia, is compiled from letters of Dr. Lotfullah S. Hakim of Tíhrán.

"Bahá'u'lláh has risen from the eastern horizon. Like the glory of the sun He has come into the world. He has reflected the reality of divine religion, dispelled the darkness of imitations, laid the foundation of new teachings and resuscitated the world. . . . Many people and sects in Persia have sought reality through the guidance and teaching of Bahá'u'lláh.

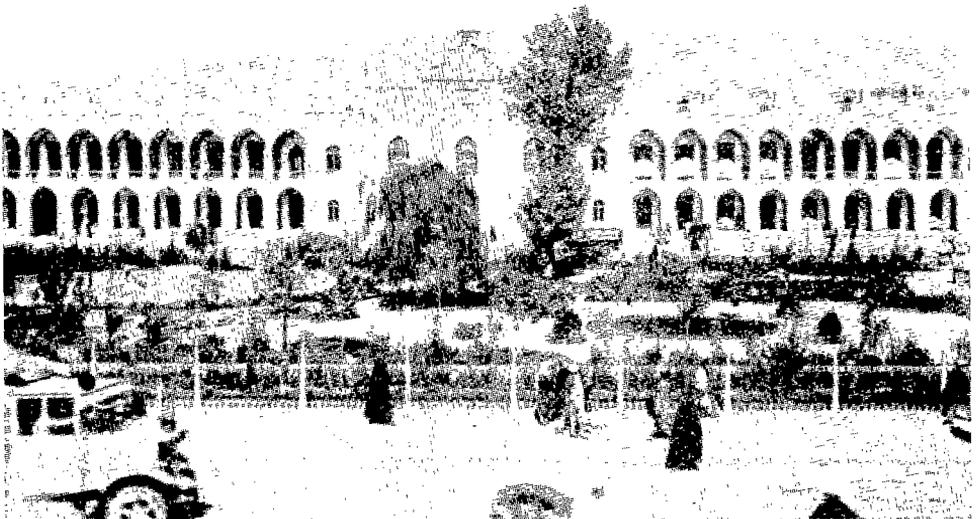

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

PROCLAIMING the reality of religion in word and deed in Persia today is a far cry from the days preceding the dawn of the new era in that land when the Báb as the Herald, and Bahá'u'lláh as the Law-giver, arose to revivify the souls of mankind. In those dark days in the land which gave Bahá-

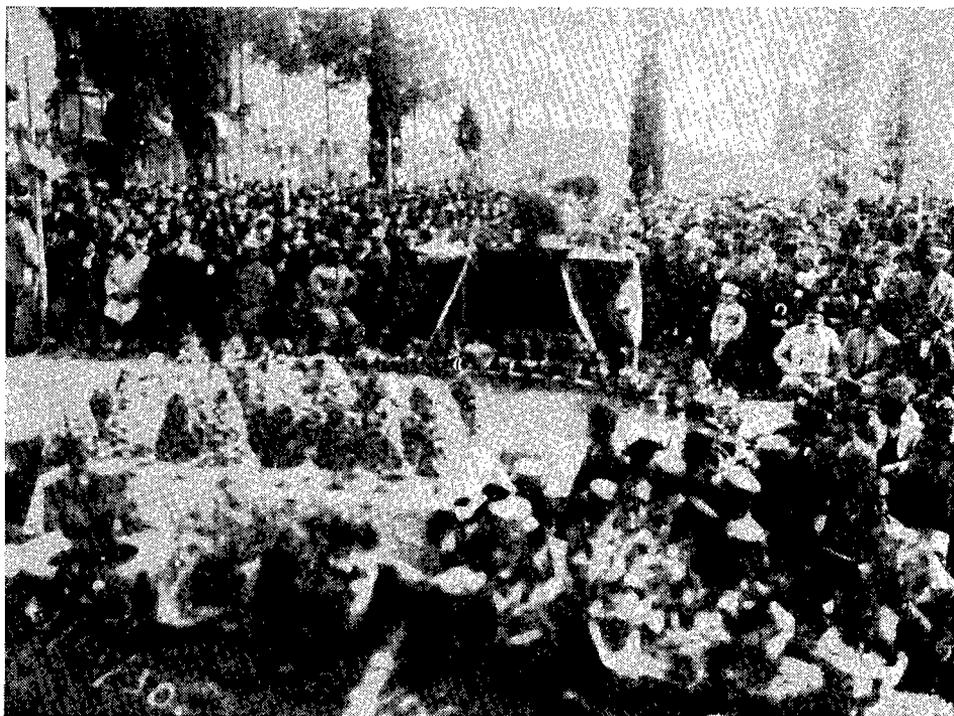

'u'lláh His birth, social as well as religious affairs were in a state of hopeless decadence. Only through the Word of a Prophet of God could the people of that or any other land emerge from the thickets of superstition, erroneous interpretation of their Scriptures, and the very depths of ordeals.

God alone has the Power to do whatsoever He willeth, and the greatest proof of the divine authority of Bahá'u'lláh is the effect of His Word in the hearts and lives of those who accept it.

IN THE FOLLOWING briefs of letters of Dr. Lotfullah, we can see how spiritual susceptibilities have been increased, how spiritual civilization is progressing, and how the oneness of humanity and peace is being accomplished step by step. The blending of the different races, nationalities and religions has been made possible through the Word of God.

'Abdu'l-Bahá, while in America, said to a group of friends: "Today the Bahá'ís of the East are longing with deep desire to see you face to face. Their highest hope and fondest wish is that the day may come when they will be gathered together in an assemblage with you. Consider well the Power that has accomplished this wonderful transformation."

Dr. Lotfullah's letters follow:

On March first, Miss Root, accompanied by the three Bakeroffs (young brothers of our Assembly) and myself, visited the prison where Bahá'u'lláh was incarcerated, and from there motored a few miles distant to the Bahá'í cemetery to visit the graves of the friends, among them the well known teachers, Hadji Amin and Mirza Bakeroff, the father of the young men who were with us. While there we attended the burial service of a dear old lady in the Cause, wife of Aga Husein Ali Nuri. Both wife and husband were of the very old believers. In their home the body of the Báb was hidden for three years. The husband is still alive. Miss Root spoke in detail about the "Life After Death," and chanted prayers. It was a very touching scene at the grave, tears were in the eyes of many. I cannot express in words how effective was this visit.

We then visited the tombs of all the friends, and at last those of Miss Lillian Kappes and Dr. Sarah Clock (the two American Bahá'í sisters who died while in service in Tíhrán). We all stood silent in deep meditation for some time.

Later we motored to Vargayieh where the blessed bodies of the two well known martyrs, Varqá and Ruhú'lláh, are at rest in a nine-sided room in a big and lovely garden. There Miss Root chanted the Visiting Tablet for them, the English translation of which was hanging on the wall.

It was an historic never-to-be forgotten day for all of us, and ended happily in a visit to the home of Dr. Susan I. Moody.

“ON MARCH 21ST, the Feast of the New Year as celebrated by Bahá'ís was attended by over twenty-three hundred; about one hundred were non-Bahá'ís, the remainder were all Bahá'ís. It was the most unique conference and meeting of its kind ever held in Tíhrán. Many spoke briefly, but there were two very dear guest speakers, Miss Root, and Dr. Youness Khan who had just returned from his long visit in Europe and in Haifa, Palestine. He gave a most interesting talk on his teaching tour and his varied experiences in the different cities, and conveyed a message of love and affection from Shoghí Effendi.

Later Miss Root rose and spoke, her face shining. We could see the light around her distinctly—even from far off. Her talk was on the greatness of the Bahá'í Cause and the importance of Persia. She spoke with such enthusiasm and courage that every one was deeply affected. That wonderful soul, Mirza Valiyyu'lláh Khan Varqá son of the martyr, Varqá was an excellent interpreter, for with his keen spiritual perception and marvelous spirit he could convey the true meaning of her words with accuracy and fluency. All present, including Miss Root herself, were deeply affected by the overwhelming presence of the spirit.

WHILE SPEAKING at these wonderful meetings in Persia, Miss Root, though an American, might truly represent not only the American Bahá'ís but the friends all over the world, for the followers of Bahá'u'lláh have attained that perfect spiritual fraternity through His Revealed and Holy Word which makes the brotherhood of mankind a living and vital thing. They hold aloft the standard of the Oneness of God, the oneness of mankind, and the oneness of religion.

"In this radiant century," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "divine knowledge, merciful attributes and spiritual virtues will attain the highest degree of advancement. The traces have become manifest in Persia. . . . May spiritual brotherhood cause rebirth and regeneration, for its creative quickening emanates from the breaths of the Holy Spirit and is founded by the Power of God."

WORLD THOUGHT AND PROGRESS

ANGORA, Turkey, May 23 A.P. —Turkey is taking the United States as her model in her attempt to develop a prosperous nation.

Those policies credited to America—peace on earth, time is money, honest business, no bargaining, women first—were ticked off one by one in an interview by Tevfik Ruchdi Bey, foreign minister, as the mottoes of the new Turkey.

The interview was on the basis of development in American-Turkish relations brought about by the going into effect of the treaty of commerce—the first between the two countries.

"It took only 30 minutes to elaborate the bases of that treaty," said the foreign minister, "because to the United States and the new Turkey bargaining is distasteful, and they can't afford to lose time thereby.

"Bargaining in international relations still unfortunately exists in some parts of the world, but the United States and Turkey want to do what is reciprocally just, and do it in the fastest way possible. America and Turkey are quick to comprehend new ideas because both, as nations, created something new."

The foreign minister pointed out that American goods as well as ideas were gaining rapidly in Turkey.

"Automatically certain American goods are replacing other makes in our market, because we find greater utility in them and they are more to our taste. Hence American-Turkish commercial relations are becoming increasingly important."

Asked what share America's example had upon the Turkish government's recent extension of the franchise to women, the minister replied:

"A great deal. That example, as well as the proof our women have given of their ability, determined us to give them the vote before they wasted time in useless propaganda.

"The new Turkish government anticipates the desires of its people by handing them new rights and duties, meanwhile constantly preparing them to desire higher things. That is our way of making up time lost by centuries of ignorance and oppression under the sultans."

As a final great bond between the American and Turkish Republics the minister called attention to their mutual strivings for peace. . . . Evening Star, Washington, D. C.

MEXICO has reduced its army from 175,000 men to 50,000 men. Its military budget has been cut from 200 million pesos to 70 million pesos, or only 35 million dollars in American money. The millions rescued from Mars are being used for public works, highways, dams, railroad extension, and education. There are 15,000 miles of highways under construction and 5,000 miles are in service for automobile traffic.

Even the 50,000 soldiers that remain are not all "soldiering." Thirty-two thousand of them are at work as highway builders or on the other communicating systems and the dams. It is well also that a little of the money that is saved from former unproductive expenditures is at the disposal of a Tourist Commission in order that Americans and others may learn the glories which Mexico has to show them in place of the over-advertised rebels and bandits of the era that is passing.

It is noteworthy as a sign of Mexican progress that this advanced country has no military attaches connected with its embassies abroad, but has substituted educational and labor attaches. It is taking the Kellogg Pact more seriously than some of its neighbors.—News Bulletin, Nat'l Council for Prevention of War.

LONDON, May 20 A. P.—In a performance that won enthusiastic applause from a large audience at the Savoy Theater, Paul Robeson, celebrated American colored actor and singer, last night appeared in the title part of Shakespeare's "Othello."

His work was hailed as a triumphant success by the critics of London's morning newspapers.

The Morning Post said "There has been no Othello on our stage for 40 years to compare with him in dignity, simplicity and true passion."

The Daily Telegraph adds "By reason of his race he is able to surmount the difficulties which English actors generally find in this part."

The fact that in the play Othello is depicted as a Moor, and Mr. Robeson is colored contributed to strengthen the dignity and fidelity of what London's playgoers agreed was a memorable performance.—Evening Star, Washington, D. C.

“The glory, happiness, honor and peace of man do not consist in personal wealth, but on the contrary, in sublimity of soul, nobility of resolution, extension of education, and in the solution of the problem of life.”

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

“I HAVE NEVER SEEN a very rich man die happy,” once remarked Dr. Billings of Chicago to a friend of his. He then proceeded to name five very wealthy men whom he had attended at their death beds, and they had all been unhappy, notwithstanding their millions. There was always family trouble, or some other trouble.

One need not conclude from such evidence that it is not possible to be both wealthy and happy. Rather the lesson to be drawn from such facts as these is that wealth is not a guarantee of happiness. If the amount of happiness an individual could attain were in direct proportion to his wealth, it would be a strange universe to live in. For then there would be every incentive for acquisitiveness and self-seeking, with assurance of joy in proportion to the degree of self-seeking plus ability to heap up riches.

But unhappiness, as subtle as air itself, manages to creep even into bank vaults. Against sorrow and disaster there is no sure protection, certainly no insurance to be paid in premiums of cash.

Destiny has a strange way of reaching the selfish and acquisitive —usually by other than financial loss. Strange law, but true, that to them that hath shall be given. Destiny opposes no insuperable obstacles to continuous financial success on the part of able and acquisitive men. For it is inherent in the very nature of evolution and progress that ability shall have field for expression, and definite rewards in kind.

To a Midas, gold seems to gravitate in unbroken obedience to some inner law of attraction. Here the individual finds no opposition from Destiny. But there is in this wealth selfishly acquired no impregnable fortress to bulwark body and soul against disaster. From a thousand directions disaster can come upon a life lived outwardly so proudly as an expression of indomitable power.

In the physique of the individual, in wife, in children, in friends, lie infinitely complex possibilities of attack and destruction. The outer world may obey every behest of Midas, but within the inner world how feeble is the control which he can exert over the sources of joy!

More significant even than cataclysmic misfortunes in family and social life, is the steady process of spiritual atrophy and the growth of egoism to a fixation. Thus the selfish rich man faces at death dire poverty as regards that wealth which is to be needed in the Kingdom, and feels more sore oppressed than have been any of his clients who have been brought to material poverty and ruin by the dying man's greedy financial operations. In fact, as these wealthy ones approach the abode of immortality, they discover too late how shortsighted they were in not accumulating during their lifetime goods of lasting value.

They had made a god of material wealth, but now that they approach the frontiers of the other world, they find they cannot take with them either their wealth or the power of their wealth.

What they should have acquired during their life upon this planet is described by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in these words:

"What is he in need of in the Kingdom after he is transferred from this world to the other world? That world is a world of sanctity; therefore it is necessary that he acquire sanctity in this world. In that world there is need of radiance; therefore radiance must be acquired in this world. In that world there is need of spirituality. In this world he must acquire spirituality. In that world faith and assurance, the knowledge of God, the love of God, are needed. These he must acquire in this world so that after he ascends from this mortal to that immortal world he shall find that all that is needful in that life eternal is ready for him."

Carelessness and shortsightedness

regarding eternal wealth is not by any means a monopoly of the very rich. Many who have no wealth of worldly goods have no wealth either of spiritual goods, and at the point of death find themselves in unhappiness and dismay. Thus neither does wealth nor poverty guarantee tranquility, which is in essence a spiritual, not a phenomenal possession.

There is no condemnation in material success and wealth, provided the dazzling power and enticements which these bring do not blind the possessor to the spiritual verities. "Wealth," says 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "has a tempting and drawing quality. It bewilders the sight of its charmed victims with showy appearances and draws them on and on to the edge of yawning chasms. It makes a person self-centered, self-occupied, forgetful of God and of holy things."

Great then, is the station of those men and women who, possessing wealth, do not neglect the requirements of the Kingdom. "Such rich men," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "are in reality the light-bearing stars of the heaven of mankind, because they have been tried and tested and have come out of the crucible as pure gold . . . unalloyed and unadulterated. With all the wealth of the world at their feet they are yet mindful of God and humanity, they spend their acquired riches for the dispelling of the darkness of ignorance and employ their treasures for the alleviation of the misery of the children of God. The light of such rich men will never grow dim and the tree of their generosity will grow in size and stature, producing fruits in all seasons. Their every deed will be as an example for succeeding generations.”

Thus it is seen that God is entirely impartial to wealth. The way to the Kingdom is open to all, rich or poor. But it is the wealth of the Kingdom which the wise acquire while on earth. This kind of wealth alone brings assurance, fortitude, and joy throughout life. As the physical powers wane, the spiritual powers grow. And when Israfel brings his kindly message and passport for a journey into further and more ethereal bournes, there is neither regret nor dread. The darkness of Death becomes transformed even this side of the grave into the light of Immortality.

LET ME KNOW LIFE

The following poem written before the author came in contact with the Bahá'í Movement, is not only of poetic value in itself, but is extremely interesting as showing a situation which has occurred many times in the case of those who have become Bahá'ís—that they had previously reached out subconsciously for truth and had arrived at an attitude of mind and spirit which made the Truth of the Bahá'í Cause a complete fulfillment of their spiritual aspirations.

Let me know Life:—

Where sunlight sweeps the earth and seas tumultuous
Fling banners of white, shattered foam
In challenge to the high, veiled gods
Who nod above that glorious strife, —
Let me know Life!

For never by the dreaming rivers have I prayed
With clasping hands, to those old sleeping gods,
For peace and soft content.—
The future I have loved, and not the past.

Then rise! thou Guardian of the Future, rise!
From far free ends of earth, where dawn
Has found Thee ready at Thy work.
Through the glad tumult of uprising millions, come!

I hail a God with laughter on his lips
And morning in his eyes!

TRUE WEALTH

What wealth really is, as seen from the universal viewpoint of a Great Teacher, is here described by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in a way which convinces both the intelligence and the heart. This remarkable passage is from the book, "Some Answered Questions," and is worthy of the most careful study by all who ponder upon wealth and its problems.

THE honor and exaltation of every existing being depends upon causes and circumstances.

The excellency, the adornment, and the perfection of the earth is to be verdant and fertile through the bounty of the clouds of springtime. Plants grow, flowers and fragrant herbs spring up, fruit-bearing trees become full of blossoms, and bring forth fresh and new fruit. Gardens become beautiful, and meadows adorned; mountains and plains are clad in a green robe, and gardens, fields, villages, and cities are decorated. This is the prosperity of the mineral world.

The height of exaltation and the perfection of the vegetable world is that a tree should grow on the bank of a stream of fresh water, that a gentle breeze should blow on it, that the warmth of the sun should shine on it, that a gardener should attend to its cultivation, and that day by day it should develop and yield fruit. But its real prosperity is to progress into the animal and human world, and replace that which has been exhausted in the bodies of animals and men.

The exaltation of the animal world is to possess perfect members, organs, and powers, and to have all its needs supplied. This is its chief glory, its honor and exaltation. So the supreme happiness of an animal is to have possession of a green and fertile meadow, perfectly pure flowing water, and a lovely, verdant forest. If these things are provided for it, no greater prosperity can be imagined. For example, if a bird builds its nest in a green and fruitful forest, in a beautiful high place, upon a strong tree, and at the top of a lofty branch, and if it finds all it needs of seeds and water, this is its perfect prosperity.

But real prosperity for the animal consists in passing from the animal world to the human world, like the microscopic beings that, through the water and air, enter into man and are assimilated, and replace that which has been consumed in his body. This is the great honor and prosperity for the animal world; no greater honor can be conceived for it.

Therefore it is evident and clear that this wealth, this comfort, and this material abundance, form the complete prosperity of minerals, vegetables, and animals. No riches, wealth, comfort, or ease of the material world is equal to the wealth of a bird; all the areas of these plains and mountains are its dwelling, and all the seeds and harvests are its food and wealth, and all the lands, villages, meadows, pastures, forests, and wildernesses are its possessions. Now, which is the richer, this bird, or the most wealthy man? For no matter how many seeds it may take or bestow, its wealth does not decrease.

Then it is clear that the honor and exaltation of man must be something more than material riches; material comforts are only a branch, but the root of the exaltation of man is the good attributes and virtues which are the adornments of his reality. These are the divine appearances, the heavenly bounties, the sublime emotions, the love and knowledge of God; universal wisdom, intellectual perception, scientific discoveries, justice, equity, truthfulness, benevolence, natural courage, and innate fortitude; the respect for rights and the keeping of agreements and covenants; rectitude in all circumstances; serving the truth under all conditions; the sacrifice of one's life for the good of all people; kindness and esteem for all nations; obedience to the teachings of God; service in the Divine Kingdom; the guidance of the people, and the education of the nations and races. This is the prosperity of the human world! This is the exaltation of man in the world! This is eternal life and heavenly honor!

These virtues do not appear from the reality of man except through the power of God and the divine teachings, for they need supernatural power for their manifestation. It may be that in the world of nature a trace of these perfections may appear; but they are not established and lasting; they are like the rays of the sun upon the wall.

As the compassionate God has placed such a wonderful crown upon the head of man, man should strive that its brilliant jewels may become visible in the world.

—'Abdul-Bahá.

A PILGRIMAGE THROUGH PERSIA

1.—Baghdád and Kirmansháh

Miss Root, who has recently completed a tour of Persia, visiting the principle cities on behalf of the Bahá'í Movement, relates in this most interesting series of articles, her experiences as an American Bahá'í traveler in Persia.

PERSIA, the land of Bahá'u'lláh, the scene of the life and martyrdom of the Báb, the childhood home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the long caravan routes over which passed Qurratu'l-'Ayn and the other eighteen "Letters of the Living," the soil made fragrant by the pure blood of countless thousands of devoted followers—O reader! let us approach with reverence our pilgrimage to this sacred birthplace of the Bahá'í Faith!

Of ancient 'Irán once so renowned in the classic days of the great Cyrus, and again in her Renaissance period of Háfiz and Sa-di, the new glory is this: that out from Shiráz has arisen the Báb far mightier than the poets of this Land of the Lion and the Sun; and born in Tihrán was Bahá'u'lláh the Great World Teacher of this budding universal cycle.

Persia has kept its nationality for twenty-five hundred years and now it goes forward to its greatest triumph. This Persia you are to visit is larger than France, Germany, Spain, Holland, Belgium and Switzerland combined. It is nearly one-fifth as large as the whole United States, even though it has only fifteen million inhabitants for this vast area. Geographically, Persia is a great tableland, the plateau of 'Irán.

Just as in the histories of past religions, devotees by the millions have sought the shrines of Confucius in China; have searched the places where Buddha trod in India; have wailed at the Wall in Jerusalem; journeyed through Palestine where Jesus Christ walked and talked; have thronged to Mecca, Medina, Karbilá and Mashhad,—so in this twentieth century hundreds of thousands of Bahá'ís and others interested will pilgrimage to Persia, and in the centuries ahead they will come in even far greater numbers. Enroute from Haifa and 'Akká, they will travel on to Baghdád to see the House of Bahá'u'lláh and the Ridván Garden where He first declared His Manifestation, and then they will come on through the western frontier of Persia to Tihrán, the city of Bahá'u'lláh. Later they will go reverently to all the other places, Shiráz and Bushir and to Tabriz where the Báb in the public square was shot down with hundreds of bullets. They will bend tenderly over the grave of many a martyr.

THE WESTERN people will do their best to help Persia. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in one of His Tablets, gives this promise to the Persians: "In the near future, your brothers from Europe and America will come into Persia and establish new arts, signs of civilization, and

From left to right—Dr. Habibulláh who is writing a book about the Bahá'í history of Kirmansháh which will be published in both the Persian and English languages; Mme. many factories. They will promote commerce, agriculture, and education. When the country will be perfectly safe, then they will come. They will make the country of Persia a paradise superior to other lands. Then the government will be entirely happy, for it will know that the Bahá'í ideal is to do everything best for the government, and that the Bahá'ís are most sincere."

Bahá'u'lláh has prophesied a wonderful future for Tihrán. Here are His Words from the "Kitáb-i-Aqdas:"

"O Land of Ta (Tihrán)! let nothing grieve thee, for verily hath God made thee the Dawning-place of the joy of the world. Should He so will, He will bless thy throne with one who shall rule in justice and shall bring together the herd of God which hath been dispersed by wolves. He shall meet the people of Bahá with joy and happiness. Lo, he shall be of the essence of creation before God: upon him forever be the glory of God and of those in the Kingdom of Command!

"Rejoice thou in that God hath made thee the horizon of Light, for in thee was born the Dawn of Revelation, and upon thee was endowed the name by which shone forth the Sun of Bounty and illumined the heaven and earth.

"Soon shall agitation overtake thy affairs and the populace shall reign over thee; verily, thy Lord is the Omniscient, the Omnipotent!

"Rest thou assured of the Bounty of thy Lord; verily, He shall not withdraw from thee the glances of His Favor. Soon shall tranquility settle down upon thee after commotion. Thus hath it been ordained in the New Tablet."

'Abdu'l-Bahá said of Irán: "The future of Persia will be great and splendid, because it is the birth-place of Bahá'u'lláh. All the other countries of the world will look with respect and honor to Persia; be assured that this country will progress to such a degree that it will dazzle the eyes of all learned men of the world. Verily, this is the great glad-tidings, this is a promise which shall be fulfilled in the near future. Spread this good news throughout the world."

WITH THIS introduction, O readers, let us enter Persia along the western frontier. The Baghdád friends, who have served you and me as if we were royal guests, have accompanied us from Baghdád to Khaniqayn, a twelve hour journey by train, just to be sure we come safely. And when they tuck us into the big motor car, which they themselves had chosen for us, they give us a truly Baghdád abá which is a sunshine-brown cloak embroidered with gold and silver, and they give us three wool rugs. Then after ordering little glasses of tea brought out to us in the car, gallantly with a smile and back of it a tear they wish us "Alláh-u-Abhá";

Coming to the Custom House at the Persian border five miles beyond Khaniqayn, the writer presented a letter of introduction from the Persian Minister in Baghdád. Travelling with her were a Bahá'í lady from Shiráz and a Bahá'í young man from Tihrán journeying the same way. The Customs Official after reading the letter invited the party in to have tea, while the baggage which had been roped high to the sides of the car as heavily as a peddler might pile his wares, was patiently undone and examined. The official said that if there were any Bahá'í books they must be destroyed. There were none, for the writer knows the rules of the country.

If Persia did but know it, the very books they burn and boycott have been instrumental in creating among Occidentals an understanding and appreciation of Islam, eliciting such statements from Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania and other great Westerners that the Station of Muhammad as the Messenger of God is like the Station of Christ. Thus these very Bahá'í books which Persian Moslems burn as heretical have served the Cause of Islám in the West. The Bahá'í Movement is not against Islám.

After a delightful little talk about the unity of all religions the car was again ready, and the bags and we ourselves were stowed in like peas in a pod. The snow-bed road was excellent, the sunshine warm and exhilarating. We were starting into Persia in January, the coldest and most difficult season to travel, but busy people cannot always wait for the spring and the Persian gardens where the nightingales sing on the rose branches. Our chauffeur and his helper, Hassan, a svelte boy of seventeen, guided the car so deftly it moved like a swift-flying bird. The total distance from Baghdád to Tihrán is about five hundred miles.

trucks and passenger machines and many more horse teams and donkey caravans stood in the line.

Hassan and the chauffeur shoveled and carried gravel to put under the wheels, the red quilt round the baggage was unroped and also put under. However the sun sank lower and lower and it seemed as if we must spend the night in the drifts. But in the early starlight the cars triumphed and we moved forward to good roads. We followed behind the motor car carrying government mail and reached Kirmansháh at one-thirty o'clock in the morning. Because there were many cars they could travel in the night, usually this is not allowed.

Kirmansháh Bahá'í friends had sent three believers to the border to meet me, but they had waited two days and then returned as there had been a mistake in the telegram. A large group of Kirmansháh friends had motored out many miles to meet us and escort our car into the city, but they too had been forced to turn back at night when we had not come.

Delighted now at our arrival, the friends came to the hotel early in the morning and took us to a palatial Bahá'í home. A meeting for nearly two hundred women was held that day. The mother of a martyr sat in the audience. When her son, Jacob Mottahedeh, had been shot for the faith, she had given a wedding feast to celebrate his passing, because he had wished this and not a funeral service.

This youth's pure life and martyrdom have given a profound depth to the Cause in that city. Really, one needs to see it to realize its powerful significance. Men, women and children are inspired and urged forward because one of their dearest members gave his life that the Bahá'í Cause might be continued in his city.

A large meeting for nearly three hundred men was held in the evening. Ten years ago such a Bahá'í meeting would have been impossible without many being killed. Now whenever any kind of a gathering is held, the policemen come to the street and stay until every one passes out on his way home. Certainly law and order are very good in Persia.

Some people in very high positions in Kirmansháh and in all other cities of Persia quietly come to call and to ask about the Bahá'í Teachings and their progress in the west. One of the very high government officials in Persia traveling that route said he would meet the writer in the home of a friend. He was extraordinarily intelligent and asked questions which showed he had studied the Bahá'í Teachings deeply.

When the discussion was over, she said: "I have told you everything very frankly, but I do not know how your country will receive me when they know I am a Bahá'í as well as a journalist." "Our country is tolerant," he replied. "Ten years ago I should not have dared take the risk of speaking with you."

Many people in Persia are Bahá'ís who do not openly declare their faith. All along the motor route of Irán in the villages and cities the Bahá'ís knew that a western Bahá'í sister was passing their way. They came to the road, and if they made no greeting, their smile, their shining eyes that were quickly lowered or turned in another direction, showed her that they recognized and loved the believer from the Occident. There is no city nor any important village in all Persia that does not have Bahá'is.

A VERY EFFICIENT and delightful Bahá'í of Hamadán came to accompany us on to his city. The road lay over a high mountain but everything went beautifully. Friends had given us a bountiful lunch—(as they had done everywhere from Haifa to Iráq, Iráq to Persia!)—roasted chickens, hard-boiled eggs, delicious Persian bread which is of whole wheat and baked very thin like great pancakes, dozens of oranges and very inviting Persian cakes and bonbons. We stopped and ate our lunch beside a crackling wood fire, in a very clean little room in the wayside inn. Our Hamadán friend who often travels this route had reserved the room for us and he ordered tea to be brought. The place gave one an idea of what the best wayside inns are. The chaufffeur ate with us and plenty of food was sent out to Hassan who guarded the car and the baggage. The boy who served us tea was given a generous share, and in one-half hour from the time we left the car we were back and whirling up the mountain. Western Persia is beautiful in this winter season, her topography is nearly all mountains and the immense plateau.

Four miles out from Kirmansháh we had passed by Bisitun and Tak-i-Bustan, where there are some of the most celebrated remains of Persian antiquity. From the rock carvings, sculptures and inscriptions which look down upon one from the chiseled surface of the mountain-side one can read a wonderful tale of bygone splendor; but our journey is to seek and to know the new glory of this ancient Irán. The winding mountain road runs along sheer precipices which sink down to snow-banked valleys far below. This is a most difficult mountain climb, but for us everything went happily, and in a few hours we were approaching Hamadán.

“Is not the object of every Revelation to effect a transformation in the whole character of mankind, a transformation that shall manifest itself, both outwardly and inwardly, that shall affect both its inner life and external conditions? For if the character of mankind be not changed, the futility of God’s universal Manifestation would be apparent.”

MILLENNIUM

MARZIEH K. NABIL

"The marvelous bestowals of God are continuous. Should the outpouring of Light be suspended, we would be in darkness. But how could it be withheld? If the divine graces are suspended, then divinity itself would be interrupted. Even men ask for continuity."
 —'Abdu'l-Bahá.

A recent article by a man well versed in current trends proclaims the coming of a new era. According to this authority, people are no longer interested in what have been, for the past decade, burning questions; a cynical attitude toward religion, a patronizing slant on spirituality and idealism, an avidity for the brutal in thought and conduct, may no longer be classed as modern; rather, we are recovering from "post war materialism," and are on the eve of a period when the chief issues will be idealism, the seeking of "a religion which will satisfy the unchurched," and a more scientific attitude toward science, whose hypotheses we will accept with discretion, rather than immediately revolutionize our mode of life on the basis of some new theory which may later be disproved.

The Bahá'ís have known of this imminent new era for almost ninety years. It was in 1844 that the Báb appeared in Persia and awakened the East to the coming of "Him Whom God should manifest," and this Coming occurred when the world was in the deepest misery and was sunk in a sea of materialism. What the cited article referred to as post-war materialism was in a larger sense not post-war at all, because the war itself was the result of hideous materialism accumulated through centuries of growing away from divine truths. A study of the climactic nineteenth century would substantiate this. The times were ugly with the suffering occasioned by a mismanaged Industrial Revolution, a heartless, destructive society, a Napoleon; human beings were crowded into poor-houses and left to die; children were working seventeen hours a day in the mines; families were living on "potatoes-and-point"—hanging a bit of meat over their table and watching it while they ate. The pages historians have left behind bring us not only details of intense physical suffering, but also describe the spiritual torture which fell upon men; death was all around them, and they cried aloud for help, and ran from one ark of deliverance to another.

This was a new thing in history, this awaiting a millennium. The Western Middle Ages had looked back over their shoulder at the Ancients and the Bible; if they expected a new era, it was only one in which all things would be destroyed and the world would cease to exist; and even in life, they looked for death, mortified their flesh, and retired into solitude. With the Renaissance and the coming of humanism, an intellectual, materialistic development began, which culminated in the brilliant eighteenth century, a period in which men could see through existing conditions but not above and beyond them, and in which patronizing intellects disported themselves in their own technique. As every text book shows, the second half of the Eighteenth century saw a wave of sensitive idealism which swept upward to the chaotic nineteenth. From the last of the eighteenth century, men began to prophesy a new era, a millennium, and it would seem that there was not a thinker who did not anticipate the coming of a new day. Carlyle thundered of the abomination of desolation and saw a phoenix rising from a world in flame; to Ruskin, a beneficently ethical Beauty would moralize society; Arnold thought that culture, that sweetness and light, would insure a new order; Emerson awaited the Master Poet who would open up new horizons; the followers of Saint-Simon wore their vests buttoned backward as a sign of new brotherhood and inter-dependence; Musset, the burning young Romanticist, shouted, "Which of us will be a god?"

We all know what happened. The Millerites went up to their hill and Christ did not come floating down; the ardent New-Era-ists were quenched in 1848 with the political reactions which took place; haloes were broken, one by one; and after that men were ashamed to hope any longer, and gradually turned to the coldest realities available; we had a man like Zola, a theory like Darwin's an unhoping, subdued, invertedly defiant attitude which is now called modern.

All this time, while the world was in torment and waiting for deliverance, the New Era was dawning in a lost, forgotten country. In 1844, in that decade which historians call the dividing line between our times and the dead past, the Báb announced the coming of a great World Teacher. In Persia, though of old the king of kings had bequeathed the whole known world as legacy to his three sons, there were now only shattered columns, only dust heaps left of his palaces. Persia in 1844 was a synopsis of all the diseases which can afflict humanity: there was despotism, poverty, ignorance, mutual hatred; the masses entirely relying for guidance on a grasping, tyrannical priesthood; the women, the educators of humanity in its most impressionable years, degraded to a menial position; a despotic government; a country where idealism and spirituality had guttered out; a people hermetically sealed against salvation. Yet even there, a group of men awaited a millennium, felt the imminence of a spiritual rebirth. These recognized the Báb, not only from the prophecies which they had studied and which His coming fulfilled, not only from their years of prayers and meditation, but also from His radiant, majestic bearing, His inspired knowledge, His triumphant message. And so it was that the East was awakened and prepared for Him Who was heralded.

Regarding the lengthy prophecies and the specific descriptions and dates which the Holy Books have handed down to us, scholars all over the world are in agreement; an instance among hundreds shows us that even in the thirteenth century men were familiar with the importance of the date 1260; for around 1255, Paris was in ferment over the "Eternal Gospel," a treatise which foretold a new era of the Spirit to begin in the year 1260, in which the existing theology would be superseded.

No such new era occurred in the year 1260 of the Christian dispensation; but in the year 1260 of the Muhammadan dispensation, the declaration of the Báb occurred. "The date of Bahá'u'lláh is calculated according to lunar years from the mission and the Hejira of Muhammad; for in the religion of Muhammad the lunar year is in use, as also it is the lunar year which is employed concerning all commands of worship

"In Daniel, chapter 12, verse 6, it is said: 'And one said to the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, How long shall it be to the end of these wonders? And I heard the man clothed in linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and swore by him that liveth forever that it shall be for a time, times and a half; and that when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished.'

"... we will say briefly that each day of the Father counts as a year, and in each year there are twelve months. Thus three years and a half make forty-two months, and forty-two months are twelve hundred and sixty days. The Báb, the Precursor of Bahá'u'lláh, appeared in the year 1260 from the Hejira of Muhammad by the reckoning of

Islam."* When Bahá'u'lláh later appeared according to the prophecy of the Báb, He proclaimed the teachings which have so enamoured humanity that there is no Bahá'í who would not give his life for them.

Prophecies, however, are proofs of a new era only to students of the various sacred texts; but to the unchurched, to agnostics, or atheists, or the indifferent, equally impregnable proofs reiterate the advent of a spiritual millennium.

The modern world is divided against itself, and a world divided against itself cannot stand. The only possible way out of present day conditions is by arbitration, and yet this is null and void when the arbitrators have the old divisions in their hearts. A religion is the only power intrinsic and compelling enough to amalgamate humanity; unity means religious unity; where faiths are at variance, there is always a point beyond, a secret room in each man's heart where his brothers may not enter, a shekina where he bows his head in hostile superiority. Humanity needs one religion, one standard of right and wrong; at present there are no standards at all; what is moral in one house is a life and death offense in the next; when a society no longer believes in an indivisible, ultimate Good, which is one just as the color white is one, that society is in its death throes.

The Will of God, revealed throughout the ages by His Manifestations, is the ultimate Good. God is fullest revealed in the noblest of men, the highest creation, His Manifestation. He can be clearly known only through the Great Teachers who are His living exponents. It is idle to say that we can construe God for ourselves; our imaginations belong to us, and we cannot even avoid being patronizing toward our belongings because they are ours, much less worship them; even an Emerson or a Dante cannot see farther than an "oversoul" or a "great white rose." But among the Manifestations of God, since only through these shall we find the standard, there is none whose teachings in their present form will bring peace.

Missionaries will tell us that they have been obliged to divide up their sphere of activity into zones, each zone receiving the faith according to the interpretations of a different schism; this can hardly be termed a dissemination of unity.

Centuries have passed away, and no one has been able to make a conclusive choice from among the "two and seventy jarring sects." It is doubtful whether we should guard a flame of sacred fire, or bathe in the Ganges, or lead a holy bull to pasture. Our thousand schools of thought, offshoots of religious belief, are equally unable to bring men together. Philosophy cannot be lived without religion. Agnosticism will not satisfy an active mind. Atheism expounded is nothing less than theism with some changes of vocabulary, and the atheist is also groping for a standard.

It is only in obeying the command of Bahá'u'lláh that we worship one God and serve one humanity, following the essential oneness at the heart of each religion, that the world can be at peace. There is no Bahá'í precept which mankind will not acknowledge, immediately or after meditation, as pure truth.

Everyone agrees that peace among nations is imperative, that castes and races must be reconciled, must heal the wrongs they have done each other, that universal education of a spiritual as well as material quality is essential, that true science and true religion are in harmony, that men and women are equal. . . . It is easy to agree with the Bahá'í principles, but not to obey them.

The Bahá'ís are those who, not content with mere agreement, spend their lives in striving to obey the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh; they have chosen a path which leads to martyrdom, to loss of fortune, to the constant setting aside of personal desires. The acceptance of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh is a serious thing; there is no turning back from such acceptance, for there is no individual who can be at rest with himself once he has renounced his soul's highest truth. This is a Cause for the courageous; for those who can give even their tired hours, their broken, reluctant bodies, in service; for those who can win victories and never see their laurels; for those whose hearts shall not waver, though all the heavens and the earth arise against them.

But isolated courage, sporadic sacrifice, is not enough; it is only through coordinated effort, through symmetrical, rhythmic activity, that the kingdom of God shall come upon earth. World regeneration is insured by the establishment of the Bahá'í Administration, through which channel alone can a Bahá'í life be led. Were it not for the order and discipline maintained among us by the impregnable institutions which Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá have founded, our efforts would cancel each other, and, as is adequately illustrated by the history of former religious dispensations, our very power and spirit would assure disintegration.

When Bahá'u'lláh passed away in 1892, the enemies assailing the Cause expected immediate victory, but to their astonishment the Bahá'ís rallied in solid phalanxes around the Center of the Covenant, and the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh were spread to every country; again, what man held impossible, so will tely more numerous and widely distributed than in 1892, turned with one accord to the Guardian of the Cause Shoghi Effendi, and under his guidance set themselves to carrying out the injunctions in the Will and Testament of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The result is that today the Bahá'ís are a disciplined, united group working together in powerful harmony, demonstrating the truth that human beings may retain their widely differing personalities and yet function collectively as "one soul in different bodies."

And just as each Bahá'í has seen the dawn of a millenium in his own soul, has felt himself changing, developing, casually accomplishing the whole world find itself transformed, the old materialism pass away, the new spirituality be established.

THE Holy Spirit is the mediator between God and His creatures. It is like a mirror facing the sun. As the pure mirror receives light from the sun and transmits its bounty to others, so the Holy Spirit is the mediator of the Holy Light from the Realm of Reality, which it gives to the sanctified realities. It is adorned with all the divine perfections. Every time it appears the world is renewed, and a new cycle is founded. The body of the world of humanity puts on a new garment. It can be compared to the spring; whenever it comes, the world passes from one condition to another. Through the advent of the season of spring the black earth and the fields and wildernesses will become verdant and blooming, and all sorts of flowers and sweet-scented herbs will grow; the trees will have new life, and new fruit will appear, and a new cycle is founded . . . In the same way, the appearance of Bahá'u'lláh was like a new springtime which appeared with holy breezes, with the hosts of everlasting life, and with heavenly power. It established the Throne of the Divine Kingdom in the center of the world, and by the power of the Holy Spirit revived souls and established a new cycle.

OBSTACLES TO HUMAN UNDERSTANDING

ABDUL HUSSEIN ISPHAHANI

The following article by one of the Persian Bahá'í scholars who has spent some years of study in Switzerland, was presented as a paper at an international congress for moral education held under the auspices of the League of Nations. It is an excellent treatment of the causes of provincialism in the mental attitude of youth, and of the way to overcome this obstacle to ideal growth and development.

FROM the start a child must be familiarized with his true position and value, not to a narrow circle of a local, national or dogmatic color, but to all humanity. He must be deeply imbued with the great ideal that he belongs to a circle wider than his own immediate environment and to which he owes more than to his native land. In other words he should be given as a guide in his life, that moral means human and human again is equivalent to moral.

The negligence of the enforcement and development of this noble ideal in the schools both in the past and at the present time may be traced to three obstacles of the first magnitude.

It is a psychological as well as a sociological fact that man belongs to different environments. The teacher and the pupils are susceptible to innumerable contradictory influences that imperceptibly creep into their character and deeply affect their conduct in life.

With the teacher who is more mature than his pupil, these contradictions which can be well observed from his responsiveness to his different callings in life are more pronounced in three fields:

a. In his religious leanings. Taking the religious attitude towards life as a fact of normal human nature, teachers even if they are atheists, monists, or sceptics, are more or less religious. A fervent narrow believer belonging to a certain sect or system of beliefs and dogmas is continually in conflict and opposition with the other beliefs and dogmas of his fellow teachers. Breadth of view on these matters is very rare. Unhappily narrowness of mind in religious matters is a huge obstacle in the way of the development of international feelings. A teacher partial in religious matters, however good he may be, can do no more than turn his pupils into bigoted fanatics who may be more dangerous to humanity than pests and plagues.

Therefore, according to the temperament of the teachers pupils in general are either sworn atheists or hot-headed believers, with always the same result: the total suppression of ideal human sentiments.

b. In his attitude towards social institutions. A teacher's conception of the social regime is continually clashing with the views of others on the same subject. The great contention between capitalists and laborers in the field of economics on the one hand, and anarchists and believers in government in the sphere of politics on the other, reflect themselves with a more or less intensity of view and moral influence on his pupils. He may make them good lovers of order or sworn enemies to society as a whole or to a special fraction of it. Unfortunately this spirit which is more marked in advanced classes proves a menace and a hindrance to the establishment of a healthy atmosphere of human brotherhood in the school room.

c. In his conception of humanity. One is apt to overlook the fact that in general man's conception of humanity is vague and undefined. In the mind of the child especially it is his village, city or at most, his country, on the one hand; and the rest of the world, as entirely foreign to his interests and welfare, on the other. Although education sometimes smoothes the rough edges of this narrow and partisan conception, yet the resistance of the local, national and social prejudices point to the undeniable fact that we are all too deeply imbued with this anti-human notion—that humanity is composed of heterogeneous elements of the most divergent nature, the best amongst which is that to which we belong.

There is no doubt that the teacher, more especially in his history class, feeds the brains of the young on this anti-human poison. Consequently national as well as social prejudices are shutting the doors of the class-room to international feelings.

Now, as to the contradictions in the influences effecting the pupil's character, it is enough to point out three of them: 1. The school. 2. The home. 3. Public or private entertainments. The opposition and struggles between the moral conception acquired in these different environments are to a great extent obstacles in developing in his soul a highly human sentiment. Narrow religious or national education at home may destroy the good that the school has engrafted on his mind. Entertainments, private or public, and more especially the cinema—destroy to a great extent even the harmonious and benevolent work of both the home and the school.

It is a sad and atrocious thing to observe that poor innocent children are learning through cinemas to hate other nations whom they never know.

THERE ARE two more attitudes of mind that are menacing human international sentiment, namely, intellectual dishonesty and lack of tolerance.

When a religious man, in spite of the great similarity between the moral principles of his creed and those of another, still holds his own as superior to those of the other, he is certainly intellectually dishonest. When a teacher drives into the mind of his pupils that the imperialistic exploits of a Frederick the Great or a Napoleon are admirable, he is molding a society of dishonest intellectual machines. When a German, French, British or Italian teacher leads his class to believe that his nation monopolizes all the human virtues of which the others are bereft, he is shaping dishonest machines and thus ruining the work of true civilization.

It is this mental dishonesty that is poisoning life, that is eradicating all the sublime, the beautiful and good in human nature.

Intellectual honesty does not always involve tolerance. The attitude of a free-thinker as well as a devout dogmatic thinker, towards a religious belief—however intellectually honest both may be, emphasizes the point in consideration as a hindrance to international human sentiments. A teacher who is exclusive, and intolerant in his views does not contribute to the welfare of humanity. Tolerance in the school is what we need.

ALTHOUGH BAHÁ'Í schools are still in their formative period, yet their methods of teachings, especially in the subject of history, always have in view the ideal of inculcating in the children the spirit of love for mankind. Universal history with a view to acquainting the child with the general line of man's development and human solidarity, especially in the fields that have always either divided or united mankind, forms the essential program of the Bahá'í teacher. This does not mean in the least the exclusion of national history, which is treated in so far as it forms a part of the general movement of the history of the world.

Bahá'í teachers take the utmost pains to mould the minds of the children into the most human cast. Brotherhood of man and real love for all mankind are always their guiding stars. It is incumbent on every Bahá'í child first to learn and practice the words of Bahá'u'lláh, "You are the leaves of one tree and the drops of one ocean . . . Associate with all religions and creeds in the utmost harmony and concord . . . Glory is not for him who loves his country but for him who loves his kind." And second, the teaching of 'Abdul-Bahá: "Beware of prejudice! Light is good in whatever lamp it is burning. A rose is beautiful in whatever garden it may bloom. A star has the same radiance whether it shines from the east or the west."

It is with such teachings in the schools that Bahá'ís counteract the bad effects on the child either at home, or in society. Happily for us the Bahá'í home cooperates with the school and even chisels off the bad effects of a narrow education in case the child is in a non-Bahá'í school. With such sublime teachings and ideals the child grows to be a lover of mankind and a servant of humanity. How could it be otherwise?

* * * *

Bahá'u'lláh has announced that inasmuch as ignorance and lack of education are barriers of separation among mankind, all must receive training and instruction. Through this provision the lack of mutual understanding will be remedied and the unity of mankind furthered and advanced. Universal education is a universal law. . . . The holy Manifestations of God, the Divine Prophets are the first teachers of the human race. They are Universal Educators and the fundamental principles they have laid down are the causes and factors of the advancement of nations.

CHARACTER TRAINING

EDUCATION—the instruction and guidance of men and the development and training of their innate faculties—has been the supreme aim of all the Holy Prophets since the world began, and in the Bahá'í teachings the fundamental importance and limitless possibilities of education are proclaimed in the clearest terms. The teacher is the most potent factor in civilization and his work is the highest to which men can aspire. Education begins in the mother's womb and is as unending as the life of the individual. It is a perennial necessity of right living and the foundation of both individual and social welfare. When education on right lines becomes general, humanity will be transformed and the world will become a paradise.

At present a really well educated man is the rarest of phenomena, for nearly everyone has false prejudices, wrong ideals, erroneous conceptions and bad habits drilled into him from babyhood. How few are taught from their earliest childhood to love God with all their hearts and dedicate their lives to him; to regard service to humanity as the highest aim of life; to develop their powers to the best advantage for the general good of all! Yet surely these are the essential elements of a good education. Mere cramming of the memory with facts about arithmetic, grammar, geography, languages, etc., has comparatively little effect in producing noble and useful lives.

The thing of paramount importance in education is character training. With regard to this, example is more effective than precept, and the lives and characters of the child's parents, teachers and habitual associates are factors of the utmost importance.

The Prophets of God are the great Eductors of mankind, and their counsels and the story of their lives should be instilled into the child's mind as soon as it is able to grasp them.

A MESSAGE TO YOUTH

The following excerpts are here published from the baccalaureate sermons of the Presidents of some of the leading Eastern colleges, because they present an inspiring vision to the youth of the land, painting a picture by no means pessimistic of present day conditions and ideals in an apparently unspiritual age. The quotations were printed in The Boston Globe of June 16, 1930.

YALE UNIVERSITY

“AS LONG AS A nation’s policy is frankly determined by the expectation of war with one or more of its neighbors,” said President Angell of Yale, “and as long as its naval and military policy is guided accordingly, all talk of abiding peace must be ironic and will everywhere be so understood. Slowly if necessary, but steadily, we must move toward a psychology of peace and away from the prevalent psychology of war, and the men of your generation can render no greater service to humanity than in the advancement of this cause by the constant pressure of your influence.

“The period in which we are living may well come to be known in religious history as the ‘age of unbelief,’ the latest of many, for the lineage runs direct and substantially uninterrupted from the Greek philosophers of the fourth century B. C., with occasional later high points such as the British skepticism of the 18th century and the radical movement of the French Revolution. Hardly a week goes by that some new book does not appear attacking one or another of the strongholds of religious faith, while the popular magazines are flooded with articles of like character. Even college professors vie with itinerant lecturers and casual essayists in the chorus of atheistic propaganda. I doubt whether any vital element in Christianity, to say nothing of other religions, has wholly escaped this assault.

“Inevitably contemporary youth is affected by those critical onslaughts upon Christianity, upon religion and morals in general. After all, our practical attitudes are the immediately important things. It is what we do that counts most certainly. Faith without works, as St. James remarks, is dead.

“The world needs real men, men of courage, both moral and physical. Evil and injustice are not inert, much less dead. They stalk abroad in social life, in politics, in business. If men like you will not do battle with them, who should? Moreover, crushing human need is all about you in the world crying for relief. Even in these times of great wealth, poverty and disease and crime and under-privilege constitute a challenge to that idealism which, thank God, never dies in youth, however thin and feeble it may become in later years. One need not be a professed pacifist to realize the grotesque futility of war as a means for the just settlement of international issues and its utterly irrational wastage of life and treasure. With the increasingly lethal character of the modern means of warfare, the time is rapidly approaching when even the fire-eating politician must hesitate to advocate armed struggle. With the Peace Pact, the League of Nations and the International Court, from two of which our timid nationalists shy as too dangerous for us to contemplate, war should be made humanly impossible. But this will not occur unless the men of your generation so decree, and, if you do not so decree, you and your children with you may well be blotted out in the utter ruthlessness of the next war. This is not idle speculation, it is grim fact. Moreover, it is fact which cuts to the very root of the deepest instincts of pure religion.

“Let us agree without cavil that we are living in an age of moral and religious hesitation and uncertainty. Does this mean that, in consequence, our spiritual life must be paralyzed? Certainly not. The gods of the Greek Pantheon may indeed be dead, and Isis and Osiris but faint voices from the tomb; yet the God that dwells in the heart of man is not dead and will not die. There is that in the human spirit which cannot be wholly smothered by the fumes of a purely self-centered philosophy, nor choked by the tentacles of a smug materialism. You may teach that there is no God until many have come so to believe; you can ridicule as guileless, or as fools, all who put anything before the gratification of personal pleasure and worldly passion; but you can never wholly slay the ineradicable instinct for noble living, for daring spiritual adventure, for genuine devotion of self to the needs of society and to interests conceived as higher than this self and essentially sacred; and that is true religion.”—President James Rowland Angell of Yale University.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY

“A BACCALAUREATE address is supposed to deal with the relation of men leaving college to the responsibilities about to be thrust upon them as citizens; and so when invited to give this sermon to the graduating class I asked myself what quality in educated men the world stands most in need of today.

“Knowledge has increased vastly in these later generations, and is growing at a rapid rate. Many laws of nature, previously unsuspected, have been revealed by scientific labors; the history and condition of men, his thoughts and impulses, have been explored; until much that lay concealed has become the common property of all civilized peoples. More knowledge, no doubt, is needed, and all glory to those who seek and find it; but it is not the gravest need of mankind now.

“Education, or rather the possession of the tools for getting it, is more widely diffused than ever before. For the mass of our people we need, not so much more, but better instruction. A lack of education is not the salient mark of our time.

“Intelligence is not in general deficient; and of energy and enterprise, the motive powers that make intelligence effective, there is, in our country at least, an abundance.

“In spite of the cynic and the pessimist; in spite of much misconduct public and private; in spite of the prevalence of crime in our land, there is much virtue and public spirit. The observation of a lifetime has led me to believe that these qualities have not diminished, but on the whole, have gained in strength; certainly that has been my impression of college students.

"To many people it may seem overstrained, but to me one of the greatest, it not the most salient, defects of our day is the lack of wisdom. Cruel and disastrous wars have occurred throughout recorded history, but none that has involved so largely the whole population, or has been so widely harmful as the World War.

"Mankind is now seeing how to preclude war. Almost everyone is anxious for this; but no sensible man is perfectly sure that what all men object to doing they will not do. If we felt sure that wars would not come we should not talk about them so much. They need not occur if there were wisdom enough to direct the course of human conduct.

"A university like this is not endowed solely, or even primarily, for the personal benefit of its students. That is a great end, but not the greatest. If it existed for that alone there might be just cause for jealousy on the part of those who do not share its benefits. It is endowed in order that those fortunate enough to enjoy the privilege may contribute to the welfare, and especially to the wisdom of the whole people; and the public has a right to expect such an attitude from its educated men."—President Abbot Lawrence Lowell of Harvard University.

DARTMOUTH COLLEGE

"THIS TRADITIONAL SERVICE in which we are participating in the commencement exercises symbolizes the spirit which actuated the founders of our historic colleges in New England. They believed that human life uninfluenced by religious conviction was incomplete. They believed that unintelligence in religion was dangerous as elsewhere.

"In these few hours which precede change in our mutual relationships certain conditions can well be recognized which perhaps could less clearly be distinguished while attitudes of all-embracing wisdom on the part of college authorities, or of intellectual posing on the part of undergraduates, seemed inseparable from our common life. The conditions of American life have so changed that undergraduates in the main come to the college without any acquaintanceship with what religion really is, except in some of its superficial forms. Judged on the basis of these forms, religion appears unattractive and the undergraduate body becomes indifferent—if not actually resistant—to any formal attempt to approach it helpfully in clarification at this point.

"The religious impulse is to be found most purely in the spirit which animated Jesus, the great Teacher, and not in the corrupted ideals of His self-appointed or unintelligent interpreters, far remote from Him in thinking and in time. The resounding din of organization, the hysterical activities of political propaganda, the quarrelsome conduct of advocates of exact theological definitions, the confused counsels of social reform, are not the sources from which to seek either the comfort or the inspiration of a devotional relationship between man and God. As Elijah in days of old, seeking to know God, found him not in the great and strong wind which rent the mountains and broke in pieces the rocks, nor in the earthquake, nor in the fire, but in the still, small voice, so today God most surely may be found in the reverence of the reflective mind and in the sensitiveness of the willing spirit.

BROWN UNIVERSITY

“THE BUILDING OF life goes silently on,” said President Barbour of Brown, “with materials which have been shaped in our daily tasks and our common place surroundings. For every man is a builder, not only in that structure which is rising in every land and in every city, but in the inner temple of the soul.

“It is well that we reverently acknowledge and seek the divine guidance as we do our forest and quarry work of preparation, and as we build ourselves with the product of our toil into the life of the world.”—President Clarence A. Barbour of Brown University.

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY

A sincere and intelligent consideration of traditional religion was urged on the members of Princeton University's graduating class by Pres John Grier Hibben in his annual baccalaureate sermon. Pres. Hibben asked the men to see their studies of the past four years in science, literature and history in their bearing on the problems of religion.

The speaker urged them to think their way clearly through the problems of traditional religion and the skepticism of the age.

Pres Hibben declared in conclusion:

“There is something within man's nature, the power of his thought and will, which thus suggests a unique origin and contains deep hidden intimations that man belongs to the order of the spirit, and gives us an assurance of the reality of those ideas which have ever kindled the aspirations of our race, the ideas of ‘God, freedom and immortality.’ ”

THE INSPIRATION OF GOD'S WORD

BYNE GOODMAN CAVENEE

THERE is an elevation accompanying an act of praise which comes in no other way. To find the good and to acclaim it brings out all that is best in ourselves. It puts us in tune with the good everywhere, makes us receptive to it and makes us desire it. Not only should we seek the good that is in all things and all beings but we should express our appreciation of it to the best of our ability. In doing so we expand our inner self a certain amount and open it to a world of goodness. Nothing good dies; consequently the effect of such acts is lasting and remains with us. Furthermore it reacts upon others who hear us and tends to produce a similar expansion in them. Sincere praise is very powerful in its influence. So is criticism, but in a manner directly opposite to praise. Whereas praise expands, criticism contracts. Praise warms the heart while criticism chills it.

Of all acts of praise, however, there is one superior to all others in its reaction upon us. In performing it not only are we in harmony with good everywhere but we are lifted into an exalted Presence which dominates us and leaves us desirous of nothing but His love and to know His will. When the heart voices songs of praise to its Creator it feels something of the vibrations of eternal love, the force of which carries it to or near to the peak of exaltation, according to the depth of feeling developed. The deeper the feeling the higher the exaltation and the greater the ecstasy of emotion produced. Such vibrations are full of a divine potency that regenerates the soul and fills it with the joy of living. The mind consequently becomes alert to new knowledge, and the vibrations of the flesh reach a higher plane through their contact with those above. Remaining in such exaltation the soul becomes immortal.

BEAUTY IS A divine attribute and its cultivation belongs to the soul. Appreciation of true beauty is a stage of growth and anything beautiful, either material or spiritual, is worthy of protection for its own sake because of the effect upon the soul. Appreciation of beauty in face or figure is easy and to a limited extent that of surroundings. Beauty in nature is a step more difficult and beauty of the soul still more, although it is the most important of all. Seeing beauties in nature helps to make one detached from material things and so is an approach to spiritual appreciation. It is natural to think of God when one thinks of nature, and some understanding of His laws is necessary to any appreciation. Studying nature is one of the best ways to come into a proper relationship with Him. When one is lost in admiration of a sunset, or the magnificent spectacle presented to one's view from the top of a mountain, or when the senses are lulled and soothed by gazing upon a wave-tossed sea the soul is close to God. The natural forces are calming unless one is overwhelmed by their power or in danger from them. Merely breathing deeply of pure air lifts one temporarily to a higher plane, so if one did not do it for the body's sake it would be found profitable for the soul. Deep appreciation of nature whether in its natural state, or as reproduced in art or described in literature, especially poetry, is an indication that the soul has caught a glimpse of heaven and sensed the beauty there. Music at this stage will bring it even closer.

But beauty in all its glory is seen only by the soul that has known its Lord and witnessed it in Him. The beauty is everlasting and its memory never fades, the light that surrounds it dims all lesser things. There is no beauty that approaches the shining splendor of His radiance, his majesty, His glory. Seeing this the soul is satisfied forevermore.

A LARGE PART of our energy is wasted in useless effort, energy which would be far better expended in building stronger bodies and souls. Especially is it wasted in diseases of the mind, in worry, fear, petty vexations, pride and doubts. This is due to depending upon human intelligence to solve all difficulties and it is not equal to the task. In fact no one of them is actually solved through human endeavor alone. The sooner one realizes this truth in its completeness the sooner he will find the remedy. Few situations involve only ourselves, except some diseases of the flesh and occasionally our own talents, for practically all of them are in some degree dependent upon circumstances in general or upon other persons for their solution. Because of this fact the individual cannot control them and the above-mentioned diseases are the result.

The true remedy can be found only by discovering the laws governing our own existence as well as our relationships with each other and beginning to live by them. The knowledge of them must come first to be sure, but that amounts to little if we do not follow them faithfully. However, we are only too glad to do that, once we understand something of their significance. This is where the secret of right effort applies.

Consider the lilies, how they grow. Where is any effort expended? Not only is everything needed for their growth provided without thought on their part of how the provision would be made, but all that they actually do is to keep their faces turned directly to God singing His praise and glory in their beautiful pure white blossoms. Only when man's heart is purified and his prayer becomes a song of praise does he resemble the lily. Only when he prays to be free from all petty worries and burdens and to have his mind and heart and being filled with love in their stead, leaving all else in the hands of God, can he learn to sing.

WHAT A beautiful word is hope and how beautiful is all the world where hope is. It is the foundation of faith, also tolerance and charity. Even in the depths of despair the voice of hope is not stilled for long, and when faith in God exists we rise, at least temporarily, to the heights of glory.

Hope is the beginning of all success and happiness whether material or spiritual. Without hope progress would not be possible. It is a torch that burns within the heart through all eternity and although it may be dimmed it is never extinguished. But to burn brightly and to cause a glow of radiance about it the heart must be pure. Then the radiance is reflected as in a mirror and in its presence others must feel the light of the torch within themselves brightened. The hope that comes from a heart purified by divine love is contagious.

Hope then is also a force of attraction, bringing to the heart wherein it abides all that is good and beautiful in others. It is a magnet that draws all unto itself. In fact it has magnetic power which, next to love, is the greatest power in the world. It is the secret of magnetism and eventually overthrows or conquers all lesser powers. There is a sovereignty, a dominion, that belongs by divine right to the heart aglow with hope and this sovereignty is enduring, this dominion imperishable. Hope is a coworker with love, and through these two all blessings are ours, lifting us at last into that eternal reunion for which the heart has ever yearned.

INTERNATIONAL PEACE GARDEN

MARTIN L. DAVEY

We take pleasure in publishing the following address delivered over the radio by Mr. Davey, the Tree Expert, on Easter Sunday. This man of vision gives an interesting description of the wonderful project of an International Peace Garden to be created somewhere on the boundary line between the United States and Canada. The hundred years of peace between these two enterprising countries is one of the most significant evidences that nations can live together peaceably with no deprivation to themselves but only gain and progress, hence the value of such a Memorial Garden.

FRIENDS everywhere, today I would like to tell you about the proposed International Peace Garden, which is to be created somewhere on the boundary line between Canada and the United States.

This inspiring project is sponsored by the National Association of Gardeners, an organization of nature lovers, whose lives are devoted to the work of maintaining beauty on private and semi-private places and in public parks. It is one of the most unselfish, and beautiful, and far-reaching undertakings that one could imagine, and should have a powerful appeal to the finest instincts of the people in these two great neighborly nations.

The idea was conceived in the noble spirit of Henry J. Moore, Lecturing Horticulturist for the Province of Ontario. It was proposed at the annual convention of the National Association of Gardeners in the City of Toronto last August, and was received with moving enthusiasm and with the fervor of a great crusade. Without a dissenting voice and in the spirit of earnest purpose, it was decided to accept the heavy responsibility of sponsoring this monumental project.

For more than a hundred years, peace has reigned inviolate between the peoples of Canada and the United States. No finer example of neighborliness or enduring friendship could be found in the world than that which exists between these two adjoining countries of the North American Continent.

How appropriate it is, then, that an International Peace Garden should be created on the imaginary boundary, half on one side and half on the other. It is proposed that this Garden shall be a thousand or more acres in area, and that it be located some place on the line where it will be accessible to the greatest number of people.

In it will be planted all the varieties of trees, and flowers, and shrubs that can be grown in this latitude—beautiful living things that will speak more eloquently of the fact of peace and the will to peace than any towering monument built of cold and inanimate stone. Many of these growing things will be contributed out of the abundance on the private places in both countries, but the work of creating it will require a considerable investment. Then there will follow, in a natural course, the problem of raising a sufficient endowment to maintain it into the long distant future.

It is the plan of the National Association of Gardeners not only to welcome the larger contributions from those who would enjoy helping in a substantial way, but also to make a special appeal to all the school children of Canada and the United States, asking that each one, so far as possible, give just a little so that a multitude may have a part in this great living monument of peace.

It seems to me that no more useful thing could be done than to enlist the school children in this spiritual and intellectual stimulation. To think peace is to live peace. To think it actively and consciously is to build up in the on-coming generation the spirit and the will to peace. If we receive nothing more than the development of this fine philosophy of neighborly living, we will have been compensated a thousand times for all the effort and all the cost.

In Holy Writ, we find a powerful bit of logic: "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." If in the development of this worthy project, the sponsors of the movement can cause the children of Canada and the United States to think the language of peace and to be inspired by its idealism, the results will be more substantial and lasting than have been achieved by the brilliant statesmen since the beginning of civilization. Nor will it be easy for cunning politicians to undo the effectiveness of this inbred philosophy.

We can visualize this International Peace Garden as a thing of impressive beauty, where in a short space of time foliage and flowers will vie with each other to produce a quiet elegance and a glorious charm that will lure the nature lovers of this continent and the world.

Yes, it will be the Mecca of unnumbered thousands of those who love the beauties of nature and those who are moved by the spirit and purpose of peace.

In this Garden the living, growing things will symbolize the development of an enduring friendship and will typify the substantial character and spiritual force of two great peoples. This outdoor beauty will be the handmaiden of fine human qualities and will express in eloquent fashion the deep-seated purpose of lasting peace that has operated so powerfully for more than a century, and that is more firmly imbedded within us now than ever before.

About it all will be an atmosphere of admiration and respect that will be akin to reverence. Deep in the hearts of all normal human beings there is a longing for the blessings and the fruits of peace. These beautiful growing things will express in a sublime way the hopes and aspirations of the people of two nations that have lived side by side without conflict as an example to the world.

Man could build countless monuments of steel and marble, and place them at frequent intervals along the extensive boundary line, but each one would be cold and forbidding and could not kindle the fires of enthusiasm in a single human breast, nor inspire one mortal being to loftier sentiment.

There is something about this idea of an International Garden, with living trees and flowers and shrubs, that stirs the imagination. It seems to be so fitting for this purpose. It is such an appropriate manifestation of human ideals. It is so expressive of the finer qualities of human nature. It is at once satisfying and uplifting.

Year after year innumerable people will travel to see it and will think the thoughts of peace. They will be moved to a keener realization of the fortunate circumstances under which we are permitted to live as friends and mutual well-wishers. They will carry back home with them a new sense of their own responsibilities as neighbors.

Pictures of this International Garden should hang in every school-room in Canada and the United States to proclaim its meaning and its purpose. Stories of it should be told in lofty sentiment to every new class of children that will be the citizens of tomorrow. It should be proclaimed from every pulpit and told with enthusiasm in the quiet of every fireside.

This undertaking appeals to me as a thing of highest value and far-reaching possibilities in the thinking and the living of both peoples. It will not and should not detract in the slightest degree from the patriotism of Canadians for Canada, or Americans for America. We expect Canadians to be loyal to their own country, and they expect the same thing of us. No person would be worthy of citizenship in either country if he were not patriotic toward the land of which he is a part. But we have been neighbors for a long time, and we shall continue to live side by side in peace and friendship and in mutual respect, so long as we have the character to understand the rights of each other and the capacity to live and act on the plane of higher civilization.

The National Association of Gardeners deserve the fullest commendation of all peace-loving citizens for their willingness to assume the responsibilities of so large an undertaking in the interest of us all. They should have the lasting gratitude and the cordial support of every manly man and every noble woman, in whose veins runs the blood of honor, and whose mind is ruled by the processes of reason and human idealism. I bespeak for them the most generous and enthusiastic support. Our loyalty to the cause which they represent will be rewarded by an International Garden of Peace that will speak powerfully to the people of our own time, and carry the message of friendship and good will to many unborn generations.

It is said by some that there will always be war, and it is possible that mankind as a whole has not reached that stage of development where the scourge of war can be permanently removed from the world. It is also possible that crafty and selfish tyrants may disturb the peace of mankind here and there. It is conceivable also that in some places self-seeking and designing politicians may lead their people astray. But it will not be in response to the popular will, except where people are deceived and misled.

The desire for peace and its benign benefits is instinctive with every normal father, and is a basic impulse that surges through the heart of every mother who has gone down into the dark valley to bring a new babe into the world.

The people, the great masses who make up each country, want peace. The higher the civilization which they have been permitted to attain, the more definite and fixed is the conviction that they have a right to live in peace, and to work out their individual destiny unhampered and unscarred by the ravages of war.

How appropriate it is, in this significant period when sincere efforts are being made by the leaders of the great nations of the world to arrive at mutual understanding and to provide a more permanent basis for world peace, that this International Garden should be projected! What a happy thought it is that inanimate steel and marble should be eliminated from its being, and that no cannon or other sign of strife should have any place in its creation or existence! It is to be just an immense garden of growing things where beauty reigns and where friendship is the theme.

Canada and the United States have offered to the world an example that is worthy of admiration and emulation. We have lived as neighbors without the necessity of armed strife for more than a century. There lies between us an imaginary dividing line of some three thousand miles in length. Not a fort or a battleship has been found necessary along that far-flung border. Not a soldier needs to be stationed there. We have business and social and political intercourse without the remotest necessity of military maneuvers. We understand each other. Each people forges ahead to its own logical destiny in its own way, and each respects the rights of the other.

These impressive facts constitute a magnificent tribute to the character of the people of both nations, and are evidence of a form and degree of civilization that should be a source of enduring satisfaction to all who are permitted to be citizens of either country. What a lesson it is to the world, and what a challenge to the cynics who have no faith in the capacity of human beings to live rightly in relation to their neighbors.

There could be no more fitting evidence of the friendly spirit and the understanding of the people than the creation of this significant International Peace Garden on the boundary line, where men and women and children may go to admire the living, growing things and to be inspired by the beauties that they see everywhere about them, to live and act the ideals of peace, both as individual citizens and as essential parts of either great nation. All the eloquence of Demosthenes, all the logic of Cicero, and all the mastery of Shakespeare cannot compare with the powerful appeal of the International Peace Garden to the hearts and minds of those who live upon this continent, and those from other lands who come to see, with minds that understand and hearts that comprehend. The language of trees and flowers and shrubs, though mute and inaudible, will be more eloquent and more convincing than the language of statesmen, philosophers and poets. This International Peace Garden will proclaim the lofty spirit of two great countries. Yes, it will be a glorious and beautiful picture of the soul of the people.

SONGS OF LIFE

AFTER SEEING THE MOVING PICTURE OF 'ABDU'L-BAHA

He walked the earth once, patient and tender
 And the Light
 Of Heaven shone around Him.
 All who saw Him
 Felt the joy and peace and love.
 Shall we forget?
 Nay, still He walks among us.
 We are blind,
 Wrapped in a storm of self.
 His sun still shines
 Into the hearts of men.
 Reach forth your hand, my brother,
 Here is mine.
 Clasp we in deathless love
 This shining hour.
 Then when the storm shall fold us
 Once again
 In its gray fury, though we see not clear,
 Still hands shall clasp, and hearts
 Shall still remember.
 And the temptation shall lead unto light,
 And the light shall shine.
 It shall flame till it burn away Desire and doubt.
 And then shall come a river
 Deep and clear
 To sweep away the ashes
 And leave naught
 But white sand shining sweet and clean
 Unsoiled by struggle.
 And then shall come a voice, Saying—
 I was the doubt and the desire
 The light, the flame, the river
 And the sands,
 I was the struggle and the triumph.
 I am God.

PREMATURE

In a sweet hour when my heart
 Was filled with joy,
 I said to God, "I love you more Than all the world."
 And God said, "It is good."
 Next day He took my joy,
 And when I cried
 Aloud in anguish, "Child," He said,
 "Take back thy joy—play yet another year.
 Try not thy wings again till thou art grown."

PURE SPIRIT

My soul went on a pilgrimage
 Through unreality
 This morning when the wind
 Blew all the grass in silver, and the tide
 Ran swift beneath the sun.
 I saw the yellow flowers nodding softly
 By the wall,
 And trees agleam with cobwebs thickly strung
 With sunfilled dew.
 I saw the myriad seagulls drifting white
 Down tides that ran from blue to wine-red purple Hastening out to sea.
 I saw the wide clear sky
 Grow hot with light.
 My soul went on a pilgrimage through these
 In search for God.
 And when I found Him, far beyond them all,
 I heard Him say—
 "Dear child, you brought Me with you.
 Now return,
 And find Me—everywhere."

WAITING

Dawn, pour thou into my soul,
 For I am a pool,
 Waiting thy sea of light.
 All night the marsh grass waved
 Between me and the sky
 Fine lines of thought and dream,
 Keeping the sky from me.
 But now the wind of love
 Has swept me clean.
 Dawn, pour thou into my soul.
 I am a pool,
 Waiting—waiting for thee.

TO 'ABDU'L-BAHA

I am too small To love God truly.
 Yet,
 Because I love You,
 I sing songs
 To God.
 This be Your part—
 To kindle song,
 A flame,
 Upon the altar of my heart.

"One of the functions of the sun is to quicken and reveal the hidden realities of the kingdoms of existence. Through the light and heat of the great central luminary, all that is potential in the earth is awakened and comes forth into the realm of the visible. The fruit hidden in the tree appears upon its branches in response to the power of the sun; man and all other organisms live, move and have their being under its developing rays; nature is resplendent with countless evolutionary forms through its pervading impulse; so that we can say a function of the sun is the revelation of the mysteries and creative purposes hidden within the phenomenal world."

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE INFINITE abundance which characterizes the phenomena of the natural world is nowhere more striking than in the physical life of the sun. This great cosmic center of life and heat to its surrounding planets is pouring forth energy with a profligacy which can only be explained upon grounds of infinite supply. It must be realized that the sun's rays are going out into space in every direction. What the average person does not appreciate is the astounding ratio of the total daily radiant energy of the sun, as compared with the microscopic amount of it received by this planet and making possible our life, health and happiness. It has been estimated by recent astronomers that only about a two-billionth part of the active energy of the sun is intercepted by this planet. In other words, the sun could with equal ease and without the expenditure of one iota more of energy, light and heat two billion other planets the size of the earth at the same time that it is caring for our needs.

When we survey this astounding vitality and superabundant energy of the sun and its so lavish expenditure of power disbursed into space, we come face to face almost with Infinity itself; for the relation of this total energy of the sun to the actual work accomplished upon its planets, bears almost the proportion of the Infinite to the finite. Certainly from every practical point of view, we may assert that the sun not only has, but is actually giving out, infinite supplies of energy. Here we have a picture in nature of a supply so rich and abundant as to be impossible of exhaustion or even of complete utilization for the utmost of man's needs.

A SIMILAR lavishness characterizes all of the phenomena of nature as we know it, both in the heavens and upon this earth. Two thousand island universes are conceived to occupy sidereal space, of average size equal to our own island universe the Milky Way, and separated by inconceivable and vast voids. Such is the grandeur of the scale upon which nature works in the cosmos as a whole. Or if we turn to our own microscopic planet, we find again the same lavishness expressed in all phenomena of natural life in the tremendous scale upon which life is created in its lower levels in order to eventuate in Man.

Only in the life of man himself do we observe circumscription, lack, and destitution; while in the world of nature everything bespeaks of lavish generosity on the part of the Creator and of a bounty which is infinite in its supply.

Man has created in his own world a mode of life in which want is more characteristic than plenty. Why is this? Let us not assume that such a situation was intended by the Creator. Shall He lavishly expend so vast a quantity of precious solar energy upon a void, and yet, pinch humanity—the highest expression of creation—with want and deprivation? It is impossible to conceive that the Creator works in such a way. No, the same abundance was intended for man as for the natural world, not only was intended but exists on the plane of reality. It is man's own wilfulness and selfishness which have caused human society to become so characteristically limited in its supplies as proportioned to its needs.

It is not the fault of nature that people have not enough to eat, but the fault of our economic system which is based almost wholly upon the self-seeking and exploiting attributes of man. How is it possible that there is not enough wheat to eat when economists are telling us that the farmers are producing too much. The fact is that much wheat now produced is not being sold; and so with cotton and other staples. The earth produces abundantly for man. But humanity, having arrived at no adequate way of distributing this lavishness, sits down in want and deprivation and permits the consumer to be in need at the very moment when the producer is suffering economically because it is said there is no market for his goods.

AGAIN LACK is evidenced in the matter of the use of power as at present discovered or invented by the human race. Inventions which might extend power more cheaply to the whole of humanity are held back because they would lessen the profits of present capitalists. The aim of society as a whole seems not to be to find out how cheaply the blessings of nature can be disbursed to every individual, but to find out how most successfully to center and focus her blessings upon the few who have power and brains enough to establish monopolies. Thus it is that while some suffer from a very plethora of wealth the majority of humanity faces a bare subsistence and are deprived of all comforts and of many necessities.

Is this the universe that we see as the telescope looks out into space? No! The astronomer sees visions of infinite power and blessings for humanity in the subatomic energy of the sun. While economists are bewailing the exhaustion of the earth's coal deposits, astronomers are preaching the discovery of infinite supplies of power from the atom, or from the very space about us. But, undoubtedly, this discovery is to be held back from humanity until universal peace is established together with a divine order of civilization which assures a just and kindly distribution of economic wealth.

LET US try to conceive of the ease and comfort which would accrue to humanity when an infinite source of power easily and cheaply applied to the needs of man should become available. This power could be used to create nitrogen from the air and otherwise to increase fertilization of the soil; to irrigate waste spaces; to speed up production. It would create, with the genius of man at the helm, a superabundant supply of all agricultural and textile needs of man. The same power applied to manufacturing would assure a wealth of goods such as now we can hardly conceive. Distant travel would be brought within the reach of the most humble individual, and the application of such efficiency to the machinery already in the world would assure more leisure to workmen.

All this, however, is dependant upon the reorganization of humanity in terms of service rather than of exploitation, otherwise this power might be used to still further enslave the guileless and humble. The new divine civilization must be dedicated to humanity as a whole; and the greatest genius of the human race in the future must be spent not so much in production as in the problems of distribution.

It takes no great stretch of the imagination to realize that the great law of abundance which reigns throughout the cosmos is destined to apply to the economic life of man both as an aggregate and as an individual.

Let us realize that deprivation as humanity knows it at present is purely its own creation. And let us reach out for those means which God has given us for creating a world of peace, of plenty, of joyousness. This can come about only when the divine civilization, the pattern of which has been given us by Bahá'u'lláh, is established.

"Now concerning our social principles, namely, the teachings of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh spread far and wide fifty years ago, they verily comprehend all other teachings. It is clear and evident that without these teachings progress and advancement for mankind are in no wise possible. Every community in the world findeth in these divine teachings the realization of its highest aspirations. . . . Should these sublime teachings be diffused, mankind shall be freed from all perils, from all chronic ills and sicknesses. In like manner are the Bahá'í economic principles the embodiment of the highest aspirations of all wage-earning classes and of economists of various schools . . . all shall bear witness that these teachings bestow a fresh life upon mankind and constitute the immediate remedy for all the ills of social life."

THE NEW ECONOMICS

DALE S. COLE

The author, whose frequent articles have proved of great interest to the readers of The Bahá'í Magazine, is an electrical engineer of Cleveland, Ohio, and is a deep student of economics.

AFFAIRS of business account for a good portion of life spent on this planet, perhaps justly so, for an active, effective life is good. However, the old adage "business is business" is not as apt or relevant as it may have been in the past, and some business leaders are expressing thoughts which are both interesting and startling.

An attitude seems to be developing which holds that mere statistics and the technical interpretations thereof, are not altogether sufficient to place in the hands of those interested, all of the data necessary to shape the course of common endeavor towards that which will result in the greatest good for the largest number.

Agreement is fairly general that business which does not so result—is not sound business. It is also generally indicated that, aside from the benefits themselves, human progress is predicated on sound business, because commerce and industry have profound influences on social conditions.

Sound business may not, however, always insure uninterrupted periods of maximum commercial activity. This contingency may not be an untempered calamity.

A very well known man has stated that he believes periods of business depression are not without their chastening effects. During prosperous times wasteful practices flourish. Carelessness grows and crime increases.

When business is poor and there is much unemployment, men are jolted out of their neat complacency. They fear because they are unable to control the situation. Instinctively they turn to higher things, to their Creator, seeking encouragement and consolation. Waste is stopped. Efforts are redoubled. Faith increases.

It has been suggested that when fifty-one per cent of the people actually decide to render real service—then prosperity results. A small majority influences mundane affairs. May not even smaller numbers, working in unity, be yet more effective towards spiritual advancement?

The recent cataclysmic changes in the business world of the United States focuses attention on a factor which has been assuming increased importance for some time. Other matters have received more attention for a variety of reasons, but it can no longer be doubted that there is a great and general shift of human interest from politics to economics. Among the greatest problems of the next decade, and thereafter, will be found those of economic relationships.

People are not now so much interested in political matters either as regards their own internal national problems or those of international character. They do not want to fight or bicker. They want to work peacefully, to acquire a competence, and to enjoy some leisure. They are beginning to realize the importance of the spiritual nuances of life.

If opportunities are to be realized to work peacefully, to acquire a competence, and to have time for the better things of life, it is being learned that we must look to the realm of economics and not to the turmoils of politics to bring about the desired conditions.

Economics is the mechanism through which existing ills must be attacked and treated; but the inspiration, the drive, must come from fundamentally deeper sources.

Recently, Mr. Calvin Coolidge said that "we must put first things first," "set small store by things which are temporal," and strive "mightily for the things which are eternal." He reminds us that "we cannot give all our thought to material success. We cannot be relieved of all hardships. We should not faint at the first obstacle."

And there are obstacles. One of them is the purely national idea of economic welfare; the rather limited and short-sighted idea that one nation need not consider the well being of other nations. But there are indications that this attitude is undergoing revision.

The international aspects of trade are being forced on the attention of every nation and its thinkers. For instance, the United States has been for some time now a great creditor nation and at the same time has enjoyed a favorable balance of trade. We have loaned much money abroad and continued to export more goods than we imported. This it is said, cannot go on indefinitely. There will come a time when we must accept more goods from abroad.

How will an excess of imports over exports affect many of our industrial and social conditions? There may be many answers to such a question but the important part is that we can no longer ignore the possibility. World trade, international cooperation and good-will assume increasingly important prospects in this age of new economic relationships.

What of the threat of a tariff war? We erect high barriers to keep out foreign goods in an effort to keep our own wheels turning. Reprisals on the part of other nations are not unreasonable and instead of cooperative, smooth course of international trade, a retrogressive and dangerous situation may not be improbable.

Tariff walls are only one of several kinds of obstacles which must be eliminated or circumnavigated if world trade is to fulfill its highest function. There are also geographical lines, limitations of speech, racial prejudices, and religious bigotry to overcome.

World trade will assume increasing importance as the years go by. It offers the only chance of doing things on the large scale which seems necessary to the newer economic laws which hold sway. World trade cannot be carried on advantageously if hampered by too narrow nationalism, prejudice, suspicion and selfishness.

Mr. Owen D. Young recently pointed out that "we may sign great declarations of peace, but we shall concurrently find, if we follow a narrow economic policy, an increasing resistance in countries less well off than ourselves, to that disarmament which is the insurance of the peace that we seek."

When mass production has once gained headway, there is need for ever-increasing markets. Normal obsolescence of things purchased is not sufficient to keep the mill wheels whirring, nor does population increase rapidly enough to provide the needed outlets. Wider and wider markets are necessary. Where but in foreign fields can these be found?

That our mass production machine has brought a high standard of living is generally admitted. It is unthinkable that such a standard should regress. It has its ills, many of them, but there are great advantages. In other parts of the world, can the standard of living be improved by similar methods, and if so can we learn to use advantageously the leisure resulting? How can a great international productive mechanism function except through close cooperation of the component parts?

A new business philosophy is forming. The United States preaches, from recent experience: machine production, high wages, shorter hours, greater purchasing power. Spend, that the wheels may be kept turning; that you may have wages to insure purchasing power. Incidentally it has been found that the more leisure, the more wants; the more time to spend the greater the consumption.

Europe has not yet held with all of this. Their program has been low wages, long hours, thrift. Europe has not thrown off post-war depression. The United States has apparently forged busily ahead. Which philosophy will you choose?

Somewhere between these extremes will there not be found that which will define progress as that which brings the greatest good to the largest number?

Be that as it may, the requirements of expanding commerce are forcing a better international attitude. Business cannot and does not wait for the flag. Economics outstrips politics.

As world trade increases among nations, and it must increase, there will be more and better intercourse even though the needed international language is not yet adopted. There will be closer acquaintanceship, broader understanding.

Economically, Europe is a group of water-tight compartments. Each country is marked off not only by geographical and racial boundaries but by economic restrictions and regulations. It is beginning to be recognized that this may be one of the reasons for sluggish commercial recovery and advancement.

Economically these barriers are liabilities. Socially they are a handicap to better race relationships. Spiritually they impede the universal realization of the brotherhood of man and the oneness of mankind.

Back of every change, every trend, every step—there are significances.

Sometimes it seems as if man had failed in trying to bring about, voluntarily and effectively, better conditions in the world; and that economics is taking these matters out of his incompetent hands and under the guise of business expediency bringing about many desirable improvements.

The world has great tasks to perform, much business to transact, many wants to fulfill. And in fulfilling these wants according to the dictates of science, social conditions will be greatly effected, the mode of life will be universally and continuously bettered. It seems that these great changes are intimately associated with the application of science to commerce and industry and that the mechanization of life has much to do with it. The machine must be made to serve man, and apparently it can best do so when running at high speed.

In order that the industrial machine may function efficiently as a machine and as an influence towards human progress, adequate markets are required. These can only be obtained through world trade; world trade in a broader and yet more intimate sense than it has been realized before, wherein not only commodities are traded, but wherein many intangible services and reciprocities draw peoples closer together.

In the panorama of life a number of interesting pictures may be projected. These will have to do with—

1. The effect of the increased use of machinery on human life both here and abroad. Sufficient is being said about this in the press of the moment to indicate its importance.

2. The problem of what mankind will do with the increased amount of leisure in prospect.

3. The necessity of better international understanding and cooperation.

4. A deeper interpretation of business statistics.

5. A broader conception of the function of business.

6. The increased importance of economics and the relatively decreasing interest in politics.

7. Agriculture's place in the commercial scene.

8. Our attitude towards work.

9. A sincere desire to know the truth.

In all of this, international aspects seem to be assuming greater and greater importance. In a recent editorial in The General Electric Review may be found these admonitions:

"We must think internationally; politics must break down some of her artificial barriers. Statesmen must heed the voices of Science and Economics. There is no permanent blessing in being too rich to be loved and there is no serenity in being over much envied."

Thus is the warning sounded as regards the United States. Will we heed it? Will we assume leadership in the solution of the problems of economic relationships which confront the world and back of which lie deeper and more significant factors, those things which affect the spiritual life and well being of every individual?

Mr. Owen D. Young has voiced a powerful plea—

"I pray for sober and sensible responsibility, a spirit of friendliness and helpfulness and cooperation for all, a spirit of restraint in the use of power which has been entrusted to us, and most of all, restraint in speech.”

Does it not seem that with the great currents of constructive thought which are surging through the business world there are forces back of these conditions and trends and changes which although more or less obscure are nevertheless powerfully active in bringing about a betterment of conditions?

Does it not seem as if these forces are working, not only to bring about the necessary changes, but to stimulate mankind to a realization that these forces can be relied upon? Are we not gradually casting away our cumbersome method of trial and error and learning to reason more effectively?

And does it not seem that in becoming more familiar with these forces man will realize that he may have mistaken means for the end, that in the final analysis the mere machinery of business is not the essence of the problem? Final results are paramount, and no results which do not contribute to the greatest good for the largest number are acceptable.

Perhaps we are beginning to realize that we have not appreciated the real purpose of life, and that when we do we will not be content to let economic necessities drag us along, but will assume the active directorship of laws, bending them to the common good, and shaping the destiny of mankind according to the great purpose.

According to the Bahá'í Revelation the fundamental forces are divine, and man's duty is to so orient his activities that he may become the channel for their operation.

Commercial success is not the end of life—it is but a means towards the physical and spiritual advancement of the world.

This definition in no way restricts man's endeavors. It enhances them, and we are taught that the daily tasks of this work-a-day business world, when carried out in the proper spirit, are high forms of worship.

“Material affairs are of two kinds. The first kind are those concerns which have no direct relation to life. They contribute toward luxury, effeminacy, indolence. Indulgence in these things makes one negligent of God and stifles all traces of spirituality. The other kind are those affairs which contribute toward the maintenance of livelihood, adding to the comfort, happiness and progress of the human family. Spiritual Powers come always to the assistance of such affairs, they increase the moral insight and responsibility of man and add to his awareness and mindfulness.”

2.—Hamadan

This is the second installment of the serial story by Miss Root concerning her experiences in Persia. The first article which described her visits from Baghdad to Kirmansháh, was published in the July number.

 FEW miles out from Hamadan, the Spiritual Assembly of nine came out in a motor car to greet us; yet a little nearer and there were nineteen other cars and several of these were filled with ladies. Twenty automobiles in which were Bahá'í brothers and sisters, came into the city with us. It was a triumph for the unity of the East and the West.

“Not even emperors and kings have twenty motor cars awaiting their approach,” said our Hamadán friend laughing. He was the one who had accompanied us from Kirmansháh.

The guest was taken to the hotel and a little reception followed. Many of the Hamadán Bahá'ís are Jewish and they seem to have considerable freedom in serving the Bahá'í Cause. Perhaps the mullahs think that as long as the Jews have never accepted Islám it does not matter if they change their faith to the Bahá'í belief. But among those five thousand Bahá'ís in Hamadán there are many wonderful Muhammadan Bahá'ís too, who previously had been most bitter against the Cause. Also there are many Bahá'ís there who cannot openly declare their faith.

On the way to the Bahá'í schools and to the Bahá'í Headquarters' buildings we pass through a little square where rest the tombs of Esther and her uncle Mordecai. Who will be the new Esther in this City of Hamadán? A visit to the Bahá'í Girls' School makes one think that in that assembly of splendid girls she may be being trained here and now. In this excellent School for Girls and in the fine Bahá'í Boys' School are many hundreds of students. Non-Bahá'ís also send their children there because these institutions have a very high standard.

All the Baha'í youth of Hamadán are being trained to take their places on all committees, to become Bahá'í speakers and teachers and to write about the Cause.

During my stay of three days I lectured before five hundred and fifty people at each session, and each time it was to different believers. Every guest came by invitation, presenting a card at the door. No hall is large enough to hold them all, and few cities in Persia can have even as large Bahá'í gatherings as these. Bahá'í delegates came from several villages around Hamadán to greet the sister from the West.

During my journalistic work I visited the Mayor of Hamadán, Mr. Gholam Reza Afkhami; and the Head of Western Education of Persia, Mr. Ali Ashraf Mumtaz. Both men are keen workers for the progress of Irán and both are optimistic that Persia is going forward to a great era. The Mayor had been a general and he was in full uniform. He said that Persia is safe for travel. The sole credit for this secure and progressive Persia, he said, is due to His Imperial Majesty Shahanshah Pahlevi.

Certainly the writer thinks that this great Shah is a benefactor not only to Persia, but to all humanity, for in this universal cycle, in the family of nations each member must be reliable, dependable, in order that all may be in peace and able to progress. During the reign of this present Shah there has been more justice, tolerance, and kindness than with any preceding Ruler, of that long preceding line of the Kajar dynasty. Those rulers were born to excessive luxury and to despotism, but His Imperial Majesty Pahlevi, Shahanshah, was a soldier, then a general, later Minister of War and then Prime Minister. He has come from the people; he knows hardships, sufferings; and his experiences have made him considerate for others and liberal and fair. Only a soldier, a general, Shahanshah could have brought about the unity, the safety and the progress of Irán.

MR. ALI ASHRAF MUMTAZ, Head of the Education Department of West Persia with headquarters at Hamadán, in an interview, said that the plan of the Government is to increase the number of primary schools throughout the country. The higher institutions of learning will be in the cities. He showed how public education has progressed more in the past nine years with His Imperial Majesty Pahlevi Sha-hanshah than during the fifty years that went before. The writer thought of Lord Curzon's words and saw his plan fulfilled before her very eyes. This great English writer had said: "If I had any voice in the regeneration of Persia, I would not bring out a company in London but I would organize a coup d'état in the village schools."

One of the greatest secrets of the present Shah's remarkable reign is that he has introduced new methods in education, education for girls as well as boys, and education for the nomad tribes. Mr. Mumtaz said that the very nomad tribes who at first rebelled against the introduction of schools now are sending requests to the government for more schools and more teachers. This western Persia is the most backward part of the entire country, because it is here among the mountains that many tribes have been living the migrating, wandering life of nomads. The government is trying to get them settled on lands and grouped in villages, but of course this takes time. Some of the children of the chiefs are brought to Tihrán and educated in the government schools.

Mr. Mumtaz has established a library for western Persia. Courses have been introduced in sewing and carpentry in some of the schools, while in a factory some pupils learn to make Persian rugs, and a few boys are being trained as fine tool-makers.

"We are delighted with the American system of education" said Mr. Mumtaz. When the writer asked him what the United States could do to help Persia, he replied that it would be a great service if American educators could come and give lectures on the American system of public instruction, or if they could send books. He himself studied in Paris and while there he met Madame Hippolyte Dreyfus-Barney who has done so much for education in France and in the educational section of the League of Nations. She would be welcomed very warmly in Persia if she could come and speak.

The writer suggested that it might be very good if a group of American experts, each a high authority in his particular work, could make a trip through Persia—an educator, an industrialist, a business man and an agriculturist. Mr. Mumtaz said it would be excellent. This is not at all impossible, for several distinguished men in the United States have expressed the wish to make a tour of Persia.

I told this educator that my journey really is an experiment. If friends in Europe and the United States learn that traveling is safe and that westerners are very welcome visitors, they would like to come and travel in every province of Persia, for Persia is one of the most interesting and enchanting lands of Central Asia. So far comparatively few tourists, scholars, writers and educators have ventured long stays in this ancient country. Now Persia, just as Albania and Turkey, is interesting itself in active plans to attract the tourist world to come here.

IT WAS HARD to leave the beautiful Bahá'í friends of Hamadán who had been so kind, so loving; and to say good-bye to the non-Bahá'í officials who had shown the utmost courtesy. It was with a hurt in my heart that I had to decline the urgent invitations from delegations from the villages round about who had come to beg me to accompany them to visit their Bahá'í groups. One said reverently as he shook hands with me: "I long to take the hand that has touched Shoghi Effendi's beloved hand." A Khanum said: "We can never go to see the Greatest Holy Leaf, but we thank God we can see you who have seen her." May Bahá'u'lláh bless those deeply spiritual, blessed saints of the villages!

The morning was very cold and some of the friends thought it would be much better to postpone the journey, but cars had come through the day before from Qazvin and the writer felt we ought to start because often the roads fill with snowdrifts and one is detained for weeks. So saying "Alláh-u-Abhá!" to the loved believers of Hamadán, our party started forward towards Qazvin. A Hamadán believer came with us to see us safely to Tihrán.

We certainly "made haste slowly," for after the first fifteen miles a blinding, cutting blizzard began, it took hours to get to the nearest "Coffee house" ahead. We left the car and walked the last few yards. The Persian coffee house consisted of one room, not very large. The floor was the bare earth mixed with snow which had been tracked in, until it was four inch deep oozy mud. One could hardly see for the smoke because forty-five men stood there smoking or ordering tea or food which was being cooked on a hearth of charcoal.

Fortunately there was a little alcove space leading off from this room, and the mule drivers were good enough to come out from it and give it to our party. A bed quilt was brought and hung up as a curtain. The alcove was swept and dusted and a long table brought in and on this my Bahá'í sister and I piled our rugs and camped!

At first we refused tea, thinking the glasses would not be too clean, but later we were only too glad to have the hot fragrant tea, for everywhere in Persia the tea is good, and the coffee-house owner was very kind to us. We discovered, too, that the cups were clean because every cup was given a deluge of boiling water inside and out before being brought to us with the large china pot of tea. We had food enough in the lunch baskets and very good food.

We certainly were very comfortable compared to the nearly three score men standing in the mud in the larger room or sitting on their Persian rugs, which they nearly always carry about with them. These coffee houses are rest houses for the hundreds of mule drivers who can travel with their heavily laden beasts only about fifteen miles in the day, and they sleep in these places. However, the blizzard and deep snow brought many drivers of motor trucks to that house as well as the mule drivers and us.

We spent the night there and all the next day; we broke the window pane built in this mud house in order to get some fresh air. In the early evening, the miracle happened! Motor cars began to come from both directions. They had ploughed through from Hamadán, and the Qazvin cars had forced their way over the mountains. Fifty cars joined the kaleidoscopic ensemble around the coffee-house. After long discussions among the chauffeurs, all decided to move forward and travel all night, the Qazvin contingent started first en route towards Hamadán, but we decided to keep to our original plan and try to reach Qazvin.

It took one hour and a half to get through the drifts into the road ready to start. After a two hour journey, at eleven thirty o'clock that night the cars, some thirty besides the other vehicles had been halted at a little inn and coffee house. The chauffeurs had decided it was not wise to go over the mountain in the night.

All the rooms had been taken by the earlier comers, and our party had to be content with a little room near the coffee house. It had no stove, no furniture at all and we had to put the rugs on the stone floor. A boy brought in a charcoal pan of coals called "Manghal," the coals were not "red" enough and the fumes nearly asphyxiated us.

It was a long night and each one of us was very ill from the intense cold and the fumes, but at four o'clock in the morning the boy came again and brought another pot of fire, this time with the coals a glowing red, and he brought hot tea. At seven o'clock we started forth again in the automobile procession, but soon we outdistanced the other cars and were first in the line.

You will probably never visit the coffee houses of Persia along these motor routes and we never should, had it not been for the snowstorm. Usually the cars go from city to city quickly and travelers can stay in very pleasant, comfortable hotels. This was the worst storm of the year; so if you, O readers, now see Persia in its most difficult season, you can imagine how delightful and easy it would be to go over these splendid mountain roads in the spring when all Irán is abloom with blossoms.

THE BAHÁ'Í RELIGIOUS AND SOCIAL PLAN

ABDUL HUSSEIN ISPHAHANI

THE Bahá'í Religion, the fundamental principle of which is the unity of all humanity, holds in its vision society as a whole in order to bring about a complete reform. Up to the present, the principle cause which has checked the development of the ideals of great reformers and which has prevented the successful spread of their principles, has been the neglect of these reformers to envision the grand reform of human society as a whole, in all phases of human living. They forgot that the life of humanity is an integral whole which cannot easily undergo partial and particular reforms.

These reformers, together with moralists and philosophers, have certainly contributed partially to ameliorating human nature, but the greatest difficulty has always been the limitation of their projects and the gradual dissipation of their efforts, which have ever failed to result in a unified system of total reform.

It is not sufficient merely to consider human misery from the economic point of view neither is it logical to conceive a mode of reform which would be purely religious. It is necessary to undertake a movement envisioning the totality of all these questions, embracing all of human nature and satisfying every need of life. And only from God, the Almighty, through His Divine Mouthpiece or Messenger, could come such divine and inclusive basic Laws.

This is exactly the plan of the Bahá'í Religion the latest and greatest of social and religious movements. It desires a total reform of the life of humanity and the cooperation of all of the members of human society.

But any form of organization destructive to individuality or, conversely, threatening the disintegration of human society by excessive concessions to the individual liberties, is completely contradictory to Bahá'í principles, which seek to establish a durable union and an equilibrium between individual ambition and social forces.

The means taken by the Bahá'í religion for founding such a union are two: first, means purely religious; second, means purely social though based on the Revealed Word.

From the viewpoint of the Bahá'í Movement, the reconciliation of the religious views of man must precede the reconciliation of races, and it is for this reason that it commences its program by religious means.

THE RELIGIOUS MEANS. The Bahá'í Movement considers religion as a dominant factor in human progress, a factor which man cannot dispense with since this factor reappears under other forms more or less fervent.

The Bahá'í religion aims to free religion from all superstitions and all injurious prejudices in order that religion may agree with the fundamental scientific concepts. Every religion which tolerates superstitious prejudices, or which does not conform to established scientific concepts is absolutely useless, is even injurious since it causes a loss of social energy and for that reason ought to be rejected as incompatible with the ideal of civilization.

The great religious need of today is not a reform of a certain sect or reconciliation of different sects of the same religion, but a complete reconciliation of all religions; for in spite of earnest attempts to solve the difficulties within any single religion, there is a constant recurrence of religious differences which tend to be perpetuated in different sects. The only possible solution and the most reasonable one is to meet the problem by considering the common truths in all religions. In essential principles all of the revealed world religions really are in accord, and all of them are expressed in three fundamental ideas: first, the existence of God; second, the existence of the soul and eternal life; third, free will. There does not exist a single religion the moral ideals of which do not essentially conform to all the other religions.

“Bahá'u'lláh promulgated the fundamental oneness of religion. He taught that reality is one and not multiple, that it underlies all divine precepts and that the foundations of the religions are therefore the same.”

The Prophets of God, the Universal Manifestations, are like skilled physicians, and the contingent world is like the body of man; the divine laws are the remedy and treatment. . . . The individual realities of the Divine Manifestations have no separation from the Bounty of God and the Lordly Splendor. In the same way the orb of the sun has no separation from the light . . . the Divine Manifestations are so many different mirrors, because they have a special individuality, but that which is reflected in the Mirrors is One Sun.”

Today the tendency of man toward an international and universal viewpoint in almost all phases of life demands modification in our spiritual attitude. We need a universal religion. Never has need for such a religion been so strongly felt as it is today.

Bahá'u'lláh, the Founder of the Bahá'í Movement, tells us that this renewal of religion, this new spiritual dispensation is the same which has been prophesied by all the other preceding Founders of religion; the very same that has been sought by the majority of reformers and freethinkers. Buddhists, Brahmans, Zoroastrians, Muhammadans, Christians, Jews and freethinkers, have realized in this New Movement their highest religious aspirations, and it need not surprise us to see a new spirit in Bahá'is, a bond of brotherhood, and abandonment forever of all former prejudices and all lamentable hatreds. But in order to have a foundation for a durable union which would never be broken, there must be effective means for conserving it. The religions of the past enjoyed a golden age only at their beginning, but as time went on, disintegration was produced from within, and the theology of man now holds sway.

Among the means for conserving the unity of the Bahá'í Movement I will content myself with mentioning four, the absence of which in other religions have resulted in their ruin.

First, in this new religion the Revealed Word is the sole criterion. Oral traditions even when authenticated are not given much importance. In this way causes which have been the means of quarrels, disputes and religious wars, are once and for all abolished in this Movement.

Second, religious texts must be taken only in their plain meaning without having recourse to subtle interpretations which might cause schisms. It is absolutely forbidden to undertake personal interpretation and to explain away the simple and clear intent of the text. The principle works of Bahá'u'lláh are written in language so clear and so evident that they admit of no ambiguity, and need no professional exegesis on the part of a clergy.

Since religious orders and the profession of the clergy is absolutely forbidden, each one can be his own priest. The function of priesthood thus falls upon all believers, and each Bahá'í is expected to consecrate a certain portion of his life to producing union and progress for all. In other words the Bahá'í religion may be looked upon as a missionary movement which demands democratization of religious instruction and extends its clerical function to all humanity.

Third, the Bahá'í religion goes even further. It concedes the differences which exist in the point of view of men. The intellect of man is not formed from any one model, natural differences and varying gradations clearly exist and add to the types and to the richness of humanity. The conception of a ray of light varies according to the point of view, whether of a scholar or of a simple peasant. But these differences in point of view need not lead to antagonism or to harsh disagreements. Bahá'u'lláh has commanded that if two or several individuals cannot come to an agreement but fall into any kind of antagonism, because of differences of opinion, all of these individuals are in error. Nevertheless, there is to be throughout the Bahá'í world an actual spiritual unity; in other words, spiritual unity based on the Revealed Word without human interpretation.

Fourth, other religions have the misfortune of having had accidental disturbance, due to the existence of individuals who make pretense of divine revelation from God. In this Cause such a thing is not tolerated. Religion must be based on the Revealed Word of God. The Bahá'í Movement considers the spiritual emotions and spiritual life as an essential part of human nature. It is impossible for man to live without faith, without religion.

According to the Bahá'í Movement every man is endowed with a more or less pronounced depth of spirituality. And Bahá'is believe that the Founders of divine religion are the Mouthpieces or Manifestations of God sent to awaken in man neglected aptitudes and reverse the usual mode of life by making the spiritual attitude dominant.

The Bahá'í religion aims at the spiritlessness of modern civilization. The social reformer must commence at the foundation and source itself of human nature. The most direct appeal to the soul of man has always been that of religion.

The intellectual maturity of man today demands a religion more comprehensive; a universal divine religion comprising all that is good in every other divine religion, eliminating from them all that is superstitious; a religion which is able to stabilize the fluctuations of the intellect; which illumines the soul morally; and in a word spiritualizes life and all human needs.

THE SOCIAL PROGRAM. The social program of the Bahá'ís focuses upon the effort to eliminate every sort of misunderstanding which exists between peoples of different races and mentalities, allowing always the emergence and persistence of a spirit of reconciliation. Once understood the social program of the Bahá'í Movement is very easy to promulgate and establish. Having commenced by reconciling the different phases of the religious side of man toward life, attention can now be given to leveling the differences in other directions.

Among these needs the question of language assumes international importance. Bahá'u'lláh, after having expressed His regrets at the loss of time devoted to the study of several foreign languages, envisions an ideal state of things based upon the employment of a universal language which may make of all the world one country. He states in His writings that the agreement and unity of man has always been effected by the Light emanating from the principles of His Cause, and that the greatest principle contributing to this end is that all the peoples of the world should eventually be able to understand the language and the articles of each other. "The rulers or counsellors of the earth must consult together and appoint (choose) one of the existing languages, or a new language, and instruct the children therein in all the schools of the world; and the same must be done with respect to writing also. In such case the earth will be considered as one."

Another question of international importance is universal education. According to the Bahá'ís education ought to be the same in all the schools of the world. The different systems of education at present are so contradictory that it is not surprising that many present misunderstandings come from this source. With a universal world system of education, the possibilities of wars between nations would be reduced.

In order to solve the political and diplomatic differences between nations, Bahá'u'lláh, in 1865, ordered Bahá'ís to work to establish a Society of Nations, and a Court of Arbitration where delegates representing the governments and peoples of the world would meet with equal authority. The ideal and plan of Bahá'u'lláh is to establish Universal Peace in a permanent manner, treating all international disputes and especially the question of disarmament.

The Bahá'í religion also undertakes a reconciliation on the question of division of wealth without revolution and without overturning the social order. It solves the economic problem by methods used both during the life of the individual and at his death: during life by means of graduated taxes on incomes, and at death by inheritance laws.

“Bahá'u'lláh states that a person should be free to dispose of his possessions during his lifetime in any way he chooses, and it is incumbent on every one to write a will stating how his property is to be disposed of after his death. When a person dies without leaving a will, the value of the property should be estimated and divided in certain stated proportions among seven classes of inheritors, namely, children, wife or husband, father, mother, brothers, sisters and teachers, the share of each diminishing from the first to the last. In the absence of one or more of these classes, the share which would belong to them goes to the public treasury to be expended on the poor, the fatherless and the widows, or on useful public works. If the deceased has no heirs, then all his property goes to the public treasury.”*

By this method of taxation and inheritance laws wealth circulates freely and there will be no concentration of capital in a few hands such as exists today.

In order to solve litigation and differences which arise between individuals as well as to meet the need of an administrative order in the Movement, the Bahá'í Movement has what is designated as the House of Justice or Spiritual Assembly. There is a local Spiritual Assembly which is even at present being carried out by Bahá'ís in various centers; there is the National Spiritual Assembly already established in nine countries; and there is an International Spiritual Assembly—not yet established—the members of which will be elected by all the Bahá'ís of the world.

Work among Bahá'ís is considered as the worship of God, and the Bahá'í community is morally obligated to find work for all. “In the Bahá'í Cause arts, sciences and all crafts are counted as worship . . . Briefly, all effort and exertion put forth by man from the fullness of his heart is worship, if it is prompted by the highest motives and the will to do service to humanity.” And this is only one of similar utterances from the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

To elevate the moral level of humanity, Bahá'u'lláh ordered marriage as a definite institution. He insists strongly upon this order, attributing a great number of moral faults to the present weakness of this sacred institution. Alcohol, opium and all sorts of stupifying drugs are absolutely prohibited.

These and many other measures comprehending all the present day needs of humanity establish the foundation of a civilization which will be not only unique and unparalleled in the world's history, but will be the model of the common life of man upon this planet throughout all the present cycle and extending through hundreds of years to come.

1.—Haifa

BEATRICE IRWIN

The author of this series of travel articles, of which this is the first, is an artist by profession. Her contributions to the use of color in illumination have been remarkable. Something of this color sense illumines her literary style.

WHEN one has been waiting ten years to arrive at a place, one is apt to be disappointed, but in reaching Haifa my expectations were surpassed. From the moment that the "Mauretania" cast anchor in the flame-blue bay, a breeze of balm and welcome encircled life and brought fragrance, healing and blossom in its wake. During the six months that held the mystery and marvel of a daily contact with 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Paris (1913) — many commands and prophecies on travel had been given to me and these life has fulfilled in unexpected ways and places, but a culminating experience has been savoured during a nineteen days visit in the Pilgrim House, which is just one of the many glad surprises that awaits us in Haifa, Palestine.

People often ask if the Bahá'í Revelation has its miracles like the ministry of Christ, and when one enters this living foundation that has been built up within the space of a few years at the base of Mt. Carmel, one realizes that here is a tangible miracle of an international, rather than an individual character, and one that arrests and bewilders the attention even in our age of mechanical marvels. But the ways of the spirit are as the ways of love, hidden in deep waters, the strength of whose tides is only dimly gauged by the greatness of the things they bring to pass upon the surface of our vision. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Who spent nearly forty years in Turkish prisons, and was finally only released and allowed to live in Haifa in 1909, has left here a Temple of living deeds to commemorate the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, which tells the message of the new day in action, as well as in the peace and repose of the Holy Shrines that guard the mortal dust of the three Great Ones who have brought Their message of spiritual unity to our distracted day!

There is a deep significance in the fact that this new Light centered at 'Akká, which was the famous capital of the mediaeval crusades, and then that it took as its point of material radiation, Carmel, the mount on which Elijah and the prophets of Jehovah overthrew the priests of Baal; Carmel, which is spoken of in Scripture as a place of "sanctuary and fertility," and not far from which lies Nazareth, and that other "Mount" on which Jesus delivered his Beatitudes.

Continuing the tradition of these blessed spots, we find that the love and labor of 'Abdu'l-Bahá have created on Mt. Carmel a haven of rest and renewal for His followers, and a beacon of inspiration for those who are seeking the Light that the Bahá'í Revelation is offering to the world today. Half way up the mountain are built the homes of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, also those of His three married daughters, and the Persian and American Pilgrim Homes, where "believers" from the four corners of the earth congregated, in earlier years, as the guests of 'Abdu'l-Bahá; and now in these days as the guests of Shoghi Effendi.

Each of these houses is large, cool and roomy; set in gardens fragrant with fruits and flowers; and best of all filled with human beings who tenderly inspired by the overflowing example that has created this abundance, are also striving to become builders of a new humanity. As one gradually contacts the living buds and branches of this spiritual tree, and meets the wife, the sister, daughters, granddaughters, grandsons, friends, and even the servants of the Household, one realizes as never before, what a spontaneous gladness and generosity is contained in the Bahá'í ideal of love. Overflowing and unquestioning is the nature of the hospitality and welcome that awaits us here, expanding our hearts and minds to meet its own penetrating and radiant dimensions. And so the pilgrim's first enlightenment is one of kinship with a larger life, more abstract, and at the same time more intimate. More abstract, because allied so closely to the invisible force that underlies all this Manifestation; and more intimate, because in some strange way the capacities of the individual nature become quickened and startle the human unit into an awareness of his own weakness and strength hitherto unknown.

Outwardly, life flows by daily in a sweet freedom of happy hours. The library and public rooms of the Pilgrim House are at the guest's disposal, and he seeks solitude or companionship as he desires. The Guardian of the Cause, Shoghi Effendi, and other members of the family lunch and sup and visit with us, and their knowledge and thoughts reveal the reality, the purpose, and the history of the Bahá'í Revelation from many a new and broader angle. Each member of the Holy Family seems to embody, both consciously and unconsciously, different aspects of the teachings; its administrative power, its fine discriminations, its soaring courage, its international enterprise, its friendly gaiety, its generous love, its tender devotion and its spiritual aspiration and freedom. These and many other mysteries the vitalized perception of the pilgrim becomes aware of, merely in the simple contacts of life; receiving spiritual grace with daily bread.

And then there are those chosen hours when alone, or in fellowship, the path is taken nearer to the summit of Mt. Carmel, where the shrines of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Báb are set in a nine-terraced garden, whose beauties have already rendered it one of the notable points of interest in Palestine. Travelers of all creeds and countries visit here as they pass through Haifa, and many inquire about the purpose of the square building of golden sandstone, whose nine lofty chambers and strong stately lines constitute a sanctuary for Baháís throughout the world.

At night the facade of the shrine is flood-lighted, and is a golden beacon from afar to all incoming ships.

There is a prophetic and psychologic kinship between this mountain harbor of light, and the splendid new harbor of commerce now under British construction. Combined, they give promise of world peace and world progress, and a fulfillment of the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá Who predicted that Haifa would be one of the most important gates of international communication in the near future.

As the pilgrim walks up the four palm and cypress bordered avenues that form the approach to the Shrine, or as he meditates among the glad abundance of flowers and fruits that fill the terraced gardens, with a view of distant 'Akká where Bahá'u'lláh and the Holy Family were prisoners for many years, he becomes aware of another stupendous miracle that Love has wrought in raising this banner of flowering beauty above the weight of worldly doubt and the slow density of matter. Resting one day in the shadow of a circle of cypress trees on Mt. Carmel, Bahá'u'lláh selected this spot as a fitting point for the resting place of the Báb's ashes. Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá developed the plan of gardens and shrine, radiating them from the same circle of cypress trees that was their point of inspiration. His grandson, Shoghi Effendi, co-operatively with the world-body of Bahá'is, has carried out these plans, perfecting their detail with infinite skill and care, so that in the incredibly short space of seven years the present landscaping has been effected and twenty-five hundred trees of different kinds have been planted to say nothing of the flood tides of roses and stocks, geraniums and other flowers that break in endless waves upon the vision.

In this garden we have a new memorial to Death, and an interpretation of its meaning as the portal of larger life and creative growth. In such a spot there can be no sadness in our hearts, only a sense of strength, peace, joy, and an inspiration to fresh service for world welfare. In the cool silence of the Shrines, each pilgrim receives his individual chart of action, and reads it by the glow of gratitude that must surely flame in his heart.

Much has been accomplished for the waiting world by the Bahá'í Revelation, but so much remains to be done, that the workers, re-born after a pilgrimage to Haifa, must hasten to their destined ends, the inner significances of their stay becoming manifest in works, for in this new dispensation, the essence of faith is that, "Deeds reveal the station of the man!"

Doubtless each season has its charms, but in April the orange trees are in fruit and flower, the slopes of Carmel are crimson, white and gold, with wild anemones, cyclamen, and daisies; the new-turned soils spread bronze and purple weavings between the green valleys, and the nights still preserve that mysterious delicacy and fragrance that is the greatest gift of spring.

Any period of sacrifice, waiting and working that may have to precede a visit to the Master's home, is but the necessary shadow that better fits us to appreciate the renewing light of this rare spiritual experience.

"O Friends! In the garden of the heart plant only flowers of love and withdraw not from clinging to the nightingale of love and yearning."

SEARCHING FOR TRUTH

A SPIRITUAL AUTOBIOGRAPHY

The writer of this interesting article which describes the spiritual evolution of an individual in this day and generation, wishes to withhold his name simply in order that he may dwell more personally upon the details of his life than would seem appropriate otherwise. The picture can be delineated with finer strokes than he would consent to make if his name were published in connection with this true autobiography.

MANY times I have been asked the question, "How did you come to be a Bahá'í?" I might answer this question very briefly stating concretely the grounds upon which I eventuated into this Movement which has so filled my life for twenty years, but such a brief answer would not in reality do justice to the question. I did not so suddenly just become a Bahá'í, as the reader will see in perusing the story of my spiritual life. The fact is I was evolving from early childhood, through my own inner guidance and choice of religious material about me, toward that breadth of modernity characteristic of the Bahá'í Cause which eventually proved the solution of all my spiritual needs.

My religious life has been fairly typical, in its evolution, of the trend of this generation as regards those at least who have earnestly sought a way out from the zealous convictions and fixed theological inheritances of past generations. Not that my parents were exceptionally narrow in their religious beliefs. On the contrary they were more liberal for their day than were their contemporaries. By family tradition, my mother was a Unitarian and my father a Universalist. My grandfather on my father's side had been a religious radical in his day, a powerful thinker and writer and one of the leaders of the Universalist Movement at a time when it was held in great condemnation by the orthodox faith of the day.

Yet with this liberal approach to religion, both my parents were deeply and earnestly pious in their convictions and had not arrived at the point where intellection should begin to cast doubt upon the truths of the Holy Scriptures. Their expanding vision was derived from a more liberal interpretation of the Scriptures, not from any doubt as to the authenticity or scientific accuracy of the bible.

My mother read the bible every day, and introduced the reading of it to her children. On Sunday nights we made a collection of verses in alphabetical order and memorized each verse that we thus collected. In fact, these verses ring in my memory to this day.

It was my mother's greatest delight to lead her family of seven children up the aisle of the church every Sunday, and with herself and husband fill two pews nearly to overflowing. Nothing could stand in the way of this regular and required attendance except illness sufficient to keep us in bed. Age was no criterion. It made no difference as to whether we were able to understand the sermons. Our presence in church from the age we were able to walk was considered in itself to confer inestimable benefits upon us.

The church we thus attended was, by necessity, a Congregational church which was the only church within miles of our home. This is where my childhood faith was staged, a congregation none too liberal—though earnest and in the main cultured and intellectual.

After church came the Sunday school which we also were required to attend. I can recall to this day the sensations peculiar to Sunday, and especially peculiar to the mile walk to church and home from Sunday school on hot summer days. I can recall the rapt stillness in which life seemed to be cast after these hours of devotion, the sacrosaint atmosphere which enveloped everything, the flickering play of sunshine and shade about me as I walked back home, mediating in my childish way on the sacred lessons of the sabbath day.

After the traditional type of Sunday dinner at which all the family were always present, the afternoon was spent in quiet pursuits, only a limited number of which were available to us on this day. The chief recreation was reading, in which the whole family engaged happily for several hours after dinner. This was followed by a walk, usually of three or four miles. At sundown came a family song service, followed by a simple supper, and more reading until bedtime.

Games of all kinds were forbidden. No visiting playmates were allowed us children on Sunday. While it was considered that walking upon the sabbath was a moral exercise, bicycle riding or canoeing were not so classed. Also upon the sabbath whistling was tabooed as unseemly. I can recall an occasion upon which I descended the stairs whistling happily at the beginning of the day, and Father, in his grave voice, said, "Boy, do you know what day this is?" The playing of the piano was not allowed, even to accompany the hymns at twilight.

These old time Christian hymns, beautiful as is their music and spiritual concept, seemed exceedingly mournful and depressive to me as a child, perhaps as much due to the way in which they were sung as to the musical quality of the hymns themselves. However, it seems to me even today that the Christian hymnal has been gradually becoming much too sombre. It was just about the time of my boyhood that the Christian Endeavor Movement found it necessary to pep up its singing service with new songs such as, "There is Sunshine In My Soul Today." I can recall one Sunday evening, when on account of bad behavior I had been sent to bed, the sound of the sombre singing from below effected me with the utmost melancholy and sadness to the point of tears.

WHETHER DUE to this pious environment, to my native disposition, or to accidental causes, I began to read the bible through at the age of seven upon my own initiative. I finished it within a year. From Genesis to Revelation every word was read; even the entire genealogies—Abraham begat Isaac; Isaac begat Jacob, etc.—received due attention, my childish mind not discriminating invidiously regarding the differing material which composed this holy text.

I do not recall any specially momentous event in my spiritual evolution during my preadolescent years, but a marked change came at the beginning of adolescence. At about the age of twelve, the intellect began to present questions which it was difficult for faith to answer. Some of these questions I presented in such a purposely disconcerting manner to my Sunday school teacher—a motherly and little-educated religious matron—that she resigned from the class, and a man was secured who was willing to meet my questions in a more jolly manner but not in any way more satisfying to my intellectual needs. One of the questions I asked was, “If Cain was the oldest son of Adam, what was this far country he went to to get him a wife? Where did its inhabitants come from?” No answer was forthcoming that met with my satisfaction.

Sunday school proving now no joy to my rapidly growing intellect, I made a proposition to my parents which was willingly accepted, that in place of the required attendance at Sunday school I spend the same length of time Sundays in reading the bible. Thus it happened that again I read the bible through, this time at the age of twelve. Now the sacred book began to differentiate itself into passages of dramatic interest, passages of spiritual inspiration, tedious passages which were quickly skimmed over, and curiously exciting passages which if isolated from the bible and published as separate literature would fail to pass a board of censorship.

I now began to think for myself, but remained none the less earnestly religious. My religion was broadening out however in a natural correlation with the broadening intellectual life. Through reading “The Light of Asia.” I became fascinated with Hindu thought and religion. I dipped into theosophy and the occult. And by the time I graduated from high school at the age of seventeen, I had reached such an advanced point of religious liberalism that I chose for my graduation speech the subject, “Beacon Lights of History—Zoroaster, Buddha, Confucius and Christ.” This treatment was a little too advanced for the theology of the educational authorities, who permitted me to speak on the first three in the group of Beacon Lights but eliminated Christ from the list, deeming it unwise that Buddha, Zoroaster and Confucius should be named in His companionship. It seemed a little humorous to me and not at all just to deprive me of an opportunity to deliver encomiums upon Christ as one of the Beacon Lights of the world’s history.

I attended by choice at this time a church in which a liberal Unitarian preached, and found there for the time-being a satisfactory harmony between my spiritual aspirations and my intellectual powers.

College naturally brought to play an important influence upon my spiritual concepts. A class in evolution, by one of the greatest scholars on that subject in the country, brought me in touch with the thoughts of the scientific world, but from a material and not a spiritual angle. For instance, it was to me a great surprise when our professor stated that at one time the cuttle fish were so successful a type upon this planet that they came within an ace of becoming the dominant species. This idea that the happening of man upon the front stage was seemingly accidental, and that some other species might equally well have arrived where man now is, was of course rather disconcerting to the spiritual concept of man as presented in revealed religion. That was however a period of greatest materialism in the theory of evolution. Today it may be said that evolutionists are not so prone to consider the emergence of types as accidental. They are puzzled by the marvelous way in which evolution has moved forward to "homo sapiens," and there is more room in their concepts for a Purpose behind this evolution than there was in the mind of my then professor.

Astronomy brought forcibly to my attention the fact that the Christian theology built up in a period of the old astronomical belief that the earth was the center around which the whole universe revolved was rather incompatible with our new knowledge that the universe is a vast aggregation of solar systems which, as the spectrum tells us, are all of the same chemical elements. Hence they may also be considered to pass through similar development as our own solar system, and to have some form of life perhaps upon them.

I was puzzled by the thought that if this were so, what about Christ being the unique Son of God sent to this planet? If this is the only inhabited part of the universe, the concept fits. But if there are millions of other stars with their inhabited planets, the concept is far too narrow.

I went to a visiting preacher who on Monday (as was the custom) was receiving students wishing to discuss matters of religion, and put this question to him. His answer, that probably there was not another inhabited portion of the universe, did not at all satisfy my dubiousness.

At about this same time I carried some of my most pressing spiritual problems to the President, one of the noblest spiritual characters I have known, formerly a clergyman. In everything else pertaining to our college life I had the greatest reverence for his character and judgment and found his verdicts completely satisfying. But here in this field of spiritual doubt he had no clear message for me. I can recall gaining nothing at all from my conference with him. I went on therefore elaborating a religion of my own which contained a good deal of Buddhism and Hinduism existing side by side in perfect harmony with my Christian concepts.

At about this time, through friends in my native town, I became reinterested in theosophy and read deeply in that fascinating field. This was the first religious movement that I permitted myself to join, and for a year I was a member of the Theosophical Society. Intellectually it was quite satisfying. (I had been browsing in it even some five years earlier.) Its doctrine of Karma* had more influence upon my ethical life than anything I had come across. It had caused me to give up such little peccadillos as trying to beat the railroad of train-fare or the telephone company of the nickel in the slot. I realized that one can gain absolutely nothing from such enterprises, but only can lose. This theosophical presentation of ethics in terms of absolute mathematics is to me still today one of the most impressive of human concepts concerning ethical living.

*Karma—for the sake of those who may not be perfectly familiar with this doctrine—may be explained as a belief that we can never escape the consequences of our deeds whether good or bad, but must pay the last penny for all wrong doing. Thus in reality it would seem that the greatest reward of doing good is to grow better,—because then one ceases to commit deeds which are designed to bring suffering.

A great event in the Theosophical Society of my town proved my undoing as a devoted follower of this mystic cult. This event was no other than the visit of L—, considered at that time to be the most advanced of all Theosophists and one of the great leaders of the movement. My analysis of him as a human character, however, left so much to be desired that I greatly lost faith in the effective possibilities of Theosophy as a religion. For if this was all it was able to accomplish in the way of a paragon, there appeared little inducement for devotion. Soon afterwards, my youthful judgment becoming confirmed by the emergence of strange reports leading to L—'s elimination from the Theosophical Society, I resigned my membership in that movement and found myself once again unattached, and free as any bird to wing my flight into whatever blue empyrian took my fancy.

CONCERNING PRAYER

E. M. GROSSMANN

The following article is reprinted from the "Sonne der Wahrheit" ("Sun of Truth") the official publication of the Bahá'ís of Germany. It has been translated into English by Mr. H. G. Pauli of Brooklyn, N. Y.

THE meaning of prayer has been gradually lost in our Western world. There is scarcely room for it in our busy occidental life and in most of our gatherings one would blush, and under certain circumstances feel like a criminal, should an effort be made to mention anything concerning prayer.

But should we at last have the courage to face our Maker with a little honesty, then we would feel how startlingly unseeing and befogged our eyes have become, because they have forgotten to look to the Light from above; and how our hands have become more and more empty and disconsolate because they cannot be folded in simple childlike supplication.

At various times the Great Ones walked the earth; I mean those who stood nearest to God and Who brought us His Message. They themselves became as the most humble of His creatures. Their teachings transmitted to us from Him, operated with a supernatural power stronger far than mere human power and left an influence which will last forever.

As Christ bowed His Head in the garden of Gethsemane and those Words passed His lips, "Not as I will, but as Thou willest; Thy Will be done;" He built a bridge over which the Divine descends to man, over which God lifts up our little human existence to His Nearness. And with dying lips He fulfilled It for us on the Cross. "Father, into Thy Hands I Commend my Spirit."

Softly the wind played over the heights of the Mount of Olives, a murmur glided along the banks of the Jordan, passed over the waves of the sea of Gennesaret, and the Bridge grew above the localities of the Holy Land and reached to the very ends of the earth.

THE STARS also of the Báb and of Bahá'u'lláh scintillated for a long period of time over the Orient and over the Occident and 'Abdu'l-Bahá lived His Holy Life at the foot of Mount Carmel.

Their deeds were a perseverance in prayer. Their lives formed a continued treading on that path of prayer which builds a bridge between heaven and earth.

In all things in the Divine Creation there is a hidden meaning laid down as a foundation, even in the most insignificant of things. If we are not able to grasp this hidden meaning it is our fault in our undeveloped state of consciousness.

In each of the words and teachings transmitted to us from God by the Divine Messengers, there is a basic hidden meaning and it is the fault of our own limited capacity if we do not recognize it.

The Divine Manifestations of all times have made use of prayer as the most powerful means of arriving at the Court of the Almighty, and at the point of greatest nearness, for They realized God's secret world-conquering power.

Shall we bow our face again in abashment and stand with disconsolate and empty hands?

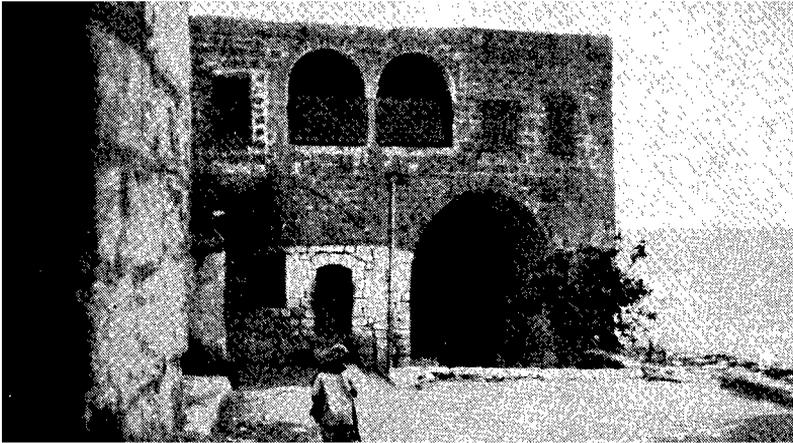

With exquisite fragrance the wind caresses the garden of Carmel. The prophecies have been fulfilled, and at the "end of the days" the Bridge between God and man is erected with renewed power.

THE CAVE OF ELIJAH

WALTER B. GUY, M. D.

N a lovely mountainside near the point of Carmel, the Mountain of God in Palestine, that jutes out its rocky point into the Mediterranean sea, is an ancient cave. Its rounded ceiling is grimed with soot and smoke; its walls are roughly chiseled out of chalky rock; and under the soot and grime one can dimly see ancient writing in letters of Hebrew and Greek. At its far end are two altars for burnt sacrifices—a rounded concavity between—possibly the site of an ancient serpent or some other emblem of divinity. Cut out of the left wall is a rough rocky room where doubtless many have

It is entered by an ancient wooden door and lighted by a barred window nearby. Outside is a courtyard lined by numerous stone houses. It is reached by a short climb up the mountainside from the plain below.

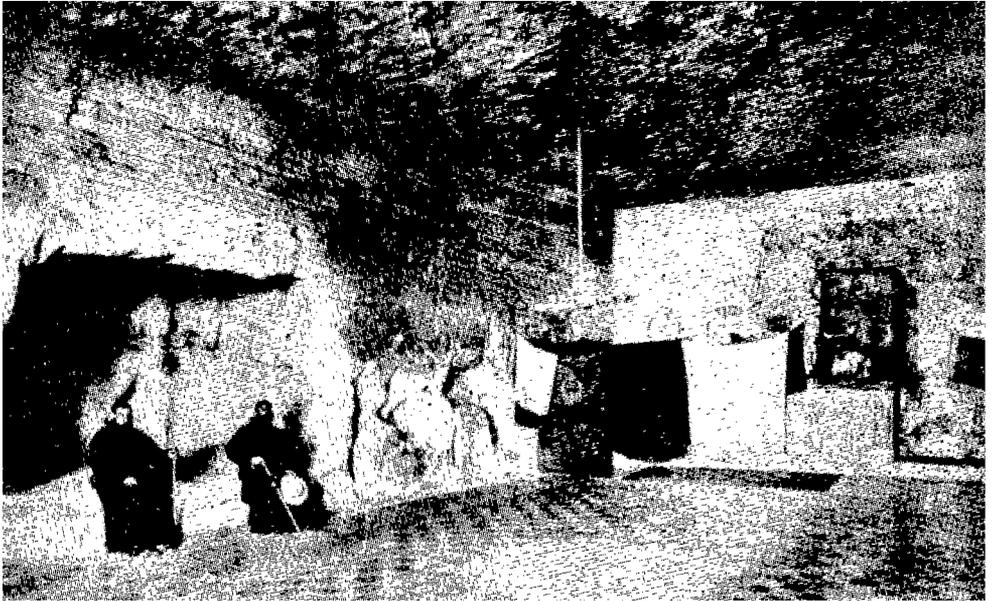

As the writer sat in its gloomy chamber, the picture of long ago came vividly before him. For this gloomy cave is the cave of Elijah the Hebrew prophet of long ago. There, after a drought and famine of three years duration, sat the prophet of God imploring for rain that the curse might be lifted from the land, that God's gift might again pour down, that nature might again be refreshed and renewed, the flowers return and food for the children of men.

This story of long ago tells us how Elijah, after pleading for the return of God's gifts, said to his servant, "Go up now look toward the sea," and he went up and returned and said, "there is nothing." Elijah looked up and said, "Go again seven times." And it came to pass on the seventh time that he said, "Behold there ariseth a little cloud out of the sea like a man's hand."

As we read the story we are told how Elijah's prayer was answered, the rain came and nature was refreshed, food came and the people of the land were saved from famine and despair.

On this rocky mountain and in this gloomy cave the ancient prophets have meditated, taught and prayed. Its walls have echoed to their chants of praise and prayer for many centuries. The lowly Nazarene—the loving Christ—doubtless many times visited this sacred place from nearby Nazareth, and both the Blessed Ones of today—Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá—each have spent three days and nights at this ancient shrine. Did they not, too, pray for rain, the rain of the Love of God upon human hearts and minds, that the flowers of the celestial virtues might spring up and sterile souls become gardens of paradisaical delights. Even today caravans of Bedouin Arabs come with their tents, camels and donkeys; make their sacrifices, chant their prayers, and perform their sacred rites at this ancient shrine.

Nearby lies the little plot of land containing the graves of Bahá'í residents and pilgrims, among which shines the white monument of the revered Dr. Esslemont, while just beyond the courtyard at the side of the rocky path that leads to the mountaintop, is the lonely grave of a pilgrim from far off India who came to worship many years ago.

The waves of the blue Mediterranean sea roll ceaselessly at the foot of this Mountain of God; the azure sky frames the rocky summit with a celestial blue, all is quiet and at peace. But though unseen the army of the celestial heights keeps watch; the sacrifices and prayers made in this ancient cave shall surely be answered; this ancient land, though now filled with prejudice and strife, in God's own time shall be as the prophet of old proclaimed, the abode of heavenly peace, the highway of holiness, and a mirror of the heavenly kingdom.

“The proof of the validity of a Manifestation of God is the penetration and potency of His Word, the cultivation of heavenly attributes in the hearts and lives of His followers, and the bestowal of divine education upon the world of humanity. This is absolute proof.”

A LOOK FORWARD IN MEDICAL SERVICE

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

FREQUENT newspaper items remind us of remarkable medical discoveries, of the great skill in modern surgery, of the millions invested in hospitals and laboratories, yet withal there is a general feeling of dissatisfaction with our medical service both as to its quality and high cost. We feel there is something wrong, perhaps with the methods of administering our knowledge in this science of medicine which Bahá'u'lláh tells us is the "most important of all the sciences." Or perhaps our physicians have not advanced far enough to thoroughly assimilate and properly coordinate the knowledge so recently obtained.

In an article in the June Atlantic Monthly Doctor Ralph Arthur Reynolds, a San Francisco physician, points out the poor showing the United States makes in certain fields of health and medical practice in comparison with much better results obtained in Vienna and parts of Soviet Russia. In each of these places the government has taken over the conduct of health matters, giving free service where necessary, making certain tests and precautions compulsory besides using skillful educational methods. Doctor Reynolds would deplore such socialistic control in our own country, and thinks physicians themselves should awake and reform their practices ere reforms are forced on them by our government.*

Another San Francisco physician, Dr. C. M. Cooper, realizing the need of reform in the habits and practices of physicians in order to forestall government action, has already developed a plan offering relief to overworked doctors and better services to perplexed patients.

In a little pamphlet Dr. Cooper sets out his plan for remedying some of the shortcomings of present day medical service, in such a clear and effective way that it leaves us with a vision of a better day near at hand in this vital field.

Dr. Cooper's plan, briefly, consists in physicians grouping themselves in small "unit service organizations." "Each unit would do one line of work and remain small enough to keep in human touch with all its patients." His own organization consists of four physicians having sufficient skill in all fields of medicine to save patients unnecessary trips to specialists. It includes also nurses, technicians and a secretary or direct-

The Future of Medical Practice—Medical Service Organizations by C. M. Cooper, M.B., San Francisco. Reprint from California and Western Medicine, March, 1930.

*The same note was sounded by Dr. Malcolm L. Harris at the recent meeting of American Medical Association in Detroit (June 23, 1930) when he warned the members of the profession that unless they took steps toward establishing medical centers of their own, "the profession must eventually capitulate, become socialized and become employees of the State."

ress. This is not the place for reproducing the details of the plan, but it is appealing since it relieves the physicians of the long days and vacationless years, which too often take the very soul and life out of him, prevent him from giving his best to each patient and offers to the patient a much more easily available and moderately priced medical service than at present. The system aims at friendliness, the personal touch which begets confidence, a doing away with red-tape and formalities. Provision is made for free service, and near free service, where circumstances call for it, and for preventive measures. Nor does Doctor Cooper forget that education in right and healthful living is the greatest insurance against sickness and that the public needs educating in these things as well as in such fundamentals as will prevent people from entrusting themselves to unreliable methods and practices.

Six years' trial of this plan has convinced Dr. Cooper that it goes far toward solving many of the problems that have arisen with the new discoveries and methods in medicine.

The plan is in keeping with the spirit of the times in that it recognizes the power and efficiency of the group, and yet does not restrict individual initiative. There is mutual aid and relief resulting in greater justice and opportunity alike to physician and patient.

From a layman's point of view one of the most valuable things in connection with the plan is the opportunity it offers of avoiding excessive routine and machine methods. The present tendency in medical practice is to perfect the tests, the analyses and microscopic examinations until the hospital and clinic seem to some simply soulless machines. These things are good and must by all means be utilized. But are we not in danger in the field of medicine as in other fields of letting our discoveries and inventions enslave us rather than become our servants?

Perhaps we need to remember that the practice of medicine is an art, the healing art, and in just so far as it becomes simply technical and mechanical, so far it loses much of its healing power. Are we in danger of neglecting the spiritual side of healing and of forgetting that whatever the means all healing comes from God?

Bahá'ulláh tells us in a beautiful letter to a physician how to use both the spiritual and material means of healing:

"In God must be our trust. There is no God but Him, the Healer, the Knower, the Helper. . . . Nothing in earth or heaven is outside the grasp of God.

"O, doctor! In treating the sick, first mention the name of God, the Possessor of the Day of Judgment, and then use what God hath destined for the healing of His creatures. By My Life! The doctor who has drunk from the Wine of My Love, his visit is healing, and his breath is mercy and hope. Cling to him for the welfare of the constitution. He is confirmed by God in his treatment."

“God has given to man the wonderful gift of scientific knowledge . . . by which he is able to do much for the advancement of civilization. . . . He should use his power for good, to bring the fruits of civilization into the possible possession of all men, to encourage harmony and kindness, to produce concord amongst men. For this reason God gave this divine gift.”

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE FUTURE of mankind is a problem which now interests not only sociologists but scientists. The immense age of this planet, now established at about a billion years, is only the prelude, so astro-physicists think, to at least another billion years of life upon the earth. An estimate upon such a tremendous scale leads naturally to the question of what the nature of human existence will be in this vast stretch of the future. What will the world be like in the next billion years?

A thousand million years of existence has passed and mankind, the highest expression of life upon this planet, has but just reached the point of being able to accumulate, organize, and perpetuate knowledge. There does not seem to be now any limit to man's capacity to go on doing this. However, it is not with the accumulation of knowledge that we need be most concerned, but with the use to which we will put this knowledge. How adequately shall we be able to employ these great stores of information when secured?

John C. Merriam, President of the Carnegie Institution of Washington, asks this question and describes serious obstacles in the way of a wise and adequate use of the power which modern knowledge gives to man. “The future of mankind, in the social sense depends not alone upon our capacity to accumulate and to organize. Ultimately, in handling our greatest and most critical affairs we must depend upon the capacity of individuals to understand and to utilize the materials thus brought together.”*

It is not only because individuals have limited capacities to operate the knowledge gained, but especially because of their emotions and their innate tendency to individualism that men find it difficult to utilize efficiently and nobly the knowledge which the scientists bring them. “Independence,” says Merriam, “is one of the most marked qualities of human beings.” And this together with man's emotionality brings almost infinitely complex elements of disturbance. It will be extremely difficult, thinks Merriam, to handle the affairs which we organize unless there is a different and new development of the individual. We are gathering "dangerous fruit from the tree of knowledge, and may question whether we can bear the consequence of coming to view the world as gods." The problem of democracy and modern society is how to secure for its direction "individuals with adequate ability for performance of great tasks." And, secondly, how to secure the proper subordination of the individual to the direction of gifted leaders. The social world should be so organized and trained that each element in the complicated machinery will keep understandingly to the fulfillment of its duties.

How remarkably the vision of this great scientist points toward the climax in human affairs at which is needed just the Divine Revelation and divinely ordered organization of society which Bahá'u'lláh has brought us. Here we find a solution to the problem with which the scientist is so deeply concerned—that of controlling the emotions and the individuality of humans so as to make safe the efficient use of the marvelous knowledge which science is pouring into the world. All of this is completely satisfied in the organization of the Bahá'í Cause. Here we have the machinery perfect in plan and feasibility for securing leadership of the highest quality, establishing that leadership in a firm position in a way that is democratic, and pledging to that leadership the loyalty and obedience of all classes.

As the scientist sees, the problem fundamentally is one of the individual and his constitution; even the magnificent pattern of civilization which Bahá'u'lláh constructs for us, would be impossible of fulfillment were the individual to retain the qualities which up to the present made autocracy the seed of exploitation and war, and democracy the symbol of fickleness, weakness, and inefficiency.

But the Bahá'í Cause does change the individual. That is its first task. Gradually the sense of individualism is merged into the spiritual sense of unity within the group. Self-will gives place to evanescence. The group knowledge and the group wisdom achieved by consultation becomes a guide for action more efficient than the prowess of any individual.

WHEN mankind is thus perfectly organized and ready to function according to the laws of Bahá'u'lláh, his nature having become spiritual and pliant to the will of God and loyal and obedient to delegated human leadership, then there can be safely committed to man's care these immense treasuries of knowledge which are accumulating ever faster.

The proper organization of humanity having thus been conceived, there arise sublime visions of future achievements of a society where science reverently questions the universe for truth and power, and in the spirit of true service and harmony the man of affairs applies to the world's needs the truth and power gained by the scientist.

THE INNER REALITY OF MAN

IT is known that in man there is a reality other than this material one which is called body, and that reality which is other than this physical one is called the heavenly body of man; and we call that body the ethereal form which corresponds to this body. It is that reality which discovers the inner meaning of things; otherwise, this body of man does not discover anything. That reality grasps the mystery of existence. It discovers scientific facts. It discovers technical points. It discovers electricity, telegraphy, the telephone, and so on, discovering all the arts—and yet the reality which makes all these discoveries is other than this body, for, were it this body, then the animal would likewise be able to make these scientific and wonderful discoveries, for the animal shares with man all physical limitations and physical powers. What then is that power which discovers the realities of things which is not to be found in the animal? There is no doubt that it is the inner reality of man; and that reality comprehends all things, throws light upon the inner mysteries of existence, discovers the Kingdom, grasps the mysteries of God, and distinguishes man from the brute. That reality penetrates the inner core of beings; and it is evident that man is endowed with that reality and there is no doubt therein.

THE BASIS OF BAHÁ'Í BELIEF

THE ORDER OF MELCHIZEDEK

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

This illuminating series of articles by Mrs. Ransom-Kehler, distinguished Bahá'í teacher and lecturer, began with the introductory chapter in the November 1929 issue of this magazine; chapter 2 dealing with "Tales of the Past," was published in two parts in the February and March, 1930 issues; chapter 3 on "The Order of Melchizedek," consists of three parts, the first two parts were published in the April and May numbers; part 3 which follows, concludes chapter 3.

THERE are some sixteen essential mineral elements necessary for our bodily health. It would be just as sensible to say: "Why all this bother about agriculture, with its problems of cultivation, fertilization, floods, drought, harvesting; why the drudgery of preparation, cooking, preserving? Why not just eat these essential minerals and do away with the labor and effort of consuming them through another medium, the vegetable kingdom?"

Nothing of which the human mind can conceive can be acquired except through mediation. To ask mankind to find God without a Mediator would be like trying to obtain light and heat without a sun, like having music without notes, literature without words, words without letters, letters without sounds, sounds without atmosphere, atmosphere without its constituent elements, and these without that underlying all-pervasive, indivisible energy upon which all empirical contact is based.

It is just as defensible to ask that we acquire knowledge without focusing the attention, as that we attain to the Ultimate by any other means than through that Eternal Sun of Probity that reflects His

Light and Life to men. An apple might as well say: "I do not want to be severed from my source by any intervention. I wont grow on the branch; I'll grow on the root of the tree."

'Abdu'l-Bahá speaks of the focal center which lies in the very structure of the universe. The two fundamental laws of creation are organization and change. Beginning with Heraclitus and Empedocles, extending to Bergson and Dewey this question has vexed and lured the minds of men: What is it that remains fixed in the flux; why does the universe continue changeless in the midst of incessant change? That which does not change is the organization of all phenomena and of all experience around a center. The atom with its proton; the systems with their central suns; the protoplasmic cell with its nucleus; the vortical movement of gravity toward its center: centripetal and centrifugal forces; legislative and executive functions in government (else anarchy and chaos); the cerebro-spinal nervous system as the center of perception with its attendant motion; apperception, the organizing power of the personality; the point, irreducible minimum of the universe (modern physics shows the point as containing the whole non-spatial universe—the nexus between the finite and the infinite; this same condition expressed in religious terminology is the only Begotten Son of the Father, the Word made flesh); the heart which focuses the vital forces; attention, the pivotal point around which reason and learning are organized; the great personalities Who alone have influenced social and historical movements; Truth as the reference point which determines whether propositions agree among themselves and with the further interpretation of experience; and so forth indefinitely as far as the mind can reach.

For everything there is a center, and this center is the mediating point through which otherwise several and disunited strata, powers and kingdoms mingle. The vast primordial flow of energy would remain undifferentiated and therefore useless to human beings did it not reach combustion in the sun, there to be reflected out again in the form of light and heat, the essentials of life on this planet. Without the taut string, the hollow reed,—the mighty winds of heaven would withhold forever from man the sublime purgation of music; and when the tides of the heart finally ebb, the rapture and glory of creative life has lost its contact with this world.

If then the physical universe, the universe of chemistry and biology with its magical perfection of organization and structure is built around a center, a focal point, how can we rationally suggest that a kingdom as unorganized, as inchoate, as imperfect as the kingdom of man's mind and heart can dispense with this requirement that holds the systems, the exact processes of mathematics as well as his own thinking in their proper orbits.

But here he is likely to say: "Very well, I will grant that my relation to God must be organized around a center; but why must that center be a human being? Why can't it be something psychological like attention or apperception, already used in your illustrations?"

Out of his own mouth we judge him; the quarrelsomeness, the hatred to which he has already objected arise from the substitution of human psychology, the following of our own differing and antagonistic interpretations of God and His Will, for the supreme guidance laid down for us by that Great Mediator Who alone can transform through the Center of His Life and Teachings the majestic attributes of God to accord with the finite requirements of man.

When we attempt to push aside the Manifestation and "go direct to God," each one of us is motivated by an entirely different conception of what God is, how to express His Will, of what is well-pleasing to Him. A fine and courageous woman who recently offered this objection to the Bahá'í Teachings—that we had had enough Manifestations and didn't need any more—responded when I asked her where man would turn for accurate guidance if the Great Mouthpiece of God did not reveal His Word from age to age: "Why, you are God, I am God, every one is God." When I gently suggested that things equal to the same thing might reasonably be expected to be equal to each other; but that my impression of God being totally different from hers it would look as if the two Gods, the one that she is and the one that I am did not represent an essential unity but a positive contradiction, she was not convinced of the incongruity of her assumption.

The crux of the matter lies in our interpretation of the nature of the soul and of life's ultimate purposes. The embarrassing news of ourselves given us by modern psychological discoveries unfolds the age-old effort of the subconscious mind to aggrandize the ego and to bend the environment to its progress and supremacy. The age-old struggle envisaged in the great religions of the world is carried on between those elements in the personality that would escape the limitations of the self with its humiliations, doubts, fears, defeats, seeking the assurance of sacrifice, good will and peace, and those demanding human supremacy, personal preferment and selfish satisfactions.

Aside from the considerations already adduced no one could be sure of God's Will and purpose in human life if it were left to the mere guess-work of the individual; my idea of what God wanted humanity to do would be at variance with my neighbor's. Only as One appears with the authority and majesty of God's Words upon His lips which He unfolds in such wise that no doubt or question of their authenticity eventually arises, can mankind take each succeeding step of the soul toward the supreme eventuation of his journey toward Reality: for "the divinity of God is the sum of all perfections which reveals itself in the reality of man."

"God the Exalted appears in the clothing of His creatures. This is through His Favor, so that His servants may not flee from Him, but that they may approach Him, rest in His Presence, and be benefited by that which He reveals from the Heaven of His Will."

The Manifestation as the Focal Center around which the whole of creation is organized, is the great archetypal pattern that reflects this relationship in every phase of expression. Since nothing exists without a center, since everything is focused into the relatively small and out again into a vast influence,—the cosmos into ninety-two elements, language into fifty-six sounds, the tree into the seed and back into the tree again,—we are constrained to look for that nexus relating God to man. Direct relations throughout the universe do not occur; therefore we see that in man's striving to know God, "this knowledge is impossible save through His Manifestation."

SOME ASPECTS OF MODERN SCIENCE

THE CHANGE IN VIEWPOINT

GLENN A. SHOOK

Professor of Physics, Wheaton College

The author of this series of three articles on modern science, written at editorial request, is unusually qualified to present to the readers of The Bahá'í Magazine some of the spiritual aspects of modern scientific thought. In the first article he shows how uncertain scientific thought has become about the constitution of matter, and how there are different concepts even regarding what the atom is; whereas a generation ago science was much more dogmatically assertive and obstinately materialistic. The fact is that the great scientists today are not at all cocksure, and the trend is to feature matter in other terms than the merely concrete, thus approaching a point where the spiritual truths regarding the unseen find a possibility of adjustment with the truths the scientists perceive about the known universe.

ONE of the important principles of the Bahá'í Teachings is the harmonizing of religion and science. "Any religion which contradicts science or is opposed to it," says 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "is only ignorance, for ignorance is the opposite of knowledge. There is no contradiction between true religion and science."

In an age the activities of which are so controlled and guided by scientific knowledge it is evident that religion must come into agreement with science or be totally discredited by humanity, at least by the educated portion of humanity.

No religion in the past has offered such a harmonization, for the reason that in the past there has been no body of scientific knowledge with which it was necessary to harmonize; but the Bahá'í Movement, designed and revealed for this day and age, contains within its precepts a perfect solution of this apparent gulf between science and religion.

A reconciliation between science and religion is impossible, however, so long as any theory of science leads directly or indirectly to the conclusion that a revealed religion is an illusion. It is the object of this thesis to point out some of the present tendencies and to indicate in a general way the nature of the ground upon which certain philosophical ideas are based.

When we turn to the Renaissance and consider carefully the forces that brought about the significant changes of that period we are impressed with the fact that the emergence of the scientific spirit is the most revolutionary. Not only do we see here a revival of Greek learning but a new type of thinking. Authority gives way to observation and experiment, deduction is supplemented by induction.

The most astounding thing, however, is that with two or three exceptions there were no martyrs; the persecutions while thorough-going and up to standard were mild compared to religious persecutions, and as for scientific wars the idea is nonexistent. In no other field of ideas since the beginning of history had it been possible to bring about radical changes in thinking without bloodshed and a temporary halt in real progress. Its inception was marked by a single purpose; the search for truth, and the desire for reward or distinction of any kind was never in evidence. A Pole, an Italian, a German, a Dane and an Englishman; catholic, protestant, good churchman and heretic,—all labored together for an understanding of the physical universe. By the end of the seventeenth century an ostensibly solid foundation for the physical sciences was laid, but by the end of the nineteenth century it was considerably shaken, nevertheless we have witnessed nothing but steady progress. It is not surprising therefore if the educated world turns to science for the solution of many of its problems. Here at least there is no prejudice, no bias, and the knowledge of the physical world is the most exact knowledge that the world in general is aware of.

To get a concrete picture of the sort of scientific background that is now necessary let us consider briefly the history of the atom.

Very simple phenomena like the evaporation of water or camphor, the transfer of odors etc., makes it clear that matter is not homogeneous but exists rather as discrete particles and they must be very small since they cannot be seen with the most powerful microscope. In the case of a compound like water, we call these particles molecules, while in the case of a simple substance like hydrogen we use the term atom. Now one of the fundamental laws of chemistry states that elements like hydrogen, oxygen, etc. always combine in the same proportion to form compounds. For example, in water we always have two atoms of hydrogen combining with one atom of oxygen and moreover we know that the oxygen atom is thirty-two times heavier than the hydrogen atom, which is by the way the lightest of all. In the early days they did not know the actual mass of any atom in grams so they expressed their relative mass calling the mass of hydrogen 1. These relative masses were and are today called the "atomic weights" and for many years they were sufficient for the problems of chemistry.

Now in dealing with chemical reactions what kind of an atom must we imagine? Simply particles with the proper relative mass and nothing more.

In dealing with an enclosed gas we explain pressure by assuming that the gas consists of particles which strike against the walls of the vessel. Here again they must be very small but what they lack in mass they make up in numbers and velocity so the pressures we observe are satisfactorily explained. The question naturally arises, is this the atom of chemistry? Yes and no. Here we must assume that we are dealing with elastic spheres and that is obviously unnecessary in chemical reactions.

Again we speak of positive and negative charges simply because we observe attraction in some instances and repulsion in others. We must be dealing with two kinds of charges but they differ only in that two similar charges repel while two dissimilar charges attract. We call the charge produced with a glass rod rubbed with silk "positive"; but that produced by an ebonite rod rubbed with fur, "negative." However the designation is quite arbitrary.

trary and we might just as well call a positive charge negative. When two platinum strips are placed in acidulated water a current of electricity may be passed from one strip to the other through the water, but what is far more interesting we also observe that hydrogen gas collects at the negative strip and oxygen at the positive. It is quite natural that we should assume in this case that the water is broken up or ionized, as we say, into two particles which we call "ions" or wanders. One of the particles manifestly has a positive charge associated with it in some way and the other has a negative charge. An ion is an atom or sometimes a group of atoms with an electric charge. When a hydrogen ion loses its charge it becomes hydrogen gas. The properties of the ion are quite different from the properties of the atom. It is not necessary, of course, to assume that the ion is an elastic sphere and it would be superfluous to do so, but it is necessary to assume that it has a charge or to put it another way, if we assume it has a charge we can account for the facts of ionization. The point to keep in mind is simply this, the physicist or chemist does not make assumptions that are not both necessary and valid.

Some phenomena in light require a much more complicated atom model which we can only describe briefly. This atom, for the most part, consists simply of space; likewise does the solar system when you come to think of it, so that must not bother us, for in the center there is a positive particle," the proton," which contains nearly all the mass and revolving around the proton there are negative particles of very, very much smaller mass called "electrons." The model resembles the sun with its planets. This is the modern atom and while it is necessary to account for the more complex phenomena of the physical world, it is superfluous for some of the simple things we have explained above.

Why not have just one atom? Indeed this is precisely what we would like but at present it is not forthcoming, although there is no doubt that a universal model will be devised.

Is then the atom a discovery? Does it really exist? In one sense yes, and in another sense it is a mechanical model devised to fit the facts of observation.

Sometimes we reach a dilemma as in the case of the classical wave theory of light. Up to the last quarter of the nineteenth century practically all of the observed phenomena of light demanded a wave theory, but certain discoveries of the last fifty years, notably those involving interchanges of energy, can only be explained if we assume, not a wave but a flight of particles variously called quanta, corpuscles or photons. At first sight it does not appear that both theories can be right, and yet it is entirely probable that we simply need a larger outlook. In the words of Sir J. J. Thomson, "this duality of corpuscles and waves may be of the nature of things." Perhaps this is just another way of saying that the physical universe is decidedly more complex than anyone in the eighteenth century ever dreamed it to be.

One result of these changes is that there is less stress upon atomic models. In the past a phenomena was explained when a mechanical model could be built in the mind. There was always a desire to get back of the mathematical equations but today we realize that the ultimate reality is very much beyond our reach so we are for the most part content with symbols. The complexity of the physical world and the failure of a simple model to solve most of our problems has naturally led to this conclusion.

What lies behind the symbols that we use in equations? The answer is, "we do not know." We no longer think that a thing must be concrete to be real, and this attitude indicates that we are becoming more spiritual for as Eddington says, ". . . we are no longer tempted to condemn the spiritual aspects of our nature as illusory because of their lack of concreteness."

In short much that was considered fundamental in the old classical physics has been shown to be quite inadequate for modern discoveries. The old ideas of length mass and time have been replaced by new concepts which seem very weird and fantastic to the layman but this may be taken as a sign of progress.

In concluding it may be well to summarize the important facts.

1. A scientific model like the atomic model must not be considered entirely in the light of a discovery but rather as an explanation, adequate perhaps today but subject to modification tomorrow.

2. Mechanical models have succeeded, at least so far, only with the simplest type of phenomena with which we are aware, namely, the physical universe i. e. the inorganic world.

3. As the physical universe unfolds before us, as the result of scientific research, it becomes more and more complex while the models and theories become more and more abstract.

4. In the light of all the facts we have at this moment, the crude discarded model of yesterday can hardly be expected to solve the complex problems of tomorrow.

In a subsequent article we will attempt to show the instability of the atomic foundation of all mechanistic theories.

"The highest praise is due to men who devote their energies to science; and the noblest center is a center wherein the sciences and arts are taught and studied. Science ever tends to the illumination of the world of humanity. It is the cause of eternal honor to man, and its sovereignty is far greater than the sovereignty of kings. The dominion of kings has an ending; the king himself may be dethroned; but the sovereignty of science is everlasting and without end."

QAZVIN AND TEHRAN

This is the third part of the serial story by Miss Root concerning her experiences in Persia. The first article which appeared in the July number described her visits from Baghdád to Kirmansháh; the second part published in the August number gave an account of her stay in the city of Hamadán.

THE morning we left Hamadán was glorious. The sun shone warmly and the snow-covered mountains scintillated as if decked with millions of diamonds. The writer, though, was seeing something more. She closed her eyes to think about Qurratu'l-'Ayn, her great ideal of spiritual womanhood who had come this same way, only on donkey-back, and at every step her life had been in great danger from the fanatical clergy. To go to Qazvin, the city of such an heroine, is indeed a holy privilege. Suddenly while I was thinking and praying, the chauffeur was halting the car. There in the road ahead of us were peasants dressed in costumes of green and apple pink and white. They lifted their arms to motion that the car be stopped. Then, playing on Persian musical instruments called "Tars," they danced a most graceful dance and sang a salute to the spring season. Then standing on either side of the road and bowing low, they motioned the chauffeur to pass. Were they Bahá'ís who had come far out from Qazvin, dressed in the ancient costumes, to give a silent welcome to the sister from the west? If so, it was very sweet and apropos, for now is the springtime of a new universal cycle.

A few miles further on stood fifteen motor cars filled with Bahá'í friends who were waiting to greet us. First among them were the nine members of the Qazvin Spiritual Assembly. Mr. Arbab Borzoo, owner of the Grand Hotel, the best hostelry in Qazvin, and a devoted Bahá'í, asked the guest to ride in his Grand Hotel autobus, which she did. A little outside the gate of the city, in one of the large buildings, a reception was given where tea, Persian cakes and fruit were served by the Bahá'í friends of that suburb. Their speeches of welcome were so beautiful, one can appreciate what it means to hear "the broidered tongue of the East." The Persians are keenly intelligent, eloquent, poetical by nature, and extraordinarily courteous and hospitable.

After a happy half-hour here the friends again entered their motor cars and accompanied the visitor to the Grand Hotel. Entering the foyer massed with palms, there I found more than one hundred Bahá'í women and girls waiting to greet me. It was exquisite to see these women of Qazvin from whom the world expects so much, for since Quarraty'l-'Ayn has come from this city, women in every continent who have admired her so deeply, naturally expect all women of this historic city to be beautiful, highly cultured, spiritual, marvelous speakers, and fearless, possessed of a courage which thrills the world. I was not surprised to find Esperantists among them, for I feel sure if Qurratu'l-'Ayn had lived in this generation she would have learned this international auxiliary language. Only some of the ladies came, for in Persia there are so many Bahá'ís that only a limited number can be present at any gathering.

A luncheon was given that day in the hotel for members of the Spiritual Assembly, and at six o'clock a lecture was given in the Bahá'í School building. The women had decorated the great hall with scores of wonderful Persian rugs and embroidered pieces made by themselves and the pupils of the schools. The place was lighted with a hundred lamps. Flowers were placed in little vases on all the tables, and standing with shining eyes to receive their sister from the west were more than three hundred men and boys. Truly it was a great welcome. First a prayer was chanted, then came addresses of welcome in both Persian and English, emphasizing the union of the East and the West, after which the visitor spoke of the progress of the Bahá'í Cause in the United States and Europe, giving many incidents of the influence of Qurratu'l-'Ayn in the West. When the last prayer was chanted and the vast audience still stood in great silence, the writer felt that if Qurratu'l-'Ayn looked down upon those spiritual souls she would know what rare and eternal fruits her life and her martyrdom have brought.

The next day a luncheon was given at the Grand Hotel for Bahá'í ladies, and immediately afterwards a women's meeting was held in the same school hall. Here several poems of Qurratu'l-'Ayn which had been set to music were given, for her poems are sung today not only by Bahá'ís but by musicians of all religions in Persia. Prayers were chanted, and then came the lecture in which the writer told them how good it would be if some Qazvin women could lecture in Europe and in the Americas; they could speak dynamically about the history and great life of their townswoman Qurratu'l-'Ayn. A feast was served for more than three hundred women and girls. The meeting was held in the school building, which was a little more comfortable in this extremely cold weather, but generally all meetings are held in the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár in Qazvin, and it is a house where Qurratu'l-'Ayn had often lectured and taught the Bahá'í Cause.

Returning to the hotel, the writer was presented to four Bahá'í friends from Tihrán who had been sent by the National Spiritual Assembly to welcome her and escort her to the capital. It was characteristic of Persia that these friends and Bahá'ís of Qazvin and the writer had a little meeting of prayer before they discussed the plans for Tihrán. The Persians always chant their prayers, and one who hears this sweet chanting of the Words of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá will long to hear them, I am sure, long after the pilgrimage to Persia is finished.

The next morning the hotel was thronged with friends who had come to say good-bye. The ladies were in one drawingroom and the men were in another large drawingroom which had been specially given for the American to meet her brothers and sisters during the brief stay of two days. The Spiritual Assembly and many other friends took motor cars to accompany the Bahá'í teacher on the first stretch of her journey towards Tihrán. There they descended and distributed Persian sweets,—if we did not break bread together we broke cake and bonbons and tasted salt as a Persian symbol of lifelong friendship, as well as of most thoughtful hospitality. Then saying again and again “Alláh-u-Abhá” to them all, we directed our chauffeur and Hassan to drive forward and the car with the Tih-rán brothers followed close behind ours. The dear Qazvin friends waved us out of sight.

A JOURNEY from Qazvin to Tihrán requires only about four hours with a good car and on this day the weather was fine. Tihrán friends had wished to come out in very great numbers to meet the Bahá'í guest, but she had asked then and in all other cities that the number be limited. She feels, and so does the National Spiritual Assembly, that in Persia at the present time moderation,—never astounding, never attracting public excitement—is better when the Government is doing its best to have a safe, tolerant and neutral Irán. The spirit of the Tihrán Bahá'ís, however, is so hospitably big that several thousand believers had asked to come and meet the western sister at Karadj, a suburb nineteen miles before the gate of the capital.

Tihrán is a city of three hundred thousand inhabitants, situated midway between the eastern and western thriving cities of Tabriz and Mashhad. It can be reached via Russia and the northern city of Rasht, or from the northwest via Tabriz, from the south via the Persian Gulf and Bushir, and from the west via the golden-route from Baghdád over which we had just traveled. It has only been the capital for the past one hundred years, before that Isfahán and Shiráz had the honor of being the ancient capitals. However, if Tihrán is a new city which is considerably Europeanised, still it is said to have all the charm and the gorgeous splendor of the greatest oriental capital in Central Asia. It stands close beside the remains of Rhey or Rhages (spoken of by Bahá'u'lláh) which was a contemporary of Babylon and Nineveh, a city of a million souls in those days. In the time of the Arab conquest it was reported to have had eight million inhabitants.

Coming in the motor car we saw Mount Demavand with its shapely white cone so high and keenly cutting and it seemed close to Tihrán as if it and the Elburz Mountains embraced the city to the north. Whether Noah's Ark had rested on Mount Demavand nineteen thousand four hundred feet above the sea level we must leave to the historians to decide. Anyway, to come to Tihrán is a thrilling adventure for a Bahá'í, and to others, too, it is a country with great tourist interest.

The writer closed her eyes for a moment to breathe silently a couplet from the "Masnavi" of Bahá'u'lláh. (These divinely inspired lines do not refer to Persia but to the Abhá Kingdom, the Kingdom of Heaven from whence He came to show us the way.)

"O thou sacrifice of God
From the altar of love do not return,
Give your life in the path of love!
Come to the Door of the Beloved
Without head and body,
In order that you may be accepted
As a citizen of This Land!"

How gladly the Founders of the Bahá'í religion and those first believers in Persia had done this!

KARADJ WAS very near; the National Spiritual Assembly and more than one hundred and fifty other Bahá'ís had left their motor cars and stood to receive the sister from the west. In that solemn moment, it was not just individuals greeting one another, it was the spiritual union of the East and the West. It was a tremendous ovation, and then everyone went into the large restaurant where tea and cakes and flowers were served, and speeches were made. Many policemen stood about, several photographers took countless photographs; everyone was happy and enthusiastic. After this reception the automobiles were again entered and the writer came in the car with the owners of the Grand Hotel to Tihrán.

When we reached the imposing gate of the city of Tihrán, called "Qazvin Gate" because it is the end of the Qazvin-Tihrán road, there were many cars and vehicles. It was the busy time of the day, and every passenger must halt to show his card of permission to enter. Cars of friends quietly drew up around my car, policemen came and we cannot say it was merely a coincidence—they stood beside my car until the signal came to start forward.

Coming into the Grand Hotel, I saw that covers had been laid for nearly one hundred and fifty guests; the owners were giving this dinner in my honor. Many of the famous national dishes of Persia were served,—chicken pilaw with pistachio nuts, raisins, dates and orange peel for flavor. Also they had the many delicious fruits for which Persia is so celebrated.

This hotel has been my headquarters. It is one of the most beautiful and comfortable hotels in all Persia. It is an interesting fact that the builder of this hostelry, Mr. Seyid Nasroullah Bakeroff, a most ardent Bahá'í, constructed this luxurious "palace" built round a central court and with a great theatre, in the hope that the Center of the Covenant 'Abdu'l-Bahá, would come again to His native land and this hotel would be His home! Some religionists opposed him and tried to have the construction stopped. They said, "he is building such an hotel for his God." Well, indeed he did build it to the glory of God. One feels the love and the spirit in this house. Ordinary travelers are impressed with the courtesy, the completeness of everything; but coming as I did as a Bahá'í (and it will be the same when you come), it is infinitely sweet to hear "Alláh-u-Abhá" everytime a boy comes to serve you; and he does not walk, he runs to fulfill your wish! The three brothers Mir Aminoullah Bakeroff, Mir Kamal Bakeroff and Mir Jalal Bakeroff own this hotel, and with them I feel their love, their thoughtfulness, their efficient care are showered upon this humble Bahá'í from the west as it would have been poured upon 'Abdu'l-Bahá Who could never come during His lifetime, and the builder, too, has passed on to the Other World.

One day they told me an incident of their good father this Agha Seyid Nasroullah Bakeroff. They said that at the time of Nasiro'd-Din Shah's death by an assassin, their father was in Baku. The Muhammadans, very prejudiced, attacked him and said: "You killed the Shah!" Everything that ever happened was blamed upon the Bahá'is. Fifty policemen came and took the father to the police court. The Chief of Police shook hands with Mr. Bakeroff and said: "I know you Bahá'is are the best people in the world and would not kill anybody! For your own safety, however, I imprison you here for two days, for if I free you the Muhammadans will put you to death." Thus his life was saved.

During the five weeks here, Bahá'í parties with the invitation card have been given six nights a week, always one hundred guests and many times two hundred, and at each reception and lecture there have been new faces, for no one has been invited twice, yet I have not seen nearly all of the Bahá'ís in Tihrán. Two meetings were attended by men and women together.

This is a great innovation for husbands and wives to come together and to sit together. One young woman made a most eloquent speech of welcome, but it was the first time she had ever spoken before men.*

The hospitality of the Persian people is remarkable. One afternoon it was raining when I left a reception, but the women and girls and little children all came through the garden to the outer door where the carriage stood, even though I had said good-bye to each one of them in the drawingroom and on the veranda. They were not thinking of the rain on pretty frocks; it was sisters of the East and the West meeting together for just one afternoon. One young girl said: "Do you realise it is probably good-bye forever!" Others said: "It is the promise of Bahá'u'lláh fulfilled, for He said our fair-haired sisters with blue eyes would come to us from the west."

"Through the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh the horizon of the East was made radiant and glorious. Souls who have hearkened to His Words and accepted His Message live together today in complete fellowship and love. . . . This has been due to the declaration and foundation of the oneness of the world of humanity. Today in Persia there are meetings and assemblages wherein souls who have become illumined by the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh—representative Muhammadans, Christians, Jews, Zoroastrians, Buddhists and of the various denominations of each—mingle and conjoin in perfect fellowship and absolute agreement. A wonderful brotherhood and love is established among them and all are united in spirit and service for international peace."

THE KEY TO UNITY

LOUISE DRAKE WRIGHT

THE curiosity of the world has recently been stirred by the discovery of what appears to be a ninth neighborly planet circling outside the orbit of Neptune, a telescope powerful enough to sight the unknown member of our solar system having been constructed. Fresh probabilities open unchallenged as the thought is entertained, and if it be verified, some of the careful calculations of the past that made a comfortable, orderly sequence for our minds to rest upon may be subjected to changes as the presence, power and light of this immense magnet, henceforth, will have to be taken into consideration.

As each noticeable discovery in the world of science urges new estimates of past assumptions in its field of knowledge and opens further possibilities, likewise in the realm of divine revelation each Light-Bearer brings to judgment past concepts and offers vast and beneficent reformations based upon adherence to fundamental, unchanging laws.

Now that achievements in natural science have outstripped imagination in many ways, advanced ideas are quite generally welcomed by persons of intelligence. We no longer imprison our Gallileos of scientific adventure. But in the domain of divine investigation primitive methods, where distrust, fears and condemnation prevail, are still adhered to.

One of ineffable holiness, who in the past century offered the key to world unity and peace, was held a Prisoner for forty years, suffering every calamity and indignity possible to endure. Nevertheless, this supreme Sun of celestial radiance arose unhindered by opposition, and is discernible to those who adjust the telescope of the spirit—the mind—to spiritual requirements and values, and turn its clear lens directly upon this all-inclusive recent revelation of God.

The Orb of Manifestation became known to the world through three individualized Aspects, or Vehicles of Its significance.

The first to be recognized was the Báb, as Herald of the Manifestation.

Then the Light-Bearer Himself, Bahá'u'lláh, the Dawning-Place of Divinity, revealed His Presence and His Mission.

His eldest son, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, next became known as the definer and explainer of the Word of the Manifestation and the Exemplar of His Teachings.

The spiritual supremacy and exquisite personality of Ali Mohammed, the Báb, immediately attracted large numbers of the Muhammadan faith after He announced Himself as Herald of "One whom God will manifest." Thousands of His followers so caught the flame of His unearthly quality and the high ecstasy of His inner beauty that they suffered unspeakable martyrdom rather than be separated from the love of God shining through Him with such intensity. On the other hand, it was quite inevitable that those who clung to orthodox tradition should passionately resent His resounding demands that they burn many of their books, do away with long cherished rituals and abolish their superstitions. He also went into the minutest detail as to their manner of living, making strict rules as to what they should eat and training them carefully in much needed ways of personal cleanliness. He was a hurricane shaking the trees of their existence; a plough to dig up old roots so long interlaced beneath the surface of their lives; tilling the ground of their minds and hearts to make ready for the momentous event rapidly approaching. A Manifestation of God was about to proclaim Himself. Who would welcome Him? Not those imprisoned in a dead past and surrounded by walls of prejudice nor those filled with self-righteousness.

He bade His followers to turn entirely to the Holy One when He appeared. "At the time of His Manifestation there will be for them (the people) no greater paradise than belief in Him and obedience to Him," He wrote in the "Beyan."

After this "Dawning Point of Revelation" had opened highways of faith for the incoming of the "Promised One," the Báb's immaculate young life was set at naught by His enemies and He was liberated, through martyrdom, from the cage of this world.

For hundreds of years, many religious books have reiterated certain sacred names which the Prophets, through their utterances and visions, have kept before the minds of the people. Like long vine roots running below the ground until drawn out into the light and air to burst into bloom, these familiar ideas may be traced over long periods of development until they eventually impersonate in great beings who manifest God's purpose and explain His meanings. How many generations of the Jews brooded over the hallowed name of the Messiah as a fulfillment of their heart's desire, until He was born as the Christ Child, The Word, The Son of God, at the time when spiritual comprehension was in its youthful stages.

Similarly there are two familiar expressions, "The Lord of Hosts," and, "The Covenant of God," that have stood out prominently through the centuries. At last, humanity having acquired a more mature realization of the character of their Maker, and, being ready for closer union with Him, these conceptions have taken outer form in the holy personages of Bahá'u'lláh, the Lord of Hosts, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Covenant of God.

The outstanding events in the amazing history of Bahá'u'lláh are written that all may read these tragic but victorious pages. We know how the prison of 'Akká became a mighty throne from which emanated His Light to the world. It is said that in His presence the strongest impression one received was a vivid realization of the tender solicitude and ineffable love of the Heavenly Father. He came to awaken the divine nature and reveal the treasures hidden therein.

He wrote these beautiful lines:

"To gather jewels have I come to the world. If one speck of a jewel lie hid in a stone, and that stone be beyond the seven seas, until I have sought and found that jewel, My Hand shall not stay from its search."

Those who were blessed by a close view of His daily life tell of His unchanging poise and majesty, serenity and kindness during the long years of poignant calamity. Disaster never caused agitation; human circumstance, whether favorable or detrimental, was welcomed indiscriminately. The will of this "prisoner" of the Sultan of Turkey and the Shah of Persia was so powerful that no messengers sent by those dominant potentates came before Him unless He read in their hearts worthy motives and granted them permission.

In a Tablet He spoke of the mission He was particularly to accomplish—"My part is but to deliver this great and clear Message."

The delivery of so sublime and vital a message must have been written, not only by the Supreme Pen in manuscript form, but traced upon the living page everlasting where those eternal verities are indelibly inscribed, which man in his upward climbing has become capable of appropriating and which, through the power of the Holy Spirit, he may always reach and possess. Each Manifestation as the Divine Physician gauges the receptive capacity of the people of the world and creates the fructifying environments in which His prophecies of attainment and benefits may find expression in human affairs.

The Master at one time said that the Word of a Manifestation was not only a prophecy but that it was also a creation. In the Tablet of Joseph, Bahá'u'lláh wrote, "My demonstration was brought to its fullness and completion for all that are in the heavens and on the earth before I made Myself known, because it appeared with such wonderful condition that no one could find any way to delay or oppose."

The unique genius of Bahá'u'lláh has brought to this chaotic world an indivisible, irresistible, indestructible, all-embracing penetrative plan. This plan is not static but dynamic and operative, and today is moving steadily, creatively through all avenues of life, remoulding thought and feeling and arousing those slumbering, long delayed, God-given high hopes and aspirations, through its inspiring promises of victory that mark the opening of the New Age.

Bahá'u'lláh makes known that in a shorter time than any past experience can warrant, there will be established a new order of nations, built securely upon the bedrock of divine justice.

Bahá'u'lláh gave to 'Abdu'l-Bahá a number of significant and mystical Names: which are familiar to every Bahá'í; and before ascending to His spiritual station on high, proclaimed that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was to be His successor, leaving in His Will no uncertainty as to the meaning of this bestowal.

Had it not been for the intimate acquaintance with the perfect life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and also His wealth of explanations regarding Bahá'u'lláh's Station and Principles, the teachings might have stood too far removed from the comprehension of the creatures to have been grasped and put into operation before a long period of years had elapsed. But through contact with the Master's unprecedented self-sacrifice and devotion, the people came close to a Life they could partly understand and wholly adore. Through His explanations, the Word of Bahá'u'lláh is tempered to the people's capacity to receive.

The white light of the love of Bahá'u'lláh shining through the Center of the Covenant ('Abdu'l-Bahá) breaks into rainbow colors of promise across the sky of eternal hope, and thus illumines all shades of intelligence.

In one of His Tablets 'Abdu'l-Bahá speaks of that which He was particularly meant to represent.

“O ye friends of God! . . . No one must believe that 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the 'Second Coming of Christ,' nay rather he must believe that he is the Manifestation of Servitude, the mainspring of the unity of the human world, the Herald of the True One with spiritual power throughout all regions,—the Commentator of the Book according to the divine text, and the Ransom to each one of the believers of God in this transitory world.”*

This “Mainspring of unity of the human world” wove for the earth a fresh garment. The strong and skillful weaver moved with ceaseless, painstaking tread through the warp and woof of existence to blend and harmonize the countless dissimilar threads of life. Seekers for truth from all religions, countries and peoples, came pouring to Him in endless streams. Hindus of high and low cast found it possible to lay aside long held prejudices when they sat side by side in the presence of such holiness. The poor and neglected He singled out as doubly dear to Him, consoling them with spiritual and material aid; warring Arab chiefs coming to have their grievances justly settled, walked away together in peace; great officials of the surrounding regions and those representing various foreign nations who were stationed in His vicinity came for consultation upon affairs of state; Muhammadan Mullahs sought His interpretation of obscure passages in the Qur'an. Those of all religions brought their intricate questions for Him to solve, either through means of the tremendous correspondence always piled high about Him or through interviews with Him while He lived in the prison town of 'Akká; or later when He traveled to far countries to proclaim Bahá'u'lláh's Cause, as well as in Haifa where He entertained numerous pilgrims all the remaining years of His life. His charity, loving kindness and unerring wisdom guided and uplifted the multitudes that ever pressed about Him.

The Master's many years of martyrdom drew to a close on November the twenty-eighth, 1921, and the sanctified Tabernacle of His Spirit was placed within the beautiful Sacred Shrine on Mount Carmel where the outermost garment of the Báb had lain for many years.

Ever unified in life purpose, these two mighty aspects of the Orb of Bahá'u'lláh,—the Morning Star of annunciation, the Báb, and the Moon of perfect reflection, 'Abdu'l-Bahá,—blending eternally with the Sun of Truth, Bahá'u'lláh, form the beacon light of the new creation.

When the Will of 'Abdu'l-Bahá was read and it became known that He had left a great inheritance to all who loved Him, a wave of relief and gratitude went around the

Bahá'í World. He appointed a "Guardian of the Cause," to direct its multitudinous affairs. He created and defined this new station of service in the world with its nature, function, and grave responsibilities. "The Guardian of the Cause of God as well as the Universal House of Justice," the Will read; and He named His eldest grandson, Shoghi Effendi, as the one to initiate this highly difficult undertaking and to fulfill the sacred trust.

A few lines of the Will are here quoted:

"O my loving friends! After the passing away of this wronged one, it is incumbent upon . . . the loved ones of the Abha Beauty, to turn unto Shoghi Effendi . . . as he is the sign of God . . . the Guardian of the Cause of God . . . he is the expounder of the Words of God, and after him will succeed the first born of his lineal descendents. The Guardian of the Cause of God as well as the Universal House of Justice, to be universally elected and established, are both under the care and protection of the Abha Beauty, under the shelter and unerring guidance of His Holiness the Exalted One, (May my life be offered up for them both!). Whatsoever they decide is of God. . . . Whoso deviateth, separateth himself and turneth aside from him hath in truth deviated, separated himself and turned aside from God. . . .

"So soon as they find anyone beginning to oppose and protest against the Guardian of the Cause of God, they must cast him out from the congregation of the people of Bahá and in no wise accept any excuse from him. . . .

"He that obeyeth him not, hath not obeyed God; he that turneth away from him, hath turned away from God; and he that denieth him, hath denied the True One."

Nothing could have assured this generation more effectually of the victory of the Cause of God in the near future than the merciful provision of a succession of devoted adherents to the Will of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, who, down the centuries, will "amplify and apply" His Word to the needs of humanity at the period of time in which each will occupy this centralizing position.

Shoghi Effendi is a "Master builder"; the only one who is capable of bringing into visibility and making concrete this mighty structure, a Universal House of Justice. He is endowed from on high with the insight, wisdom, love and power to inaugurate so stupendous an enterprise as a Universal House of Justice at this time of warring nations.

The unified action of a body of servants chosen for their adequate mental and spiritual endowments will, through organizing courts of arbitration, prepare the way for the permanent establishment of universal peace.

His Holiness, our Lord Jesus Christ said, "My sheep know my voice." All who have learned to listen to the voice of 'Abdu'l-Bahá know that the inestimable gift to the Cause of our precious Guardian's leadership is the Master's dearest love speaking anew through the consecrated life, perfect balance of mind, spiritually attuned, clear heart of His Highness Shoghi Effendi, through whom the "Hands of Power" will fashion the human habitation for the descent of the impregnable divine plan.

SEARCHING FOR TRUTH

II

In the present installment the author takes up his spiritual experience from the end of his college days, and traces it through a period of three years rich in growth and development, leading to the decision to enter the ministry. In the next and concluding installment, life at the Harvard Divinity School will be described and the event, in the midst of his preparation for the ministry, which led the author to give up this purpose and devote the rest of his life to the Bahá'í Movement.

MY college education left me with an increased fund of knowledge and an intellectual training, but with considerable impairment of health due partly to the fact that I worked my way through college while at the same time endeavoring to stand high in my studies.

I found great help in the treatments of a Dr. William Pratt, mental healer and one of the most spiritual and noble men that it has been my privilege to know. He had, previous to his work in mental healing, been a business man who had failed in business and incurred a nervous breakdown. He started in business again and had another nervous collapse. It was then that he came in touch with that same source of healing to which, as some assume, Mary Baker G. Eddy owed her inspiration, namely, Dr. Quimby. Among other patients there at the same time were the Dressers who, with Mr. Pratt, developed an independent system of healing. They called it metaphysical healing, later to be ably expressed in more general terms by a son, Horatio W. Dresser,—while Mary Baker G. Eddy went on developing her own powerful system of healing now so widely diffused.

Dr. Pratt, as we called him, though he had no medical degree, having been himself healed in a remarkable way by this mental healing system of Quimby's, practiced it with great effect upon others and kept a sanitarium where resident patients were helped. He was one of the most selfless men I have ever known. His personal presence and atmosphere were most cheering and uplifting and his treatments were very helpful to me. His method was to spend ten or fifteen minutes in spiritual conversation, and then have a period of silence in which he concentrated on the patient. His power of concentration was great. I have seen him run upstairs—(a man of sixty-five) from shaking the furnace, and sitting down, immediately compose himself to his spiritual task. Once, in the midst of the silent treatment, a hirdy-girdy began its vociferous music below our open window. I wondered whether it would effect Dr. Pratt, as it was disturbing to me and made it difficult for me to maintain an atmosphere of meditation. But it had no effect upon my healer, and soon I was totally oblivious of it.

I can recall that in these silent periods my mind became more or less a rosy blank, and I was suffused with a calm and buoyant flood which seemed to heal. I would return home walking on air, and bring enough vitality to last me until next I could drink from this fount of healing.

I thought that my problems were all solved with this wonderful guide and healer at my side, for he was indeed a spiritual guide as well as healer—a man of deep mystical wisdom. But just at this point one of those catastrophes occurred which change the pattern of our lives, namely, that Dr. Pratt himself passed away from this earth. Thus I found myself again spiritually afloat.

AT ABOUT this time, while teaching school in Brockton, Mass., I had two very deep spiritual experiences which I will narrate.

As I was strolling out one evening feeling a little lonesome, being unacquainted in this city, I passed a diminutive church and hearing the sound of singing stopped to look in. This perhaps was more than an act of mere curiosity on my part. I was being lead undoubtedly by my spirit of religious investigation. When I entered the rear of the church, the little congregation was then engaged in prayer. They were quite evidently simple men and women earning their bread by manual or clerical labor. Their prayers were the most remarkable I have ever heard in any Christian church. When the prayer closed, the young clergyman came down and urged me to join with them. I became a frequent attendant at this church, which as I discovered was of the denomination of "The Church of the Disciples" or "Campbellites." I found a wonderful spiritual brotherhood in these simple men and women: one of them the driver of a baker's wagon, another a watchman at a railroad crossing, women who worked in a candy factory, and such like.

In their prayers they really talked with God, and their Christian love for each other was of such a quality that when I was urged to join the church I felt strongly attracted to do so; for here I saw manifested, as I had never seen before, a wonderful spiritual power pervading the whole church body. Oddly enough this church to which I found myself drawn was of the Evangelical type with a theology far from the liberalism to which I had been accustomed. In order to join the church, it would be necessary to receive total immersion, an act which they deemed essential to salvation. Reasoning pragmatically that whether or no total immersion was necessary to salvation it was an act that certainly would do no harm, I decided to let it be no obstacle to affiliating myself with these wonderfully spiritual men and women.

At the time that I was baptized one of my pupils also happened to be baptized, and I will speak later of the effect in my school of this whole affair. Thus it happened that the only church I have ever joined was one of the most evangelical in type, strangely different from all in which I had ever worshipped; but my guidance had always been to seek for spirituality under whatever guise it was to be found. Here in this church I found a real quality of spiritual power.

SHORTLY AFTER this event a revival service came to Brockton conducted as a union service in the leading Congregational Church by a Mr. Campbell, a revivalist from London. I have frequently attended revival meetings out of religious curiosity, but at most found them emotional rather than spiritual in their effect. This revival was quite different, however; it seemed to be imbued with a marvelous spiritual potency. I joined with the group who rose to partake of the special revival benefits. I found a tremendous spiritual power impregnating my life for some weeks following this meeting, and my relation with my students was fraught with a spiritual sweetness and a love which I have rarely known. I suppose the fact of my baptism in one church followed by a public declaration in the revival service became spread among the pupils, and these definite spiritual steps on my part seemed to have called forth from the pupils all that was harmonious and lovely in their natures.

Unfortunately my stay at this school was brief because I was only substituting for a teacher during her illness, and I left Brockton with great regret on my part amid many farewells and bouquets of flowers from my pupils.

I speak of this relationship with the pupils merely to indicate how spiritual potency in life always flowers out into blessings of harmony and love.

I must confess here that this spiritual elevation was not permanent. I wish indeed it had remained so.

My next teaching experience was in a school characterized by great evil—one of the foulest schools in our country. I need not go into details. I was very unhappy there and not at all well; my spiritual powers seemed to have disappeared entirely.

When the summer vacation came, I was a wreck physically and nervously, and went to Mt. Desert, Maine, to camp out and to recuperate.

During my last few weeks at the N—High School I had come in contact with a young Christian Science practitioner, whose name I have forgotten, and had taken some treatments from him. He was a very earnest and sincere young man and worked hard over me, and I seemed to feel some benefit. I attended a Christian Science lecture and bought the book, "Science and Health." When I reached my camping site with the friend who was to spend the summer as a camp-mate, I found myself so depleted of psychical as well as physical vitality that I could not even engage in a limited way in the wholesome tasks and recreation of camping in the midst of those glorious mountains by the brilliant sea.

When my condition was at the lowest ebb, upon a day when I had given up a proposed trip of mountain climbing with a group of friends and was lying in the hammock gloomy and depressed—a letter came from my practitioner. It was an official healing letter of preachment to me and references in "Science and Health" and the Bible which I was to read. Feeling already helped by the letter, I immediately set to work reading the references cited. In a short time a great buoyancy seemed to fill me, and I got up and started out to overtake my friends. They had gone too far to be overtaken; but from that moment on I began to take hearty exercise, to work efficiently at the camp tasks, and to hold consistently to the faith that all this work was making me stronger instead of straining me as it had seemed to do before.

I began to thrive marvelously, and when my father came up to join us a month later, he hardly recognized me. He was amazed at my tireless energy.

WHEN THE end of the summer came, I arrived at an important decision, namely, to give up teaching and enter the ministry. Acting with speed, I found that I could get a scholarship at the Harvard Divinity School to pay my tuition and room rent there and I was able to secure in addition a fellowship of $250 from the Unitarian Association. Thus within two weeks of the time I had decided to go into the ministry, a penniless student found himself provided with ample funds for the year. Such has been always my good fortune when my choices are right and destined.

One may be surprised that it was the Unitarian denomination that I connected myself with as a divinity student rather than "The Church of the Disciples" which I had joined. The reason was this: that an investigation of their larger churches of this denomination around Boston, and of their divinity students, disclosed the fact that there was here no such earnest simple faith and beautiful spirit as had so remarkably characterized the members of the little church in Brockton; and I came to the sad conclusion that the spirituality of the latter had been a local rather than a denominational expression. The theology of the Campbellites being far too narrow for my then intellectual development, I saw no reason to connect myself further with this denomination. Therefore it was with the Unitarians that I now threw my faith and efforts.

My parents were deeply rejoiced at my entering the ministry, for two reasons: one that my grandfather, with seven sons, had been deeply disappointed because none of them had been willing to follow the profession which seemed to him the most worth while in the world. It now seemed fitting that a grandson should take up that work. Secondly, because it seemed a fulfillment of a pledge that my mother had made under extraordinary circumstances. In my babyhood, at the age of about a year, I had double pneumonia and was in a dying condition, the doctors having absolutely given up all hope. During the crisis, my mother, walking back and forth with me gasping in her arms, had prayed deeply for my recovery and had made a vow to consecrate my life to God's service should it be spared. Miraculously, it seemed, my breathing became more regular and I was soon peacefully asleep, and as present events prove, managed to live. Thus it seemed a guidance that due to no suggestions from my parents I should be studying for the ministry and from my own desires was entering upon a course of action which tended to fulfill the promise my mother had made to God.

MIDNIGHT OIL

MARZIEH K. NABIL

A COLLEGE professor once returned a paper on philosophy with the marginal comment that after all, true happiness is to be found only in a state of complete nonexistence. The words of professors are frequently so profound that the ordinary mind had best make no attempt to fathom them. However the remark is an interesting one, because it reminds us again of the innumerable philosophies and systems of existence which are quietly flourishing about us, often in the least likely places. Philosophers write conscientiously tedious tomes on how to live life, and our libraries are crammed with Utopias and paradises, each representing someone's solution to the problem, ranging from descriptions of a world where the houses are edible and the streets are paved with sapphires, to the heaven of the Divine Comedy, where triumph the joys of the intellect. Nor is the average human being's mind entirely idle; for as the world goes on in its impulsive way, counting calories and puzzling comfortably over the latest murder mystery, each individual is yet evolving for himself, as a sort of by product, a philosophy of life; this he will confide on occasion to friends in need. He will tell them, for instance, to return to Nature, and there they will find peace out under the great redwood's balm is awaiting them; or he will insist on the contrary that the spectacle is always within the spectator, and induce them to abandon the redwoods and take up mind-reading or Swedish gymnastics. Should he quote Scripture, he will do so with the pointless charm of Rabelais' pilgrims, whom Gargantua ate in a salad and who found in the Old Testament a literal reference to their experience; he will regard the essence of Scripture only with indulgent respect, and dismiss it as counsels of perfection. He prefers to invent some sleight-of-hand method of living, some system of philosophy, either original or derived from a fellow mortal to whom he has intrusted his judgment.

Man desires a complex and obscure solution to existence; he would rather go bare-footed, subsist entirely on carrots or listen to the voice of his departed uncle issuing at midnight from an alumininum horn, than prefer his neighbor to himself, or confine his business activities to honesty. Moreover his conduct is not unreasonable, for a peculiarity of the universe is that it may, logically, be made to fit any theory whatever; Schopenhauer, disappointed in love, had little difficulty in blaming the female sex for the French Revolution; while some of our modern scientists could with equal justice attribute the disturbance to a pandemic dysfunctioning of endocrine glands.

inition imperfect, for obviously a finite mind cannot hope to settle the infinite business of living, any more than unconscious natural phenomena could organize themselves into a disciplined whole. A study of every philosophy, whether home-made or recognized, will prove that for one acceptable tenet there are ten to be rejected; that every human leader of a school tacitly obliges his followers to disregard many clearly established truths because these happen to conflict with his doctrine; and that even should he bring the moon out of a well, he wears a green veil which none may lift.

In the whole range of human experience there is no fellow human being, however great, who can claim us unreservedly; we invariably find, after reading his book or watching him live, that he suffers as we do from human inadequacy; and so it is that Flaubert warns us not to touch our idols, because their gilt comes off on our fingers; and Emerson grows indignant when we exalt another human being and seek our truth from him, because our ideas are easily as valuable as his, we too are subject to "gleams from within," we find in every work of genius our own rejected thought.

We all, then, have our gleams from within, even though they are often but the vague phosphorescent lights which skim over graveyards after dark. But if we would see, we must stand in the full beating force of the Sun of Reality, which alone "gives truth to the known and the power of knowing to the knower." We must go to the source of all knowledge, which is the knowledge of God; it is only in this light that a science or a philosophy, an act or an event, may be estimated; and this knowledge, which is our only true standard, is embodied in the words and deeds of the Divine Manifestations, Who come to us at Their appointed times and make the world new again. They are the Truth which all men seek, and all other doctrine is true only in so far as it approaches Their divine explanations. They unravel for mankind the significance of human endeavor, and light up the waste and chaos which men have made of former religious dispensations; and learning is sterile without them. They are the soul of life, and the rest is only technique. Their words are the blossoming trees and the pools white with dawn, and men's words are at best like those Japanese bits of paper that develop into flowers when they are dipped in water.

There are those who say that if the prophets of God bring with them a new springtime, while scholars and thinkers do not, it is because the Divine Messengers appeal to the emotions, and they speak simple truths which all can understand, while philosophers have their being on a high intellectual plane to which only the chosen few may hope to ascend. This thought is comforting to our so-called intelligentsia, but unfortunately it does not bear investigation. Those who have watched mysogynists warm to Schopenhauer and the bellicose to Nietzsche, patricians to Plato and politicians to Machiavelli, intuitionists to Kant and cynics to Voltaire, must conclude that emotions are strongly engaged. As for the second point, that the average mind is unable to understand the great truths in our libraries, it is undeniable that some of our writers are involved and tedious; but after painfully ferreting out their meaning we usually find that it could have been expressed in a few simple words, and we decide that what is obscure in a philosopher is his vocabulary. Moreover a thoroughbred thinker is apt to be meticulously lucid; Socrates blamed himself when his pupils failed to understand him, and was at pains to clarify; and Descartes addressed his Discourse to the layman, saying that good sense is the best-shared thing in the world.

But the words of a Divine Manifestation are so perfect in regard to form that the meaning lies open before us; here we do not see as through a glass darkly; the window is flung wide, and we may look as long and as far as our capacity allows; and with each new experience, each new fact learned, the vista develops, and the horizon recedes. The intellectual stimulus is indeed such that it brings to birth new civilizations, driving thought toward reality; while the higher emotions, without which no good act is ever accomplished, are awakened—the heart speaks and is answered.

The Bahá'is are commanded to engage in the most strenuous endeavor, both mental and spiritual; our education may never be spoken of in the past tense; the lines laid down by His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh stretch to infinity, and there is no profitable learning from which we are excluded. For the difference between truth and opinion is this, that the first is a setting-free of the mind, and the second a postponement of wisdom.

ONENESS IN ITS TRUE SIGNIFICANCE

FLORENCE KING

The policy of the Bahá'í Magazine has been to publish from time to time articles contributed by Bahá'í youth in different parts of the world. The author of the following article is one of the younger members of the Bahá'í Community of Washington, D. C.

IT is evident to most people that there is a supreme power which controls the universe. The people of religion call this power, God. All of the great prophets; Moses, Buddha, Zoroaster, Christ (the Son of God), Muhammad (the Seal of the Prophets), and Bahá'u'lláh (the latest Prophet, Who declared Himself in 1868) have taught us that there is one true God. "God singly and alone, abideth in His own place which is holy above space and time, mention and utterance, sign, description, and definition, height and depth."* Bahá'u'lláh's teachings emphasize the "Oneness of God." He says, "Oneness, in its true significance, means that God alone should be realized as the one power which animates and dominates all things, which are but manifestations of Its energy."

If there is only one true God, there can be only one true religion. Then if all the great Prophets taught the worship of the one true God, why is the world of humanity divided up into sects and creeds? There are the followers of the great religious systems; Buddhists, Jews, Christians, Muhammadans, etc. Each religious system is divided into countless sects. Everyone thinks that his religion is the only true religion and that everyone else is wrong. What is the cause of these differences? Man-made interpretations, forms, and ceremonies. These differ. When we read the actual words of the Divine Teachers (Prophets), we find that they all taught the same fundamental truths and that the foundations of all religions are these same truths. "All the great Prophets," said 'Abdu-l-Bahá "have served the selfsame foundation. They have served the same Reality. Hence the purpose and result of all the Prophets have been one and the same. They were the cause of the honor of mankind. They were the Divine civilizations of man, whose foundation is one. For the fundamental basis of the religion of God there is no change nor variation."

The great obstacle to ideal spiritual development, is that all the religions are so cluttered up with superstitions, interpretations, forms and ceremonies, that the one true religion as taught by the Prophets, is obscured. A restatement of truth by a Divine Revelator speaking with authority is needed. That is exactly what Bahá'u'lláh has done for the people of the world today. In the introduction to one of His most important books, called "The Hidden Words," He says, "This is that which descended from the Source of Majesty, through the tongue of Power and Strength upon the Prophets of the past. We have taken its essences and clothed them with the garment of brevity, as a favor to the beloved, that they may fulfill the covenant of God; that they may perform in themselves that which He has entrusted to them, and attain the victory by virtue of devotion in the land of the spirit." Therefore, according to the teaching of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "The Bahá'í religion is not an invitation to a new religion, not a new path to immortality, God forbid, but the ancient path cleared of the debris of strife and misunderstanding and the imaginations and superstitions of men, and is again made a clear path to the sincere seeker that he may enter therein and know that the Word of God is one Word though the Speakers were many."

ALL OF THE Prophets have taught the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. They have all taught the Golden Rule and their purpose has been to bring about unity and love among mankind. Oneness should be applied to mankind as well as to God and to religion. Why have men divided the world into countries and made boundary lines which God never intended to exist? Those in power have done this from personal motives and selfish interests. These national divisions have caused much rivalry between rulers and countries and terrible wars have resulted. "Glory is not his who loves his native land," said Bahá'u'lláh "glory is his who loves his kind. . . . This handful of dust, the world, is one home: let it be in unity." The world has become so much smaller than it used to be as a result of the improved means of transportation and communication, that it now seems little larger than a single country in the past. Wouldn't it be wonderful if the world could be considered as one country and governed as such? Certainly it would be the means of the solution of many perplexing problems which confront humanity today.

THERE IS ANOTHER division which has been the cause of much discord in the world. That is the division of mankind into different races. There is in reality one human race. All were created by God and all are descendants of Adam. Why should the color of the skin make so much difference and be the cause of hatred and separation? That is the only real point of difference between the races. "They are constituted alike and exist under the same law of growth and bodily development. All live and move in the plane of the senses and are endowed with human intelligence. Bahá'u'lláh has declared that difference of race and color is like the variegated beauty of flowers in a garden." When one goes into a rose garden, some of the roses are white, some red, pink, and yellow. This variation of color makes the garden more beautiful. It should be the same in the garden of humanity.

When we travel from country to country and mingle with the peoples of different races and nationalities, we are surprised to find how much alike people are the world over. Of course some have greater educational opportunities than others and are therefore more advanced; but if all received the same education and training, and a universal language was part of that education, differences would disappear and the path to world unity would be cleared of many obstacles.

The Lord has manifested Himself to the world again today. This Manifestation of God is Bahá'u'lláh, Who spoke with divine authority giving the revealed laws and creative words of God which shall purify religion from its superstitions and imitations. He has not only made a restatement of the truths which the former Prophets gave to the world and "Clothed them with the garment of brevity" but He has given us the solution of the peculiar modern problems which need adjustment ere humanity finds peace and rest. He teaches the "Oneness of God," the "Oneness of Religion," and the "Oneness of Mankind." He is the Collective Center about which all the people of the different religions, races, and nations will gather in love and unity. All those who have accepted His teachings and who see in Him the Manifestation of God, whether they be Jews, Christians, Zoroastrians or Moslems, or whether they be black or white or belong to the East or the West are already associating in perfect unity, brotherhood, love, and joy. Only One whom God has sent could accomplish this. "Every dignity shall vanish," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "save the Glory under the shadow of the Word of God."

“Thoughts must be lofty and ideals uplifted in order that the world of humanity may become assisted in new conditions of reform.”

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

INTUITION is a remarkable guide and counselor in thought and action. Some individuals seem to have developed this power to an extraordinary degree; it is especially characteristic of the genius, who arrives at truth through ways other than that trodden by ordinary mortals. The great leaders of humanity, as men of thought arrive at truth, or as men of action steer safely amidst great risks and dangers, by means of the guiding star of intuition.

This power is however in us all and can be cultivated. To speak in spiritual terms, we may call it the guidance of the Holy Spirit—a guidance granted even to those who know not its source. Destiny, to accomplish her ends, aids men of great capacity to achieve through this her gift of intuition.

Those who use this power may or may not recognize it as divine. Napoleon did not. Washington and Lincoln did. But whether recognized or unrecognized, this force has been the principle factor in the great ideas, the great discoveries, the great achievements of the human race.

But there comes a time in many lives when intuition fails to guide.

Those who have walked safely through risks and dangers now stumble and receive no longer the divine guidance. Of such, Napoleon is the most striking instance. He plainly from the beginning of his campaign in Russia seemed to have lost all power of guidance, and his ruin followed upon his own misjudgments and mistakes. Why this sudden curtailment in correctness of guidance? Plainly the power of intuition cannot be granted in unlimited degree to mortals who are too self-centered and exploitive in their aims. This guidance, which raises the power of the individual to the *n*th degree, is unsafe to put in selfish hands; and although destiny may grant it to men of great capacity in order that their peculiar gifts may reach fruition for the sake of the world, if these individuals do not come to consecrate their lives purely to service the gift of guidance finally is withdrawn. Otherwise the selfish would use this power to exploit the very universe itself.

EXACTLY the same thing is true of prayer. In small degree we are permitted to pray for material things, for definite desires—human though they be.

“Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.”*

But how far can the desires of material human nature be met through prayer? It is evident that there is an almost mathematical limit to this possibility. For two reasons there cannot be unlimited fulfillment of individual desires. First because the selfish desires of individuals often conflict in such a way that if the desires of one person are granted ad infinitum it would mean a proportionate curtailment in the satisfaction of the wants of others. For instance, in a specific locality all might desire to live in the most desirable and elevated section of the locality; yet plainly all cannot do so. Therefore there is a distinct limit to the possibility of answer to prayer on the part of the individual for such a purpose.

Even more apparent is the inevitable limitation of prayer in meeting the desire of individuals to rise to the top level economically, socially or politically. The reason is apparent and is of a mathematical nature. The number of individuals at the top is always a very limited number. If we reckon it mathematically, only ten percent of the people can ever rise to the position of the first ten percent. That is a universal law which no amount of prayer can interfere with. The organization not only of human society, but of the universe itself, depends upon gradations of rank and subordination as well as upon leadership of the few. “The degrees of society must be preserved. The farmer will continue to till the soil, the artist pursue his art, the banker to finance the nation. An army has need of its general, captain, and private soldiers. The degrees varying with the pursuits are essential.” This is a universal law not subject to the caprice of man's desire, even if expressed in the most earnest of prayers.

But supposing one prays not for external things so much as for opportunity for the fulfillment of one's own abilities and for complete self-expression. Even here, however, there is necessarily a definite limit, if by self-expression we mean the will-to-power and the enhancement of the ego. For should prayer become a tool for extending the ego to an infinite degree of resourcefulness and power the universe would become a sorry chaos of warring titans. Plainly there is a limit to self-expression which no manner of earnest prayer can avail to overpass. The Infinite and Eternal One cannot bestow, upon the many, power to an infinite degree. In fact power is not bestowed by God upon any one. It is only loaned. The individual may become a channel for the Will of God, and as such continue to progress infinitely. There is no limit to the extent to which the individual may seek to express the Will of God; for in such an arrangement there is still the One Power—the universe is still a unity and not a chaos.

APPLYING these truths to the individual life, it becomes apparent that prayer is not too much to be used toward the fulfillment of material desires or toward self-expression, though God in His mercy and beneficence permits prayer to be an aid even in these directions within the limits already described.* But men of faith should soon arise from the low plain of requesting God to satisfy their personal desires toward the higher planes of selflessness and service; and where prayer is used, seek for further abnegation of self, union with and attachment to God, illumination and guidance in the way of universal service.

Baha'i Scriptures, paragraph 572

Many earnestly religious people are dismayed at finding their most ardent prayers unanswered. Could they look within themselves they might find the reason and learn to raise their prayers to a higher level. Through earnestness of spiritual request many human material desires do find fulfillment, it is true; but when the individual becomes puzzled by the fact that there is no consistency in this procedure and that while some prayers are answered others are not, he may do well to consider the two great spiritual laws above described which make it inevitable that the further one proceeds in the direction of using prayer for egoistic desires the less in proportion is the success attained. On the other hand, there is no limit to the extent to which prayer can be used as a source of illumination, of union with God, of power for service. The best prayer we can make is—"I ask of Thee, O Thou Beloved of the hearts and the Hope of the lovers, to make us pure and without desire, following Thy command, and leaving our delights to seek Thy good pleasure."

"We ask for things which the Divine Wisdom does not desire for us, and there is no answer for our prayer. His Wisdom does not sanction what we wish. We pray, 'O God! make me wealthy!' If this prayer were universally answered human affairs would be at a standstill. There would be none left to work in the streets, none to till the soil, none to build, none to run the trains. Therefore it is evident that it would not be well for us if all prayers were answered. The affairs of the world would be interfered with, energies crippled and progress hindered. But whatever we ask for, which is in accord with Divine Wisdom God will answer. Assuredly!

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

DIVINE LOVE AND MAN'S PROGRESS

ROSA V. WINTERBURN

THE first need of finite man in his progress towards the Infinite is the infiltration of the Spirit of God. The Spirit is illumination, it is impulse, it is energy; and, perhaps most important of all, it is the means of steady contact with divine sources of life. It is communication opened up between man and God. It is imperative for human happiness, achievement, and success that this road be kept open; that man permit this spirit of God to grow in his heart, and that he consciously foster and encourage it. This growth depends largely upon expression. It must manifest itself in the words, the actions, the heart fibre of man, or it will wither and die. We are steadily assured in the Divine Words that the agent for this expression is love, divine love.

Love is not only the constructive energy between human beings, it serves the same purpose between man and God. So important is this command to love that it appears among the first instructions in the Hidden Words.*

“O Son of Existence! Love me, that I may love thee. If thou lovest me not, my love can never reach thee. Know this, O servant!”

That is man must open his heart by love. He must live love, or the understanding of the divine love can never penetrate into his own consciousness. The unruly, hating child has no conception of the meaning of a parent's love. It is only when his own heart becomes awakened by love and he gives it expression that the father's or mother's love can sweep in a flood into his life and understanding. So a human being must love; must live it, must help plant it in the lives of those around him before he can even dream of the meaning of divine love. But once implanted such love becomes the agent for the expression of the divine spirit through man; and as the spirit grows stronger so also will its expression, love, become more compelling, more comforting, more constructive.

We are not left in doubt as to the nature of this love. We are warned against mistaking involved human preferences, longings, and emotions for the clear sunlight of Divine love. Such a love light makes as clear the beauties in the life of one we may have called an enemy as in the life of one we humanly love. It stimulates the growth of tolerance, justice, help towards all; it eliminates suspicion and jealousy; it is an ever-purling stream of human happiness.

This divine love in the hearts of men and its expression are imperative if the world is to be reconstructed in this new age. In fact it is the only means. World peace will never be brought about by laws and courts and conferences and parliaments, unless these are the active agents for the organized formulation of human and divine love. Love must function through human agents because the world is human. It is not intended to function miraculously nor by direct divine intervention, because men are entrusted with the rebuilding of this world as God's agents; and the fact that men rebuild by their own efforts is what causes the upliftment of mankind. It is said, "God does not change that which people have until they change what is within themselves."

"The divine purpose in religion is pure love and amity" * * * "Thus will humanity be rescued from the strife and wars of six thousand years, dissensions will pass away and the illumination of unity dawn." Consider the depth of meaning in these words and their significance to the human race. The divine purpose of religion is pure love and amity. For six thousand years, says Ábdu'l-Bahá, vicissitudes and hardships have prevailed in this world, but he continues, "Now in this radiant century let us try to carry out the good pleasure of God, that we may be rescued from these things of darkness and come forth into the boundless illumination of heaven, shunning division and welcoming the divine oneness of humanity."

The conclusion is evident. Live, love and amity. Teach them to our children. Practice them in business. Deal with crime and evil through love, not revenge or fear. In such a life there is no place for weak yielding to evil or wrong doing; for love must be strong and just. It must be ceaseless training for the divine perfections. "Pure love and amity" are not the mere human personal emotions. They are the universal divine principles of eternal life and growth and happiness. One of man's greatest difficulties is to learn how to distinguish between his own personal emotions—the human—and the universal basic guides of life—the divine. Failure to so differentiate the human from the divine holds mankind back in the old six thousand year struggle.

The lesson of this "radiant century" is that humanity shall emerge from the merely human environment of materiality, emotion, and personal desires into a practical and applied understanding of the universality of the divine principles, and that he shall base upon the divine principles our treatment of crime, ignorance, poverty, unemployment, unlimited accumulation of wealth, and discords individual and national.

Slowly through the ages man has been trained to a fuller comprehension of the divine purpose. There have been glorious teachers and radiant followers, steadily lifting mankind to higher and higher levels of understanding and accomplishment. Now the day has dawned when all mankind should participate in this religion which is "pure love and amity." "Enough of these six thousand years which have brought such vicissitudes and hardships into the world! Now in this radiant century let us try to carry out the good pleasure of God!"

STUDENTS OF THE LAND OF THE RISING SUN

AGNES B. ALEXANDER

"Just as the sun is the source of all lights in the solar system, so today Bahá'u'lláh is the Center of Unity of the human race and of the peace of the world."

THESSE were the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to the late Dr. Naruse, the founder of the Japan Woman's University, of Tokyo in London, in 1912.

As I look from my window on the street below, there pass by young men clad in blue uniforms, or girls in blue skirts, white blouses and hats all of the same style, some with their knapsacks of books on shoulders, or school bags in their hands. These are the students of the Land of the Rising Sun, where knowledge is eagerly sought. As all wear regulation school uniforms, Tokyo would appear to be a city of students.

A study of more recent trends in Japanese school children and of schools of higher education shows a most unusual evolution from customs of previous generations to an extreme modernization both in costumes and habits of thought.

One of the fine things about these schools is their democratization expressed outwardly by uniform costumes so that all students, rich and poor, appear alike, and no one can tell whether they come from humble or wealthy homes.

Education is taken very seriously in Japan. There is greater demand for higher education than there is opportunity or accommodation for the pupils, therefore there is great competition and school life is taken very seriously.

Students in Japan have a broad outlook upon life, very cosmopolitan, and they think deeply upon some of the world's current problems. For instance recently in a contest held between students of three universities of Tokyo, among the subjects chosen were the following: The World State; at the Pacific Era; Religion, the Primary Institution; Japan's Civilization and World Prosperity; the Pacific Ocean in the Future; the Final Goal of the East; International Student Federation; the Coming War and Imperialism on the Pacific; Individual Consciousness and the Solution of the Economic Problem; Arbitration and World Peace.

One of the fine private Preparatory Schools for Boys in Japan is the Seikei Gakuyen, a school of about four hundred boys in the suburbs of Tokyo. I had the pleasure of attending here an Esperanto Program gotten up by a group of about forty students who are devotees of this linguistic movement. I had been invited to take part in the program and to speak in Esperanto on some subject which would interest their mothers and sisters for on this occasion they were the guests of the students.

The program began at eight-thirty a. m. and continued, with an hour-and-a-half intermission at noon, until four p. m. The first part was devoted to speeches in Japanese by ten of the students.

The Esperanto program opened with songs sung by the Esperanto group of the school followed by a talk given by Dr. Asajiro Oka, a member of the Imperial Academy of Japan, the highest educational body in Japan, and an enthusiastic Esperantist. Speaking in Japanese on, "The International Age," which he described as the age in which we are living, he called attention to the necessity at this time for an international language.

The writer spoke in Esperanto, one of the students eloquently interpreting into Japanese. The talk was entitled, "Showa," that is, "Bright Peace" (the name given to the present era in Japan) and how to attain it in the world through the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh.

Twelve musical numbers consisting of occidental music, piano, violin and vocal songs in English, German and Hawaiian completed the program.

In the school rooms were exhibits of history, art, geography, travel, baseball, rugby, weather reports, Esperanto and other subjects. In the center of the Esperanto exhibition room, a tree placed upon a table with rainbow streamers extending from its top had inscribed at its foot the word, "Mondpaco," "World Peace." Around it and on three sides of the room Esperanto literature from all parts of the world was displayed. The conception of the Esperanto tree coincided with words which Lidja Zamenhof, the daughter of the author of Esperanto, wrote to a group of Esperantists of Tokyo: "Bahá'u'lláh, la granda Profeto de la lasta jarcento, diris antaŭ kelkdek jaroj, ke lingvo internacio estas necesa por atingi la Ciamduran Pacon. Tia sama estis la motivo de la Autoro de Esperanto, kaj tio estas la stelo, kiu ne nur verde, sed per cium koloroj de cielarko lumigas kaj briligas nian horizonton." The translation of this is: "Bahá'u'lláh, the great Prophet of the last century said some sixty years ago that an international language was necessary in order to attain Everlasting Peace. Such also was the motive of the author of Esperanto, and that is the star which not only in green (the Esperanto color), but with all colors of the rainbow, brightens and illumines our horizon."

In an adjoining room, travel by means of Esperanto was represented. Here seated upon an aeroplane, "Esperanto," suspended in the air by means of wires, was a dummy which appeared to be traveling through the universe. Across the room a paper globe represented our world, and other planets were indicated by stars.

In order to arrange the Esperanto exhibition, the students had sacrificed their nights' sleep and worked, with only one hour's rest, through the night.*

This school also observes a fast during the year. As most of the students come from families of the higher class and have never experienced what it is to go without sleep or food, these meetings are held to teach them (as explained in the school pamphlet) "how delicious is sleep and how much they owe to food."

The "fast meeting", as it is called, is not compulsory, only each student of Seikei is required to keep it once during his school days there. At the time of the fast, the boys of the lower grades abstain from eating two or three meals during one day, while those of the higher classes retire to a temple for three days and keep a fast, except for a bowl of rice water served each day at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. It is said, the first day they are hungry, the second day they are not so hungry, and the third day their minds are clear. During these three days they practice Japanese penmanship, and are advised to omit their physical exercises. For each time a student keeps the fast, he is given a silver medal, and if he keeps it five times, he receives a gold medal.

Morning devotional service is observed in this school by the students assembling in the main hall and sitting there in silence for fifteen minutes with hands folded in front, but during the fast they remain in silence for thirty minutes.

The eager, earnest students of Japan are found everywhere. A group which I have been privileged to meet are the students studying English in the new Tokyo Y. M. C. A., a six-storied building which was opened December 29, 1929. Here three hundred and fifty young men, most of whom work during the day, attend the night school which is held five evenings in the week. I had the pleasure of teaching here as a substitute for a friend several weeks. On three especially arranged occasions the opportunity was given me to speak of the Bahá'í Movement, one of these times to the English Speaking Club when about one hundred assembled.

To share in any way in assisting these bright, eager minds to find true knowledge is indeed a joy and a privilege.

In a Tablet from Ábdu'l-Bahá to the late Dr. George J. Augur, of Honolulu, are these words:

"Japan has great capacity, but there must needs be a teacher who will speak by the confirmations of the Holy Spirit."

*These students are trained to sacrifice sleep through the observance once a year of a "sitting up all night meeting," that is, during one night they assemble in the school hall and spend the night, first sitting in silence followed by talks from the teachers, moving pictures, a walk out of doors, and again silence broken after a time, until the morning.

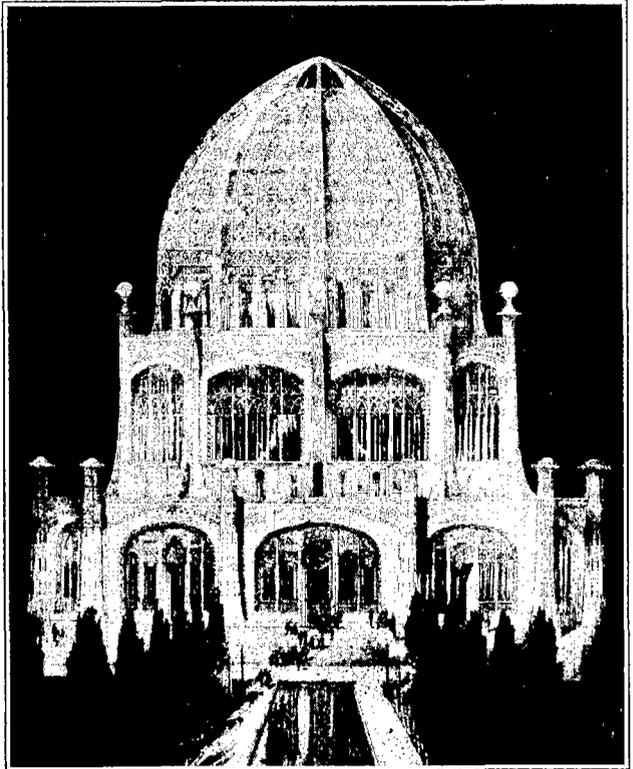

THE PASSING OF LOUIS BOURGEOIS

S. W.

THE architect of the first Bahá'í Temple of Worship in America, and in fact on this continent, passed to the life eternal on August 19, 1930. The Bahá'í world has thus lost one of its most distinguished citizens.

Probably in every country of the world Mr. Bourgeois was known, at least in architectural circles, for his now famous design of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkar which is now in course of construction on the shores of Lake Michigan in Wilmette (suburb of Chicago, Ill.). Of this magnificent design Mr. Bourgeois himself wrote in a letter to a friend in these somewhat mystical terms:

"I cannot write on the Temple. This belongs to some one else to do. It is what others see in this Temple, not what I may say. It is too sacred to me to try to utter words about it. It would be like a mother praising her child, besides it is not my child but God's child. Very few will see its reality in this age. I cannot see the end yet regarding the Temple, but I leave it all to the Blessed Beauty and to the Greatest Branch who shall 'build the Temple of the Lord.' My share in it is so small, it is not worth mentioning.

It reminds me of the Moving Picture called D'Israeli. When this mighty Jew accomplished the impossible, all his friends came to congratulate him because of his wonderful power. His answer was, 'I have no power, but they do not know it.' Most people who appreciate this 'new art' look to me as the creator of it, but the One Who did it, they do not know—that One was the Blessed Perfection, Bahá'u'lláh."

Many times we have heard it said by returned Bahá'í pilgrims from the Holy Land that Ábdul-Bahá had said that the design was given to the world by Bahá'u'lláh, that it was Bahá'u'lláh's Temple.

Mr. Bourgeois submitted his model at the Convention of Bahá'is held in New York City in April, 1920, at which time his design was chosen. The Temple as now being constructed under the direction of The Research Service, Inc., Managing and Supervising Engineers of Washington, D. C., is somewhat reduced in size, the design having been made smaller by Mr. Bourgeois himself in accordance with the instructions of Ábdu'l-Bahá.

This Temple is dedicated to the Oneness of God and the oneness of mankind. Its reality both materially and spiritually will not be fully understood, as Mr. Bourgeois intimated, for some time to come. It is a Temple of Light, "the first thing new in architecture since the thirteenth century," according to Mr. H. VanBuren Magonigle, past president of the American Federation of Arts.

But to the minds of many one of the most remarkable things about this unique and magnificent edifice is the fact that funds for its erection have come from many parts of the world and only from Bahá'is. In the Words of Ábdu'l-Bahá," . . . from every country in the world according to their various means, contributions are continually being sent toward the fund of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkar in America. . . . From the day of Adam until now such an event has never been witnessed by man that, from the farthest country of Asia contributions were forwarded to America. This is through the Power of the Covenant of God."

Probably no modern architectural creation of any kind has attracted such widespread interest as Mr. Louis G. Bourgeois' design of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkar, descriptions of which have appeared in newspapers and magazines around the world.

* * * *

"Nothing short of direct and constant interaction between the spiritual forces emanating from this House of Worship centering in the heart of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkar, and the energies consciously displayed by those who administer its affairs in their service to humanity can possibly provide the necessary agency capable of removing the ills that have so long and so grievously afflicted humanity. For it is assuredly upon the consciousness of the efficacy of the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, reinforced on one hand by spiritual communion with His Spirit, and on the other by the intelligent application and the faithful execution of the principles and laws He revealed, that the salvation of a world in travail must ultimately depend. And of all the institutions that stand associated with His Holy Name, surely none save the institution of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkar can most adequately provide the essentials of Bahá'í worship and service, both so vital to the regeneration of the world. Therein lies the secret of the loftiness, of the potency, of the unique position of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkar as one of the outstanding institutions conceived by Bahá'u'lláh."

IN MEMORIAM

TO LOUIS BOURGEOIS

THOU ART NOT DEAD

SHAHNAZ WAITE

O thou who caught the vision crystal clear
 And brought it forth to man in outer form,
 A thing so mystical, so wondrous fair,
 That those who stand before it, bow their heads
 As if before a shrine and say, "Behold!
 This is the work of God, and not of man!
 A Temple whose design was drawn above,
 And given to humanity through thee."

How pure a mirror must have been thy heart,
 That it could draw from realms invisible
 This radiant ray of truth, and it reflect
 In all its splendor to a waiting world.
 This is the Temple of the Living God,
 A House of Worship, Unity and Love;
 Where all who enter in are one in Him,
 And in that oneness ever will abide.

Its form divine is like a mighty chord
 Of sweet celestial music—spreading peace
 And harmony throughout the world. It is
 The "Lost Chord" found again, the chord of love,
 That shall retune each heart with Power Divine
 Until the whole world joins in one great song,
 That Song of Life—the Song of the Redeemed.
 Blessed thou art, thrice blessed thou indeed,
 Whom God didst choose to be a channel pure,
 To give this Glorious Temple to the world.

Thou art not dead, but risen to higher realms,
 Thy work not finished; thou shalt still work on
 And guide the hands of those who daily build,
 Until completion crowns the Temple's brow;
 Then with the "Choir Invisible" thou wilt join
 In songs of praise, while from the temple's doors
 The songs of little children, sweet and pure,
 Will float out far upon etheric waves,
 Encircling all the earth with Peace and Love.

In fondest memory thou wilt still live on,
 And ever will the Temple speak of thee;
 For God through thee didst give it unto man
 A Monument of sacrifice and love
 To shed its glorious light of knowledge true;
 And in that light shall men see face to face,
 And East and West forevermore be one.

A CANDLE

MONA WANDANITA HILLE

A candle—once you said—if it would give light
 Must give its life to the dark night,
 Drop by drop. So when the feeble flame
 Had flickered out I saw your name
 In silver signature blaze across the darkened sky.
 Then I knew why.
 The frail, clear crystal bowl
 That held your soul
 Had shattered.
 For, after all, what mattered
 To you was Light!
 And that there might
 Be yet more light you gave yourself in rapt caress
 To loveliness
 That an all-too-poignant beauty might raise Itself in temple-towers for the future days.
 Clear-etched against the lake
 It towered in your vision. You knew not it would break
 Your heart with beauty—
 This sweetly dim altar to an unseen Deity.
 You smiled—and slept—a slow, white slumber.
 But do you know the number
 Of lights you lit with your candle, as it dripped
 Its life on those who dipped Into your soul? "You know!" you said, in accents slow.
 Ah, yes. We know. . . .

SOME ASPECTS OF MODERN SCIENCE

II. The Passing of Atomic Materialism

GLENN A. SHOOK

Professor of Physics, Wheaton College

THE early doctrine of physical science was rightly called Atomic Materialism. It accounted for all physical phenomena by means of the motions, impacts, etc., of some sort of atom model, but made no claim to account for the mental and spiritual aspects of our lives. As the triumphs in the physical world increased, however, the atomic world became more and more real, while the mental and spiritual was regarded as more or less shadowy. By the end of the nineteenth century this type of materialism was generally accepted among scientific men and it would have claimed all educated men had it not been for the failure of the classical physics to solve all our modern problems. The radical change to which the atom was subjected every few years did much to disturb the confidence of scientific men so we are not far from the truth when we say that mechanical materialism was finally destroyed by the very progress of physical science.

The public at large, however, lags a good many years behind the foremost minds so that we still see some eighteenth century materialism even today, although it is hardly considered respectable!

Now this change called for a truce between science and religion so that the old time conflict is no longer in evidence; nevertheless there is a kind of materialism which is just as dangerous, if not more so, to real spiritual and moral progress.

When the physical sciences discarded their crude atomic models, because they were inadequate for their researches, these models were taken over by the newer biological sciences where they still occupy an important place. Now it is important to remember that while the physical sciences no longer hold to the old views of matter they are nevertheless "mechanistic." They operate exclusively in a "mechanical" world (using the term in a broad sense), a world in which there is no urge or desire to attain a definite goal.¹

If a ball is released from the hand it will fall to the ground but the ground is not a goal for the ball, that is it has no urge to reach the ground. If an obstacle is placed in the path of the ball, say a table, it will fall upon the table and it will make no effort to reach the ground. It may, to be sure, roll over the edge of the table and thus reach the ground but no one would interpret that as an urge. Again when the ball is released we know with certainty what will happen to it. Now when a flower turns toward the light it shows a purposive action and if an obstacle is placed in its way it will endeavor to get around the obstacle but the ball never exhibits any such purposive action and it is with this kind of world and with this kind only that the physical sciences are concerned.

Moreover any science, biology or psychology let us say, which bases a theory upon a physical science is necessarily mechanistic. Incidentally, as McDougall points out, the sciences find some difficulty in keeping up with the rapid changes of the latter and as a result very many of them are still thinking in terms of atomic materialism. If the simple atom of Democritus cannot solve the problems of physical science it seems highly improbable that it can solve even the simplest mental process. We need not dwell for a moment upon the obvious fact that as a machine the mind is incomparably more complex than the most baffling physical problem.

The object of the present article is to indicate some of the conclusions of a mechanistic theory and to explain, briefly, to be sure, the grounds upon which such a theory is based. Modern Materialism, then, as differentiated from the Atomic Materialism of the past, is essentially a mechanistic theory.

Let us examine some of the consequences of Modern Materialism to see if our views of the origin, purpose, and destiny of man is thereby effected, for if there are no serious implications in the mechanistic science we shall not be particularly alarmed concerning it.

To quote from McDougall's recent book²: "If the mechanistic assumption is valid, we cannot validly postulate any, even the slightest, degree of freedom of choice, any effectiveness of our ideals and our aspirations for their fulfillment; we cannot believe in the reality of moral effect or of creative activity of any kind; our belief that we can by our efforts contribute in some degree of the realization of our ideals; our belief that by taking thought we may refine our ideals, or give preference to the better over the less good; our belief that by self-discipline and culture we may raise ourselves in some degree in the scale of personal value and contribute however little towards the conservation of values—all such beliefs are illusory." He has probably not overstated the case against Modern Materialism and indeed we are tempted to go one step further. If all creative activity is an illusion why not throw out the mechanistic assumption? There is some slight evidence that the whole theory might fall of its own weight, but we should not take that passive attitude toward any vital question.

Revealed religion in the light of such a theory would be pure superstition and herein lies its greatest danger. The only religion possible under such a system would be Pantheism for Deism is ruled out.

When we consider the circumstances it is not surprising that some sort of scientific attack should be made upon the mental process. At the same time when a concrete mechanical model was considered a sufficient explanation for physical phenomena the scientific method appeared to be the only ideal one and quite naturally if this is the most perfect example of the way in which God works it would certainly be consistent to apply this simple and orderly procedure to the mind. Moreover, about the time Modern Materialism was taking shape, the physical world was considered the real world and it is but natural that certain types of materialistic philosophers should look upon the mind only in the light of a ready-made mechanical model.

On the other hand, before a complete physical explanation of all mental and spiritual aspects was established, certainly before the great mass of educated men realized the consequences of the mechanistic assumption, the physicist had ceased to look upon a model of any kind as ultimate reality.

Physicists today realize that they cannot get very far behind the symbols they use in equations. As we have shown before a thing is no longer considered real merely because it is concrete. As Eddington points out “. . . time might be taken as typical of the kind of stuff of which we imagine the physical world to be built.” This suggestion is very helpful, for time is real to all of us but it is certainly not concrete, and to most of us energy is also real but hardly more concrete. Now if we could extend the same idea to mass and to space as the physicist is able to do, we should realize that the physical world is symbolic.

We may now summarize the salient points:

1. The mechanistic theory is not based upon the most modern and consequently the only adequate concepts of the atom. To quote Eddington; “Physics today is not likely to be attracted by a type of explanation of the mind which it would scornfully reject for its own ether.”

2. From the time of Newton to the present physicists have made no claim to account for mind or spirit and it is reasonable to assume that they are in a position to realize the limitations of physical science.

3. No philosophy or science should claim the support of the physical sciences upon matters which the physical sciences repudiate. Eddington's reaction to this point is very illuminating; “Penetrating as deeply as we can by the methods of physical investigation into the nature of a human being we reach only symbolic description. Far from attempting to dogmatise as to the nature of the reality thus symbolized, physics most strongly insists that its methods do not penetrate behind the symbolism.”

The efforts of psychology along this line must be regarded in the light of an explanation rather than a series of significant discoveries. The physicist drops a theory or explanation when he finds that it fails to explain the observed facts. It may happen, as in the case of the wave theory of light, that he retains a theory provisionally if it seems to explain some of the facts, but under this condition the retained theory is certainly not regarded as satisfactory. We do not maintain today that we have a satisfactory theory of light but on the contrary we are inclined to regard the situation as a dilemma.

Such things as intuition, spiritual guidance, creative impulses, etc. are as real to a highly developed people as fear, anger, and the desire for physical necessities are to the general run of mankind, and they must be reckoned with by any theory that claims to explain mental and spiritual effects. To maintain that spiritual experiences are an illusion is comparable to saying that all of the modern discoveries in light are false merely because they cannot be explained upon the old wave theory.

A hundred blind men may testify that the sun does not exist but if a few should receive sight they would immediately discredit the testimony of the rest. Again a community may consist for the most part of ignorant people but that would not disprove the existence of wisdom, for a few wise men might so demonstrate the value of wisdom that the ignorant would desire to attain it.

The only position then, that psychologists can take (upon spiritual matters) is the position that the modern physicist takes with reference to the wave theory or any similar half truth; that is they must admit that they are in a dilemma for the reason that the mechanistic theory will not explain all the facts.

Shall we ask psychology, then, to explain our spiritual experiences, putting them aside as illusory if they are not thus justified? No, we must reject psychology for the larger experience just as we reject an atom model as an explanation of the ultimate reality of some physical law.

It is sometimes claimed that when sufficient data are collected psychology can explain mental and spiritual operations with the same accuracy that the physicists can explain a physical phenomenon. Even if true such a pronouncement is far from satisfactory, for if man, to illustrate the point, has no greater evidence for the future life than the physicist has for the existence of the ether, he would certainly be justified in turning materialist. The whole difficulty is, as we have tried to indicate, these two ideas are not comparable.

Finally we must remember that any theory or hypothesis which is proposed as an explanation of some effect cannot be attended with a large number of exceptions. If the mind is a machine, then it should behave like a machine most of the time. To assume that it is a machine but on account of an infinity of unknown factors it practically never functions as a machine can hardly be taken as good ground for a theory that rejects the most obvious and direct experiences of life. Again we can do no better than to quote Eddington, "In comparing things spiritual and things temporal, let us not forget this—Mind is the first and most direct thing in our experience; all else is remote inference. . . . Surely then that mental and spiritual nature of ourselves, known in our minds by an intimate contact transcending the methods of physics supplies just that interpretation of the symbols which science is admittedly unable to give."

We must always be ready to follow truth wherever it leads, but in rejecting the mechanistic assumption we are rejecting a theory that is built upon an unstable foundation and that does not take into account all of the facts of our mental experience.

In the last article we shall approach the problem from the spiritual rather than the rational standpoint.

A PILGRIMAGE THROUGH PERSIA

Martyrdoms and the New Civilization

This is the fourth installment of the serial story by Miss Root describing her experiences in Persia. The articles have been appearing monthly beginning with the July Bahá'í Magazine.

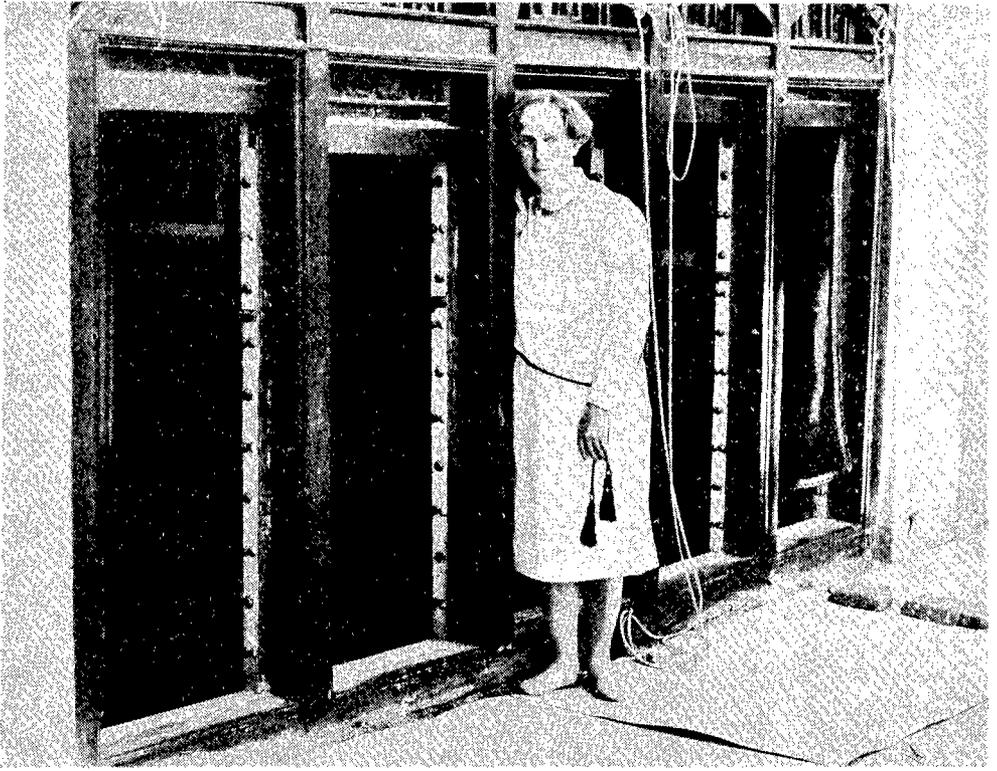

Bahá'í Persia! You have borne the martyrdoms, the exiles, the loss of all your worldly possessions, you have suffered and yet worked on continuously, day and night, taking no rest nor composure. You have established the Bahá'í Cause on a firm foundation. You have looked to the western friends to come. I give you the glad tidings that they will come, and soon. The rest of the world can never thank you enough that you have stood in your place and done your part to establish and promote the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh.

How many of the stories of the martyrs come to my mind! Suleimnan Khan, a young man still in the thirties, son of a statesman, when the executioners had cut holes in his body and after placing lighted candles in the wounds paraded him through the streets of Tihrán in derision because he was a Bahá'í, he said to the chief: "Would you please move this one candle that is burning my hair and put it in some other place?" Angrily asked why, he answered very softly: "Because Bahá'u'lláh's hand has touched my hair!"

The little boy of twelve years, Rouhullah Vargha, who so courageously gave his life rather than deny his Lord, I have written as a story apart from this, it is one of the most touching spiritual tales in all history. The child, after seeing his father cut to pieces for being a Bahá'í, the Chief of the Court who could not persuade the boy to say that he was not a Bahá'í, whispered orders to strangle the lad a little just to frighten him and then he would ask the boy again. This little boy strangled with the rope around his neck did regain consciousness. The Chief of the Court coaxed him to give up his religion. Rouhullah Vargha said: "No, I saw Bahá'u'lláh, I can never deny Him. I will go as my father went." Dropping on his knees, as the Persians pray, this little boy began to chant. The Chief of the Court was so overcome he called out to the executioner to kill the child quickly, and he himself ran out of the room through the corridor past the other Bahá'í prisoners standing to await execution, and no more of those prisoners were put to death that day. None of these people had done anything. It is written on their prisoner photographs taken before their execution, that they had become Babis (Bahá'is) which was against religion.

No city, no province escaped, all had their martyrs' graves. This religion was accepted by many mulahs, Seyids and statesmen as well as by lay Muhammadans. Indeed, four hundred distinguished mulahs accepted the teachings of the Martha L. Root, as a pilgrim, taken at the House of the Báb in Shiraz, Persia, on May 4, 1930. This is the room where the Báb first declared His mission. Later He declared it at Mecca.

Báb and Bahá'u'lláh and openly declared their faith. They too, were martyred.

TODAY THE VISITOR to Persia sees that some of the most responsible positions of the whole Empire are entrusted to Bahá'is, and no Bahá'í has ever betrayed the confidence reposed in him. They are most loyal, trustworthy citizens who work for the Government with all their brains and all their heart. A great new spiritual culture is arising in Persia. When you read the account of the various Bahá'í committees in my next article you will see the training that is transforming the believers into efficient workers. They are broadened and evolved through the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. Every Bahá'í too without exception educates his sons and daughters, and when he cannot do it the National Spiritual Bahá'í Assembly helps him.

One man who knows all Persia very well said that some of the young people educated in Europe lose the spirit and strict observance of their ancestral Muhammadan religion. They cease to believe in their Prophet and are really agnostic. Before they went abroad, their religion was the foundation of their purity and character. Losing their religion, they lose their highest ideals. Then when they come back sometimes they are not sincere with themselves or with others. Their ancestors, although they had not been trained in education as we know it today—still they were moral, pure and sincere. The great service which the Bahá'í Cause is giving to the present generation is the morality, the pure life, the sincerity of their forefathers plus the new sciences and modern education. This is helping to build the new Persia.

The great masses of the Bahá'í students who, because of the financial condition of the country, cannot afford to study in Europe and in the United States, still are getting education in the Bahá'í schools and in other schools of the nation; in their studies of the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh they catch the illumination and they evolve to a high spiritual culture which combines religion and the sciences.

Even the humblest Bahá'í in the smallest village—and there are five hundred villages in Persia where there are Bahá'ís—has become tolerant, kind and really internationally-minded. Foreigners going into Persia are astonished to find that these poor peasants in the cradle of Central Asia are liberal-minded toward people of all other religions. Men sometimes study forty years to become mullahs, but their learning belongs to the past; when speaking with a Bahá'í peasant they cannot always answer his arguments.

Another man whom I met in Persia, this one a Bahá'í, told me that there are many laws passed in Parliament about elections. Some of the laws preclude Bahá'ís. If one is known to be a Bahá'í, according to the laws he cannot become a parliamentarian. One day this Bahá'í, when speaking to a well-known member of Parliament, said to him:

“You have among your Parliament members Zoroastrians, Jews, Christians who really do not believe in Muhammad. Why do you exclude Bahá'ís who believe in Muhammad and know His Station as the Messenger of God? He replied: “Those Zoroastrians, Jews and Christians have no influence over us, while you Bahá'ís, although you are a minority, you are uprooting us, you are taking great numbers of our members. This is why we do not wish you to have more power. I shall tell you the truth, we do not wish you to increase in influence in Persia.”

However, the Bahá'í Cause is progressing steadily. During these five weeks of the writer's stay, a Persian Almanac was being published. It had a large paid advertisement against the Bahá'í movement inserted by enemies. Although the book was in the press and four hundred copies had been finished, when the National Spiritual Assembly took this matter up with government officials the advertisement was ordered out of the book. The four hundred copies were ordered to be sent to the Police Department where this page was cut out from every one of the four hundred copies.

THE WRITER was present at an amateur theatrical performance given by Bahá'í young men before seven hundred men and women in the Grand Hotel theatre to raise money for the Bahá'í Library. It was interesting to see that (just as at the cinemas now) the men and women attended, the ladies sitting in one half of the theatre and the men in the other part. Many government people were present, captains, policemen, at least a third of the audience was non-Bahá'í. A fine orchestra was playing and every musician was a Bahá'í. The actors, and they were all Bahá'ís, performed with the capacity and ease of professionals, and received the deserved applause due to true artists. The drama had to do with education, the calamity of the rich father who refused to give his son an education and the blessing to the poor man who struggled that his boy might be trained in the sciences. On a blackboard in the last act were the Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá on the necessity of education. Also a chorus of Bahá'í children chanted one of the Bahá'í poems.

The Tarbiat Bahá'í School for Boys and the School for Girls will be written about in a separate article. However, Persians told me that many great families send their children to these schools because of the high moral character of the training. For fifteen years they were the highest institutions of their kind in Persia, excepting one government school which was known as the University. Now the government has established excellent schools. The children of His Imperial Majesty Pahlevi Shahan-shah attended the Tarbiat Schools before he was Shah, and afterwards a teacher from Tarbiat Schools has been one of the teachers in the Royal Palace; for His Royal Highness the Crown Prince Muhammad Reza Pahlevi and the Shah's daughters now have private tutors. So many children from the provinces have asked to come and study in the Tarbiat Schools, but it is not possible until a dormitory can be built for them. I asked how much such a dormitory would cost and the National Spiritual Assembly said it would require thirty-five thousand dollars. It would be very beautiful if the west could do this for the country boys and girls of Persia. Any service which is rendered for education to this nation which is making such a stupendous effort, is a good relationship which would never be forgotten. Eighteen dollars a year pays the tuition for a pupil in either school. Miss Adelaide Sharp of San Francisco who has been the Director of the Girls' School since 1929 received a letter of appreciation from the Persian Board of Education for her modern scientific methods. Dr. Susan I. Moody of Chicago who has worked in Tíhrán for years has done much to help these schools.

NO ACCOUNT of the new civilization in Persia would be just without a full description of the wonderful work of His Imperial Majesty Pahlévi Shahanshah. But I hope my articles about him may appear simultaneously with this narrative. However, what I did not state and what will interest Bahá'is, is that His Imperial Majesty Pahlévi Shahanshah was born in the same Province, Mazandaran, near the village of Nur where the family of Bahá'u'lláh lived. As Bahá'u'lláh's father was a Minister, the family was much in Tíhrán and Bahá'u'lláh Himself was born in the capital, but 'Abdu'l-Bahá was born in Nur. During my stay in Tíhrán, I heard that His Imperial Majesty telegraphed to the Persian Ministers in Moscow and Askabad, and Persian subjects Bahá'is imprisoned in those cities were freed and allowed to return to Persia. His Imperial Majesty is very just and very neutral. He probably would have done the same if the Persian subjects had been Muhammadans or Christians. This was only one of several Bahá'í incidents which showed that he is fair to all his subjects and tolerant. There has been very little Bahá'í persecution since civil laws were introduced in Persia, during his reign.

Just about two years ago the Persian Government introduced the civil code which thus did away with the old religious courts. Where the Muhammadan religion has heretofore played a leading role sometimes running counter to the government, now the power of the mullahs is much less. When the Persian government began the universal military service, conscription, the Muhammadan religious authorities definitely opposed it, but the government decided that the religious elements must not oppose the laws of the land. Certainly the power of the mullahs is much less under the new regime.

Something else in Persia has helped indirectly towards tolerance. One year ago the government ordered that the kulah (the black Persian hat for men, really a kind of fez) should be changed to the Pahlévi hat, which is a cap, for it is the kulah with a little brim in front. When the Muhammadans touch their foreheads to the floor in prayer they must turn this cap, even though it is very awkward to do this, with the peak to the back, for it is not the custom to take the hat off. Small as this departure of the kulah may seem to the western world, still it is an orientation towards change in thought. It is an interesting fact that when 'Abdu'l-Bahá was in New York City in 1912, He said to His Persian secretary, Mr. Valiollah Vargha, who had come from Tihrán: "The kulah is a very good hat, but it ought to have a little brim to protect the eyes." Mr. Vargha bought a French hat and from it fashioned a kulah with a brim or peak to it and used it sometimes, in the United States. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to him: "That is very good." Then when the Persian government first introduced the Pahlevi hat and the soldiers were wearing them even though the law had not been passed making this compulsory, Mr. Vargha wore the Pahlevi hat. His employer, an ambassador, said: "You will be insulted and persecuted in the street," but Mr. Vargha replied: "I am going to wear it anyway because

Then too the government passed a law two years ago that the overcoat must replace the abá. This was another help to bring tolerance. Only legitimate mullahs who could come forward and pass a rigid examination that they possessed the high qualifications to be spiritual teachers of Islám could wear the turbans and the abás. Before that time thousands under the guise of turbans and abás could commit deeds that no country that is an honored member of the League of Nations, which Persia is, could allow.

His Imperial Majesty Shahan-shah Pahlevi is one of the most creative rulers Persia has had since the founding of the Persian Empire by Cyrus. He is working not only for Persia but that Irán may cooperate with all the other great countries for the welfare of humanity.

THE NEW GREEN ACRE

LOUIS G. GREGORY

GREEN ACRE* has long been known to readers of the Bahá'í Magazine. It has lived a generation; yet it is now new. The reference is not to physical changes but rather to the new spirit which swept over its activities during the past season and aroused general testimony to something new born. For a year or more, perhaps during many years, this community struggled in the pursuit of ideals which now seem measurably attained. The aim is concentration upon that which is real both in the single and the mass life of mankind. Here idealists meet and strive to combine recreation with knowledge, rest with service, change with system, freedom with devotion, activity with service. The fame of this spot has spread around the world. Men and women of genius have here shared their gifts with others. Literature, art, science, statecraft, education, commerce and religion have been its patrons. But its greatest treasure is the hearts of those who have humbly served, making others happy through their warmth and glow. Green Acre has its shining river, golden sunsets, fragrant flowers, wooded acres, mysterious pines, attractive buildings and sacred hill. It is inwardly equipped through the harmony of its friends to create joy in human hearts and to attract souls to the supreme knowledge of God. This is the fountain which is perennially new.

* The Baha'i Summer Colony in Eliot, Maine.

People came from New England, New York, the middle West and the sunny South. They appeared in divers shades of thought and color, of varying social ranks, some mild and contemplative, others strenuous or executive in type, yet all illumined by the same sun, drawing life from one soil and sustained by the breezes of the same Heaven. Each found a broader horizon and received a spiritual boon in mingling kindly with his fellow beings. Green Acre has a message for those who seek the treasures of God concealed in man.

THE PAST SEASON was preeminently a workers' convention. Those who are striving in various ways to uplift and guide humanity conferred and gained inspiration. Speech is golden when it reflects action. Prepared addresses showed a wealth of information produced by labor as well as inspiration. Many impromptu talks seemed coined into expression by the powers of the heart.

The sacred anniversary which marks the martyrdom of the glorious Báb inaugurated the season. A flood of light was shed upon this wonderful character by selected readings, prayers and addresses. One might well feel himself amid those times that tried the souls of men and marked the birth-cries of the New Age. The deeply mystical and spiritual were vividly set forth. It revealed an influence of marvelous power in its first contact with the appalling glooms and shadows of a waiting world, a power that spreads increasing circles of light.

Special occasions were those commemorating the life of Miss Sarah J. Farmer, the founder of Green Acre, the anniversary of the visit of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Whom its workers turned for guidance; and Eliot and Portsmouth days. The village of Eliot in which Green Acre nestles is a stronghold of orthodoxy. It yet takes pride in its somewhat wayward offspring and those occasions are always notable which bring the two communities, typifying the fundamentalist and modernist in religion, into cooperation, mutual understanding and the exchange of friendly sentiments. Each finds in the other that which is worthy of cultivation.

Portsmouth day was the means of assembling a brilliant company with an orchestra of a dozen pieces, with its officials and workers to voice its traditions of freedom, interracial justice and its humane attitude to all who labor for the good of humanity. Portsmouth and Green Acre have so much in common that although one is a city and the other the country and they are separated by a river and the boundary between states, yet in reality they seem like one community as each in its own way applies the ideals of the New Age to the service of all mankind.

Parents sometimes lend their children to Green Acre, this for various reasons. A group of those of very tender years lived on a farm not far away. When it was mentioned to them that they had better attend a class at Fellowship House they all went on a strike. Was this not vacation time? Must they spend all their time at prayer? Truly does the modern revolt against custom, affect all humanity! Yet these dear children yielded to a mild persuasion which prompted a trial for just once.

After getting started, they loved the stories so much that when those who had charge of them wished to discipline them, they were not allowed to attend the classes. What happiness in journeying over the mountain-tops, to the moon, in the wilds of adventure through the forests, and to share in the deeds of heroic lives and to gain knowledge from the Manifestations of God! These dear children showed a joy that was unmistakable. They displayed precocity. The heaven that is near them in their innocence cheered their hearts. A touching incident was that near the close of the season a child's love for God was the cause of the assembling of a number of mature people together to hear the message of the Kingdom.

With what joy did we hail the youth, those whose lives are just budding into maturity! Should they be expected to abandon their playfulness? Why should they? Is not youth the time to be frolicsome? Yet these were Bahá'í youth indeed in that they gravitated to the universal, showing no sense of separation from the elders, pursuing their pleasures with moderation and delving earnestly into the divine teachings so as to fortify their young lives for the trials and struggles as well as the successes and victories that must come to those who are faithful. These young people went in for intensive study, absorbing the Brilliant Proof and the Hidden Words and being able to state their ideas in a way to command admiration. With a sense of gratitude and confidence do we lean upon those who are young and strong and who as future guides will direct the destinies of mankind.

Those who sought a broader horizon with superstitions dispelled could listen to a brilliant series of lectures on the beginning of one of the world's great civilizations, this being a study of what Muhammad brought to mankind. This is one of the necessary elements in the study of comparative religions, the object being to establish the validity of all religions by discovering the unity upon the plane of reality. How men of genius such as Carlyle and other thinkers have reacted to the Prophet of Islam, the motif and genius of the Prophet Himself, the reverence He inspired by His luminous teachings, the lustre that He shed upon men, the awakening of culture, diffusion of knowledge, the saintly lives and the men of genius that flowered forth as a result of the mystical power that He wielded and His prophetic vision of the Supreme Light appearing in this marvelous age. Such were thoughts that awaken impulses of nobility.

Delights, adornments and capacities are served in the quest for God. Perhaps some found the True One in the classes for meditation and prayer that swung, like a pendulum between the Fellowship House and the Pines. Others might perceive the light of guidance in the Hidden Words or Seven Valleys, or in the group studies of divine sociology and following guidance.

THE NEED FOR order, which of old was called heaven's first law and the evolution of an administration which binds the strongest to the weakest by the bonds of divine wisdom and love, were set forth by a man of affairs with large experience, and thence came a wealth of illustration drawn from actual knowledge. That which lends itself harmoniously to the rapid changes of the world, which is firm yet not harsh, gentle yet strong, mighty yet simple, will survive the wreck of material things and the crash of conflicting theories and doubts. Bahá'í administration attaining its ideal in action will increasingly serve men of all religions through the years.

There came from another man of affairs a resume of the world's treasures in architecture. It was a liberal education and a broadening of culture to trace the graceful flowering forth of constructive genius as expressed in the building of temples of worship in all the ages and cycles. Shown a people's monuments, we can easily read their civilization. As we followed the words of the speaker, as well as the beautiful portraits shown upon the screen, through the Egyptian, Greek, Roman, Moorish, Byzantine,

Renaissance and modern, we were prepared for what was the fitting climax: the structural and architectural beauty of the great universal Temple of today, the temple of light, which like the horizon will cover all men. Here indeed is overshadowed "the glory that was Greece and the grandeur that was Rome" even in their most halcyon days, this through the Glory of the Highest. Bahá'u'lláh declares: "This is a great and magnificent century and that which is hidden and concealed in man shall be revealed in this day." How marvelous is man when he becomes divinely conscious!

Opportunities were also afforded to absorb views in practical education, several professional educators bringing to bear their experiences and range of knowledge. They developed the trend in modern education to get beyond set forms, ancient dogmas and lifeless platitudes. Bahá'u'lláh was quoted as commending studies but of those sciences which "do not begin and end in mere words."

Another course of lectures reviewed the latest book of Prof. Edington, the noted British scientist and made it apparent how the present scientific mind is striving to explore the universe and discover the cause of causes. In what was developed the absolute need of the Manifestation became apparent. For whether the effort be to trace "natural laws in the spiritual world" or spiritual laws in the world of nature, men can apprehend the unseen reality only in the way He makes clear. The scientific mind is increasingly awe-struck at the phenomena of the universe.

Men make ideal progress when they seek to know the Creator along with His creation. The mind is brightened by the evolution of science; but out of the depth of the heart comes the longing to know!

A FLOOD of new ideas and the descent of heavenly bounties marked the holding of the regional convention. It was a meeting of teaching and one of the noblest training classes for teachers. Teachers came in greater numbers and with an enthusiasm rarely seen during many years. Their eloquence soared to the highest plane as they consulted about the joys of teaching, the technique of approach, the plan to open new cities, the way to invoke the spiritual power which is the means of attraction, the confirmation which comes to traveling teachers, the severance and sacrifice needed, the need of firmness in the Covenant and loyalty to the Center of life and the apprehension of those Holy Breezes which waft from the Paradise of Abha. These meetings continued beyond the appointed time and perhaps reached their climax in the one held on Mount Salvat, where a recent pilgrim to Haifa brought back a wealth of wisdom and a spiritual heat which seemed to set hearts aflame. Rarely if ever has a greater number of teachers been heard and those who taught as a rule showed humility rather than self-sufficiency.

The conference for interracial amity and the teaching convention, although separated from each other by a week seemed to be one continuous meeting in all of which the gems of reality continued to flash forth and to dazzle by their splendor. People forgot their human limitations and differences in the flow of the divine. Although the holding of so many meetings imposed a great physical strain, all sessions were crowded and people seemed to forget all save their love for reality and their wish to know more of divine love. The oneness of the human family; the removal of the blight of human prejudices; the scientific and spiritual light of unity and freedom; the overpowering joy that appears in true brotherhood; the progress of those who seek to build rather than destroy; a just appraisal of spiritual values and a willingness to recognize merit though concealed by worldly station; courage, faith, vision, self-sacrifice; pursuit of the ideal and upholding the principles that are sublime and eternal: These are a few of the lights which attracted souls to the perfect way.

THE PAST SEASON was a demonstration of the power of unity which reached so high an efficiency that inquirers found the atmosphere Pentecostal and so declared it. Some who came as agnostics found their doubts resolved into certainty and are now seeking to spread the teachings in their respective environments that humanity may grow. Thus may hearts discover the mysteries of the new creation! Thus may injustice end and oppression give way to freedom of the realm of day! Thus may patience with clay, a trait of great souls, keep love upon the plane of permanency which is divine! Thus may minor notes become majors and celestial songs be heard that mark the change of error's night into endless day! Thus may the Spirit of God envelop the world and all humanity within its radiant form!

SEARCHING FOR TRUTH

A SPIRITUAL AUTOBIOGRAPHY

In this, the third and concluding installment, the writer describes how he was led both through logical concepts and through spiritual intuition to a remarkable realization of the Bahá'í Teachings. The pattern of this quest for Truth will undoubtedly suggest to many readers similar experiences of their own for it may be said that the world today is universally seeking.

THE two years that I spent at the Harvard Divinity School proved one of the most thrilling intellectual and spiritual episodes of my life. Here I found the privilege of contact with great professorial intellects, a training in exact scientific approach to knowledge even in the field of religion, a fellowship of earnest sincere students, and an opportunity to browse ad libitum in the magnificent library of religious literature.

One of the three most formative intellectual influences of my life was George Foote Moore, professor of history of religions, perhaps the greatest thinker in that field in the world; a tremendous intellect at whom the very professional lights of Harvard marveled and called the "Encyclopedia of Harvard." His erudition was both vast and exact in many fields. I took all the courses offered by him in the history of religions, and when I had finished had a marvelous birdseye view of the great religious movements throughout the world's history.

Strangely enough the effect of these courses at the Divinity School with the treatment of religion used by these great scholars was to minimize rather than to magnify religious faith and enthusiasm. The mystical was rather scoffed at and derided. Religion came to appear the expression of man's ideas of the universe rather than any distinct revelation from God. It was rather interesting to note the reaction to all this on the part of the more evangelical type of students enrolled. In order to keep their ardent faith in Christianity, these students zealously refrained from any thought or discussion concerning that critical approach to the Bible and to religion which was current at Harvard.

I have found from other sources that the Harvard Divinity School is not unique in this peculiar and paradoxical effect of tending to destroy the religious faith of those receiving its training for the ministry. (Even Divinity Schools cannot withstand the Spirit of the Age.) A gradual transition had been taking place for some decades as regards curriculum; now no longer did Divinity students find it necessary to study Hebrew or Greek in order to read the Bible in the original. The courses most popular with the students were history of religions, philosophy, and sociology—courses which helped to bring the students into rapport with the intellectual life of the contemporary world rather than courses which dealt with the Bible as a unique source of truth.

PERSONALLY I found, however, an absorption in certain directions in the more direct spiritual life, most notably in the course on mysticism given by William W. Fenn (later Dean of the Divinity School)—who handled the subject of the history of mysticism in a more devout and sympathetic way than it was being handled in other modernistic theological seminaries—a truly remarkable man who was able to appreciate the most delicate mystical thoughts of the great spiritual writers of the past and to place them in their proper relationship to Truth as a whole.

Of even greater value to me than this course was my own deep reading in the sacred books of the great world religions, of which I found an immense amount of material in the library of the school—material hard to find elsewhere. Here I found my real spiritual education rather than in the courses given by professors. In reading these writings of the great mystics of all religions I discovered two striking facts: first that they all approached truth from such similar viewpoints that many times one could not tell from the context whether one was reading the rapt utterances of a Christian, a Hindu, a Buddhist, a Muhammadan, or a Chinese mystic. The reason for this spiritual consanguinity is apparent. Mysticism being in reality the flowering of religion and its highest expression, these great souls who had made the most complete contact with the Divine Being were all relating in their writings the same experience. When they sang of the love of God and of the joy of union with Him, they were all writing of an experience which is as universally catholic to the human soul as is the experience of human love. Here on this altitude there was no difference or opposition of thought.

Secondly, I discovered that the styles of writers of spiritual subjects differed in proportion to the power and sincerity of their inspiration. It would almost seem as if their words became impregnated with a certain vibration or rhythm. I became finally so sensitive to this rhythm of style that I could tell immediately the degree of sincerity and the spiritual height of the soul of the writer, regardless of the sentiments expressed. Let me make this clear. A book may contain most lofty sentiments and yet be the expression of an insincere soul. How can one discover this discrepancy? By sensitiveness to the spiritual vibration of the written or spoken word one can learn to discriminate and distinguish the sincere from the insincere. This power of quick analysis has proved very valuable to me in all my spiritual reading, has guided me to only the purest and best spiritual thought and expression, and became as a touchstone which finally led me to the full appreciation of the spiritual utterances of Bahá'u'lláh under an experience which I will presently narrate.

During my first year at the Divinity School I experimented with a vegetarian diet with two results: First, that in the lack of proper substitutes—eating as I did at the university commons—I came to suffer from lack of sufficient protein and found myself nervous and run-down; secondly, I became exceedingly sensitive, and this sensitiveness, while a deterrent in the ordinary transactions of life, proved an advantage as regards spiritual intuition which I found quite increased in the course of the year. I discontinued the experiment and have since followed a normal diet*

THE events which immediately led up to my contact with the Bahá'í Movement and my acceptance of it, I will now briefly narrate.

In the course of my first year at Harvard, meditating over a book I was reviewing for the Boston Transcript which dealt critically with the values of present day society and presented an ideal organization for humanity, I came to a conclusion which both then and now seems logical and sound. "This is a splendid picture of the ideal humanity which the author is painting," I thought to myself as I walked for exercise and meditation on a beautiful spring morning past the sparkling water of the Brookline reservoir, "but who is able to put it across? Can the author persuade humanity to adopt this splendid type of civilization, or can I myself with the utmost of enthusiasm and spiritual power which I might hope to develop in the course of my ministry bring the whole world to this foundation?" The ludicrousness of this caused me to smile. Plainly such a thing was unthinkable that any human being could bring all humanity to one thought, one opinion, and one mode of action—no matter how gloriously appealing on the plain of the ideal.

But the more I reflected upon the imperative need of humanity for the adoption of such a perfect pattern of life, the more I felt the inevitableness of a cultural revolution. On these two premises my conclusion was therefore drawn, that the time was ripe when, since no one of human power could accomplish this need for humanity, we should again have upon earth a Being of more than human spiritual dynamics, both to reveal and to put into effect this Ideal Civilization.

A FEW months after this experience, while being at York Beach, Maine, during my summer vacation, I gravitated to Green Acre as a natural result of my general policy of seeking out any new thing. I had read in the Boston papers frequently of the discussions of universal religion at Green Acre and my interest had been aroused. Finding myself now in close proximity to this unique center of thought I dropped in one Sunday afternoon just in time to hear a lecture on sculpture by a New York artist. It was a glorious August afternoon, of a quality of summer weather which only Maine can give, and the lecture was held under a tent the sides of which were up enabling a view of the beautiful sunlit waters of the Piscataqua rightly called by the Indians "River of Light."

However, as so frequently happens in life, it was not the lecture on sculpture which I was led there to receive. At the close of this somewhat pompous and egotistical talk, I went up to the platform to greet, not the lecturer, but the presiding officer and director of Green Acre, Miss Sarah J. Farmer, whom I had personally met at Mrs. Ole Bull's home in Cambridge; and whose sweet smiling face upon the platform had inspired me more than the words of the lecturer.

*That vegetarianism or fasting are not in the present age essential steps to spiritual development is definitely stated in the Bahá'í Teachings.

As I recalled myself to her acquaintance she took and held my hand for some time and looking intently at me she said: "Have you heard of the Persian Revelation? I know by your eyes that you are ready for it. (A remarkable discernment, as the reader will presently see; for within half an hour from that moment I was to become an assured Bahá'í.) Go to that lady with the gray veil. She will tell you about it."

The lady with the gray veil (Mrs. Mary Lucas, soprano soloist, who had just returned from a visit to Ábdu'l-Bahá in His Prison at Ákká) drew me under the shade of an apple tree and in that simple natural spot unfolded to me the story of a new spiritual revelation for humanity and assured me that our spiritual Lord was in very fact upon the earth.

So prepared had been my intellect for this very fact by my meditation, previously described, upon the need of a universal revelation and Revelator, that I accepted without further query or any obstacle of scepticism this great Truth and have held to it ever since. What doubts I had were to come later as the critical intellect put into play its effect. But the inspiration of these early days in the Cause were to me like the fresh and joyous hours of dawn, when the birds sing of the glories of God as expressed throughout His firmament and the flowers sparkle with transcendent beauty in a fresh morning dew undissipated by the heat of life.

THERE was then hardly any literature upon the subject and the teachings of this Movement had to be acquired through direct contact with individuals. Therefore I decided to come and spend a few weeks at Green Acre in order to absorb more knowledge of this Movement which had so gripped my spirit. As soon as my business permitted I carried out this purpose, and spent three glorious weeks at Green Acre—weeks transcendent in sweet human fellowship and in glorious inspiration and guidance. Here I found others, both mature men and women and inspired youths, traveling the road which I had but shortly taken. In this spiritual fellowship were two young college graduates, now well known throughout the Bahá'í world, who became wonderful spiritual comrades to me—Harlan F. Ober and Alfred E. Lunt.

All that Brook Farm aimed to be—a lofty and divine fellowship of kindred minds—Green Acre has proved to be; and this has been possible in practical working out for the reason that here the impossible feat was not attempted of earning a living at the same time as holding spiritual concourse.

My most impressive contact with the Bahá'í literature was the actual Words of Bahá'u'lláh as published in a tiny pamphlet where some of the so-called "Hidden Words" were gathered together. This booklet I would take from my vest pocket as I walked the fields, and the vibration of these holy words were as fire to my spirit. I literally seemed to walk on air, to be lifted up above the ground.

Now all of the sensitiveness gained by my vegetarian diet and all of the power of diagnosis as applied to spiritual writings became effective, in enabling me to perceive the transcendent power of the Bahá'í Word. No spiritual writing in all my reading through the sacred books from the dawn of civilization up to now had the dynamic spiritual creative power which these words of Bahá'u'lláh had. Thus the spiritual impression of His utterance corroborated the logical approach to the Movement which had been working out in my intellect and which had enabled me to immediately accept the astounding fact of a Divine Revelator actually being upon earth.*

From this moment on my thought, my life, my efforts have been thrown into this great universal Movement for humanity which I found to contain all the ideals that have been conceived for humanity, and which also, viewed however critically contained nothing that should be omitted from a perfect pattern. All the truths which I had sought and previously found in other movements reached their apotheosis for me in the Bahá'í Truth.

As was natural, my relatives and friends took rather lightly my new religious faith, and predicted that it would soon yield ground to some other novelty. But their predictions have proved false. What had appeared to be fickleness in previous years was in reality a search for truth which would accept nothing short of perfection. The giving up of the semi-perfect had been no betrayal of loyalty to Truth. For how could one attain to pure gold if one remained content with baser metals?

The whole world is today searching indifferently or earnestly, as the case may be, for truth and is rapidly discarding the old forms. This is because a new epoch is at hand, and the old traditions do not avail for the life of today. This search for a new religious pattern is as wide as the human race itself, and is going on among the youth of Islam, of Hinduism, of Confucianism, of Judaism, even as it is among the youth of Christendom.

I present this brief tale of my own spiritual life that it may possibly inspire and encourage those who are still on the road of search. In the Words of Bahá'u'lláh: "The steed upon which to journey through this valley (the valley of search) is patience. In this journey the traveler will reach no destination without patience. . . . 'Those who strive strenuously for us, we will assuredly direct them into our ways.'"

Let us all be assured that there is Truth; that the universe does not mock us with a spiritual vacuum; and that this Truth, gradually realized by humans, is one and the same Truth which the Light of God recurrently reveals not only here but throughout all the worlds of being. "Peace be unto those who follow guidance."

*Many who have become Baha'is have been led to the acceptance of the Revelation by the more mystical process of meeting in vision and being taught by 'Abdu'l-Baha before they came in contact outwardly with the Baha'í Movement. Some of these experiences we hope to publish at a future date in The Baha'í Magazine.

The American University of Beirut has become one of the greatest centers in the college education of the Bahá'í youth of the world. No other college at the present time has a group of Bahá'í students equal in size to this. The religious attitude of the college authorities is very liberal, and the Bahá'í students are given the same opportunity to practice their religion and hold their religious meetings as all other religions and denominations. It is significant to see these young women without the veil.

“There are two influences tending toward prosperity and progress which emanate from the forefront of advancement of the world of humanity. . . . One is the influence of civilization. . . . The other is the divine influence.”

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THERE ARE TWO kinds of organization which characterize human affairs. One, the result of conflict of human wills, energies, and intelligences finally resulting in a political and economic empire which has the power of functioning perhaps for centuries and regulating the affairs of all humans under its sway. Of such was the Roman empire, the most striking example in antiquity, a stupendous organization which for some centuries assured the peace of the known world and the stability of a universal civilization. Of such also are the modern empires which at the opening of the twentieth century bid fair to rule the world by gentleman's agreement.

The second form of organization is that which expresses an inner truth, intrinsic, essential to the soul of man. This truth we call spiritual. It is in fact, however, as much pertaining to the secular as to the spiritual world, for it is simple Truth, and Truth in its essential unity is unique and one. When mankind become enrolled under the banner of this essential Truth, a wonderful organization takes place which is an expression of the spiritual qualities of man—those qualities which we may call the higher and truer qualities: loyalty, obedience, brotherhood, kindness, charity, justice, patience, industry, perseverance, serviceableness, and subordination of self to the need of the group.

AT THE VERY time when the Roman empire was at its height and the legions of Caesar shook with their colossal tread all the lands that fringed the Mediterranean, there was a humble carpenter, of a subject race held somewhat in contempt by the Romans, who gathering a few simple-minded disciples about Him launched a movement which was destined to produce for mankind a spiritual organization. To the secular-minded Romans this stupendous event was no event at all. It remained unnoticed, unrecorded in their chronicles. Nevertheless the organization founded by Christ was to wax in proportion as the organization founded by Caesar was to wane. And when the time came that the will of the Caesars was no longer efficacious in controlling the world and the huge colossus of the Roman empire was falling to ruin before extraneous attacks, nevertheless within this rotten shell was sprouting a new germ which was to overshadow all of Europe with the blessings of its verdure and its fruits. The Pax Romana came to a tragic end, but the Pax Christiana effectively grew until it sheltered three continents with its power.

Again in the Seventh century arose in Asia the spiritual force of Islam which was able to organize warring desert tribes into a force which united under one empire and one civilization diverse peoples, tongues and races from India to Gibraltar. Within these districts so long the prey of petty warfare, peace and prosperity flourished as never before.

TODAY WE HAVE the spectacle of humanity struggling to form an organization of the first-named type—a great League of Nations in which the diverse wills, needs, desires, emotions, of fifty-two countries are expected to be so balanced as to guarantee perpetual peace.

While this praiseworthy effort is going on in Geneva, from Haifa is radiating an influence of quite another nature seeking to build world peace and brotherhood upon the expression of the innately spiritual and noble qualities of man. Which of these two movements will predominate in world affairs? The one has all of pomp and circumstance to render glory and prestige. The other movement is working quietly and humbly in the hearts of individuals, unheralded by newspapers and by politicians. Already the foundation of that noble political structure conceived as the League of Nations is threatening to crumble before the emotional outbursts of a neurotic and war-crazed Europe. All American newspaper correspondents agree in testifying to the war psychology which now pervades the Old World and the imminent danger of a new world war. They assert that the League of Nations and the Briand-Kellogg peace pact are today the least important factors constituting international politics.

Tragic fact! The Structure upon which the League of Nations was founded, ideals noble and perfect in theory now seems to be but a futile display in the midst of the electric storms which rage throughout Europe.

Was not this exactly what 'Abdu'l-Bahá announced—that human and political efforts toward world peace would be unavailing for the very reason, He pointed out, as events are now proving, that the human will cannot so regulate itself in the midst of the play of volcanic human emotions. "According to the divine teachings the banner of Universal Peace must be raised by the Power of the Word of God. The oneness of humanity must be established by the Power of the Holy Spirit. No matter how the politicians strive, their efforts cannot bring peace. Unaided human power is of no avail."*

UNFORTUNATELY humanity cannot lift itself up by its own bootstraps. In other words, human nature being what it is (as pessimists so often take pleasure in pointing out) strife and conflict will go on inevitably. But the very nature and essence of religion is to change and sublimate human nature. Only by such change and sublimation can the causes of war be eliminated or controlled. "The world of humanity cannot be saved from the darkness of nature, and cannot attain illumination, except through the abandonment of prejudices and the acquisition of the morals of the Kingdom."*

The impulse to unity, to peace, must come from within the heart of man both individually and collectively. Individuals must value the welfare of others as highly as their own; so, too, must nations deal with other nations in terms of the Golden Rule. Only where this good will is actually being expressed collectively by humanity is universal peace possible; and such a spirit of unity and brotherhood is possible only through a spiritual power impregnating and revivifying the hearts of men.

THE PRESENT SPECTACLE of nations that have just missed annihilation in the last war again facing each other with hatred and malevolence which cannot help but produce another conflict,—this spectacle is one of the most tragic that human nature has to offer. How often has man's passion-nature driven him into a course of action which his intelligence could show him was suicide. And yet he could not stop!

The spirit of conflict and aggression is like a trail of gunpowder which, if once fired, blazes to a catastrophic end. Such is human nature in its present state of evolution upon this planet. For this reason it becomes apparent that no politico-economic system can hold in balance the desires, needs, passions, of humanity in such a way as to guarantee peace and security of civilization.

But while the efficacy of secular peace movements is waning and their futility is becoming apparent, the power of the spiritual is daily gaining. All over the world men and women are turning to that horizon illumined by the Glory of God in this Day; and a living miracle takes place, that races which have existed in eternal hatred of each other have now become brothers in fact. The Bahá'í brotherhood is a potency capable indeed of one day achieving world unity and peace, for in it is that same Power which created the fair peace of India under Buddha, the glories of Christianity, the majesty of a virile Islam. But today for the first time religion, unified in expression as well as in truth, is destined to penetrate the whole world and to lead all nations and races under the banner of universal peace and brotherhood in the name of Bahá'u'lláh. "Peace be unto those who follow guidance."

"Today no power save the great power of the Word of God, which comprehends the realities of things, can gather together under the shade of the same tree, the minds and hearts of the world of humanity. It is the motive-power of all things; it is the mover of souls and the controller and governor of the human world."

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE FIRST FEMINIST MARTYR

ZEINE NOUR-UD-DINE ZEINE

Mr. Zeine, the author of this valuable article, is a graduate of the American University of Beirut and is now a teacher of sociology in that splendid institution. He has a remarkable background. His grandfather, Jinabi Ziene, left Persia and followed Bahá'u'lláh first to Baghdád and later to 'Akká where he spent the rest of his life as one of His amanuenses, so the family first lived in 'Akká and later in Haifa. We are fortunate to have for the Bahá'í Magazine the accurate material which Mr. Zeine has sent us—a picturesque and dramatic account of the tragic story of Qurratu'l-'Ayn, the far-famed Persian Feminist and Poetess, the first woman martyr for the freedom of women.

YOU can kill me as soon as you like, but you cannot stop the emancipation of women", so said the Persian feminist and poetess Quarratu'l-'Ayn, when she was imprisoned in 1850.

Born from a noble family, her keen and sagacious intelligence and her fervid eloquence very soon filled all those who came in contact with her, with awe and admiration. Awe, because in her controversies with the most learned men, she was ever triumphant. Admiration, because in a time when most of her country women could not read or write, she displayed such marvelous powers of learning and speech.

Her beauty matched her elocution. But it was a grand, a commanding, a majestic beauty. On one occasion, it is so related, when she was delivered up to the government authorities, she was brought before the Shah, who, on seeing her, said: "I like her looks; leave her and let her be". On another occasion, the festivities and rejoicing of a wedding were going on in the house of one of the Persian nobles. When Qurratu'l-'Ayn came in the ladies of the court and other distinguished guests who were present were so much attracted by the charm of her looks and so greatly impressed by the beauty of her speech that, "forgetting the festivities, they gathered round her, diverted, by listening to her words, from listening to the melodies, and rendered indifferent, by witnessing her marvels, to the contemplation of the pleasant and novel sights which are incident to a wedding".

IT MEANS VERY little to say that Quarratu'l-'Ayn was in advance of her age, unless one says also what that age was. Persia, nay the East in general, was in a deplorable state. Ignorance and superstitions prevailed; intolerance and bigotry waxed high. Education was neglected. The rights of women were slighted. Such were some of the conditions during that age. Filled with a passionate desire to change all that situation she raised her voice against it, discussed and debated with doctors and sages, and addressed the meetings of the most eminent men. At the beginning she used to carry on her discussions and talks from behind a curtain, but later she threw aside her veil, thus adding the power of her looks to the potency of her words.

To lay aside the veil and speak in public, at a time when "women were secluded in harems and had to be closely veiled if they appeared in public places"; when it was considered impolite for them to speak to men, needed a heroic courage. The very ideas she propounded endangered her life. Yet her courage never failed her and her heart never recoiled from the oppressions and persecutions that she received at the hand of her enemies. By day and night, and accompanied by a few women who had become inspired by her noble ideas, she traveled in Persia from city to city, pleading with men and women everywhere to abandon their prejudices and superstitions and love truth; to put aside hatreds and jealousies and live in harmony and good will with each other. She championed the cause of education of both sexes and fought for the freedom and rights of her kind. Her fame now spread far and wide so that "most people who were scholars or mystics sought to hear her speech and were eager to become acquainted with her powers of speculation and deduction."

Finally, the clergy were alarmed: her vehement and tumultuous ideas confounded them, and her courage and steadfastness in spreading those ideas filled them with apprehension. The people were aroused to molest her, and eventually, she was delivered up to the government authorities. It was then that she pronounced those heroic words with which this account begins. She was imprisoned for two years. Then in August, 1852, a disastrous attempt was made on the Shah's life. Many people were arrested, horribly tortured and condemned to death. And she was one of the innocent victims of that fatal day.

QURRATU'L-'AYN met a very painful and lingering death. The story of her execution is a very tragic one. She was delivered over to one of the military authorities — a Sardar—who was made responsible for her execution. In Tihran "she was placed in the house of the Kalantar, a town official who was made responsible for her custody".

"'Three days' (the Kalantar's wife related) 'our beloved guest stayed in her room chanting prayers—eating little and seldom. On the morning of the third day she said to me: "Tonight, they will come for me". She gave to me a bottle of attar of roses, a ring, and a handkerchief—her only possessions—all she had left of her former riches.' '*"

Another account has it that Qurratu'l-'Ayn had put on a snow-white robe of pure silk before her execution. When asked by her guardian, early in the evening, why she had changed her dress, "I will be going on a long journey tonight," she had answered. And so by dint of feminine intuition, she had known the time of her death. As the leaden-footed hours of the night were passing one by one and the silence of nature grew deeper, the beginning of that journey was drawing nigh. "Chanting prayers, she waited, waited, prepared and ready for what she knew would come!" '*

And that evening they came.

It was the fifteenth of September, 1852. The lights of the city of Tihrán were going out one by one. People were sleeping. The richly colored domes and minarets of the Capital shone pale in the light of the moon. A sad moonlight was shining through the window of the room where the beautiful Qurratu'l-'Ayn was confined. It was a room in the garden of the Sardar near the gates of the city, to which she had been brought that same evening. The stars were so pale! And the night was so still, so silent, as if the whole creation was watching breathlessly in dreadful expectation of a bitter and heartrending tragedy.

At about midnight, for the first time, the tranquil silence was broken by the sounds of some footsteps. Presently a key turned in the lock, the door opened slowly, and a handsome young Turk entered the room of Qurratu'l-'Ayn. He held a silken handkerchief in his hand. She, sitting on the floor in the middle of the room, was praying. As he moved towards her, she suddenly raised her head, threw at him one of her piercing glances and said in a clear and dignified voice: "Young man, it becomes you not to be my executioner, and to perform such a crime". Horror stricken by those words, the young Turk refused to touch her, turned back, and ran out of the door "like a madman". It is said that he dashed into the room where his master, the Sardar, was awaiting him, flung at his feet the fatal handkerchief and the money he had received as a bribe, and said: "I am ready to kill myself and not shoulder the responsibility of this woman's death".

A few moments later, another person entered the room of the prisoner. He was a heavy set, coarse, ugly looking man. And he was drunk. He held the same handkerchief in his hand. Qurratu'l-'Ayn had finished her prayers, but she was still sitting on the floor. As his looks fell upon her, his wolfish eyes flashed with ferocity born half of intoxication and half of his own beast-like nature. Without a moment's hesitation, he threw himself upon the unfortunate young woman and accomplished his dark deed—he strangled her with the handkerchief. There were still signs of life in her when he drew her out of the room. Here he met others who were sent to help him in the accomplishment of the Sardar's fiendish scheme. They dragged her to the rim of a dry well and threw her into it. Immediately the well was filled up with large and heavy stones. It was midnight.

The moon had now sunk behind the snow-clad Elburz mountains. The shadows of the domes and the minarets grew deeper and blacker. Darkness enveloped the city of Tihrán. There was not any light save the pale glimmering of the lonely stars. As the men were returning from the well, something fluttered on a rosebush near by. Apparently a nightingale disturbed in her sleep. At the same time a loud shrill sound of a cock pierced the appalling silence of the night. Also a wind was growing, "a wind that laid a cold finger upon flesh and spirit." And the leaves that laid without a sound on the trees began to whisper again. It seemed that the creation was beginning to breathe once more; but there was something in that breath that resembled a deep sigh, like the sigh that is drawn by the audience when the curtain falls on the last act of a mournful tragedy. And we can, with a profound certainty, say that the silent stars, that night, looked down upon one of the most ferocious and cruel acts of man.

Thus ended the life of one who "like a lily of the desert growing amongst ruins, gave flowers and perfumes to surrounding moral devastation". Why? Because she believed, she believed in the Great New Message of the Báb; and because she, fearlessly, unwaveringly, enthusiastically, delivered that Message to the people of her country. "The Báb said of her: 'Lo! she answered My call, even before I had called her.' " She believed that that Call was the Truth.

The story of her conversion is in itself a testimony to her keen spiritual sense and deep receptiveness to truth. "One never-to-be-forgotten day," writes Lady Blomfield,* "she (Qurratu'l-'Ayn) was turning some books and papers in the library of a more enlightened cousin, when she found a little leaflet, the first words attracted her attention, she read on and on, she became more and more interested—then thrilled and excited!

"'Who wrote this?' She cried to her cousin who came in.

"'What have you there? What has happened? Why are you so agitated?'

"'But you must tell me who wrote this'. She showed the leaflet to him. Then it was his turn to be agitated.

"'You have found that, where? Oh, I cannot tell you about it, you should never have seen it!' It is a very secret matter! It should have been securely and carefully concealed.'

"'Now that I have seen it', and her voice shook with excitement, 'you must tell me about it, my cousin.'

"'He still hesitated, but at last, yielding to her enthusiasm, he said: 'It is written by Sheikh Seyid Kasim—keep it a secret, closely guarded—the risk of a terrible danger would attend its discovery!'

"'So this wonderful pamphlet is by Sheikh Kasim Rashti and Sheikh Ahmad Ahsai? And this is what they teach their disciples? But it is the Truth, every shining word of it . . . ''

And once the fire of that Truth kindled her soul, her faith became dynamic. From the moment when she believed the Truth until the hour of her martyrdom, she followed the demand of the venerated Sheikhi teacher, Sheikh Qasim Rashti: . . . "then let all the world know". No wonder then if E. G. Browne wrote "Had the Babi (Bahai) religion no other claim to greatness, this were sufficient that it produced a heroine like Qurratu'l-'Ayn".

More than seventy years ago, Qurratu'l-'Ayn, throwing back her veil, told her countrymen: "Why do you sleep? Awake from your beds of negligence. The sun hath arisen from the day-spring of pre-existence. Why do you drown yourselves in the sea of materialism? Behold the resplendent light! Listen to the songs of the New Age. A new life is breathed into all existing things. The zephyrs of the divine favor are wafting upon you".

DOES NOT THE world need that message today when the moral life of the people everywhere is becoming loose, when ancient customs and cherished beliefs are disintegrating, when the economic forces are threatening disaster, when the threads of political relations are sorely strained and tangled?

Let the politicians in their offices of State, and the leaders of religion in their houses of worship and the teachers of youth in their educational institutions—who are all in a great measure responsible for the establishment of Peace and Order in the world—let them turn their gaze to the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh and see for themselves if it is not therein that lies “a supreme instrument for the establishment of the Most Great Peace, and the one agency for the unification of the world, and the proclamation of the reign of righteousness and justice upon the earth”.

OLD AS THE HILLS

ANOTHER GREEN Acre season has closed and memories crowd upon me—the low spot on the path where the cold evening mists always greeted us, the old Inn, the river, the happy faces of the friends. Vivid pictures remain etched on my heart, a woman who came in tears, her fortune suddenly gone, her husband snatched away by death, her family miles away, alone, so terribly alone; the dawning in her sad face of the first faint promise of peace; her wistful smile in answer to offered friendship and at last new courage, new plans, a life caught up out of the blackness of despair and given a vision of happiness through service—the miracle of re-creation through the Master's touch. A young Jewish girl, bringing to Green Acre a sister who needed the out-of-doors, coming an atheist and going away in the company of “Him of Whom Moses and the prophets did write”, Whose “sign” is His power to transform human lives.

Such is Green Acre. The method? Old as the hills—the presence of God mirrored first in the lives of human friends, until the broken reflections are lost in the complete picture and the Master is real! The miracle comes often in this place. Here His eyes saw the sunset reflected in “The River of Light”. His feet have trod these paths. These pines have given Him of their fragrance. Here the sunlight wove a golden carpet for His use. Here those who love Him gather for rest and refreshment and talk of Him with happy voices and faces made radiant by His presence. Hither each brings his tiny candle to illumine, if may be, the path we strive to follow in the footsteps of the Master.

And now we go again, the newly born with eyes still misty in the unaccustomed splendor, with feet faltering a bit on the new path but with faces alight in confidence and trust. To the four winds go souls with renewed courage, with clearer vision, with readier sympathy, with deeper love and truer devotion to our Lord. Such is Green Acre, “the Green Acca of America”.

This is the fifth and concluding article of the series by Miss Root describing her experiences in Persia. Beginning in the July number and continuing monthly, the articles have been widely and favorably commented upon, and have interested both Bahá'ís and non Bahá'ís. They have often been referred to as the best contributions from the pen of this distinguished Bahá'í teacher and author.

AS Persia is the foremost Bahá'í nation both chronologically and in point of numbers, it will be of great interest to describe the administration of the Bahá'í work in this country because of the number of years in which the Movement has been developing there. The application of the principles of Bahá'u'lláh in the daily life is now being practiced to a remarkable extent.

NATIONAL SPIRITUAL ASSEMBLY: First and foremost in speaking of the work in Tihrán is to explain about this group of nine, elected each year. Until the present time the Tihrán Spiritual Assembly has acted as National Spiritual Assembly, looking after the Bahá'í work of the whole country. This year or next, probably this will be changed and a National Spiritual Assembly will be established. It has not been possible to do this earlier, to gather and publish the lists and statistics, because of the many prejudices existing in the country. Never have I seen a group of men work more indefatigably than does this group of nine in Tihrán. They meet in sessions from four to five hours long, three times a week. Many other meetings must necessarily be called, too, when telegrams from other cities show that Bahá'ís are in difficulties. On fete days—and they are numerous in Persia—this committee spends the entire day straightening out the affairs of the Cause. Hundreds of letters are received from all parts of Persia and advice must be sent. The work in Tihrán itself is colossal, for all the work in all the committees must first be presented to this National Spiritual Assembly, and all questions and information about these matters must be discussed and voted upon. No committee does anything without the consent of the National Spiritual Assembly.

This National Spiritual Assembly also gives a great deal of attention to the two large Bahá'í Tarbiat Schools, one for boys and the other for girls, and these institutions rank very high in character, in morals, and in scholarship. Of the eighty students sent by the Persian Government to Europe to study this year, twelve were Bahá'ís; they won through sheer scholarship and notwithstanding the fact that they were Bahá'ís. One examiner said: "I am against your religion, but I must say that the Bahá'í youth are well trained."

Each year, too, this National Spiritual Assembly arranges a national convention where different subjects are discussed. This congress continues for twelve days, with two sessions each day, these meetings being of four or five hours' duration. For example, topics like the following may be chosen: What to do in order openly and officially to declare the Baha'i Cause as a new religion? How best to facilitate intermarriage among the Jews, Zoroastrians and Muhammadans who have become Bahá'is? What must we do to promote the education of Bahá'í children in all villages? This convention is held at the Ridván the last of April, for in this springtime the Government offices are closed in the afternoon and thus there is a little more leisure time for the majority.

When these questions are decided upon they are sent to the seventeen different Bahá'í districts, for it should be explained that the Bahá'is of Persia are arranged in seventeen great sections of the country, each section having a Central Spiritual Assembly for that area which may include one hundred or two hundred local Spiritual Assemblies. These questions are relayed on from the seventeen points to all local assemblies. Then the seventeen Central Spiritual Assemblies hold seventeen earlier Bahá'í conventions each in his province, where these questions are duly discussed and each of the seventeen conventions elects one delegate to come to represent them at the National Convention in Tihrán at the Ridván time. After the National Convention in Tihrán, this National Spiritual Assembly in Tihrán must collect all the data and discussions on these questions, decide upon them and put them into action.

There are many committees for men. They are as follows:

I. Men's Arrangements Committee, which plans many hundreds of meetings all over the city. Every night in different sections meetings are held, for one hundred or perhaps two hundred persons, because so far in Tihrán it has not been possible to have a large Bahá'í gathering very often. It has seemed more wise to keep the gatherings smaller until Persia is a little more advanced in freedom of religious thought and conscience.

II. Charity Committee, and this really means the Finance Committee. Every Bahá'í gives money each month for the expenses of the Cause in Tihrán, and this Finance Committee spends this money for the schools, for progress of the Cause, for sending nineteen Bahá'í teachers throughout the country, and for the poor and sick. A subcommittee of this group buys food and fuel in the summer months when they are cheaper, stores them and then in winter gives them out to the poor. All the Bahá'í poor and sick are looked after, their wants are investigated, and in difficult times many persons are helped irrespective of religion or nationality. Every call for help in Persia has found a response from Bahá'is.

III. Huquq is managed by one man who is specially appointed for this work. Every Bahá'í in Persia without exception gives his Huquq each year; this gift is never asked for, it is always brought with happy free will. Many persons in Persia who are most sincere Bahá'is but outwardly cannot declare their faith, send their Huquq secretly just as they also send money to the Charity Committee. Perhaps I should explain exactly what Huquq means. At the end of each year when a Bahá'í makes up his accounts and sees how much he has been able to save in this period he gives nineteen per cent of this income in a lump sum as his Huquq. Bahá'u'lláh in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas says regarding Huquq:

“Whosoever possesseth an hundred mithgals of gold, nineteen mithgals thereof shall be dedicated to God, the Lord Who hath power to rend the earth and the heaven. Beware, O people, lest ye deprive yourselves of this great bounty. Verily, We laid this Command upon ye while We were independent of ye and of all there is in the Heavens and the earth. Herein lies a great wisdom and discernment comprehensible by none save God, the All-Knowing, the Wise. Say thou, by this (He) hath willed that your possessions may be cleansed and that ye approach stations unattainable save by those whom He willeth. Verily, He is the All-Giver, the Beloved, the Bounteous. O people, defraud not the Lord of His dues, and enjoy not (your wealth) save after with His permission. Thus hath it been ordained in the Tablet and in this exalted Tablet. Whoso defraudeth the Lord defraudeth justice; and upon him who obeys what hath been ordained, shall descend blessings from the Firmament of the Bounty of his Lord, the Generous, the Bounteous, the All-Giver, the Ancient!”

IV. Publishing Committee. This group writes articles for newspapers and these are shown to the National Spiritual Assembly before they are sent out. Sometimes this Committee brings books from Egypt to be sold; many Tablets are mimeographed for distribution as printing is not allowed. This Committee receives its money from the Finance Committee.

V. Teaching Committee for Men. This committee arranges sub-committees in all the different sections of the city. There are many Bahá'í teachers in Tihrán. These sub-committees bring together the little groups of individuals who are interested to hear about the Cause and to study. This General Teaching Committee chooses and sends the Bahá'í teachers to these little meetings which occur, five or six, every evening.

VI. Committee for Entertainments. Each believer in Tihrán goes to this Entertainment Committee and announces what entertainments he will give during the year whether dinners, luncheons or teas. He states how many guests he can entertain and gives the dates for these events. Then the Entertainment Committee arranges these meetings which are also semi-social parties. Many hundreds of these entertainments are given by Tihrán Bahá'ís during the year, for Persia is noted the world over for its hospitality.

VII. Committee for Children's Savings Bank. Every day Bahá'í parents try to give their children coins more or less. Every Sunday the child when he goes to Bahá'í Sunday School takes his coins and the teacher gives him little tickets for these. When the tickets accumulate to make one dollar, he is given a cheque or share for one dollar. No child can draw his money for ten years, as the idea is to teach them to save.

This committee has extended its activities to the provinces where it has many “shareholders.” At present the capital of the committee amounts to about twelve thousand dollars being the aggregate of very small savings; and this sum has been put at interest at six per cent.

The foundation of this committee was based upon instructions from 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Who sent two gold coins as the first contribution to the "Savings Bank." An account under the title "'Abdu'l-Bahá's Capital'" has been opened to which contributions are made by friends. By 'Abdu'l-Bahá's instructions ninety-five per cent of the interest on this capital is to be spent each year for Bahá'í purposes and five per cent added to the capital. The fact that the Beloved Guardian Shoghi Effendi also has a capital in this committee is an effective encouragement to the children.

VIII. Boys' Sunday School Committee. This committee meets twice a week to prepare the spiritual lessons for the boys. They not only study the Bahá'í Teachings, but the Books of all other religions and philosophies, and choose extracts from all to teach the children. Every six months they have an examination for the boys (and girls). Little prizes are given to those who stand highest and these premiums are presented at a feast to which are invited the parents and all the children. They do wonderful work, and they say that Dr. Susan I. Moody has helped them very much in organizing and arranging the various departments.

IX. Schools' Committee. Their work is to promote the schools. They have control of the funds of the school and they sometimes give garden parties, theatre performances and other entertainments to raise money for the schools. They consult with the teachers about all the needs of the schools.

X. Success Committee. The work of this Committee is to interest people who are in high stations, ministers, statesmen, chief officials and others.

XI. Committee for Copying Tablets of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. This is a very great task because it is all by hand and there are many thousands of these Tablets. They are collecting every Tablet from every part of Persia. Most of these precious Tablets have never been translated into English or other languages. For three years this committee has been working constantly, and only one-half of the work is finished.

XII. Holy Places Committee, which looks up all Bahá'í historical sites and houses, takes photographs of these places, and when the properties are owned by nonBahá'ís this committee tries to purchase them in order that they may be kept as historic shrines.

XIII. Committee of Properties Left by Will to the Cause. The duty of this group is to ask the documents of such properties from all parts of Persia and file them, also sometimes by consent of the National Spiritual Assembly they change these properties into money or for other better properties. This is often a long process.

XIV. An Economic Committee has been recently established. This group has written to the United States, Great Britain and other nations for information how to establish a great cooperative association first in Persia and then between Persia and the United States and with other countries. The members are now translating these circulars.

When the translations are ready the National Spiritual Assembly will study them and decide what to do and the Economic Committee will carry out their instruction.

XV. Justice Committee. The work of this committee is about as follows: For example, if some difficulty arises between two Bahá'ís financially or otherwise, this committee settles it. Each party chooses two members of the Committee and the committee chooses one member. These five hear both sides of the case, give a decision and the complainants must accept the verdict of the five. This saves the time and money of lawsuits in the courts. The other day two Muhammadans who had a difference came and asked this Justice Committee to settle their case in this same way.

XVI. Committee of the Eternal Garden. This is the committee which looks after the Bahá'í cemetery. This Bahá'í cemetery which is just outside Tíhrán is the most remarkably beautiful one in all Persia. The Bahá'ís bury their dead according to the Commands of Bahá'u'lláh as given in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas in the best respect and in a lovely manner. The graves, just as in the western world, are dug deep and the lots are made attractive with fine trees and fragrant, beautiful flowers especially Persian roses. Nearly all the Bahá'í dead are laid to rest in this great garden which was given by one of the believers.

XVII. Young Men's Bahá'í Association which looks after the general Bahá'í Library and other places where non-believers may come to read the Bahá'í books. It has several sub-committees. One of these is to train youth to give Bahá'í lectures. Another is a Sports' sub-committee that arranges games in the great Bahá'í Garden of 15,000 square yards situated just outside the city. After the sports the young men gather in the Bahá'í Hall in this garden to hear lectures about the Cause. This Young Men's Committee also has another sub-committee to correspond with Bahá'í youth of the west. Still another sub-committee is called the theatrical group, it is composed of very capable Bahá'í actors and musicians who give two or more theatre productions each year. These plays are sometimes solely about the Bahá'í Cause. Sometimes they are classic Persian plays with a high moral and with them something about the Cause is introduced. The money raised is devoted to the work of this Committee. This Committee also arranges excellent Esperanto Courses.

XVIII. Women's Arrangement Committee. This committee arranges meetings for the ladies as the men and women have separate meetings except a few times in the year when they are able to have joint sessions. This group decides the places, the dates and the program for many hundreds of meetings for women in Tíhrán.

XIX. Women's Teaching Committee to interest non-believers.

XX. Young Women's Committee to teach the girls. These classes which are like the Sunday Schools of the west, meet every Friday afternoon, as that is the holy day of the East. The classes are held in private homes. This year there are seventeen classes for girls in different sections of the city. There are thirty-four teachers and three hundred and sixteen scholars. They have nine grades. The first and second classes of little girls learn brief quotations from the Holy Words of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá and other Prophets. The third grade is given a short history of the Bahá'í Cause; the fourth grade learns "Hidden Words" in Persian; the fifth and sixth grades study a book called "Lessons in Religion" written by a great Bahá'í teacher Muhammad Ali Nabil Akbar. It deals with many Commands in the "Kitabel-Aqdas." The seventh grade has a course in "A Traveler's Narrative." The eighth grade studies the book of Iqán and the ninth and highest grade is given a course to learn to give public lectures on the Bahá'í Cause.

XXI. Committee for Progress of Bahá'í Women. This group has a school for women who did not have the opportunities for education in their youth. These women are first taught to read and write, or if they know how to read and write, they are taught composition in order to know how to express themselves.

Later they all write articles about the Cause, and they are taught to give Bahá'í lectures.

XXII. Committee of Co-operation of Men and Women. Since conditions in Persia do not permit of men and women holding joint meetings very often, this committee is to co-ordinate the work of the men's and women's committees. Each committee among the men and women appoints one delegate to this special committee.

All these committees which I have enumerated for Tihrán have similar duplicates in all the other sixteen districts in different provinces of Persia where each district is the center of many local assemblies.

Those who have had the privilege of seeing the Persian Bahá'ís at work in this wonderfully arranged administration, can realize the potency of the Bahá'í Cause in the actual life of the world and its power to transform its civilization from the chaotic individualistic systems of the present to that of cooperation as given to the world by Bahá'u'lláh.

"In this century a great impelling stream is manifest in the world of intellect. Minds have been stirred by this impulse and have made marvelous progress . . . Man must throughout all the degrees of life evolve and progress day by day, for life is continuous. The Divine Manifestations have appeared so that They may confer the divine realities upon man, an ideal power which enables him to advance along all the degrees of human attainment. The power of the world of existence is limited, while the power of God is unlimited . . . therefore the holy souls who are confirmed with this divine power are likewise endowed with eternal motion. Their progress becomes unlimited. Day by day their lives are strengthened, the circle of their comprehension becomes wider, the sphere of their intellects becomes more effectual and their Spiritual powers are increased."

III.—MANIFESTATIONS OF GOD

GLENN A. SHOOK

Professor of Physics Wheaton College

This is the concluding article by Professor Shook in his series on modern science which commenced in the September number. These articles have proven to be an illuminating course in modern scientific trends linking religion and science.

WE HAVE already seen that if the mechanistic assumption is carried to its logical conclusion there is little chance for any type of religion. In most instances, to be sure, all of the destructive implications are not taken into account and this leaves room for at least Deism if not Pantheism, nevertheless there is a feeling, shared alike by those who are familiar with Modern Materialism and those who follow scientific thought, that ultimately science will have a complete solution of the mind. Now we are forced to add to this the rather sinister fact that the very word "religion" to many sincere people, cannot be disassociated from the notion of prejudice, superstition, discord, etc. In reality these people are not antagonistic to religion but to the incrustations of religion; nevertheless the result is the same.

On the other hand we observe great progress for peace, universal brotherhood, reconciliation and racial amity, etc., operating ostensibly without the aid of organized religion and in most cases entirely devoid of the spirit of religion, as the plain man understands it.

Consequently it is rather difficult, at the present time, to reestablish the concept of a revealed religion, that is, a religion promulgated by a prophet divinely inspired, such as Christ or Muhammad.

However, there are two or three points that we must keep in mind. When we apply anything like scientific investigation to world conditions today it is not at all obvious that society, unaided by great spiritual ideals, will gradually evolve into a higher state so that it can control its own destiny. Moreover, it is not unreasonable to suppose that a Manifestation of God, on earth today, might do for society just what Christ did for the Roman world or Muhammad for Arabia.

Finally, if we assume that religion may be renewed again, i. e. if we assume that the Christ spirit (not the historical Jesus) might return to earth again, it is quite plausible that it might come at a time when irreligion and undecipherable confusion are the rule of the day.

While science can make no contribution to religion, the scientific spirit, which is free from dogma and prejudice, will greatly assist us in differentiating truth from error even in things spiritual. One trained in science cannot, because of his scientific training, advance the knowledge of spiritual development but he may, because of his tendency toward mysticism, be able to demonstrate the consciousness of the presence of God. It has often been suggested that such a person probably keeps the two fields in separate compartments of his mind but so he does with music and science or art and science. This does not indicate any dualism but a differentiation of method as applied to two distinct fields. The difficulty in the past, that is, in the days of atomic materialism, was that the foremost thinkers assumed that scientific knowledge was the only certain knowledge.

The greatest proof that man may again receive spiritual education from a great Prophet (or Manifestation of God) is, of course, the existence of the Prophet Himself. To use Ábdu'l-Bahá's very comprehensive illustration, Christ was the perfect mirror that reflected the divine rays and when the people turned to Christ they saw God reflected in Him. In speaking of our relations with God Eddington's words are to the point, "The most flawless proof of the existence of God is no substitute for it: and if we have that relationship the most convincing disproof is turned harmlessly aside."

When we turn to the cause of Bahá'u'lláh we find all of the elements of any past religion but in the very nature of the case we also discover that He has brought infinitely more than any other Prophet because His message is universal, and moreover the world is more mature today than at the time of Christ or Muhammad.

The validity of His message and His uniqueness as a Divine Educator does not depend upon any one phase of His life or teaching although any one part of His teaching would in itself be sufficient proof for the erudite. We will in this connection, however, point out certain important aspects of this universal religion in order to demonstrate that things spiritual cannot be reduced to a mechanical system of atoms. At the same time we will not lose sight of the fact that our scientific training will keep us from being objects of antiquated traditions.

Even a superficial study of Bahá'u'lláh and Ábdu'l-Bahá (His son and successor) will convince any fair minded person that They were unique in Their station and that Their message to the world is not to be compared to local and transitory reforms that we witness on every hand. Some forty years ago Benjamin Jowett of Oxford, in speaking to one of his colleagues, made this significant statement, "This is the greatest Light that has come into the world since Jesus Christ. Never let it out of your sight. It is too great and too near for this generation to comprehend."

All who are familiar with the early history of Bahá'u'lláh, both friends and enemies, are agreed that He was not educated in any school and certainly He could not have been very familiar with the arts, sciences or political history of Europe and the New World, at the time He was exiled from Persia in 1852. The rest of His life was spent in exile and prison; sometimes with a little liberty but more often under conditions that would be unendurable to the most rugged to say nothing of one who was of noble birth unaccustomed to such hardships. Nevertheless in spite of these handicaps He trained thousands of His countrymen to a degree of enlightenment that has astonished all onlookers and we must remember that Persia was at this time among the lowest of the civilized nations of the world.

At a time when the eastern nations were in perpetual strife and conflict, when the various sects were exhibiting nothing but intense hatred, He taught that it was better for the individual to be killed than to retaliate and so effective was His teaching that over twenty thousand were martyred within a few years.

For more than a thousand years these people were taught that all religions were inferior to Islam and that all foreigners were infidels; nevertheless in an incredibly short time these apostles of the new day under the inspiration of their leader in far away Ákká, came to regard all religions as one and the people of the earth as "the leaves of one tree".

He urged Persia to study the arts and sciences of the Western nations, taught that reason and religion must conform, that men and women are equal, that all children must be educated. He even went so far as to maintain that society must educate the children if the parents are not qualified to do so.

Not only did He advance ideas that were entirely new to the Eastern nations but He anticipated practically all of the most progressive ideals of today.

Isolated from the culture of Europe and without books of any kind He commands the limitations of the extremes of wealth and poverty, the abolition of both chattel and economic slavery, the adoption of a universal language, the formation of a Universal League of Nations, the settlement of disputes between nations by an international arbitration court. And these are only a few of His reforms.

Such knowledge must be innate: The more we attempt to give a mechanical explanation of the mind of such a unique individual the more irrelevant does such an explanation become to our experience.

One of the greatest proofs of the Manifestation of God is the creative power of His words. Even if one is only slightly susceptible to mysticism he cannot read the words of Bahá'u'lláh without feeling their spiritual import. The following are from the Hidden Words:

"Busy not thyself with this world, for with fire We test the gold, and with gold We test the servants."

"Thou desirest gold, and I desire thy freedom therefrom. Thou hast recognized the wealth of thyself therein, and I have recognized thy wealth in thy sanctity therefrom . . ."

"Thou art My lamp and My light is in thee. Get thee light therefrom and seek none other than me, for I have created thee rich and bountifully favored thee."

The prophecies usually create very little interest except in the minds of those who have a profound regard for sacred scriptures, and probably for the reason that a prophecy has no practical significance until it has been fulfilled. When a prophecy is fulfilled however it does furnish corroborative evidence which must not be overlooked.

The zeal of the unorthodox for their skepticism concerning the prophecies of Isaiah, Daniel and Revelation is only equalled by the zeal of the orthodox for the literal interpretation of the first chapter of Genesis but we will try here to avoid any bias by considering only prophecies that have been made and fulfilled in our day.

About sixty years ago Bahá'u'lláh wrote to the heads of the leading nations, announcing His mission and urging them to cooperate in the establishment of true religion, just government and international peace.

Napoleon III showed only contempt for this timely warning whereupon Bahá'u'lláh wrote him again in 1869 saying in part:¹

“Thy doings shall throw thy kingdom into confusion, sovereignty shall pass from thy hands, to requite thee for thy deeds, and thus shall thou find thyself in grievous loss. . . . We behold abasement hastening upon thy heels and thou art yet of them that are heedless.”

The next year he was defeated by Prussia and the second French Empire came to an end.

A few years later, in the very beginning of the new German Empire, Bahá'u'lláh wrote to the Emperor an equally solemn warning as follows:

“O King of Berlin! . . . Recollect the one who was greater than thee in station (i. e. Napoleon III) and whose position was higher than thine. Where is he? And where are his possessions? Be admonished and be not of those who sleep. He cast the Tablet of God behind him when We informed him of what had befallen Us from the hosts of oppression, and thus disgrace beset him from all sides until he returned to the dust in great loss. . . .”

“O banks of the River Rhine! We have seen you drenched in gore because the swords of retribution were drawn against you and you shall have another turn. And we hear the lamentations of Berlin, although it be to-day in manifest glory.”

How could a prisoner in Akká predict such events except by intuition!

While Abdu'l-Bahá was in this country He referred to the World War on several occasions. In October 1912 in California He said;

“We are on the eve of the Battle of Armageddon referred to in the sixteenth chapter of Revelations. The time is two years hence, when only a spark will set aflame the whole of Europe.”

'Abdu'l-Bahá also foretold the social troubles after the war in no uncertain terms. In November 1919 when everyone was fairly confident that peace and harmony would certainly reign for a while, He said;

“It is clear that each nation now wishes complete self-determination and freedom of action, but some of them are not ready for it. The prevailing state of the world is one of irreligion, which is bound to result in anarchy and confusion. I have always said that the peace proposals following the great war were only a glimmer of the dawn, and not the sunrise.”

On the other hand we are assured of the ultimate triumph of spirituality over materiality. In 1904 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote:

(1) Baha'u'llah and the New Era, J. E. Esslemont.

“Know this, that hardships and misfortunes shall increase day by day, and the people shall be distressed. The doors of joy and happiness shall be closed on all sides. Terrible wars shall happen. Disappointment and the frustration of hopes shall surround the people from every direction until they are obliged to turn to God. Then the lights of great happiness shall enlighten the horizons, so that the cry of ‘Ya Bahá-el-Abhá (O God the most Glorious) may arise on all sides.’”

The moment we realize that man’s spiritual nature must be trained by a Divine Educator a certain amount of confusion in our mind gives way to order. The coming of the Great Prophet is like the renewal of spring; every activity of man takes on new life. It is not surprising therefore, with this powerful spiritual force operating in the world today, that we should witness a tendency toward spirituality in the arts and sciences in the face of the prevalent mechanistic outlook.

Every effort then, that we see, which is primarily for the advancement of the race, the elimination of prejudice, the reconciliation of the nations and the establishment of praiseworthy morals must be in the very nature of the case the reflection of this great spiritual force.

It is not unscientific to assume that such a spiritual force does exist in the world and that it operates as we have indicated; rather it would be decidedly unscientific to attempt an explanation of the mind without taking into account the influence of these Manifestations of God who appear in our midst from time to time.

We may be cognizant of the source of this power or entirely unaware of it and still manifest it to more or less degree according to our capacity. In the words of Bahá’u-lláh;

“Its light, when cast on the mirrors of the wise, gives expression to wisdom; when reflected from the minds of artists, it produces manifestations of new and beautiful arts: when it shines through the minds of students, it reveals knowledge and unfolds mysteries.”

* * * *

“Between religionists and scientists there has always been warfare for the reason that the former have proclaimed religion superior to science and considered science opposed to religion. For this reason strife and enmity have existed between them. His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh declared this to be a mistake, for religion is in harmony with science and reason. If it be at variance, it proceeds from the mind of man only and not from God and is therefore unworthy of belief and not deserving of attention . . . Bahá’u’lláh has removed this form of dissension and discord from among mankind and reconciled science with religion. This is His unique accomplishment in this day.”

CONSULTATION AND DISCUSSION

E. B. M. DEWING

The author of this interesting article on the value of consultation has recently come from New Zealand to this country, and has been carrying on special studies in the social sciences at Columbia College. His treatment of the subject well expresses the importance which the matter of consultation is assuming in the eyes of the social scientist. The article will be especially illuminating to Bahá'ís who may not have fully realized to what extraordinary extent the secular world is being moved to carry out the very principles laid down by Bahá'u'lláh many years ago.

IN this article consultation and discussion are dealt with in their broadest aspects and for the sake of convenience are not differentiated. The primary objective is to enumerate the mental and spiritual attitudes of individuals that it is necessary to hold, in order that a perfectly conducted and harmonious group may come into being. Its purpose is also to demonstrate that the social sciences have arrived at a realization of the value of integration in the group. Throughout, the Bahá'í law of loving consultation is upheld as the most advanced conception of this subject yet achieved. The perfectly conducted Bahá'í Spiritual Assembly, be it in the Orient, in the Americas or in the Southern Hemisphere, is the new world order in embryo and there is nothing to prevent each individual and association from introducing these ideals into their affairs with great advantage.

'Abdu'l-Bahá laid down a law in His Will and Testament to the effect that "It is incumbent upon everyone not to take any step without consulting the Spiritual Assembly, and they must assuredly obey with heart and soul its bidding and be submissive unto it, that things may be properly ordered and well arranged. Otherwise every person will act independently and after his own judgment, will follow his own desire and do harm to the Cause."

The recognition in some degree of the value of consultation is by no means a recent development. We are told by a Jewish chronicler of the Macabean period of ancient Rome that "three hundred and twenty men sat in council daily, consulting always for the people to the end that they might be well ordered. . . and there was neither envy nor emulation among them."

In the days before the Great War, De Toqueville, author of "Democracy in America," in discussing the habits of free cooperation and discussion, almost uninfluenced by the character of the state among German, and to a greater degree among the Russian peasantry, wrote, "It is man who makes monarchies and establishes republics, but the cooperative community seems to come directly from God."

Today in all walks of life the principle of consultation is taking hold upon the structure of society. In education the discussion method is being developed more and more, at the end of public meetings and lectures of all kinds, it is almost customary to have discussion before closing; in big business, the one man concern is being increasingly rare, and has given way to trusts, the corporation and the limited liability company controlled by an elected board of directors. The question of the desirability of these associations does not enter into the point under discussion. A still later development which is usually rewarded with considerable success is the business where the worker also has a controlling interest. Democracy itself is in fact based on the principle of consultation. The dictator is always insecure and absolute monarchs are almost of the past.

In all these instances, however, and in many others that could be given, where consultation is resorted to, the law of consultation is only incidental and subjective, whereas Ábdu'l-Bahá makes it objective and fundamental. Moreover, as is always the case when a philosophic and spiritual structure is built up around a social incident, it quickly assumes a significance that previously was absent. It is like the raw material for a product that is all assembled, and which as yet exists only in the plans and mind of the artisan.

There is also at least one vital aspect missing. The vital characteristic of consultation as enunciated by Ábdu'l-Bahá is that it must be loving and harmonious and He says regarding the obligations incumbent upon the members of consulting councils, "The first condition is absolute love and harmony amongst the members of the assembly." This essential difference is not present in the concept held by the average citizen. Where consultation takes place, as for example between members of a parliament, consultation in love and harmony is not considered essential; in fact usually there is no real desire for agreement. Consultation is brought about under those conditions by a group in the hope that their eloquence will be instrumental in winning over a majority to their way of thinking, so that they may bring about some policy that they desire to see affected. Personalities and anger are frequent and there is no obligation or attempt on the part of the defeated side to abide by the will of the majority. Their views are unchanged and they will work unceasingly to the end that their point of view will eventually prevail. Concerning this Ábdu'l-Bahá says, "It is again not permitted that any one of the honored members object to or censure, whether in or out of the meeting any decision arrived at previously, even though that decision be not right; for such criticism would prevent any decision being enforced."

HAVING thus briefly described the Bahá'í law of consultation and compared it to other forms of consultation, let us now consider the desirable mental and spiritual attitude for the individual to assume, and the psychological processes that take place during consultation. Ábdu'l-Bahá says, "The shining spark of truth cometh forth only after the clash of differing opinions." This is a marvelous and profound statement which psychologists and sociologists today increasingly echo. Miss Foley wrote of individual attitude in a discussion group, "We must not press our view. We should pool our differences." H. A. Overstreet in “About Ourselves,” when discussing the manner in which world unity can be brought about, mentions the matter of suitable institutions. He says, “Far more fundamental than is the necessity for producing the type of minds which have the habit of thinking widely and understandingly with and through other minds. Such intercreating minds, making their linkages with other minds, will gradually build up more finely functioning groups, which in turn making their wider linkages will carry on a progressive unification of mankind.” Again he says, “In discussion, mind meets mind. Each mind gives as well as takes. Each mind learns in a measure, to become open to the other, to tolerate, to try to understand. In each mind there are born ideas and attitudes that come not solely out of itself, but out of the interaction of other minds. And out of that union of other minds with many minds, comes a breadth and power of insight not otherwise achieved.”

The command to consult should be welcomed by every Bahá'í because the importance of the Cause is so vital, that none should feel capable of taking the responsibility of individual action. He should realize that no matter how altruistic his motives may be his point of view by reason of his humanly constituted mind, must of necessity be tinged with his personality. It is only the Perfect Man Whose opinion is impersonal; yet such Beings are exceedingly humble and Their charm lies in the manner in which They do not seek to force Their message upon those around them and so destroy their ability to express themselves. Rather they seek to draw out the individual and bring to light all that is best in mankind.

The very least that can be said in favor of group consultation, is that it is a shifting of responsibility from the weak shoulders of the one to the broad shoulders of the many. Inharmony is often due to individual mistakes; but if the whole group have made an error, all alike are responsible and friction between the group and the individual or between the group and a section of the group is accordingly rendered less likely.

One prime requisite for consultation is humility. Each individual, especially if he has a pet scheme of his own which he wants to see put into operation, should approach the council chamber as though he were a subject bearing gifts, which he knows are quite inadequate to a king. His attitude should be that of desire to have his scheme tested and if feasible, improved upon. “Should anyone oppose, he must on no account feel hurt for not until matters are fully discussed can the right way be revealed,” wrote Ábdu'l-Bahá.

Professor McIvor, of Columbia University, says there should be a willingness to discuss differences, and they should not be regarded as a source of division.

The attitude should be that of the scientist. Heigel describes the scientist as one who sinks himself in the object. He goes out from himself, seeks to unite with something that is out there in the thing or the life he is studying, he divests himself as far as possible of his personal equation, intrudes nothing of his private self, lets the object tell him what it has to tell. Overstreet says the scientist tries to find fact deliberately with carefully guarded technique. Eddington, when discussing the value of science, says, "Moreover the answers given by science have a singular perfection, prized the more because of the long record of toil and achievement behind them." In short discussion to be effective must be carried on with patience and a passion for truth.

Let us emulate the great and wise Socrates, whom Overstreet so beautifully describes, "Socrates was great as the oracle once reminded his fellow Greeks, because he knew he did not know. He did not come bristling with his own opinion, he had no impervious dominating egotisms; he was not at all wrapped up in a kind of finality of self congratulation. He went out modestly and sincerely to discover what other people thought. And in the process of talking with them simply and searchingly, he brought to birth ideas of which they themselves had been quite unaware. But what was more by this give and take process of his, he brought to birth ideas in himself; so much so, that when these ideas emerged, he was the most astonished of all.

"It would be a pleasant task to paint the picture of Socrates for Socrates is convincingly like what any average individual might be, if only that individual could grasp the idea of emptying the idea of pretention, and trying to build up ideas by intercreating processes with his fellows."

No one, when the majority disagrees with him, should adopt the attitude, "Well, you have my opinion and you do not accept it, I accept your decision, but you are wrong, and I have nothing further to say." Such an attitude closes the door to truth as far as that individual is concerned and may prevent the master key to the true solution from being contributed which that individual may yet hold. It is like a rower in a race throwing away his oar because he does not like the instructions of the stroke. The rest of the team are not only deprived of his propelling power, but have an additional dead weight to carry and this extra weight in the group is represented by a straining of the relations. It is an attitude that indicates that the individual considers himself exclusive and superior in intelligence to the others. This does not mean that in a group there may not be experts of superior ability. It is the duty of the rest to recognize this greater wisdom when it appears. But it would seem that only in the case of a definite hard and fast technical or legal point is it justifiable for an individual to hold on to his opinion. There is a further danger to the individual that results from this holding on to a point of view. It may become inhibited and a mania, and result in neurosis and all kinds of undesirable nervous conditions. There is nothing more tragic than to find someone who has a perpetual grouch because, some group ten years ago would not do something he thought they ought to do.

Then there is the opinionated person. He is slightly different because whereas the previous type may be perfectly sincere, the opinionated person merely likes to hear his own voice and never really minds very much if his ideas are acceptable or not. Of this kind Overstreet naively remarks, “. . . he has his mind all made up. He knows. ‘Don’t tell me,’ he says. And if you are wise you don’t.”

Tricks of oratory should have no place in true discussion, useless reiteration avoided, and above all argument for its own sake.

All should be ceaselessly on the watch for the clique consciousness. As soon as a group within a group develops, efficiency and vitality diminish, and loving consultation is impossible. A slavish adherence to precedence must be avoided. Conditions change and just because a step failed ten years ago or even last year, it does not say it always will. Henry Ford is a good example in this respect; he refuses to allow records of unsuccessful experiments to be kept. New blood should be deemed a necessity and all should acquire the secret of eternal youth as far as thought is concerned. The greatest men never get old and often do their best work at great ages. Just as soon as an individual has ceased to look for new aspects of truth and starts to sit back on his laurels and the glories of the past, that individual ceases to be a positive force in society.

The timid should be encouraged, for beneath a retiring exterior deep wisdom often lies.

THE ATTITUDE of compromise is not truly constructive, because it is not real agreement and that process of integration that is so characteristic of the highest type of consultation has not taken place. Compromise in its very nature implies continued difference under agreement; the parties agree to differ.

In discussion, interest in dull subjects is stimulated. Matters that are hard to give whole-hearted attention to when attempted alone, assume a different aspect when dealt with by a group.

True discussion is stimulating to the intellect, a group intelligence is aroused that is something in the nature of healthy competition, but more profound. Man is a social animal and it is a well-known fact that two working together will do more work than the same two men working separately.

Associations that plan conferences should remember that the best results accrue when the speeches are brief and few, and the discussions under control and numerous. It is not conferring to have billed speakers and after them to confine the discussion to a few previously selected persons who proceed to deliver prepared speeches. Such gatherings fail to a large degree, because all have not participated, the thought is individual thought and the “shining spark of truth has not come forth after the clash of differing opinions.”

Regarding the character of a group, it is easy to see that the more important its function, the more difficult it becomes to maintain harmony. A discussion group or a language class is not likely to indulge in acrimonious debates, because nothing very vital is involved. A group of business men, legislators or members of a religious body are far more likely to so indulge because matters that affect them deeply are involved.

The group needs to examine the motives of the individual if he is obstinate and a continued source of inharmony. In everyday life it would probably be found to be due to self-interest and in religious matters it may be that also, but more likely due to a narrow dogmatic mind. Singleness of purpose and absence of complex motives are the first essentials for a harmonious and efficient group. It might well be said that the harmony of the group increases inversely as the complexity of the motives of the individuals decreases, and their sincerity, love, singleness and purity of purpose increase.

In the Bahá'í group, the highest type of consultation yet conceived is evolved, because their method is conscious loving consultation. It will be the pattern for all society of the future and the Parliament of Man yet to be. In Persia especially, whole groups of society practice the Bahá'í plan on a large scale, indeed it would be a separate article in itself to describe them.

Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, says that Bahá'ís should consult even in their private affairs. When that is universally practiced, a civilization of the very highest order will be born.

“Nothing less than persistent and strenuous warfare against our own instincts and natural inclinations, and self-sacrifice in subordinating our own likings to the imperative requirements of the Cause of God, can insure our undivided loyalty to so sacred a principle [consultation]—a principle that will for all time safeguard our beloved Cause from the allurements and the trivialities of the world without, and of the pitfalls of the self within.”

Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause.

CONSULTATION IS AN ART

DORIS HOLLEY

ACCORDING to the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, true consultation brings forth the right decision. That is, a procedure exists by which the right decision may be found. This is one of the basic principles of the Bahá'í Revelation. If we work from principles to particulars, our action being the result of conscious obedience to spiritual law, our action will be based upon a solid foundation which the winds of personal opinion cannot blow down. We will have an unerring formula by which the right decision may be arrived at. The principle or law employed to find the right decision is the law of consultation, the guiding principle of this age.

What is true consultation?

“Every destruction is followed by a construction”, Bahá'u'lláh assures us, so perhaps if we see what is supposed to be consultation in the usual sense and clear that preconceived idea out of the way, we can proceed to the interpretation of this guiding principle according to the spirit of the Bahá'í teachings.

Ordinary consultation consists in talking over an already-formed decision with someone we have picked out, consciously or unconsciously, to agree with us. Do we consult with someone who we know in advance will not agree with us? Not unless we have to, and often then we don't even listen to what that “unreasonable” person has to say. If, unexpectedly, the person with whom we are consulting does not agree with us, we try to win him over to our opinion. That is, we try to prove the correctness of an already formed opinion by finding a corroborator. We find another person of the same opinion to prove the success of our consultation. But have we made the right decision? As the principle upon which this form of consultation is based is the principle of agreement, and even more strictly, agreement with us, the word consultation can hardly be applied to it. Agreement has nothing to do with the right decision, it is simply a confirmation of an already formed decision.

Consultation is an art. We need training in this subtle form of the expression of truth. The free schools for this important education are the Spiritual Assemblies of the Bahá'ís of the world.

In the administration of a Bahá'í community under the World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, decision is vested solely in a Spiritual Assembly. When we use the means of true consultation in this age, by consulting with an Assembly (as a member of it or as a believer), we haven't chosen those whose decision is final, but they have been chosen by the whole community. Therefore any other form of discussion ceases to be consultation in the sense of the existing procedure by which the right decision may be found. The decision is obtained through opinions advanced without attachment, and this is a result of spiritual growth. The opinions are advanced impersonally, in a spirit of search for truth, and the decision arrived at by majority vote of a Spiritual Assembly is unquestionably accepted by the Bahá'í community.

The training of those elected to serve as members of a Spiritual Assembly is difficult and painful. These nine people, as a whole, the various personalities representing different salient qualities, or states of consciousness, make together one more or less complete human being. It is like being mixed with eight other people in a magic retort, which, if heated to the secret intensity, will produce the divine elixir. These training schools in the art of consultation are crucibles in which the fire of self must be wholly consumed.

The attitude of the ordinary person, at first in an unchanged state of consciousness, is that of pride at the honor conferred upon him, or an over-awed admiration of the other eight members and a feeling of spiritual inferiority. The latter is really false humility, for we are taught not to think of our own capacity (it would be enough to discourage anyone), but to know that if we are elected we must do our best and trust in God, and that to be overwhelmed with our own shortcomings is but the other side of the shield of being overwhelmed with our own importance. The outcome is just as limited. "Self-mastery is self-forgetfulness," said 'Abdu'l-

Bahá. At first we submit outwardly to the majority rule, but inwardly we are not convinced. Even if we have the wisdom, (and obedience) not to mention it to others, inwardly we feel that our idea or opinion (which has been rejected) is right and timely, and would have produced much good but for the fact that the other timid souls lack courage and vision. In other words we are completely attached to our own inspiration. It is only as our consciousness begins to change from the personal to the impersonal, from the particular to the universal, that we can begin to form a part of that mysterious collective entity through which the truth can come—a channel through which the spirit can work—when that channel is not clogged by insisted-upon opinions and personal prejudices.

Prayer, and meditation upon the words of Bahá'u'lláh, produces a changed state of consciousness, and it is only by a changed state of consciousness that the Revelation can be proved. Otherwise it is useless. If we stay just the same, personally-minded and limited, we do not belong to this universal age and cannot become an instrument through which its spirit can function. As our thoughts become permeated with the spirit of the Teachings our consciousness changes. This is the mysterious secret of the spirit of the age.

A UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE—WHICH?

A. EVELYN BAXTER

This magazine has often published accounts of International Esperanto Congresses. The Twenty-second Universal Congress of Esperanto was held this year at Oxford the sessions of which are very well described by Miss Baxter in the following article.

UP AND down the world, multitudes now realize the need of a universal language which shall make not only possible but easy the interchange of trade, culture and friendship between small and almost unknown nations, as well as between the so-called "Great Powers." But it is another matter when one inquires which among the tongues already spoken is to be the medium of interchange, or whether it shall be a new invented language.

Only those who are accustomed to international affairs, such as great congresses for peace, religion, law, medicine, police, postal services, cooperative societies, and the like, have any idea of the chaos which reigns owing to the translation and retranslation when, say, even four languages are used; and although this is somewhat obviated by simultaneous radio transmission of the translations, yet considerable difficulty remains yet to be overcome.

But what was the state of affairs at the great Twenty-second Universal Congress of Esperanto held at Oxford (England) in August? Any misconception arising from ambiguity? Any preference of one person before another due to supposed superiority of nationality, or to the fact that the one is using his mother-tongue while to the listener it is an acquired language? Emphatically no! Whatever the nature of the gathering—social function concert, play, the business meetings of the Congress, the impressive Summer University, or the smaller meetings of special societies or activities—the same success and satisfaction prevailed.

As one who had the privilege of attending this great Congress, I should like to give a few personal impressions and reminiscences. Matter-of-fact reports can be read in the various Esperanto journals such as "Esperanto," "La Nova Tago," "International Language," "Heroldo," etc.

First of all let me say what an æsthetic treat it was to meet in this historic university city—the centuries-old seat of learning—and to have the opportunity between more serious occupations, of roaming around the wonderful old colleges with their interesting halls and beautiful gardens. And with what hospitality and generosity the Mayor and Corporation welcomed us. What excellent arrangements had been made by the indefatigable secretary, Mr. Cecil Goldsmith, for housing his unwieldy family!

All large meetings were held in the beautiful hall of the Town Hall—those of the Congress itself and of the Universal Esperanto Association (U E A) in the mornings; those of the Summer University in the afternoons; and in the evenings the various social functions; while sectional meetings were held in the lecture-rooms of Christ Church College adjoining.

The Congress was attended by over twelve hundred people from twenty-nine different countries. Is that not indeed a miracle when twenty-nine tongues are made eloquent in one common language?

This great family was welcomed individually by the Deputy Mayor and Lady Alderman and most hospitably entertained. The great hall was beautifully decorated with plants and flowers, and the gallery running the length of the hall was draped with the flags of many nations, and on the platform was the "Verda Standardo" representing "Esperantujo." Mr. Bernard Long, B.A. (London), President of the Congress, ably presided and welcomed the many nations represented at the Congress. Official representatives from various governments gave the greetings of their country, and a letter from our beloved Guardian, Shoghi Effendi (Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause) was mentioned, and was afterwards read at the second business meeting. How encouraging to feel the interest and support of our Guardian in this important world-wide movement towards friendship between all nations!

A wonderful service was held on Sunday morning at St. Mary the Virgin's, when the large church was full, and Rev. T. Grahame Bailey, M.A., D.D., gave an excellent address on the necessity of exerting ourselves in order to make progress in the spiritual life, and called on us to put forth every effort towards the realization of universal peace which can be so greatly helped by a universal language. A Roman Catholic service was held in the Priory of the Holy Ghost. At noon, all the "Kongresanoj" assembled in a corner of the quadrangle of Christ Church College for a group photograph, and in spite of cloudy conditions this proved a great success.

THE CONGRESS was officially opened on Sunday evening, when the hall was again crowded. One representative from every country attending the Congress gave a short greeting in turn. It is ever a joy to see the family of Dr. Zamenhof represented at the Congress, and at this meeting Dr. Felix Zamenhof, brother, and Miss Lydja Zamenhof, youngest daughter of the esteemed "Majstro," were both on the platform and gave short but moving speeches in the very spirit of the inventor of this wonderful language. It is no mere coincidence that this daughter of so universally-minded a father, is the only Bahá'í in Poland. She not only knows and loves the Bahá'í Faith, but works devotedly to promote the Cause by speeches, articles and translations. She has just finished translating into Esperanto "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era" by Dr. Esslemont. The meeting closed with the singing to organ accompaniment of the world-wide Esperanto hymn "La Espero."

AMONG BAHÁ'Í activities, a meeting was held on Monday, August fourth, in the afternoon at which about sixty people were present, representing several nationalities.

The feeling was most sympathetic, and the three papers given by our esteemed teacher, Mrs. Mary Hanford Ford of New York, Miss Elsa Maria Grossmann of Hamburg, and Miss Lydja Zamenhof of Warsaw, pointed out the need of a recurrent Manifestation of God, and that the time was ripe for such to appear—indeed that He had already appeared in the person of Bahá'u'lláh. Professor Paul Christaller (Stuttgart) as Chairman presided in a most cordial manner and gave a few of the Teachings which are peculiar to the Bahá'í Movement, such as a universal language, script, education, and above all universal peace. Two of the "Hidden Words" of Bahá'u'lláh were read by the writer. The Bahá'í friends met twice for lunch, when those from other countries were the guests of the Bahá'í British National Spiritual Assembly. Many from distant lands felt the joy of friendship which is only possible in many cases by means of Esperanto.

A SPECIAL feature of this Congress was the large number of blind persons from several countries, and the splendid arrangements made for their comfort by Mr. and Mrs. Merrick and their helpers. Two ladies devoted the whole of their time to the sale of objects at a stall on behalf of the blind, many of the articles having been made by the blind themselves. Esperanto has been of enormous benefit to the blind, not only for purposes of travel, but by using only the one international language for translation greatly increasing the scope of literature available in Braille.

As a relaxation from the serious occupations of the day, every evening had some form of entertainment, and on Friday evening was held a great international ball at which many wore the picturesque dress of their country. Every evening also there was given a short "Talking Film" in Esperanto.

Perhaps one of the most touching of the Congress meetings is the closing one. Our amiable President, Mr. John Merchant (Sheffield) who so ably conducted the business meetings with the efficient help of the Secretary, Robert Kreuz (Geneva) bids us keep the "Verda Standardo" flying throughout the world for another year, when we hope to experience as successful a Congress at Krakow in the land where Dr. Zamenhof lived and worked.

"The Divine Power alone is potent enough to triumph over these religious, racial and patriotic prejudices. . . . He (Bahá'u'lláh) heralds the hour of unity which has dawned on all mankind."

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

"CHINA is calling, in fact the whole world is calling for Light. That is why people are taking such an interest in these Bahá'í Principles and the books explaining them. There is a need, there is an approach, and there is a fulfillment. This is a New Message of great value; it is liberalizing, quickening. It makes religion more dynamic to solve world problems. For all this there is a need, and the deep-thinking men of China all realize this great necessity; for we cannot go back to the old stereotyped, half-dead creeds. This Bahá'í Message supplies a new ideal and the world cannot win against it," said Dr. Y. S. Tsao, former President of Tsing Hua University, to Miss Martha L. Root, journalist and Bahá'í lecturer and teacher.*

China groping her way for Light in one of the most turbulent, chaotic and yet imminently progressive periods of her existence, would find indeed in the Bahá'í Movement an answer to all the problems which harrass her.

Here, as in fact almost universally throughout this planet, the old religious forces are crumbling. The moral sanctions and customs supported by thousands of years of religious tradition are no longer holding Young China in the face of a thousand outside influences impinging upon them. Never deeply spiritual in temperament, the Chinese now left without even the comfort of religious habit are in great need of some guiding star for their national and racial destiny.

There are those among this vast populace who find this guiding star in Communism. There are those, and they are fortunately strong in number and influence, who find it in the Nationalism based upon the three-fold principle of democracy uttered by Sun Yat-Sen, whose ideals are near to being a religion among the zealous leaders of the Kuo Ming Tang party. Yet this is not enough, as Dr. Tsao himself acknowledges, for there are many and deeply serious problems before which the best brains of China find themselves baffled.

Nor is China alone in this danger of chaos. Not alone China, but the whole world, needs the Bahá'í Teachings. The Christian world no less than the Confucian world today faces the danger that her civilization as it is built up cannot actually survive the threat of chaos and disintegration.

The same disruptive force which has turned China into a slaughter pen, bringing to stop the wheels of progress, menaces also other nations in an alarming way. As we approach the Christmas season of peace and good-will to men we hear from Europe increasingly alarming accounts of the will-to-war.

To get rid of war is the biggest task to which mankind has ever addressed itself, said former Prime Minister Arthur Meighen of Canada at the International Conference of the World Alliance for International Friendship recently held in Washington. "We must meet the new conditions if we hope to survive. With war possible now in three dimensions weapons come into play which cannot be matched with other weapons. The only way to meet offense in this new warfare on three planes (sea, earth and air) is by reprisal. Reprisal will follow reprisal until the whole civil population are wiped out or demoralized. There can be nothing but defeat and despair to both the conquered and conqueror, and no agreement to limit destructive agents will hold in time of combat for war is itself an outlaw. The belligerent fighting for his life will stop at nothing. Necessity knows no law.

"But what of the League of Nations and the numerous peace pacts? These are praiseworthy indications of man's will to peace," says Mr. Meighen, "but we must not rely upon them. The absence of any provision for enforcement of the pact will tempt the nations to achieve a quick victory. During the period of these pacts has taken place a growth of armament more terrible than the world has yet known. Within a decade of the "war to end war" we have witnessed expenditures for armament more enormous than ever before.

"Very manifestly there is nothing in the world capable of giving security against war. Something must be found. There is nothing of supreme importance in the world today save to be adequately organized against war. Nationalism must be abated. We must find those common cords of humanity that will vibrate to those who feel themselves as brothers."

Another speaker at this Conference, Hon. Jacob Gould Schurman, former American Ambassador to Germany, said that prevention of war is assured only if nations living side by side, no matter what their differences are, never think even of resorting to war. He has put his finger on the crux of the matter. War can only be abolished when the desire for war is annihilated in the human breast, and that desire will never be annihilated until men come to think of all mankind as brothers, the welfare of all being held in equal esteem.

Ruhi Afnan, grandson of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, a graduate of the American University at Beirut and student at an English University, in an illuminating article published a few years ago in this magazine* pointed out that the world cannot accomplish reforms in the way in which it is now endeavoring to do, singling out one at a time. War cannot be abolished until national racial and religious prejudices and hatred are abolished. The Bahá'í Movement carries forward simultaneously all the principles necessary to accomplish this. Here we have a Movement which at the same time establishes a universal religious consciousness; an actual world brotherhood as deep and earnest and effective as the world has ever known within the heretofore limited fields of sectarianism; a will-to-peace springing from the sentiment of the sacredness of human life (to be killed is better than to kill, says Bahá'u'lláh) and founded effectively upon the Parliament of Man. These principles are accepted in toto by every adherent of the Bahá'í Cause. Every one who becomes an adherent of the Bahá'í Cause, whether cultured or uncultured, whether erstwhile enlightened and tolerant or bigoted and ruthless, becomes thereby an active agent for world peace.

Where else can one find in the world today a Movement which like this can actually offer security against war? A Movement capable of drawing into its fold Christian, Buddhist, Muhammadan, Jew and atheist, as regards religious cleavage; and of the classes of men, every type of intelligence and every degree of education from the illiterate and fanatical tribesmen of Persia to the college professor and scientist, nay, even, the rulers of Christendom.

The European and American worlds, though at present moving smoothly in the ordinary channels of civilization, are in no situation to be hypercritical regarding the chaos in China. Let us extend to that great people who are sincerely striving toward better government, customs and religion, the hand of brotherhood. Let us not continue to teach them the arts of war and force them to use those arts for their own national safety. Let us rather offer them this Golden Gift of the Bahá'í Teaching which is, if they could but see it, the greatest means today for their advancement and repose, as indeed it is for the advancement and repose of the Occident.

"China, China, China, Chinward the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh must march! Where is that holy sanctified Bahá'í to become the teacher of China! China has most great capability. The Chinese people are most simple-hearted and truth-seeking. The Bahá'í teacher of the Chinese people must first be imbued with their spirit; know their sacred literature; study their national customs and speak to them from their own standpoint, and their own terminologies. He must entertain no thought of his own, but ever think of their spiritual welfare. In China one can teach many souls and train and educate such divine personages each one of whom may become the bright candle of the world of humanity. Truly, I say they are free from deceit and hypocrisies and are prompted with ideal motives.

"Had I been feeling well, I would have taken a journey to China myself! China is the country of the future. I hope the right kind of teacher will be inspired to go to that vast empire to lay the foundation of the Kingdom of God, to promote the principles of divine civilization, to unfurl the banner of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh, and to invite the people to the Banquet of the Lord!"

CHINESE CULTURE AND BAHÁ'ISM

THE Bahá'í Movement is beginning to bring a new orientation in China, this wonderful nation with 500,000,000 souls. What China does later, may have its effect in every country of the globe. If she should become a military nation, who can say, how with one-fourth of the population of the globe involved, she might be the balance that would sink all civilizations. If China comes out strongly for Bahá'u'lláh's universal principles she might lead the world, in a century or two, to a new undreamed of international co-operation! Dr. Sun Yat-sen, the "George Washington of China," the immortal Father of the new Republic, listened with interest to the Bahá'í Teachings when I met him in Canton in 1924. He asked to have two Bahá'í books sent to him. He was a great idealist; his program was based on cooperation rather than on competition, and his ultimate aim was universal peace.

Visiting Canton again in September, 1930, five years after the passing of this great man, I had the honor to meet His Excellency Chen Ming-Shu, the Governor of Kwangtung Province. He was formerly one of the great generals of China; he has stood at the front and faced death many times. He is a man of vision and one who thinks deeply. He said: "I did not know much about this Bahá'í Movement until you sent me a booklet two days ago, but as I read it, I believe Bahá'u'lláh was a Prophet and China has need of a Prophet in these days. Such Teachings at their lowest estimate could not harm any nation and at their highest they could do a great good in China and in every other country. No nation is more fitted to receive these Teachings than China, for the base of Chinese civilization is universal peace. Just now we are going through great disturbances, but when China is righted and we are on an equal footing with other nations, China will take her place in all international welfare."

Governor Chen Ming-Shu, although he is such a busy man, visits the schools and sometimes speaks to the students just as did the late Dr. Sun Yat-sen. Governor Chen knows which schools are the most progressive, which teachers have the broadest outlook, and no one realizes more than he that no force can convert China into peace. The ideal alone can conquer in the end.

WHILE in Shanghai, the writer had the joy of meeting again Dr. Y. S. Tsao, former President of Tsing Hua University (this is the Boxer Indemnity Institution). He is one of the keenest educationists in China and a distinguished writer of Chinese affairs. Speaking with him about the relation of Chinese culture to the Bahá'í Movement, he stated among other points: "An analysis of Chinese culture shows that the Eastern philosophers when in trouble dig deep down into their souls. This Bahá'í Movement is a new way of 'digging down' and the Teachings supply the help they are seeking. China is calling, in fact the whole world is calling for Light. That is why people are taking such an interest in these Bahá'í Principles and the books explaining them. There is a need, there is an approach, and there is a fulfillment. This is a new Message of great value; it is liberalizing, quickening. It makes religion more dynamic to solve world problems. For all this there is a need, and the deep-thinking men of China all realize this great necessity; for we cannot go back to the old stereotyped, half-dead creeds. This Bahá'í Message supplies a new ideal and the world cannot win against it. The older religions may struggle on till they are dead: they may never attain to the goal of accepting this. The world may sink farther and farther down until it drinks the last dregs and then it will come up again. Chinese history has been like that. After a number of years of suffering some ruler or teacher appears and for several hundred years there is progress. Then a relapse comes, but in these modern times China cannot afford a relapse. Confucius himself taught that about every five hundred years or so a great teacher or reformer will come.

"These Bahá'í Teachings carry universality and supply the educational, the economic and the social solutions for this new epoch," said Dr. Tsao. "Not alone China, but the whole world needs these Teachings. China needs them specially because her leaders are groping for Light."

"How will the Chinese people take these Teachings? I sometimes ask myself," he continued, "among the Eastern people there are some that take religion much more seriously than does the West or China. People of the Near East and many in Central Asia make religion their very life, they are desperate in their religion. My question is will the Chinese people take this Bahá'í Movement so seriously as the peoples of the Near East? According to history in the past, the Chinese people have rarely taken religion so very earnestly unless it was encouraged by government or by some sovereign. Judging from the modern spirit of the new rulers in China, they have learned so many and modern Western ideas that the present Government and its leaders have not yet looked to a religious teacher or a new religious movement to help in the solution of China's affairs. However, they have not made as rapid improvement in the direction of the affairs of state as they had hoped, so the earnest thinkers and leaders who are endeavoring to dig deeper into the human soul, and looking for a guiding spirit from the spiritual Heaven, might appreciate and understand the value of this new Message from Bahá'u'lláh, inasmuch as this new movement not only fulfills the needs of the present day, but supplies as well an ideal for the future of mankind. Through their sufferings, through their wanderings, the Chinese people may see a Light here."

Dr. C. T. Wang, Minister of Foreign Affairs in China.

Dr. Tsao graciously is assisting in the publication of the Chinese version of "Bahá'u'lláh And The New Era," a Western book written by Dr. J. E. Esslemont, giving the history and the Teachings of the Bahá'í Movement.

"Common sense which runs like a thread through China's long history," said Mr. Yeh Kung-cho former Minister of Communications, "shows that the common ideal of China is the peace of the world. Much literature condemning war had been written by China's thinkers. She entertains no wild ambitions towards any other country, so when her house is put in order, she will stand ready to cooperate with the world in material and human resources according to her former traditional spirit and morality."

Dr. C. T. Wang, Minister of For-

oreign Affairs was in his office in the capital, Nanking, and when I asked him about China's aim for world peace he answered! "We have always stood for world peace. We have never been an aggressive power, this has been an historical fact for four thousand years. We have stood for cultural and peaceful development; the Mongolian race fought, but not the Chinese. If we have something good, we let the world have it, if it wishes, but we have never forced our customs or laws on other people. We never conquered Japan, never intended to, but they took our written language and our culture." When I spoke of the French Revolution by way of comparison, saying that it took that country small as it is when one thinks of China's vast millions, one hundred years to restore peace, he said: "Times are different now, it will not take China one hundred years to develop peace in her domains."

Dr. Paul Linebarger, legal adviser to the National Government of China called upon me at my hotel in Nanking. He said that he had worked for eighteen years with the late Dr. Sun Yat-sen and that the latter's great aim was universal peace. Dr. Linebarger, who was given the degree of Doctor of Laws in the National Central University the week I was in Nanking (and this honor has only been bestowed upon one other scholar either Chinese or foreign in this young University) said to me: "You Bahá'ís are most welcome in China. We like to see you introducing the Bahá'í Teachings here."

University of California in 1912 and took his Ph. D. degree in Columbia University, has always specialized in education. He said that since the revolution in 1911, several times there have been two governments, but education has never disintegrated. During all this time instructions about education could be sent to any province. I asked Dr. Chiang about the teaching of religion in the schools, because at the moment there is a great furor among the foreign missionaries. He answered: "So far as the public schools are concerned there is no teaching of religion in these schools; it is the same as in America. We go a step farther and include the private schools no matter by whom established, whether by private individuals, societies or missionary organizations; in the lower schools below junior middle school no religious training shall be given. However, above junior middle school, and this means the normal schools, colleges and universities where students are old enough to think for themselves—religious teaching is optional. Teachers cannot enforce attendance. The missionaries are too drastic, but our program is much more moderate than in some countries."

I gave Dr. Chiang one or two books about the Bahá'í Principles and we spoke of Bahá'u'lláh's Teachings and what the new universal education should be. All great educationists are interested in these Teachings which proves what Dr. Tsao said that the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh offer a new solution for education, and the economic and social welfare of mankind. These solutions have not been brought forward in former religions. The great universities of China just as the Western universities were opened to lectures on these Principles. Their International Clubs also arranged for more talks. The writer spoke to two thousand young men in the National Central University in Nanking, October sixth, on "International Education For the New Age," a lecture based on Bahá'u'lláh's plan for the new universal education. The Chancellor in his letter said: "You are heartily invited to give us a speech." After the lecture in Hong Kong University which was well attended and enthusiastic, a beautiful girl of nineteen years came forward and asked what she could do to promote the Bahá'í Cause in Singapore, her home city. They said she is one of the brightest girls in the university, and whatever life-work she undertakes she will bring to it extraordinary capacity.

There is absolutely no prejudice in China. They are open to investigate truth. The Director of Broadcasting in Canton said that the people of China would be very interested in these universal principles. Three lectures were given over the radio, and the "Canton Municipal Daily News" in its issue of September 23, 1930, had two full pages with photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the Special Supplement Section. On these two pages were (1) a story about the visit to Canton; (2) Lecture broadcast on "New Universal Education; (3) "Esperanto As a Universal Auxiliary Language" and (4) the broadcast speech on "What Is the Bahá'í Movement?"

The speech broadcasted in Hong Kong was given in full in six newspapers the following morning.

The West on the other hand, could with profit examine the basic foundation of Chinese culture and ask itself whether the great civilizations of China contain elements which can contribute toward international cooperation. China has seen the rise and fall of many dynasties, China has had her discoverers and inventors, men of fine arts, philosophers and poets and scholars, while we in the Occident were still savages on the plains. Highest of all, China had the great sage and Prophet Confucius, born in 551 B. C. who taught the central doctrine of being sincere in thought so as to rectify the heart, to cultivate the person, to order well the state, and to pacify the world. He taught also that all within the four seas are brothers.

According to the School of Physiocrats, one writer says: "The whole teaching of Confucius aimed at restoring to human nature that first radiance that first beauty, which it had received from Heaven, and which had become obscured by ignorance and passion. He therefore exhorted his countrymen to obey the Lord of Heaven, to honor and fear him, to love their neighbors as themselves, to overcome their inclinations, never to make passion the measure of action, but rather to subject it to reason, and not to do or think or say anything contrary to reason." The essential part still remains to be done, to bind it upon the brows of earth, and this was the task of Confucius, to bring men back to the original divine state of nature. What has happened to China in the lapse from Confucius' teachings, has similarly come upon the West in its neglecting to live the teachings of Jesus Christ. These great Prophets and Manifestations—and such an One is Bahá'u'lláh—come to this earth from age to age to “renew religion,” and Their Teachings carry the great Creative Power to change men's hearts and lead them up.

Just as I am finishing this thought, at six o'clock this morning, here in Shanghai, I see with my very eyes a symbol of what the Bahá'í Teachings will do for China. From my high window, I view the black clouds over China, over the sea and over the Yangtse River. It looks as if it would be a day of “night” and depression; but something is happening behind this grim, floating blackness: a mighty orb of light steadily arises behind all this, and slowly but surely the black clouds drop down out of sight or are melted through magic, into white beauty. It is the glorious full sun uprising in dazzling brilliance! What can withstand the rays of such a light! Today breaks into glad sunshine and all the blackness passes away and will be remembered no more. So arises Bahá'u'lláh to these thinkers of China who, in the early morning watch of a new epoch just breaking, glimpse the Sun of Truth!

WHAT IS TRUTH?

THORNTON CHASE

The following was written some years ago and is from the unpublished letters of the author who was pronounced by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to be the first believer in America in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh.

TRUTH presents itself in the passing of the centuries in the enduring record of its effect upon civilization and the tenacity with which man clings to the channel of its expression. Its immediate proof is demonstrated in that which is the acme of miraculous expression—when through its assimilation a sinner becomes a saint. In other words, it is a complete transformer of the individual soul life.

The Water of Life, which is a symbol used to express Truth, is no shallow pool upon which we are to launch the frail toy rafts of metaphysics and philosophies; instead, it is a boundless and bottomless ocean in which we may plunge and should immerse our entire beings, divested of every thought and concept save that which is of God.

Truth is single like light, and just as light when broken upon the cross of the prism, becomes fragmentary and disjointed and diluted, so the Light of Truth when strained through our mentalities becomes fragmentary and adulterated with our misconceptions and false imaginings, and is thereby deprived of its innate potency to influence the lives of men to spiritual attainment.

This is demonstrated in the beauty and simplicity of the life and teachings of Jesus the Christ—the Divine Light of the World—which, broken on the cross of human hatred, opposition and denial, became fragmentized in the upbuilding of different sects and cults, each calling itself by the Name of Christ and yet, by reason of these different attitudes, all of them falling short of the Christ intent.

Throughout the ages, man has been prone to take one little cup of this Water of Life and become so attached to it that it finally became for him the entire ocean;—to take one ray of the light, of the color suited to his liking—red, or green or yellow—and become so enamored of it that at last it grew to constitute for him the entire sun. Thus, the Christian holds no tolerance for any form of religion which does not teach a personal God, while the Indian philosophies reject any which does teach a personal God; the reincarnationist will accept no religion which does not teach that repeated experiences in the flesh are the only means of soul purification, and so on almost endlessly. Each thus immures himself in a fortress of his own making wherefrom he combats the approach of any with ideas contrary or different to his own. No man may rightly declare that if the Word of God be not presented in exact accordance with that which he considers the proper manner of Its appearance he will have nothing to do with It. In so doing, he withdraws himself to a dungeon with his one little ray of light and refuses to admit the larger illumination.

There was no ritual in the presentment of the Truth by Jesus the Christ; no creed advanced by Him save that of love; no dogma save that of the oneness and singleness of God. But humanity has builded about the virgin form of Truth so great a structure of all of these, that the Great Treasure itself has now for long been almost obscured.

Many of the new sects and cults and isms and various other movements relating to the spirit have absorbed much of their doctrines from age-old Oriental philosophies which declare that man is sufficient unto himself; that within him rest the potentials for satisfying all of his needs and aspirations, to attain which he must engage in the performance of particular acts,—the leading of an ascetic life, or make positive declarations of his power and that he is a part of God and that the center of God rests within himself.

How remotely different is this to that which has been the attitude of every one of those who have come with the Real Message and the Divine Authority!

“I of myself can do nothing.” “The Word that I speak is not mine, but my Father’s that sent me.” “And Moses hid his face; for he was afraid to look upon God.” “The Lord is my strength and my salvation: He is my God. . . . My father’s God, and I will exalt him!” “The gales of the All-Knowing, the All-Glorious passed by me and taught me the knowledge of what hath been. This thing is not from me, but from One who is Mighty and All-Knowing.” “This is a leaf which the Breezes of the Will of thy Lord the Mighty, the Exalted, hath stirred. Can it be still when the rushing winds blow?"

Thus all of these things which are being sought after and accepted by many as a means for the acquisition of religion may be recognized as the results of religion. It is not the result (the fruit) of the tree which gives it its life: nay, rather, it is the sap drawn up by the forces of attraction (love) through the pulsating arteries of being from the invisible, unattainable and unknowable fountain of the Almighty. All else is subject to decay, disease, disintegration and death.

The Bahá'í Revelation is the Light of today. It is a call sent forth in this age for the races of men to unite these divergent streams sent forth from the Fountain of Truth to irrigate the soil of human hearts, and to recognize the single flowing of the Great River of Life, bringing all mankind to a common heritage in the ocean of the Bounty of God. Thus will be accomplished racial and religious unity, real human brotherhood and universal peace.

WHAT HOPE IS THERE FOR MAN?

SHAHNAZ WAITE

WHY have the great forces of evolution thundered their way through cycles of creation to produce so infinitesimal a being as material man, if this life is all, and has no other purpose than to eat, drink and be merry and tomorrow die?

Until this question is answered, so long must life at its very best be but vague and unsatisfactory; so long over all things must brood the shadow of death and decay, made more appalling by hopeless contemplation; so long must creation appear but a cruel mockery, a heartrending tragedy, and a useless farce, for which peoples and civilizations come into being only to be destroyed and to leave no trace, utter obliteration being their fate. All the work of evolution futile; scientific inventions and all education useless, and all the heart-longing and hope, vain.

What hope is there for man, imprisoned in a world which has no pity for him, whatever may be his fate? A world which goes on in precisely the same fashion whether he live or die. The glories and beauties of nature were the same when Ceasar lived and will still be the same when we who now gaze upon them have passed into the Unknown.

Of what avail then is the struggle of human life? Is it for the many or only for the few? Is all the toil and sorrow of the millions merely for the upliftment and perfecting of certain types? If so why such waste of brain and heart, of love and patience?

Only when men and women turn to the Spirit and learn that their lives are not infinitesimal, and useless but one with the Infinite; that each one possesses within himself or herself an Eternal active, conscious individual being, a form, endowed with a Divine Energy which draws to itself and accommodates to its use, everything that is necessary for the accomplishment of its unfoldment, whether physically, mentally or spiritually; only then will it be clearly understood that nature is subject and servant of this Radiant Energy, or Soul of man, which is an eternal emanation from God, made in His image and likeness potentially, and as such has its eternal movement towards the "Eternal Highest." Without this knowledge there is no joy, and life is purposeless.

IN THE TEACHINGS of Bahá'u'lláh, expounded by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, we find the answer to all of these abstruse problems, the problems of life and death solved, and the purpose of this life made clear. Relative to this subject 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said; "How can man be content to lead only an animal existence when God has made him so high a creature? All creation is made subject to the laws of nature, but man has been able to conquer these laws. The sun in spite of its power and glory is bound by the laws of nature and cannot change its course by so much as a hair's breadth. The great and mighty ocean is powerless to change the ebb and flow of its tides, nothing can stand against nature's laws but man.

"To man God has given such wonderful power that he can guide control and overcome nature. The natural law for man is to walk on the earth, but he makes ships and flies in the air. He is created to live on dry land, but he rides on the sea and even travels under it.

He has learned to control the power of electricity and he takes it at will and imprisons it in a lamp. The human voice is made to speak across short distances, but man's power is such that he has made an instrument and can speak from East to West! All these examples show you how man can govern nature and how, as it were, wrest a sword from the hand of nature and use it against herself. Seeing that man has been created master of nature, how foolish it is of him to become her slave. What ignorance and stupidity it is to worship and adore nature, when God in His goodness has made us masters thereof. God's Power is visible to all, yet men shut their eyes and see it not. The Sun of Truth is shining in all His Splendor, but man with fast shut eyes cannot behold His Glory."*

"Some men's lives are solely occupied with the things of this world; their minds are so circumscribed by exterior manners and traditional interests that they are blind to any other realm of existence, to the spiritual significances of all things; they think and dream of earthly fame, of material progress, sensuous delights, and comfortable surroundings bound their horizon; their highest ambition centers in success of worldly conditions and circumstances. They eat, they drink and sleep. Like the animal they have no thought beyond their own physical well being. It is true that these necessities must be dispatched. Life is a load which must be carried on while we are on earth, but the cares of the lower things of life should not be allowed to monopolize all the thoughts and aspirations of a human being. The heart's ambitions should ascend to a more Glorious Goal. Mental activity should rise to higher levels; men should hold in their souls the vision of Celestial Perfection and there prepare a dwelling-place for the Inexhaustible Bounty of the Divine Spirit.”*

“All around us to day we see how man surrounds himself with every modern convenience and luxury and denies nothing to the physical and material side of his nature. But take heed, lest in thinking too earnestly of the things of the body you forget the things of the soul; for material advantages do not elevate the spirit of man. Perfection in worldly things is a joy to the body of man, but in no wise does it glorify his soul. Only by improving spiritually, as well as materially can we make any real progress and become perfect beings. It was in order to bring this spiritual life and light into the world that all the Great Teachers have appeared. They came so that the Sun of Truth might be manifested and shine in the hearts of men, and through Its Wondrous Power man might attain to everlasting life.”*

“The Soul of man is eternal, immortal. . . . Man is shown to be the sum of all creation, the superior of all created beings, the goal to which countless ages of existence have progressed. At best man spends three-score years and ten in this world—a short time indeed. Does a man cease to exist when he leaves the body? If his life comes to an end, then all the previous evolution is useless, all has been for nothing! Can one imagine that the Creator has no greater aim than this?”*

IN A TALK given by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in New York City, July 6th, 1912, on “Evolution”, we find a clear and complete explanation of “The Purpose of This Life”, and upon reading this masterful presentation of the subject, the salient points may be put as Questions and Answers as follows:

Question—What is the purpose of this life?

Answer—“To prepare one's self for the life beyond.”

Question—What is the state of man during this life?

Answer—“Just as he prepared himself in the world of the matrix by acquiring forces necessary in this sphere of existence, so likewise the indispensable forces of the Divine Existence must be potentially attained in this world.”

Question—What is he in need of in the Kingdom which transcends the life and limitation of this mortal sphere?

Answer—“That world beyond is a world of sanctity and radiance, therefore it is necessary that in this world he should acquire these Divine Attributes. In that world there is need of spirituality, assurance, faith, the knowledge of God and the love of God. These he must attain in this world, so that after his ascension from the earthly to the heavenly Kingdom he shall find all that is needful in that life eternal ready for him.”

Question—What are the elements of that world?

Answer—“That divine world is

manifestly a world of lights; therefore man has need of illumination here. That is a world of love; the love of God is essential. It is a world of perfections; virtues or perfections must be acquired. That world is vivified by the Breaths of the Holy Spirit; in this world we must seek them. That is the kingdom of life everlasting, it must be attained during this vanishing existence.

Question—By what means can man acquire these things? How shall he obtain the merciful gifts and powers? (Here 'Abdu'l-Bahá gives us seven steps which are like seven great Candles-sticks of Spiritual Illumination.)

Answer—“First through the knowledge of God. Second through the love of God. Third through Faith. Fourth through philanthropic deeds. Fifth through self-sacrifice. Sixth through severance from this world. Seventh through sanctity and holiness.”

Question—If man fail to acquire these forces and attain to these requirements what will be the outcome?

Answer—“Unless he acquire these forces and attain to these requirements, he will surely be deprived of the life that is eternal.”

Question—If these forces are acquired what is his attainment?

Answer—“If he possesses the knowledge of God, becomes ignited through the fire of the love of God; witnesses the great and mighty signs of the kingdom, becomes the cause of love among mankind and lives in the utmost state of sanctity and holiness, he shall surely attain to the second birth, be baptized by the Holy Spirit and enjoy everlasting existence.

Question—For what has God created man?

Answer—“Man has been created for the knowledge of God and love of God; for the virtues of the human world, for spirituality, heavenly illumination and life eternal.”

Question—But how does man spend his time?

Answer—“He continues ignorant and negligent of all this. Consider how he seeks knowledge of every thing except the knowledge of God. For instance his utmost desire is to penetrate the mysteries of the lowest strata of the earth. Day by day he strives to know what can be found ten metres below the surface, what he can discover within the stone, what he can learn by archaeological research in the dust. He puts forth arduous labors to fathom terrestrial mysteries but is not at all concerned about knowing the mysteries of the kingdom, traversing the illimitable fields of the Eternal World, becoming informed of the Divine Realities, discovering the Secrets of God, attaining the Knowledge of God and witnessing the Splendors of the Sun of Truth and realizing the glories of everlasting life. He is unmindful and thoughtless of these. How much he is attracted to the mysteries of matter and how completely unaware he is of the Mysteries of Divinity!”

Question—What is the purpose of a Bahá'í?

Answer—“His purpose is the good pleasure of God, the understanding of the mysteries of the heart, and investigation of the Realities.”

Question—How must he spend his time?

Answer—“Day and night he must strive that he may attain to the significances of the heavenly kingdom; perceive the signs of divinity; acquire certainty of knowledge and realize that this world has a Creator, a Vivifier, a Provider, and Architect.”

Question—How must he know this?

Answer—“Through proofs and evidences and not through susceptibilities—nay rather through decisive arguments and real vision; that is to say, visualizing it as clearly as the outer eye beholds the sun. In this way may he behold the Presence of God and attain to the Knowledge of the Holy Divine Manifestations.”

Question—How must he come into a knowledge of the Divine Manifestations?

Answer—“He must come into the knowledge of the Divine Manifestations and Their Teachings through proofs and evidences. He must unseal the mysteries of the Supreme Kingdom and become capable of discovering the inner realities of things. Then shall he be the manifestation of the mercy of God and a true believer, firm and steadfast in the Cause of God.”

Question—By whom has the Door of Divine Knowledge been opened?

Answer—“Praise be to God! The Door of Divine Knowledge has been opened by Bahá'u'lláh; for He has lain the foundation whereby man may become acquainted with the verities of heaven and earth and has bestowed the utmost confirmation in this day.”

Question—What is He to us?

Answer—“He is our Teacher and Adviser; He is our Seer and the One Clement towards us.”

Question—What gifts and bounties has He prepared for those who are faithful?

Answer—“He has prepared His gifts and vouchsafed His bounties, revealed every admonition and behest, prepared for us the means of eternal glory; breathed upon us the life-quickening breaths of the Holy Spirit; opened before our faces the doors of the Paradise of Abha, and caused the lights of the Sun of Truth to shine upon us. The clouds of mercy have poured down their precious rain. The sea of favor is swelling and surging towards us.”

Question—What season has come?

Answer—“The Spiritual Spring-time has come. Infinite Bounties and Graces have appeared. What Bestowal is greater than this?”

Question—What must be our expression in return?

Answer—“We must appreciate the Divine Generosity and act in accordance with the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, so that all good may be stored up for us and in both worlds we shall become precious and acceptable to God.

Question—What will be the ultimate attainment?

Answer—“We will attain to everlasting blessings, taste the delicacy of the love of God, find the sweetness of the knowledge of God, perceive the heavenly bestowals and witness the power of the Holy Spirit.”

GOD-INTOXICATED ARCHITECTURE

DR. FREDERICK H. NEWELL

Dr. Newell, the author of this article is an engineer, President of The Research Service, Incorporated, Consulting and Supervising Engineers, of Washington, D. C. He is the author of many scientific articles, and is deeply interested in all that pertains to the progress of humanity.

MANKIND in the making has marked his progress by the temples he has built. Most of these have long since disappeared; the records of these are blank. When fragments of others are found they give us perhaps our only evidence as to the existence of nations, wholly lost except for these fragments. Such ruins prove that these forgotten nations possessed intelligence and a high degree of skill during milleniums long before the historic era. They afford clues, fascinating but elusive, of systems of primitive thought and practice. The material temples have survived the deities to which they were erected.

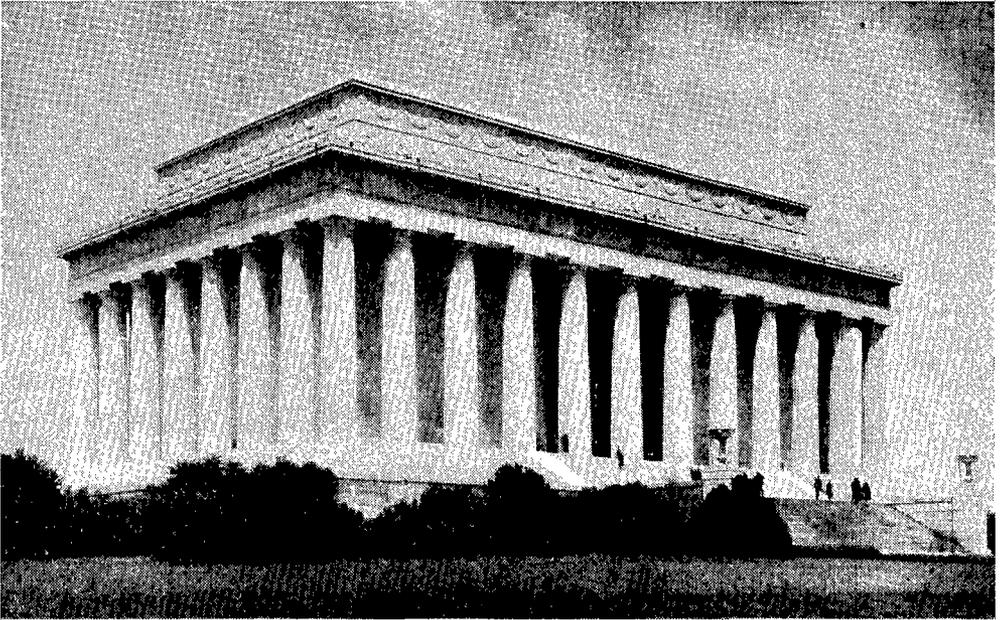

Primarily a temple is not a church, not a place of public worship, quite the contrary. It is a consecrated piece of ground, not to be profaned by the careless crowd; it has been defined as the dwelling house of the Deity to which it is consecrated and whose presence is marked by a statue or other symbol. Here are kept the sacred treasures, the gifts and tribute of the worshippers.

A church building on the contrary is often regarded as a social center, a place of meeting for all who may be interested. It is not narrowly limited to the use of the priesthood but is more comparable to a school or place of instruction, an evolution in part comparable to the Jewish synagogue, a place for religious instruction and worship.

The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár with its surrounding buildings may be said to combine the conceptions both of a temple, and of a church with class rooms and facilities for study and meditation. In one sense it has no direct ancestors; it stands in a class by itself. Yet it has its predecessors or prototypes, infinite in number and variety. Some of these doubtless have had an influence on the design; a few in a negative way, warnings what not to do; others have been helpful in suggesting size and form. It is well worth our time to study the "ancestors" or predecessors of the temple, so that we may appreciate the magnitude and far-reaching effect of the work in hand, namely, the building of the Bahá'í Temple, now in course of construction at Wilmette, Ill. It is, of course, impossible in a brief article to do much more than suggest a few lines of thought.

THE MOST complete or readily available source of information on the growth of the ideals of a temple are in the Hebrew sacred books, at least those combined and printed together as the Old Testament. There have been recorded the traditions reaching back into pre-historic times; giving the development of a Semitic people from the days of human sacrifice, when each tribal deity had a local habitation, on up to the times when there was erected for their god a permanent home or temple in Jerusalem, a rectangular room or structure into which the high priest alone could enter once a year. This was surrounded by courts and cloisters where the various classes of people might meet for public worship.

The essential feature of each temple, erected in succession at Jerusalem on the older ruin, was this "Holy of Holies" devoted to the Divine Presence. So far as is known, it was a plain box-like room of 20 cubits on each edge; that is, about 30 feet high, wide and long. The buildings which surrounded and concealed this, in whole or part, were doubtless ornamented in Oriental fashion; possibly a mixture of Cretan, Egyptian and Babylonian styles. Nothing characteristically Hebraic has been found.

There are no traces of the ornamentation nor of the colors used; many of which were doubtless vivid.

The Greeks had much of the same idea, a room or darkened enclosure devoted to the presence of a particular god whose statue was enshrined there. This was surrounded by columns all relatively severe, with little ornamentation; a striking contrast to the elaborate details of their far Eastern contemporaries. It must not be supposed, however, that these temples were colorless. Those that remained have been bleached white by the weather, but particles of color found in interstices show that they were not originally of the snowy white pentelic marble. Possibly the best idea of one of these temples devoted to the presence of a specific god can be had from the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D. C., where the great statue practically fills the building. The doorways of the Lincoln Memorial are unobstructed, whereas the doors of the Grecian and Roman temples were thrown open only on great occasions when the multitude was allowed to gaze upon the statue from a distance.

The Romans followed the Greeks in simplicity of outline, erecting rectangular buildings, carefully proportioned and conforming to certain architectural conventions which became more and more rigid as the arts declined.

In contrast to these Grecian and Roman structures, which the world has regarded as the highest achievement of art, were the Egyptian temples. In these the more striking feature was the entrance or approach with gigantic pylons guarding the doorways, all massive, everything designed for permanence and with resultant heavy, serious and gloomy effects.

Opposed to the straight lines, low roofs and box-like forms of the classic age are the curves and elaborate tracery of the temples and tombs of Persia, India, and China,—with arches, slender posts, openings of all sizes and shapes, riots of forms and color, peaked roofs, spires, pagodas, minarets and domes, fantastic to western eyes, grotesque rather than serious. All in a sense were intended to serve the same purpose, namely, to guard and protect the sacred relics, images or symbols which denoted the presence of a deity or which turned the worshippers from worldly to spiritual thoughts.

One of the most impressive forms of architecture evolved by the human race, the Byzantine was a creation of the Greco-Roman world, particularly, its Eastern branch, The Eastern Roman empire located at Byzantium (now Constantinople) from whence the name Byzantine is derived. The special character of this Byzantine architecture, of which St. Sofia is the most notable example, is the placing of a round dome upon a square base the four walls of which are each supported externally by half-domes. In the most perfect elaboration of this architectural system, as in the Turkish mosques of Constantinople, the central dome lifts its majestic head skyward above the friendly grouping half-domes clustering at its base and enclosed in the four slender tapering minarets; while the interior presents a special beauty of vast space unbroken by supporting columns, a majestic simplicity which commends itself especially to Muhammadans as expressive of the Unity of God.

DURING THE progress of the renaissance of art in Europe came the evolution of the Gothic forms notable for the pointed arch and for symmetrical pinnacles. There was in medieval Europe a period when men's energies seemed to be devoted to the multiplication of these churches and cathedrals repeating over and over again, with slight variation, the more attractive of these structures, embodying a union of the Greek system of columnar construction with the Roman vaulting and arches. In fact, to the European mind a church or temple must be based upon some of these types.

A reaction from these well established forms took place in New England where there developed the characteristic colonial church, barn-like in form and with a plain pointed steeple; possessing a certain charm from simplicity as contrasted with the more ornate European structures.

There is a tendency to try to improve on these forms. In attempting to develop something suitable and yet characteristic, there has come about a wide range of effort shown by some of the more recent structures in the United States, particularly those adopted by the founders or followers of the newer religions or sects. As an illustration of such an attempt may be noted the temple in Salt Lake City, obviously inspired by European ideals and yet not following classical lines. This is a temple in the restricted sense in that its use is confined to the priesthood; while the people as a whole must congregate for worship in a tabernacle nearby.

BEARING IN mind these recent attempts and the older well-known types, it is of peculiar interest to view the sketches of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár whose concepts differ so widely that it has been said by one of the architects of the country to be "the first new idea in architecture since the 13th century." Whether so or not, it is unique. It is erected on a circular foundation which reaches down to bed-rock, the building itself being nine-sided. It has no front nor back, as all sides are identical. There is hardly a straight line visible, everything is curved. In place of solidity an attempt is made to create an impression of airiness. The architect, Louis Bourgeois, "has conceived a Temple of Light in which structure, as usually understood, is to be concealed, visible support eliminated as far as possible, and the whole fabric to take on the airy substance of a dream; it is a lacy envelope enshrining an idea, the idea of Light, a shelter of cobweb interposed between earth and sky, struck through and through with light—light which shall partly consume the forms and make of it a thing of faery.”*

It is to be noted that each type of religious architecture that humanity has created has been an expression of a definite religious belief. The Egyptian, Hebrew, Greek and Roman temples respectively, were of this kind. Christendom experimented with adaptations of the Roman basilica, until the glorious Gothic architecture flowered out in the middle ages as a perfect expression of the inspiration and upsoaring qualities of the Christian faith.

Meanwhile the Muhammadan world was evolving from the Byzantine church the mosque which, as already stated, is a perfect expression of the simplicity of dogma of the strictly unitarian faith of Islam.

BAHÁ'Í TEMPLE—MASHRIQU'L-ADHKÁR

In course of erection on a 9-acre tract on the lake shore in Wilmette, Illinois, 14 miles north of Chicago

It was to be expected that the new power and inspiration of the Bahá'í faith should express itself in new forms of art and architecture. Such a form would naturally evolve from pre-existing forms just as, for instance, the Muhammadan mosque evolved from the Byzantine, and the Gothic from the basilica; yet would be in a way a de novo creation. A study of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, designed by Louis Bourgeois, will make it evident that his glorious creation does exactly this. It embodies, as definitely conceived by him, the characteristics of past religious architecture brought together in a new whole of which there is no similar example. In other words, this inspired architect has created a new form of architecture perfectly adapted to the expression of the Bahá'í Faith with its universality and its world-wide comprehensive scope. The future alone will show whether the Bahá'í world will seize upon this form of architecture as its particular type, or whether it will go on evolving other forms.

“WHAT DO WE NEED OF A SAVIOR?”

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

The following is Chapter 4—“The Collective Center”—in the series which the author has been contributing intermittently since November 1929, under the title “The Basis of Bahá'í Belief.”

JUST as the question most frequently asked by orthodox Christians when informed of the coming of Bahá'u'lláh, is “What do we need beyond Jesus?”—so amongst those for whom the Sun has ceased to give its Light, the first question is: “But what do we need with a Manifestation or Savior? They represent just another cause of quarrelsomeness and misunderstanding among men; their followers hate, condemn, yes, kill each other in the name of their Founders; why complicate human life any more than is necessary by setting up these divisions? Let us dispense with this Figure and go to God direct.”

There are some sixteen essential mineral elements necessary for our bodily health. It would be just as sensible to say: “Why all this bother about agriculture, with its problems of cultivation, fertilization, floods, drought, harvesting; why the drudgery of preparation, cooking, preserving? Why not just eat these essential minerals and do away with the labor and effort of consuming them through another medium, the vegetable kingdom?”

Nothing of which the human mind can conceive can be acquired except through mediation. To ask mankind to find God without a Mediator would be like trying to obtain light and heat without a sun, like having music without notes, literature without words, words without letters, letters without sounds, sounds without atmosphere, atmosphere without its constituent elements, and these without that underlying all-pervasive, indivisible energy upon which empirical contact is based.

It is just as defensible to ask that we acquire knowledge without focusing the attention, as that we attain to the ultimate by any other means than through that Eternal Sun that reflects His Light and Life to men. An apple might as well say: "I do not want to be severed from my source by any intervention. I won't grow on the branch; I'll grow on the root of the tree."

Ábdu'l-Bahá speaks of the focal center which lies in the very structure of the universe.* The two fundamental laws of creation are organization and change. Beginning with Heraclitus and Empedocles extending to Bergson and Dewey this question has vexed and lured the minds of men: What is it that remains fixed in the flux; why does the universe continue changeless in the midst of incessant change? That which does not change is the organization of all phenomena and of all experience around a center. The atom with its proton; the systems with their central suns; the protoplasmic cell with its nucleus; the vertical movement of gravity toward its center; centripetal and centrifugal forces; legislative and executive functions in government (else anarchy and chaos); the cerebro-spinal nervous system as the center of perception with its attendant motion; apperception the organizing power of the personality; the point, irreducible minimum of the universe (modern physics shows the point as containing the whole non-spatial universe—the nexus between the finite and the infinite; this same condition expressed in religious terminology is the only Begotten Son of the Father, the Word made flesh); the heart which focuses the vital forces; attention, the pivotal point around which reason and learning are organized; the great personalities Who alone have influenced social and historical movements; Truth as the reference point which determines whether propositions agree among themselves and with the further interpretation of experience; and so forth indefinitely, as far as the mind can reach.

For everything there is a center, and this center is the mediating point through which otherwise severed and disunited strata, powers and kingdoms mingle: the vast primordial flow of energy would remain undifferentiated and therefore useless to human beings did it not reach combustion in the sun, there to be reflected out again in the form of light and heat, the essentials of life on this planet; without the taut string, the hollow reed,—the mighty winds of heaven would withhold forever from man the sublime purgation of music; and when the tides of the heart finally ebb, the rapture and glory of creative life has lost its contact with this world.

If then in the physical universe, the universe of chemistry and biology with its magical perfection of organization and structure is built around a center, a focal point, how can we rationally suggest that a kingdom as unorganized, as inchoate, as imperfect as the kingdom of man's mind and heart can dispense with this requirement that holds the systems, the exact processes of mathematics and of his own thinking in their proper orbits.

* Baha'i Scriptures ¶-983.

But here he is likely to say: "Very well, I will grant that my relation to God must be organized around a center; but why must that center be a human being? Why can't it be something psychological like attention or apperception, already used in your illustrations?"

Out of his own mouth we judge him; the quarrelsomeness, the hatred to which he has already objected arise from the substitution of human psychology, the following of our own differing and antagonistic interpretations of God and His Will, for the supreme guidance laid down for us by that Great Mediator Who alone can transform through the Center of His Life and Teachings the majestic attributes of God to accord with the finite requirements of man.

When we attempt to push aside the Manifestation and "go direct to God," each one of us is motivated by an entirely different conception of what God is, how to express His Will, of what is well-pleasing to Him. A fine and courageous woman who recently offered her objection to the Bahá'í Teachings—that we had had enough Manifestations and didn't need any more—responded when I asked her where man would turn for accurate guidance if the Great Mouthpiece of God did not reveal His Word from age to age: "Why, you are God, I am God, every one is God." I gently suggested that things equal to the same thing might reasonably be expected to be equal to each other; but that the God in her and the God in me have a totally different impression of what God really is. If each of us is God with such variant ideas of what His own nature is the Almighty is not only not Omniscient but as mystified, struggling and partially informed as the average human being.

This conception, called in philosophy Dogmatic Idealism, was especially fostered by Bishop Berkeley. Its reductio ad absurdum is known as Solipsism; if I am co-existent and identical with the consciousness of God what proof have I that all the other people in the world are not merely my ideas or that I am the idea of some one of them? This particular system now stands in the museum of mental antiquities along with Absolutism, Nominalism, Scholasticism, Aristotelian Logic and Platonic Politics.

The crux of the matter lies in our interpretation of the nature of the soul and of life's ultimate purposes. The embarrassing news of ourselves given us by modern psychological discoveries unfolds the age-old effort of the subconscious mind to aggrandize the ego and to bend the environment to its progress and supremacy. The age-old struggle envisaged in the great religions of the world is carried on between those elements in the personality that would escape the limitations of the self with its humiliations, doubts, fears, defeats—and those that seek the assurance of sacrifice, good will and peace.

Now each kingdom is dependent upon something above it, if it is to be elevated into a higher state. It is only as the vegetable sinks its roots into the mineral kingdom that the mineral is enabled to change its nature and rise into a condition of augmentation and growth; only as the vegetable is sacrificed to the animals that it can enter into a kingdom of free motion and sense perception; so human beings are powerless to elevate themselves to the spiritual station for which they were created except as something from that level reaches down and they through the sacrifice of their inherent nature of egotism and selfishness, are exalted to the Realm of God's Kingdom.

All the basic things of experience begin with the infinitely great, are reduced to the infinitely small and then once more are radiated out again into infinitude: the basic energies focus in the sun and then sustain a great system as they are reflected to the planets. The fundamental unified energy of the cosmos focuses into ninety-two chemical elements, invisible, indiscernible, and then builds the complicated structure of the universe: the power of mind can be reduced to some fifty-six sounds, infinitely small in comparison to the stupendous kingdom of reason, science, philosophy, guidance, communication, art, which those sounds build.

A focal center, a transmitting point between two infinitudes is the evident structure of the worlds we are living in: it is therefore irrational and indefensible to suggest that this great cosmic pattern breaks down at the one point where it is most sorely needed, a point of transmission between God and man.

For these reasons (and for others, which lack of space prohibits discussing) man cannot dispense with a Mediator or Manifestation of God.

THE GARDEN OF THE HEART

DORIS MCKAY

THERE has come to my hands a little book in a rainbow binding—its flyleaves are the azure blue of sky. It is called "The Garden of the Heart," compiled from the writings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l Bahá by Mrs. Frances Esty.*

As I turned the pages of the slender, bright-hued volume, charmingly rendered through the Roy-croft's art, I read at the heads of the pages the enchanting words which are a key to the passages of which the book consists: sun, garden, seeds, flowers, plant, fountain, trees, birds, fragrance, spring. Soon I was lost in that retreat of the spirit where "the ideal consummate wisdom is hidden in every plant and a thousand nightingales of speech are in ecstasy upon every branch."

Those who have already found their way to the garden of the heart have learned the Source of those utterances in which the wordless messages of God through Nature are revealed. The Persians called Bahá'u'lláh the Ancient Beauty, the Beloved of the World. Words of love, of dominion, of wisdom from His Supreme Pen have astonished the learned and worked miracles upon the hearts of the heedless in two hemispheres during the last century. Of Him only an occasional picture is revealed—of a child of the imperious ruling class of Persia surrounded by marveling, venerable mullahs; of a youth made head of a lordly household famed for its magnificence and regal hospitality; of a young man in chains in a Bábi dungeon, or seen for a moment as His child saw Him, shackled by the neck to a fellow prisoner, hatless under a tropical sun; as a law-giver in a prison room at 'Akká, gray walls, stone floor, pacing through the night, a trembling amanuensis transcribing words of revelation upon a blazing, incendiary scroll. Then of a sage in a crumbling palace in the shadow of prison walls—sunset hours of a Day of existence in which the “rushing wind” of God had blown continuously; a King moving among His most obedient servants—the birds, and flowers and trees; a Creator gazing into the innocent, upturned faces of His creation.

In the garden He found promise of a world based on divine law—our world that is to be. Here flowers of different colors agreed; beauty, submission, simplicity, usefulness were the unconscious expression of the inhabitants of this kingdom. Through the delicate perfection of the world of nature God alone was speaking. There was no lesser sound.

To what other world than to that of Nature should 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of Bahá, turn for analogy in His promulgation of His Father's teachings? The chiming of fragile flower bells, the joyous whirr of wings, the brimming of perpetual fountains, the glory of eternal sunshine—through these did God reveal His secret that man might understand.

The idea for this compilation, wherein one finds the essence of mysticism and poetry, grew in Mrs. Esty's lovely earthly garden; it is its most beautiful flowering. “From flowers inhale the fragrance of the Beloved One,” Bahá'u'lláh had said, and there were the words of an oft-repeated prayer, “Cause me to walk in the Garden of the Nearness of Thy Presence, O my Beloved!” The whisperings of the Beloved in her dream of a man-built garden were inscribed in a God-made Book, where the Presence so subtly revealed, became articulate in deathless words. In the “Garden of the Heart” Mrs. Esty, lover of gardens, shares with us the results of loving search.

MEDICAL HISTORY AND THE ART OF HEALING

ZIA M. BAGDADI, M. D.

I.

Dr. Bagdadi, whom we asked to write upon the science and art of medicine from the modern viewpoint, has the unusual advantage of thorough acquaintance with the medical concepts of the Orient as well as the Occident. Furthermore he has had not only the great opportunity of the guidance which comes through the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh and of 'Abdu'l-Bahá as regards medical practice, but also direct contact with 'Abdu'l-Bahá Whose message to a group of medical students at Beirut University he cites in his articles. The first article brings a brief of medical history up to modern times. The second article describes the art of healing as Bahá'ís conceive it.

THE Egyptians and Babylonians are considered the world's earliest builders of the foundation of medical science.

The Egyptians were the first ones to use many drugs such as opium and squill with other vegetable extracts, as onions, caraway and pomegranate seeds, and sycamore fruit. In surgery the Egyptians were particularly skilled in performing amputations, cutting for bladder stones, venesection, cupping; and their surgeons bandaged well.

The Babylonians more than 2,000 years B. C., endeavored to find ways and means to combat diseases. At that time, the city of Babylon was the world's greatest city, even larger than the cities of London and New York combined. The Babylonians had famous Temples and "hanging gardens." When one became ill, the members of the family would put the afflicted one in the temple or in the garden, where sympathetic people could stop at his bedside, make a diagnosis and prescribe in writing whatever might help the sufferer. Then in the evening the anxious parents or relatives would come for the patient and the various prescriptions, and hurry back to their homes to try out the different suggested remedies. Thus human knowledge and varied experience collected together just as little rain drops form a stream or lake. The Babylonians employed cupping and the aid of the whip to obtain hyperemia. But now we are fortunate to apply a hot water bag or bottle instead of using the whip on the poor patient.

The Persians took all the medical experiences of the Babylonians, added to them from their own knowledge and recorded them in the form of books. Avicenna, a Persian by birth, wrote his first book on medicine at the age of twenty-one. He wrote on anatomy, surgery psychiatry and materia medica, and his books have been printed in Arabic, Latin and Hebrew. Then the Arabs contributed their share; and later were instrumental in spreading this knowledge in Europe where it was translated into several languages. The Indians used actual cautery instead of the knife; and resorted to other primitive practices in both medicine and surgery.

WITH THE DEVELOPMENT of medicine, it is natural that superstitions should have developed among the ancient people. In early Greek times, amulets and charms, especially crab eyes, were used against eye troubles. A coral branch in silver settings and a coral chain placed around the neck of a child were regarded as protective against evil eyes, jealousy and bad influences. In the Orient even up to this time beads and sometimes pieces of alum are strung together and used as amulets to protect children, camels, horses, mules, donkeys and cattle. While traveling in Egypt, Palestine and Syria a few years ago, I was very much surprised to see so many automobiles and trucks decorated with amulets and charms for protection against accidents, engine troubles or flat tire.

Hippocrates, (460-357 B. C.) "the father of modern medicine," gave to Greek medicine and through it to modern medicine, its scientific spirit and its ethical ideals. He was instrumental in divorcing medicine and surgery from superstitions. Plato (427-347 B. C.) likewise was a famous philosopher and noted for his knowledge of the healing art. Pythagoras, (580-489 B. C.) sage and philosopher, traveled through Egypt and the East in search of knowledge. He introduced a regular system of dietetics, avoiding meat. Aristotle (384-322 B. C.) never dissected a human body but examined the structure of a great number of animals and thus contributed to biological knowledge. His physiology and anatomy show that he was a great philosopher and doctor. Claudius Galen (131-201 A. D.) "The Prince of Physicians," was the last great Greek physician after Hippocrates.

Aurilius Cornelius Celsus in the first century after Christ, though not a physician, rendered the best account of Roman medicine of his time. The Romans were the first people to create military first-aid stations. In a country almost constantly at war with its neighbors, the development of military surgery was no more than natural. The Romans invented teeth-extracting forceps, small pocket case instruments, speculum, probe, etc.

IN THE MIDDLE AGES the Arabs excelled all other nations in medicine, and, they were the earliest experimenters in chemistry. In the 13th century branding and acupuncture—(bleeding by penetrating the tissues with needles)—were the chosen methods of treating joint diseases as well as muscular pains. Cupping in a wet and dry form was and still is employed in the Orient. The cups used for this purpose are especially designed where the air therein can be exhausted by suction. I, too had to use cupping, scarification, and other primitive methods, in order to please my patients in Palestine and Syria.

Trephining—drilling in the skull—was practiced with primitive drills. Schematic illustrations representing the bony, nervous, muscular, arterial and venous systems were some of the works in the evolution of the 13th century.

In the 14th century the art of medicine was improved. Nursing was studied by talented women; and a primitive laboratory for tests and analyses was in use. On the other hand, witchcraft in the middle ages was at its highest. Humanity at that time could hardly accept the spread of epidemic diseases and misfortunes without assigning a cause, and so the devil was to be blamed. Thus the conception of witchcraft was born.*

In the 15th century, anatomy, dissection and pharmacy were taught to students. Teachers such as Jacobus Sylvius read from books, the servants did the dissection and the students looked on.

In the 16 century, a hospital was opened in Paris. The physician used to administer medicine to the patient from a special beaker, and the nurse carried a jug of water to wash away the taste of the medicine.

As to surgery in those days,—in preparation for an operation—the patient was placed in a wooden bathtub, often partaking of a good meal, while the surgeon prepared his instruments. A narrow table served as an operating table. The patient's hands were tied above his head, and the extremities were held down by assistants. While the surgeon operated, a servant served refreshments to the onlookers. In amputation, the surgeon would amputate the limb, leaving the assistant to sew up the wound, while he occupied himself with consoling the patient.

*Even today, there are many witch doctors in the world. When a witch doctor in South Africa is called upon to make a diagnosis, he does not care for X-ray negatives, laboratory reports, history cards, nor does he even bother to take the patient's temperature. Instead, he picks up a bag filled with vertebrae of various sizes and, mumbling a few words of sorcery, carelessly spills them in all directions. He then propounds the diagnosis and prognosis, and collects his fee. Primitive simple-minded people who believe in everything, consider the witch doctor as a person with extraordinary power of healing; who can assist ardent wooers in their love problems; who can find lost or stolen property; who can bring rain from heavens; who can bring or drive away good luck, etc.

Ambroise Pare (1510-1590) from a barber's apprentice developed into the greatest surgeon of his time in Paris. He discarded the use of boiling oil to stop bleeding after amputation, and introduced the use of ligature and surgical dressings. Guillaume Bondelet (1509-1566) founded the anatomical theatre, and was such an enthusiastic anatomist that he dissected the body of his own son. Obstetrics in those days was a comparatively primitive and simple matter. Heronymus Cardanus (1501-1576) of Milan, was famous in the explanation of symptoms and the administration of laxatives.

Michael Servetus (1509-1553) pointed out that the blood passed into the heart after being mixed with air in the lungs. He was a physician and clergyman. He was persecuted and burned alive in Geneva.

AMONG the greatest medical and anatomical discoveries of the 17th century were the successful carrying out of experiments in blood transfusion by Richard Lower; the discovery of the circulation of the blood by William Harvey; the use of the microscope in studying the blood corpuscles and human tissue as practiced by Marcello Malpighi.

The 18th century ushered in by a dreadful plague in Europe, saw the eventual discovery of vaccination as insurance against the dreadful plague of smallpox—a discovery of Edward Jenner in 1798. During this century also occurred the first attempts to treat the insane in a humane manner. Philippe Pinel urged the necessity of treatment by gentle means and recommended physical labor in place of corporal punishment and physical restrictions.

The 19th century witnessed a tremendous advance in medical knowledge and treatment. The most important discovery of the century—that of Louis Pasteur regarding the bacterial causes of contagion—distinctly stands as one of the most beneficent discoveries of man since the beginning of the world. During this century also the homeopathic medicine and treatment was inaugurated by Samuel Hahnemann. From the discoveries of Lord Lister has been derived the present system of aseptic surgery. In this century also anesthesia were discovered and used for surgical operations, Dr. Long of Athens, Ga., giving the first public demonstration with ether at the Massachusetts General Hospital in 1846. Robert Koch made the important discovery of the tubercle bacillus and the vibrios of cholera.

DURING THE present century a great development has taken place in treatments other than those based upon materia medica and surgery. Doctors themselves place little value in drugs. Maintaining normal conditions of living with the power of nature to do the healing—this is what all physicians recognize as the reality of healing today.

The vast success of Christian Science and other schools of mental and spiritual healing have acted as a leaven to impregnate the art of medicine with mental as well as physical qualities. The power of the mind in the mechanism of the body is being more fully recognized, not only by the laity, but also by the medical profession. Anything which can effect the mind becomes also a factor in healing, namely, prayer, faith, etc. This is recognized even by materialists who realize the vast importance of the subjective as well as the objective world of the patient.

At this point in the evolution of society and of medicine, the world is indeed ready for the practical and all comprehensive treatment of the art of healing as given by Bahá-'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The Bahá'í Movement has the distinction of being the first religion definitely to inculcate a science of healing. What this Bahá'í teaching is will be described fully in the ensuing article.

“Religion and science are intertwined with each other and cannot be separated. These are the two wings with which humanity must fly. One wing is not enough. Every religion which does not concern itself with Science is mere tradition, and that is not the essential. Therefore, science, education and civilization are most important necessities for the full religious life.”

THE UNSEEN WORLD

Life put within my hand a slender thread
Of tenuous beauty and of fragile strength,
Like unto the strand a spider weaves
That breaks not easily tho' holding in its length
The sparkling crystal beauty of a thousand drops of dew.
Ever it led me on seeking through all my days
The Unseen World. Past rigid beauty set
In liturgy; simplicity that sought for truth;
Goodness formed in deeds of kindness
Until that glorious day
The Message of the blessed Ridvan
Pierced all my being with immutable Reality.
As a rose garden hid behind a wall
Proclaims its presence by perfume rare,
Yet is not seen; the sweeping winds bring Witness from the Unseen World.
Fragrance of Love and Unity, source
Of all I passed before. The winds of El Abha.

“You must become distinguished for heavenly illumination and acquiring the bestowals of God. I desire this distinction for you. This must be the point of distinction among you.”—Abdu'l-Bahá.

“How CAN I perfect myself as a Bahá'í when my daily work absorbs all of my energy and I have little time for reading and studying the Bahá'í teachings? I wish The Bahá'í Magazine could give me aid in this direction,” so states a letter recently received.

This is indeed a theme worthy of many articles which we hope will flow to us in answer to such a need. Meanwhile there can be no better subject for an editorial than this very problem of how to grow spiritually when there is little time left from a busy working day for spiritual study and for meditation.

It would seem that such a humdrum life was deprived of opportunity for spiritual growth. Just the contrary is true however, for work is perhaps the greatest opportunity life offers for development and expression of the spiritual; because of its very handicaps work offers the best field for distinctive effort toward spiritual growth. The working day is full of those little tests which are so necessary to show to us our true spiritual station: tests to one's patience, to one's kindness, to one's spirit of service, to one's love and faith toward mankind and God. The more easy and secluded life of the home, or life free from affairs, does not afford such opportunities for tests and such means of growth. An individual under these circumstances may feel complacently amiable and conceive of himself or herself as rather adequately fulfilling the spiritual injunctions, when in truth the reality of that person is not in such a condition of perfection; for there has not been acquired through daily practice the strength of will, the effort, the patience, the active kindness and spirit of service which daily work, no matter how humdrum, calls forth. We grow by striving, not by dreaming of how to be perfect; and in the very strife of the business world souls grow strong, just as generals prove their valor only on the field of battle.

THERE IS STILL another direction in which work is a splendid spiritual opportunity, for here is the greatest field of service. Indeed work, as modern thinkers and industrialists perceive, must, to be perfect, be an expression of the will-to-serve. All work, no matter if it is in exchange for money, is a form of service. However, just as the form is lifeless without the spirit, so work loses its advantages for spiritual welfare if not done in a spirit of service; the more conscious and sustained that spirit is, the more powerful is the spiritual growth. One can in fact so perfect one's spiritual attitude toward work as to make it pure service, all commercialism being withdrawn from the inner consciousness. It is not necessary—so state even practical men of affairs—to connect one's work consciously with motives of gain. If the idea of service is predominant, the gain, says Mr. Ford, will take care of itself. Thus one can in reality free one's work-life and one's daily tasks entirely from self-seeking motives, functioning only in the spirit of service; and yet find the universe supporting one in all the necessities of life.

It is only work done in such a spirit that is equivalent, 'Abdu'l-Bahá tells us, to prayer. This is a very important point to realize and one hard to appreciate; for it is difficult to conceive that sweeping a floor, or waiting on the table, or selling goods at a counter, or typing, or teaching, is actually equivalent to prayer. Yet we are told so in the divine teachings, and such is the case when the spirit is that of pure service.

The most striking example I have seen of this truth was at Haifa, Palestine, in 1910, when upon being greatly impressed at the sight of a venerable patriarch in the group meeting around 'Abdu'l-Bahá, I inquired who that most saintly looking man was and found that he had been the cook and devoted servant of Bahá'u'lláh. Truly I say his face stood out in all that group of followers as the most distinguished in spirituality.

THIRDLY, there is marvelous opportunity through work to try out and prove the power of the Holy Spirit to flood our lives. Work can be done as the expression of individual ability, which is limited in us all; or it can be done through the aid of the Holy Spirit, which is limitless. Let us make our work, no matter what it be, a true expression of the divine creative force—that Force which both created and sustains the universe. At this point work ceases to be a task and becomes a creation. Every individual through such a surrender of self to the universal as to become a channel for divine inspiration, could work as the artist works and find that joy in work which every artist knows. It is just this point of creativeness which lifts work up from drudgery to an art.

Now there are many tasks which it might seem ridiculous to connect with creative power, but be sure that there is in reality no task in the universe in which the doer cannot function through aid of the creative force. So nature works, from her humblest to her greatest tasks; from building the atom to building the universe itself. Those who work aided by this creative force are true Builders, servants of God in the development of Being. "The body of man," 'Abdu'l-Bahá states, "is created for this world but his heart is made for the habitation of the Holy Spirit. . . . When you are plowing the ground, or sowing the seeds or reaping the harvest let all your thoughts and subconscious thinking be of God. Your hands and feet will be working but your heart must be attached to the Almighty."

So MUCH for perfecting one's spiritual life. But that is only half the end and aim. Every individual must, at the same time that he is speeding his own development, be demonstrating to the world the spirituality that is within him. Especially is this so in the Day of a Manifestation of God, when the world watches and judges every adherent of the new faith by his deeds rather than by his words. Every Bahá'í has not only a great opportunity but a great responsibility to demonstrate to the surrounding world the inspiration and sustaining power of the Cause even in the midst of the daily life. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven," said Christ. And it was these very good works which Christ enjoined upon His followers that were the chief means of confirming others in the faith.

Bahá'is should stand out and shine like the sun, says 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Distinction does not mean, as in the fairy tale, that a Cinderella become a princess; or that a newsboy rise to the Presidency. By standing out with distinction

'Abdu'l-Bahá does not mean to rise to a greater station in life, but to ennoble the life we live from day to day. This is the distinction which He enjoins upon us, and here is perhaps the greatest opportunity which any individual has to spread the Cause which he holds dear.

Any one who can live kindly, generously, magnanimously, radiantly, demonstrating sustained joy and faith in the midst of the drudgery of life, will do far more to convince onlookers and companions in work of the efficacy of his religion than if he shone in golden robes and spoke with organ voice majestic principles of truth.

Therefore we see that the day's work instead of being an obstacle to spiritual growth, is the greatest opportunity that life affords. But in it one should never lose consciousness of the divine. A few words and phrases of prayer silently uttered from time to time help to lift the thought, even in the midst of action. Every moment must be transfused with the divine love and aid.

It is thus that people become saints through work. And when we come to think of it, do we know of individuals who have ever become saints in any other way?

"The Bahá'is must be distinguished from others of humanity. But this distinction must not depend upon wealth—that they should become more affluent than other people. I do not desire for you financial distinction. It is not an ordinary distinction I desire: not scientific, commercial, industrial distinction. For you I desire spiritual distinction; that is, you must become eminent and distinguished in morals. In the Love of God you must become distinguished from all else. You must become distinguished for loving humanity; for unity and accord; for love and justice. In brief, you must become distinguished in all the virtues of the human world: for faithfulness and sincerity; for justice and fidelity; for firmness and steadfastness; for philanthropic deeds and service to the human world; for love toward every human being; for unity and accord with all people; for removing prejudices and promoting international peace. Finally, you must become distinguished for heavenly illumination and acquiring the bestowals of God. I desire this distinction for you. This must be the point of distinction among you."

MEDICAL HISTORY AND THE ART OF HEALING

ZIA M. BAGDADI, M. D.

The first part of this series was published in the December Bahá'í Magazine and covered briefly the subject of medical history up to modern times. In this, the second chapter, the author describes material and spiritual healing.

THOUGH the science of medicine, with all its branches, and the art of healing have progressed a great deal from the time of the Babylonians until now, in the days to come the methods of healing will be a hundred per cent better than now. In the future diet will replace most of the bitter medicines and nasty drugs. Some of our physical ailments are caused by a disturbance in the proper balance of the elements that constitute the body. For example, in a diabetic person, the carbohydrates—sugar and starchy elements are increased; and in the anemic, the iron elements of the blood are diminished. In both cases, the correct balance of the elements of the body is disturbed. Since the body derives all of its elements from food, the most scientific and logical method of restoring the normal balance must be through food and correct diet. Thus any one can understand why a diabetic must not take sugar and starchy food, and the anemic must take food rich with iron.

All the animals get sick. All the birds get sick. They do not go to doctors nor do they consult specialists. Then how do they cure themselves? Simply by eating the proper food, avoiding any thing the body does not need and selecting what is needed. Their only doctor is their natural instinct which works through the senses. A donkey once was very ill and nobody seemed to know what troubled him. He refused to eat until some one brought him thorny cactus which he ate immediately and got well. The animal was suffering from a deep abscess in his throat which needed lancing, and the cactus thorn performed that simple operation.

Unfortunately man, the highest type of all other creatures, is the most stupid and helpless fellow when it comes to curing himself. He likes what harms him and dislikes what is good for him. But man can and will learn how and what to eat correctly if doctors and healers teach the truth about diet; and without self-interest, prejudice, or exaggeration redouble their efforts in educating the public.

Should man become a vegetarian? Were we extremists our answer would be, yes, certainly. But because we prefer moderation in all things, our answer is, yes, but gradually. Because heredity is a great factor in human life and the fact that the man of today has inherited from time immemorial the habit of eating meat, and has not yet educated himself in knowing just what he should and ought to know about food, therefore, man must for a while continue to be a meat eater, gradually lessening however the amount of meat in his diet.

Food is important, but sleep is more important than food, and happiness is most important of all. To make a patient happy is to hasten his recovery.

IN THE FUTURE, materia medica will form only a small part of the healing art for there are other more efficacious methods of healing.

The important subject of spiritual healing is fully explained by the great Teacher and Master, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in the book called, "Some Answered Questions." I have learned from Him in a short time more than I could learn in my lifetime from the Medical Schools of the East and West. He divides spiritual healing into four kinds, namely, two kinds of spiritual healing by material means, and two kinds by spiritual means.

The first spiritual healing by material means can be obtained by contact—that is, instead of taking medicine, the sick can be healed by coming in contact with a strong spiritual healer. For just as certain physical diseases are contagious, likewise health is contagious. Suppose a person suffering from pain due to congestion of the blood, or nervousness due to poor circulation, should go to a cheerful, strong healer, or suddenly come in contact with happy and charming company. What happens? No doubt such a contact will act on his nerves as a nerve stimulant or tonic. The nerves which control the blood vessels when thus stimulated, will in turn transmit that stimulation to the arteries and veins, dilating their lumens, improving their circulation, and relieving the congestion. And that causes the pain and nervousness to stop. On the other hand, should a sick or even a healthy person come in contact with a frightful object, as in the case of great fear, his face becomes pale, his lips white, his extremities tremble and he may collapse and faint. This is because fear shocks the nerves which in turn causes the blood vessels to contract, impairing circulation. It is evident, therefore, that for certain nervous diseases, spiritual healing can be obtained by contact with a strong, optimistic, spiritual healer.

THE SECOND SPIRITUAL healing by material means is by the power of touch—that is, the strong healer, by touching or placing the hand on the affected part will impart relief. This is because in every human being there is a magnetic power or electricity. Thus, from the hand of the healer, a current of human magnetism or electricity flows and stimulates the nerves, relieves congestion and improves circulation. When a baby falls and injures its little hand, it usually cries until the mother picks it up, and probably kisses the sore part. Then the baby's cry ceases, often as suddenly as it started. Was the baby crying for that kiss? No, it is the magnetic force and the electric current flowing from her gentle lips and arms that help the baby when it is distressed by pain and weakness.

THE THIRD SPIRITUAL healing by spiritual means is obtained by concentration faith and prayers:—

The power of concentration has a great effect. That is, the mind can produce great power through concentration. For example, from the modern hose of a fire-extinguishing engine, a stream of water can shoot up in the air more than 120 feet high. But Lake Michigan, more than 300 miles long, or even the greatest ocean in the world can never rise so high. This is because there is a power of pressure behind the water in the hose. And that is the power of concentration. Thus, when the human mind concentrates on health or sickness, it attracts either one, as a powerful magnet does to a piece of steel. Moreover, this world is full of good and bad things. When you think of good things, through the power of imagination and concentration, you feel happy; and when you think of unpleasant things, certainly you can feel very unpleasant. Therefore, is it not better for man to heed the unanimous advice of all the divine and spiritual physicians, the true and great prophets, who taught "See no evil. Hear no evil. Speak of no evil and think of no evil"?

Moreover, how often it has happened that you felt sore all over, depressed and melancholic, you did not care to go anywhere or see any body, you felt sick mentally and physically! Then suddenly and unexpectedly you received the greatest news of your heart's desire: perhaps your loved one just arrived in town and called you up from the station, or you unexpectedly received money due you, and could now pay bills and debts. What did you do about it at that moment? Did you remain in bed, pull the covers over your eyes and try to sleep? Or did you jump out of the bed, and rush to answer the happy call? Yes, that was what you did, and you forgot all about pain and troubles. This is the power of concentration. This is the miracle of determination. This is the effect of will-power. Therefore, when the mind of the healer and the mind of the one seeking health are concentrated on health the desired results can be obtained.

FAITH is important. Millions of people in India touch the tail of the white elephant or the sacred bull to heal their ailments. Millions of Arabs, Persians, Turks, Russians, Egyptians, and others from the near and far East, travel thousands of miles and make pilgrimages to the holy city of Mecca, and its sacred well, the Bir Zam-zam, and to Jerusalem and the Jordan to fill their bottles from the holy waters for blessing and healing purposes. A great many also go to the holy shrines of the saints in the Holy Land and in Iraq (Baghdad) to get some of the sacred soil to make out of it mud pills and give to the sick as you would take and swallow a medicinal pill. And they get good results. Yet every one knows that in the tails of the white Indian elephant and bull there is no such thing as power of healing. Nor can there be any healing power in the waters and soil of the shrines in the holy cities. Then where does healing come from? It comes from faith. Therefore, he who wishes to obtain spiritual healing must have faith in the healer.

PRAYERS should be considered in this life in the same way as the life preserver to a passenger on a boat. For the effect of a sincere prayer is not less than concentration and faith. Prayer is a strong magnet that attracts the mercy and bounty of God. Consider how the thirsty plants attract the bounty of the gardener. The heart of the gardener is moved only when his plants and flowers pray to him for water; they appeal to him by the humble attitude of drooping their heads and the wilting of their leaves. The gardener is fond of all his plants, but he pays attention only to those that show their need of help and he gives them plenty of water. His mercy and bounty goes to the humble among the flowers, not to the one whose head stands high as an arrogant person. In like manner, man who is the highest and noblest tree of the garden of existence can attract the mercy and bounty of the Heavenly Gardener His Creator—through prayers.

Another benefit of prayer is that it imparts true happiness to the human heart and soul. For true happiness exists only when the mind and the heart are free from worry. Therefore, when you have faith in prayer you free yourself from worry, and are filled with hope and cheer. Thus, he who believes in the efficacy of prayer is much happier, lives better, sleeps sounder than one who does not believe.

Furthermore, prayer should be considered as the best means of communication with God, the Source of all good. As a loyal lover yearns to commune with his beloved and benefactor, how much more the loyal creature must long to commune with his Creator? Also, just as it is the duty of the patient to ask his physician for all that he wants, in like manner man ought to ask his needs from the All-Provider. When our prayers are not answered it is only for our good, if we are of those who know. A good mother does not always give her little child the thing it cries for, because that thing may bring disaster to its life. Therefore, the merciful mother and father heed the cry and grant the child everything that is conducive to the happiness and growth of its body and soul. They are neither deaf nor cruel when they do not heed the hundreds of silly requests made constantly by their little child. Likewise, man has many wishes that sometimes are more dangerous to him and to society, and even more destructive than children's notions. Therefore, while praying, our real prayer from the depth of the heart should be: Lord! Thy Will be done, not mine.' Last but not least, man should be reminded that divine and natural laws are not to be violated. He must not break these laws, and then wail because his prayers are not answered.

THE FOURTH SPIRITUAL healing by spiritual means is through the power of the Holy Spirit. That mysterious power works through the Divine Manifestations Moses, Christ, Muhammad, the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and before them all the ancient prophets had that power. How well I remember the time when I was burning with malarial fever in the city of 'Akká in the Holy Land. I was attended by a prominent physician, who notwithstanding all his medical skill and all his quinine pills, was unable to lower my high temperature. Finally, in a delirious condition I was carried from the pilgrimhouse to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's home. He came down to see me, and after feeling my pulse, He ordered a glassful of iced lemonade and told me to sip it slowly. I took it and fell asleep, for two hours. Then my good old doctor called and found me sitting up in bed, smiling, refreshed and with normal temperature. I did not hesitate to tell him how I enjoyed that glass of lemonade. And by the way during all the time of two weeks that I had such a high fever, that doctor would not even let me have a cold drink of water, not a drop. Whereupon he nodded his head and said. "The Master has cured you!" Yes, with lemonade, or sour milk or rock candy, 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to heal the sick.

But you will be surprised to know the number of people who died in 'Akká with their stomachs filled with lemonade or sour milk. This is because on seeing or hearing how that wonderful Master was healing so many of the sick with such simple things as lemonade, or sour milk, others thought they could do the same. They did not realize at the time that it was the Holy Spirit behind the sour milk or lemonade that had the power of healing!

That mysterious power of healing through the Holy Spirit may also find a channel through the pure and sanctified souls such as true disciples, and sincere spiritual physicians. But those who attain to such a station are very rare indeed.

JUST BEFORE leaving the medical school of the American University of Beirut, Syria, about twenty-two years ago to come to America, a number of medical men and students, myself included, heard from the lips of 'Abdu'l-Bahá His views on medical ethics. He said in effect:

The duty of a doctor is to be divine in character and merciful in heart. He must meet the patient with a cheerful smile, not with a stern and frightful look. He must give ample time to find the cause of illness, then prescribe according to the correct diagnosis. If he has no time to spend on a thorough examination, he should not take so many cases that he cannot handle, but rather refer them to another doctor. And last, but not least, he must not give less attention to those who cannot pay their bills. Any doctor who characterizes himself with these qualities, is verily an angel of life. Otherwise, he is an angel of death!

In the writings of Bahá'u'lláh you can find everything your heart desires, even on the subject of healing for He has given great treasures of wisdom. His first advice is, "when you are sick, go to the skillful amongst the doctors." And the following words are from the writings of Bahá'u'lláh in Arabic which may be quoted here, not as the text, but from my own memory:

Do not eat save when you are hungry and do not drink after retiring to sleep. (Perhaps this is to avoid the habit of getting up during the night to drink cold water.) Exercise is best before meals, thereby the organs become strong; but it is dangerous when the stomach is full. Take medicine when needed, and leave it alone when the body is normal. Do not take any food save when digestion is completed and do not swallow until after thorough mastication. Heal the sick first with diet, then with medicine. If you can find what you need for healing in a simple remedy, do not use a compound medicine. When incompatible foods are served, do not mix them, be contented with one variety. Begin first with the simple or light food, then the heavy or coarse, and take the liquid before the solid. To eat one meal on top, or shortly after another, is harmful, beware of it. When you start to eat, begin in My name, the Most Glorious, and finish with the name of God, the possessor of the throne and the earth. Whatever is difficult to be masticated—too hard on teeth—is forbidden by the wise. A little food in the morning—a light breakfast—is like a light to the body. Stop all bad habits, they are the cause of unhappiness in the world. Find the causes of disease. Be moderate in all conditions, by this, the body is kept from fatigue and that tired feeling. Shun worry and anxiety, therein is a black calamity. Say! Jealousy eats up the body and revenge burns up the liver, as fire consumes the wood. Avoid both as you would avoid the lion. To purge the body is essential during the mild seasons. He who overeats, his illness will become more severe. . . .

And here is Bahá'u'lláh's message to the doctor and the sick:—O Doctor! Heal the sick by mentioning the name of your God, the possessor of the day of judgement, and after that, use what God has destined for the health of the bodies of His creatures. By my life! The doctor who has quaffed from the wine of my love, his visit is healing and his breath is mercy. Say! Cling unto him for the protection of health. He is confirmed by God in his treatment. Say! this profession is the most honored of all other professions, because it is the greatest means from God, the Life-Giver of the dust—to safeguard the bodies of all people, and He has placed it at the head of all other sciences and wisdom.

Under the title, "Things To Think About," Milton M. Schayer, columnist in the Intermountain Jewish News of Denver, Colorado, devotes one of his columns to the following statement of some of the principles of the Bahá'i Movement as sent to him by Willard P. Hatch of Los Angeles, Calif.

"Willard Hatch probably will never make the front page in any sort of scandal, so his name will not be generally known, The world, however, is a better place in which to live on account of his work. He is devoting his life to spreading the gospel of the brotherhood of man as enunciated by the Bahá'i Movement, and he asks that a friendly word be said for this unselfish and humanitarian cause. They advocate searching for truth and want mankind to abandon all superstition and prejudice. They believe in the "oneness of mankind," and that religion must be a cause of love and harmony else it is no religion; and they also believe that religion must go hand in hand with science. Faith and reason must be in full accord. These are just a few of the principles they preach, and fortunately as the years go by more people learn to practice them."

*"Verily the century of radiance has dawned, minds are advancing, perceptions are broadening, realizations of human possibilities are becoming universal, susceptibilities are developing, the discovery of realities is progressing. * * * Do not only say that unity, love and brotherhood are good; you must work for their realization. * * * In the sight of God color makes no difference at all. He looks at the hearts of men."* 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

HIS sketch, concerning a man, begins with a woman. She was a little woman, brown of face, bright of eye, with a low voice and gentle manner, and she was the mother of three small children. The father, a high-grade mechanic, died when his son Ernest was only four years old, and for him and a younger brother and sister the young widow set herself to be not only guide and director but bread-winner. She had some education and so could teach an elementary school. Donating a part of some property accumulated by the thrifty husband to the establishing of a school in her home city (Charleston, S. C.) she was for a number of years its principal. Mrs. Just's accepted labor brought her in touch with the lowly and needy colored people of that city and she enlarged the scope of her endeavors to include much unpaid service to these her neighbors.

In that school-house to which she had dedicated a part of her own small holdings she opened a night school and conducted a Sunday school, and when no preacher was at hand, held religious services and pointed the way to right-living and to progress.

It was in his mother's school and in her Sunday school that Ernest Just's education began.

It was a day of small beginnings, offering perhaps no suggestion of the great future which lay ahead, unless indeed that mother's faith and courage fed a something in the spirit of that son of which both may have been, even then, dimly conscious and which these later years have seen quickened to a veritable flame.

All during childhood and on into youth Ernest Just must have been receiving impressions that did not add to his happiness. In a lad of different training and temperament they might have subtracted from his self-respect. Not so with him. He became aware of a world from which he was shut out—a world of wealth, of opportunity, of achievement, of power safe-guarded and made exclusive by a color-line. But he had found another world—a world of thought! And in it he dreamed and worked and revelled.

By THE TIME he was fifteen that messenger of light, the Northern school-maam, had invaded his school. One such was quick to discover this wide-eyed, serious lad who always knew all of the lesson assigned, and often showed hunger for more than the text-books contained. On one memorable day she drew from him the confession that he was torn between the desire to go North and be educated, and a sense of duty that prompted him to go to work and make life easier for the mother who had done so much for him. This teacher wisely pointed out the possibilities which a liberal education would open up that could never be realized if school were abandoned at his then stage of advancement. She did more, she paid a visit to the mother and was surprised and delighted to find her sharing her son's ambition.

There seemed only one obstacle. There was not sufficient money to finance the adventure. But here the lad himself came forth with a solution of the problem. He would work his way. Others had done it. Why could not he? One of the things which Dr. Just recalls, with a twinkle of the eye, is the grave concern of some of their friends! "Don't let that boy go way up north," they protested to his mother; "he aint so strong and he's bound to catch cold, then what'll he do 'mong strange white folks? He'll just lay down an' die." "Well," responded the far-seeing mother, "I'd rather he'd die trying to make something of himself than to live and be no good to himself or the world." And so, inspired by that Spartan-like mother, Ernest with little of this world's goods but mightily endowed with courage and capacity, set forth for the "cold" North.

Kimball Academy in New Hampshire has the honor of opening its doors to the young student. Although barely prepared to enter the lowest class, young Just completed the four years course in three years with honors. Meanwhile he had so distinguished himself for scholarship that he had been made president of the school's debating club, and editor-in-chief of the Academy Magazine.

Graduating from Kimball was only a beginning. Ernest Just was headed for the heights of life. In the fall of 1903 he matriculated at Dartmouth College. Here the savings from vacation earnings were soon augmented by prizes and scholarships. Hamperings and disadvantages began to recede while progress and achievement took definite shape in the mind and life of this lone youth, battling his way forward, upward!

Then came the day of graduation with magna cum laude. What had happened? He had not only kept pace with his classmates, he had gone beyond them. Previous to this time no Dartmouth student had ever taken honors in two different fields, but he did. Mark his versatility. He made the highest mark in Greek ever awarded a freshman in Dartmouth College. In his sophomore year he bore off prizes, in his junior and senior years he won scholarships. It was I believe during his senior year that there appeared in the college magazine one of the tenderest, most beautiful tributes ever paid a beloved mother by a gifted son. Ernest Just was the author. Small wonder that it was predicted of him that he would succeed, no matter to what he might decide to devote his attention.

With this brilliant scholastic record fresh upon him, Mr. Just joined the Faculty of Howard University, Washington, D. C. Although he had come as a scientist, it is only fair to say of him that he brought to the institution its awakening as to the dramatic gifts of its students. It was with a class in English literature that he demonstrated to the school and to the community the possibilities of developing dramatic art even among under-graduates. To some this may be forgotten or unknown history, but distinguished alumni working in these lines at home and abroad recall with enthusiasm the presentation en costume of two legitimate dramas under the direction of Prof. Just, and the overwhelming surprise and delight of the crowds who came to look and listen.

BUT THE WINDS of Destiny were blowing the bark of this young scholar into far different channels. Prof. Just began to spend his summers in research work in the Biological Laboratory at Wood's Hole, Mass. In 1916 he was given the degree of Ph.D. at the University of Chicago. And from now on he travels so fast that one grows almost dizzy in watching his flight; nor can one lacking scientific knowledge essay to give adequate description of that flight.

His interest now lay chiefly in the subject of fertilization concerning which he made valuable discoveries and wrote extensively. He was one of the authors of "General Cytology," collaborating with such distinguished scholars as Dr. Lillie of the University of Chicago; Dr. Morgan, President of the National Academy of Sciences; Dr. Jacobs, Director of the Marine Biological Laboratory, and others. By degrees his name and his fame were being cited in foreign magazines and in 1924 he was the choice of a group of German scientists to prepare a monograph on "The Functions of the Cell." He contributed to a set of books on chemistry; was placed on the editorial staff of a scientific journal published in Berlin, Germany; assigned to similar position on equally important periodicals at home, in Chicago and in far away Japan, while significantly enough, he became a member of the staff of the official periodical of the Marine Biological Laboratory in America where he began his scientific investigations. Honors were heaped thick and fast upon the now distinguished scientist. He was made a Fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, also member of the American Society of Zoologists. He was awarded the first Spingarn Medal.

"No miser in the good he holds" is Dr. Just. To the aspiring student he is ever ready with timely advice or the helping hand. Ambitious study clubs turn to him for advice upon abstruse questions and he often puts aside scientific work to meet with a group of students when in simple compelling manner he holds forth upon some topic in which they are interested. On such occasions he is at his best. So he will be remembered by some readers of this magazine privileged to hear him at an interracial meeting under Bahá'í auspices.

IT WAS perhaps inevitable that the distinguished accomplishments of this man should attract the attention of that group of philanthropists who are consecrating vast sums of money to the encouragement of study and research that lead to the benefit of all mankind.

The Rosenwald Foundation has given the Zoological Department of Howard University of which Dr. Just is head, fifteen thousand dollars a year for five years with an additional five thousand dollars for equipment.

Dr. Just was able to spend last year in Italy where he engaged in the work that has become so dear to him and to which he has made definite and valuable contribution.

His attainments and popularity brought to Dr. Just a return engagement, and he had the overwhelming distinction of returning to Europe in the summer of 1930 to the city of Padua where as one of eleven of the world's greatest scientists he lectured to a Special Assembly of scientific folk.

One has to be little short of a magician to wrest from this great but modest man any account of his varied experiences, his marvelous triumphs. We all have heard how those European students are given to register approval or disapproval of the men who lecture to them. It has been learned that in Italy there came from the students in response to the last of his talks such spontaneous outbursts of cheering and applause as is rare even there. I tried to get from its recipient some account of it all, but he was so reluctant to talk of himself that I had to abandon the effort.

One particular experience among the many experiences that have befallen him is deeply cherished by the scientist, that is his stay at the Kaiser Wilhelm Institute in Berlin. He went there to lecture in response to an invitation from its founder, Adolf von Harnack, author of The History of Theology, Higher Criticism and other works of value.

It is like a bit of beautiful drama, is it not, that this young man from the new world met and communed with this ripe old scholar of the old world only a few short months before the latter journeyed to the Great Beyond? May it not be a harbinger of what the future holds in store to be able to record that this eminent theologian was in harmony with modern scientific thought even to the extent of founding a school for its promotion? Add to this the fact that his work with a man of different race and younger generation is cherished by the latter as one of the most satisfying of all his many contacts and it becomes possible to go even farther. Why may we not forecast a day when East and West, youth and age, black and white, shall meet on one harmonious plane where religion and science shall have brought them?

It is the men who are doing the same kind of work that he is doing, dealing with the same problems, who say of Dr. Just that he is "one of the greatest scientists in the world today," but he wears his honors as all the truly great do—with unvarnished simplicity.

To those who do not know him well he may seem indifferent, at times perhaps almost rude. Not so to those who know him best. He is almost shy, yet out of those wide dreamy eyes he has a way of looking at one that might prove embarrassing if one lacks the sincerity, the probity, the honesty that are so dominant in his own character. He is tall, something over six feet I should say, or at least he appears so when he stands beside his petite wife or is rollicking with the two girls and small boy who constitute the family group. This man of science has a mouth sensitive enough to belong to a poet. His voice is low and mellow, but capable of being very stern or very sympathetic as his students will tell you.

IN THIS STORY I have not told of that dark, dark day before the end of his academy life when young Just made a hasty trip southward to say good-bye,—the last good-bye to that mother whose gentle yet forceful character has without doubt been a great influence in all his career. Only rarely does he permit himself to speak of it. I have not dwelt upon the long struggle with the prejudices, the insults, the hypocrisies, the flagrant injustices that have been flung in the way of this man's progress. Steadily, bravely, he has refused to be conquered by them, aye, even to be hindered by them. Do not think he has escaped them. To one of his slightly brown complexion such experiences are inescapable.

"Why, then," do you ask, "does he not go to Europe where character not color is the measure of a man?" I will tell you why! To be the father or mother of a colored child in this the twentieth century of civilization is to live always on the borderland of tragedy, when not in the very centre of its sickening whirl. When Dr. Just looks into the faces of his own beautiful children there surges up into his heart and mind millions of other faces—down in the swamps of Georgia, in the cottonfields of Mississippi, in cities and towns, in high school and college, in hovel and cottage and beautiful homes,—faces, faces, faces, all shut in,—below the color line! If you have managed to get a little closer to him than most folks he will confess to you in words like these: "I cannot leave them! I have tasted the joy of freedom, but I could not be happy if I failed to do my duty. I believe that Science is yet to play a large part in the development of human beings, and if I can help these boys and girls to look at life as a splendid adventure, and upon themselves as a necessary part of the great whole, I think it will mean more to me than work in the laboratories of princes or kings."

A scientist and a humanitarian! A master of the test-tube and a magician with the microscope, but above these a man who understands spiritual values and who has the inherited gift of relating these values to all work in his class-room. He lives above the color line! And in all of this is Dr. Just not among the few who exemplify in every day life this injunction of 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "By his arts, sciences, inventions and all of his work, man must reveal his highest capacity. * * * Work done in the spirit of service is worship."

SCIENCE AND RELIGION

SCIENCE may be likened to a mirror wherein the images of the mysteries of outer phenomena are reflected. It brings forth and exhibits to us in the arena of knowledge all the product of the past. It links together past and present. The philosophical conclusions of bygone centuries, the teachings of the prophets and wisdom of former sages are crystalized and reproduced in the scientific advancement of today. Science is the discoverer of the past. From its premises of past and present we deduce conclusions as to the future. Science is the governor of nature and its mysteries, the one agency by which man explores the institutions of material creation. All created things are captives of nature and subject to its laws. They cannot transgress the control of these laws in one detail or particular. The infinite starry worlds and heavenly bodies are nature's obedient subjects. The earth and its myriad organisms, all minerals, plants and animals are thralls of its dominion. But man through the exercise of his scientific, intellectual power can rise out of this condition, can modify, change and control nature according to his own wishes and uses. Science, so to speak, is the "breaker" of the laws of nature.

This endowment is the most praiseworthy power of man, for through its employment and exercise, the betterment of the human race is accomplished, the development of the virtues of mankind is made possible and the spirit and mysteries of God become manifest. Therefore I am greatly pleased with my visit to this university. Praise be to God! that this country abounds in such institutions of learning where the knowledge of sciences and arts may readily be acquired.

As material and physical sciences are taught here and are constantly unfolding in wider vistas of attainment, I am hopeful that spiritual development may also follow and keep pace with these outer advantages. As material knowledge is illuminating those within the walls of this great temple of learning, so also may the light of the spirit, the inner and divine light of the real philosophy glorify this institution. The most important principle of divine philosophy is the oneness of the world of humanity, the unity of mankind, the bond conjoining East and West, the tie of love which binds human hearts.

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

BEWARE OF DIFFERENCES

HARRY P. FRANTZ

The author of the following article is a student at the University of Pennsylvania, Department of Journalism. We are pleased to publish his brief review of the Bahá'í Movement in accordance with our policy of publishing frequently articles contributed by the youth of the world.

IN collegiate circles young men and women pride themselves upon their tolerance and flaunt their open-mindedness as though it were some phenomenon peculiar to a particular class of society. The Bahá'í religion is a direct challenge to this self-appointed intelligentsia to extend their tolerance from such obvious and personal considerations as color and race to a greater tolerance, that of the religious and spiritual life of other people. It offers opportunity for world tolerance that the real liberal will be only too glad to embrace.

Bahá'is ask no Christian to give up Christ; no Muhammadan to turn his back upon Muhammad; no Buddhist to disown Buddha. The Bahá'í religion does ask the world to look further afield than a faith or a sect; to substitute tolerance for bigotry; to accept every one of "God's Messengers." Muhammadans say, "There is but one God and Muhammad is His Prophet." Bahá'is would have us say, "There is but One God and in Him we are all one."

WILLIAM MILLER of Low Hampton, New York, was a scholar and a devout man. He believed the "two thousand and three hundred days" mentioned in the Bible,* referred to years not days and that the time of the Second Advent of Christ was close at hand. Resourceful as well as mathematical, on May 23, 1844, he stood on the highest hill in Low Hampton with a little band of followers firmly determined to be a favorably-placed welcoming committee when the cloud bearing the returning Savior should appear. The heavenly visitation failed to function and the Millerites walked down the hill to repurchase their homes and substitute blue serge for their conspicuous white muslin robes.

William Miller was right. But contemporaneous events in Persia proved that his mistake lay in awaiting divine pyrotechnics while the Báb, the Herald of Bahá'u'lláh, the One awaited, was then "just another fanatic," and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, born on that same day in 1844, must have looked much like many another brown Persian baby. Today over half a million Bahá'is in Persia celebrate the date of Miller's unhappy climbs not because of William Miller, but because on that day the Báb, the fore-runner of Bahá'u'lláh, declared this cause and began His ministry, and on that day the Son of Bahá'u'llah, the Center of His Covenant, 'Abdu'l-Baha (The Servant of God) was born. Now Bahá'is are to be found in nearly every country of the world with a considerable group of believers in this Truth working with fervor to spread their religion in the United States.

MUCH as John the Baptist preached the coming of Jesus Christ, so The Báb (The Gate) preceded Bahá'u'lláh and proclaimed the approaching advent of One greater than Himself whom He called "Him Whom God shall manifest." Midst the overwhelming power of the Muhammadan religion some advanced thinkers dared to hope for something better and to these The Báb poured forth His sermons and His prophecies. So well did His eloquence and sincerity convert His few listeners that they in turn departed to spread His story of "a greater One to come" throughout all Persia. While His early mission, being localized, had allowed Him to remain unmolested, the later wide-spread success of The Báb led to His violent death; for the Muhammadan priesthood realized too late that they had underrated this latest Prophet. They revenged themselves upon The Báb with six years of persecution culminating in His death at the hands of a firing squad; but the message of the devout Messenger had taken root and His adherents grew in spite of fierce persecutions.

Among the foremost of The Báb's supporters was Mirza Husayn Ali, better known by the title of Bahá'u'lláh (Glory of God). Born of wealthy parents and with a youth spent in the highest of social circles, He threw Himself into the ranks of the followers of the Báb, sharing their persecutions. In 1852

He was thrown into a prison from which many of His fellow-believers went to a violent death. Bahá'u'lláh was assisted by the Russian consul who interceded in His behalf and testified to the purity of His character.

His freedom restored, Bahá'u'lláh lived in the wilderness for two years. His innate spiritual leadership was recognized by the Bábis. Bahá'u'lláh converted thousands with His sermons and the Bábi movement in Persia continued to grow until again the Moslem authorities decided to take a hand. This time exile was imposed upon Bahá'u'lláh and His family. In preparation for their journey to exile in Adrianople the famous twelve-day encampment in the Garden of Ridvan was made. It was on the first of those twelve days in April, 1863, that Bahá'u'lláh declared Himself to be the One whose coming The Báb had foretold.

At Adrianople Bahá'u'lláh publicly announced His mission and was enthusiastically accepted by the majority of the Bábis who were known thereafter as Bahá'is. A small minority, inspired by the jealousy of Mirza Yahya, Bahá'u'lláh's half-brother, attempted to make trouble for the Bahá'is and the religious authorities, ever-seeking a way in which to attack the new and growing Faith represented the conflict in such terms to the civil authorities that in 1868 the Turkish government banished both Bábis and Bahá'is; Baha'u'llah and His followers going to 'Akká in Palestine, a city with a climate so deadly the Sultan had reserved it for political enemies.

It was during this time of suffering that Bahá'u'lláh spread the message of the Bahá'í Faith throughout the western world by a series of letters written to the rulers of the principal countries. Queen Victoria of England replied: "If your religion be The Truth it will live." The Bahá'í religion has not merely lived; it has taken on new life and strength.

After many years the conditions of His imprisonment were improved and Bahá'u'lláh spent the last years of His life in comparative peace and comfort, passing away in 1892 at the age of seventy-five.

TODAY we marvel that a message could bring such persecution and suffering upon those who were faithful, and naturally we are curious to discover the foundation of such unbending faith and devotion. This message, for which men and women were content to suffer in prison and exile, had as one of its fundamental principles, the Oneness of Mankind.

J. E. Esslemont, one of the most prolific of Bahá'í writers, has declared: "One ploughs, another sows, another waters, another reaps, but there is One Lord who giveth the increase."

The beloved son and successor of Baha'u'llah, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, proclaimed the tolerance of the Bahá'is by this declaration: "It is not necessary to lower Abraham to raise Jesus; it is not necessary to lower Jesus to proclaim Bahá'u'lláh."

Bahá'is believe that some of the present day professing Christians have so weakened the teaching of Jesus that One is needed Who will bring with Him a strong, vigorous belief, alike to all the world, and that Bahá'u'lláh is the vehicle chosen by God to transport a rejuvenated faith to a world that has strayed far from the teachings of earlier Prophets.

There is nothing revolutionary or iconoclastic about this Faith which had its beginning in the Birthplace of Religions, the Orient. In 1912 'Abdu'l-Bahá told the American people that "the solution of economic questions will not be brought about by array of capital against labor and labor against capital in strife and conflict, but by the voluntary attitude of good-will on both sides. Then a real and lasting justness of conditions will be secured." The most conservative of our business colleges now teach that doctrine to their students.

America prides itself on large college enrollments. The Bahá'í religion is not an ignorant faith. Bahá'u'lláh attached great importance to the equality of the sexes and one of the means He relied upon was universal education. "He who educates his son, or any other children, it is as though He hath educated one of my children."

The Bahá'í Cause would undertake the education of public opinion by the teaching of a tolerance that would bring the Christian into the synagogue and the Jew into the church. The Bahá'í religion would not have young people in the United States—the "melting-pot of nations"—asking, "I wonder if that girl is a Catholic?" or, "Do you think that fellow is a Jew?" 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "Since all gather to worship God what difference is there?"

FROM MOLECULE TO MAN

LOULIE A. MATHEWS

The author has given us here in a simple and vivid form the story of life development from the first atom to the perfection of man himself, lord of the world of nature. In this treatment of evolution, some of the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá bearing on the subject are interwoven, teachings which wonderfully illumine the puzzle of how life is evolved. This and the following chapter, which will appear in the February Bahá'í Magazine, were originally written as a "Child's History."

UR world is swung in starry space like an emerald ball tossed high against the sky.

There was a time when the earth was covered with water that hid the valleys and hills, and even the mountain tops.

A fierce sun beat down and dried little patches of earth, here and there, where the water was shallow. And plants sprang up. Neither animals nor human beings could have lived at this period of the world's history, as there was no air fit to breathe. After a while, the plants waxed stronger and more sturdy and exhaled gasses that helped to create for us the necessary atmosphere. But these plants upon land were not the first. It was under the sea that the earliest traces of life appeared. Water plants grew and after countless ages, animal life followed. Thus, a crude procession of living creatures spread from the water and began to cover the earth.

In those far-off days, inventions and discoveries lay in the invisible realm, waiting for man to develop and call them into everyday life.

It was to Evolution that God gave the gigantic task of developing man. The meaning of the word "evolution" is "to bring forth, change and perfect;" so you may well understand that time, as we know it, could play no part in such a labor. A million years was as sunrise to sundown with us. There was no one to say "Finish this piece of work right away, for we are in a great hurry." No, everything moved slowly forward. To perfect a single form took so much time that no one could reckon it.

"These cellular elements have at some time been in the mineral kingdom. While in the mineral kingdom, they have had their coursings and transformations through myriads of images and forms."

We learn that our senses are not reliable sources of information. If we believe them we should think the world standing still instead of spinning round and round. We should look at a rock and believe it solid—immovable, instead of being made up of millions of separate cells. For the expression of all physical life is change and movement because everything on this planet is composed of tiny invisible cells: the air you breathe, the water you drink, the house in which you live, the mountain tops and the forests, even you yourself are composed of the cellular elements of which Abdu'l-Bahá speaks.

Ages ago these tiny invisible cells were dancing freely about the universe when Evolution called to them and said, "It is time for you to go to school," and started the various elements that now make up your body on a long, long journey. At the outset they came to a mysterious land, spoken of in the Bahá'í Revelation as the Mineral Kingdom. This kingdom was a hidden treasure chest, containing wonders greater than any fairy story ever told.

Let us imagine ourselves far down under the earth, carrying a magic lantern, so that we can unlock the treasure chest and examine its contents. There were great caves in which heaps of leaves from prehistoric forests had lain. The form of the leaves had disappeared, and was replaced by a substance, solid and black, that today we see burning brightly in our fireplaces.

As we watch the flames making shadows on the wall, we must not forget the stately forests of long ago. The origin of coal.

Wandering about, we should come upon rocks of many hues, and blocks of marble, pink and white. Mounds of gold and silver, and veins of copper, that would make mirrors and ornaments for Egypt and Syria. Here were diamonds embedded in the rocks that were to sparkle on the fingers of queens. Rubies and emeralds to be woven into royal crowns, and jewel jade destined to adorn temple altars in far-off lands.

Into each one of these substances, the little invisible cellular elements plunged, working their way through the cruder materials and precious stones. Millions of years passed. Then the head master, Evolution, chose from among the elements, those ready to be forwarded into the vegetable kingdom—that kingdom lying in the sunshine under the blue sky.

ing accomplished their functions in the vegetable kingdom, the cellular elements ascend to the animal kingdom."

The new world in which the elements found themselves was full of gayety and freshness. Now they put on Nature's brightest colors, dressing in tints of the garden with broad green sashes. The trees, the flowers, the vegetables received them, as did the waving fields of grain. A happy rhythm was everywhere. Even during the winter sleep, dreams of spring stirred by sunshine and showers were ever present. It was like a long, long summer vacation. But at length the tireless master Evolution pressed them forward. It was time for a sterner school. Oh, with what regret they bade goodbye to the forest, stream and field, and sadly wended their way to the kingdom of the animals.

"In the animal kingdom again the elements go through the composition of myriads of images."

Loudly they knocked on the gate of the new kingdom, crying, "Let us in! We come from the headmaster, we have gone to the school of the Mineral as well as the Vegetable, and have thus arrived at your threshold." The scholars soon made a tremendous discovery: In this Kingdom they could move about! What a delicious experience to run and jump after centuries of keeping still! Wandering about wherever curiosity prompted, brought greater knowledge of the earth than had been acquired through all the previous ages.

Everything in the Animal Kingdom was not easy, however: here food must be hunted; the young protected from fierce claws. And a watch set for enemies. They endured cold and thirst and for the first time encountered conscious death. Yet these misfortunes served them well, for it brought them nearer and nearer to the end of their journey, until, without realizing any change, the elements crossed the borderland and entered the Human Kingdom.

"In the vegetable kingdom the elements again had their journeys and transformations through myriads of conditions. Hav-

"For every single phenomenon has enjoyed the postulates of God, and every form of these infinite electrons has had its characteristics and perfections.

"In the human kingdom the elements have their transformations and coursings through multitudes of forms. In short every single primordial atom has had its journeys through every state of life, and in every stage has been endowed with a special virtue and characteristic."

There was no use knocking here, for the gates were thrown open and it was plain to see no one was within. The Kingdom stood empty. Not knowing what else to do they sat down and waited for Evolution, who could be seen running towards them at great speed. "Your journey is ended," he cried joyously. "It was by means accidental that your experiences led you hither, for all the time while passing through the different degrees of matter, in all the varied kingdoms, you were potentially man." You can understand the word "potential" if you think of an acorn in which is imprisoned an oak tree; with its trunk and spreading branches, all its potential life hidden in a tiny seed that can be held in the palm of your hand.

Evolution assured them that all the necessary tools for man's development were in the Human Kingdom. "There was only one key that would unlock the secrets of Nature: this key was to be found in man's brain." "You must adventure along new paths, relying upon your own initiative; yet, go not alone, but in the company of Courage and Patience. And have no fear."

And so the elements advanced and the tasks became more and more difficult.

Countless trials, countless failures there were before primitive man learned to make a fire, build a shelter, and to prepare his food. Painfully he mastered the rudiments of physical life, one by one. How many hundred years passed by while he gazed at the rushing waters, unable to invent even a rude raft with which to reach the opposite bank, while you and I thunder over that same water carried by a locomotive on a suspension bridge.

"In the world of existence man has traversed successive degrees until he has attained the human kingdom. In each degree of his progression he has developed capacity for advancement to the next station and condition. While in the kingdom of the mineral he was attaining the capacity for promotion into the degree of the vegetable. In the kingdom of the vegetable he underwent preparation for the world of the animal and from thence he has come onward to the human degree or kingdom. Throughout this journey of progression he has ever and always been potentially man."

THROUGH A WIDE ANGLE LENS

DALE S. COLE

HAVE you ever wondered which experiences the most joy, an astronomer looking far a way through his great telescope into dim distances, or the worker in the laboratory peering into the minuteness of things through a powerful microscope? Undoubtedly there is a thrill in each experience to the true seeker, for in each case new knowledge is being sought. Another building stone is in the process of being added to the foundation of the temple of knowledge. In each case truth is being sought through the sense of sight aided by wonderful lenses.

Science is teaching us to think abstractly. The final solution of a complex scientific problem regarding the universe may be an equation of symbols. Such an equation may express a law without explaining the meaning of the symbols. It is the meaning of the symbols which we must try to understand. The full import may lie beyond the bounds of human perception, but by trying sincerely to interpret these meanings into life, we will undoubtedly be led along the path of spiritual appreciations and away from the older, and no longer tenable, ideas of materialism. Spiritual progress has profound effects on mundane affairs.

“When you breathe forth the breath of the Holy Spirit from your hearts into the world, commerce and politics will take care of themselves in perfect harmony. All arts and sciences will become revealed and the knowledge of God will be manifested. It is not your work but that of the Holy Spirit which you breathe forth through the Word. This is a fundamental truth,” said 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

In prosperous times humanity is prone to be complacent. But in times of stress and bewilderment, when humanity realizes that it cannot completely control its environment, it instinctively looks upward to some source of help outside or above the material universe and its workings.

Human interest in spiritual or religious thought and possibilities is accelerating. There is increasing evidence that we are beginning to realize that “we cannot pull ourselves up by our own bootstraps.” Science is frankly endeavoring to peer into the meaning of the symbols which so stealthily slip into the equations expressing natural laws.

Prof. Thomson, closes his most excellent little book “The Atom” with this very interesting suggestion:

“It is a remarkable instance of the unity of thought that a study apparently so remote from human emotion as atomic physics, should have so much to say on one of the great problems of the soul.”

He refers here to the difference between living and dead matter, between the conscious and the unconscious.

In another place he suggests that what we may need is “a less materialistic view of the universe.”

Prof. Albert Einstein has quite recently voiced ideas regarding science and religion which have caused considerable comment. (New York Times.)

He believes that neither a religion based on fear nor one embracing solely a social or moral idea of God are effective, but that gifted individuals and noble communities have had a cosmic religious sense, free from dogma and the idea of God made in man's image. This cosmic religious sense leads to a “definite conception of God.” He believes that “the most important function of art and science is to arouse and keep alive this feeling in those who are receptive.”

Whether we agree with him or not “that the only deeply religious people of our largely materialistic age are the earnest men of research,” we can see much in his statement “that the cosmic religious experience is the strongest and noblest driving force behind scientific research.” We can realize the worker's deep “faith in the rationality of the structure of the world.” We can see that the men of science are devoutly seeking by following at least one path, that of scientific method.

It is decidedly inspiring and stimulating when scientists of the rank of Thomson and Einstein direct thought into spiritual channels. It indicates that spiritual forces are working, however as yet generally unrecognized and possibly unanticipated. It tends to guide the thought of a world interested in science to the real foundations of the universe. Science interests many because of its applications. These myriad applications result in material wealth, but the time is not far distant when the spiritual significances of science will far outweigh the others. To many, these brief and guarded suggestions of the men of science have greater inspirational value than many sermons. They indicate that spiritual values are being gauged as more and more important and fundamental.

One of the most intriguing and stimulating books of the hour is Sir James Jeans “The Mysterious Universe.” Although not as comprehensive as Eddington's earlier “The Nature of the Physical Universe” it is a provocative challenge to think about the universe and the particle of it which we call home.

Jeans suggests that “the nature of ultimate reality can only be expressed in terms of mathematical formula.” The mechanical and biological concepts of the universe have failed to offer complete and satisfactory explanations, and human intellectual activity has advanced so far that anything short of a complete explanation is not deemed adequate.

Certainty has given way to probability. Scientists no longer endeavor to state, in every case, that given a certain set of conditions, a second specific set of conditions or states will follow. They say it is probable that such will be the case. Determinism seems to have been given a death blow.

Because of advanced technique we are now able to deal with conceptions of particles much smaller than ever before. For this reason and others, mathematical averages now have great significance.

He believes that the laws which nature obeys are not so much like those which a machine follows as those which govern a musician composing. The universe can probably best be pictured "as consisting of pure thought, the thought of what, for want of a wider word, we must describe as a mathematical thinker."

Present day pictures, which science draws, are mathematical ones, and "the universe appears to have been designed by a pure mathematician."

By pure mathematics is meant those departments of the science which are creations of pure thought as contrasted with applied mathematics which reasons about the external world.

Jeans believes that the final truth of a phenomenon resides in the mathematical description of it. Mechanical models no longer suffice, but mathematical formula do not tell what a thing is, only how it behaves.

"Today there is a wide measure of agreement, which on the physical side of science, approaches almost unanimity, that the stream of knowledge is heading toward a non-mechanical reality; the universe begins to look more like a great thought than a great machine . . . Mind no longer appears as an accidental intruder into the realm of matter; we are beginning to suspect that we ought rather to hail it as the creator and governor of the realm of matter. Not, of course our individual minds, but the mind in which the atoms, out of which our individual minds have grown, exist as thoughts."

'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "When we speak of the soul we mean the motive power of this physical body which lives under its entire control in accordance with its dictates. If the soul identifies itself with the material world it remains dark . . . but if it becomes the recipient of the graces of the world of mind, its darkness will be transformed into light, its tyranny into justice, its ignorance into wisdom, its aggression into loving kindness; until it reach the apex. Then there will not remain any struggle for existence. Man will become free from egotism; he will be released from the material world; he will become the personification of justice and virtue, for a sanctified soul illumines humanity and is an honor to mankind, conferring life upon the children of men and suffering all nations to attain to the station of perfect unity."

"There is, however, a faculty in man which unfolds to his vision the secrets of existence. It gives him power whereby he may investigate the reality of every object. It leads man on and on to the luminous station of divine sublimity, and frees him from all the fetters of self, causing him to ascend to the pure heaven of sanctity. This is the power of the mind, . . ."

It is intensely interesting to read Jean's last chapter in the light of the Bahá'í Revelation.

'Abdu'l-Bahá explains the third power of man "which is an emanation from the divine bestower; it is the effulgence of the sun of reality; the radiation of the celestial world, the spirit of faith, the spirit His Holiness the Christ refers to when he says, 'Those that are born of the flesh are flesh and those that are born of the spirit are spirit.' The spirit is the axis round which the eternal life revolves. . . . This spirit of faith is the flame of reality, the life of humanity and the cause of eternal illumination. It inspires man to attain the virtues and perfections of the divine world."

Modern science has taken a huge step away from its older materialism when it quite frankly begins to talk of the mind, and of the universe being, perhaps, a great thought. A thought certainly is not a material thing. Perhaps it will not be so hard to take the next step and recognize generally the third power of man—the spirit of faith. It has already been suggested that our scientists may need a "less material view of the universe" to enable them to understand at least some of the meanings of the symbols which occur in the most accurate pictures of the universe—mathematical descriptions.

Perhaps the probabilities which theories and hypotheses seem to lead to will be found to be but another expression for the Will of God.

Mathematical pictures are the most complete but these equations are in symbols. What do the symbols mean? The whole course of science seems to be away from the tangible and towards the intangible. We can scarcely now expect a reversion to a physical or entirely materialistic interpretation of these mysterious symbols.

It was suggested that the thought comprising the universe is that of a pure mathematician and a pure mathematician does not reason about the external world.

Is it not clear that all of these extremely interesting speculations, and many more which might be cited, point to spiritual forces, spiritual influences, spiritual effects?

Our modern scientists are doing much to emphasize an increasing appreciation of the fundamental importance of things and forces which cannot be defined as purely physical or material. Current literature is rich in such highly interesting material. It is hard to understand why we go on placing such undue importance on the trivialities of life when there are such great things to consider. It is comforting to know that there is a great fund of knowledge which great minds are tapping and that when released, such knowledge always benefits mankind.

"Scientific knowledge is the highest attainment upon the human plane" said 'Abdu'l-Bahá "for science is the discoverer of realities. It is of two kinds, material and spiritual. Material science is the investigation of natural phenomena; divine science is the discovery and realization of spiritual verities. The world of humanity must acquire both. A bird has two wings; it cannot fly with one. Material and spiritual science are the two wings of human uplift and attainment. Both are necessary, one the natural, the other supernatural; one material, the other divine. By the divine we mean the discovery of the mysteries of God, the comprehension of spiritual realities, the wisdom of God, inner significances of the heavenly religions and foundation of the law."

THE EXPECTATION OF THE AGES

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

This, the fifth installment of the series under the title "The Basis of Bahá'í Belief," deals with the subject of biblical prophecy as reaching its fulfillment in the Manifestation of Bahá'u'lláh. In the present age the validity of prophecy is not a very current belief, nevertheless the mere fact that there have been hundreds of fantastical interpretations of bible prophecy is in itself no proof of the invalidity of prophecy. One cannot even from a scientific point of view dismiss with mere negation the whole matter of prophecy which forms such an integral basic part of the Judaic and Christian religions. A careful perusal of this article will be of interest to any one who desires to see to what extent the Bahá'í Movement is the fulfillment of the direct prophecies recurrent all through the bible. The Moffatt translation is used throughout.

THE most important question to every sincere and spiritually-minded person today is how he may know his Lord when He appears: for the signs of His coming are so evident that all save the dead are aware of them.

The Hebrew prophets gave clear evidence to the Jews of the conditions that would accompany the advent of the Lord of Hosts when He should tread upon the high places of the earth; Jesus Himself expounded the ways in which His followers might know His Spirit when it descended again into flesh.

Since the only evidences which the Christian accepts as sacred and authentic are these two let us examine in some detail this proof from prophecy concerning the Baha'í claim that Bahá'u'lláh fulfills the great expectation of the ages and has come in the fullness of time to usher in the Kingdom of God on earth, making of human hope, divine assurance.

Jesus instructing His followers as to "the time of the end" refers them back to Hebrew prophecy—let the reader note what Daniel said about it is His word on this subject.¹ Turning then to Daniel we find an exact chronology of the events that are to transpire.² He assigns from the time of the rebuilding of Jerusalem in 457 B. C. (Ezra:7) seventy weeks of the sacrifice of Jesus. In Numbers 14:34 and Ezekiel 4:6 the symbolism of a day is interpreted as a year: therefore seventy weeks is four hundred and ninety days or, scripturally, years. When the thirty-three years of the life of Jesus is added to 457 B. C. we obtain the number 490. But in chapter eight we find the prophecy to which Jesus refers: "How long . . . to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden underfoot?" "Unto two thousand three hundred days." From the edict to rebuild Jerusalem until the year of the birth of Jesus there were four hundred and fifty-six days; this date subtracted from twenty-three hundred gives the date 1844. Daniel also gives the same date in another way. In 12:6 he gives it as a time, times and a half, or a year, two years and half a year. The sidereal year is three hundred and sixty days, twice that number is seven hundred and twenty and half of it are one hundred and eighty, which added give twelve hundred and sixty, after the daily sacrifice is abolished. This occurred in 622 A. D. Adding the numbers we arrive at 1882 subtracting the thirty-eight years difference between solar and lunar time we obtain 1844 which exactly corresponds to 1260 A. H., or Muhammadan reckoning.

To the wary this might seem like special pleading or adroit manipulation to establish a point, but the fact that in widely scattered lands (America, Germany, Bohemia, Sweden and elsewhere) without intercommunication or the knowledge that other groups were trying to interpret these passages, they all quite independently arrived at the date 1844. It might have been a coincidence had two groups agreed, but where six or seven without comparison reach the same conclusion, we are constrained to believe that the cryptogram is evident to those who seek its meaning.

In the Christian Bible John also refers to a time, times and a half, giving in the eleventh chapter a reference to three days and an half, and explicitly to "a thousand, two hundred and three score days."

Thus the date 1260 A. H. and 1844 A. D. are given in many references in both the Hebrew and Christian scriptures.

Daniel, to whom Jesus told His followers to refer, gives a second date: a thousand two hundred and ninety. Dating this from the declaration of Muhammad (for it concerns a similar declaration) we have the year 1864.

Americans are familiar with the story of the group in this country who found thus, in the prophecies,

"the time of the end." They now call themselves "Seventh Day Adventists," though at that time they were known as "Millerites." Interpreting the scriptures literally they gave away their property, severed all earthly ties, and clothing themselves in white went up onto the hilltops in New York state "to meet their Lord in the air." Similarly a group of Germans having independently found the same date repaired to Mount Carmel for the same rapturous experience. Such was the origin of the prosperous German colony today living at the foot of Mount Carmel. The date on which these expectations were thus dramatized was May 23rd, 1844.

The date 1260, given as such in Revelation,¹ was also the date of Muhammadan expectation. "The year sixty" for a thousand years in Muhammadan history was spoken of as the time of the return of the Imam Mahdi.

On this very day the Glorious Báb in His tender youth arose as the consummation of the past cycle and as the Forerunner of the great Day of God for which the righteous were yearning. A young man of irresistible beauty and power, He established, in the six short years before His martyrdom, a following for "Him Whom God shall manifest" Who in nine and again in nineteen years would reveal Himself.

THE RELIGIONS of the world teach the appearance of two great contemporaneous Manifestations in this day: the Jews are promised the Lord of Hosts and the Messiah; the Christians the return of Christ and Elijah.¹ The Muhammadans, the Mahdi and the Messiah. But also forth from the Lord would come His Branch² His Servant³ reflecting His Light as the moon reflects the light of the sun. "Moreover in that day the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be seven-fold as the light of seven days"⁴: the religion revealed in this day shall be as great as all seven of the previous dispensations.

When Jesus was transfigured, previsioning the state in which He would next appear, the disciples saw two others with Him, whom they called Moses and Elijah.⁵ Daniel in his apocalyptic vision sees three: the man clothed in linen and one on this side one on that side of the river.⁶ In the Zoroastrian teachings three would arise in Persia.

The third figure in these predictions is 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Arm that would rule for the Lord of Hosts.⁷ He was the oldest son of Bahá'u'lláh appointed by His Father as Center of the Eternal Covenant of God with man; to Bahá'is He is identical with Bahá'u'lláh⁸ differing from Him only in function: as for example the light and heat of the sun are two different functions. By this means, long prophesied, Bahá'u'lláh extended the rays of His bounty and blessings upon mankind by nearly thirty years.

'Abdu'l-Bahá, which means the Servant of God; the actual incarnation of that ancient agreement between God and His creation, taught in the sacred religions of the world as the Covenant⁹; the Holy of Holies where man ever makes contact with His merciful Creator; 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the focal or pivotal point of Love and Unity in the world, was also born on May 23, 1844.

Thus we see that the chronology of prophecy was fulfilled by the declaration of the Báb and the birth of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

When Daniel had his vision he was standing in the palace of Shushan in Elam. Glancing at the Biblical Gazeteer we find that Elam is Persia and that Shushan the capital is near the site of the present capital, Tihrán, where Bahá'u'lláh declared His mission. This was in 1853 (the first date given by the Báb) to a chosen few of His friends: in nineteen years or 1863 He made known His Station to a larger group and in 1864 (the second date in Daniel, 1290 days) He publicly announced in Baghdad His Purpose and Authority.

But according to Biblical prophecy the return of the human presence of God amongst men, was to occur on Mount Carmel:¹⁰ that is why the German group made their pilgrimage there to await His coming. Mount Hermon is also called Mount Zion¹¹ and between Mount Carmel and Mount Hermon is situated the city of 'Akká, well-remembered in prophecy.¹²

So clearly has this locality been established as the place of reunion when the Promised One should come—that during the second crusade in 1136 a band of monks settled on Mount Carmel for that sublime rendezvous. There to this day their monastery stands on that brow where Carmel gently slopes into the sea. Bahá'u'lláh pitched His tent near there: once more He came unto His own, but His own folk did not welcome him.*

Turning to Micah 7:12-15, he says that in the day of restoration the One promised of God shall come from Assyria.¹ Examining a map of that period we find that the present site of Baghdád is included in that ancient empire. Bahá'u'lláh was first thrown into prison in Tihrán for allying Himself with the followers of the Báb in 1852. Banished to Baghdád the following year, He proclaimed His Station in 1864 on the eve of His banishment to Constantinople; from there He sojourned for a brief time in Adrianople whence He was sentenced to the penal colony of 'Akká—between Mount Carmel and Mount Zion in 1868. At 'Akká He passed from this earth, a titular prisoner, in 1892. In the twelfth verse it gives four different movements, in addition to coming from the fortified cities. The fourteenth verse² refers to the group of voluntary exiles who accompanied Bahá'u'lláh throughout His bitter trials and hardships, sharing the unspeakable abasement to which He was subjected. In the fifteenth verse Micah gives the days of Israel's coming out of the land of Egypt as the time during which the marvels of God will appear unto the Promised One: Bahá'u'lláh, as already stated, went into prison in Tihrán in 1852 and ascended from the world in 1892; 'Abdu'l-Bahá entered the prison of 'Akká with His Father in 1868, and was freed by the Young Turk revolution in 1908: thus both terms covered exactly forty years.

Therefore we see that the Báb, Baha'u'llah and 'Abdu'l-Bahá fulfill the Christian and Jewish prophecies with regard to Their number, the time of Their Appearance and the place in which They should appear; the exile and wanderings of Bahá'u'lláh and His final coming to Achor³ and Mount Carmel was fulfilled; He Who would establish the Covenant and build the Temple of God was appointed,⁴ and so the expectation of those who can look with clear sight and pure heart has been satisfied.

The great burden of prophecy throughout the Old Testament concerns the dispersion and the return of the Jews; when the Lord of Hosts appears Israel will flowback to Palestine, and "sing there as in the days of her youth."

Of startling significance then was the issuing of the great Firman of Toleration by the Sultan of Turkey in 1844 permitting Jews to take up residence in Judea and Turkish subjects to become Christians. The world today is apprised of the Zionist movement which amply fulfills the ancient predictions; but not until the Báb declared the presence of Bahá'u'lláh in the world was this gesture of restitution made.

There is still another point before we finish with these proofs from prophecy and take up the next signs given by Jesus in the twenty-fourth chapter of Mark.

Bahá'u'lláh, Who was born Husayn Ali Mirza Prince of Nur, was a descendant of the ancient royal dynasty of Persia. His grandfather was Prime Minister of the empire, His father a Vizier. Before His princely estates were confiscated and His rank reduced He often met with the followers of the blessed Báb, Whose Station as the Imam Mahdi, or Ga'im (as He is called in Persian) Husayn Ali Mirza immediately recognized before the world. In these meetings He was addressed by the supporters of El Báb as Jenabe Bahá. The name was given Him before His declaration. Choosing, as each succeeding Manifestation has ever done, the Name by which His followers shall call Him, this word, already given Him in recognition of His sublime character and attainments, was combined with the Name of God (Allah, in the religion where He appeared)—as Jesus, for example, called Himself the Son of God, and Bahá'u'lláh became the title under which He went forth to conquer the world with His Love and Wisdom and to establish the reign of the Almighty on earth. Bahá'u'lláh means the "Glory of God" and prophecy rings with His coming. "The city needs no sun, for Bahá'u'lláh illumines it, and the Lamb³ lights it up."² "The earth shall be filled with the knowledge of Bahá'u'lláh as the waters cover the sea."³ "Arise, shine for the light is come and Bahá'u'lláh is risen upon thee . . . and the Gentiles shall come to Thy light and kings to the glory (Baha) of Thy rising."⁴

*John 1:11. (1) Isa. 11:16. (2) Cf. Isa. 37:24. (3) Also spelled Akka. (4) Abdu'l-Baha.

THE CARMEL MONKS

A waxen Virgin hovers in the gloom
 Lit with red gems and candles, and the fume
 Of agate clouds of incense; heavy sighs
 Hang listless in the air, and upturned eyes
 Are straining for the brazen trump of doom.

The monks are waiting yet for Christ to come.
 On Carmel mountain they have made their home,
 Over the shore where the wan ocean dies.

To beautify His coming roses bloom,
 And tuberose, and yellow Spanish broom,
 And in the chapel singing voices rise;
 But Christ has come, and gone again, and wise
 Were they who kissed His feet and saw Him home.

THE MAN OF SCIENCE

SCIENCE is the first emanation from God toward man. All created beings embody the potentiality of material perfection, but the power of intellectual investigation and scientific acquisition is a higher virtue specialized to man alone. Other beings and organisms are deprived of this potentiality and attainment. God has created or deposited this love of reality in man. The development and progress of a nation is according to the measure and degree of that nation's scientific attainments. Through this means, its greatness is continually increased and day by day the welfare and prosperity of its people are assured.

ALL blessings are divine in origin but none can be compared with this power of intellectual investigation and research which is an eternal gift producing fruits of unending delight. Man is ever partaking of these fruits. All other blessings are temporary; this is an everlasting possession. Even sovereignty has its limitations and overthrow; this is a kingship and dominion which none may usurp or destroy. Briefly: it is an eternal blessing and divine bestowal, the supreme gift of God to man. Therefore you should put forward your most earnest efforts toward the acquisition of science and arts. The greater your attainment, the higher your standard in the divine purpose. The man of science is perceiving and endowed with vision, whereas he who is ignorant and neglectful of this development is blind. The investigating mind is attentive, alive; the mind callous and indifferent is deaf and dead. A scientific man is a true index and representative of humanity, for through processes of inductive reasoning and research he is informed of all that appertains to humanity, its status, conditions and happenings. He studies the human body-politic, understands social problems and weaves the web and texture of civilization.

IN fact science may be likened to a mirror wherein the infinite forms and images of existing things are revealed and reflected. It is the very foundation of all individual and national development. Without this basis of investigation, development is impossible. Therefore seek with diligent endeavor the knowledge and attainment of all that lies within the power of this wonderful bestowal."

“We may think of Science as one wing and Religion as the other: a bird needs two wings for flight, one alone would be useless. . . . Religion and Science walk hand in hand, and any religion contrary to Science is not the Truth.” —'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE EVIDENT disparity between science and religion, growing gradually through three centuries of the modern scientific age, has reached its culmination since the doctrine of evolution explained the method of progress of all life forms, while geology explained the development of the earth, and modern physics, chemistry and astronomy turned man's attention powerfully to the material universe. In proportion, the truths of the spiritual world have suffered great diminution of interest.

This strife between science and religion has proved quite disastrous to the emotional nature of man. It has caused blind and unthinking opposition on the part of the uneducated religionists to the clear truths of the scientific world, and such opposition to truth could not fail to have a disastrous effect upon those opposing it. On the other hand, this strife between science and religion has undermined the religion of the educated to such an extent that the intelligent class who are in effect the leaders of public life and thought are greatly lacking in spiritual faith and earnestness. Humanity cannot safely continue to function in this way—its emotional nature divided between allegiance to the truths of religion on the one hand and the truths of science on the other.

It is evident to any one who reflects on the subject that there can be no actual disparity between the truths of science and the truths of religion. For both science and religion are seeking to explain the universe and to discover the best ways in which man can harmonize himself with those cosmic laws which regulate all life. As there is but one universe, so there is but one truth about that universe, whether it be sought by the path of science or by the path of religion.

Bahá'u'lláh enunciated the great principle of unity between religion and science, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá the Interpreter and Expounder of the Bahá'í Faith states, in a way which can hardly be open to controversy, this great principle:—

“There is no contradiction between true religion and science. When a religion is opposed to science it becomes mere superstition; that which is contrary to knowledge is ignorance. . . . It is impossible for religion to be contrary to science even though some intellects are too weak or too immature to understand truth. . . . Put all your beliefs into harmony with science; there can be no opposition for truth is one. When religion, shorn of its superstitions, traditions, and unintelligent dogmas, shows its conformity with science, then there will be a great unifying, cleansing force in the world which will sweep before it all wars, disagreements, discords and struggles—and then will mankind be united in the power of the love of God.”

FORTUNATELY there is a rapprochement going on at present between religion and science. Intelligent religionists, not only in Christendom but in the world of Islam, of Buddhism and Confucianism, are welcoming all the truths which science has to offer mankind. On the other hand scientists, finding the cosmos more and more mystifying and inexplicable at every step of their investigation, are now in a more hospitable mood toward the admission of spiritual forces in a universe in which matter has almost entirely disappeared before scientific analysis and philosophy.

Of late there have been pronouncements on the part of world prominent astrophysicists maintaining the essential reasonableness of believing in a divine force eternally at work in the universe, both cause and guide of all material phenomena. One of the most stimulating and helpful of such books is the recently published “Man and the Stars”* by Harold True Stetson, Professor of Astronomy at Ohio Wesleyan University and Director of Perkins Observatory.

In his chapter, “Has Science Displaced Religion?” he says:

“Nothing can be more disastrous to honesty of thought than to try to segregate scientific and religious ideas into water-tight compartments. . . . Science and religion when rightly scanned give supplementary views to a picture of life, vastly deficient when looked at from either standpoint alone. . . .

“At the foundation of science is the principle that the universe is orderly. The belief that this expression of order is the expression of a superior intelligence, an ultimate Personality, is a premise of all religion. . . . As the correctness of assumptions in science becomes substantiated through the consistency of subsequent experiments, so in religion the vindication of faith comes in the test of subsequent experience based on such faith. Many of the tentative hypotheses of science trace their origin to an intuition not unlike the intuitions of faith. But we cannot expect science to prove or disprove non-material realities. The existence of great personalities such as Socrates, Buddha, Jesus, and Lincoln, afford better evidence for the existence of a Master Personality than any laboratory experiments can offer. Water does not rise above its level, nor a personality above its Source.”

THE CONCEPT of God which is promulgated in the Bahá'í faith is of a type uniquely acceptable to scientific thought—a Divinity which in its infinitude is beyond the comprehension of finite minds. It is futile to attempt to describe in human terms this “One Power which animates and dominates all things, which are but manifestations of Its energy.”* Man only wastes his efforts in metaphysical attempts as to the nature of Deity. The function of religion should rather be to help man find his proper relation to a universe which is the expression of this Power. It is the purpose of the great Prophets and Founders of religion—such as Moses, Christ, Buddha, Muhammad, Bahá'u'lláh—to help man adjust himself to the world he lives in. These Prophets demonstrate to humanity a truth most pregnant both for science and for religion, namely, that the Divine Power which lies back of all phenomena is a force of love, and that the universe is therefore a friendly home to man, serving both his needs and his aspirations.

Just as the religionist needs to take cognizance of the material discoveries of the scientist, so the scientist needs to take cognizance of the immaterial discoveries of the religionist and should be able to shift his attention from a universe of whirling electrons, atoms, planets, suns and island universes, to a world of Reality where the spirit that is within him can commune with the Great Spirit that is omnipresent.

WHEN we change our focus from the world of Becoming to the world of Being, we pass beyond the portals of time, which exists only in relation to the movement, growth, evolution of star-dust and life-forms. We pass also beyond space, which is the habitation of matter only and not of Idea.

The world of Becoming is a busy workshop where the clang of the anvil, the throb of incessant activity, and the sweat of human and nonhuman labor fill the air. But the world of Being is a pleasant world—all serenity and peace like a secluded valley or like quiet ocean depths. Here no activity, no striving for progress, disturb the measureless tranquility of Perfection. From the world of Being radiates the world of Becoming—but though the latter is energy itself, the former is infinite repose.

The great teachers of humanity have known how to live equally in both of these worlds. In the world of Becoming they have played an important part, pushing forward by their teachings and lives the evolution of humanity. But when this titanic task has over-wearied them, they have known how to retreat into the world of Being and how to find there both peace and power to bring back to their work amidst mankind.

One of the most important functions which religion can perform for us is to teach us how to turn from the world of Becoming and explore the world of Being; so that we too may find peace and refreshment even in the midst of the turmoil of life, and thus become more effective in performing our modest share of the great task of building a better universe.

*Words of Wisdom, Baha'u'llah.

“Discover for yourselves the reality of things, and strive to assimilate the methods by which the means of life, of well-being, of noble mindedness and glory are attained among the nations and people of the world.”

BODY—SOUL—SPIRIT

LOULIE A. MATHEWS

In the January number the author gave us a vivid picture of the story of evolution "From Molecule to Man." In the following article she describes what man's birthright really is and how it is attained. Both of these articles were originally written as a "Child's History."

DOST thou think thy body a small thing when within thee is enfolded the universe?"

We might compare the body to a nest of boxes. It is only the outer box that is visible. For a long time scientists and physicians were satisfied with having opened the first box, thus being able to study anatomy and the circulation of the blood. But as the light of Bahá'u'lláh spread, men began to see into all sorts of odd corners that had not been thought of before; they wanted to investigate everything. The scientists, therefore, set to work to construct a powerful glass that would greatly magnify objects. Lifting the lid of the inner box, they peered through the lens. Here were found heretofore unknown groups of living particles in the body, which they named molecules.

Once having discovered the molecule, the scientists were less satisfied than ever. Now they put their heads together, and their wits to work, and made another magnifying glass, many times more powerful than the last. This second magnifying glass was the power of scientific imagination and investigation. By these means it was discovered that the molecule contained particles of matter finer than any substance ever dreamed of! The molecule, in fact, contained the atom. Unbelievable! Extraordinary! It seemed useless to search farther, there could be nothing more. So the smallest box lay unopened. But progress does not stand still, and after about twenty years again the power of scientific investigation cleft the atom and there inside, were seen bobbing about, electrons and protons. The most minute division of matter; but of tremendous importance. For herein lay a secret evolution had never before divulged, and one that makes us understand a little of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's meaning, when He speaks of the elements now composing the body having passed through the lower kingdoms and there acquired characteristics and perfections that were impressed upon these indestructible elements, and by them carried forward from one state to another, from one generation to another.

It pushes back the narrow boundaries of our minds until we see vast horizons. It tells us, too, that while these elements are with us, we are impressing our own qualities upon them. Would it not be worth while if we left them charged with the love of God and of humanity? Is this not what the Prophets are begging us to do for those who come after us?

And what are we to conclude of science that has brought to light these secrets of nature? Bahá'u'lláh states that "Science and Religion are one," no longer separate, no longer against one another, but joined together. The Bahá'í Revelation teaches that the Prophets bring Light, making scientific discoveries possible; and that true religion and true science walk hand in hand.

 "In the mineral kingdom soul is called latent force.

In the vegetable kingdom virtue augmentative.

In the animal kingdom sense perception.

In the human kingdom the soul signifies rational being or mind. . . .

"The soul, like the intellect is an abstraction."*

Physical man is the final attainment of evolution. If we think at all, we conclude the body was intended for a high purpose since it has journeyed so far and been fashioned with such care. The Prophets tell us that the body is a vehicle and a companion of the soul during its earth life. 'Abdu'l-Bahá speaks of the soul as being abstract. We never catch a glimpse of it, any more than we do a message passing over a telegraph wire.

The qualities and elements that go to make up the soul are drawn together by the laws of affinity and heredity and come into being at the same time as the body, but the soul does not reside in the body, it cannot be found in the body any more than intelligence can be found in the brain, or affection seen by cutting open the human heart. The soul is connected with the body. 'Abdu'l-Bahá speaks of the body as the horse and the soul as the rider: sometimes the rider moves without a mount—meaning that the soul acts in the physical world with the aid of the body, but when freed, acts without it. Then when man dies, his relation with the body ceases. He also gives us this illustration. "The sun may be reflected in a mirror, but the sun does not enter the mirror; if the mirror is broken the sun does not die." So the soul reflects whatever is held up before it, as 'Abdu'l-Bahá goes on to explain:—"If the soul identifies itself with the material world it is dark. If it remains in this station and moves along these paths, it will be the receptacle of darkness, but if it becomes the recipient of grace, its darkness will be transformed into light." Remember that whatever you think and feel makes a picture that is reflected by the soul, just as your face may be seen in a still pool of water.

Very different laws govern our two companions. The body needs sleep, not so the soul. While you are safely tucked up in bed, the soul can go and come without fear of disturbing you. It can visit islands and lands beyond the sea that you have never seen. It needs no aeroplane to carry it aloft. As we know to our sorrow the body is subject to illness and injury, but not the soul. It never feels pain nor suffers physical loss.

After sharing many happy years together, the time comes when these two companions must part. The body fears death and so does the soul, unless it understands what death really is. "The breaking of the cage that sets free the bird," as 'Abdu'l-Bahá says. "The body is like an egg shell, when the chick comes forth the shell is broken up." Now the soul must prepare for a journey that is even longer than the one we have traced for the body.

*Divine Philosophy, 'Abdul-Baha.

Its work done, the body will sink down into the earth to rest. What can the soul take on this mysterious journey? It can take the knowledge and love of God, faith in the words of the Prophets, unselfish acts and pure thoughts that make up true individuality, as well as our intellectual attainment.

We want to know, more than anything else, if we remember this life. Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdul-Bahá tell us we do, and that we shall recognize one another and feel love and affection in all the worlds of God. Love is eternal—a reflection of God. If we have served our fellowman with tender kindness, our love for humanity leaves a shining track upon the earth that will point the path to God and reflect joy into countless hearts.

Bahá'u'lláh writes, "If any of us could realize what hath been assigned in the kingdom of God, the Lord of the throne and the dust, he would yearn with a great longing for that exalted holy and most glorious station."

"There is yet another, however, which must be differentiated from that of soul and mind. The third power is the spirit which is an emanation from the divine Bestower."*

'Abdu'l-Bahá has explained matter to us; how elements are drawn together and again separated to assume new forms. The form is constantly changing, but the elements that compose each form remain eternal.

In the human kingdom these elements are drawn together by a natural law—birth, and dissolved again by another natural law—death.

How then can man attain to immortality? It is because man possesses an element nowhere else in nature—a soul—which when filled and exalted by the light of the spirit attains to that exalted height of being which Bahá'u'lláh calls Life Eternal. It is spirit that lends wings to the soul. But the ray of spiritual light cannot enter our very being without our consent. Spirit is the light that penetrates the soul with each unselfish act. Doing God's will with joy and fragrance sets us free. If during life, you open the door of your heart, only a crack, then only a tiny little ray of light can enter, but should you open wide the door, a flood of light will pour into your heart and fill your whole being with radiance.

Something wonderful happens then! You have been baptized by the spirit. You have been born again, this time into the kingdom of heaven! You have received the second birth spoken of by the Prophets!

You remember what His Holiness, Jesus, said about giving a cup of water in His name that we have given it to Him. We do not have to do big things in order to please God. There are only two things necessary. That our intention should be free from self-interest, and that we give away our hearts with every gift.

Bahá'u'lláh speaks of this in The Seven Valleys, "When the owner of the house is at home in his own house (the heart), all the pillars of the heart are radiated and illuminated through the giver of light."

When does the ray enter the soul? Whenever you rush to the assistance of a little animal that is hurt, a helpless bird that God has placed under your care. When you have noble thoughts and aspirations, whenever you give the best to a comrade and keep the least for yourself, when you speak with candour and treat others with justice you are inviting the Celestial visitor, you are opening the door to the spirit. This is the way the soul fills with light and becomes eternal. Good deeds are like a drawbridge: they allow the spirit to pass over the dark moat of our animal nature. At first the bridge is let down momentarily and taken up again by the force of self. But each time the drawbridge is lowered, it remains down a little longer, until at last goodness weighs it down so heavily that spirit pours across continually.

Lovely pictures of eternal life have been painted by the Prophets of today. The pure spirit, they tell us, converses with the Prophets and saints of every age; journeys through space to other universes; is surrounded by beauty not to be imagined by our finite minds; experiences spiritual union with those loved; assists the children of earth and carries upwards prayer to the very gates of paradise. The pure spirit shall reach God, the destination and purpose of all creation. And in that bright morn we shall shine with a radiance more dazzling than the iridescent wings of angels.

“The face of nature is illumined—the grass, the stones, the hills and valleys shine; but they shine not of themselves, but because they reflect the rays of the sun. It is the sun which shines. In the same way, our minds reflect God. Those who live thinking good thoughts, doing good deeds, and with love in their hearts—the minds of these become ever clearer, reflecting more and more perfectly the love of God, while the minds of those who live in ignorance and desire are clouded and obscured and give forth His light but meagrely. . . . When in the course of evolution the stage of thought and reason has been reached, the human mind acts as a mirror reflecting the glory of God. . . . Life is eternal, but the individual human consciousness is not inherently so. It can only gain immortality by uniting with the pure Divine Essence. This union man may reach by a pure life and love for God and his fellow men.”

THE GREAT DISCOVERY

ESTHER DAVIS

IT was in my twenty-first year when the first marvelous vision came to me. I had been through a very sad experience, having been greatly deceived in one whom I dearly loved. The thought of going through life with the burden of confidence and love misplaced seemed more than I could bear.

Walking by the river and thinking of this painful event, the words came from my heart: "I cannot bear it. I shall not be able to live through it!"

Suddenly a wonderful thing happened! As I faced the river, and looked up to the heavens as if for help, the sky seemed to open. I saw the form of a man, an old man. At the same time, a ladder appeared, and it reached from the heavens to the earth. I thought the man was God. I then heard a voice, although there was no sound, and these words came from the man:

"Follow my commandments, walk in my paths, and all shall be well with thee."

Then I realized I was at the very bottom rung of the ladder.

To do what the voice advised seemed too great a task. It meant I should have to climb that great height from the low place whereon I stood. My poor little brain could not believe it would be possible to attempt so huge a task.

I said, "it is impossible. I cannot!"

The voice again spoke to my soul with soundless words:

"You can if you try."

Would that I could convey to my readers the power of those mighty words! So powerful were they, I felt they must be true.

I immediately responded, with great resolution: "I will try."

I turned from the river and retraced my steps homeward.

I was a changed being. Life from then on was different. Where before it was dark, now I beheld the light. I was happy, very happy. The question then came: "What shall I do? What course shall I pursue that would be pleasing in the sight of God?"

The thought came: "Study your own religion. It will teach you many things."

I had not been trained very much along religious lines up to this time. At heart I firmly believed in my religion, which was the Jewish faith. I felt that God was guiding my footsteps. His words were in my soul, lighting the path, making even the hard places easier. Prayer and supplication were great helps in changing some of the tendencies to which I inclined.

I found there were many obstacles in the path, much to be overcome in myself, sacrifices to be made.

I went into the homes of the poor. My deepest sympathies were with them and their problems. Giving to them the hand of love and guidance as far as I knew, the recompense was far greater than I could have imagined.

Many years have passed since then. Letters of gratitude still come to me from those who now have reached manhood and womanhood and were children at that time.

I studied long and hard in the faith of my fathers, keeping to the old traditions and customs with the utmost devotedness until suddenly the thought came to me: "Why not look into other faiths, go into other churches, make comparisons?"

The idea seemed strange, and novel; yet it persisted until I finally went to other places of worship outside of my own. I then realized I had been following the thoughts of others, many of which were old and outworn. I began the search for those pearls of great price, light and love, which I found not in any church.

I looked for the Light in the faces of those whom I met in the streets. I did not see it. It was then revealed to me that there was one on earth who was next to God. He would reveal all things to me and He would teach me. I could not speak of this revelation to anyone, thinking no one would understand. It was kept in my innermost being as a sacred, precious possession.

AND THEN, by some fortunate chance or destiny, I heard of Green Acre. It was at Atlantic City, on a visit, that I saw a notice in one of the shop windows of a Mrs. Dow Balliet giving lessons in psychology. I was strangely attracted, and went to see her. After meeting and speaking to her, she said to me, "You should go to Green Acre."

Never having heard of that place, I inquired where it was.

"If you write to Miss Sarah J.

Farmer, Eliot, Me., she will tell you and give all directions."

It seemed almost impossible at that time that I should be able to get so far from home. However, events turned out later on that made it not only possible to go, but enabled me to spend the summer there.

I shall never forget the first time I saw Miss Farmer on the platform in the attractive hall where the meetings were held. She was speaking at one of the large afternoon gatherings. Her words literally seemed like pearls and diamonds as they came from her lips. I loved her from the moment that I saw her there. We became great friends and were mutually attracted.

One evening she asked if I would attend a small meeting which she called "The Sunset Group." It was in the little cottage of Miss Mansfield, on the hill facing the beautiful Piscataqua river. Miss Farmer loved to sit on the porch of the cottage to view the sunsets that are so lovely at that spot.

We were a party of about six. I had never attended anything like it. We all sat silently watching that glowing ball of fire as it slowly disappeared over the water. After several moments of silence, each, one by one, gave a short spiritual message.

Each had given out what came to her through the spirit. It was time for me to say something. I was silent. Nothing had come to me. I felt stupid, empty; when suddenly the place seemed filled with a great light, and I saw an immense pair of wings and a hand seemed pushing me to arise, go forward to Miss Farmer, and tell her what I saw.

"Miss Farmer," I said, "I see an immense pair of wings over this place. They are especially over you, as if to protect you."

At that time I knew nothing of the difficulties that Miss Farmer was laboring under. She was trying to do more than her strength would allow, and in consequence was much troubled.

As I uttered the words she cried, "Oh, my child" (she always used that endearing term to me) "you are seeing the wings of the cherubim! It is my symbol! "See," pointing to the brooch she wore, with its outspreading wings, which I had not noticed, "put your hands upon me and give me the blessing, for you know not how much I need it."

Her voice was filled with anguish. It brought to me a keen sense of her suffering. After that evening there was an added bond between us. She never forgot that message, and, alluded to it many times. Later on, when her troubles seemed to grow greater, we had other spiritual experiences which I shall not dwell on at this time.

THE FOLLOWING summer Miss Farmer went abroad. In the course of her travels she met one who told her to go to 'Akká and consult a wise man who lived there.

Miss Farmer was much in need of advice regarding her plans for Green Acre. There seemed to be no one able to give her the required help. She resolved to see this wise man in the East. He might be the one who would solve her problem. Accordingly she went. But before going she made a list of questions regarding her needs; she would ask and might have them answered satisfactorily.

Miss Farmer's experience with 'Abdu'l-Bahá is a part of her history.

SARAH FARMER had not written to me, not one word, during her entire trip. I only knew she was in Europe. Spiritually, I was in close touch with her and realized she was exceedingly happy; yet knew not what had caused the change in her mental attitude.

Most eager was I to see her when the news came that she had arrived in New York and was stopping in the home of Miss Emma Thursby. I immediately went there. To my astonishment and regret I was told no one was allowed to see her. She had fallen, was hurt, and was ill in bed.

Miss Thursby assured me I would be one of the first to see her when she was able to have her friends; and in about two weeks I received a note saying Miss Farmer was much improved, I could see her. When I hastened there Miss Thursby told me that she was still quite weak and that three minutes must be the limit of my stay.

Upon entering her room, seeing her lying in the bed so white and helpless, I involuntarily exclaimed, "Oh, my dear! I don't understand!"

"What is it you do not understand, my child?" she asked,—looking up at me with a wonderful expression in her eyes, "Seeing you lying here so ill. I have been thinking of you being so happy."

"Oh, but I am happy, so very, very happy!"

“What is it?”

Her answer came: “I have seen Him.”

“TELL ME about Him,” I implored; for a dart of confirmation through the center of my being assured me she had seen The One who was with me in spirit.

She looked up at the little Swiss clock above her bed and said, “Only three minutes,” meaning I could be with her only that length of time. It was not possible to explain, then?

Again speaking, she said, “Take down this address,” and she gave me the name and address of Mr. Hooper Harris. “There is one who came over in the same steamer with me who is a guest there. His name is Raffie. He is a young Persian. Write to him. Ask if he will come here one week from today. You also come. I will introduce you. He shall tell you all about it.”

Reluctantly I left her. I was burning with the desire to hear and learn more, and could hardly await the time when more would be given me. I wrote at once to Mirza Raffie. He replied promptly. His letter began:

“My dear Sister Esther:

I shall gladly meet you at the place you mention, and give you the message that will bring joy to you and your family.”

His letter was signed, “Your brother, Mirza Raffie.”

Never had a letter brought such joy to me. He called me his “sister,” and signed himself, “your brother.” Why, this was the very thing I had been in search of—brotherhood and sisterhood of the human family!

I had looked in vain. Here it was at my door. How wonderful!

Mirza Raffie came as promised. Miss Farmer introduced him to me. He greeted me with a lovely smile. After a little conversation he began to read the prophecies in the Bible. I wondered why he did so, without explaining the great message I craved. There was a vital purpose in it. It was the beginning of a long series of talks and teachings which finally led to the fulfillment—the Coming of the Promised One.

IN THE October 1930, number of The Bahá’i Magazine, in the article, “Searching for Truth,” the author has beautifully expressed himself in these words: “The inspiration of those early days in the Bahá’i Cause was to me like the fresh and joyous hours of dawn, when the birds sing of the glories of God as expressed throughout His firmament, and the flowers sparkle with transcendent beauty in a fresh morning dew, undissipated by the heat of life.”

I testify to those statements.

We were on fire at that period. Each time a lesson was given, my feet were like wings carrying me to the place where I would receive the next part of the glorious message.

The following summer found me again at Green Acre. In the little cottage “Willowcote,” a small coterie consisting of “Mother Beecher,” Agnes Alexander, Young Raffie and myself were exceedingly happy.

How we worked and played together—work that seemed play, it was all so joyous. One night I was left alone. The rest had gone to an evening talk at the Inn. Thinking of this glorious Bahá'í Revelation, I saw myself on the edge of a mighty ocean whose broad expanse reached north, south, east and west.

It was the ocean of Truth, of Life, of Love. We all must become immersed in it some day. But now we were just at its border, as if playing with the pebbles on the beach. We little knew how great it would become. This wonderful Bahá'í message! Bringing on its wings the comforting assurance of the brotherhood of man, the oneness of God, the banishing of war, and the establishment of the Most Great Peace. Walking down the lane through the pasture one lovely day I sat down to rest beside the Piscataqua river.

It was all so quiet and peaceful, I thought of the second verse of the first chapter of Genesis: "And the spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters." Surely, He was in this place. His spirit was here. "Let there be light, and there was light." Yes, the Light had shed its radiance on this old earth, but never had the Light shone so powerfully for me. Its rays are penetrating the dark corners, the shadows are disappearing.

Light and Love, walking hand in hand. How wondrously changed will be the places where men dwell! They will see Light through the eyes of Love.

The ladder of life is still being climbed. Step by step we each must go, slowly making our way, until at last the topmost rung will be reached for "Man has been created for the knowledge of God and love of God," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "for the virtues of the human world, for spirituality, heavenly illumination and life eternal."

THE SEARCH ETERNAL

O Prophet Heart, that pulses life for me,
 Thru world on world my love shall search for Thee.
 I grope thru all the misty veils of space
 To trace the outline of Thy boundless grace.
 I climb the topmost peaks 'neath star-swept skies
 To glimpse the light reflected in Thine eyes.
 I wing my soul thru all the singing spheres
 To hear the same love-song Thy Soul endears.
 O Prophet Heart, Thy life-pulse sings to me;
 My list'ning heart eternally follows Thee.

COOPERATION—SPIRITUAL AND MATERIAL

BEATRICE IRWIN

Miss Irwin, who promises us a series of articles on "New Interpretations of Old Ideas," of which this is the first, is one of the foremost explorers in the realm of light and color in their effect upon the human emotions. She has worked out types of lights for certain emotional effects, and is the author of "Gates of Light," recently published in London.

A MODERN mystic has said that by constantly having fresh thoughts we preserve the youth of our bodies, and it is true that what interests us refreshes us physically as well as mentally.

The reason that religion to a growing extent is losing its hold on modern life, is that its method of presentation remains largely mediæval, and sets spiritual life and thought apart from daily existence, consequently people have acquired the habit of considering religion merely as a mental theory, an artistic formula apart from life, rather than an interwoven essential and a heartfelt cooperative fact!

Miss Beatrice Irwin

ONE OF THE MOST revivifying and vitalizing aspects of the Bahá'í Revelation is its presentation of religion as a cooperative liberator into a larger life, a constant invocation to the "investigation of reality," and to a fuller self-expression, through the use of the word do rather than the dont which is usually associated with religious ceremonial.

By calling upon each individual to be a priest unto himself, and to skillfully interweave the material and spiritual threads of existence, Bahá'u'lláh has freed religion into a more mature cooperation with life, and has provided a definite method for the creation of a new pattern in our spiritual consciousness. This glorious pattern is embodied in the word Unity.

Perhaps we use that word a trifle too glibly, and without realizing what a difficult and awe-inspiring ideal it contains! However, the Báb, Bahá'u'llah and 'Abdu-l-Baha, have provided us with a magic lamp of guidance with which to illumine the obscure and arduous road! That lamp is cooperation—material and spiritual; for this principle animates the basic ideals of the Bahá'í Revelation. Let us consider how its rays function in material realization.

In (1) universal religious tolerance we find the spiritual cooperation of religions demanded. (2) In the establishment of International Parliaments the material cooperation of nations. (3) In the union of science with religion the cooperation of two different methods of expressing much of the same Truth. (4) In the equality of sex the material and spiritual cooperation of human rights.

From this four-square tower of cooperative strength rises the reality of the Bahá'í Revelation, though but a few stones of its future structures can yet be discerned.

It is an ironic fact that at the moment, Geneva, India, Egypt, the Holy Land and Britain, are all talking cooperation, but achieving no results, for the reason mentally and nationally—which means materially—that this principle is neither understood nor practiced, and therefore morally or spiritually it is impossible of achievement. In short, it is better if possible, for deeds always to precede words.

Biology and psychology show us that a material cooperation between mind and body is necessary before the Spirit can cooperate with either. In other words the spirit demands a highly organized physical instrument. Christ said—“Be ye perfect even as the Father.” Bahá'u'lláh said—“Possess a good, a pure, an enlightened heart that thou mayst possess a kingdom eternal, immortal, ancient and without end.” Both these utterances proclaim that material and spiritual cooperation are interdependent and indivisible. History also proves the truth of this statement for during different epochs spiritual ideals have been demonstrated by material cooperation and activity.

The middle ages were dominated by religion, the Renaissance by art and beauty, the nineteenth century by progress, and our day by human unity, towards which we are struggling through a clamoring diversity whose very intensity only makes the need for unity more keenly seen and felt.

The world-body of Bahá'ís as well as individual Assemblies cannot expect to entirely escape the influence of this world unrest and questioning, but in struggle there is growth, and growth is conducive to fruit.

Bringing the question of cooperation from the nation, through the Assemblies down to the individual, I believe that as intimate a knowledge as possible of each other's lives and conditions is essential to the correct basic understanding from which thorough cooperation develops.

'Abdu'l-Bahá always said, it is not enough to contact each other at meetings; we should visit with each other whenever we can, for by so doing we gain a clearer insight of the gifts, limitations, privileges, penances and responsibilities that constitute the working capacity of any life, and by recognizing these are in a position to ask both more and less of each other. Equipped with this clear understanding we can more readily give ourselves like glowing threads to Love's shuttle, which is ever working out the cooperative design that is the glory of the Master's plan.

Spiritual solidarity is the result of spiritual understanding, and this fine flower of attractive fragrance can and does only grow from a material cooperation based on rational demands and a loving appreciation. So in spite of the rush and turmoil of existence we shall always gain by making time and opportunities to know each other better; above everything glad of each others' gifts, for their very diversity is essential to the cooperative plan which is fitting us to enter first the Bahá'í unity and then into that vaster world unity of which Bahá-'u'lláh has commanded us to be builders, the builders of a new civilization!

“Know that a heart wherein lingers the least trace of envy cannot enter My presence. * * * “Ye are all the leaves of one tree, the drops of one sea.” * * * “Consort with all the people of the world with perfect love and fragrance.” In these three utterances of Bahá-'u'lláh, we find the principle and the philosophy of material and spiritual cooperation comprehensively expressed for the individual, for the community and for the world!

Briefly then let us crystalize the result of these observations upon the advantages of cooperation and the disadvantages of individualism.

Individualism develops a narrow and (1) egotistical outlook on life.

(2) It creates fear and suspicion of others through a lack of the understanding of facts. (3) It has a tendency to encourage avarice, which is the result of fear; and a lack of generosity, which is a perversion of the possessive instinct. (4) It induces an aversion to new experiences, and in so doing limits our knowledge of life and of our powers and limitations.

Cooperation on the other hand (1) develops an unselfish, enquiring and tolerant attitude towards life. (2) Through the intelligent understanding of facts that cooperation brings, confidence is established in ourselves and in others, and a desire to be just in our dealings. (3) This desire develops first discrimination, then good judgment, and finally a sense of spiritual values. (Not until we have arrived at this point is real spiritual cooperation possible!) (4) The necessary friction and mental flexibility that cooperation entails, results in breadth of outlook and an approximately sincere knowledge of other people's and one's own mental and moral resources, and limitations.

Each individual can direct the habitual attitude of his mind, but the grand keynote inspired by the Bahá'í Teachings, is that of cooperation-material and spiritual.

“If the oneness of the human world were established all the differences which separate mankind would be eradicated. Strife and warfare would cease and the world of humanity would find repose. Universal Peace would be promoted and the East and West would be conjoined in a strong bond. All men would be sheltered beneath one tabernacle. Nativities would become one; races and religions be unified. The people of the world would live together in harmony and their well-being would be assured.”

CIVILIZATION, RACE, AND INTELLIGENCE

STANWOOD COBB

EVERY race of any achievement tends to develop a racial vanity which in current opinion relegates all other races to an inferior place.

Thus the Greeks at the height of their power and achievement and forgetting or unaware of former centuries when they as a rude and uncivilized people acquired all their arts of civilization from foreign races—applied the term “barbarous” without discrimination to all nations who were strangers to the language and manners of the Greeks. The Romans, borrowing the word, applied it in like manner to all hostile nations beyond the pale of the Roman empire and civilization. In medieval times the term was applied to those outside the civilization of Christianity, despite the fact that the Islamic and Chinese civilizations were in the early centuries of the medieval period far superior to Christian civilization. So likewise the Chinese called barbarians all peoples not natives of the Celestial Kingdom.

The implication that races not expressing the same type of civilization as one’s own are lower in intelligence and capacity, inheres in all manifestations of racial vanity.

Pride is natural in any race or nation which has achieved a significant culture. But a pride that entails as corollary a contempt of other races and an assumption of inherent racial superiority based on biological factors, is unjustifiable in the light of historic and scientific fact; and is an obstruction to human progress in the light of the pressing need in this age for a real interracial sympathy and amity based upon the realization of deep-seated similarities and the general equalities of human capacity and potentiality regardless of nation or race.

Those races or nations which manifest a too evident superiority complex may find enlightenment in the realization that other races in the past have been in the vanguard of humanity and that in all probability the future will disclose new racial and national leaderships.

To despise or relegate to the category of inherent inferiority races who having achieved mightily for civilization have fallen into a decrepitude, or races in the callow stage who are but adolcescing into civilization, is as ludicrous as for a man in the prime of life to decry and disdain the intelligence of the senescent, or of the budding youth.

In other words, the races and nations of the planet live in a time cycle, as do individuals, and like individuals they have in general their period of rude and energetic childhood, their period of ripe fruition and achievement, and their period of decline.

PLAINLY the civilization prowess of any given race or nation is not dependent upon innate racial superiority of intelligence but upon other less easily determined factors. For if racial achievement were dependent chiefly upon the factor of intelligence, then such cultural achievement would continue so long as the racial strain continued.

But such is not the case. Once a given race takes on a new configuration, due to internal or external forces of disruption, the racial achievement ceases even though the race continues in the same biological strain.

Thus the Egyptian fellaheen, though of the same race today as the peasants who tilled the banks of the Nile in the days of the Pyramids, have not for three millenniums borne cultural fruitage.

And the Greeks, since the Silver Age of the Mediterranean Basin, have ceased to express themselves in glorious forms of art and logic and intellectual creativeness.

The peoples who constitute the brilliant Islamic civilization which next to the Greeks held up the torch of science and learning to the world—they too, though still surviving as to biologic strain have not for centuries given birth to one iota of knowledge or cultural progress. Yet who shall say that their inherent capacity is less today than it was when Muhammed and His immediate successors blew slumbering embers of racial genius into fires which lit the world?

Well might the Arabs of the ninth, tenth and eleventh centuries have looked with contempt upon the half-barbarous and almost wholly rustic civilization of Europe in comparison with their superb cities, their richly productive industries, their scientific agriculture and horticulture, their world trade, their universities, hospitals, and advanced medical science. Today the relative values of these two civilizations are exactly reversed. Yet Europe is composed of the same races today as then, and the Islamic world with the exception of Turkoman invasions is also essentially the same in race.

WE MUST not fail to distinguish at all times between the existing cultural status of any race, and its native intelligence and capacity. The latter cannot be judged on the grounds of the former.

Could the world have foreseen in 1850 the Japan of today? One doubts whether even the most perspicacious of Americans or Europeans realized in the Japanese of the Shogunate period the capacity for industrial and technological progress which they have evidenced since suddenly emerging from feudalism into a nationalism determined to vie successfully with Occidental nations. Yet as regards native intelligence, the Japanese were the same then as now and are the same now as then.

It is evident that one cannot judge capacity by status nor compare the intelligence of races on the sole grounds of known achievement. Nor can one safely in judgment limit any race as regards its future development.

MODERN biology and psychology do not warrant the assumption of any vital differences of intelligence as inherent biologically in race as such.

"Science can find no evidence whatever that one race is inherently less intelligent than another," says John Langdon Davies in his "New Age of Faith." This negative kind of proof nevertheless deserves consideration.

My education work with pupils of many races at Robert College, Constantinople, left me with the conviction that intelligence is a matter of individual, not racial difference. In one class a Greek might lead in scholarship, in another an Armenian, a Bulgarian, or a Turk.

As these youths of the Near East, coming from environments of the utmost cultural simplicity not to say ignorance and superstition, took up their lives in the collegiate intellectual environment of the twentieth century they began to approximate to a cultural pattern which was above nationality, race, or creed—the pattern of the modern scientific civilization which dominates the Occidental world. Many of these Oriental students, continuing their education in the universities of Europe or of America, came still nearer to the universal type of modern culture. And some of these, settling into professional work in the countries of their educational adoption, have become naturalized citizens so to speak in the realm of scientific knowledge and practice in which they now live, fully abreast as regards achievement with their Occidental neighbors.

A very interesting psychological study of immigrant children at Ellis Island has been carried on since 1923 by Dr. Bertha M. Boody, executive secretary of the Y. W. C. A. of New York City and formerly dean of Radcliffe College. This investigation of the mentality of the immigrant stream as it reaches the doors of the United States, carried out by means of tests which eliminate language as an obstacle factor—gives very interesting results as regards comparison among the immigrant races tested, and also between the intelligence of these immigrants and of average American school children of equal age. Children were selected for those tests because it was felt that their reactions would be less conditioned and restrained by folk-ways than that of adults.

The races tested were numerous enough to allow for rather universal conclusions. Italian, Polish, German, Russian, French, Armenian, Spanish, Hungarian, Jugoslavic, Czecho-Slovak, Swedish, Danish, Greeks, Swiss, Albanian, Chinese, Belgian, Lithuanian, Arab, Dutch, and Negroes from the British West Indies.

"The differences indicated by these tests" concludes Dr. Boody, "seem to be individual rather than in race or nationality as such—. In any one test, or in the case of one individual as compared to another, there may be apparent distinctions; but as the study goes on, day after day, the records, as far as race is concerned, seem to even themselves.

"There may be examples of low mentality or of high powers, but for them to be located as belonging to one race as set off against another, the actual tabulated results do not seem to allow. Individual differences there are in great numbers; but the curve of the scores seems not to differ in any marked degree from race to race, nor does it differ markedly, with possibly a slight allowance for differences in the strain of examination conditions, from the curves shown in studies of unselected groups of American children.”

AS REGARDS those periodic manifestations of human intelligence, energy, and genius which through the impetus of the Divine Power create great periods of civilization, we find upon close study that they are national rather than racial in scope.

And nationality is a psychologic, not a biologic fact. No historic races we know of were pure at the time of their highest creative work for civilization, unless we except the Egyptians. The greatest cultural achievements of Mesopotamia came from repeated mixtures between Sumerians, Arcadians, and other Semitic races. The beginning of creative development in the Greek race occurred in the islands and coastal cities of Asia Minor, where for centuries there had been a mingling of races. Rome, at her height, was a true racial melting pot. The Islamic civilization of the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries was so heterogeneous as regards race that the term “Arabic” can hardly be applied to a culture which included Persians, Syrians, Greeks, Moors, and Turkomen as well as Egyptians. Nor can one strictly designate as “Islamic” that great flowering of civilization to which Jews and Christians contributed as fully as Moslems. Yet this civilization, so heterogeneous as regards race and religion, was most homogeneous as regards its culture. And America—newest type of creator of civilizations—is not a race in any sense of the word, but rather an idea toward which certain types of temperament and mentality have been gravitating from all the countries and races of Europe for three hundred years.

IN FACT, it is far easier and simpler, in considering the causal factors of civilization, to speak of nationality rather than of race. For the groups now called races are nothing but peoples made brethren by civilization more than by blood. And since nationality is in essence psychological—the true causes for great historic outbursts of civilization must be sought in the realms of spiritual dynamics, of psychology and sociology rather than in the realm of biology.

Civilization being a matter of environment and ideology rather than of race, depending on spiritual, psychological and social causes, it is hazardous to pass judgment as to relative inferiority or superiority of intelligence or capacity of different races or nations on the ground of present achievement, or of the lack of past achievement.

“As the behavior of an individual depends, certainly in some measure upon the training he receives at the hands of parents, playmates, teachers and social environment in general, so the cultural behavior of families, groups, tribes and nations,” says Dorsey, “is dependent upon historic and psychological factors never in any way proved to be heritable traits. What any individual family or physical type could or would do under different geographic and social environmental conditions is something which no one at present is warranted in asserting dogmatically.”

How do civilizations come into being? What causes a given locality to flower out into amazing creativeness, setting new world patterns for living? The fundamental origins are mysterious, and must be sought in the world of Reality and Spirit, which is ever overshadowing, guiding and stimulating the phenomenal world. But the process is quite capable of analysis. It is observable historically that the occasion of a great civilization is the growing wealth and prosperity of a youthful and vigorous people which under the stimulus of a great Ideal and the guidance of great leaders suddenly begins to flower forth in new and unforeseen patterns.

While the impetus to each new civilization epoch is thus given to some special city or nation, the development of the civilization is through a prosperous civic or national center becoming a focus of opportunity, a vortex drawing irresistibly to it men of high ability, initiative, and enterprise from surrounding lands. This immigrant talent contributes no small part to the victorious achievements of the favored nucleus, and the total result is the expression of the highest genius of a geographical unit which is as large as human contacts of the period permit.

The spirit of the locality or nation, exerting an esoteric influence, becomes a catalysis enabling the world civilization of the epoch to combine with its natural environment in such a way as to produce new creative forms and modes of life. It is as if the God of Michael Angelo's Creation reached down successively to the slumbering clay of Adam, and inspired it with a divine afflatus.

And just as at its period of highest prosperity genius from all surrounding lands flock to a favored focal point which has become the stage for the world's contemporaneous power of leadership; so when the national energy wanes and prosperity drops bit by bit away the leaders and bold spirits forsake the ship of state which they see to be slowly sinking and foregather to some newly rising center where opportunity again is rich.

Thus national vigor, industry, prosperity and intelligence is a centripetal force drawing all to it; while national decadence, decrepitude and senility not only lack all magnetism to attract but even tend to become centrifugal and dispersive of its native genius.

Cycles of national greatness thus repeat themselves in successive racial centers. Each race, each nation, each people has its destiny of growth, of fruition, of decline, and of senescence which in sheltered peoples becomes a sort of quiescent immortality. For a race never dies.

Sometimes, after a long hibernation, a new life springs up within an ancient race and there appears a recrudescence of racial vitality and achievement. Thus the Italians have had two periods of greatness—one in the Roman Age and one in the Renaissance; and they give signs of vitality today which hints at the possibility of a third cycle. The Semitic race perennially blossoms forth into greatness, but always in new nationalistic groups. China, most remarkable example of racial continuity, has had at least three periods of high creative civilization.

It SEEMS clear, then, that achievement or lack of achievement cannot form a basic test of the native intelligence of any race.

In fact, the time has come when we should judge men as individuals, regardless of race. We must give up the habit of pigeon-holing the different races, assigning fixed racial attributes to them, as to say, such and such a race is honest or dishonest, brave or cowardly, intelligent or unintelligent. Rather let us look upon all men as brothers, and realize that what any particular individual of the human race is today is largely the result of geographic and social environment, training, education and opportunity.

Let us see all humans as the Truth revealed to us today teaches us, then we shall see all as equally needful of our love and of the hand of brotherhood free from superciliousness. Among the many instructions on this subject given to us by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, are these illumined words:

“The one all-loving God bestows His divine grace and favor on all mankind; one and all are servants of the Most High and His goodness, mercy and loving kindness are showered upon all His creatures. The glory of humanity is the heritage of each one, as the Holy Writings tell us: all men are equal before God. He is no respecter of persons.

“Prejudices of religion, race or sect destroy the foundation of humanity. All the divisions in the world—hatred, war and bloodshed, are caused by one or the other of these prejudices. The whole world must be looked upon as one single country, all the nations as one nation, all men as belonging to one race. . . . We must obey God and strive to follow Him by leaving all our prejudices and bringing about peace on earth.”

“The Light of Truth has heretofore been seen dimly through variegated glasses, but now the splendors of divinity shall be visible through the translucent mirrors of pure hearts and spirits. The Light of Truth is the divine teaching, heavenly instruction, merciful principles and spiritual civilization.

“In Persia among the various religions and sects there were intense differences. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared in that country and founded the spiritual civilization. He established affiliation among the various peoples, promoted the oneness of the human world and unfurled the banner of the ‘Most Great Peace.’ He wrote special epistles covering these facts to all the kings and rulers of nations. . . . Therefore spiritual civilization is progressing in the Orient and oneness of humanity and peace among the nations is being accomplished step by step.”

THE MEANS OF ECONOMIC RELIEF

DR. ALBERT D. HEIST

Has science any means of relief to offer for the present economic woes of mankind? Undoubtedly science is a great servant of mankind, but science must be illumined by a noble purpose. What this purpose is the author makes clear in the following article.

THIS is a Day of vital expectancy. The unmarked trail lies ahead, alive with thrilling uncertainties, the future hopeful. The world is endeavoring to find some means of relief from the distracting burden of economic grief and adversity which has enthralled it. To many minds it seems as if the present civilization is but a terrible tragic ferment of conflicting ideas, ideals and standards of value, an intense and universal struggle not only of nations but of words, thoughts and ideas. Ignorance and prejudice parade in the guise of intelligence, and it seems as if the majority has not learned to place emphasis on the things of the spirit, rather than on things earthly. This is apparently the condition of the lowlands of life where crime, selfishness, prejudice and superstition prevail.

But to other minds there has come a realization that we are living in the morning of a New Day, that the rays of the Glorious Sun of Truth are casting their luminous rays on the highlands where intelligent hope dispels fear and anxiety. They have caught the vision. With conviction and assurance they heed the Words of the Divine Revelator of this New Age.

There are many evidences in the world today, which indicate that some Power is directing the thoughts and actions of those true servants of humanity who sacrifice time, thought and energy to discover the eternal laws and spiritual values of this great universe. To them greatness is translated in terms of usefulness—a real deep and abiding service to mankind, in the fields where personal gifts and qualifications permit.

In many avenues of human endeavor, we may also recognize a progressive effort toward the consummation of a great purpose, that of establishing a Divine order of peace and unity. A brief resume of a few more recent developments in the fields of human thought and activity are presented.

II

The New Day of Science and Religion: In an age when we are surrounded by the marvels of science, when each day new powers are harnessed to the chariot of civilization, the human mind is tempted to accept the methods and means of science only to deliver us from the present difficulties.

Science has triumphed over many physical barriers; it has extended human vision; quickened the hearing, so that we may catch whispers from the antipodes; and by means of electrical and mechanical development it has added immeasurably to the power of human achievement. It has built huge steamships that sail the seven seas, and constructed means of transportation which are marvels for safety and speed. Applied science has developed many conveniences and advantages for modern life, but we cannot go to the laboratory for a solution of social and industrial difficulties; and when it comes to the problem of the adjustment of relationships between nations, science must confess its inadequacy.

But scientists are realizing that all invention and discovery must be directed towards that goal where humanity is benefitted in a larger sense than mere material satisfaction. The fact that scientific research in its effort to comprehend the law of matter leads but to the realm of the spiritual, is becoming more evident. New values are being determined, and these values arise in an object or activity when it is discovered to possess the possibility of influencing life in a wholesome way. A wholesome life must have capacity to recognize spiritual and moral values. As representative of such may be mentioned good will, kindness, fellowship, faith, hope, sincerity and many other attributes. When these may touch life with beneficence, they have value. To contribute to the spiritual satisfaction of man seems to be the ultimate purpose of pure science.

IN CONSIDERING some of the statements which have recently been made by some of our prominent scientists, we note this definite tendency.

At the conclusion of his presidential address, before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, Dr. Robert Milliken said: "Acceptable and demonstrable facts do not, in this twentieth century, seem to be disposed to wait on suitable mechanical pictures. Indeed has not modern physics thrown the purely mechanistic view of the universe root and branch out of the house."

In "Science and Civilization" by the same author are these words: "Science has laid the foundations for a new and stupendous advance in man's conception of God, for a sublime view of the world, and of man's place and destiny in it."

In accord with this thought Sir Arthur Eddington has given expression to this: "The universe seems to be rather like a great thought than a great machine."

While others may be quoted, we may add another very interesting idea recently described by Dr. Whitney,—“there is no rational description of the ultimate cosmic motion except the Will of God.” Thus we learn that Science is recognizing the ultimate possibility and trend of the evolutionary process toward a more perfect adaptation between material form and life.

“Everywhere throughout creation a purpose is working out, a will towards perfection is manifesting. That purpose and that power are controlled by love and wisdom, and those two types of energy—the purpose of spirit and the attractive force of the soul—are intelligently applied to the perfecting of the matter aspect. Spirit, soul and body—a divine triplicity—manifest in the world and will carry all forward towards a consummation that is pictured for us in the scriptures of the world in a wealth of imagery of color and of form.'*"

In all modern effort at research the spirit of expectancy and hope prevails; and with the accumulated knowledge, and experiences of the past, man is striving for a greater cosmic consciousness, in the humble realization that present equipment and understanding of the human being and of his relation to the Universal is so inadequate. Western thinkers feel that they are at the threshold of a great Revelation, when the curtain of uncertainty will lift and a larger view be obtained of the next step higher. This idea has found expression in "Leaves of Grass" (Whitman)—

"Hurrah for positive science! Long live exact demonstration! . . .
 "Your facts are useful, and yet they are not my dwelling,
 "I but enter by them to an area of my dwelling."

PROMPTED by the scientific investigations and with the acceptance of such important truths, there will emerge a new race, with new capacities, new ideals, new concepts of God and of matter, with a better comprehension of life and spirit. Through that new race and through humanity of the near future, there is bound to come a better understanding of races, nations and peoples, an understanding which is motivated by the divine principles of love, wisdom and mutual cooperation.

How true are the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

"The greatest attainment in the world of humanity has ever been scientific in nature. It is the discovery of the reality of things . . . Science ever tends to the illumination of the world of humanity. It is the cause of eternal honor to man, and its sovereignty is far greater than the sovereignty of kings. The dominion of kings has an ending, the king himself may be dethroned; but the sovereignty of science is everlasting and without end."

III

The New Day in Psychology and Religion (Oriental and Occidental). A great parable is being taught today. A miracle is happening, but we may be too near to appreciate its meaning and influence.

The growing interest in and understanding of the Oriental mind by the Western people and the consequent altering relations between them, indicates that some subtle influence is operating in the world today.

The difference between the way in which the Western people have represented the East to themselves in the past, and the real East, may be likened to the difference between "Faust" of Gounod, and the real "Faust" of Goethe. The first being but an expression, melodramatic tears and terror for the crowd; the latter a creative philosophy comprehended only by the few.

The day of the missionary, gunboat policy is gone. The West is no longer imposing its commercial policies and military systems upon the East. A new understanding is apparent. The veils of misinterpretation and misconception are being penetrated. The West no longer regards with awe and mistrust the idiomatic literature of the East as a strange and confusing jargon of poetical expression steeped in self-mystification, but accepts many phases of Eastern thought not as a challenge but as an illumination.

*"The Soul and its Mechanism" (Bailey).

On the other hand the Eastern mind no longer assumes an attitude of apparent indifference to the scientific literature of the West, but endeavors to comprehend the significance and utility of that scientific knowledge.

Thus old antagonisms are vanishing, and out of a mutual interdependence there is developing a new consciousness—that of an essential unity.

“Praise be to God! The infinite bounty of God hath resuscitated the whole world,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá “and the East and the West have become united with the bond of the summons of God. . . . Today the call of the Kingdom of God hath reached the hearing of the far and near of all the continents of the world and the standard of the solidarity of mankind is held aloft by the grasp of the Divine Power.”

WHEN WE endeavor to ascertain some of the causes which have led to a better understanding of these peoples, we find that in the realm of religion and psychology a common note is being struck. Western psychology has wandered in that borderland of the unseen, which like some other sciences seems to converge towards some no-man’s-land on the indefinable. Its terminology has led to confusion and misunderstanding. Dignified words such as energy which could not be clearly defined as meaning nervous, atomic or vital, and force which had no common meaning, implying etheric vibrations, electrical currents or freely floating power, are the producers of violent discord. A study of the latest literature on psychology emanating from the many and varied schools in Europe and America shows that the majority were primarily concerned with endorsing or rejecting the mechanistic philosophy of the Behavioristic

School. In the “Mansion of Philosophy” (Durant) the picture is very ably presented:

“Psychology has hardly begun to comprehend much less to control, human conduct and desire; it is mingled with mysticism and metaphysics, with psycho-analysis, behaviorism, glandular mythology and other diseases of adolescence.”

Thus the West, has its dissenting voices, but a new school has appeared. It may be termed the introspective school of psychology, sometimes called the introspectionist and also the mentalist. In contradistinction to the older materialistic philosophy it admits the fact of consciousness and assumes a conscious entity, as Dr. Leary defines it in “Modern Psychology:”

“The introspectionist is interested in consciousness, awareness, awareness of awareness, the self, the “I” images, and all sorts of other things that the behaviorist of strict training and rigid technology, scorns, ignores or denies.

“The mentalists insist that psychological activity is not the mere reflection of physical activity, that over and above the body and the brain there is something different, on a different level, call it mind, spirit, consciousness, what you will. Thought is not the functioning of matter.”

As compared with the Eastern thought, which is inclined towards the spiritual and transcendental, the Mentalist group of the West appears like a hazy reflection of the oriental idea—an idea which assumes that a soul and a spirit is the fundamental life and energy which vitalizes form and structure.

The venerable scriptures of India have expressed this thought from time immemorial. In the "Bhagavad Gita" we read:

"The Supreme Spirit, here in the body, is called the Beholder, the Thinker, the Upholder, the Taster, the Lord, the Highest Self.

"Illuminated by the power that dwells in all the senses, yet free from all sense-powers, detached, all supporting, not divided into powers, yet enjoying all powers.

"Without and within all beings, motionless, yet moving, not to be perceived is That, because of its subtlety, That stands afar, yet close at hand.

"These temporal bodies are declared to belong to the eternal lord of the body, imperishable, immeasurable.

"They say the sense powers are higher than objects; than the sense powers, emotion is higher; than emotion, understanding is higher; but higher than understanding is He."

Here we learn that the Oriental Psychology deals with the Cause, the Creator, the self, and teaches that the lesser self merges with the Greater Self, in whom all live and move and have their being.

Thus there seems a gradual fusion of the East and the West in the realm of psychological thought. The West with its scientific knowledge about form and structure, is approaching to the point of recognizing that the true self is the conscious divine soul, with an awareness of its physical existence, while the East is becoming cognizant that the physical is the vehicle through which the Spirit demonstrates its energizing power. It is evident that the combination of materialistic and introspective philosophies will play an important part in harmonizing the East and the West which leads to unity and reality.

"The melody of the East has made joyous and happy the Western World, and the song of the West has penetrated the ears of the Eastern people," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

A New Day has dawned in the World.

The great hope of the Ages is being fulfilled, Science and Religion are cooperating to establish a closer relationship between people and nations. New discoveries and new truths are solving many of the old problems mitigating against the possibility of that Unity and Accord which Prophets and poets have visioned and which is the great keynote of the most illustrious master of all ages.

But in completed man begins anew
A tendency to God. Prognostics told Man's near approach; so in man's self arise
August anticipations, symbols, types
Of a dim splendor ever on before
In that eternal circle life pursues.
For men begin to pass their nature's bound,
And find new hopes and cares which fast supplant
Their proper joys and griefs; they grow too great For narrow creeds of right and wrong, which fade
Before the unmeasured thirst for good; while peace
Rises within them ever more and more. . .
"Paracelsus" (Browning)

Thus we are standing expectantly at the dawn of a New Day. It seems as if mankind were standing before a curtain in a cosmic proscenium, eagerly waiting for the rising of the curtain when there will be revealed the next drama of human life with the expectation that the promised land of man's hopes and dreams will be realized.

With his long past history of experiences and accumulated knowledge man has come to a point where his progress is stayed and baffled by many obstacles. In this apprehensive condition he feels the need of a great guiding Personality who will lead on toward the Promised Land of international harmony, racial accord, scientific-religious cooperation, and many other needful principles which will ultimately lead him upward and onward.

Bahá'u'lláh teaches us that:

"In that Day there is no refuge for any save the Command of God and no salvation for any soul but God. . . .

Hasten, O People unto the Shelter of God, in order that He may protect you from the heat of the Day whereon none shall find for himself any refuge or shelter whatsoever except beneath the Shelter of His Name, the Clement, the Forgiving."

MEDICAL HISTORY AND THE ART OF HEALING

ZIA M. BAGDADI, M. D.

In this, the author's concluding chapter in his series under the above title, a vital comment on the art of material and spiritual healing is continued from the previous chapter, with the addition of many helpful instructions from the writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

ONE of the problems in the scientific world today is the existence of so many different schools of medicine and healing institutions everywhere. One might say, "the more the better." True, the more the better if they would accept the truth in each and not be antagonistic to one another. Instead of being blessings to mankind, often these great institutions are the cause of utter confusion to the minds. Their conflicting methods, their contradictory theories, and their lack of sympathy toward each other, have puzzled the public and made it very difficult for many who are not well informed as to whom the sick should go for relief. The unnecessary sufferings of human beings, and the death rate will be very much lessened when the medical profession becomes more spiritualized and the public is more illumined by turning to the Source of knowledge and mercy, heeding the advice and exhortation of the Divine physician of the day.

ALTHOUGH IN the previous article, the subject of material and spiritual healing was somewhat fully explained in accordance with the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, here again His own words are quoted from His writings, that the reader's memory may once more be refreshed and this vital topic be better understood.

"There are two ways of healing sickness, by material means and by spiritual means. The first is by the use of remedies, of medicines; the second consists in praying to

God and in turning to Him. Both means should be used and practiced.

“Illness caused by physical accidents should be treated with medical remedies, those which are due to spiritual causes disappear through spiritual means. Thus an illness caused by affliction, fear, nervous impressions will be healed by spiritual rather than by physical treatment. Hence both kinds of remedies should be considered. Moreover, they are not contradictory, and thou shouldst accept the physical remedies as coming from the mercy and favor of God, who hath revealed and made manifest medical science so that His servants (creatures) may profit from this kind of treatment also. Thou shouldst give equal attention to spiritual treatments, for they produce marvelous effects.”

The above message was from 'Abdu'l-Bahá to a doctor who had not decided to which school he should belong—medical or spiritual. The substance of the answer to him is of course both.

In the previous article, the advice given by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to a group of medical students at Beirut was mentioned. His further advice and instructions to old and young doctors and patients as well in America, are here quoted; and indeed they might well constitute the light of guidance to all conscientious physicians, the means of their true success, and the path that leads to physical and spiritual health.

“For the physician the first qualifications are—good intentions, trustworthiness, tenderness, sympathy for the sick, truthfulness, integrity and the fear of God. With life and heart strive thou to be both a spiritual and physical physician.”

“O THOU son of the Kingdom! If one possesses the love of God everything that he undertakes is useful, but if the undertaking is without the love of God, then it is harmful and the cause of veiling one's self from the Lord of the Kingdom. But with the love of God every bitterness is changed into sweetness and every gift becometh precious. For instance, a musical melodious voice imparteth life to an attracted heart, but lureth toward lust those souls who are engulfed in passion and desire.

“With the love of God all sciences are accepted and beloved, but without it, are fruitless, nay, rather the cause of insanity. Every science is like unto a tree; if the fruit of it is the love of God, that is a blessed tree. Otherwise it is dried wood and finally a food for fire.”

“O THOU sincere servant of the True One and the spiritual physician of the people! Whenever thou presentest thyself at the bed of a patient turn thy face toward the Lord of the Kingdom and supplicate assistance from the Holy Spirit and heal the ailments of the sick one.”

To A YOUNG physician. “Now experience is necessary in order to attain skill and proficiency. The greatest of all these is the confirmation and the power of the favor of the Blessed Perfection. [Bahá'u' lláh]. I am hopeful that also will be thine.”

THE SYMPATHETIC nerve is an important factor in a balanced health. This strange nerve which springs into branches from small bulb-like glands, called ganglions, all along the human spinal cord from the neck down to the end of the spinal column or back bone, to supply the internal vital organs, is still a mystery to most of the doctors today. It has a relation between body and soul. It controls the heart, the morals and all emotions. It is a great factor in health and happiness. For example, when a particle of dust enters the eye, it causes irritation of the sensitive nerves which control the lachrymal gland—the tear-producing gland—and the eye is filled with tears. On the other hand, the mere seeing or hearing of a real sad tragedy, gives the same effect, namely, acts upon the sympathetic nerve which in turn agitates the lachrymal gland and causes the eye to shed tears. This goes to prove how this nerve controls human emotions. In the following paragraph 'Abdu'l-Bahá tells the doctors in a few words what this nerve is and how and when its marvelous function could be better understood.

“The powers of the Sympathetic Nerve are neither entirely physical nor spiritual, but are between the two. The nerve is connected with both. Its phenomena shall be perfect when its spiritual and physical relations are normal. When the material world and the divine world are well correlated, when the hearts become heavenly and the aspirations grow pure and divine, perfect connection shall take place. Then shall this power produce a perfect manifestation. Physical and spiritual diseases will then receive absolute healing.”

IN ALL my life I have never seen any one who practiced and believed in prayers more than Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. How well I remember those early hours before the dawn when I became awakened by 'Abdu'l-Bahá's melodious voice praying and supplicating in behalf of His loved friends everywhere. On one occasion while He was occupying one room and I another next to that of Bahá'u'lláh's in 'Akká when both arose from sleep at that usual early hour, He said emphatically that were it not for those prayers His bones would have been turned to ashes long ago.

To a friend He wrote: “Man must, under all conditions, be thankful to God, the One, for it is said in the blessed Text, ‘If ye be thankful, I will increase ye.’ (That is, if we are thankful to God, God will increase His bounty unto us) Man must seek shelter in the mercy and protection of God, for he is constantly subject to a hundred thousand dangers. Save for the refuge and protection of the Merciful Lord man is without shelter.”

To a patient who needed spiritual healing 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote: “Turn thou to the Kingdom of thy Lord with a truthful heart and with all devotion, sincerity and great spirituality, and ask to be healed from pain and passions and be confident in the bounty of thy Lord.”

To another patient: “Rest assured in the mercy of the Lord; be rejoiced for my remembering thee; gladden thyself by the appearance of the Kingdom of God and call out, 'Ya-Baha El-Abha,' from the depth of thy heart with all meekness and supplication, attracted by the fire of the love of God. Then annoint or rub all the parts of the body. Verily I say unto thee, if thou attainest this condition we demonstrate to thee (i. e.; if thou followest the direction given) be confident in the speedy recovery through the favor of God."

To one who believed his illness was his punishment from God, He said: "Take some honey, recite 'Ya-Baha El-Abha!' and eat a little thereof for several days. For these thy prevailing diseases are not on account of sins, but they are to make thee detest this world and know that there is no rest and composure in this temporal life."

And to another: "I hope thou wilt become as a rising light and obtain spiritual health,—and spiritual health is conducive to physical health."

To a lady physician: "O handmaid of God! Continue in healing hearts and bodies and seek healing for sick persons by turning unto the Supreme Kingdom and by setting the heart upon obtaining healing through the power of the Greatest Name and by the spirit of the love of God."

Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Baha have revealed many healing prayers. Fortunate is the one who uses them. The following is a short and sweet prayer by Bahá'u'lláh which is usually repeated nine times by Bahá'is:

"O my God! Thy Name is my healing, Thy remembrance is my medicine! To be near Thee is my hope and Thy love my companion. Thy Mercy is my need and my hope in this world and the world to come; for Thou art the Giver, All-knowing, and Wise."

The "John O'Groat Journal," a weekly paper published in Wick, Scotland, with the largest circulation of any paper in the five surrounding counties, comments as follows in the issue of January 9:

"The Bahá'í Magazine (December) has the usual fine selection of articles bearing on the principles of this world-wide movement—racial and religious unity, true human brotherhood and universal peace. Leading place is given to an editorial on present conditions in China, a great country now groping her way for Light. "War," says the writer, "cannot be abolished until national racial and religious prejudices and hatred are abolished. The Bahá'í movement carries forward simultaneously all the principles necessary to accomplish this." Among various other features containing the enunciation of many uplifting thoughts and sentiments, the issue contains a beautiful picture of the great Bahá'í temple which is in course of erection near Chicago and which it was the privilege of the present reviewer to see over last year, so far as it was then constructed. No reader who with open mind peruses this magazine and other publications issued by the Baha'is can fail to appreciate the lofty thoughts and noble ideals for which the movement stands."

THE SOCIAL FABRIC

WHAT could be better before God than thinking of the poor? For the poor are beloved by our heavenly Father. When His Holiness Christ came upon the earth those who believed in Him and followed Him were the poor and lowly, showing the poor were near to God. When a rich man believes and follows the Manifestation of God it is a proof that his wealth is not an obstacle and does not prevent him from attaining the pathway of salvation. After he has been tested and tried it will be seen whether his possessions are a hindrance in his religious life.

BUT the poor are especially beloved of God. Their lives are full of difficulties, their trials continual, their hopes are in God alone. Therefore you must assist the poor as much as possible, even by sacrifice of yourself. No deed of man is greater before God than helping the poor. Spiritual conditions are not dependent upon the possession of worldly treasures or the absence of them. When physically destitute, spiritual thoughts are more likely. Poverty is stimulus toward God. Each one of you must have great consideration for the poor and render them assistance. Organize in an effort to help them and prevent increase of poverty. The greatest means for prevention is that whereby the laws of the community will be so framed and enacted that it will not be possible for a few to be millionaires and many destitute.

ONE of Bahá'u'lláh's teachings is the adjustment of means of livelihood in human society. Under this adjustment there can be no extremes in human conditions as regards wealth and sustenance. For the community needs financier, farmer, merchant and laborer just as an army must be composed of commander, officers and privates. All cannot be commanders; all cannot be officers or privates. Each in his station in the social fabric must be competent; each in his function according to ability; but justness of opportunity for all.

“Differences of capacity in human individuals is fundamental. It is impossible for all to be alike, all to be equal, all to be wise. Bahá'u'lláh has revealed principles and laws which will accomplish the adjustment of varying human capacities.”

—'Abdu'l-Bahá

THE WORLDWIDE problem of unemployment, diminished markets for industry and commerce, and growing poverty of the masses, present an alarming phenomenon concerning which economists and statesmen find no optimistic solution to present. Unlike other business crises, this is worldwide; and there is no sign yet upon the horizon of its abating.

In Asia the fall in the value of silver has destroyed wealth of the people to the extent of several billions of dollars. Until the former value of silver is restored, the purchasing power of that vast continent containing one-half the population of the world is immensely reduced. Statesmen do not know exactly how to restore the value of silver. Even if they did, it does not seem likely that there could be sufficient unity in the banking and political interests of the world to bring any such step to pass.

South American countries, with the exception of Argentine, are in such a condition of hardship and poverty that they have become a prey of constant revolution, which does not help but merely hastens economic disintegration.

As for Europe, the prospect there is even more gloomy, if we may trust the reasoned comment of Frank H. Simonds, perhaps our leading newspaper correspondent there, who makes the following statement:

“ . . . the impression I gather from Geneva and from the public men of all European countries here assembled is this: With the exception of France, the condition in all continental countries has become such that the familiar issues and problems of the post-war era, problems political and military, have become actually side issues. Disintegration within countries has become so general and gone so far that one of the most familiar judgments one meets is that capitalistic and democratic civilization is endangered, if not doomed, and that Europe is drifting toward a general catastrophe.”*

It is indeed time for all serious-minded men to inquire whether the economic and political institutions thus far prevailing among leading nations are either the best or the most feasible for humanity.

It must be admitted that this country has up to the present prospered under the regime of economic individualism. Both the capitalist and the laborer, leaders of wealth and the masses, have gained immensely through the efficient and scientific exploitation of this country's enormous resources, and through the application of science, inventiveness and efficiency to industry. Yet if these are all the factors necessary to prosperity, why the present crisis with its worldwide ramifications? Should the cycle of mass production and mass consumption again be restored to the success which prevailed during the last decade, there would be little inclination to critically scan the fundamental structure of our economic institutions, for this is a pragmatic country and what succeeds is considered ipso facto to be right.

* Washington, D. C., Sunday Star, February 22, 1931.

It is, however, the fact that this cycle of mass production and mass consumption is not today successful, the fact that economic individualism seems helpless to stem the tide of unemployment and misery either here or elsewhere—these facts seen in the light of even more seriously impending catastrophes abroad, throw doubt upon the perfection of the human institutions so far established.

“WILL paternalism be ushered in as a reaction to exploitation and to competition that can have but one outcome?” asks Dean Arland D. Weeks, School of Education, North Dakota Agricultural College, in a very interesting article* in which he queries as to what the future organization of society must be to adequately solve the political and economic problems due to vast differences in the mentality of humans as discovered by the modern psychologists. Over one-half our population, that is to say, more than sixty millions people are found by the psychologist to be of low average intelligence or less, that is, having an intelligence quotient of less than one hundred. We cannot blame this lower intelligence group for stupidity, says the author, they cannot help themselves. It is a biological quality. In this connection the author states an amazing fact, just the opposite of our ordinary idea, namely that the increase of knowledge due to the education of today does not tend to level the intelligence but rather multiplies disproportionately the resources of the superior.

“Science means something directly to the lowly, but it gives unprecedented power to the gifted. As knowledge grows from more to more, a wedge progressively separates the social fates of persons at different levels of native ability . . . Two illiterates of contrasting abilities would upon learning to read be still more different.”

“Economic manipulation governed by relatively high intelligence can be more persistently and hopelessly oppressive . . . The bigness and inscrutability of manipulative processes leave the lower mentalities badly off for self-help.”

“With the ripening of institutions and the perfection of economic strategies, assuring steady increase of disproportionate benefits to the upper levels of intelligence, it can only be through policies determined at the seats of power that, for example, in the United States, a farmer is not made a peasant or exhaustively exploited and put on a dole.”

“We can only hope that the lower millions will have great leaders, and that the classes who have mental power by birth will conceive of the state in terms inclusive of the welfare of the mass—for the inequality of brain cells is great.”

AT SUCH a time as this when the whole world is perforce seriously questioning the efficiency of its institutions—political, social and economic—the solutions to these grave problems which the Bahá’i Movement offers in its great World Design revealed by Bahá’u’lláh merits the earnest attention of every thoughtful person.

As regards the institutions of government—we have in the Bahá’i World a perfect balance of democracy and aristocracy. By means of universal franchise employed without chicanery, or even electioneering (which in reality is a dangerous procedure tending to defeat the very purposes of democracy) the best and worthiest people are elected as leaders. In the Bahá’i election there is but one aim—the selection of the best people, as evidenced by character, by gifts, and by general efficiency and ability to serve. Once elected, this group constitutes a government by the best, using the word best in its larger significance; harmony of thought and absolute unity being essential. This governmental body has but one aim, to legislate honestly and wisely for the benefit of all; and as these aims and accomplishments are to be universal in their beneficence, so on the part of the electorate is found a loyalty that upholds the hands of government. Here we see the perfect solution of the problem raised by the previously quoted writer—a vast problem due to the mental differences of society.

As to the economic problem, we find in the Bahá’i World of the future a perfect solution of the present impasse between capital and labor, without destroying the individual initiative of either group. By means of a really effective method of profit-sharing the interests of labor and capital are amalgamated. Furthermore the state, local and general, guarantees employment and livelihood. By these provisions poverty is absolutely eliminated.

Here we have the ideal co-operative state, an enormous step forward from the individualistic state of the past, yet retaining the opportunity for individual effort, inventiveness and reward. The different classes of society, the different classes of industry, the different classes of government, are so integrated as to perceive and feel an actual working unity. This is what one might call one hundred per cent co-operation. Mutuality of interest is both conceived and practiced by all, and with the great dynamic power which comes from an efficient working unity, humanity will be able to prevent all these economic crises and catastrophes which are at present the concern of governments and which are indeed threatening the very foundations of human society.

The principal cause of these difficulties [economic problems] lies in the laws of the present civilization; for they lead to a small number of individuals accumulating incomparable fortunes beyond their needs, whilst the greater number remains destitute, stripped and in the greatest misery. This is contrary to justice, to humanity, to equity; it is the height of iniquity, the opposite to what causes divine satisfaction.—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

THE UNBROKEN SPIRITUAL GUIDANCE

HOWARD R. HURLBUT

"The marvelous bestowals of God are continuous. Should the outpouring of Light be suspended, we would be in darkness. But how could it be withheld? If the divine graces are suspended, then Divinity itself would be interrupted. Even men ask for continuity."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

VER sixty years ago, Bahá'u'llah wrote: "Verily, every drop contains an ocean and in every atom there is concealed a sun." That sounds like the declaration of a dreamer, or some allegory, and not by any possibility applicable to a real condition. Many have doubtless read articles which of late have been appearing in periodicals and the daily press regarding scientific investigation of the atom. In one there appeared this statement: "Scientists have determined that in every atom there is contained in miniature a replica of our solar and planetary system; that each atom contains a sun with planetary electrons revolving about it and situated relatively to one another as are Saturn and Neptune of our own system." And there are dreamers in the scientific world who insist on peopling these infinitesimal realms with beings infinitely more infinitesimal still, possessed of intellects with which they struggle with the problems confronting them, just as we with our advanced capacity wrestle with our greater problems.

By reason of the installation of the great 100-inch reflector in the telescope on Mount Wilson, in California, we have been introduced to that wonderful sun, Antares, in the constellation of Scorpio. Astronomers have succeeded in measuring its diameter and have found it to be four hundred and twenty millions of miles—a distance so inconceivably vast that fully fifty thousand such bodies as this earth of ours could be strung along it and leave a great distance to spare. They have determined that what we have always considered this universe of ours is the merest of pigmies in its relation to untold millions of universes distributed through space. If the mind of man shall thus delve into the regions of the infinitely small, what intellect is there which shall give to the imagination wings of such power that he shall attain to the vistas of limitless grandeur enjoyed by those upon a plane beside which our own is only as a rose-leaf on a shoreless ocean!

Scientists the world over are agreed that one of the greatest problems confronting them is that of the atom: that with its solution, practically all of their troublous problems will be dissipated in thin air. If the secret of its stability shall be uncovered, the illimitable forces of nature will yield to the supremacy of intellect, and humanity will enter upon a plane of complete domination of all the material realms of the divine. It is the atom which constitutes the basis for the creation of the material universe, and which is the compelling argument, never changing, never ending, enduring as God its Creator, and acted upon and developed in unbroken accord with the predestined plan for the execution and fulfillment of an irrefragable law.

Regarding the atom and its importance in the eternal plan of creation, we refer to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's wonderfully clear treatise on evolution as given before the Theosophical Society in Paris;¹ and to the address before the Metaphysical Society of Boston,² and other published writings. These include a definition of the completeness of divine justice which compels that every individual atom in the universe of worlds shall have its coursings through all the kingdoms to its predestined station in its "paradise" which is its development to the station of service in being part of the highest contemplated physical creation of God—the human body—a divine temple devised by Deity to house a human soul capable of being a perfect mirror for the reflection of the beauties of the divine station. Having attained to this "paradise," it reverts by regular and orderly processes to its original primal station, to begin again its interminable coursings.

And, because this is so, it follows that there can never by any possibility be a perfect world. Were it possible for a perfectly completed state to exist, then must creation cease to be, for the reason that the eternal law of God is progress, and there can be no progress after perfection has been attained. This applies not only in a limited sense to a limited portion of the created realms, it applies to the totality of all the realms. It applies to this distinctively human condition with which we are associated and in which it is the design of God that we shall be determining factors in the working out of our destiny.

II.

How illimitably magnificent are the vistas of life when we come to full realization that less than a remote suggestion of a clock-tick in the eternal history of the soul is even the most extended experience it may enjoy as the measure of life as we know it upon the plane of human consciousness! That through eternities it is to uninterruptedly progress toward a goal which has no fixity, and along the pathway to which are scattered inconceivable beauties of augmenting attraction, to whose advancing splendors the soul is continually developed in its capacity to assimilate and understand!

There is no condition in the worlds of the unseen which has not its reflex in the material realm. Therefore, we can approach this subject of continued imperfection with a clearer definition of its meaning and intent. As matter, evolving through infinite æons of the past, has successively developed material forms which have been susceptible to cultivation and advancement to something higher and more refined and beautiful, so must it inevitably follow that in all the illimitable æons of futurity shall the atom have its coursings through all the kingdoms of matter, remaining continually in a condition of imperfection, destined to express in every age all of the weaknesses, all of the crudities, all of the qualities of every description which matter in its progress in the past has ever expressed. That is why perfection in a human state cannot rationally be even dreamed of in the sense of a widespread attainment. It would controvert the established and inviolable law of evolution which God has fixed in his universe of worlds as an agency for bringing forth understanding of something of His beauty and of raising up in the human heart the desire to make an approach thereto.

Now, to revert to this matter of the divine spiritual influence working along other than directly spiritual lines. It will be readily conceded that a worship of divinity which is a matter of compulsion through the dominance of an established law could not in any real sense be considered as worship at all. It would be like a boughten friendship or a compulsory service. Therefore, God, in sending forth the emanation of His unfailling love from His source of being, raised in His human creation an independent will which He caused to have separated from His own and existent of itself by a voluntary evolution from the being of man. And this independent human will He made capable of opposing itself to the divine will in every realm of its activity except that of composition and decomposition; that is, it should have no control over life or death, but should be voluntarily the director of all its intervening action between the cradle and the grave.

In such a creation, designed and projected upon its predestined plane of being in a state of absolute purity, there rested the capacity to differentiate between beauty and ugliness, between right and wrong, between sanctity and grossness, and with this capacity the authority to make an independent choice. Then Divinity upraised in a human temple a reflex of itself, mirroring in full perfection all of the glories of the divine attributes, and caused this unsullied human creation to endure all of the exigencies and vicissitudes of life which any human might be subject to and through all of this to demonstrate that a pure character may remain unsullied in a sea of wrong. Consequently, when a soul shall be attracted to this human expression of divine beauty and demonstrate sincerity in daily living, this constitutes the reality of sanctity and the apotheosis of worship of the Divine.

You have now had placed before you the upraising on the human plane of that which is called religion.

If from the beginning God failed to afford this opportunity to follow example: if He failed through any period of human need to supply a source of light and guidance to a wandering race, then would He fail in His established law of absolute justice which was designed to perpetuate the universe of worlds. Therefore, in every age has the Almighty lifted up these mighty human expressions of Himself as agencies for influencing the human will to a recognition of His beauty.

We perceive, therefore, the absolute failure of religionists to understand the character of divine justice when they will insist that there has been and is no other than a single channel for the administration of God's law, His bounty and His love.

III.

To some pilgrims visiting Him in the "Most Great Prison," in 'Akká, 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave this teaching: "Jesus spoke everything in parables because the ideal sense is, in this way, revealed and understood. This contingent world is like the mirror of the spiritual kingdom, consequently it is better to explain each subject so that the real meaning can be understood. When anything has been renewed in this contingent world it is found to be in better condition, and if renewal did not take place from time to time, annihilation would be the result of all contingent beings. If the plants had no rotation they would soon cease to exist. This is the reason that God has ordained rotation and renewal. Even the sun itself revolves around another center. In appearance the sun is the center of the contingent world, but in reality it has a center around which it revolves. The earth revolves around the sun once in three hundred and sixty-five days, which causes the four seasons; and by these four seasons the contingent world is constantly revived and renewed. And this same renewal is seen in the Kingdom. The early days of every Manifestation are called the spring—when you see the seeds first sprouting and everything is young and tender. Then follows the summer season, when things have reached a state of perfection and the fruits are gathered. Then comes the autumn season, when everything begins to fall into decay; after which speedily comes the winter, when all is dead, and without any apparent life. God is almost forgotten, and the hearts are turned to the world entirely. But when this state is reached, it is a sign that a new springtime is coming.

"For instance, in the beginning of the appearance of Moses, it was the springtime of His day. The summer time was when many people had accepted Him, believed in Him, promulgated His teachings—His fruit was gathered. Then came the autumn, when His commands first began to be neglected, and the true followers began to fall away, and the true teachings to sink into decay. Then came the winter, when the hearts ceased to turn unto God, were occupied with worldly things entirely, and spiritual death apparent. Then came the springtime of Christ. In the last days of winter, just before the spring, there is no sign of herbage, or anything that is green, but when the springtime comes once more the dreariness of winter is forgotten. Thus it is that in the different Manifestations the four seasons are made manifest."

IV.

Bahá'u'lláh tells us that the Word of God is as a two-edged sword; it cuts at the heart of human institutions and character and it creates in the people of love a condition of pure holiness and sanctity, and in the people of hatred an attitude of denial, opposition and oppression. This does not mean that it injects the opposing attitude into the human condition, but that because of the purity of the Word the impure tendency of the human will brings out its expression of denial. But the seed of the Word of God, wheresoever planted, cannot remain without effect, and therefore whether it be in the people of direct opposition or in those who wander from the paths of truth because of vain imaginings and false interpretations, the spirit of the Word continues as a compelling force. That is why in every religion, at certain stages of its history there may be found remarkable—sometimes wonderful—demonstrations of the workings of intellectual capacity in fields of scientific development when spiritual aims seem to be almost entirely lacking. That is why, although the glory of the Solomonic sovereignty was attainable by the Jewish people and they had become uplifted by the laws revealed through Moses, they were subject to the continued augmentation within themselves, as individuals and as a race, of characteristics which led to their sure destruction. That is why the followers of the Prophet Muhammad, even when they had departed from the pure spirituality of the allegorical teachings of the truth which He revealed, progressed by inconceivably rapid bounds to the highest degree of material civilization the world had known. That is why the Christian dispensation progressed to a full recognition by imperial Rome and became the dominant religion of Europe, only to pass to its decline in the blackest night of human experience—the Dark Ages of Christian Europe.

Every Founder of a prophetic dispensation brought to the world a capacity in Himself for the complete reflection of the will of God. He did not manifest it in its fullness, but limited its expression to the capacity of understanding in the people He addressed. And the identifying quality in each dispensation over all other qualities was, after His passing, a characterizing influence in the development of those who professed religion under His banner.

Thus, the identifying characteristic of the teachings of Brahma was Sacrifice. And, resultant on this, even after these long centuries of idolatrous habit and practice of His followers, we see them engaging in the most extreme forms of sacrifice to accomplish soul-purification.

The outstanding teaching of Lao Tse was Reverence. And although nearly three thousand years have passed since his rise, the Chinese people remain today the most reverent of all the races of earth.

Zoroaster stressed Purity. And it is a matter of record in the presidencies of Bombay and Calcutta that the Parsees give the lowest percentage of trouble because of crime, prostitution, or other forms of vice, of any of the other Oriental subjects of the British Empire.

Buddha taught Renunciation. And it has been a leading characteristic of His followers—this renunciation of self, which obtains even to the extent that the Buddhists are today less in opposition to other religious teachings than are those of any other branch of religion, renouncing claim to an exclusive revelation and welcoming all worshippers beneath the canopy of God's bounty.

The mission of Moses was directly attached to Righteousness—the establishment of which was the most desirable condition of His time, and His followers have ever persisted in adhering to His laws more consistently than have other religionists to their own. Beyond that, the laws which He revealed in that remote past constitute the bases of practically all of the laws existent in the world today.

The particular quality emphasized in the teachings of Jesus was Love, and although Christianity has often failed to develop and foster in its devotees the real Christ spirit of wide acceptance and recognition of God and His truth, this spirit of love and helpfulness is clearly and scientifically applied by Christian peoples.

Muhammad brought to His followers Submission. How marvelous was the influence of this teaching on the barbaric tribes who had formerly laughed in derision at every law, but who, in an incredibly brief period, became submissive to law! Today, even, we find everywhere amongst these religionists the almost absolute submission of their desires, their possessions and their lives to the requirements of their religion which involve a greater degree of simplicity and a less complicated system of theology than any other extant religion.

Oh, matchless pageantry of purpose in the promotion of qualities to constitute the structure of a perfect man! Sacrifice! Reverence! Purity! Renunciation! Righteousness! Love! Submission!

And now we come to another expression of these enduring paral-els in the scientific application of the unchanging law to the requirements of human well-being: All of the rivers of earth start from sources sparkling and pure and have their coursings through wide varieties of soils from which they gather and absorb the impurities and discolorations, to discharge them at last into the purifying body of the waiting sea. So, too, all of the streams of divine instruction have had their birth in pure and inspiring fountains, and down the centuries have flowed through the soil of human hearts and intellects and have become saturated more or less with their qualities until at last they must be plunged into the purifying ocean of God's design.

It must readily be recognized that the predestined purpose compels an ultimate juncture of all these hitherto separated streams, and that when a Messenger of God shall finally arise, giving equal and full emphasis to every one of the divine qualities, He must be the Perfected Expression of the desire of the Creator.

So, do we reach the time of the coming of Bahá'u'lláh—the Glory of God—Whose Manifestation of all the power, the beauty, the compassion, the knowledges, which have had expression through the ages of the past, brings to a discordant and war-torn world the inspiring message of Unity as the healing balm for all its woes.

Under the clear definition of the divine purpose which He has brought we find a mandate for the unification of all the schools of religion under the one banner of a single God—a gathering together of all His worshippers under the tent of Unity, recognizing as divine in its inception and origin every prophetic dispensation of the past, and that all were ordained by the Almighty for the expression of His will.

Bahá'u'lláh has declared that the soul that is alive in this day has attained to everlasting life, and the soul that remains dead in this day shall never attain to the desired station. That is, if one shall persist in blindness when the sun is shining in the fullness of its glorious effulgence, he cannot hope ever to attain to vision when the world is bathed in a lesser illumination.

The Bahá'í Faith aims to stir the dulled consciousness to a deeper understanding and, precisely as the yeast leavens the lump and causes it to expand, so do the Bahá'í Teachings bring about an expanded concept of life and life's relations and duties, and inspire in the sincerely seeking soul a greater degree of selflessness and simplicity in its approach to truth. In the coming of Bahá'u'lláh the walls which have been raised by man's fallacies between the pillars of the temple of faith have been torn down, and today the entire world of humanity may offer its worship in service, bathed in the unquenchable Light shining from before the altar of the unapproachable Divinity.

THE SPIRITUAL EDUCATION OF PERSIAN CHILDREN

JALAL SAHITHI

The author of this article, written at the Editor's request is a Persian youth who is studying modern industry and engineering in Detroit at the same time that he is doing practical work in the Ford factory there, his aim being to take back to Persia a proficiency in these lines which may be of service to his native country. Mirza Jalal describes to us vividly the obstacles as well as the spiritual exaltation of his boyhood training in the Bahá'í religion. We consider this article a human document and a valuable chronicle of the past days of spiritual persecution. We hope to have further articles from his pen dealing with his life in Persia and also in this country.

REAT things are not always great in appearance. Objects of real significance are often hidden in insignificant surroundings. The noblest hearts may be found in the humblest persons, and the dearest treasures in the cheapest lands.

Everybody can see in the Bahá'í Magazine, or in other Bahá'í publications, pictures of groups of Bahá'í children, mostly from the East; simple in appearance those pictures are, and yet full of meaning, full of suggestion, full of instructive points. From them we may easily learn a great deal about some Bahá'í activities that for years have been silently going on in many Bahá'í centers, especially in the East.

Being recently surprised in finding his own picture in a Western publication, this writer wishes to take the opportunity to share with the friends some of the reminis-cences that the picture suggests to him.

Tihran's present well-organized Bahá'í classes, wherein meet hundreds of Bahá'í children and young people every Friday* morning, started at a time when the friends in Persia still had the problem of safeguarding their lives and property in addition to all of the problems related to the spreading of the Cause in a world of bitter and violent opposition. Aside from all was the problem of rearing the lamb-like children in the midst of such a wolf-like people. How difficult the task, how necessary that it be done!

The friends already had the conviction that no wise gardener would devote all of his attention to the well-rooted trees to the neglect of the young ones. They realized the necessity of selecting a special body of far-sighted, whole-hearted teachers to take care of the children and young people so that in the light of the Bahá'í teachings they might grow to be souls in whom universal love and brotherhood would be things of heart rather than words of mouth. The seriousness of other problems, however, might have overshadowed this vital problem had not the rays of hope shone through a few noted young Bahá'ís who rose to organize the first Bahá'í class for children.

These young teachers noticed one day a few Bahá'í children in company with a number of religiously unpolished nonBahá'í lads. If our youth is going to grow like that of others, what hope then?—they thought. So with Bahá'í assurance and firmness they started the new activity in a city the soil of which was still colored with the pure blood of its martyrs; the air of which was still filled with the cry of "Death to the Bahá'ís"; its people still stalking for Bahá'í prey; and its government cooperating to crush the whole movement.

THE WRITER had seen but five springs before his first contact with a class which started about one year previous. The following is essentially the story of the first class as given by several teachers:

There came that historic Friday morning. For the first time a dozen or so Bahá'í children found themselves where they could breathe, so to speak. They could mention the name of 'Abdu'l-Bahá or Bahá'u'lláh with no fear, but with no loud voice lest some unfriendly ear should hear and cause trouble. There were two or three adults, the organizers of the class, sitting on the carpeted floor like the rest, facing a number of adorable, peaceful children whom they addressed not as pupils but as brothers and friends. In a low tone a prayer was first chanted, silence and meditation followed, and then the joyful voice of a teacher said, "Friends," and proceeded to tell the little friends why they were there.

Any one who has dealt with young children will understand what it means to talk to a number gathered together for the first time, but would he also thoroughly understand what it means to be in a room with every door tightly shut to avoid detection, and have to tell the children why they were there and why they could not have much freedom; why they were to assemble in that way every Friday morning; why they were to enter without talking to or looking at any one outside so that nothing might be suspected; why they were not to scatter or expose any of their writings or lessons; why they were not to talk loudly while in their meeting; why they were to go out one by one at long intervals; and why they were not to complain if they should be stoned, neither to use the least unkind word if mistreated. Suppose now, dear reader, you put yourself in place of a six to eight year old child who was to mind all those admonitions, and yet be happy and contented. The little heroes, however, went on to their meetings very joyfully, and did what they were asked to do.

* Friday is the Sabbath day in Persia.

A Bahá'í Sunday school class conducted by the author (front row, center). These boys are all most zealous students of their religion and active in helping to spread the Bahá'í Movement. A study of their faces reveals the earnestness and fine altitudes of character already attained. They represent most promising material for the new Persia.

The lesson of the day consisted of a sentence containing six meaningful words in the original Persian, meaningful individually and collectively. It was a short quotation from the precious words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to the effect that a Bahá'í is one who possesses all human perfections. This was the first lesson; this was the cornerstone; this was the first spiritual food served to the young Bahá'is, a food nutritious enough to last them forever. So far as this writer knows, this lesson has remained the first lesson ever since for all the children attending Friday morning Bahá'í classes.

A NUMBER of weeks passed; the number of students increased; the difficulties in meeting became greater because the neighboring lads had discovered the assembling of their little Bahá'í acquaintances, and were wickedly doing all they could to torment the young students. But every thing has its advantages; the mischief of the lads helped us to practice what we were learning. The more they hurt us, the deeper they engraved sympathy in our hearts; the more they tried to agitate us, to excite us, to break up our meetings by shouting, cursing, throwing stones into the courtyard, the more we learned to understand and appreciate the value of calmness, peacefulness, harmlessness and quietness; and, what is more, our teachers, too, found many occasions to quote to us more and more of the beautiful, touching and penetrating words of our Master, 'Abdu'l-Bahá. As all these hardships came and passed, we learned to share with our parents the unescapable ordeals. We had some reason to pray to the Lord and ask Him to assist us to serve and teach those whom we could help.

Praise be to the Lord that a successful end came to the first year of our class, but not an end to the enthusiasm of the teachers or the students. The second year started; the lessons were a continuation of the first year, that is, short quotations. The first year lessons were taught to the younger ones.

Most of the Bahá'is of Tihiran resided at that time in the southern part of the town where the meetings were being held. There were also a number of Bahá'í families scattered all over the town so that another problem for some of the youngsters was that of transportation. They had to walk very long distances and had to pass some dangerous zones; yet nothing prevented the presence of all the little Bahá'ís at their meetings. Will the writer ever forget the caressing touch and encouraging words that he received so many Friday mornings from his mother, who would prepare him to attend his classes, asking him to keep his lessons in his pocket and go with prayers; and she herself, then, would pray in her heart that her son might not return with a fractured head or a broken arm, for, if he did, there was no place to go for justice. Undoubtedly all Bahá'í mothers did so every Friday morning.

THE ABOVE description is not to present the cruelty of the ill-bred Muhammadan children, but just to indicate the seriousness with which the Bahá'ís in Persia approached the problem of spiritual training for their children, and of making them thoroughly acquainted with the marvelous teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. Three considerations of equal importance have always been chosen by them for spreading the Cause: themselves, their children, the outsiders.

Now we may look upon the enjoyable side of our Friday morning meetings. Not only were we having our regular tea twice at each session according to the Persian habit, and luncheon parties occasionally, but also our monthly feasts at which time the little friends themselves were the speakers. Yes, the gifted little Bahá'í speakers would quietly utter such words as "We must all unite and work for universal peace, for removal of prejudices of all kinds, for racial amity," etc. Then there would come the prizes for the best speakers, the gifts from the parents for every one; and then sherbet, candies, and fruits would be served.

In later years, when there was more than one class, the students of different classes would have a general gathering in some one's large garden, where hymns would be sung, prayers would be chanted, and speeches would be delivered. All these united forms of praying, chanting, and feasting were our general source of inspiration, happiness and encouragement. They kept us up and going. We always enjoyed them and looked forward to them. The greatest thrill we ever received came from one of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's tablets blessing all the children who attended Bahá'í classes.

Unlike school education, our study in these newly organized Bahá'í classes was never to come to an end—that we knew from the beginning. We were taught that none of us would ever be graduated from the studies of Bahá'u'lláh's teachings. If a Bahá'í is to be the possessor of all human perfections, we were told, and one of the conditions for perfection is to have knowledge, a knowledge translated into practice, then who would claim that he knows all the Bahá'í teachings practically?

Based on this kind of reasoning, we were invited to attend the third year class to study the "Hidden Words"* together with a number of tablets in Arabic; the fourth year to study the history of the Cause in detail; the fifth and the sixth year to study, as thoroughly as possible, the "Book of Iqán"; the seventh year to learn "Some

*Revealed by Baha'u'llah

Answered Questions"; the eighth year to study the writings of the well-known teacher, Mirza Abu'l-Fadl. Thereafter it was suggested to us that we join the classes of the grown-up friends, to study further the different phases of the teachings in more detail, to speak, to learn how to present the teachings to different types of seekers, and, in short, to be a Bahá'í in practice.

MANY OF the students of the early years who went to all those classes whole-heartedly are Persia's young, capable, energetic, trained Bahá'í teachers of today. Together with every year's new product, so to speak, they constantly reflect the divine light to the world, and help all the true seekers to find their path toward Truth.

Friends in other Persian towns started long ago to follow the steps of the Tíhrán friends. In a similar manner they have gradually organized their own Friday morning Bahá'í classes. The lessons they teach are the same as those taught in Tíhrán. Members of each local committee for children's classes are chosen annually by the respective local Assemblies just as Tíhrán's is elected by the Assembly. Through regular monthly reports all the committees keep in touch with each other, and all with Tíhrán, thus making the whole of Persia a Bahá'í unit in that respect. So we see that when Friday morning dawns in Persia, our little brothers and sisters rise not only to get illumination from the glorious sun, but also to receive divine light from The Most Glorious Sun of Truth.

Friends of other lands, too, have gradually organized their classes for Bahá'í children. Their reports flow to all corners of the earth, and accomplish their part in making a unit of the world. Many times in our classes Dr. Susan I. Moody, one of the few American friends who have sacrificed a part of their lives in assisting and inspiring the Persian friends in their endeavor to serve, has spoken of "The Rose Gardens" of America as our dearest friends in the West, and also as the hands that are soon to be extended to grasp those of the East; then, united, to raise the standard of human relationship to ever higher planes.

"O God, permit us to partake of the perfection which belongs to Thee and of whatsoever Thou hast ordained for Thine elect. Make us to desire that which Thou dost desire, namely, Thy command. Help us to fly upward by Thy grace, sheltered by Thy presence, assisted by Thy nearness, and tranquilized by Thy love, in such wise that we may look only to Thee, speak of naught but Thy love, and turn to none save Thee."

Editor's Note—Happily for the Bahá'í communities of Persia, the situation there today contrasts most dramatically with the little less than tragic conditions which the author describes as prevailing during his youth. Today, thanks to the liberal vision and efficient administration of His Imperial Majesty Shahanshah Pahlevi, Bahá'ís are everywhere protected in all rights of religious liberty and can congregate publicly in large numbers with perfect safety. Religious martyrdom in Persia is now a thing of the past.

It is subject of thought to consider how deeply indebted the whole world is and will always be to these pioneers of the Bahá'í Movement in Persia who, at the constant risk of property and life, carried the Bahá'í Cause through this dark period of bitter persecution and martyrdom.

THE COMING OF SPRING

HUMAN tastes differ; thoughts, nationalities, races and tongues are many. The need of a Collective Center by which these differences may be counterbalanced and the people of the world unified is obvious.

“Consider how nothing but a spiritual power can bring about this unification, for material conditions and mental aspects are so widely different that agreement and unity are not possible through outer means. It is possible, however, for all to become unified through one spirit, just as all may receive light from one sun. Therefore, assisted by the Collective and Divine Center which is the law of God and the reality of His Manifestation, we can overcome these conditions until they pass away entirely and the races advance.

“The Collective Center has always appeared in the East. His Holiness Abraham, His Holiness Moses, His Holiness Jesus Christ, His Holiness Muhammad, were Collective Centers of their day and time and all arose in the East.

“Today His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh is the Collective Center of unity for all mankind and the splendor of His light has likewise dawned from the East. He founded the oneness of mankind in Persia. He established harmony and agreement among the various peoples of religious beliefs, denominations, sects and cults by freeing them from the fetters of past imitations and superstitions; leading them to the very foundation of the divine religions. From this foundation shines forth the radiance of spirituality which is unity, the love of God, the knowledge of God, praiseworthy morals, and the virtues of the human world. Bahá'u'lláh renewed these principles, just as the coming of spring refreshes the earth and confers new life upon all phenomenal beings. . . . His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh came to renew the life of the world with this new and divine springtime. . . .”

CONTRASTS

1. THE WORLD

"Because man has stopped his ears unto the Voice of Truth and shut his eyes unto the Sacred Light, neglecting the Law of God, for this reason hath the darkness of war and tumult, unrest and misery, desolated the earth." . . . Talks by 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

O hear the battle rolling 'midst the far peaks of the hills,
The roaring and the thunder from the clash of different wills!
O see the wounded falling, and the blood that stains the ground—
The dear, red blood that's flowing, while the death-clouds gather 'round!
To block this path to glory, and to still this dreadful fame,
The world doth pray, imploring that true Love be set aflame —
That tyrants cease to flourish, and oppression to prevail—
That this, the end of aeons, shall another earth unveil.

2. "THE GLAD TIDINGS"

"With power and might will the proclamation of the Kingdom of El Abhá found a new civilization, transforming humanity; dead bodies will become alive . . . blind eyes will see . . . the indifferent will be decorated with the flowers of divine civilization." . . . 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

O hear the Báb, the Herald that the Dawn of Truth appears,
With Light of Love and Righteousness, allaying all the fears!
O see the banners flying, where the tents of princes gleam—
The passes in the mountains, whence oncoming cohorts stream!
Bahá'u'lláh is calling, and the drum-heads roll and beat—
The shaken earth is trembling 'neath the march of peaceful feet:
The pillared skies are fallen, and the clouds are blown away,
The while the martyrs' glory is the token of the Day.

3. HIS SERVANTS

"They are not greedy after comfort, nor do they seek flitting pleasures. They are not longing for honour, neither pursue the phantasmal imaginations of glory and wealth. They are the devotees, the tried soldiers of Bahá'u'lláh . . ." Bahá'í Scriptures.

His servants here shall suffer from the world they would retrieve,
Although their hands are gentle and their tongues shall not deceive—
Opposing thoughts shall sweep them as the rain-drops from the sky,
Until they hear Him calling as their death is drawing nigh;
Bahá'u'lláh is calling, but the seeds of peace are sown,
The seeds of human fellowship, whence bitter hate is flown;
His battle is with evil, and His weapons Truth and Love,
To fill the fields of Godliness with plowshares from above.

4. HEREAFTER—THE REWARD

"Like unto the candle they are aflame with all the virtues of the world of humanity. This is everlasting glory. This is eternal life. This is true attainment. This is the divine sublimity of the creation of God."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

How could a world of darkness know and welcome them and Thee,
When Thou art Light, and night doth ever from the morning flee?
O see these birds of heaven rise in ever higher flight,
Until they're lost in distances far past the range of sight—
In realms of God of Glory, of the Kingdom that's Divine,
Where virtues are supernal, and Thy Spirit's Love is wine:
In death of all unworthy things they draw Thy Presence near,
Whose brows the angels marked with Light—whose names Thou callest dear.

TREASURES FROM THE LAND OF FARs

FLORENCE E. PINCHON

THE past" wrote Bahá'ulláh to the Persian Zoroastrians, "is the mirror of the future. Look and perceive!"

And it is in this spirit—not one of mere curiosity—but of sincere desire to understand something of the past of an ancient and once mighty land, whose history, literature and culture naturally possess an absorbing interest for all Bahá'is, that one approaches the great International Persian Art Exhibition now being held at Burlington House, London.

To one able to perceive beneath the surface of apparently chance happenings, deeper issues, it would appear of peculiar significance that the world of Islam should have, in this way, made so definite a rapprochement to the Christian, extending hands of mutual interest and friendship, and pouring into the lap of an astonished West of its hitherto most jealously guarded, sacred and dazzling treasures. And that we should be privileged to see them is, as Sir Arnold Wilson, Chairman of the Committee has observed, "more astonishing than any event in the history of the progress of modern civilization to date."

Also, to a Bahá'i, it is not without import that, during this year of world-wide anxiety and depression, attention should thus have been focussed upon the land of Bahá'u'lláh; that by means of the radio and newspapers, journals and books, this long isolated and little known country should be, as it were, flung open to the understanding and appreciation of the Occident, and of England in particular. That around this nucleus and shrine of Persia's past splendors have been gathered offerings from Paris and Poland, Russia and Egypt, Denmark and Germany, Austria and America, and indeed from most of the leading countries of the world. And, by such an act, bringing yet a little nearer that happy Day when mankind will have come to realize their essential oneness and interdependence, and seek shelter beneath the Tent of Unity and the Canopy of Glory. Reminding us, too, of that other Treasure House, at whose holy Threshold we have been commanded "to endeavor to present every priceless and valuable thing."

Even to recall the way in which these rare and wonderful objects were collected, with its strange mingling of most primitive, modern and ultra modern modes of transport, stirs the imagination. Across great tawny deserts they were borne—costly bales of merchandise—on the backs of slow-swaying camels, even as in the days of Cyrus and Darius, or of the Magi who journeyed from Saba, purposing their long pilgrimage to an overcrowded inn at Bethlehem. While overhead, across other stretches of wilderness, magic carpets and jewelled riches literally floated on the throbbing wings of aeroplanes. They were whirled by automobiles into city depots; hidden among the dates of a tramp steamer in Sindbad's port; till, from the perilous seas once more the twentieth centure received them into the grey mists of a London dock.

“Tis but a step between the desert and the sown” sings a Persian poet. Only a door in a wall may separate arid wastes from a green garden. So, on crossing the threshold of this Home of the Arts, one passes from the gloom of an English winter into another world; a world of glowing color, vibrant with the intangible atmosphere and romance of the East. Scarcely anyone so poor that he may not behold, and in that way share, some of the world’s priceless possessions; none so unimaginative that they may not wander awhile in a region of poetic fantasy and become enlarged thereby.

It would neither be possible, nor advisable, to attempt to trace the history of Persia’s artistic developments, nor to describe in detail this amazing and unique exposition, the Press in many countries having, no doubt, afforded opportunities to grasp it in more or less detail. Sufficient perhaps to say that, for the serious student here, beneath one roof, is provided a complete survey ranging from 3500 B. C. to the reign of Nasir-ed-din Shah of Bábi days. So, gentle Reader, all that one can ask is, that you will walk for a brief hour through this bazaar of beauty, with a Bahá’i visitor, and share with her a few of the thoughts, and perhaps a little of the emotion, aroused by this intensive visit to a land steeped in the great poetry and mysticism of the past, and now so closely linked with all we hold most dear. This land that cradled the arts, and heard the immortal songs of Hafiz and Sa’adi; that staged the marvelous and mythical feats of Rustem—the Persian Hercules; that worshipped with Zoroaster the great spirits of Light and Darkness; the land that saw the vast ambitions and failure of the youthful Alexander, who, thus early, tried to unite the East and West into a single empire, and to achieve, by force of arms, that which was destined only to be accomplished, in these latter days, by the power of mutual understanding; the land that knew the might and tyranny of Mahmud—

“ ’Neath the hoofs of whose Turkish squadrons

The glory of India lay,
While his elephants proudly trampled

The deserts of far Cathay.”

But, above all, the land that offered so sombre and yet sensitive a background for the heroic epic of the Báb, and beneath whose turquoise skies has sprung to birth, in God’s hour of final consummation, its last and greatest Spiritual Genius,—the peerless Manifestation of the Glory of God to men.

Perhaps the first fact to impress us in our brief survey is, that the art we call Persian is, in a sense, the most ubiquitous of arts. It has never been a strictly national product, but rather an elusive influence that has penetrated and permeated the whole of the civilized world, offering a striking illustration of the truth that to real art, as to great music, there can be set no geographical boundaries.

For eight centuries Persia was a subject country, and the Arabian Caliphs, and also their Mongol and Turkish rulers, recognizing the artistic sensibility of the peoples they had conquered, sent artists from Fars to every part of the Saracen domains, from India to Spain, from the Caspian to Africa, thereby creating an art that became, in process of time, truly international.

Is it not easy to perceive an analogy between this and that which is taking place to-day in the realm of religion? The new religious genius of the Persian race, born and nurtured, with so much suffering, among its receptive people, is now being disseminated far and wide. Like these flowing arabesques, exquisite flower-patterns, and lovely colorings, the ideas, ideals and principles of the Bahá'í Faith are gradually permeating the mental and emotional life of all nations, and weaving on the cosmic loom the woof and warp of a divine civilization and art of living, in which Truth and Goodness, Science and Religion, blend to create that plan and pattern whose realization is joy, and whose perfection is beauty.

THROUGH a doorway of Yesterday then, let us pass into the Archæmænian and Sassanian periods, of the third to the seventh centuries. Beneath these winged bulls and mighty lions in wonderfully enamelled tiles, Cyrus may have stood to receive deputations from his subject kingdoms. And a frieze depicting the scene would have been admired by Darius as he mounted the great staircase of his new palace at Persepolis. Xerxes probably ordered this presentation, in stone, of a sacrificial lamb, offered at one of his own royal banquets. While upon "pavements" that is, glazed bricks, like these, "in red and blue and white and black" we are told in the Bible that the people feasted, when Esther reigned as queen at Sushan. In that same palace where Daniel saw those far visions of the Angel Michael and the things that were to be.

Although no work of art or monument, save a ruined arch by the Tigris, survived the conquering hosts of Islam, it is known that art reached a high state of development during this period; while these particular rulers and their deeds seem to have dominated the memory and imagination of the Persians all down the centuries. It is, therefore, highly probable that it was this brilliant dynasty Bahá'u'lláh made reference to in His letter to the Shah:

"They have become such that thou seest naught but their empty places; their gaping roofs, their uprooted beams, their new things waxed old . . . They have descended to the abyss and become companions to the pebbles; to-day no mention is heard nor any sound; nothing is known of them or any hint . . . Verily the decree of God hath rendered them as scattered dust."

Possibly no country in the world has, by reason of its repeated ruthless invasions, devastations and subjections, had more vividly impressed upon the national consciousness the transitoriness of all earthly things. Such a people would not find it so hard to realize, as we do, that, as the Sufis taught, and Bahá'u'lláh emphasized—"Verily this mundane world is as a mirage of the desert."

Yet, through it all Persia has contrived to retain her sense of nationality, and in some subtle way to “lead captivity captive,” by imposing on her conquerors her own cultures, while absorbing the best in theirs, thereby on a truly grand scale, “distilling sugar and honey from the bitter poison of suffering.”

CARPETS: Perhaps for most visitors the main interest of the Exhibition centres in the carpets; carpets, which sweeping from ceiling to floor scintillate with superb harmonies of blue and green, fawn and crimson, deep rose, silver and gold. Yet, amid their myriad complexities of pattern and decoration, it is easy to discern their ritualistic origin and the ancient symbolism typified in the designs employed. For here, on every side, we can trace the countless illustrations with which we are accustomed to meet in Bahá'í literature. Here the cypresses—those “trees of immortality” spread wide their branches, and the “doves of eternity” sing upon the delicate twigs of the “divine lote tree,” or their bleeding hearts are transfixed by the “arrows of misfortune.” Here, too, the partridge and gazelle flee from the pursuing hunter, and the “nightingale of holiness” utters his melody to the listening heart of a rose.

The symbol, which has been described as “the clothing which the spiritual borrows from the material plane,” is essentially a form of artistic expression. It suggests. And this symbol of the Tree and its branches is one of the oldest in human history. God, or the Manifestation of His creative power, was from earliest religious history typified as the Tree of Life. The design of a branched tree, on either side of which stood two figures, is to be found inscribed on many ancient Indo-Iranian stones, on antique Assyrian and Babylonian gems, and on sacred amulets. The long oval shape of the amulet forming a centre pattern in many of the carpets.

Bahá'u'lláh frequently refers to Himself as the “Parent Stem” and “Root” of the New Revelation, and also establishes 'Abdu'l-Bahá's station and degree when giving Him the title of the “Greatest Branch.” The latter, explaining the symbol of the Cross—which design can be traced throughout all nature—says:

“There is nothing more beautiful than this tree united with the cross. Verily, this tree is a type of the Tree of Life in conjunction with the cross; in this, the mystery of sacrifice.”

In this handsome crimson rug, the maker has wrought, with the fingers of infinite patience, many hundreds of knots to the square inch, and among them his own humble name. Now across the centuries we greet his handiwork. Time and skill and patience have combined to transform the wool of a sheep into this thing of joy, as it has the mulberry leaf into yonder gorgeous satin brocade. What a lesson for those of us who are so apt to feel discouraged when, of the spiritual seed sown to-day, we fail to reap a harvest to-morrow! Yet are we not working for to-morrow rather than today? And may it not be that future generations will see of the labor of our hands and the travail of our souls in the threads we are weaving in this new and glorious carpet of a divine civilization.

Here hang the silk carpets of Josophagen, with their circles of dark green cypress trees upon a pale blue background—like a picture caught at early dawn. Indeed more like pictures they seem, than rugs upon which to tread; or symphonic poems in rich bass chords, with overtones of silvery arabesques. And in the centre of them all shimmers a huge patch of gold. It is a twelve-sided silk carpet—one for each of the Imams—brought from the tomb of a Safavean king, in a golden-domed mosque which stands in the heart of a little blue city on the road to Tihrán. Here it was Mullah Abdul Karim lived—that most trusted servant of the Báb. Box shrubs screen this unique and sacred carpet, whose centre is an ivory oval surrounded by broad glowing bands of orange and crimson and again ivory, splashed with blue palmettes and red stems, and cypresses in green and yellow, the whole bounded by a patterned combination of all the colors used. The exquisite fantasy of a consummate artist, and a wonder of the world!

Surely no one, and certainly not a Bahá'í, could stand unmoved before this wondrous emblem of Persian Islam! For to us it appears not only as a gesture of friendship from its newly awakened people and tolerant, broad-minded Shah, but as a veritable sign and token that age-long prejudices are, at last being broken down, and the longed-for cycle of religious unity and reconciliation already at hand.

“Verily He hath shone forth from the direction of the Orient, and His Signs have appeared in the Occident!”*

We do not know the names of the Imams here memorialized; it is enough that we know the greatest of them all, He who is the new Manifestation of that most ancient Glory.

“O last of the Prophets.

I know thy nearness to Allah.

Thou hast come late—because thou hast come

From a great distance.”

The representations in mosaics of the mihrab or praying corner to be found in every mosque, and the small crimson mats in which the design is repeated, remind us of the fact that, in the Moslem religion, the value and necessity of prayer is enjoined, as it is to-day in a far greater measure in the Bahá'í. And, as we are told, "in the estimation of a wise man, a mat in the Kingdom of God is preferable to the throne of the government of the world."

*Lawh-el-Akdas, Baha'u'llah.

Turning away from this section we remember the admonition to "rest on the carpet of 'All is from God: there is no power or might but through God alone'." A firm truth upon which to stay our weary feet during these days of acute personal and national distress—in this great and terrible Day of the Lord, wherein the "mountains shall be made like unto carpets."

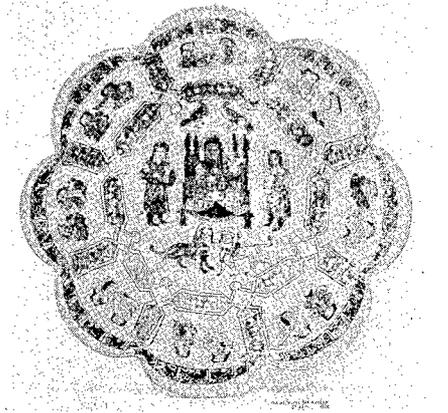

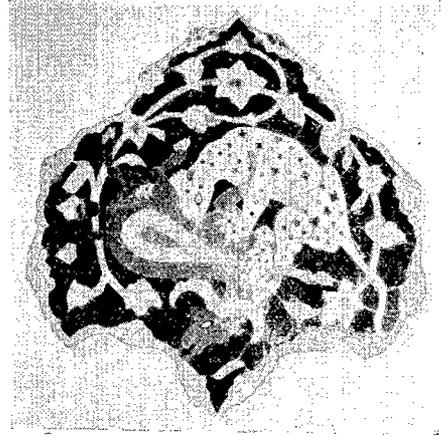

POTTERY: Then we find ourselves standing, like Omar Khayyam, "one evening at the close of Ramazan . . . in that old Potter's shop, with the clay population round in rows."

But, no! the hand of the Potter did not shake when these beautiful works of art were made. Indeed, it seems difficult to realize that these lustrous dishes and platters, these jars and bowls painted in green and blue and gold were really formed from mother earth, and formed too so many hundreds of years ago. Some of them were, no doubt, destined to adorn the banquet tables of kings, but others, less ornate, but none the less pleasing, were made to serve the common usages of life, —to hold the freshly-made mast, or water from the spring.

With what new force there comes to us many a Bahá'í analogy:

"From the clay of Love I have kneaded thee: why seekest thou another? . . . By the hand of Power I have made thee and by the fingers of Strength have I created thee. Do ye know why we have created ye from one clay? That no one should glorify himself over the other. Be ye ever mindful of how you were created."

In the Qur'an is written: "Thou shalt see no difference in the creatures of God." From the ideal standpoint there is no variation between the creatures of God, because they are all created by Him. Yet, we know, that so individual is the work of the Supreme Potter that no two human beings were ever exactly alike; no, not even two grains of wheat.

The artist soul in the Persian craftsman loves to retain this flexible individualistic touch. He takes a joy in allowing some subtle difference to appear in every object made, however humble; feeling instinctively, as one of their own critics has said, that it is rather by his "works" than by his "work" he should be known.

Yet is the informing Spirit ever one and the same. And the great Teachers have always striven to arouse in men that keen sense of their spiritual identity in variety. "Be," said Abdul-Bahá, "as one soul in many bodies." And as a Persian Mystic has expressed the idea.

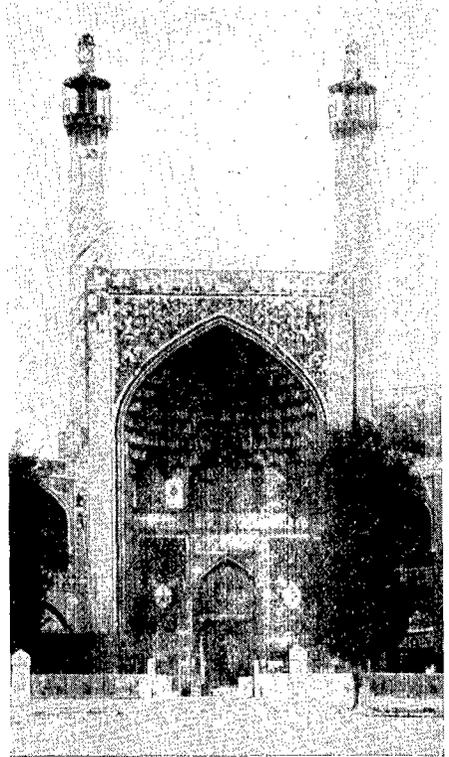

"Beaker and flagon and bowl and jar—

Of earth or crystal, coarse or fine,
However the Potter may make or mar,

Still may serve to contain the Wine;
Should we this one seek, or that one shun,

When the Wine which lends them their worth, is one."

In the East, art has never been divorced from the ordinary purposes of daily living, but designed to serve the ends both of usefulness and beauty. A lesson that we of the West might well take to heart. And it is not difficult to believe that if here, in our more recent and mechanized civilization, once the dread of poverty and destitution could be eradicated, which—were the Bahá'í principles practically applied should be quite possible—a love of Beauty would soon become a quickening force among all men, instead of being, as now, more or less the culture of minorities.

THE MOSQUE OF ISFAHAN: Through a small reproduction, decorated with mosaic faience, of the entrance to the Royal Mosque at Isfáhán, we reverently enter. Shall we remove our shoes? Or is it only a reflection in the pool of water that stands before it? We pass beneath its glittering facets, thinking of the youthful Báb Who, during the year He spent in this ancient capital of the Safavi kings, must often have crossed the broad sunlit expanse of the Meidan-i-Shah and entered here to worship. Here, where the angry Ulemas refused to meet Him in conclave, fearful of their own confounding.

In imagination we see, in the spacious courtyard, lined with shrubs and flower beds, a number of black-robed figures, bowing towards the Kibla, with foreheads to the ground. Or upon the wide-spread carpet beneath the dome they stand, making response to the voice of the Mullah. The name of Allah in deep sonorous chords fills the air. Rich colors of turquoise blue and green and crimson streams over the assembled worshippers. But now, clear through the silence that has fallen, one hears the warning voice of God's new Messenger to men.

"Rend asunder the veils. Beware lest celebration preventeth you from the Celebrated, and worship from the Worshipped!" Or its echo comes to us in the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

"O, army of Life! East and West have joined to worship stars of faded splendor, and have turned in prayer unto darkened horizons . . . In this holy dispensation, the crowning glory of bygone ages and cycles, faith is no mere acknowledgment of the unity of God, but rather the living of a life that manifests the virtues and perfections implied in such belief."

Over our heads hang a pair of lacquered doors enriched with gold, believed to have come from the "Hall of Forty Columns," the beautiful open audience chamber of Shah Abbas, and little garden palace, wherein Minuchihr Khan so successfully concealed the Báb from His enemies.

JEWELS: Now let us pause for a few minutes before the blazing jeweled appurtenances of the Persian Crown. The cases are aglitter with objets d'art which bear eloquent witness to the lavish extravagance of the country's rulers, especially of the Safavean kings, when Persia knew unusual prosperity and the Court touched a height of unprecedented splendor. The walls above are draped with rugs woven of silk and gold fit for royal gifts. And we remember that Bahá'u'lláh, brought up in the precincts of the Court, must often have seen such sights as these—quite possibly these very objects—bowls and vases of gold inlaid with exquisite enamels, gem encrusted rosewater ewers, huge emeralds, glistening pearls, diamonds and pink tourmalines, richly embroidered garments and priceless ornaments—and in after years drawn numerous analogies therefrom.

“O children of the Spirit! Ye are My treasures, for in ye I have treasured the pearls of My mysteries, and the gems of My knowledge.”

“Look at the Pearl! Verily its lustre is in itself, but if thou coverest it with silk it assuredly veileth the beauty and qualities thereof. Such is man—his nobility is in his virtues not in that which covereth him.”

Just such a finely wrought damascend sword as this might the great Teacher have had in mind when He wrote:

“O my Servant! Thou art like unto a well-tempered sword that lieth concealed in the darkness of its sheath and the value thereof is unknown to the expert eye”

And as all fair things may thus serve to remind us of diviner, this gold necklet sparkling with old diamonds, rubies and pearls will flash to us its spiritual message—“Your ornament is the love of God.”

Again we catch the same note in Bahá'u'lláh's stirring appeal to the Pope:

“Sell that which thou hadst of decked ornaments and expend it in a sovereignty to the King Should anyone come unto thee with the treasures of the earth, turn not thy sight towards them; but be as thy Lord hath been.”

Or in His passionate appeal to Nasir-ud-din Shah: “. . . . Where are their hidden treasures and their apparent gauds, their bejeweled thrones and their ample couches? Emptied is what they treasured up, dissipated is what they collected, and dispersed is what they concealed”

And then there comes to us those words of gracious promise and profound yearning:

“To gather jewels have I come to this world. If one speck of a jewel lie hid in a stone, and that stone is beyond the seven seas, until I have found and secured that jewel my hand shall not stay from its search.”

THE ART OF THE BOOK: To those for whom the literature of Persia—its poetry, philosophy, legends and religions—possess the dominating interest, a world of wonder and delight lies open among the Manuscripts and Miniature Paintings.

Sometimes we have questioned why it was that this new Message of God should have been clothed in the tongue and revealed through the characters of such ancient languages as Arabic and Persian, languages so hard for us to learn and so far removed from the usages of the Western, and particularly the Anglo-Saxon world. But beholding these masterpieces of calligraphy one ceases to wonder. The very forms of the letters, their graceful curves and flowing outlines inscribed in crimson and black, blue and gold, convey a vivid impression of combined beauty and dignity. Suras from the Qur-an appear on thick golden-leaved parchment, intertwined with arabesques and richly colored mosaics. And one realizes that here is a language and a penmanship more worthy than any other could be to bear the traces of the Supreme Pen—"from the treasury of which the gems of wisdom and utterance, and the arts of the whole world have appeared and become manifest."

And with what keen freshness of understanding we remember our Lord's injunction:

"Write that which we have revealed unto thee with the ink of Light upon the tablet of the spirit . . . and if thou canst not do this, then write with that crimson ink that hath been shed in my path . . ."

It is with a sense of profound deprivation that one admiringly contemplates, but cannot read, these brilliant quatrains from some of the world's supreme Poets, from the Diwan of Hafiz, the mystical Jami and Jalal-ud-din Rumi—author of those famous lines quoted by Persian Bahá'is:

"It needs an eye which is king discerning To recognize the King under every disguise."

Here too are beautiful specimens of lacquered calamdans, or long penceases,—looking as though they might have come out of an old Italian studio,—used by a Persian scribe, and in which he carried the Indian ink, reeds, scissors, etc., so essential to his art. And one calls to mind the remarkable calligraphy displayed by both the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh, and which, to the Oriental mind constituted so sure a sign of inspiration. It was at Kum that Mullah Abdul Karim received in trust the pencease and seals bequeathed by the Báb to His Successor; when, at the urgent request of those present was revealed a pencease in the form of a man, penned by the Báb with such fineness and delicacy that it appeared like a single wash of ink on the paper, and containing 360 derivatives from the root word Baha. After examining some of these extraordinary pen drawings, one can better appreciate this form of art. But probably only a Persian, and a calligraphist, could fully understand the skill and spiritual significance of such a creation.

For any real appreciation of the beauty of Persian paintings one finds it necessary to make practical application of the Bahá'í principle of discarding prejudices and preconceived ideas, and trying, by means of a sympathetic imagination, to enter into a different realm of thought and perception. A most fascinating and profitable exercise!

To our Western minds, accustomed for centuries to a form of art so much more localized and representative, with its decided anthropomorphic tendencies, these paintings seem to possess a curiously impersonal atmosphere. We begin to realize that the outlook of an Oriental artist is far more universal and abstract than ours—of the mind rather than of matter. It is essentially decorative in character. No attempt is made to render light and shade. Everything glows in brilliant hues, distinct and hard like a jewel. Yet are these miniatures fragile marvels of minute detail. Strange that a country of such empty spaciousness and magnitudes should produce an art so microscopic! As though the mind thereby sought for and found a necessary reaction and relief.

Persian mirror cases, lacquered pen cases and book covers painted and lacquered by famous artists of the Court of Shah Abbas and later such as Ali Gholi, Agha Zaman. (From the collection of Mirza Ali Kuli Khan, Persian Art Center, Hollywood, Calif.)

It is also interesting to note that Persia paid less honor to her painters than to her poets. This is in part due, no doubt, to the fact that the priests of Islam inferred, from a restriction given in the Qur'an regarding images in the mosques, that Muhammad prohibited painting and sculpture. Which only goes to show that religious zealots in all ages are especially prone to "magnify His strictness with a zeal He would not own." At any rate, the Moslem has always lacked the inspiration afforded by religion to the Christian, Hindu or Chinese. Painting too was essentially an affair of Courts for the materials used cost money and so could not be executed without the patronage of the wealthy. The painter, therefore, was less happily situated than the poet, who could paint his word-pictures, and weave his "metrical chaplet of coral and pearls and gold" more independently.

To a Bahá'í student, in this connection, two figures make an outstanding appeal. One is the Prophet-Artist Mani, who, about three hundred years after Christ, sought to reconcile his own Zoroastrianism with the new teachings from Galilee. It was Zoroaster who founded the Messianic idea, and prophesied the ultimate coming of Shah Bahram to establish a reign of righteousness and peace, weaving for his followers the three-fold cord of good thoughts, good words, good deeds. With clear inward vision Mani perceived that these two great Teachers were in the realms of Spirit one. To this fusion of religions he tried to unite art, holding that painting was a sacred rite and duty. He had an immense following; St. Augustine being, at one time, among his adherents. Like many another pioneer idealist he perished for his beliefs. But the influence he exerted on his country's art still lives.

And here, among many small but lovely paintings illustrating Persia's poetic legends, hangs a picture by Bihzad illustrating the story of Laila and Majnun, to whose power of yearning love Bahá'u'lláh refers in the "Seven Valleys." Bihzad is the second figure to claim our interest, for he was Persia's supreme artist. Born at a time when Sufi Mysticism had permeated the very marrow of the nation's life, he has introduced into his work this element of spiritual love. As a painter he caught the same vision that inspired the poets Jami and Jalal-ud-din Rumi and many others of that particular period; and under the spell of this ideal of the realization of the divine, he created his country's masterpieces.

Before such beauty one can only stand in quiet contemplation; not seeking to define it, but rather letting it define us, lending the time necessary for its radiant colors and inner meanings to awake within us a responsive echo of joy. So that we may not merely look, but perceive; not only admire but understand.

"THE PAST is a mirror of the future." Great as have been the achievements of Persia in bygone ages, widespread as her influence has been on the art and literature of the world, it is by a far more wonderful contribution that she is destined to shine for future generations; and by exemplifying in her national life the principles laid down by Bahá'u'lláh, to create a new and brilliant social order such as no country in the world has ever yet known.

"Glory be upon the people of the Glory!"

OUR BROTHER

(Humbly dedicated to Shoghi Effendi)

So wise he is, and noble, and so true,
So radiant of soul, and like a king;
So fair and tall, he is as if he grew
By Living Fountains in the heart of Spring . . .
I have not seen him save in mystic flight,
I have not touched his hand except in prayer.
I know him still as God's appointed Knight
Of Truth and Beauty in a world of care.
I, being weak, am mute before his face,
And yet all flame and wonder to behold him;
Since Life withholds from me this gift of grace
I dare in reverence alone to fold him.
And still forswear the need of human other,
So strong, so true, so tender is our Brother!

No. 1

One of the Bahá'í principles "suggests a plan whereby all the individual members may enjoy the utmost comfort and welfare. The degrees of society must be preserved. The farmer will continue to till the soil, the artist pursue his art, the banker to finance the nations. An army has need of its general, captain, and private soldiers. The degrees varying with the pursuits are essential. But in this Bahá'í plan there is no class hatred. Each is to be protected and each individual member of the body politic is to live in the greatest comfort and happiness. Work is to be provided for all and there will be no needy ones seen in the streets."—Abdu'l-Bahá.

DOES THE STATE owe the individual a living? Certainly not, says America. That is a matter of individual effort. Those who are willing to work, and who are industrious, can earn a living commensurate with their ability. Those who are feeble of intellect, or incapacitated for labor, are supported by the State, but no others.

Yet already, in great sections of the world, a new philosophy is being applied with revolutionary effect—namely, that the State must guarantee a livelihood to every individual born into it.

The apparent cause of this great economic innovation is the universally prevalent unemployment situation. Those who will not work may languish, we have said. But what of those who will work, yet through no fault of their own cannot find work?

For the first time in the history of the world, governments consciously are facing this dilemma and striving to find an answer to it. "Let them starve!" is plainly not the answer. "Feed them!" is the universal slogan. But how?

The world, taken unawares, is today desperately trying to work out some plan whereby life, as well as liberty, shall be guaranteed to every individual. For liberty is not of much use to dying men; and democracy must offer its citizens richer values than the mere liberty of starving when work fails.

THE STATE does not exist as an abstraction. The modern State is conceived of as a cooperative enterprise, safeguarding to each individual composing the group the opportunity for the pursuit of life, happiness and prosperity. The State is for the benefit of the individual, not the individual for the benefit of the State. The duty which the individual owes to the State is simply to contribute to the power and capacity of the State to aid the individual.

The power of circumstance rather than the appeal of theory has forced the leading nations of today to such a philosophy of the State. As a Labor member of the British Parliament recently told the writer, Great Britain has definitely adopted the point of view that the State must guarantee a livelihood to every individual, and this policy dominates its action in the face of unemployment. All of Europe is acting along much the same lines. In America the civic organizations and city governments have largely been meeting the crisis of unemployment; but should that crisis continue longer, the city treasuries being now nearly exhausted from this strain the nation as a whole will have to face the definite problem which Europe is meeting in a practical way.

A GENERATION and a half ago Bahá'u'lláh, sending forth His Message of a World Revelation and a New World Order based upon the divine pattern, made the declaration that the right to live is sacred to every individual; and that it would be the duty of the Bahá'í State of the future to safeguard that right, the community standing at all times back of the individual and guaranteeing him a livelihood. Since that Creative Word went forth, the Spirit has been stirring the heart and conscience of man, stimulating world thought to the point where today it has arrived at virtual acceptance of this great economic truth.

The new State, by whatever name we may label it, will certainly be cooperative rather than individualistic. It will plan for the individual members of the group much in the same way as the family has always planned for the career of its members and safeguarded their welfare. In the Orient the patriarchal family, expanding to a very large unit, has guaranteed to all of its members cooperative aid in case of destitution or misfortune, the family group standing solidly behind each member. Today the idea of the family is everywhere merging into the larger idea of the State; and those dynamic qualities inherent in the family as a vital unit governing human conduct and human welfare will reappear in the larger unit, the State.

It is evident, however, that a change must come over the individual as well as over the State in order that this cooperative arrangement should be made successful. If the State owes the supreme duty of life and welfare to the individual, so the individual owes supremely to the State the duty of contributing according to his ability and prosperity to the power of the State to accomplish its necessary ends and purposes.

Doubtless as the State is seen by the individual to be more and more an agent for his prosperity and happiness, he as an individual will develop an increasing loyalty and devotion to the State. To contribute in taxation from the surplus means at his disposal will become an accepted responsibility, and to men of large heart and conscience even an enjoyed privilege; since such contribution to the State will plainly be seen as a means of benefaction to all everywhere who are in need or misfortune and as a means of guidance and development to those who have abilities to express.

The haphazard application of philanthropy under our present individualistic system, where man gives of his superfluity only as he feels moved to do so, will yield to a more orderly, beneficent and intelligent plan conducted by the State and reaching a fruition such as private philanthropy could never attain.

ALL OF THIS implies a growth in the spiritual nature of man. In fact, the whole economic and political structure of humanity is always expressive of that spiritual state of development which humanity has at the time reached.

Private philanthropy in the twentieth century expresses magnificently the spiritual conscience planted in the human race through the teachings of Christ. But this spirit of good will and beneficence must be broadened and transferred from the individual to the state; so also must the spirit of individual responsibility and service to the State become correspondingly broadened and deepened.

The Bahá'í Movement works simultaneously along both lines of action. While it holds out to humanity the perfect pattern for the future State, it also stimulates and inspires humanity to that degree of spiritual development essential to the carrying out of such a program.

It has been said of the Inca civilization at the time of its conquest by Pizarro, that it had achieved through organization a certainty of livelihood for all of its members. One writer queries which was the higher civilization, that of the conqueror or of the conquered.

Many factors go to make up civilization, but in epochs of a transitional nature certain factors assume a tremendous importance and certain needs must be satisfied if civilization is to survive. Today these factors which must be satisfied are the economic and spiritual. The Roman empire fell mainly because its economic structure was rotten. It had become a supreme expression of gross selfishness.

Humanity today faces the necessity of working out a foundation for its economic life which shall assure stability, not only to the economic but also to the political structure. The pattern given us by Bahá'u'lláh is perfect for such a purpose. And Destiny, which works as a hidden force stimulating and urging humanity onward in its evolution, is forcing the world to the recognition of new economic truths, preparing it for the adoption of the Bahá'í State as revealed by Bahá'u'lláh.

“Nothing short of the all-encompassing, all-pervading power of His [’Abdu’l-Bahá’s] guidance and love can enable this newly-enfolded order to gather strength and flourish amid the storm and stress of a turbulent age, and in the fulness of time vindicate its high claim to be universally recognized as the one Haven of abiding felicity and peace.”

—Shoghi Effendi.

CAPITAL AND LABOR

THE question of socialization is very important. It will not be solved by strikes for wages. All the governments of the world must be united and organize an Assembly, the members of which should be elected from the parliaments and the nobles of the nations. These must plan with the utmost wisdom and power so that neither the capitalists suffer from enormous losses, nor the laborers become needy. In the utmost moderation they should make the law, then announce to the public that the rights of the working people are to be strongly preserved. Also the rights of the capitalists are to be protected. When such a general plan is adopted by the will of both sides, should a strike occur, all the governments of the world collectively should resist it. Otherwise, the work will lead to much destruction, especially in Europe. Terrible things will take place. One of the several causes of a universal European war will be this question. For instance, the owners of properties, mines and factories should share their incomes with their employees, and give a certain fair percentage of their products to their workingmen in order that the employees may receive, besides their wages, some of the general income of the factory, so that the employee may strive with his soul in the work.

No more trusts will remain in the future. The question of the trusts will be wiped away entirely. Also, every factory that has ten thousand shares will give two thousand shares of these ten thousand to its employees, and will write them in their names so that they may have them, and the rest will belong to the capitalists. Then at the end of the month, or year, whatever they may earn, after the expenses and wages are paid, according to the number of shares, should be divided among both. In reality, so far, great injustice has befallen the common people. Laws must be made, because it is impossible for the laborers to be satisfied with the present system.

A NEW ECONOMIC CONSCIENCE

HARLAN F. OBER

"Moderation is desirable in every affair and when it is exceeded it leads to detriment."—Bahá'u'lláh.

"In former ages it has been said, 'To love one's native land is Faith.' But the Tongue of Grandeur hath said in the Day of (this) Manifestation: Glory is not his who loves his native land, but glory is his who loves his kind."—Bahá'u'lláh.

A GREAT episode is unfolding before the eyes of the people of the world. It is the drama of "humanity on the move." Happy is that one who, from the vantage point of detachment and spiritual vision, can observe this stirring spectacle.

In an address, before the Free Religious Association, Boston, Mass., Abdu'l-Bahá said—

"Creation is the expression of motion. Motion is life. A moving object is a living object, whereas that which is motionless is as dead. All created forms are progressive in their planes or kingdoms of existence under the stimulus of the power or spirit of life. The universal energy is dynamic. Nothing is stationary in the material world of outer phenomena, or in the inner world of intellect and consciousness."

At present most of the nations and peoples of the world are affected by a depression in the field of commerce. Economic disturbances are not a new phenomenon, but observers have pointed out that this disturbance which is seriously affecting the health and equilibrium of the entire world, possesses certain characteristics never previously developed to the degree now apparent.

For instance, this difficulty reveals extraordinary contrasts, of famine and plenty, of wealth and poverty, of industrial activity and industrial stagnation. Under the stimulus of new knowledge, the earth, the air and the seas have poured forth their treasures to an unprecedented degree. The controlled power of electricity, steam and gasoline, have developed industry and agriculture to a point never before known.

Intensive cultivation of crops has developed a surplus of wheat, cotton, coffee, sugar, rubber and other commodities. The producers find themselves in financial difficulties because of low prices, and millions of potential consumers are unable to buy either the food products or the materials they need for clothing or shelter, or manufacture.

Some nations possess an excess of gold and others have too small a proportion to be able to develop prosperity through interchange of products.

It is apparent therefore that the great difficulty, (in the world) is caused by the lack of a proper circulation, an inadequate distribution of wealth.

One economist with international experience has stated that the great difficulty was that business had become international, but that the various governments of the world, operating from a limited national viewpoint, not realizing this international requirement were interposing various artificial barriers and hindrances to the streams of commerce, thereby producing these periodic disturbances.

There is no doubt that this situation exists and that it has a definite influence and effect. It is apparent to the thoughtful that the real causes lie deeper than this, and the people of the world need the realization of certain fundamental facts if permanent prosperity is to be established.

A great power is undoubtedly stirring the world, but in the main this power is being directed into limited channels. It is not being made available to all the peoples of the world, largely because antiquated ideas are in control of the minds and hearts of men.

These periodic collapses are apparently necessary to compel a realization of world-interdependence. Since however, outer action springs from inner thoughts, it is most important that universal thoughts, big enough to surround the world order, shall penetrate the minds of the leaders in all the nations.

Bahá'u'lláh stated many years ago that the only thing that would prevent these violent commotions and agitations would be that the peoples of the world should become united in affairs or in one religion.

This unity cannot come into existence except through the establishment of an international body or group possessing the new spiritual vision, in whom the world will have confidence. When such a body is firmly established, it will be in a position to gather all facts regarding world conditions, and to give wise and true guidance to all the peoples. Until such a group is operating then each nation or industrial or agricultural unit working from its own knowledge and plans, must inevitably come into collision with conditions of which it has inadequate knowledge, and over which it has but slight control.

One of the most interesting phases of the phenomena of modern life is the very rapid development of conscious control of affairs. At present the areas of control are too limited, but the fact is there. It is apparent that God purposes, for this great age, that all things shall bow down before the power of spiritual man. He is not to be a derelict driven here and there on the seas of life, or by natural forces, but is intended to develop an intelligent and ordered civilization, with all affairs subordinated to a spiritual purpose and a divine control.

The outer phenomena, the vehicle of the new world order, is being prepared. The guiding power will in time become evident to all.

The description of the Tower of Babel is a description of our times, for each builder while longing to build a great edifice, speaks his own language, and works in his own way. The result is confusion, uncertainty and loss.

The Plan of Bahá'u'lláh is simple and direct. It is a swift healing antidote. It recognizes the fact that ideas control action, and that no result will come until fundamental ideas are changed.

Mankind must wake up and become aware of the facts of life and of the world. It must forget past ideas—freeing itself wholly from prejudice—realizing that the world is one home, that all men are brothers, and are co-sharers in the privileges and responsibilities of life on this planet.

Since all are the children of God, and the recipients of His mercy, it is clear that all must work together in the building up of the new civilization.

Is there any justice or wisdom in the competitive program now in existence, that condemns large industrial and agricultural groups in various parts of the world, to low standards of life, and the hardships of economic slavery? It is certain that the development of world markets was not for this purpose, but rather that, through the interchange of products of skill, there should be mutual benefits and not loss.

The Plan of Bahá'u'lláh has both a vision and practicality, greatly needed at this time. While looking upon the world as a whole, and considering all the titanic forces that ebb and flow, it starts with the individual in the small community, and considers his rights and privileges. The whole is made up of all the parts. The rights of the smallest child in the smallest community must be preserved, because he is a part of the whole.

What a contrast this suggests to our present day industrial and community methods.

Can we imagine in this new world order a situation such as exists today in many industrial communities throughout the world, where tremendous wealth flows out to the world, but the workers live year after year with precarious employment, and uncertain future.

I recently visited a County Home in a mining area, where the majority of inmates were former miners. Their long hours below the ground, far removed from the life-giving rays of the sun, had had their effect and had afflicted them with physical difficulties incident to their employment. Though this work is always dangerous because of the possibilities of explosions from dust or gases, the compensation received does not take into consideration these hazards. At the end, physically weakened, they live a drab uneventful life in the home provided by the county, grateful for its shelter, and its food.

How attractive, how merciful is the provision of Bahá'u'lláh in reference to the establishment of a standard of living, below which none in the community shall be permitted to fall. Before the wealth of the village is sent to other parts of the world, the needs of the village and of the individual must be considered and adequate provision made.

History shows that for thousands of years religious, racial and commercial wars have destroyed the peace and prosperity of the world. The remote village as well as the leading cities have been affected by these periodic uncertainties. An aggressive, selfish program, of some nation or group would suddenly turn apparent prosperity into calamity and loss.

No standard of living could be successfully maintained under these conditions, and history records the great extremes that were reached.

The Most Great Peace, as one of the evidences of True Internationalism can alone provide the inner stability necessary for the establishment of proper standards of life.

Is it not an interesting fact (one that is often overlooked), that the only guarantee of freedom to the village, is a world government, which shall protect all, from the piratical attacks that have up to this time afflicted humanity.

The Spiritual Civilization is in reality the protector of Material Civilization.

The gradual development of the plans of the new world order will be thrilling. How happy will the world be when the action of its chosen and wise leaders, considering the welfare of all, establish those plans that will bring both peace and plenty to all mankind. This will come and the joy of the world will reach to the supreme spheres.

“But if material civilization shall become organized in conjunction with divine civilization, if the man of moral integrity and intellectual acumen, shall unite for human betterment and uplift with the man of spiritual capacity, the happiness and progress of the human race will be assured. All the nations of the world will then be closely related and companionable, the religions will merge into one, for the divine reality within them all is one reality.”*

*Teachings of 'Abdu'l-Baha.

AWAKE AND SING

MAYE HARVEY GIFT

TODAY I am enamored of the beauty of the world of creation. In my heart paeans of thanksgiving and praise are welling up and pouring forth in endless stream. All my life have I gazed upon these landscapes, but today they really live for me. There is a fresh vividness of color, a new delicacy of fragrance, an exquisite grace of form that mine eyes have not glimpsed before. The song of the lark falls on my rapturous ear, the rose is radiant with dew, the sunset flaunts its banners gloriously o'er the sky and the stars scintillate like precious gems.

These are but the externals, the beautiful symbols of a new world of significances. The great reality is but beginning to dawn upon me. In some way quite unexplainable in mere words, I have emerged from the dark restriction of the chrysalis and am winging my eager way through infinite spaces. Shall we call it a new birth—an extension of consciousness—I care not. It is the wonder of the experience itself that holds me enthralled.

A small leather-bound book, “Hidden Words,” opened to me this new world of joy and illumination. It was with this very simple yet profound sentence: “In the garden of thy heart plant naught but the rose of love." I had read these words of Bahá'u'lláh before and had seen in them a certain truth and beauty of imagery. But today—I must pause a bit at the all-powerful sensation and live it over! But today—no one can take another into such a soul-revealing experience! Today, it was as if those words had become living, vibrating spirit; as if through their power a veil had been torn apart and I had caught a glimpse of the wondrous world of reality. It is a new world, this garden of the heart, and I look upon its beauties with a new eye, hearken unto its melodies with a new ear and speak its truths with a new voice. That many will not understand does not make it any the less real to me. But I have a great longing to share it with others, for it brings the life and contentment and infinite joy that only the Master of Life can impart.

While darkness still covers a slumbrous world I waken to explore this new realm of mine. I see the stars scintillating and brilliant—countless glowing worlds stretching away into a vast eternity of space. But now they are more than stars, more even than worlds; they are living torches of light to guide the souls of men throughout the gloomy night till morning breaks. Then I hearken unto a first faint stir, a movement, a growing restlessness around me, as if it were the groping search of the soul of humanity, "O! that I knew where I might find Him!" Then with a note of hope a melody rises, it swells, it breaks forth into a hallelujah chorus as the dawn comes on apace. The myriad birds are greeting the new day!

The morn is coming! Heralded by the beauteous morning star and by this burst of song, the red-orbed sun moves toward the horizon as does a monarch toward his throne. Again I see beyond the physical symbol. I see the Sun of Truth, the Mighty Illuminator of the realm of hearts and minds, dawning.

Rejoice! Rejoice! The gloom of doubt and ignorance has vanished!

Rejoice! Rejoice! The darkness of man's selfishness is past!

Rejoice! Rejoice! The night of fruitless, baffling strife is over!

Rejoice! Rejoice! For struggle is transmuted into praise!

Bahá'u'lláh, the Light of God, has risen!

A Day of Peace and Brotherhood is dawning!

Awake, O Earth! Awake and sing!

"Springtime is springtime no matter when or how often it comes. The Divine Prophets are as the coming of spring, each renewing and quickening the teachings of the Prophet who came before him. Just as all seasons of spring are essentially one as to newness of life, vernal showers and beauty so the essence of the mission and accomplishment of all the Prophets is one and the same."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

DISCUSSION, CONSULTATION AND DOGMA

E. B. M. DEWING

In a previous article the writer dealt with various aspects of consultation and discussion, and gave some of the Bahá'í Teachings on this important question. Views of a number of social scientists were quoted to show in how great a degree this law of Bahá'u'lláh has penetrated the world. This article is intended to go into the question in additional detail, and to show how consultation influences the religious life of society. This introduces the question of religious organization and dogma.

"The Great Being saith: the firmament of divine wisdom shineth with the twin orbs of consultation and mercy. Take counsel together in all things, inasmuch as consultation is the guiding that giveth enlightenment and leadeth unto the Way."

WHEN one contemplates the social developments that are taking place in the world today, after having read the above mighty resounding words uttered by Bahá'u'lláh, their prophetic truth irresistibly impresses one. This passage like many others reminds us that when Bahá'u'lláh came, He commanded and it is. While individuals in loving self-sacrifice are hurrying hither and thither attending this Bahá'í meeting and passing that motion with so little apparent result, the powers of darkness are ceaselessly being rolled back by the "Mysterious Forces of Civilization."

Consultation, hand in hand with discussion, is rapidly becoming the order of the day, and one does not realize what a vital part these twain already play in the life of the community, until one starts to take notice. Discussion is of lesser importance than consultation. In the case of the former a mere exchange of ideas takes place; while in the case of the latter a decision is required. During consultation, discussion is employed, so in that sense discussion is the tool of consultation.

Consultation is a new science, and so it is not surprising to find that those who attempt to take part in it often fail and inharmony results. It is essential for each individual to endeavor to the utmost to eliminate his personality as much as possible and to merge himself into the whole, in the interest of the whole. In this New Era we are seeing the dawn of mass consciousness and the gradual departure of the night of intense individuality. There is no occasion to shed tears over the departure of the individualist—he is an egoist and a constant source of conflict, and the sooner his departure is complete, the better it will be for us all. No doubt many will express the fear that future society, if it is to assume this harmonious and corporate aspect, will produce a kind of mass production automaton. Concern on this score is groundless. Truth never betrays the idealist and her weapon of defense is the paradox. Although consultation necessitates the elimination of the individualist, it does not destroy individuality, but on the contrary enhances it, because consultation encourages specialization. This age is also the age of the specialist, and the specialist most assuredly exists to be consulted. The true individualist in the highest sense, is outstanding because of his capacity to serve and his ability to control his ambitions and selfish desires. Those who have been privileged to mingle freely with various Bahá'í communities, will know that in this sense the units of a harmonious group are intensely individualistic.

The manner in which this tendency in the world at large operates is often surprising, and we see it most in the various social services and professions. It can best be described as a complex movement that is a reaching out on the one hand and a withdrawal or a restriction of the sphere of activity on the other. Thus we see the psychologist in court as an expert witness in cases that run the gamut from an automobile accident to juvenile delinquency. The medical practitioner calls in the social worker, who reports on the personal life of the patient; the judge of the juvenile court case forgets all about his legal training and consults with the psychiatrist; and so forth. Perhaps one of the most remarkable examples of consultation is the case conference committee in social work. In this instance the opposite process takes place and the expert consults with the amateur. The committee usually consists of interested people in the community whose only qualification is their good standing, and the case worker—the expert consults with them. It can truthfully be said that this is a very highly evolved type of consultation, because the decision rests entirely with the collective wisdom of the entire group.

In one American city the social workers have adopted with striking success, what is known as the block system. The city is divided into areas and residents in those areas consult with the social workers on all matters appertaining to their social welfare. One more example must suffice. In Montreal recently a new Y. M. C. A. started and its success as far as membership is concerned has created a record for North America. Apart from the fact that it is of outstanding interest in that its membership consists of the entire family—a completely new departure in that respect alone—it is managed by a number of secretaries who consult together, and in the words of one of them, "We have no bosses." The different clubs and activities are all controlled by the people themselves, and to be brief the entire enterprise is based on a system of control similar to the local, national and international Spiritual Assemblies of the Bahá'í Movement.

II

IN A PREVIOUS article, it was maintained that the highest conception of consultation yet attained was that upheld by the Bahá'í teachings, because here consultation is to be conscious and loving. It is interesting to note in the following brief classification the degree in which various types of associations practicing some form of consultation, function in the light of this conception. There may be those who object to the inclusion of love as a vital force in social relations, on the grounds that it is too abstract a quality. To these the Bahá'í Cause makes no apology, for it aims to spiritualize every branch of human relationship and to elevate all and sundry by the insertion of a little more of the quality of love into their affairs. "The disease which afflicts the body-politic is lack of love and absence of altruism," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá. This list is purely tentative and no doubt could be much improved. Moreover there is bound to be considerable overlapping.

1. Advisory Councils to an Absolute Monarch or a Dictator.

Here we have the lowest type of consultation. The legislators hands are tied for they can only consult within prescribed limits. Their decisions are not vital, because they are for the ruler to use as he thinks fit.

2. Undisguised Self-interest Groups.

Under this heading come boards of directors, etc., and meetings of shareholders.

3. Legislative Councils and Local Boards.

Here the groups discuss a great deal, but depend on majorities. At least two groups within the group usually exist and their motives are usually complex, for they avow concern for the people, but have to be loyal to party which is dictated to by groups and forces behind the scenes. Self interest is the main motive and there is no real attempt during discussion to reach a harmonious conclusion. If however these groups should act purely as they profess, i. e., in the interest of the people they would rank in a division by themselves between 6 & 7.

4. Associations for Promotion of Sections of Society.

These are largely for self-interest. Under them come Rotary Clubs, trade unions, associations of employers, cooperative societies etc. Here the type of discussion employed is a definite advance, because interest in the welfare of others is much more decided. Soviets also are entitled to inclusion under this group because they are confined to one section of society, i. e., the proletariat.

5. Organizations of One Section of Society in the Interests of Another.

Obviously under this group would come charities and philanthropic societies. Discussion is usually of a high type by reason of the altruistic motives of the association.

6. Discussion Groups.

Under this heading come debating societies, study groups, scientific associations. These definitely recognize the value of discussion, but no great principle is involved.

7. Fusion of Two or More Opposing Groups.

Under this come businesses where employees have a controlling interest in the business with the employers.

Also all types of conferences to promote harmony and understanding between opposing sections of society. For example conferences for better understanding between workers and employers; between opposing religions; racial amity conferences; disarmament conferences; informal discussions such as that between President Hoover and Ramsey MacDonald; and League of Nations Sessions. All these are of a very high consultive nature because differences are freely acknowledged with a view to finding common grounds for agreement.

8. Village Communes and various types of primitive peoples.

These are placed as a separate section because the principle of harmonious discussion is very highly evolved. But there is still no conscious recognition of the value of consultation.

9. Finally the Bahá'í Groups.

In these we see the pattern for all society of the future and the Parliament of Man yet to be, when conscious loving consultation will be the order of the day.

IN THE above summary it will be noticed that churches and religious bodies have not been included. This is because the method of administration and the extent to which consultation is permissible varies so much that it is impossible to classify them as a whole. There is however one characteristic which every church—Christian or Oriental—has in common, and that is a priesthood. Priesthood can best be defined as an impanelled body banded together for the purpose of propagating a set of dogmas and doctrines. They discuss matters to some extent among themselves, but do not encourage the sect as a whole to express their opinions. On the contrary the sect believe what they are told is right to believe. The fate of a church that permits discussion can be vividly pictured after reading the following passage from “An Introduction to Sociology,” by Dawson and Gettys.

“A government by discussion, if it can be borne, at once breaks down the yoke of fixed custom. The idea of the two is inconsistent. As far as it goes the mere putting up of a subject to discussion, with the object of being guided by that discussion is a clear admission that that subject is in no degree settled by established rule, and that men are free to choose in it. It is an admission too that there is no sacred authority—no one transcendent and divinely appointed man whom in that matter the community is bound to obey. And if a single subject or group of subjects be at once admitted to discussion, ere long the habit of discussion comes to be established, the sacred charm of use and wont to be dissolved. ‘Democracy,’ it has been said in modern times, ‘is like the grave; it takes, but it does not give.’ The same is true of ‘discussion.’ Once effectively submit a subject to that ordeal, and you can never withdraw it again; you can never again clothe it with mystery, or fence it around by consecration; it remains forever open to free choice, and exposed to profane deliberation.”

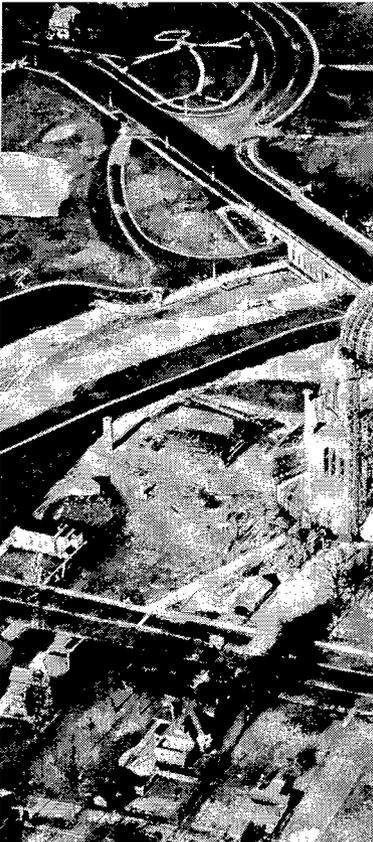

The fact remains that when members of a church begin to discuss and to think for themselves, there are only two things that can happen: either the “heretics” must leave the church and perhaps form one of their own, or the church must modify its doctrines. This alternative in these more enlightened days is becoming more common, but it cannot be denied that when this happens, it is a case of reluctant surrender to the more virile and unfettered thought of the profane.

men begin to discuss and question. Men talked of Jesus of Nazareth and the God Mithra fell; they heard of a humble Camel Driver, and Europe basked in the sunlight of a new culture; a monk pins a notice on a door in the Netherlands, men read and discuss and Rome is lashed to impotent fury; and in this day—in Persia—a young man exhorts the people to think for themselves and unite, and Orthodox Islam is rocked to its foundations and a President of the United States of America propounds “His” Fourteen Points.

As soon as a sect think that they hold a monopoly of Truth, and beliefs come to be considered more important than deeds, the members of that church become as ineffective as a chrysalis. But ere long the hardened and brittle shell splits and the moth of an awakened humanity emerges to stretch its wings in the Light of a new learning. No human or group of humans can erect a credal structure of their own accord, based upon their own interpretations of the teaching of the Prophet and expect it to stand. It is bound to be fallacious in some fundamental doctrine and the integrity of the sect will rest upon the success that meets the efforts of the leaders to curb discussion and free thought.

TODAY THE Bahá'í religion alone can afford to encourage free discussion without fear of modification and disintegration. In this enlightened faith which has no priesthood and in which all have a say in the administration, will be found people, than whom none hold more decided views. To investigators it must surely be a source of wonder that the component parts of such a loosely knit structure are such a composite body. This is because the Bahá'is alone can refer to a written Revelation suitable for this day and complete in every detail. The Báb told of the coming of Bahá'u'lláh; Bahá'u'lláh brought the teachings and appointed 'Abdu'l-Bahá to expound them; and 'Abdu'l-Bahá by His Will and Testament appointed Shoghi Effendi the Guardian of the Cause. Thus there can be no room for doubt as to what the Revealer taught, no room for interpolation. If one of their number adds or rejects a portion of the teachings, he is no longer a Bahá'í.

Thus we see that what the Prophets teach is the only true dogma and what their followers add is supposition, superstition—call it what you will. Jesus, for example, said, “Before Abraham was—I am.” That was pure dogma, pure truth. But His followers—well we know what they have done to His teachings. This aspect of dogma is not the popular conception which groups all absolute statements of the truth as dogma regardless of the author. Perhaps some day a new word will be invented which will differentiate the dogmatic statement of a follower from the truthful utterance of the Prophet. In the notes taken by Mrs. May Maxwell during an informal conversation with Shoghi Effendi, he said:

“There are certain things one must accept in order to be a Bahá'í; a faith and belief in the Manifestation of God, in the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. People will say this is dogma; certainly this is dogma, we must not be afraid of dogma, which is a statement of certain unchangeable truths.

“The Principles of the religion of Bahá'u'lláh which are being spread in the world today, are only a part of the Bahá'i religion. To believe in these Principles, and to teach these Principles, is not sufficient. It is necessary to teach these Principles of Bahá'u'lláh, because through them the world will become awakened and true civilization will become established, but it is only through the belief in the Manifestation of God Himself, through the recognition and adoration of the Source of the Light, that the world will become regenerated.”

There is one aspect of modern life which is peculiar to this period, namely, the number of people, who, having seen the fallacies of the old, refuse to attach themselves to anything else. They besport themselves with glorious socratic freedom in a world of theories and fancies. They have an insatiable appetite for truth which they receive with wide open minds—that wide they are open at both ends so that nothing is absorbed—nothing is accomplished. It is among this type that the Bahá'i Cause would be immensely popular if only there was no responsibility and obligations connected with being a Bahá'i.

In a recent letter to the writer, Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'i Cause, said: “The Cause will never be able to shoulder its increasing responsibilities if it fails now to help the development of its institutions.” And he goes on to say that the tendency today against institutionalism, while salutary in certain respects, if carried to an extreme, would certainly “undermine all our social fabric and bring about a chaotic state of world affairs.”

IV

It is self-evident that without organization nothing of a permanent nature can be accomplished in the way of creating a new world order. Over-institutionalization is bad, it is true, but when one witnesses the personal disorganization that occurs among second generation immigrants for instance, due to the failure of the religion of the parents to be taught to the children, one is sorely tempted to say that even a bad religion is better than none at all. That is rather an extreme example, but nevertheless it drives home the lesson that there is danger in casting adrift from one institution without first having another to take its place. In mundane affairs institutionalization as a necessity is not for one instant questioned, in fact the tendency to organize on a vast scale is continually increasing; yet there are those who say it is not necessary to organize in order to propagate and guard the vital religious truths which make it possible for our material civilization to exist. Nothing worth while is ever accomplished in life by an individual, until he disciplines himself in an organization. Even a great singer undergoes rigid discipline under the guidance of a teacher or school, rules are taught the singer which throughout life are adhered to until it hurts.

Once an individual has become convinced of the divinity of Bahá'u'lláh, it should not be difficult to obey His laws. It is illogical to accept His claim and to reject His message and vice versa. Moreover when one considers that all that he has given to the world is scientifically accurate and that in any case His laws rest but lightly upon the shoulders of His servants, it should not be difficult to obey His behests in love and fellowship.

There is a special virtue in laws laid down by the Manifestations of God, for they affect the lives of those that heed them in a way no earthly laws are able to do. The commands and laws of a Manifestation give to the individual a finality of purpose and a poise which no law of human origin is capable of doing.

The social instability of the world of today is due to the breakdown of religious institutions which have been unable to withstand the strains and stresses placed upon them by the Industrial Revolution. And nothing less than the willingness of the world to accept the laws of Bahá'u'lláh and to abide by them with radiant acquiescence, will make it possible to bring about permanent reorganization and the 'Most Great Peace.' The magnitude of the task confronting the establishing of the New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh so far as precedent is concerned is thus expressed when Professor Cooley says, "But beyond this and looking at the matter from the standpoint of the larger mind, the cause of failure is seen in the difficulty of organization. Even if our institutions were always good we should not succeed because to make good institutions they must be extended into a system. In attempting to do this, our constructive power is used up and discouraged. We are even led to create that which though kind in certain aspects, may brutalize and ossify the individual so that primary idealism in him is almost obliterated. The creation of a moral order on an ever-growing scale is the great historical task of mankind and the magnitude of it explains all shortcomings."

Thus we see that the Bahá'í Cause is attempting to accomplish something which no body of men and women in the past have succeeded in doing. To establish this "new moral order," that will not "ossify" will be the feat of all ages. One pauses to ask, "Can this be done?" And the answer is, not by any man-made organization will it be done. Only God can bring this to pass and His instruments will be great minded men and women who are not too great to submit to self-discipline and self-effacement, and who will consult together to the end that the interests of the whole may first be served.

THE TEMPLE OF LIGHT

ELIZABETH HACKLEY

Then we will build us a temple of light,
A symbol of God among men,
Whose rays of truth will illumine the night
Of man's prejudice, fear, and sin!

Through the nine great doors of religious faith,
Will the races of men come in;
And under one dome of love universal,
Will worship as brothers and kin!

Then hasten the time, O lovers of truth,
When the temple of light will shine;
And in the dawn of God's Great New Day,
We will enter His holy shrine!

THE TEMPLE HAS ARISEN

ALLEN B. MCDANIEL

NINE years ago the foundation of the first Bahá'í Temple in America was completed on the beautiful site in Wilmette, Illinois, at the intersection of Sheridan Road with the north channel of the canal taking water from Lake Michigan. Since that time many thousands of people who daily pass the site have wondered as to what use was being made of this great flat top cylindrical structure, and as to what was to be built on it. The people of the North Shore of Chicago now have their answer, for during the past eight months on this foundation has arisen a unique and remarkable building. All who see it are impressed with its beautiful proportions, the uniqueness of its design, and the dignity of its style and form.

The general contractors, the George A. Fuller Company of New York and Chicago, working in collaboration with twenty-four subcontractors are completing the work which was included in the contract entered into by the Temple Trustees on August 27, 1930, for the construction of the main superstructure of the Temple. This superstructure comprises a structural steel and reinforced concrete and glass-enclosed building which has the general shape and form of the final design of the architect, the late Louis Bourgeois. The engineers in preparing their plans and specifications arranged for the construction at this time of a building which would embody the architect's design and provide for the future application of the exterior ornamental material.

This exterior ornamental material will be added later on as funds become available. During the past nine years the architects and engineers, collaborating with the Trustees and the architect, have been studying this unique problem. It is likely that the major portion of the visible exterior will be some special form of architectural concrete. Metal of a suitable nature, such as an aluminum alloy, will doubtless be used for window grilles and the finer sections of the ornamentation.

The building as it is now being completed consists of four main divisions or stories. The base portion at the first floor is 36 feet high and 150 feet in diameter. It includes a circular hall 72 feet in diameter and extending for a clear height of 138 feet to the interior of the dome. Around this circular hall are nine smaller rooms or chapels, with a main entrance between each pair of rooms. A unique feature of the building is its shape, having nine sides with a pylon at the intersection of each pair of sides or faces.

Above the main story is the first gallery which is also nine sided, but with the corner pylons above the middle of the faces of the main story; that is over each of the nine doorways. This first gallery floor has a height of 47 feet and an approximate diameter of 136 feet. Above the first gallery is the second gallery story which has a height of 20 feet and a diameter of 93 feet. Above this story rises the dome which forms the covering or roof of the central circular area or hall.

The dome consists of an unusual steel framework built in two sections; the lower section supports the hemispherical glass dome which will serve as a watershed for the structure and later on will also support the interior ornamental ceiling. The outer section will support the exterior ornamental surface material. The beautiful arched window spaces are enclosed with heavy glass set in frames and sash which are formed of a non-corrosive material.

For the present, at least, there will be used only one of the nine entrances to the building, namely, that facing the intersection of Sheridan Road and Linden Avenue. This is made necessary as it will be impossible to build the eighteen circular steps on the Temple foundation structure, as these must form a part of the surface ornamental material to be placed in the future.

Through the excellent cooperation of the general contractor, the sub-contractors, and the engineers, it has been possible with the funds available to do considerable work in the basement and in the installation of part of the utilities, including the plumbing, heating, ventilation and electric light and power. In the basement structure the entire floor has been concreted and permanent partitions have been erected for several rooms adjacent to the Linden Avenue entrance, including rest rooms, receiving room, kitchen and serving room, transformer room and space for mechanical and electrical equipment.

The past winter has been an unusually mild one in Wilmette and remarkable progress has been made on the construction. The favorable weather conditions has made it possible to secure a very high quality of concrete masonry. Experts in this field who have seen the work are impressed with this quality and permanent character. In the early morning of January 15, 1931, a fire broke out in a second gallery space, which was being heated to protect the concrete while it was setting under low temperature conditions. This fire driven by a high wind spread over several bays of the second gallery story and destroyed a platform which was suspended at the base of the dome. This fire proved to be a very interesting and instructive test of the concrete masonry. Careful inspection made by experts after the fire indicated that aside from the blackening of the face of the masonry and some slight spalling of the concrete, there was no real structural damage done. The loss was covered by insurance carried by the general and sub-contractors; all damage sustained has been repaired and replaced.

As the building is now entirely enclosed and sufficiently equipped with facilities for heating, ventilation and light, it can be used in the future for the various services of the Cause. These will be set forth and provided for later on by the National Spiritual Assembly, in accordance with the instructions of the Guardian of the Cause, Shoghi Effendi.

The building of the Temple has aroused interest in people the world over, for this is truly the first universal Temple which is open to all the peoples of the world regardless of race, sect or belief. In the years to come people from everywhere will gather under the central dome to worship the one God in the spirit of loving unity and in accordance with the laws of Bahá'u'lláh.

IS RELIGION WORTH WHILE?

A. SAMIMI

The author, who holds an official position in one of the foreign embassies in Tihrán, is one of those numerous Orientals who has attained a perfect fluency in the English language. We have already published articles from his pen, and are promised others in the near future.

RELIGION receives little respect in this present age, when the minds of the thinkers of the world have so much advanced, and the masses are more attracted to the present material civilization with its brilliant scientific discoveries and inventions, than to the spiritual life.

It should be frankly admitted that those who have been so much allured by the outward dazzling beauty of the present material civilization and think they may dispense with religion and its seemingly elaborate principles, are partly right in holding such an opinion. For they see in the present religious systems of the world, when judged only outwardly, an awkwardness in comparison with the marvelous body of scientific knowledge. In the religious doctrines inherited from the past are ideas and beliefs which cause astonishment to those who look upon them at the first glance through the eyes of Twentieth Century intelligence. Consequently, they fail to take the further step of searching into the truth of the principles and ordinances originally revealed by the Founders of religions.

These fantastic and strange looking dogmas and beliefs still held by many followers of the present religions, are in reality a series of superstitions and false ideas which in no way can agree with scientific truth. These dogmas have never been intended or revealed by the Founders of religions, but they have been added in the course of time, to the fundamental spiritual principles revealed by the Founders of the religions, and thus they are man made doctrines. This is why most of the enlightened men of today, when finding these innovations and false ideas to be against scientific rules, are somewhat reluctant even to hear the word "religion."

If, however, we take a further step and thoroughly study the principles of religions as they are revealed, we will see that religion is the only effective and divine force and policy which is able to secure order and harmony among human societies, bring about real peace and comfort, and become the remedy for curing the various social ailments and pains from which humanity has been suffering for ages.

One might say, however, that such an object can be secured by laws and regulations enacted by man. But such laws could only govern mankind as far as their social and civil dealings and relations with each other are concerned. They could not, in any way touch the hearts of people, give them that real tranquility of mind which is so much sought by every individual in the world. Furthermore they could not prevent men from perpetrating unlawful and irregular acts, and from encroaching upon each others' rights. A glance into the history of religions would make very clear the fact that it is only religion which has always been able to accomplish such a wonderful achievement.

All the great world religions, when they first appeared in conformity with the exigencies and requirements of the time and environment, have been able to relieve human beings from various troubles and difficulties, cure them from various ailments and pains, and guide them to the path of prosperity and progress. But after the lapse of a few centuries, the superiors and ecclesiastical heads of religions began to introduce gradually new ideas and personal views of their own into their respective religions, sometimes with more or less self-interest; and in time the originally revealed principles were so much changed and transformed by these additional views and ideas that they seemed to have no relation with the religion itself as it first appeared in the world. One might say that the Sun of religion became darkened and the fundamental principles of religion lost their divine force and ceased to guide humanity along the divine path.

What we need is a religion which may be universal, and thereby promulgate peace and order in all parts of the world in this day when the relations and communications between human societies are rapidly increasing and, as a result, drawing humanity closer together. When we study the existing religions most impartially and in a spirit of searching for truth, we would certainly come to the conclusion that the Bahá'í principles, because of their loftiness and high ideals are the only principles which, being in complete conformity with the exigencies of the time, can adequately administrate the affairs of the world of humanity and bring peace and harmony among various races and creeds. These principles are, in fact, the unique remedy for various ailments with which humanity has been suffering for ages.

Furthermore, if we study the Bahá'í religion, we would find that apart from being of an international nature the Bahá'í teachings clearly and categorically provide that no one has the slightest right to make any comments on, or interpretations of, the writings of Bahá'u'lláh, the Founder of the Bahá'í religion. These principles and teachings are, therefore, immune from any additions or interpretations on the part of individuals.

We may safely say that the Bahá'í religion is now the only universal religion aiming at bringing about complete cooperation and real harmony among humanity and meeting fully the requirements of the present age. It is in other words the only divine force which is able to unite all different religions and creeds of the world.

This is why peace-lovers, philosophers, enlightened men and well-wishers of the world, who are working for establishing peace and for the eradication of hatred and animosity in human society, should for the sake of success in their noble task, after carefully studying the principles of the Bahá'í religion and realizing the absolute necessity and advisability of putting the same into force, try to promulgate these principles and make them known throughout the world.

THE SEARCH FOR TRUTH

EMERIC SALA

The author is a member of the Bahá'í Youth Movement and is a very promising student of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. We welcome contributions from the ever increasing group of young Bahá'ís for they have vision, a new style and a new spirit.

A FEW weeks ago while I was searching for several books in the library, a friend of mine came in, and, seeing me surrounded by so many books, asked what I was looking for. I answered, "I am searching for truth." He smiled. It did not take me long to realize the meaning of this smile because I discovered that truth is something that cannot be found in books. It is infinitely more real, more deep, than we can express in words, or record on paper. I could, however, find a few statements concerning truth like, for instance what Confucius, wrote: "Without truth I know nothing. . . . To learn the truth at day-break and die at eve were enough."

We are all familiar too, with what Christ said: "Know the truth and the truth shall make you free."

Carlyle, the famous English historian, writes: "One man that has a higher wisdom, a hitherto unknown spiritual truth—in him is stronger, not than ten men that have it not, nor than ten thousand, but than all men that have it not. . . ."

These are only a few of the statements I quote to show that truth is something worth looking for.

BUT WHAT IS truth? This reminds me of the story of the blind man who had been asked by a lady to drink milk for his health's sake, but as this man was born blind he never saw milk, so he asked a little boy to describe what it was. The boy said "It is a white stuff, good to drink." The blind man did not know what "white" was, so he asked for an explanation and the boy told him that white was like the top of a goose's back. Next the blind man wanted to know, "What is a goose?." So the boy further explained that the goose is a big bird with a crooked neck. The man wanted to know what "crooked" was. So the little boy put his elbow in the hand of the blind man and said, "This is crooked." Then suddenly one saw the face of the blind man gleam, and he exclaimed, "Now I know what milk is!"

This little story illustrates the easiest way to explain truth. There are millions of people who are satisfied with such an explanation. We, today in the twentieth century, ought to have a clearer and more definite answer. In my search for truth, of course I found a few definitions, but they do not cover the subject. For example—"Truth is conformity to fact or reality—exact accordance with that which is, or has been, or will be." . . . "The characteristic of truth is its capability of enduring the test of universal experience."

We know that man since the beginning of history has been continuously searching for truth. We know that the history of the world is the history of a search for truth. We know that men in every age, in some aspect or other consciously or unconsciously—have been and are seeking for knowledge, for truth. It may be an inarticulate yearning, an unformulated desire—but it is a striving for something.

WHEN 'ABDU'L-BAHA was asked the question, "What is truth?" He said in His wisdom, "Truth in its essence cannot be put into words." But as He was always anxious to satisfy a seeker He further explained: "Truth is the Word of God which gives life to humanity. It restores sight to the blind and hearing to the deaf; it makes eloquent those who are dumb, and living beings out of dead beings; it illumines the world of the heart and soul; it reduces into nothingness the iniquities of the neglectful and erring ones."

We can see, therefore, that truth is the very essence of life itself. It is something creative, something which stands to create harmonious thoughts in our environment—everything beautiful, everything good which helps growth and progress. Truth is the law of the universe, it is the Law of God, the Word of God.

But now, assuming that we accept these explanations of truth, how can we discern, how can we distinguish, truth from falsehood? How can we know what is right and what is wrong, what is elevating and what is degrading? There are, I think, four methods used to discern truth from falsehood.

The first method is by means of our senses. Most philosophers agree that our senses are the most reliable means of discerning truth. They say, if we see a chair with our own eyes, we know that it is true. We can rely on our sense of sight. If we feel the touch of a hot iron, we know it is not ice! If we hear music, we know it is a fact and not imagination. But—does the sun not seem to revolve around the earth? Is it true? According to our sight the stars seem to be smaller than our globe, but is it true? If we go into laboratories and ask the students of physics, they can enumerate a great number of examples proving that we cannot always rely on our senses. Consequently we have discarded our senses as a means of discerning truth from falsehood.

Another method is through our emotions. We know from our own experience how little we can rely on our emotions, how often we are mistaken if we follow just our emotions.

The third method is by way of our reason, one of the most wonderful phenomena of nature! It distinguishes man from the animals. It is one of the underlying means of our present civilization. All the literature of past ages—all of the inventions discovered—were accomplished by means of man's intellect. All our philosophers used reason in their aim to discover truth.

But can we accept our reason as an infallible guide to truth? No, we cannot. Because truth is one; it cannot be many. Our opinions are various. We disagree, we contradict each other. When we try to find truth by means of reason we soon realize that our thoughts reach a chaotic condition; they become confused and we see no way out. The wise, those who reason, will try to find a solution to a problem. They come to different conclusions. Plato, who was well known for his logic, proved through his reasoning that the sun revolved around the earth. Twenty years later this same Plato, with the same logical arguments, proved that the earth revolves around the sun! Consequently we have to discard reason as the sole guide to truth. It is not reliable.

THE FOURTH and last method is through the study of the sacred books, the Old and New Testament, the Qu'ran, the Vedas and all of the other holy scriptures—the sacred writings believed to be inspired by God. We know that millions of people accept the Bible as a standard of truth and follow literally everything it contains. Everything in it is true and everything contradictory to the principles found in the Bible is false. Men were willing to defend it as a standard of truth; they had wars—were willing to kill each other in order to maintain what they believed to be the truth. But can we rely on the sacred writings, on the Bible, and all the other scriptures as truth? Truth is there, but human reason gives to it various interpretations. It is plain that we would not have so many religions and so many opinions and interpretations of the different sacred writings if we knew the Truth. That is why our ideas cross so often. We have to come to the conclusion then that our bible and all other sacred writings, although containing truths in all their integrity, have become involved in man's theologizing to such an extent that the world is still bewildered.

WE HAVE consequently discarded our senses, our emotions (instincts), our reason and theological interpretation of the sacred writings as inadequate in our search for truth. Most of the thinkers who arrive at this conclusion become self-centered, cynical or sophisticated; while a few—the chosen ones—become faithful, firm, the heralds of happiness and the leaders of mankind. These few chosen ones seem to know the truth, as they live a beautiful and harmonious life.

Their secret is obedience to the laws of the universe as revealed by the Manifestations of God. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Interpreter and Expounder of the Law revealed by Bahá'u'lláh for this New Age, has stated:

“No one hath any way to the Reality of Deity except through the instrumentality of the Manifestation. To suppose so is a theory and not a fact.

“That Reality which is the Essence of God cannot be conceived of by any understanding, therefore God has created a Manifestor, and in Him is reflected that Sanctified Reality.”

“God sent His Prophets (Manifestations of God) into the world to teach and enlighten man, to explain to him the mystery of the Power of the Holy Spirit, to enable him to reflect the Light, and so in his turn to be the source of guidance to others.”

This is why we have to turn to the Prophets of God as the only criterion in our search for Truth. The conditions to reach that step, however, are—as expressed in the Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that “man must cut himself free from all prejudice, and from the result of his own imagination, so that he may be able to search for Truth unhindered. Truth is one in all religions, and by means of it the unity of the world can be realized.”

Only those who are acquainted with the claim of Bahá'u'lláh's Message can realize the responsibility laid upon the shoulders of those who know the Truth. Unlike previous dispensations, Truth has been revealed in this Age in the writings of Bahá'u'lláh not only for individual conduct, but also for the reconstruction and consolidation of our social order which is at present tottering to pieces. Those who are conscious of this will realize the significance of the following statement by Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause.

“How pressing and sacred the responsibility that now weighs upon those who are already acquainted with these teachings! How glorious the task of those who are called upon to vindicate their truth, and demonstrate their practicability to an unbelieving world! Nothing short of an immovable conviction in their divine origin, and their uniqueness in the annals of religion; nothing short of an unwavering purpose to execute and apply them to the administrative machinery of the Cause, can be sufficient to establish their reality, and insure their success. How vast is the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh! How great the magnitude of His blessings showered upon humanity in this day! And yet, how poor, how inadequate our conception of their significance and glory! This generation stands too close to so colossal a Revelation to appreciate, in their full measure, the infinite possibilities of His Faith, the unprecedented character of His Cause, and the mysterious dispensations of His Providence.”

THE FLAME OF LIFE

DR. WALTER B. GUY

THE spirit of life, the spirit of man, that entity of reality by which man rises above the animal kingdom and becomes human, that power which endows man with reason, and wisdom and understanding and enables him to obtain mastery over the material world, to subdue the lightning and chain the forces of nature—is from God the Creator, the Sustainer, the Beginning and the End, the Manifest and the Un-Manifest, the Knowable yet Unknowable, the Ineffable Love.

It was this spirit or flame that the lowly Nazarene, the Spirit of God (as He is called throughout the Eastern world), spoke of, when He said, “There is a Light in every man that is born into the world. If that Light be darkened, how great is the darkness.”

His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh in the Hidden Words says; “My Lamp thou art and My Light is in thee.” “I have placed in thee the Essence of my Light.” “Thou art my Light and my Light shall never become extinct. Why dost thou dread extinction? Thou art my Glory and my Glory shall not be veiled.”

The spirit of man is an emanation from the essence of Deity, it functions thru the brain, sees thru the eyes, hears thru the ears and is the superior force or identity, in the human organism.

At the present stage of human evolution the spirit of man is but dimly making itself manifest in human life. Far too much is the ego of man, the personality we call it, governed by the forces of greed, ambition, power over others, wealth and fleshly lusts, ignoring and oft-times unconscious of the mightier forces of the spiritual world. Disbelieving God and yet utterly dependent upon the flame or emanation which keeps the world in equilibrium and order.

Man oft-times denies God yet His attributes are on every hand and His evidences complete. For justice, mercy, wisdom, truth, etc., are the mainsprings of social order and without the manifestation of the eternal attributes no business, barter, trade, city or corporation can survive or carry on.

So in the individual life, recognition of and surrender to the dictates of the human spirit, denial of and mastery over the impulses and desires of the material man, is the full attainment of a victorious life which is destined in some glad day to be the state of all humanity, The Kingdom of Heaven on Earth.

MAN IN his essence is divine, a spark from out of the Essence of Life and Love, whom we call God. Man's true home is not of the earth, but whence he came. Out of pre-existence he appears in this realm of manifestation, and to the realm of pre-existence he returns.

That man should be conscious of this fundamental law and truth, the Messengers and Manifestations of the Eternal One appear at stated, regular, preordained times to call men to Love, Light and Spiritual consciousness. They are ever denied but always affirm—ever oppressed but always conquer—they suffer death, but always live—they are ever imprisoned but always establish freedom for mankind.

They call man from death to life, from sickness to health, from poverty to spiritual wealth, from darkness to spiritual light, from despair to hope, from sorrow to heavenly joy.

True life and happiness on earth is found only by attainment to this spiritual consciousness. "Man must attach himself to an infinite reality so that his glory, his joy and his progress may be infinite." 'Abdu'l-Bahá also said that any truly unselfish service for the uplift of humanity is a step toward the Kingdom of Heaven—the Will of God—the World of Reality.

Hear then the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. "O thou who art alive through the remembrance of God." "Reality on this earth consists in the remembrance of the Almighty. Therefore let your earthly life become a mighty sign of God that thou mayst prepare the way for eternal life. Shouldst thou fail in this endeavor; thy life in this world and the next will surely come to naught." Verily true mention of God lies above all else in the teaching of His Cause. Throughout the untold ages of the past to untold ages to come the Manifestations of Deity—Messengers of Love and Light—have and will call mankind to the Knowledge of God, the Love of God, the Light of God. His Truth, His Law, is His Claim on man. Did He not create him, Does He not sustain him, and at the last will call him to Himself?

These Messengers of Love tell us of the mighty plan of God and call us to partake of the feast, the banquet outspread for us on the Heavenly Table—celestial food of joy, intoxicating wine of the love of God, eternal identity in the presence of God. But man's ears are stopped by the noises of the earthly life and they will not hear. Their eyes are veiled by earthly splendor and they cannot see, their minds are clouded by tradition, imagination and worldly desires and they cannot understand.

HIS HOLINESS Bahá'u'lláh likens this mortal body to a cage which imprisons the nightingale of the spirit, the bird of paradise. In immortal words He writes, "ascend from the dungeon to the beautiful Plains of Life, and arise from the cage of the world to the alluring Garden of the Placeless." Again He says, "Close not thine eyes to the peerless wine of the eternal Beloved, and open not thine eye to the turbid and mortal wine. Take immortal Cups from the Hand of the Cup Bearer of Oneness, and thou shalt become all consciousness and hear the invisible utterance of Reality."

Eternal identity, eternal life, eternal joy, eternal service are found only in that state of consciousness from which we came, for which the heart of man ever longs and that life, joy and love awaits all and is for all.

God's Holy Messengers come from Him, manifest Him, and His attributes, and like trees at the end of the desert point to struggling souls the way home, the road to joy and high content. Their hands hold out the chalice of the Wine of God—They give us Their sublime teachings, the Bread of Life.

As we study their divine teachings, turn to these Messengers of Love in loving appreciation for their unselfish gift, see with unclouded vision their wondrous love that carried them undaunted through prison, exile, shame and even to Calvary—love, unselfish love wells up from our human hearts to them and contacting the ineffable love which makes itself manifest in them and through them our inmost self is thrilled and intoxicated with this heavenly ecstasy. Then the light in the heart becomes a living flame, burning ever brighter, daily, hourly, continually burning away all selfish longings of the egoistic animal consciousness until that lover becomes a dynamic living flame, in the Presence of his Lord.

And at the last, when life's service is complete, work done, the load laid down, this flame of Love and Light shall merge into that glorious flame from whence it came—truly the Eternal Life. Not lost in a cold, passionless Nirvana, but clothed instead with the divine attributes, acquired through simple, loving service, heavenly qualities and characteristics that like jewels shall adorn the robe of glory with scintillating, celestial beauteous colors of ever living light.

Home, home with God, performing His Will, sharing, partaking of celestial joy, in the eternal, joyous service of the Kingdom of Heaven.

“THE AIMS OF THE BAHÁI FAITH”

The following most appreciative review of The Bahá'í World, is here re-published from The John O'Groat Journal, Wick, Scotland, whose Editor has frequently reviewed issues of The Bahá'í Magazine and quoted from various Bahá'í articles in his Journal.

LAST week we gave a brief review of a book entitled “The Clash of World Forces,” in which the author, Mr. Basil Mathews, after analysing present-day world movements, emphasised the point that what Christianity had to do to-day was to strive to “break down with remorseless love the walls of class and race and nation.” We wonder if he and Christians in general are sufficiently aware that the followers of Bahá'u'lláh, a Persian sage, have been proclaiming similar views for many years. Based on the spirit of truth which is essentially at the foundation of all religions, Bahá'ism seeks to promote the brotherhood of man and peace and unity among the nations through fellowship, tolerance and justice. It is non-political, and, although highly spiritual in its conceptions, has no priestly order. Bahá'u'lláh, its founder, is regarded as a Manifestation of God for this age, and perhaps for that reason he has been looked upon by Christians who know anything of the Bahá'í Cause as a sort of new Messiah. That, however, is neither the claim of himself (he died in 1892) nor of his followers, as is made abundantly clear in the beautiful volume now before us. Rather is it that, like Christ, he had not come to destroy but to fulfil. The Bahá'is accept the spiritual oneness of all the prophets and their mutual consecration to the same task of leading mankind from darkness to light. In a most illuminating article, “The Aims and Purposes of the Bahá'í Faith,” by Mr. Horace Holley, New York, the teachings are thus summarised:

“The harmony of true science and religion; the spiritual equality of man and woman; the education of all people in terms of complete personality . . . social responsibility for every individual's economic well-being; the addition of a universal secondary language to school curriculums; the spiritual obligation of every government to make world peace its first and most important concern; and the organisation of an international tribunal capable of maintaining world order based upon equal Justice to the various nations and peoples.”

Such, they believe—and who can doubt it?—is the Divine Will. Present-day civilisation, despite all its mental activity and scientific marvels, can scarcely survive its own forces of disunity without reinforcement by a new, world-wide faith, expressive of a regenerated mankind and a higher type of social organism—such is Mr. Holley's statement of the case. In other words, the principles enunciated by Jesus Christ must become a reality in human relationships as a fundamental need of humanity in the present era.

Sufficient is contained in this volume, as in those of the two previous issues, to show how widely the Bahá'í teachings have gripped the imagination, and commanded the enthusiastic support, of many thoughtful people throughout the world. It would be quite impracticable in this notice to give anything like an adequate idea of the rich and varied contents of the volume. Suffice it to say that no one can peruse it without a deep sense of the lofty aims and purpose of Bahá'ism and the noble spiritual conceptions on which it is based.

Considerable space is given to a description of the great Bahá'í Temple which is in course of erection at Wilmette, near Chicago, and which the present reviewer had the privilege of being shown through last summer. At that time he had the honour of an introduction to the architect, M. Louis Bourgeois (since deceased), and was deeply impressed by his wonderful spirituality and evident genius. The design of the Temple seeks, in M. Bourgeois' own words, to symbolise the unity of all religions and of all mankind. It will, when finished, be something entirely new in architecture, and from the illustrations given we think it will be easily the most beautiful structure in the world. Such at any rate is the opinion of many prominent architects who have carefully examined the plans.

There is much in the Bahá'í Cause which cannot fail to appeal to all who are perplexed by the existing unrest throughout the nations. It is already a greater force than the general public are aware of, and its spiritual, cultural and sociological principles will, we think, command a much greater attention in the near future.

THE MOUNT OF FAITHFULNESS

A Height Divine awaits the severed soul—
 “The Secret placeless Place of The Most High!”
 It is that looming, lofty, matchless Goal
 For which the mounting faithful only sigh.

O mystic nightingale! Abandon thou
 The mortal dust, the mire of negligence.
 O messenger of love! Hear Him Who now
 Melodiously entreats departure hence.

The Beauty of Perfection bids thy flight Unto the fragrant Garden of His Love.
 Soar on thy wings into the Infinite!
 Heed thy Beloved's first call from above.

Immortal phenix! Thy One Love confess;—
 Dwell not save on the Mount of Faithfulness!

THE NEED OF SOCIETY

THE disease which afflicts the body politic is lack of love and absence of altruism. In the heart of men no real love is found, and the condition is such that unless their susceptibilities are quickened by some power there can be no healing, no agreement among mankind. Love and unity is the need of the body politic today. Without these there can be no progress or prosperity attained. Therefore the friends of God must cleave to that power which will create this love and unity in the hearts of the sons of men. Science cannot cure the illness of the body politic. Science cannot create unity and fellowship in human hearts. Neither can patriotism nor racial prejudice effect a cure. It can be accomplished only through the divine bounties and the spiritual bestowals which have descended from God in this day for that purpose.

“There is need for an equalization so that all may have an apportionment in the comforts of life. * * * There must be a readjustment and legislation which shall equalize conditions until humanity may have composure and rest with the utmost ease.”—’Abdu’l-Bahá.

OF MANY CAUSES assigned for the economic crisis existing in this country, one emerges with considerable importance as the result of the recent returns from the income tax of last year. These returns show very decidedly that wealth is being rapidly and alarmingly concentrated in the hands of a few, and being correspondingly reduced from the pockets of the small income earners. For the first time we find actual economic evidence for the statement frequently made that “the rich are getting richer and the poor poorer.”

In the last ten years there has been an enormous increase in the number of men with incomes of more than a million dollars per year. In 1930 there were fifteen times as many receiving such huge incomes as there were in 1920, and the total amount of their incomes was twenty times greater than the total amount of income of a similar class in 1920.

This great increase in the wealth of the wealthier classes might not be open to criticism if the general prosperity of the country were increasing in equal proportion. But what is alarming is the fact that a corresponding decrease has taken place in those classes receiving incomes of less than three thousand dollars per year. Between 1920 and 1928 the total incomes of the people in the class of less than two thousand dollars per year dropped from four billion to one and one-half billion, and the total incomes of the next higher class—those receiving incomes of from two to three thousand per year dropped from six billion in 1920 to two billion in 1928. Where in 1920 six and one-half million men and women with small incomes had almost fifteen and a half billion dollars to spend, in 1929 the number of small income earners had been reduced to three million and they had only a little more than eight billion dollars.

These figures would seem to indicate the the rapid increase in the incomes of the wealthy was partly a transfer from the incomes of the lower classes. Certainly it shows that while the rich have grown richer, people of very moderate means have, in the last ten years, been losing ground to the extent of eight billion dollars of purchasing power.

WHAT does this mean? The loss of eight billion dollars of purchasing power on the part of the common people is a tremendous blow to the free circulation of our economic system. Eight billion dollars less to spend per year for economic goods. This, indeed, might be one of the chief causes for the lack of consumption of manufactured goods, consequent shutting down of factories, and the resulting unemployment. The prosperity of a people depends very closely upon the free circulation of wealth and of money. Anything which impairs that circulation, impairs the health and the economic life of the nation.

But, it may be stated, this income being transferred to the wealthy classes can still be spent for goods. This is not, however, the fact. There is a decided limit to the amount of money which the very wealthy can spend for their actual needs, and a psychological limit to what most of them spend for their personal pleasure and gratification. Most of the income which they receive is reinvested during normal economic periods in stocks, the profits of which must come from further manufacture of goods. Now, as amount of wealth flowing into the coffers of the wealthy increases in undue proportion to the wealth of the general community and is constantly being reinvested, there must inevitably come about a surplus of manufactured goods, the tendency being to keep on manufacturing and to force sales continually in order to increase income and returns upon investment stock.

That is just what has happened in this country. Too many goods were being manufactured, but no one was willing to call a halt. Dividends had to be paid upon invested capital, forced measures of salesmanship were invented, and the consumer's dollar was being taken to the point even of the mortgaging of future incomes by means of installment selling. At last came the critical moment when the purchase of goods could not keep up with the rate of manufacture. Once that point of unfortunate balance was reached, the scales began to turn swiftly and inevitably in the opposite direction, toward a greater and greater difference between the ratio of production and the ratio of consumption. More and more factories had to shut down. Unemployment grew more general. The means of purchase on the part of the lower classes grew constantly less. And up to date nothing has been able to stem this economic rout.

WHAT may we infer from this? It is evident that there should be a wider distribution of wealth, otherwise the accelerated growth of capitalism would entail its own destruction. There must be greater purchasing power among the masses in order to keep up the necessary circulation of the economic life.

This most important issue is completely considered and met in the economic laws established by Bahá'u'lláh for the greater prosperity and economic stability of humanity. By means of a graduated income tax and by inheritance taxes a decided limit is placed upon personal fortunes. There will not be possible in the Bahá'í States those huge aggregations of wealth which begin to characterize the economic life of today. On the contrary, wealth will percolate down into the masses; first, through the practice of a wider distribution of wealth in bequests; and, secondly, through labor receiving not only wages but also a definite share of the net profits of industry. Also from the public treasury financial aid will be given to all those who for adequate reasons have not received an income sufficient for their needs and the needs of their families.

This great change will come about not by force or revolution, but by voluntary acceptance on the part of the rich of this new economic structure. They will not only see the wisdom of it so clearly as to willingly acquiesce; but they will even joyfully accept the new role of co-operator with the State for the economic welfare of the whole, rather than their present role of individualistic profit-seeking limited only by vitality, ability and competitive skill.

ONE may easily conceive certain decided changes which will take place in the psychology and life of the future under these new economic laws. In the first place, since there will be a limit to personal fortunes, there will, doubtless, be a more early retirement from commercial life, making room for more individuals to take part than at present in the top level of the industrial and commercial life of the country. That retirement or economic renunciation necessitated by the economic structure will bring a happiness, a contentment and a culture to the life of the financier and industrialist such as he cannot know today, when the economic structure forces him to expend every ounce of available energy in the terrible competition of economic survival. At present there is far too little time and energy for the actual enjoyment of life, or for the enrichment of the personality in its cultural aspects. When this strain is taken off of the lives of our industrialists and commercialists they will know a peace such as they have never known before. At present, though there are thousands who would welcome such relief, they are powerless to effect as individuals any change in the relentless pace set by the mass-mind of today under the extreme system of individualism which prevails.

If the wealthy will gain in happiness through the economic laws of Bahá'u'lláh, unquestionably the masses will gain tremendously in ease and certainty of living, and in the means of more cultural enjoyment of life. With shorter hours for labor, and with the growing tendency to locate factory units outside of the large urban centers, the prophecy of Micah may literally come true, that every man shall sit under his own fig tree. In other words, the workman may own his little home and plot of ground, and have ample time to devote to a vegetable garden and other means of improving his family life. This tendency we see already starting, and undoubtedly it will grow rapidly under the new economic laws.

LET it be understood that there is intended here no disparagement of the rich as such, and no criticism of those whose abilities have enabled them to win a successful economic position. Such men not only are contributing immensely to the world through their economic ingenuity, skill, and efforts, but are also adding to such contributions gifts of a humane nature dedicated to the amelioration of human living in many different ways. Of such 'Abdu'l-Bahá says, "Yea, verily, wealth and riches are worthy of praise if they be justly partitioned amongst the nation, but if some few be possessed of great riches, and many be reduced to poverty, then is the rich man's gold deprived of all its worth. But if great wealth be employed in the propagation of science, in the establishment of schools and colleges, in the nurture of arts, and in the education of orphans and the care of the needy—in brief, for the public benefit, then shall its possessor be accounted great, both in the sight of God and man."

There will always be a freedom for expression of the varying abilities of humankind, implying the possibility of some winning to higher financial stations than others; but for the sake of the general welfare a limit is to be set to the amount of wealth that can be accumulated by any one individual. We still would have a capitalistic group, but modified so as to avoid the faults which are at present so endangering our economic life. Today the very richness of the intake of the capitalist is like the over-rich diet which is ruinous to the body, building up toxins that lead to fatal diseases.

THE REVELATION of Bahá'u'lláh, establishing by divine laws a new civilization, eliminate all economic ills, renders perfect health to the economic body of humanity, and in the course of time will bring such a transformation to human living as the mind at present can hardly conceive of.

Those are right who say that the spiritual life cannot duly be considered so long as the physical necessities are wanting. This is not the time to preach to the world populace abnegation, resignation and acceptance of misery for the sake of heavenly rewards. The ideal religion is one which establishes just and prosperous conditions for all upon this planetary stage of our existence, at the same time that it calls upon all to lift their hearts to God in love, in adoration, and in faith.

"The citizens of a country are like the various members and organs of the body. So long as the brain and the nervous system are coordinate in their functions there will be no jar in the constitution. But when they fall out of harmony great disturbances become manifest. In like manner when the government represents ideals of progress and justice, the people will advance and progress in their activities. Ideal cooperation will bind together the hearts and strike at the root of poverty, for preventable poverty is a source of all misery and evil. The rulers must be filled with mercy and solicitude for the condition of the unfortunates."

THE BAHÁ'Í COMMONWEALTH

EMERIC SALA

One of the marked results of the Bahá'í Movement will be a new impetus and inspiration in all the arts and which we already see taking place. This article from the pen of a young man who a few years ago became attracted to the Bahá'í Teachings, we consider a striking example of a new kind of writing expressive of this marvelous new movement for humanity. It is all the more interesting as the work of youth. We are always glad to open our pages to the expressions of inspired youth in this great age.

THE world is in unrest. The competitive spirit of rivalry predominates in the lives of individuals, groups and nations. Suspicion, hatred and mistrust separate one country from another. Another war seems inevitable.

And we, who live in this world of conflict, are, in spite of our religions and culture, our skilled leaders and most accomplished statesmen, helpless when facing the problems of the world. There is, however, a way out, and we must find it, or perish.

There is one thing we have to be clear about before we can attempt to go further. In the course of social evolution, from the prehistoric times on, conditions and needs brought about certain customs, beliefs and rules. In the course of centuries the conditions changed, and the needs which once existed disappeared, while the old customs, beliefs and rules remained.

This is the situation of today. We are living under new conditions. Our needs are changed. We will not progress until we realize that our old customs, beliefs and rules must be replaced by new ones.

The world in which we are living cannot be disassociated from international rivalry, national pride or class hatred. Poverty and unemployment are its component parts.

Inequity is its foundation. Strikes, revolutions and wars are expressions of its underlying code.

And the world we are moving towards is the Commonwealth of Nations, governed by a Parliament of Men, the Guardian of the Most Great Peace. In that world there will be an abundance of all the elementary needs of life, with plenty of leisure for culture and refinement.

WE KNOW the world we are living in and we know our goal. To reach it, we need three things—a mechanism, a propelling power and a highway.

The mechanism are the people. Humanity is destined to reach its goal.

The propelling power is the law of growth, the law of progress, revitalized by the appearance of Bahá'u'lláh on the horizon of the world's history.

And all we want to know now is the highway, on which we can travel towards our goal—the Commonwealth of Nations and the Most Great Peace.

Should we study all the books of the world we will find but two roads conceived by men for the attainment of our goal.

The first is as old as men. It has been trodden by Buddha and Moses, by Christ and Muhammad, and by all the other Prophets of old with millions of their followers.

Their aim is to change the individual, and thus to bring about the necessary reform in society.

Even today, if you go to any church or synagogue, or mosque of any denomination, in any village, city or country, in any part of the world, whether you listen to a rabbi, minister or mullah, you will hear them preach individual salvation. They will summon you to love your neighbor as yourself and to return evil with good. They offer eternal happiness in the life hereafter, but fail to give us any practical solution for the salvation of our social organization as a whole.

The second road is more new. Its aim is to change first our environment, that is, our institutions, and then to bring about eventually a change in the individual.

This road is monopolized by all the radical movements of today, such as Communism, Socialism and similar organizations which come to mind.

It is beyond doubt that the first method was of inestimable benefit to mankind. Religion is the very foundation of our present civilization. Our actual code of morals is derived from it. It was the consolation to the suffering millions. It raised the moral standard of the individual.

It failed, however, to be effective in our relations as groups or nations. It is because of the influence of religion that we do not kill each other as individuals. We are, however, killing each other as organized units, despite our individual religious convictions.

The average man does not steal. We are honest in our dealings as individuals with our fellow beings. Those few who are not, are considered outcasts of society and are jailed.

If we, however, exploit, as an organized group or nation, a weaker unit, our action is beyond the influence of religion, and, therefore, honorable.

The second road leads toward social democracy and a cooperative commonwealth of nations, to be achieved through collective ownership of the means of production.

It is admitted that Socialism, using this term in the vaguest sense of the word, spread with a greater effectiveness and rapidity than any other movement in the history of the world. We cannot overlook its increasing influence and the radical changes it might force upon human society.

However promising their program and how lofty their ideals, we cannot fail to recognize the inadequacy of their philosophy in satisfying our highest aspirations, or in meeting our miscellaneous problems with which we are confronted in this new day.

Assuming that their ideals—a social-democratic co-operative-commonwealth—will be realized; that there will be an abundance of all the elementary needs of life; equal opportunity, without any discrimination, for all; an equitable distribution of the products of labor, and plenty of leisure for education and culture, man will be still craving for something higher, and will not be composed unless and until he can find other as yet unattained ideals for the realization of which he can strive with unswerving dedication.

This is why we are compelled to discard both the first, as well as the second road as inadequate in our journey toward the Commonwealth of Nations.

HUMANITY is seeking for a road that combines the elements of both, individual regeneration and social righteousness. Any system lacking these two elements is doomed to failure. Our existing religious system fails to regenerate our social order, and our socialistic movements fail to regenerate the individual.

This explains the helplessness of our most sagacious statesmen and the fallacy of the most skillfully prepared political schemes—however genuine and disinterested in scope—when facing such problems as unemployment, disarmament and international arbitration. While we cannot deny the desire of each human being for peace, universal education and material prosperity, we lack the agency to transform this desire, potentially latent in every inhabitant of this globe, into actuality. We need an instrument that can transform individual desire and individual faith into positive cooperative action.

Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, directs our attention to this instrument in the following words:

“Bahá'u'lláh and His Son, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, have, unlike the Dispersions of the past, clearly and specifically laid down a set of Laws, established definite institutions, and provided for the essentials of a Divine Economy. These are destined to be a pattern for future society, a supreme instrument for the establishment of the Most Great Peace, and the one agency for the unification of the world, and the proclamation of the reign of righteousness and justice upon the earth.”

The uniqueness of Bahá'u'lláh's method culminates in the complete amalgamation of the hitherto isolated human endeavors, namely—individual regeneration and social justice.

The impression of the following quotations from the writings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá serve as an indication of the “regenerated individual” in the Commonwealth of the future:

“O Son of Man! Thou desirest gold, and I desire thy freedom therefrom. Thou hast recognized the wealth of thyself therein, and I have recognized thy wealth in thy sanctity therefrom. By my life. This is my knowledge and that is thine imagining. How can my way agree with thine?”

“Bahá'í's consider that bestowing good upon one another is the greatest means of help to both.”

“I hope you will be just in your relations with each other, that you will never harm your fellows, that you will respect the rights of all men, and above all, consider the rights of others before your own.”

We will deal now with a feature of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh which is new in the history of the world.

“Should we look back upon the past," writes Shoghi Effendi (grandson of 'Abdu 'l-Bahá), "were we to search out the Gospel and the Qu'ran, we will readily recognize that neither the Christian nor the Islamic Dispensations can offer a parallel either on the system of Divine Economy so thoroughly established by Bahá 'u 'lláh, or to the safeguards which He has provided for its preservation and advancement."

Freedom, however democratic in its origin, is impossible without conformity to laws. No community could exist without laws. In the Bahá'í teachings we will find, however, an admonition that laws decreed by any government must conform to the divine law.

To our question as to which laws are divine, 'Abdul'l-Bahá answers: "The Laws of God are not impositions of will, or of power, or of pleasure, but the resolutions of truth, reason and justice."

In other words, we will have no oligarchy, no plutocracy.

IN THE World Commonwealth of the future, all laws, whether municipal, provincial, national or international, will be based on resolutions of truth, reason and justice. But how, we might ask, will the generations to come find legislators with such qualifications?

Bahá'u'lláh knows human nature, our weaknesses and limitations. He provides us, therefore, with a new and unique means of legislation.

We cannot go on without referring to a recent appeal of Shoghi Effendi that we should "disregard the prevailing notions and the fleeting fashions of the day, and realize as never before that the exploded theories and the tottering institutions of present-day civilization must needs appear in sharp contrast with those God-given institutions which are destined to arise upon their ruin."

One of the most essential contributions of Bahá'u'lláh and upon which the foundation of the new civilization will be established, is the principle of consultation. It is the fulfillment of individual consciousness in this age.

Its working is simple. Communities, nations, and federations of countries elect, in a democratic way directly, or by proportional representation indirectly, a council of nine, re-elected every year. The most outstanding characteristic of this group is its objective attitude. Some people call it a prayerful attitude.

The members of these assemblies meet without any preconceived ideas. They do not represent any group interests. They do not belong to any party. (We will do without political parties in the future.) They have no personal interests in the matters under discussion. They have no ambition for fame or glory. They are not remunerated for their services. Their only concern are the interests of the people, and their only passion is for love of mankind. They are deeply religious by nature. To them service is worship. They serve men in order to please God.

Such men and women, who combine a nobility of character with mature experience and expert knowledge in the discharge of their duties, cannot fail in their attempt to reach resolutions based on truth, reason and justice.

And quoting Shoghi Effendi again: "As the Bahá'í Faith permeates the masses of the peoples of the east and west, and its truth is embraced by the majority of the peoples of a number of the sovereign states of the world, will the Universal House of Justice attain the plenitude of its power and exercise as the supreme organ of the Bahá'í Commonwealth, all the rights, the duties, and responsibilities incumbent upon the world's future super-state."

WE ARE, therefore, justified in foreseeing in the not too far distant future a situation when there will be economic justice upon the earth; when the loftiest aims of our present-day idealists will be attained; abolition of poverty will be assured, with ample provision for the aged and sick; when such terms as illiteracy, unemployment or war will be obsolete, and when the dream of the poet the "Parliament of Man and the Federation of the World" will be a reality.

Who, we venture to ask, with any sense of responsibility for the age in which he is living, and love for the welfare of the human race, could remain indifferent to the following challenge pronounced by the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause?

"Leaders of religion, exponents of political theories, governors of human institutions, who at present are witnessing with perplexity and dismay the bankruptcy of their ideas and the disintegration of their handiwork, would do well to turn their gaze to the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh, and to meditate upon the World Order, which, lying enshrined in His teachings, is slowly and imperceptibly rising amid the welter and chaos of present-day civilization."

Bahá'u'lláh is the Divine Physician who diagnoses the world's malady; for the whole planet is ill and needs the power of a great specialist.

Bahá'u'lláh's teachings are the health of the world. They represent the spirit of this age, the light of this age, the well-being of this age, the soul of this cycle. The world will be at rest when they are put into practice for they are Reality.

Praise be to God, the doors of divine knowledge are flung wide, the infinite light is shining, and to such as believe and obey the divine mysteries are revealed.

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

REMOVING BARRIERS

LIDJA ZAMENHOF

An address given in Esperanto at the Bahá'í Library in London and translated by Miss Evelyn Baxter. Miss Zamenhof, well known as the daughter of the creator of Esperanto, has recently completed a translation into this universal auxiliary language of "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era," by Dr. J. E. Esslemont.

COME to you from a distant land not very well known to you. Only a journey of two days from here; it is, however, foreign to you.

How large our earth was once; how small it is now! Once it seemed the center of the universe, now we know it is but dust. Once it took years to travel round it, now, in the days of steam, electricity and radio, it has ceased to be an unpassable space; it is becoming more and more the territory of one mankind; the whole earth has become the fatherland of all, the home of one human family.

May that family be happy! An old proverb says that man is the forger of his fate. Whether mankind will be happy will depend on itself.

Mankind at times resembles a band of children who have wandered into a forest, not heeding the warnings of their elders. There, having lost their way before nightfall, they curse and weep and grind their teeth, and, blaming one another, begin to fight. And at that moment, when, perhaps, from afar shine the eyes of wolves or enticing will-o'-the-wisps on the marshes, suddenly is heard the father's voice showing the way home. Children would immediately run home. And mankind? If it obeys the Voice it also will be saved from the forest at night; otherwise it will become the victim of the wolves.

In these last days mankind has entered a forest where thorns wound the body and the feet sink in a bog. It is not the first time it has turned aside from the path. Many times has the Father saved it from danger. But now the people have entered such a wilderness that they have lost the hope that the Father will find them there, that His voice will reach them; they even doubt whether they have a Father.

But the Father loves His children and does not leave them to perish helpless.

The Father's voice calling to mankind is the teachings of the prophets. The voice, calling through the dense forest in these last days of despair, is Baha'u'llah. His teachings lead again to tranquility, peace and safety.

He reminds us that we are children of one Father, members of one family, dwellers in one home; that we must make this home a sanctuary of peace, not a battlefield.

I remarked at the beginning that I come from a country not known to you. Can the country of any nation be other than a room in the home of the family of mankind? However, room is sometimes separated from room by a high step. What is this step which presents a barrier between peoples? Not mountains, for already tunnels pierce them; not distance, for steam and electricity conquer it. This dividing step is the feeling of foreignness; and one of the chief sources of this feeling is diversity of language. We have taken the hatchet and are chopping away this step—let nothing separate us!

Some of you, perhaps, attended the Twenty-third Congress of Esperanto, the International language, which ended a few days ago at Oxford. Did you not feel, looking at that mass of different nationalities, that something great and holy was happening there? That the peoples, who, according to the Bible legend, were scattered at the Tower of Babel have come back to their fatherland, to their home? If you felt this and understood, do not stand on one side. Together with us, take the hatchet and help us to chop away the barriers, so that no longer shall anything stand between the children of mankind.

ZAMENHOF: THE MAN

This article, reprinted from "International Language," gives an excellent picture of the man who created Esperanto. The author calls him a genius. It would seem clear, however, that his success was due not only to genius, but to divine guidance, which flowed to him because of his utter sincerity, devotion and self-sacrifice in the spread of the great ideal of an international auxiliary language.

ZAMENHOF' was an indefatigable worker. All his life, except during the days of his last illness, he had to struggle to keep his family, and for an oculist amongst poor people, the struggle was a bitter one. From Esperanto he made no profit, except royalties on the sale of his works, which certainly did not make good the losses caused by the inevitable neglect of his practice. Lack of money made difficult even traveling to the international congresses; the childlike excitement discernible in his letters on his journey to the Sixth Universal Congress in Washington shows how great was the event in his life, and how great were the efforts which it cost. In spite of money worries, ill-health, bitter opposition and mockery, he fought on and worked unceasingly, and in none of his work is there any sign of discouragement (except, perhaps, in the poems Ho'mia kor' and Mia penso) or bitterness.

One looks for the motive which enabled him to persist and conquer. As we have seen, it was not love of money. Nor was it ambition or love of power, for when, in 1889, it was proposed that the American Philosophical Society should call an international conference of scientists to elect an auxiliary language, he offered to hand the matter over to them entirely and "to retire from the scene"; and, as we know, at a later date (as soon as it was practicable), he gave up all rights in his invention and all official positions. He wished for none of these. His aim was to give humanity peace and ease from the suffering caused by dissension and war, and he saw that a neutral means of communication would be one of the most important factors in achieving that aim. He was an idealist through and through, and he strove for his ideals with a passionate tenacity which sprang from the simplicity of his character. That simplicity gave him the strength to inspire his followers with his own ideals; to that fact it is due that Esperanto survived the early years. At times he showed even a touch of naivety, as, for instance, when he proposed to collect the names and addresses of ten million people who would promise to learn Esperanto, before asking any one to begin to study.

But he was shrewd, too. He expected no miracles, and foresaw opposition from the first. In his first textbook he answered in advance almost all the objections which can be raised against an "artificial" language. He realized that to make headway, the new language must be stable, and that to be stable, its basis must remain unchanged until the language is universally accepted. Hence, the principle of the inviolability of the fundamental grammar of Esperanto, which has caused so much controversy. It is safe to say that Esperanto would have gone the way of a hundred ephemeral projects, dying stillborn, if it had not been protected by this "dogma." When the famous Delegation was convened in 1907 for the purpose of choosing an international language, he pointed out from the first that it lacked the necessary authority, and that its choice, whatever it might be, would be ineffective; and the Delegation was indeed a fiasco.

He had a vein of wise disillusionment, as is shown by the following paragraph which appeared in La Esperantisto in 1891:

We must not forget that the world has always remained absolutely deaf even to the wisest of moral sermons, but remember that it flies to that which appears to have achieved success. For ourselves we may realize that our task is still very difficult and perhaps for a long time to come will demand an iron patience; but to the public we must always show a cheerful face. We must not lie, as the Volapukists did, inventing great and important facts, taken from the air; but also we must not forget that mankind, for whose good we are working, is a sick, obstinate child, who will take no medicine unless we take pains to sweeten it.

We have no record of unkindness or injustice of any kind, but the following letter shows that he could be tart, when occasion justified it:

Your letter is signed: "One of the warmest friends of the language Esperanto"! I do in fact remember that from time to time you send me letters asking after the progress of the affair; but you have never written to say what you yourself are doing for our cause. The "warm friend of our affair" is not he who is always asking questions, but he who works for it and spreads it. Instead of asking me every month what has been done, you should ask yourself, "What have I done for our affair during the past month?"

I quote these texts to show that Zamenhof's character had its due proportions of salt. We may guess that many letters like the above were required.

With all his simplicity, perhaps because of his simplicity, he showed in his leadership of the Esperanto movement a sagacity and statesmanship which amounted to genius. I need not dilate on the innumerable pitfalls besetting the inventor of an instrument used by all sorts of men, in all parts of the world. It is sufficient to refer the student to the speeches and articles in this book, in which he points out that Esperanto must have a democratic government; that the language must evolve slowly and naturally in use, and not by sudden changes; that it must be tied to no religious or political theory (not even to Zamenhof's own dearest cause, pacificism and internationalism allied with the noblest sort of patriotism). His sane guidance was the determining factor in the constant and orderly progress of the movement, and his good influence is still felt today.

I have used the word genius. This is the only word which is adequate when we are considering his creative work on Esperanto. When he compiled the language, research work on the elements necessary in an artificial language was hardly begun; he must be considered as the pioneer and greatest master of the subject. Familiarity with the result of his labors does not breed contempt; on the contrary, it is the common experience of those who have studied Esperanto deeply, that their admiration and wonder grow with increasing knowledge. That is the proof that he worked well; and those who have followed in his steps have never equalled him. The superiority of Esperanto results partly from that ten years' constant testing which it had before appearing in public; but it results too from the fact that its author was a genius.

"Genius" here includes the term "artist." It is curious that nowhere in his articles and letters do we find any mention of selection of words, or arrangement of grammar, from the artistic point of view; he never touches on aesthetics. It is possible that he never presented this side of the question even to himself. But the beauty of sound and association in Esperanto could have been imported only by one very sensitive to beauty; he was undoubtedly a great, unconscious artist—the language itself is proof of this.

Above all we receive an impression of a modest, lovable man; one who was sincere in all things, an enthusiast who never thrust his views on others; a determined worker who never wavered from his aim. His personality calls forth a deep respect, and even from those who never knew him in the flesh, an affection which explains the enthusiasm and sacrifices of those who had the privilege of working with him.

THE CHAMPIONS OF REALITY

DR. CHARLES S. FRINK

There is an ever-growing tendency toward unity and understanding between science and religion. How this unity can be attained is told us by the author; and those leaders of science and religion who are honestly working to bring about this unity he classes as "Champions of Reality."

IT must be apparent to those who have followed the trend of current literature, that the gap which has existed for so long between religionists and scientists is gradually closing up.

Prior to the advent of this scientific age, dogmatic religionists have systematically and with various motives succeeded in cultivating the weeds of superstition in their own minds and in the souls of their followers. But any attempt today to perpetuate the imitations and superstitions of the dark ages in this "Age of Light," becomes increasingly difficult as human understanding broadens and develops.

Scientists, as a whole, are naturally reluctant about associating an admittedly incomprehensible and insensible God with matter and its phenomena. Except for those who have faithfully studied and accepted the illuminating, all-inclusive teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, the problem of adjustment seems to remain unsolved as if pendently waiting for some belated superhuman power to perform the nuptials of science and religion.

The idea that science is of the head and religion is of the heart is not new to many. That religion must conform to science and reason there can be no doubt in the minds of those who have realized the import of the authoritative utterances of Bahá'u'lláh, Who says:

"If religion does not agree with the postulates of science nor accord with the regulations of reason it is a bundle of superstitions; a phantasm of the brain. Science and religion are realities, and if that religion to which we adhere be a reality it must needs conform to the fundamental reality of all things."

Science can be as wrongly dogmatic as religion. But, fortunately, there are many eminent scientists who have avoided the pitfalls of dogmatism. They have not all allowed their intellects, as it were, to paralyze the intuitional susceptibilities of their hearts. A noble expression of this type is found in one of the recent statements of Dr. W. R. Whitney—"A world figure in science":

"The will of God, the law which we discover, but cannot understand or explain—that alone is final."

If the final results of scientific research should lead to the general conviction that the beginning and the end of all creation, with its countless phenomena, is because of the "will of God," would it not be the greatest possible achievement towards the fulfillment of the Lord's Prayer?

IN REALITY, science and religion have always been affinities—a temperamental balancing, so to speak, of the extremes of extroversion and introversion. Heretofore, the anti-pathetic guardians of science and religion would not sanction such an affiliation. The arrogant religionists looked upon their ward as being too heavenly to associate with an earthling whom the scientists were determined should, at least, possess some exact knowledge of the correlative forces of its physical existence.

Essentially, religion must be the same today as always. But man, through his ignorance and selfishness, has covered Reality with the accumulated trappings and traditions of the ages until its perfect figure has become a fantasy and an object of ridicule in the sight of those who are heedless and unwise. It has been the peculiar office of science to help destroy these tinsel draperies and subtle forgeries, one or more at a time. Who can say that such an exposure is not another manifestation of the "will of God?"

The exactions and perplexities constantly confronting the scientific researcher seem to prevent him, with a few individual exceptions perhaps, from becoming dogmatic over that which, at best, has to do with proximate causes.

Science, we are informed, "Is knowledge reduced to law and embodied in system." Such being the case, it is not difficult to imagine why the work of the physicist will always be confined within the limits of sense and matter. Should he discover ways and means to materialize, measure and weigh the properties of conscious mind, would he not still be the physicist? On the other hand, should the physicist attempt to develop the alleged occult phase of psychometry by which he might further study and record the unconscious states, qualities and powers of the human soul, would he not then become a metaphysician also?

Exact science demands that the scientist, who would be successful, must possess the inherent qualities of truthfulness, otherwise, we could expect no more from him than a juggler's performance. The invention of the electric light, for example—commonplace as it now seems—necessitated innumerable conjurings with the occult forces of nature before it could be presented to the world in the form of a dependable commodity which is as necessary to the convenience and enlightenment of the enemies of science as it is to the scientists themselves.

WHAT EINSTEIN calls the "cosmic religious sense" is, no doubt, deeply rooted in the soul of every true scientist. Paradoxical as it may seem, the "cosmic religious sense" or "creative urge" as others have designated it, may be as keen in the mind of the physicist who is working day and night to produce a gas that could be used for the destruction of his fellowmen, as it is in another who might be searching for knowledge of a way to produce cheap motive power from the air. The original purpose of the two scientists is the same, viz., to control the forces of nature. Should the efforts of both prove to be successful, the accomplishment in either case will have been legitimately within the field of science, while their motives, from a moralist's point of view, may be directly contrary.

There are many people who are inclined to look upon the scientist as one who, because of the exacting nature of his work, must be temperamentally cold and unemotional. This may appear to be true because of the scientist's absolute refusal to take any unproven theory for granted. It is admitted that there may be certain scientists whose emotional natures have become more or less dormant; nevertheless, they must have imagination. Any theories which the scientist may develop in the abstract are so built with the distinct understanding that, until his theories are proven, he must regard them only as mental images or patterns until he has made them tangible and workable.

In the laboratory, the scientist is free to indulge his imaginative powers to the utmost. Here he may quietly theorize and dream to his heart's content. Here the whole of creation becomes his mental playground, and yet the task is always before him to demonstrate the soundness of his theories and to reduce them to practical usefulness and, as the psychologist might say, "He must objectify his mental images before he will be recognized as a scientist."

The great protagonists of the renewed religion of God for our time (the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá) teach us that "Man is the collective center of all phenomena." Long before the time of Christ, Socrates seemed to realize this truth, hence his injunction, "Know thyself!" It is a large order and would be quite beyond our limited human powers to fulfill were we not so fortunate as to have been born in the early morning of a New Day wherein we may expect a quickening of the soul's powers in fulfillment of the prophecies of the great ones of the past.

SCIENCE is doing much to deepen our knowledge of the interdependence of our physical and mental functions. True psychology, or "The science of the human mind or soul," is also adding much to our better understanding of the soul's operations, powers and functions—but, let it be borne in mind that there is as marked a distinction between true and pseudo or false psychology as there is between the true scientist and the juggler.

The most important lesson one can learn from the study of true psychology, perhaps, is that his own soul is the intermediary between his visible world of effects and the invisible world of causes, or, to quote from the Bahá'í Scriptures:

"The soul hath two phases: the higher aspireth to the Kingdom of Abha, and the lights of the mind shine forth from that horizon unto its higher sphere; the other phase inclineth to the lower concourse of the material world and its lowest sphere is enveloped in the darkness of ignorance. But when light is poured upon this phase (the lower) and if this phase of the soul is capable of receiving it, then 'truth hath come and falsehood vanisheth, for falsehood is of short duration'—otherwise, darkness will surround it from all directions and it will be deprived of association with the Supreme Concourse and will remain in the lowest depths."

After studying the foregoing statements, the consequent question would naturally be, "What is my personal responsibility in the matter of preparing my soul to receive the light?" Reading further in the Scriptures the answer is found in the following statements:

"The prophets also acknowledge this opinion, to-wit: That education hath a great effect upon the human race, but they declare that the minds and comprehensions are originally different. And this matter is self-evident; it cannot be refuted. We see that certain children of the same age, nativity and race, nay, from the same household, under the tutorship of one teacher, differ in their minds and comprehensions."

"No matter how much the shell is polished, it can never become the radiant pearl. That is to say, training does not change the human substance, but it produceth a marvelous effect. By this effective power all that is registered, in latency, of virtues and capacities in the human reality will be revealed. It is for this reason that, in this new cycle, education and training are recorded in the Book of God as obligatory and not voluntary."

From the above it will be clearly understood that education is the means by which the mirror of the soul is polished and prepared to reflect the rays of light from on high.

Education, it must be remembered, is dynamic. It is ever progressive and it is incumbent upon all who would be prepared to receive the light to constantly readjust their minds to new discoveries of the law which Dr. Whitney so conclusively calls the "will of God" as it is manifested in all phases of our existence.

When the leaders of ancient, outworn religious creeds—with their innumerable sects—have learned to readjust their minds to the basic idea, namely, that religion must conform to science and reason, and the scientists will have agreed that the mysterious forces of nature cannot be accounted for except as manifestations of the "will of God," may we not then speak of the millenium in the present tense and hail our modern religionists and scientists as the Champions of Reality?

"As we witness on all sides the growing restlessness of a restless age, we are filled with mixed feelings of fear and hope—fear, at the prospect of yet another deadly encounter, the inevitability of which is alas! becoming increasingly manifest; hope, in the serene assurance that whatever cataclysm may yet visit humanity, it cannot but hasten the approaching era of universal and lasting peace so emphatically proclaimed by the Pen of Bahá'u'lláh. . . . Let us take heart therefore, and labor with renewed vigor and deepened understanding to contribute our share to those forces which, whether or not cognizant of the regenerating Faith of Bahá'u'lláh in this age, are operating, each in its respective sphere and under His all-encompassing guidance, for the uplift and the salvation of humanity."

Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause.*

THE FUTURE RELIGION

HOWARD R. HURLBUT

The author, connected with the municipal government of San Francisco, has frequently written for the Bahá'í Magazine. He now contributes a series of articles describing the Bahá'í Movement as the fulfillment of prophecy, the solution of the world's present needs, the perfect civilization that has been awaiting the enlightened efforts of mankind.

NOW, for more than twenty years, the Bahá'í Magazine has been engaged in making known the teachings of the Bahá'í Revelation, discovering to the world their effect upon the individual and the national life—in the individual instance, the inspiration to the great adventure in entire selflessness of striving to disseminate this new expression of the age-old Truth; and in the wider fields of national optimism, the introduction of the principles voiced by Bahá'u'lláh as a corrective of existing evils between peoples of different races and nationalities.

The world has been witness to the continued effort of nations to incorporate the Bahá'í principles in their treaties and relationships, and yet, those responsible for this have remained in ignorance of their source. The principles referred to are Equality of the Races, Equality of the Sexes, Equality of Opportunity, Universal Education, a Universal Auxiliary Language, a transposition from merely national fealty to that of loyalty to the whole human race, an International Court of Justice, a League of Nations, an Adjustment of the Relations between Capital and Labor, in the establishment of an economical condition which shall eliminate poverty and proscribe the hoarding of wealth for the advantage of the few.

All of these were sent forth as divine mandates more than sixty years ago, at a time when there was no consideration nor observation of them in any land, and they are functioning at best only lamely today for the reason of their non-association with divine motives through their attempted adaptation by purely political means.

Then, too, Bahá'u'lláh voiced other vital principles which peoples are not according recognition and which have been limited in their acceptance to those who have accepted as valid the Bahá'í Revelation—the Voice Divine. These are the singleness of purpose and of authorization of every great Revelator throughout the ages who has appeared in the establishment of a school of religion—a condition which compels the recognition, also, that there is only one religion, and that, the unassailable Word of God.

It may be seen that in giving acceptance to these, all religious prejudice will be wiped out and with the gradual waking to realization of the universal brotherhood of man, accompanied by the assumption of the responsibilities which such a relationship compels, wars will cease to be and a spread of prosperity and augmented comfort be inevitable.

There are many remaining blind to the beauties of the revealed Truth who are curious over the mystical utterances contacted with in Holy Writ, and it is not unbelievable that some of these, given explanation of that which hitherto has remained subject to surmise, might be attracted to an investigation of the source of that Truth which could make plain the concealed verities. It is to such that this thesis is offered as something over which to ponder and, according as it may appeal to reason, accept.

Nor infrequently comment has been made over the improbability of divine inspiration being associated with the Bible, which is filled with matter not appearing to be consistent with divine thought and also with allegorical presentments which constitute a cloud to conceal such meanings as may be attached thereto. They ask why so many crudities are injected into Holy Writ and also why God didn't give truths in plain and understandable terms, and that is an entirely rational query to be put if one does not grasp the intent of the form.

One has only to refer to the latest of our dictionaries to discover lists of thousands of words which have become obsolete, and if this obtains in association with the limited period of which lexicographers treat, it must be rational to assume that back of that time there were in use unnumbered thousands of words of which we have no knowledge.

The Prophets were dealing with affairs and conditions which they visioned were to exist upon the earth thousands of years after their own time, and had they employed to record these events and conditions the idioms then in use it must have ensued in the passing of generations their record would have passed to the oblivion which we have discussed in relation to words in general.

Therefore, having the wisdom to foresee this obsolescence, they set their determinations regarding the future in terminologies based on the eternal verities—those things which were and are and ever will be present in the world—the sun and moon and stars, water and air and light, rivers and streams and sea, clouds and earth and stone, man and woman and wife, and numbers of other objects time cannot destroy. That was one reason—preservation.

THERE was another reason. When these allegories and symbols were employed, it was also written that the Word was not for private interpretation, and that these secrets were to be sealed until “the time of the end”—a term which is itself an allegory and has been the cause of endless controversy, having been generally accepted to indicate that when certain prophesied conditions should obtain in the world, the world itself would be at an end—the Day of God, the Day of Judgment, the Resurrection. This “other reason” was that in the “time of the end,” when One should appear who would demonstrate the knowledge to make clear the meanings in the concealments of Holy Writ, this capacity would constitute one of the proofs of His divinity.

II.

WHILE an intent of this thesis is to treat in the larger measure of applied prophecy, its purpose will be the better served if there shall be made clear the real meaning of some of the disguised and disputed passages. And this brings us to a consideration of the 36th verse of the 30th chapter of Isaiah—a verse which before this era has never been given acceptable explanation. It reads:

“Moreover, the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be seven-fold, as the light of seven days, in the day that the Lord bindeth up the breach of his people and healeth the stroke of their wound.”

The best that Bible commentators have been able to weave out of this has been that at some time in the experience of the race the illumination emanating from our present solar center will so vastly transcend that to which we have been accustomed that night itself will be dissipated, regarding which the main difficulty would seem to be the ability of man to endure it.

Wheresoever the term “the day” or “that day” is employed in prophecy, associated with some great event, it has reference to this day in which we are living, and to understandingly discuss this requires a harking back to the day of “beginning”—that is, the story as given to us in the opening chapter of the book of Genesis. Because a Manifestation of God brings spiritual illumination to mankind, he is likened to our phenomenal sun and is called a S-U-N. And, because the sun is inseparably associated with day, he is also called D-A-Y. And, as we determine a day to constitute the period between dawn and dark, so, too, the period during which the spiritual teachings presented by a Manifestation have the power to influence to spirituality the souls of men, is called His Day.

That one who follows immediately in the footsteps of the divine messenger to explain his Word and spread the cause is styled moon, because he rises in a reflected glory, just as our satellite of the night reflects the light of the sun.

WHEN we approach Creation, we see it as something not related to the bringing into existence this earth of ours, nor of any sphere in the universe of worlds, nor, indeed of any substance whatsoever, because, if we shall accept God as perfect, we must conclude there never was a period in which everything was not, all being co-existent with God. Had there been at any time something lacking in the universe, necessary for God to create, it would imply an imperfect world and therefore an imperfection in the Creator, which is an entirely impossible assumption.

No, Creation, when applied to bodies like this earth of ours, does not mean the bringing into being of anything new, but, instead, an introduction into a field in which it had theretofore been strange, of something infinitely old. But, the term “Creation,” as employed in Genesis, does not mean even this—it means the creation of souls. That is, out of the darkness and ignorance, the glory of the Light brought recognition of the purposes of God.

Allegory and symbology saturate the entirety of the Scriptures with their incomparable utility for the preservation of the record of the intent. The “Garden of Eden” is the first of these allegories after that which we have discussed as Creation. As given to us almost daily in the press and in numerous periodicals, scientific investigation has determined that this earth of ours, to which some religionists persist in attaching a life period thus far of only six or seven thousand years, must have endured through incommensurable billions of years, and this conclusion of science is directly in line with the declaration of Bahá'u'lláh that the present cycle in which we are and of which we are a part, is merely one of unnumbered thousands of similar cycles of like thousands of years duration which have obtained on this planet, during which people have risen from states of ignorance and deprivation to planes of the highest intellectual and spiritual attainment, then to retrogress or, by some seismic cataclysm to be almost completely wiped out, so that all knowledge of that which has gone before is lost to the succeeding remnants of the race.

Possibly, this can be more clearly grasped if we shall assume that the recession of the antarctic ice cap and the increase of the arctic cap shall in a not far distant future become of such magnitude that a tipping of the earth will bring about an almost complete submergence of areas now exposed, such submersion continuing sufficiently to be destructive of the major portion of all life. Thus, to have again the race-beginning in people of little or no attainments, were the islands of the southern seas to be lifted as continental areas, the populace would be dense in its ignorance, and the small understandings during the earlier generations be lost because of the absence of competent instruction and guidance.

Such a condition, therefore, may be pictured in the dawn of this cycle, when the people without understanding of right and wrong were in an edenic state—they could do no evil, because what they did was in the absence of knowledge. That was their true "Garden of Eden," and it continued until their state becoming hopeless of voluntary development along spiritual lines, out of their midst arose Adam as the first "Day" and brought them the Light, exposing for their guidance the divine principles in life's true relationships. It was in this dawning cognizance of their past error that their "Fall" was accomplished—not a fall from grace, but a fall from their edenic experience in being ignorant of sin.

The "Fall" was in reality a rise from a plane of ignorance to a station of understanding. The manner of their acceptance of this teaching by Adam is also indelibly inscribed in scriptural allegory, showing evil (personified in Cain) battling with and becoming victor over good (personified in his brother, Abel).

It exposes the conflict in the individual soul between the promptings toward evil and good—a condition which has shown no change from that time to this.

While religionists, as a rule, regard the Holy Books to have been revealed for a spiritual purpose, they have persisted in applying to material affairs what is to be found therein. They have done this with the creational story, as we have said, but inasmuch as the narrative related solely to matters of the spirit—the creation of souls—we can now understand Adam in this allegory as "the first Day." His teaching endured as a means of guidance until human egotistic assumption and selfish striving plunged mankind into a night of ignorance, out of which came the dawn of the second day of creation, in the appearance of Noah.

THE SHRINE

CLARA WEIR

BY a happy coincidence I arrived at Haifa in time to participate in one of the most important celebrations of the year, namely, the observation of the Ascension of Baha'u'llah.*

We set out for Bahji just at night-fall, Zeah Khanum, the mother of Shoghi Effendi, Ruha Khanum, the second daughter of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, a Persian pilgrim, and I, occupied the same car.

Our route lay through the narrow streets of Haifa, and thence along the shore of the Mediterranean, the road running so close to the water that the tide washed over it in some places. There was an invigorating, salt-laden breeze. To the left we could still see the gentle breakers, and to the right, the billowing white sands, with, here and there, a cluster of palm trees, dimly silhouetted against the sky. Scarcely a word was spoken during that drive; it would have seemed irreverent to break the silence.

Arriving at the Shrine, we found a large gathering of men in the garden, one of whom was chanting a Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh. We took seats outside with the women, but after a time, repaired to the interior of the Shrine.

The outer chamber was brilliant, the large cut-glass chandeliers scintillating with myriads of candles, and on a table a number of candle-lighted lamps threw their radiance upon delicate rug and velvet drapery. The outer Shrine is two stories high, with no windows on the ground floor, but having several above on each of the four sides. Through these windows one could see the blue sky, and beneath them, electric lights, the only suggestion of Western atmosphere, brought into relief the color and waxen texture of tropical plants, which form a miniature garden in the center.

Dark clad forms reverently sat along the walls or moved silently toward an open door through which flooded a radiance not only seen, but felt.

The inner Shrine, while dimly lighted by lamp and candelabra, yet revealed the soft green velvet draperies, and Persian rugs, and exquisite urns filled with flowers which shed their fragrance as rare incense in honor of a King. There was no somberness here, but rather, a regenerating atmosphere, which, while bearing comfort to the weary heart, yet filled one with a heavy sense of loss and indefinable longing. One realized, here, the kinship of joy and sorrow. Those who had gazed upon the splendor of His personality, silently wept. What memories must have crowded in! What heavenly bounty had been theirs to behold the King of Kings, the unrequited hope of generations, but the fulfillment of their own.

After kneeling in silent reverence at the Threshold, each one, still facing the Shrine, entered an ante-chamber, to make room for the men. Shoghi Effendi entered first, and knelt before the inner Shrine, after a few moments retreating to the outer chamber. The room was rapidly filled, as men, old and young, reverently approached the Shrine. Shoghi Effendi then chanted a Tablet, yet untranslated, which while literally incomprehensible to a Western pilgrim, yet conveyed its spiritual beauty, and broke the restraint of the sorrowing ones.

The chanting over, and homage offered at the Holy Threshold, the chamber was again emptied, and devotions were resumed in the garden. This rotation continued throughout the night.

The moon had now risen, lighting up tall cypress and brilliant flower, but a rich tenor voice in holy chant, recalled one's attention to the devotion. One observed that in this Tablet the names of Bahà'u'lláh and of Abdu'l-Bahá were mentioned. I was told that it was the chanting of poems inspired by the noble lives of these Divine Messengers of God. One experienced deep regret at not being able to understand the words.

Again the believers entered the Shrine, until it was filled as before. At three o'clock, the hour of the Ascension of that Glorious One, Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, again approached the Holy Shrine, and again chanted the sacred words which penetrated every heart and made it respond with gratitude, and renewed dedication to the service of the Most Glorious.

When we retired from the Shrine, the first streaks of dawn had already appeared in the eastern sky, while a sacred silence broken only by the song of bird, seemed to permeate all nature.

It was four o'clock when we began our homeward journey. Daylight soon brightened the landscape, and what had been only dimly outlined at night-fall, now assumed shape and color; the dull green of olive tree, in contrast with the dark green of spreading cedar; the graceful movement of robed figures, each bearing a burden upon its head; the small flocks driven by Arab and dog; a camel, or a donkey, laden with produce, all combined to add picturesqueness to the scene.

In spite of the drowsiness that gradually settled upon one, the tranquility of the morning kindled the imagination, and one saw, again, the Master traveling over the same road, many times weary with the weight of burdens, too heavy for an ordinary mortal to bear, and yet with what hope He must have gazed upon that glorious scene—Mount Carmel in the distance, with the city of Haifa snuggled at its foot; the beautiful bay, one day to become a great harbor—and one suddenly realized that here lay the concrete fulfillment of His hopes and that this was 'home.'

“Prayer and supplication are so effective that they inspire one's heart for the whole day with high ideals and supreme sanctity and calmness. One's heart must be sensitive to the music of prayer. He must feel the effect of prayer.”

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

REFLECTING THE LIGHT

ELWYN SURGES

This brief but illuminating article came to us in answer to the editorial in the January number of The Bahá'í Magazine, in which we had made a request for correspondence on the ways of improving one's spiritual life in the midst of pressing daily activities. We are glad to have this contribution, and hope that others who have any helpful message to contribute will feel encouraged to submit their ideas.

ARE there periods in our lives when we feel we have little time for reading and studying Bahá'í principles to perfect ourselves?

It is during these very periods that we may put into practice what we already know. And after all, it is only those principles that become active that are really our own.

We wish to acquire perfections. But do we see perfections in every person and in every thing that concerns us in our daily lives even in trivial affairs? We may think we do. But checking up on ourselves, sometimes the results are surprising.

It is related that once as Christ and His disciples passed the corpse of a dog, all the disciples exclaimed on the deformity and dissolution of the animal; but Christ looked until He found the beautiful white teeth, then commented only on the perfection of the teeth, disregarding entirely all the defects. Christ looked at the praiseworthy qualities always.

AS BABA'IS, we find there are scientific reasons why we must gaze only at the divine and perfect attributes. It is facing the sun instead of the shadow; seeing the positive qualities as real, the negative as unreal. We have learned "that we are as mirrors; that as physical objects receive the light of the material sun and reflect it to the degree in which they are able, so we likewise receive the light of the Sun of Reality and reflect it to a greater or lesser degree, according as we are able," there being no ingress or egress of divinity.

To reflect, we must turn toward the Sun of Truth, as we are exhorted all thru the Scriptures. Upon first thought we naturally suppose we are turned toward the Sun of Reality—that certainly is our intention. But remembering that it has been said "that we are turned toward that which we love the most and that which we love the most occupies our thoughts to the greatest degree,"—on applying this test, we might discover something altogether different from what we supposed. It is so easy to be actually turned toward the shadow, without knowing it! In other words, we may be like the disciples, looking more often at the imperfections.

Could we improve and perfect ourselves more by any one method, than by adopting the practice of striving to see perfection everywhere, at all times? This practice is turning toward the Light, turning towards the Sun of Reality indeed. For was not Bahá'u'lláh the Blessed Perfection?

THE COMING OF THE SON OF MAN

LOVE WAXED COLD

("Because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold."—Jesus.)

In the loveless cold of wintertime
 Far seems the warmth of Love's June Day.
 The Son of Man would bring it near
 To souls possessing power to hear
 And will to walk Love's Way.

WINTER PASSED

(Suggested by the Song of Solomon.)

Lo, the winter even now is passed,
 The time of soul-depressing dearth;
 The certain signs of Spring are clear;
 The time of singing birds is here,
 The flowers appear on earth.

Though the little foxes spoil the vines
 Because of tender grapes they bear,
 They shall be taken soon, and God
 Shall feed His people with His Rod
 And make His Garden fair.

He will take away the bramble patch
 And bring a beauty before unknown!
 Earth shall become a garden spot,
 A joyous life the common lot,
 With Love upon the throne.

"IN THAT DAY"

("Prove me now, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."—Mal. 3:10.)

In the day when the people perforce shall prove
 The God of Love who waits to bless,
 The windows of heaven shall be opened wide;
 All hungers shall be satisfied—
 All fed from Love's largesse.

THE UNSEEN ARMY OF SCIENCE

MARTIN L. DAVEY

The following is part of an address delivered by Mr. Davey, president of the Davey Tree Expert Company of Kent, Ohio. Mr. Davey's speech was delivered as part of the Davey Tree Surgery radio hour which commemorates the achievement of John Davey who fifty-one years ago, created the science of tree surgery.

THAT great force of men and women, who are engaged in the various branches of science, represent the most tremendous forward movements of our civilization, insofar as they are governed by human efforts and genius.

Nearly all the great work of science is hidden from public view. For the most part, it is performed quietly, patiently and persistently, without any spectacular manifestations and without any hope of public applause.

A peculiar attribute of the average scientific mind is the fact that it usually does not concern itself with monetary gain or commercial advancement. It is primarily self-repressive, and is devoted to the tedious grind of mastering known truth and searching for new. It is concerned with the results of its labors rather than personal reward.

It is for these reasons that I wish to speak in public appreciation of the unseen army of science, that has moved forward under cover of the laboratory and the study, almost unnoticed by the general public and without any clamor or popular demonstrations. The scientists of this and past generations have lifted mankind out of darkness, have advanced the common welfare, have provided new instruments of helpfulness and service, and have opened man's eyes to the amazing facts concerning the world in which he lives and the universe of which it is a part.

EXCEPT among the most primitive peoples, science and its operations affect human life at almost every turn. Insofar as its scope reaches, it has lifted our civilization to the highest level that people have ever enjoyed. But the thing that is most impressive to me is the fact that science has so tremendously enlarged man's vision. Its material contributions are so great that it is quite impossible to describe them within the scope of human language, but its contributions to man's intellectual stature are to me the more profound. Science has unlocked so many of the secrets of nature! It has elevated our comprehension of things! It has given us so much greater understanding of life and the world in which we live and the universe of which we are a part, that it has been possible for civilized man to grow to a new and greater intellectual stature!

Some folks think that science is at war with religion, but I am one of those who believe that science has done more to confirm the infinite power of the Creator than anything that could have happened. It is an immeasurably greater God that we can see through the revelations of science. We can look up to our Creator in more devout worship and with more profound veneration, because science has opened our eyes and uncovered our minds to the infiniteness of the universe and the majestic plan of its divine creation.

SCIENCE—A GREAT UNIVERSAL FORCE

THE virtues of humanity are many but science is the most noble of them all. The distinction which man enjoys above and beyond the station of the animal is due to this paramount virtue. It is a bestowal of God; it is not material, it is divine. Science is an effulgence of the Sun of Reality, the power of investigating and discovering the verities of the universe, the means by which man finds a pathway to God. All the powers and attributes of man are human and hereditary in origin, outcomes of nature's processes, except the intellect, which is super-natural. Through intellectual and intelligent inquiry science is the discoverer of all things. It unites present and past, reveals the history of bygone nations and events, and confers upon man today the essence of all human knowledge and attainment throughout the ages. By intellectual processes and logical deductions of reason, this super-power in man can penetrate the mysteries of the future and anticipate its happenings.

IT IS impossible for religion to be contrary to science, even though some intellects are too weak or too immature to understand Truth.

God made religion and science to be the measure, as it were, of our understanding. Take heed that you neglect not such a wonderful power. Weigh all things in this balance. To him who has the power of comprehension, religion is like an open book, but how can it be possible for a man, devoid of reason and intellectuality, to understand the divine realities of God?

Put all your beliefs into harmony with science; there can be no question, for Truth is one. When religion, shorn of its superstitions, traditions, and unintelligent dogmas, shows its conformity with science, then will there be a great unifying, cleansing force in the world, which will sweep before it all wars, disagreements, discords and struggles—then will mankind be united in the Power of the Love of God.

A BOOK REVIEW

CORALIE FRANKLIN COOK

OF making many books" about the Negro, present-day literature seems to have "no end." Much that is written is so unsound and misleading as to be of little or no value to one in quest of facts or reliable inferences concerning the habits, the conditions, the lives of this tenth part of our American population. It is, therefore, both refreshing and heartening to discover a book which in simple, straight-forward language sets forth, without fear or favor, the status of the American of color and his curiously complex but unavoidable relationship to the nation.

The book is "Negro—National Asset or Liability," by John Louis Hill, a white man of southern birth and education.

For the past ten years Dr. Hill has traveled in the north and in the south. He has touched elbows with men and women of high social rank in his own racial group, studied colored folk on levee, in cottonfield, in alleys and byways, in home and church, and school, apparently with open mind and the will to judge righteously.

With courage and frankness the author defines "the three separate and distinct stages" through which he has progressed in reaching his present attitude on the race question.

No. 1. The Negroes were to be kept in their place. No longer slaves they were yet necessary as servants and common laborers and so must be tolerated. They were not looked upon as citizens, hardly as human beings.

No. 2. The author takes up residence in the north, finds colored people in the role of citizens, functioning in the higher walks of life, "men and women of clean morals, high ideals and lofty conceptions of life and duty." He realizes that these people have been robbed of a fair chance and that the white race has been to blame for their treatment. But, note the author's conclusion, that while this attitude was an improvement on the former it was by no means adequate.

No. 3. Arriving at No. 3 he has come to the enlightened understanding that "all people are the results of creative forces operating in their own peculiar times and climes under the inexorable law of cause and effect. God is the Author and Maker of all people, and His gifts are vouchsafed alike to all people, regardless of race, color, kindred, save as they may be affected by the forces of heredity and environment." First contempt, then pity and finally understanding and a sense of human brotherhood.

It should be illuminating to the American who is content to call himself Negro to read this white man's dictum on the use of the word. "Never," he says, "can he take his place as an upstanding citizen until he does as a man and not as a Negro."

Many a colored person, too, who has striven with mind and soul to work in harmony with white people will thank God for the clarity of vision which has led a white man to say "most white people actually concerned about the welfare of the colored race are still in the second phase. They are really very kindly disposed to the Negro, many of them with a burning desire to help him. That attitude constantly holds the white individual "superior" to the colored one. He looks down upon him and talks down to him and regards himself as intensely humanitarian in that he is honestly endeavoring to uplift an inferior creature."

A gullible public rating its concept of colored people upon sordid fiction and popular broadcastings would do well to ponder on this reflection. Such things "are only a portrayal of certain phases of Negro life so overdrawn that they do the colored people as a whole an almost irreparable injustice."

Through the better work of science and philanthropy, whose twin genius approaches Negro life with a "sincere investigative attitude," there will come such startling revelations that there will be no question that this man of darker hue is one of the most dependable assets to the nation. In the field of manual labor alone such statement might well go unchallenged.

With unerring judgment Dr. Hill touches upon the artistic temperament of the Negro "creative of and readily reacting to all forms of art." With his inherited gifts and increasing and larger opportunities for self-expression, Dr. Hill regards it not improbable that within a few generations the very largest contribution to national art will be made by the American who carries Negro blood in his veins.

The author warns against measuring the Negro's worth in any way except as an asset to the nation. He must not be judged as part of a "white man's country," nor by the standards of those who think money the one thing to be desired, rather by the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States.

Dr. Hill must have looked back a number of years. He must have seen the freed-woman reaching out with motherly hands bringing together her scattered and often ill-assorted children, and with the help of a husband, housing them under one roof. He has witnessed, no doubt, her matchless ambition for those children, and the planting of courage in the minds of her sons and chastity in the minds of her daughters. He has seen this dark woman develop and grow until today she has come forth a woman among women.

So far, the Negro's patriotism and his strong religious nature, the writer thinks, have been a great asset to the nation. The blind, who still insist on race proscription and injustice, may well consider the potential danger of the Soviet teach ings, which offer a way out and above social abuses.

For colored people themselves no finer note could be struck than this: "The last potential evil that might come out of the colored race, which would be destructive to themselves and possibly disastrous to future inter-racial amity, is the possibility of its turning anti-religious."

Many more pages than are in this book might be written about this book. We who hope, who strive and who with patience wait, may well say with Dr. Hill when he writes as poet and philosopher, "may it not, indeed, be possible that in the divine economy of the various racial and national strains converged in America, to eventually exhibit an ideal civilization—the Negro himself, with his suffering past and saving future, may be the one element to prevent dissolution."

"To bring the white and the colored together is considered impossible and improbable, but the breaths of the Holy Spirit will accomplish this fact.

"The world of America must be very thankful for this realization; for this enmity and hatred which exist between the white and the colored races is very dangerous and there is no doubt that it will end in bloodshed unless the penetration of the Word of God, the breaths of the Holy Spirit and the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are diffused amongst them and love instead of hatred is established between the two races. They must destroy the foundation of enmity and rancor and lay the basis of love and affinity. The power of the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh will cause the disappearance of this danger from America."

“The Bahá'í Movement imparts life . . . And when this Cause is fully spread . . . warfare will be a thing of the past, universal peace will be realized, the oneness of the world of humanity will be recognized and religion and science will work hand in hand.”

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

IT IS INDEED true that “experience is the best teacher.” Man may theorize about principles of human conduct and policies which would help humanity to progress, but unless events tend to support the contention of the idealist his ideals do not produce fruit in action. When, however, destiny by means of great cosmic events, brings to pass dynamic changes, man is forced to think and act on a new level and humanity quickly arises to the necessity of the new occasion.

When Bahá'u'lláh, nearly eighty years ago, gave forth His message of universal peace to the crowned heads of the world, the great nations had then no thought of renouncing war as a means of national aggrandizement. Events of the past had seemed to demonstrate that war, when successful, was a unique means of national growth, expansion and prosperity. Humanity was not at all ready to listen to the Divine Commands as uttered by Bahá'u'lláh.

Then came the World war, an entirely new experience in the martial history of humanity because of the new methods of destruction used. War was no longer a holiday excursion in which a great victory could be won at the cost of a few lives. No nation profited by the war. Instead it proved a cataclysm most upsetting to the political and economic stability of all the nations engaged. How many monarchs lost their crowns! How many nations saw their boundaries changed and the whole pattern of their national life destroyed because of this war! Now for the first time enlightened public opinion was unanimous in its cry that war should cease. Events have forced the world to a recognition of the truth which it had refused to accept when expressed by Bahá'u'lláh.

THE SAME thing is true as regards the world's economic reformation, the pattern of which was given by Bahá'u'lláh almost two generations ago. The principle that economic security should be guaranteed to each individual by the State was not accepted then either by the politicians or by the economists as a feasible thing. Today, however, two major events have forced a great swing in the direction of the economic pattern laid down by Bahá'u'lláh.

The first of these events is the establishment of a government by and of the working classes in Russia, which guarantees a livelihood to every individual who will work and which places the whole resources of the State at the disposal of the community.

The second event is the great world-wide economic crisis and consequent unemployment which has forced all nations to face the definite issue as to what is the responsibility of the government in regard to the populace out of work and lacking in food and other necessities of life. For the first time, in many countries the individualistic policy of "laissez faire" is being forced to the wall by the very necessities of the occasion.

TODAY NO nation can afford to seem indifferent to starving millions of the working classes, especially with Sovietism claiming daily extraordinary performances of a government wholly conducted by the working classes.* Therefore we find a country like England accepting definitely the principle of economic responsibility to each individual citizen. This would never have come about by mere theory and preaching before the world war, the experiment of Soviet Russia, and the present economic crisis. The other nations of Europe are committed more or less as England to this same principle, that the State should guarantee a livelihood to every citizen.

Nor can this country avoid ultimately a similar definition of what government means. As long as private enterprise in the United States can take care of the starving, it will be allowed to do so; but should the resources of privately organized charity be overtaxed, it is quite evident that the government can not permit millions to starve without appropriating public monies in the face of such need.

So ALSO as regards the equality of men and women. The World War was a great leveller of the sexes and was the occasion of woman suffrage in England and in the United States. It caused women to successfully invade many industries previously closed to them by custom and tradition.

It was the World War more than any other single factor which awakened all Asia to the need of universal education in order that by means of the enlightenment and progress resultant, she might equal the power and prestige of Europe and so find independence and equality in world affairs.

And the greatest ideal of all for humanity and the only means of achieving world peace, that is, the unity and brotherhood of man,—this idea has been tremendously advanced by the earnest desire of enlightened peoples for a stable foundation for world peace. Realizing that such a peace can only be founded upon mutual understanding, respect and confidence, all idealists today are advocating international friendship and interracial unity.

THUS we see that all the major principles announced by Bahá'u'lláh as the basis for a new world civilization have entered the consciousness of humanity through cataclysmic events that could not have been foreseen when Bahá'u'lláh gave His great Message to the world. Now humanity has indeed developed into a more or less receptive attitude toward these principles, made so by the sad experiences it has traveled through. Today the world is ready in a remarkable degree for the great Message of universal brotherhood, universal peace, universal education, universal security to the individual, which the Divinity that guides our ends has proclaimed through Bahá'u'lláh as the necessary pattern for humanity's future progress.

JUST as in the case of the individual, so also in the case of a nation or of humanity as a whole, there is no susceptibility or receptivity for new truths so long as the old customs seem to bring happiness and success. The individual who has health, prosperity and happiness too commonly feels no need for religion; but events that change the whole pattern of that individual's life, bring receptivity and capacity for divine guidance. It is exactly so in the case of humanity itself. While the old customs seem to be advantageous, there is no collective capacity for receiving the Message of God for the welfare of humanity. But when old customs fail, institutions totter, thrones are shaken to the dust, governments quail before the rising tide of popular strength, then it is that all enlightened men attain a capacity for understanding the great principles enunciated by the Founder of the Bahá'í Movement.

As a great statesman of a foreign race said when the writer spoke to him of the principles of universal brotherhood proclaimed by Bahá'u'lláh, "What harm is there in this?" Many present day thinkers, upon hearing of the Bahá'í Movement and its principles of universal brotherhood, go even further and say, "What salvation is there for the world today unless it accepts these principles?"

It does not matter greatly at this moment that these thinkers do not align themselves definitely with the Bahá'í Movement. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá says, "It makes no difference whether you have ever heard of Bahá'u'lláh or not . . . the man who lives the life according to the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh is already a Bahá'í."

The power of Destiny moves upon the face of the world urging humanity into a condition where it is very near to accepting in practice the Bahá'í principles. It may well be that coming events of a momentous nature may break down this last remaining barrier dividing sympathetic understanding from active participation in the work of the Kingdom.

"If the world should remain as it is today, great danger will face it; but if reconciliation and unity are witnessed, if security and confidence are established, if with heart and soul we strive in order that the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh may find effective penetration in the realities of humankind, inducing fellowship and accord, binding together the hearts of the various religions and uniting divergent peoples,—the world of mankind shall attain peace and composure, the will of God will become the will of man and the earth a veritable habitation of angels."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE NEW PROSPERITY

DALE S. COLE

HOW masterfully, Robert Bridges in "The Testament of Beauty" depicts conditions in the world today, when he says:

"We sail a changeful sea through halcyon days and storm, and when the ship laboreth, our steadfast purpose trembles like as the compass in a binnacle. Our stability is but balance, and wisdom lies in masterful administration of the unforeseen."

"Masterful administration of the unforeseen" is just what the business world is trying to achieve, although the attempt is not often as vividly phrased. There seem to be unique forces at work, which have not been encountered in commerce before, widespread in their influences, and ruthless in their machinations. Many sacred economic traditions seem to be awash. A decade of spiritless prosperity has come to a catastrophic end. The ship of international trade laboreth after the storm. All phases of life are affected. Where is that balance which means stability? Is it to be found in trying to reconstruct the cycles of prosperity and depression through which we have passed intermittently for a number of years? To reconstruct them with the same building materials as before?

What queer quirk is there to human nature which causes us, at the same instant, to be slaves to traditional attitudes and enthusiastic proponents of the new? We seem to prefer antique methods of government and education, but in industry and science the newest is none too new. We like old paintings and modern automobiles. We like new clothes and old shoes—the glitter of new raiment but the comfort of old leather.

Some such attitude seems to sway many of our reactions today. We want the benefits of the new without giving up some of the flavors of the old. Changes occur so rapidly that our adaptability in many respects is insufficient. It is not strange then that our conceptions of certain phases of existence lag behind changes. Certain words and phrases have meant specific things to us and we are loathe to alter their meanings with the times. We are accustomed to the mellow chimes from the belfry, and resent any modification of them, but we are not averse to having the bells rung electrically and automatically, in fact, so to do would be a matter of pride.

Mr. Wallace Brett Donham in his most challenging book—Business Adrift—warns that:

"The world is in a peculiarly dangerous condition because of the numerous elements leading toward instability. Science continues to change our environment without changing human nature. Human behavior is changing rapidly because it is constantly facing new environments."

Human behavior may be thought of as compounded from desires and environment. Human nature, as generally conceived, may not change, but human behavior is a chameleon, a poor, confused chameleon knowing not what color to adopt. Without some steadfast purpose, some wise plan, clearly understood and assimilated, are we not prone to be blown about as autumn leaves before the winds?

In The Promulgation of Universal Peace, (page 138), 'Abdu'l-Bahá is reported as saying some nineteen years ago,

“Present exigencies demand new methods of solution; world problems are without precedent. Old ideas and modes of thought are fast becoming obsolete. Ancient laws and archaic ethical systems will not meet the requirements of modern conditions, for this is clearly a century of new life, the century of the revelation of the reality and therefore the greatest of all centuries.”

Being true when uttered, how much more true, if possible, it is today. Changes have accelerated in the meantime as 'Abdu'l-Bahá knew they would. Unfamiliar forces are at work, and these must be wisely controlled, we are told on every hand, if our civilization is to continue to advance. We are not only faced with the necessity of restoring healthy economic conditions, but we are confronted with the essential necessity of solving attendant social and humane problems as well.

IF HUMAN behavior is changing, as it undoubtedly is, why should we cling to the customary meaning of the magic word “prosperity”? Because, in the past it has meant those things which were pleasant and profitable. It savors of humming factories, of great shipments of goods, of high wages and rampant speculation. It has meant the easy acquisition of things. In the period just passed it has carried mass-production to the competitive borderland of profitless prosperity. It has allowed some men to acquire fortunes in the short span of a few years, or even months, while many others remain in need of the necessities of life. It has built up what has been characterized as the high American standard of living. All of which has been based on the manufacture and sale of things and on the rewards of a system depending upon individual incentive.

When this treasured state of affairs known as prosperity is no more, when factories slow down, when many people have no employment, when the standard of living is threatened,—with one accord we scan the business horizon, intently and constantly, for the return of prosperity. We expect it to occur in the same old form in which it departed, and for the same old reasons, bringing the familiar and cherished effects. We expect it to mean the same things that it did in the past.

But can it do so? Is prosperity ever the same for any two contiguous periods of history? Will it mean the same things in the next ten or twenty years that it has in the past? Have we any right to expect that it will? Do we want it to? Is it one of those things which we prefer to consider traditionally rather than rationally? Is it not like the old shoes which have been lost and which we hope to find and claim again as our own, wiggling our toes in familiar comfort?

II

WHATEVER prosperity has meant in the past, it will probably mean something quite different in the future. The prosperity of tomorrow will be a new, different sort of prosperity than we have known in the past, if civilization is to advance. For instance, greater economic stability will have to be achieved. Employment insurance is in the offing. Shorter working hours are much talked of. Greater premium is being suggested for leisure.

Each year we say that the spring returns, but does it? Certainly one springtime may be much like another, but time has elapsed, with its effects, and no cyclic event recurring, can ever be exactly like that which has gone before. There is progress even if nothing else can be said to move but the hands of our clocks.

And so in looking for the return of prosperity in the old sense, perhaps we are anticipating a phantom and had better place our faith in a new kind of prosperity, one better suited to the day, and one which will almost inevitably bear the marks of having been influenced by that great current of change which is sweeping humanity along toward a better and more stable civilization. Economic factors are changing rapidly. Prosperity is not immune—it must be redefined.

One of the great reasons why the meaning of prosperity must change is that there is a new competition to deal with in human affairs. It is that powerful rivalry between the tangibles and the intangibles. Today and tomorrow business will have to concern itself with this new kind of competition. The problem is not of inducing individuals to buy this instead of that thing, in order to keep production up, wages high and purchasing power active; but it is the problem of weighing the individual's wants for tangible things against his needs and impelling desires for the intangibles—security, stability, protection, a just share in well-being.

"The clear fact is that for any stage of economic progress, above the minimum of existence, the wants for intangibles are in active competition with the wants for things.

If purchasing power were unlimited this competition between tangibles and intangibles would still go on."²*

In time of stress, with purchasing power severely restricted, when humanity realizes that it has lost control of affairs at least for the time being, there is a large degree of chastening necessity which forces the attention of many from the tangibles to the intangibles. Then is when we look upward and not around.

Were purchasing power unlimited, the surfeit of things would soon stale enjoyment, and we would likewise turn for consolation and inspiration to the intangibles.

And so the new prosperity must be one which deals with the intangibles of life. The new prosperity will be gauged not by material things alone, but by things and other things—the intangibles, with ever increasing accent on the latter. What are some of these intangibles? Leisure, security, self-respect, the chance to get recreation and keep health, to play, to study, to develop aesthetic values, to share in the progress of the world as a community, to be active in and contribute to the progress of humanity, to investigate truth, and to comply with God's will.

Thus it seems probable that the new prosperity will be clothed in new garments for this one compelling reason of competition alone. The new prosperity may arise from an as yet obscure point on the horizon, so that we shall have to watch intently if we are to discern the exact time and place of its origin. Its trends and effects will be apparent to all.

*Wallace Brett Donham, in "Business Adrift."

IMPORTANT and impelling as will be the new competition between tangibles and intangibles, it is not the only factor which the new prosperity will have to take into account. The economic welfare of the world depends upon cooperation of nations, and those things which contribute to increasing commercial pressure between them, act as a brake on the industrial, ethical, political and spiritual advancement of the world. There is greater need now than ever for stability, in order that those economically embarrassed nations may regain their equilibrium.

Another factor which the new prosperity will have to face, is that of excess productive capacity in many industries and in some agricultural localities. The chances are, that in many instances, existent capacity can never again be utilized completely. Improvements in processes are all in the direction of greater and cheaper production with less human labor. Rationalization, or the weeding out of inefficient units with attendant hardships in readjustment may be widely applied.

The new prosperity will have to devise means of preventing an over supply of such commodities as wheat, sugar, coffee, rubber and metals entailing the dislocation of commercial and social life and forcing entire nations not only to the brink of but actually into revolutions. It will have to revise the whole system of distribution and solve the economics of agriculture. These are grave and momentous tasks.

The new prosperity will have to contribute mightily to the stability of the world and the individual communities of which it is comprised. Wallace Brett Donham formulates the problem, as far as America is concerned as follows:

“How can we, as business men, within the areas for which we are responsible, best meet the needs of the American people, most nearly approximate supplying their wants, maintain profits, handle problems of unemployment, face the Russian challenge, and at the same time aid Europe and contribute most to or disturb least the cause of International Peace?”

His is a great cry for leadership and a plan in which all may cooperate. On whatever grounds we may criticize the Russian experiment, they at least have a definite purpose in mind and adopt plans to achieve it. Plans may change but their aim is a clear cut issue. But he warns us that “we must remember that even plans made through such leadership (in America) will be dangerous if the leaders lack a philosophy of the problems of business as related to civilization or fail to develop the modes and habits of thought necessary to the rational foresight required in a changing world.”

As to this required philosophy, Alfred North Whitehead, in his introduction to “Business Adrift” explains that—“Philosophy is an attempt to purify those fundamental beliefs which finally determine the emphasis of attention that lies at the base of character.”

“We must produce a great age, or see the collapse of the upward striving of our race.”

Remember that 'Abdu'l-Bahá said that this is “the greatest of all centuries.” This age, to fulfil these characterizations, will have to be based on a new kind of prosperity, no matter by what terms we attempt to define it, general prosperity will have to do with many of the spiritual nuances of life. Emphasis will have to be placed with accelerated tempo, on the intangibles of life rather than on things and the possession of them.

To those who are bearing the hardships accompanying the collapse of the familiar kind of prosperity, it will be no task to accept a redefinition of it. The very things of which the older prosperity has deprived them will be the stock in trade of the new.

III

It is beginning to be realized, from a purely economic viewpoint, that there can be no widespread and sustained prosperity as long as a few, either nations or individuals are superfluously wealthy, and the many possessed of but very limited means and slight opportunities to enjoy those intangible needs which are the great factors in modifying the desires for the material things produced by industry. When a person is very unhappy, disturbed, insecure and worried, he is not a good consumer nor a good prospective customer.

In The Wisdom of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, (pages 140 to 143), this matter is very clearly discussed.

The Bahá'í Revelation teaches that every human being has a right to a "certain amount of well being." The rich may have their luxuries but the others must have comforts, the necessities and privileges of development.

In The Promulgation of Universal Peace, (pages 97 and 98), 'Abdu'l-Bahá reminds us that material civilization has reached a very advanced degree, but that this is not sufficient. It will not satisfy. Its benefits are limited to this earthly life. But there is no limitation to the spirit of man. There is need for a divine civilization which will witness great progress.

This is the key to that "great age" mentioned previously. This is the plan for "the greatest of all centuries." With the divine civilization, prosperity will also be illumined with those attributes which may help us to define it as spiritual-prosperity.

We are told that if we develop our susceptibilities to the spiritual, our effectiveness will be enhanced. We need all the effectiveness we can muster to raise the world from its present state of mal-adjustment.

Solutions for the exigencies confronting us, He ('Abdu'l-Bahá) has explained can be brought about solely through the Religion of God, which can alone create love, unity and concord in human hearts, the absolute requisites for the complete solution of the ills which beset humanity. It is through the agency of the Love of God that our purpose must be found and plans formulated. We must seek to reflect the Light of Reality on a troubled world.

Standards of monetary systems may and do fluctuate but the fundamental values on which the real life must be based, are unchanging and eternal.

OUR theorists are confused. Old laws do not seem to fit present situations. There are different schools of thought among which there is little agreement. New problems have appeared about which there seems to be some mystery, some deep-seated factors which lie hidden. Many explanations and suggestions are offered from numerous viewpoints, and there is a growing conviction that there are some secrets which have escaped us.

In Bahá'i Scriptures, (page 445), 'Abdu'l-Bahá kindly tells what these are:

"The secrets of the whole economic question are Divine in nature, and are concerned with the world of the heart and the spirit. In the Bahá'i Teachings, this is most completely explained, and without the consideration of the Bahá'i Teachings it is impossible to bring about a better state."

Thus a great responsibility is placed on those who are familiar with these tenets, a responsibility involving the wise dissemination of knowledge concerning them. Some one has said "that knowledge is power" but that wisdom is the control of such knowledge. Unwanted knowledge is almost always unwelcome, and ineffective. Education cannot be forced on unwilling recipients, but the dynamic forces now acting towards instability the world over, are also arousing new susceptibilities through sheer necessity and despair of old methods of thought, and opportunities are being presented and will continue to arise for the promulgation of the real solution as explained in the Bahá'i Revelation.

"Economic questions" said 'Abdu'l-Bahá "are most interesting but the power which moves, controls and attracts the hearts of men is the Love of God."

PROGRESSIVE RELIGION IN JAPAN

The following interesting material has been sent to us by our contributing Editor for Japan, Miss Agnes Alexander.

THE participants of a meeting held in a Buddhist Temple in Tokyo, January 10, 1931, representing Buddhist, Bahá'i and Christian. The object of the meeting was to seek true religion delivered from all prejudices. From left to right: Rev. J. Mori, Buddhist Priest and Superior of the Temple; Miss Agnes Alexander, Bahá'i teacher, and Rev. Sempo Ito, Christian Pastor. In the background the Temple entrance is seen and in the lower righthand corner is the announcement of the meeting which was posted outside the Temple gate.

BAHA'I PIONEERS

A Short Historical Survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

SIYYID MUSTAFA ROUMIE

The Author, one of the leading Bahá'ís of Mandalay, was in his youth an ardent associate and companion of the great Mirza Jamal Effendi who first brought the Bahá'í Message to the countries of southern Asia. These chronicles are both fascinating themselves in the spiritual adventure they narrate, and also invaluable as a history written by one who was an eye witness.

WHEN through the mighty Will of God, His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, came out of the terrible prison walls in the fortress of 'Akká (where He had been exiled and incarcerated for a number of years by the Turkish government at the instigation of the fanatical Muslim clergy of Persia) and finally settled at Bahjí, at a distance of about a couple of miles from the Great Prison, His numerous devoted followers and many ardent admirers of His teaching and high ideals poured forth from all corners of the world, especially from Persia, to lay their allegiance at His feet and to receive His command to serve the great Cause of the "upliftment of humanity" for which He and His noble adherents had undergone severe sufferings and privations and suffered diverse humiliations, chastisements and persecutions of which there is hardly a parallel in the history of the world.

Among these followers was a venerable figure of rather an advanced age, a great scholar of Arabic, Turkish and Persian, the selfless striking character of whose personality and whose singular courteous manners most eloquently testified to his noble birth and high rank. Sulaymán Khan was his original and official name, and Tanakaboon in Mazindarán (Persia) was his birthplace. He subsequently came to be known in the Bahá'í world as Jamal Effendi or Jamaluddin Shah. As an orthodox believer in the Báb since the early period of His Declaration, he was well aware of the prophecies regarding the Manifestation of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh. Therefore he with peaceful heart pledged his faith in Him. Leaving his dear home in Persia he renounced all his worldly possessions, very cheerfully gave up his official rank and position and presented himself to His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, offering most humbly and meekly to sacrifice himself at the Holy Threshold of his Lord so that he might attain His supreme pleasure which to him was more precious than all the treasures of the universe put together. Such was the condition of the early sincere devoted believers.

His Holiness revealed a Tablet conferring upon him the distinguished title of "Lamia" (i. e., the brilliant one). The opening words of that holy Tablet which was written by the Supreme Pen were as follows: "O thou the brilliant one! We have conferred upon thee the title of "the brilliant one" so that thou mayest shine forth in the universe in the name of thy Lord the Possessor of the Day of Distinction." He then received a command to proceed to India with his kinsman, Mirza Hussain, who was directed to accompany him. These two noble and heroic souls, without the slightest wavering, at once set out from the Holy Land with unflinching determination to serve the Divine Cause, and took the first boat available from Port Said to India.

They landed in Bombay about the year 1872-73. On their arrival here they met Jinabi Haji Sayed Mirza Afnan and the great sage Jinabi Haji Muhammad Ibrahim, "the moballigh"—both of Yazd (Persia). Since they were quite strangers to the country and were not acquainted with the language, customs and manners of the people of India, they decided for the time being to act under the advice and guidance of these two gentlemen of Yazd, who were well known as general merchants and commission agents, and had their business of long standing in Fort Bombay under the celebrated name of Messrs. Maji Sayed Mirza and Mirza Mahmood Co. So Jamal Effendi's first place of residence in India was "The Hussainieh." This was a building dedicated to the celebration of the mourning ceremony of Imam Hussain by its founder a zealous Shi'ih philanthropist from Lucknow, India, called Babri Ali.

DURING his short stay in Bombay Jamal Effendi did not remain inactive. Despite the language difficulty he managed to deliver the Great Message to many distinguished Persian residents, such as the late Agha Khan (the then head of the Khoja Ismailieh Community and grandfather of the present well known leader of that Community), and the Persian High Priest of the Shi'ih Isna Asharieh Mosque, Meer Sayed Muhammad. The latter accepted the Message and proved to be one of the most confirmed and devout believers. Within a short period Jamal Effendi became a marked figure in the public eye, and the nature of his activities became widely known, which necessitated his friends advising him in the interests of the Cause and their own protection to leave Bombay and go to the interior provinces of India. Accordingly he left Bombay and traveled through many important towns proclaiming the glad tidings everywhere and resurrecting souls from the dark graves of error and prejudice whenever such opportunity presented itself. Finally he reached Rampur Rohilkhand, which was then under a native chief by the name of Nawab Kalbi Ali Khan, an orthodox Sunni Muslim. Jamal Effendi was the guest of the chief's uncle Colonel Nawab Asghar Ali Khan. During the stay there the chief one day arranged for a meeting at his palace of the Muslim clergy of his State for a discussion with him about the Bahá'í doctrine of the "nonexistence of evil." Jamal Effendi in the course of his address told the audience that the Bahá'ís do not believe that there exists any positive evil in the creation. According to Bahá'í philosophy all is good. The Creator of all things is but one God. He is good, and therefore His creation is purely good. Evil never exists in His creation. It is a non-existent thing.

At the end of his discourse the High Priest of the State, who was noted for his learning, pointed to the fire on the hubble-bubble which the chief was smoking and questioned Jamal Effendi. "Is this not a positive evil? It may burn the palace and reduce to ashes all present here in no time."

Jamal Effendi answered the question with great eloquence. He asked the audience to imagine what would be the consequence if fire were to cease to exist upon earth for a moment. In its absence the very existence of human life would be impossible, as it is a principle element in the creational system believed by the cosmologists, and generally in cold countries people would be simply frozen to death without fire. We ought to be thankful to the Creator for creating such a useful thing for the preservation of our life. How can one justly call it a positive evil! The improper and wrong use of it, as of all things in the world, is undoubtedly an evil.

It is the same with all the natural qualities of man. If they be used and displayed in an unlawful way they become offenders and blameworthy. The gist of the Divine Laws in all religions is to use each and everything in its proper place as ordained by its Author. Then each thing is termed as good and lawful. Only when used in a wrong place is it called unlawful, evil, or sin. The chief object of the Prophets of God was to teach this doctrine to mankind according to their condition and the necessity of that time. Thus have arisen the "Commandments" and "Prohibitions."

He also illustrated the same principle from a pen-knife which was shown to him by the Chief. Referring to it he said, "How useful an article is this. But its misuse (for example, if it is used for the purpose of stabbing) is an evil. The creation of metal is not an evil in itself. It is one of the necessities of our life. But when men turn it into a deadly weapon it becomes an evil."

The Chief and the whole Assembly of the learned men accepted his scholarly exposition of the doctrine with great applause; and many became interested in the teachings of the New Philosophy of the New Age.

II.

ABOUT this time in 1876, there was held an historic gathering in Delhi, the ancient capital of the Mogul Empire in India, on the occasion of the assumption of the title of the "Empress of India" by her Majesty Queen Victoria. Almost all the Rulers of the various Native States with their entourage, high officials of the British Government and many notable persons, Indians as well as nonIndians, came to the gathering. Jamal Effendi was not slow in taking advantage of a unique opportunity. There he came in contact with almost all the celebrities of India and quietly unfolded to them the Great Mystery of the age. He met here Swami Dayanand Saraswati, the founder of the Arya Samaj, and found in him a true and sympathetic friend of the Cause. Finally he proceeded to Deccan Hyderabad—the Nizam's dominion. The Nizam being very young at that time Jamal Effendi was introduced to the Prime Minister, Sir Salar Jang Mukhtarul Mulk, who was a staunch Shi'ih. Through the magnetic personality and eloquence of Jamal Effendi this statesman soon became deeply interested in the Bahá'í Movement and eventually a

Tablet from the Supreme Pen was revealed in his favor. (According to the laws of the Kingdom, high officials could not confess openly any religion except their ancestral faith declared on oath, even though they were ruling monarchs.)

His next move was towards Madras, in southern India. While in Hyderabad and Madras he conceived the idea of visiting Burma and unfurling the banner of Ya Bahá Ul Abhá on the shore of the Irrawaddy, as he received information that King Mindon of Burma was a monarch of exceptionally generous disposition and absolutely unprejudiced mind, and though himself a Buddhist was tolerant to all forms of worship. In those days the steamships running between India and Burma were very few in number, so he had to wait for some time before he could catch a boat to take him to Rangoon. While he was thus waiting, a message from the Chief of Rampur State was received, soliciting his immediate presence there, because the brother of the Chief—Nawab Mahmood Ali Khan—had displayed a tendency towards atheism and it was the conviction of the Chief that Jamal Effendi was the only person qualified to demonstrate to his brother the absurdity of his belief and bring him round to the true faith of Islam. Jamal Effendi readily accepted the invitation. But before proceeding to Rampur he sent Mirza Hussain with a servant to Rangoon by a cargo boat, and he also sent along with them all his luggage.

It was in Madras that Siyyid Mustafa the writer of this account, met Jamal Effendi the first time. I was then quite a young man and was just preparing to return to my native country, Karbala and Baghdad, after having settled my dues in consequence of a heavy loss sustained in the rice business. Jamal Effendi's eloquent address, his silver voice and his flowery language frequently attracted large gatherings around him. This humble servant was one of his ardent admirers. I soon became so devotedly attached to him that I actually approached my father, Siyyid Muhammad, celebrated as Roumie, for permission to accompany Jamal Effendi to Rampur. My father, who was a very learned Muslim divine and held in great esteem and reverence by the Muslim public, did not approve of the proposal; and although he did not exactly know that the theme of Jamal Effendi's talk was the Bahá'i Revelation, yet he not only refused permission but even prohibited me from entering his house. I was determined, however, to accompany Jamal Effendi to Rampur and succeeded in doing so.

“The Holy Spirit is the energizing factor in the life of man. . . . He who is educated by the Divine Spirit can, in his time, lead others to receive the same Spirit. The life and morals of a spiritual man are in themselves an education to those who know him.”

HENRIETTA CLARK WAGNER

A FEW years ago I renewed a very precious friendship of my girlhood with a woman, in the interim widowed, to whom with her husband I had given the Bahá'í Message more than twenty years previous. Since the sad event we had lost touch with each other, but I was gratified to find that she had kept track of The Movement through press notices and comments.

After the ordinary conversation about personal matters, she ventured to ask, "Etta, are you still interested in that religion?"

"Yes, Mary, more than ever. In fact, it is all that has kept me on the earth." Then a pause.

"Didn't the Leader of that Movement come to this country some years ago?"

"Yes, in 1912. He spent about nine months in the United States, traveling from coast to coast, but very quietly, even so, it was astonishing how many people He met, singly and in groups—the high and low, rich and poor, educated and uneducated, people of all religions and of no religion, scientists, theologians, peace advocates and manufacturers of deadly weapons and explosives—all were touched, silenced and melted by His simple words and his indescribable, all-embracing spirit."

"And didn't He pass away some years ago?"

"Yes, in 1921, when His earthly work was accomplished."

Another pause. Then, finally,

"Well, Etta, I want to ask a question. Why, does the Movement grow so slowly?"

THERE IS, for every one of us, food for thought in this question, as to what extent we are individually responsible. Yet all great and lasting movements have had slow growth in the beginning because of the prejudice of the people to innovations. Like the boy in school who was promoted and given a first reader in place of the primer to which he had become fondly attached, we cry when our primers are taken from us—our old ideas, beliefs, habits and customs.

Just yesterday I heard a woman say that she and her husband had been attending the Congregational Church, and liked it, but she must some day go back and die in the Lutheran Church because that was her mother's religion. We cannot but admire a woman's loyalty to her mother's memory, but this is largely sentiment. Should we reflect a moment, we would realize that if we all think and believe as our forbears did, there could be no progress upon the earth. Personally speaking, I feel sure that my dear mother, who has been in the Realm of Spirit many years, has progressed infinitely more than I have, imprisoned in this cage of the body, and she would tell me, I know, not to think as she did in those dark ages of the past, but to go on, and ever on, in the Light of the Spirit of Truth.

Take our own Christian religion as an example. When Jesus was crucified, He had only a handful of real believers and followers, though many out of curiosity flocked to see and hear Him, but fell away and were no more seen nor heard from, in such wise that He turned sadly to some of the faithful and asked: "Will you also go away?" After His agony in the Garden, He found them asleep, and at His trial we hear not one voice raised in His defense. Oh, the pathos of that hour!

LET US, in comparison, look to this day, the dawn of the establishment of the Kingdom, and see if humanity has made any progress. From the time of the Báb down to the present time, it is estimated that more than twenty thousand souls in Persia have offered up their lives on the altar of Bahá'u'lláh, the Glory of God. They went to their death singing and dancing and praising God for the privilege of shedding their blood in His path. Out of their sacrifice a new Persia has been born; schools have been established and boys and girls are being educated alike. The women are coming forth from the seclusion of centuries, are becoming educated and appearing in meetings in company with their husbands. Railroads have been built, automobiles are becoming common and aeroplane routes have been established.

Think of this in benighted Persia, where, a few years ago, to be even known as a Bahá'i was sufficient to be dragged forth to an ignominious death!

With what enthusiasm have we in America followed the triumphal world teaching tour of our Bahá'i traveler and apostle, Martha Root! Particularly impressive is the picture of the open air New Year Feast in Tihrán, at which she spoke, attended by twenty-three hundred people! Can we ask, Why does the Cause not grow faster?

IN THE western world the conditions are different and the Cause has been of slower growth, due to our materialistic tendencies. We are "from Missouri"—we have to be shown. But the factors are at work which will show even the people of the dollar mark, and when the American people are at last aroused and put on the robes of spirit, we will prove that we do not do things by halves.

The Christian religion, that had its birth in the Orient, was worked out and made practical in the West, and carried back by the missionaries, as Jesus commanded, into every corner of the globe. So may it not be, through the wealth and enterprise of America rightly expended, that every country of the earth may become a garden spot and the footstool of the Most High?

"Inasmuch as this century is a century of light, capacity for action is assured to mankind. Necessarily the divine principles will be spread among men until the time of action arrives. Surely this has been so and truly the time and conditions are ripe for action now."

THE FUTURE RELIGION

HOWARD R. HURLBUT

This is the author's second installment in the articles he is contributing which describe the Bahá'í Movement as the fulfillment of prophecy and the solution of the world's present needs. The first installment appeared in the May number of this magazine.

NOAH was therefore to revive the Adamic instruction, and the experiences associated with his labors are presented in the allegory of the "Ark" which had no relation to a structure of substance, but was the "Ark of the Covenant of God" wherein Noah standing as a Revelator of the Truth, called upon the people of his time to emerge from the seas of their superstition and error and take refuge in the only Truth. Correspondingly with the Adamic experience, the evil tendencies were paramount and only a few responded favorably to his call while the great majority derided him and, as recorded in the Qur'án, they asked him by what authority he stood to present to them a new religion. Their faith had been good enough for their fathers, it was good enough for them. So the light of the day of Noah witnessed accession of interest and sure decline to the state of spiritual darkness, despite the high scientific standards promoted by Enoch.

When Abraham arose—the "third day"—there was no change in the manner of reception accorded the message. We see him pictured with his hammer breaking the images of the gods in the temple where his father worshipped, its meaning being his assault upon the false doctrines and the idolatry of the people, by reason of which on the incitement by the priestcraft, he was compelled to take recourse in flight from Ur to Aleppo.

With the dawn of his era, the race had developed from its original nomadic state, which had become tribal in the time of Noah and had begun to make claim to territories of authority as distinct from those similarly held by others, and "nations" became a human establishment, their regulation of relationships being entered upon according to their human concepts of what it should be. These laws became inadequate to uphold either an international accord or a spiritual force, and after the night had fallen upon the people, Moses (the fourth day) appeared with a repetition of the age-old cry. His was the mission of the promulgation of the Law of God, and the divine tablets which He revealed have endured through all these thousands of years to remain in our own time as the bases of all law.

His appearance is limned in one of the most deceptive, as it is one of the most alluring, of all the allegories of Holy Writ. The narrative pictures him as being found in a floating cradle in the bulrushes of the Nile by the daughter of Pharaoh, and we find ourselves almost unconsciously absorbing it and taking it into our innermost hearts as something sweet and intensely human, with the coloring of romance about it—a daughter of a king stooping to associate with the humble and taking to herself the offspring of a slave. One might consider it were better to leave so intimate a narration of human love, unsullied by explication, much as we defer making known to trusting childhood the truth regarding Santa Claus.

Undoubtedly, too, however completely we may accept this revelation of the truth about Moses, the memory of what we once accepted must linger with us in the indestructible fragrance of its romance. The bulrushes along the banks of the Nile are of almost impenetrable density and for this reason, when Ezra, the inspired priest of Israel, began during the Babylonian captivity the compilation of the folklore of his people which, with other matter, was to be merged in that which constitutes the Bible, he fixed upon the bulrushes of the Nile as an adequate presentment of the density of superstition and spiritual ignorance of the Egyptian people.

EARLY in youth, Moses had become established as a favorite at the court of Pharaoh, and when, as with every other Christ, the urge came within Him to begin His mission, He began quietly to spread the truth of a single God, in contradistinction to the several gods—Isis, Osiris, and the rest—worshipped by the Egyptians. Small attention was accorded to what He sought to promote until its rationality appealed to Aseyeh, the daughter of Pharaoh, and when she began to realize the unapproachable majesty and dignity and power of a single God ruling the entire universe of worlds, instead of a multiplicity of deities warring with one another over the manner in which affairs should be carried on, that was the time of her budding understanding of the Christhood—she found Moses (the Christ) in the density of the superstitions of her people.

The manner of the wider reception of His message is also presented in an allegory which possibly has constituted a greater test of the faith of religionists in the divinity of the station of Moses, as the Interlocutor of God, than any other recital in Holy Writ, namely, the murder in the market place. To one deeply considerate of unbroken consistency in the divine attitude, it must ever appear as impossible that a personage appointed to a divine station to reflect the attributes of the Most High should be a slayer of his brother man, and yet the record stands that this was the reason for the Egyptian monarch seeking Moses with the intent of destroying Him. To suggest any such procedure on the part of Pharaoh appears as an absurdity on the face of it.

The killing of one of the common people by a court favorite would mean little more to the monarch than might the killing of a dog and it therefore becomes imperative that search shall be had for a more rational excuse for His action. It is this—the sword employed by a messenger of divinity is His tongue and it was because of His incontrovertible argument supporting His teaching of the singleness of God, refuting every contention of the Egyptian priesthood, that they, foreseeing the loss of their influence over the populace through continuance of their appeal to prevailing superstitions, repaired to Pharaoh and informed him that the teaching of Moses was intended to destroy the religion of his forebears and also threatened the stability of his throne. Upon such a determination, it may be readily grasped, the monarch would lose no time in seeking out Moses for his destruction, because of which Moses made His flight to take refuge with Jethro in Midian.

The conversion of Aseyeh, realizing as she must have the bitter condemnation of her sire, must ever stand before all womankind as one of the most inspiring pictures of the beauty of an unfaltering faith, Pharaoh having her seized and imprisoned in a barred iron cage and submerged alive in the waters of the Nile.

The rescue of the children of Israel from the hosts of Pharaoh by the upraising of the walls of water across the Red Sea is also an allegorical presentment of their escape from the practice of Egyptian idolatries, into which many of them had fallen. Their awakened faith in the mission of Moses enabled them to throw back the waters of superstition and with shining faces march along the highway of clarified understanding toward the "Promised Land" of God.

II.

BECAUSE in this day, the compilation of records is a labor of ready accomplishment, possibly there is a measure of excuse for the many in assuming that when the Bible was prepared all of the data had been gathered and ready for final transcription. But this is farthest from the truth. There has never been any final determination as to the origin of the books of the Bible, nor the time of their compilation. It is known, however, to as great an extent as anything may be said to be known regarding the undertakings of a period ante-dating positive historical record, that when the Jews were detained in Babylon a cry was raised by some of them for their Book, although the major number of them were entirely ignorant of the fact that they had ever had such a thing. The labor of its compilation was laid upon Ezra, the priest.

Also, quarrel may be raised as to that stated herein regarding the assemblage of Jewish and tribal folklore, to be made part of a book which was to be considered divine in its origin. But it is this assemblage in precisely the manner of its compilation which is one of the convincing arguments for the validity of the Book,—that is, it registers a matchless panorama of the qualities we name divine, and in corresponding completeness those which we know as distinctly human. Thus is presented a picture of spiritual beauty upon the identical canvas where the Master Artist has caused to be limned every human emotion, every evil and vicious tendency, every degrading trait which finds root in the uninstructed soul, so that mankind shall have exposed for its guidance two directly opposing forms of attractions and be able therefrom to determine for itself that which it will adopt as the better suited for human advancement.

With the throwing off of the Egyptian yoke of superstition and their rise after less than half a millennium to the glory of the Solomonic sovereignty, the downfall of Israel began in their departure from the worship of the true God and their devotion to material things, so that they became subject to other powers and the fourth day of creation passed to its night. Then, out of their body, arose one of themselves—Jesus, the Christ. The reception accorded Him differed only in the manner of its application from that experienced by His predecessors. Our observation of Easter—the resurrection—is based also upon an allegorical presentment of something which never took place in fact. Its explication removes it from the category of things which must be taken on faith and places it entirely on the plane of rationality. When Jesus had undergone crucifixion, it threw His disciples into the deeps of despair and doubts. Up to the final moment they had believed that through His divine power He would rise superior to His enemies and flout them through a miraculous escape, convincing them of His divinity, but when He had failed in this they began in their despair to think that after all they had been worshipping only a man like themselves.

Sorrowfully, they lowered the still form from the Cross and bore it for burial to a cemetery, but they found the visitation of hate had not been dissipated at the Cross, and they were denied at every gate. Even with the owners of lots they met no more favoring reception and were in the uttermost of dejection when an old Jew came to them and consented to interment in a lot belonging to him. This was hailed by them as a special providence and giving to him all their small possession of coin they followed as he directed, only at last to find themselves looking aghast at the “Place of the Refuse” of Jerusalem. In the face of this horror they were overcome and sat and pondered long until at last, with hope died out, they scraped away the surface of the sickening mass and there, under the refuse of the city, they laid the body of their Lord. It was through three days thereafter they remained in the deeps of dejection until Mary of Magdala, who alone of them all had realized the Christ in Jesus, as they had not, because they had been holding His personality—His body—in their hearts, by her ministry brought them to an understanding of the Truth, and then it was that He was resurrected in them, and they saw Him in His Reality, and heard in their own awakened souls the voice of God, proclaiming “This is My beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased.”

Jesus, therefore, appears on the plane of divine purpose as the fifth creational Day.

FOLLOWING on the Revelation of Jesus, after six hundred years, the sixth Day dawned in the personage of Muhammad. He has been put before us as “a Manifestation apart,”—his placement in the unbroken continuity of guidance being likened to the Caspian Sea—isolated from the great oceans, but of their identical substance.

His appearance and the predestined period of His influence—His Day—are allegorized in the story of Hagar being driven with her infant into the wilderness. While the field of His missionary, initially, was one of isolation—in the arid reaches of the Arabian desert, an underlying purpose in it was the rescue of Christianity in the “dark ages” of Christian Europe, from its apparently hopeless spiritual degradation, the "Wars of the Crusades" constituting the channels through which was transmitted to deprived Christian Europe an inspiring grasp of the marvelous civilization of the East, being instructed in which, Europe was stirred from its spiritual lethargy and an awakened christendom was launched on its pathway to greater things.

The opposition which had attended the dawning of each new Day was not in any measure stilled in Muhammad's rise and as a measure of preservation he made the celebrated "night flight" from Mecca to Medina from which we have the dating of Muhammadan chronology. The prophesied term for the continuance of His teachings as a spiritual force as given in the story of Hagar ended on the day and the year (1844) when Ali Muhammad, the Báb, made declaration of His appointment to serve as the Announcer of the dawn of the new Day of God, and this "final day," pointed to in the prophetic utterances in all the sacred Books, and in which we are living, is the seventh day "in which God rested" with His work complete.

IDEALS OF PERSIAN ART

ALI KULI KHAN, N.D.

Mirza Khan is an authority on Persia and Persian general culture. In the past he has represented his country in various diplomatic capacities, most notably in the United States and Russia. He is at present in private business in this country, first having founded the Persian Art Center in New York, and later established Centers on the west coast.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON spoke of the Persians as a nation who, in the long course of their history have ever refined and civilized their conquerors. This is due to their ancient culture and to the original character of their art. The Moslem Arabs who conquered Persia in the seventh century and gave their religion to her people were, in time, conquered by the superior qualities of Persian culture. The same is true of the Mongol descendants of Genghis Kan who conquered Persia in the early thirteenth century.

Tamerlane and other mogul rulers of Persia, assisted by the learned statesmen and scholars of that country, introduced Chinese art into Persia, and later diffused a broader knowledge of Persian culture throughout the countries of the Near East, not forgetting the noble gifts of the Aryan civilization with which they enriched China. Thus, these two conquerors of Persia became the means of disseminating Persian art in all the countries from the Pacific to the Atlantic Ocean.

There are those who contend that Persia is not the originator of her arts, in that Assyria and ancient Egypt have made their contributions to Persian art. But this is true of all the nations and their arts.

Why is it that Persian art has had such a general appeal? Why has it endured despite the many vicissitudes experienced by the Persian nation? Why has Persian art influenced the arts of all the nations of the world?

A brief answer to these questions may here be of interest. The main reason is the universal conception of the Creator which the Persian artist has ever aimed to express in his handiwork. To him, the divine creator of the universe is the one father of one humanity, irrespective of race, region or religion, not a racial or parochial God, but the supreme invisible spirit of whom nature is the visible garment.

To portray this conception in lasting fashion, the Persian artist has had recourse to the two agencies of design and color. He early adopted the floral design with the cypress and the rose tree as its central pattern. The evergreen cypress symbolizes the eternal nature of God, while the fragrance of the rose suggested the fragrant qualities of the perfect man, or divine manifestation. The so-called "palm leaf" pattern is nothing but the cypress with its head bent in token of the reverence shown by created things toward the Creator.

Color is the eloquent tongue by which the various attributes of God are expressed throughout nature. One of the innumerable attributes is divine glory. This is symbolized by the phenomenon of the sun, whose color is yellow and gold. Another is the impregnable and unfathomable nature of God, which is expressed by the deep blue of the sea and the azure blue of the sky. Another is the virtue augmentative visible in the vegetable kingdom, which is green. Another is the heat of the love of God, which is symbolized by the element, fire, suggested by the various shades of red rose and crimson.

The Persian artist searched the realms of the vegetable world to discover the substances out of which these colors were drawn. But he neglected the perfecting of black, which is the symbol of evil, and against which he was warned by all Persian prophets from time immemorial. In sum, this sacred mission initiated the Persian artist into the arcana of the philosophy of color, which embodies the principle of eternal truth and furnishes the key to the enigma of divine nature. Hence, the greatest of all modern Persians, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, has said: "Art is worship."

"The sun emanates from itself and does not draw its light from other sources. The Divine Teachers have the innate Light; They have knowledge and understanding of all things in the universe, the rest of the world receives its light from Them, and Through Them the arts and sciences are revived in each age."

THE GLORY OF GOD

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

The following is the second part of Chapter 5 in the series of articles which the author has been contributing under the title, "The Basis of Bahá'í Belief." The third part of Chapter 5 will appear in the July number, and will conclude this noteworthy but brief presentation of the Bahá'í Message as related to Christianity.

THE Old Testament prophecies given in the previous chapter, represent a very small number of the references continuously made to the Manifestation of Bahá'u'lláh; but space will not permit a more exhaustive investigation. The major references of prophecy to the time and place of this great expectation and to the repatriation of the Jews, as already exhibited, were definitely fulfilled by Bahá'u'lláh. Now we must turn to the New Testament in order to see whether or not the repeated warnings¹ uttered by Jesus against the false prophets who would appear in his name, include Bahá'u'lláh.

It has already been noted that the New Testament gives the same date of fulfillment as the Old² so that we may now turn our attention to the definite statements made by Jesus as to the character of the "time of the end."

The most serious warning is against the "false Christs and false prophets who will rise and bring forward great signs and wonders, so as to mislead the very elect—if that were possible."³

In the course of this discussion the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh regarding miracles, has already been set forth. Although the miracles of Bahá'u'lláh and of 'Abdu'l-Baha are quite as clearly authenticated as any of the facts of their lives, Bahá'u'lláh makes it evident that miracles are convincing only to those who witness them; that they constitute no proof of the authority or reality of the Manifestations of God.³

Our teachings would put us in full accord with the attitude of Julian the Apostate when he scorns the Christians for offering no greater evidence of the God-like qualities of their Savior than that He had healed some blind and halt people in Palestine. However gratifying this was to the beneficiaries there would be millions in the world who would challenge or reject the authenticity of these stories. But no inquiring person can reject the historical fact that a simple Jewish peasant, facing the organized opposition of the rulers, despots, priests, authorities and society in which He appeared was able, in a few brief centuries, to overthrow the powerful and flourishing order of that brutal and materialistic era and to substitute for it his own teachings and commands.

In the Orient an event is recounted that clearly substantiates the attitude of Bahá'u'lláh. One of His followers approached Him with a manuscript containing an inclusive resumé of His apparently supernatural and inexplicable accomplishments. Bahá'u'lláh at once destroyed the manuscript on the basis, already explained, that miracles do not constitute proof of the might and the divine origin of this Peerless Personage. Therefore it is evident that the warnings which Jesus gives against the false prophets who will perform great signs and wonders, cannot possibly apply to Bahá'u'lláh, since He does not permit us to evoke as evidence this phase in His mission.

Continuing the account of the attitude and teachings of the false prophets¹ Jesus says further, "If they tell you here he is in the desert, do not go out." In other words, when that Spirit which was in Him, returns once more to dwell amongst men, He will not be remote and difficult to find, His teachings will not be removed from the ordinary struggles and problems that confront humanity. Nor will he be "In the secret chamber;" approachable only through occult and mysterious practices; but "like lightning that shoots from East to West so will be the arrival of the Son of Man."

Already we have referred to the meaning of the Aramaic phrase "Son of man"² as an idiomatic pronoun meaning I, he or, generically, a Man. Now lightning is confined to neither waste nor secret places but is equally evident to all observers, the young and the old, the ignorant and the learned; the rich and the poor, the white and the black, agree without any difference of opinion, as to what constitutes lightning:—one brilliant flash, illuminating all the dark wastes lying under the pall of night and after its cessation an apparent return of the darkness: but in the minds of those who have beheld the illumination, an ineffaceable picture of reality.

That the revelation of Bahá'u'lláh is universal, embracing the East and the West, has already been stressed. As 'Abdul-Bahá has expressed it "Under these teachings the Orient and the Occident will embrace like two long-parted lovers." But more literal than this has been the flash of His lightning. Bahá'u'lláh, from His prison cell in 'Ak-ká, under the shadow of Mount Carmel, memorialized all the monarchs and rulers of the world in the West as well as the East through His famous "Tablets to the Kings": Summoning them to disarmament and to the abrogation of war; to the establishment of peace and of justice; to the nurture of the poor and dispossessed. More convincing still was the actual journey undertaken by 'Abdul-Bahá, after sixty years as an exile and a prisoner, from the Orient to the Occident, penetrating to the very shores of the Pacific, during His memorable visit to America in 1912; which like spiritual lightning revealed the glory of unity, peace and good-will to East and West alike.

As to the darkening of the sun, the failure of the moon to yield her light, the dropping of the stars, and the rolling together of the Heavens as a scroll, Bahá'u'lláh in His fascinating treatise on the interpretation of prophecy, (recently translated by Shoghi Effendi, under the title, "The Book of Assurance") indicates the interpretation of these terms: "the sun" is the Manifestation or Founder of the past dispensation; "the moon" His laws and ordinances; "the stars," those who represent the administration of His principles; while the rolling together of the heavens represents the power which the command of the new Manifestation possesses to turn men's hearts from outmoded practices and perverted conceptions to the glorious light of the New Day.

"Then the sign of the Son of man will appear in Heaven and they will see the Son of man coming in the clouds, with great power and Glory." Zodiac, from its derivation indicates its meaning "A circle of Beasts." Astronomically there is but one man in the Zodiac, Aquarius, the Water Bearer. Due to the precession of the equinox the North Pole cuts a small circle in the direction of its inclination, about every twenty-seven thousand years, which means that the equator of the earth will cut the ecliptic in a different sign of the Zodiac about every twenty-three hundred years.

The earth progressed from the sign Pices to the sign Aquarius, astronomically, about the middle of the Nineteenth century, and at that time the "Man" came in the clouds of His Glory, for coincidentally Bahá'u'lláh was exiled to Baghdad and made the first declaration of His mission to a small group of trusted followers. Clouds cover the sun, they do not reveal but conceal it. Therefore, this prophecy clearly refers to the apparent limitations from which the Manifestation of God would suffer.

The fact that Bahá'u'lláh was imprisoned, exiled, subject to the vicissitudes of ordinary men, beclouded

His glory quite as much as the birth-place of Jesus, His failure literally to fulfill the prophecies and the manner of His birth, had previously beclouded His.

Jesus in the parable of the vineyard gives us to understand that the Owner, Who has sent His Beloved Son, will Himself come and requite the wicked servants for their treatment of His Son.¹

The New Testament indicates as clearly as the Old the coming of both the Father and the Son; Jesus states in the 16th Chapter of John His return to the Father, and the coming of the Spirit of Truth, not as an abstraction, but as a human being who will disclose that which he hears. "All that the Father has is mine, that is why I say, He will draw upon what is mine and disclose it to you."² An examination of the text shows the identification of the "Spirit of Truth" and the "Father."³

The first Chapter of John also gives this relationship of identity between the Father and the Son, while looking forward in Revelation to this Day, John sees the hundred and forty-four thousand standing on Mount Zion with the Lamb, "Bearing his name and the name of his Father written on their foreheads."⁴ "No one who disowns the Son can possess the Father."⁵ Furthermore John says that in the last hour (the end of the old dispensation) the Anti-Christ will appear.⁶ Many interpreters seem to imagine that the Anti-Christ will be a personality, who will attempt to undermine the Kingdom of the Christ, but John very early disabuses us of this idea

by telling us in the most definite terms that "every Spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God; and this is that Spirit of Anti-Christ." "Every Spirit that confesseth that Jesus is come in the flesh, is of God."

Even in that day, when Jesus was no more than a generation out of the world, men were beginning to hypothecate Him, to treat Him as an abstraction, as a Spirit, as one of the mythological Gods, not an incarnate man. John warns us that at the time of the end these beliefs will once more reappear, and to-day, we have the widespread conception that the second coming will be some sort of Spiritual experience, something that will descend into men's hearts, a transmutation that makes human experience the return of the Christ "And this is that spirit of Anti-Christ." The indefensible assumption, already analyzed, that man can reach to God without a mediator finds no evidence anywhere; no kingdom makes contact with another any where in creation except through a focal center.

Also this assumption that the Manifestation will not "come in the flesh" necessitates the illogicality of assuming in the parts of creation something that does not exist in the whole, i. e. personality.

It is scientifically and rationally impossible to advance any evidence of the part's possessing characteristics that do not originate in the whole. Since this question has already been exhaustively treated there is no need for repetition here.* Suffice it to say, that this spirit of Anti-Christ namely the belief that the Manifestation will not return in this era as He appeared previously—in a human personality—constitutes the belief of a large and increasing group of Christians.

The fulfillment of the prophecies of the Sacred book of Zoroaster, the Zend'avesta, and of the Qur'an are equally as startling and convincing as those quoted from the Old and New Testaments of the Hebrew and Christian faiths. It would encroach too far upon the limitations of this series to make more than this mere reference.

There are many to whom the interpretation of prophecy is entirely unconvincing; they argue that it is perfectly possible to manipulate such utterances to suit the exigencies of the case. Therefore, this argument constitutes only one of the evidences of the reality and station of Bahá'u'lláh.

LET THERE BE LIGHT

Reflections from the Twenty-third Annual Bahá'í Convention

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

NOW can one diffuse the fragrances from the twenty-third annual Bahá'í convention to one not present? Surely one would need a powerful pen to do this.

To separate the spirit of the convention from the atmosphere of the Temple is impossible. In the seven and a half months from the middle of September to the first of May the Temple had been erected.* Complete in outline and form, if not in detail, finish, and ornamentation, it stood ready to greet those coming from all parts of the United States and from Canada. Could anyone look at it for the first time without a sense of its meaning, without a spiritual uplift? It is a Temple of light. As one stands under the dome he is unconscious of the heavy ribs and pillars of steel and concrete, which are but a framework to hold the walls and dome of glass. For the Temple is designed not to shut out but to let in the pure white light. By day its beautiful dome and sides of glass seem to bring together and absorb the light of the sun from every direction. By night it will send out its beacon light for miles in every direction from its own illumination.

The delegates and believers had come from every direction to bring light and information to each other on important and pressing problems, and to get more light, more spiritual insight through consultation, meditation, and prayer, under the dome of light. The problems discussed and faced, although on subjects seemingly disconnected with the Temple yet in reality centered in it, ramified out from it and intricately connected themselves with it and with each other. The light of the Temple symbolized the light earnestly sought for the solution of these problems, the light of the Spirit of God.

The cry of even the learned and wise in this age is for more light to understand and untangle the intricate problems of this topsy-turvy world. So it seems inevitable that a Temple which represents universal religion and the renewed descent of the Holy Spirit should be a Temple of Light. As the pure white light stands, too, for unity, the union of all the prismatic colors, so the Temple stands for the unity of all religions and the oneness of mankind. Could anything more perfectly illustrate 'Abdu'l-Bahá's words: "The outward is the expression of the inward; the earth is the mirror of the Kingdom; the material world corresponds to the spiritual."

THIS TEMPLE and its accessories is known in Persian as the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, meaning the "Dawning-Place of the Praise of God." And so it was that on the first afternoon of the convention, the afternoon of May first, 1931, a group of two or three hundred Bahá'í believers stood on the large auditorium floor for the purpose of dedicating this universal Temple* to prayer and the praise of God. According to the instructions of Bahá'u'lláh, and emphasized by 'Abdu'l-Bahá and Shoghi Effendi, the services held in this auditorium are always to be simple, informal and confined to the Words of Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and the great prophets of the ages. The hearts overflowed with joy and gratitude as the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá were heard and the beginning of their fulfillment was sensed: "When the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is accomplished, when the lights are emanating therefrom, the righteous ones are presenting themselves therein, the prayers are performed with supplication toward the mysterious Kingdom (of heaven), the voice of glorification is raised to the Lord, the Supreme, then the believers shall rejoice, the hearts shall be dilated and overflow with the love of the All-living and Self-existent (God). The people shall hasten to worship in that heavenly Temple, the fragrances of God will be elevated, the divine teachings will be established in the hearts like the establishment of the Spirit in mankind; the people will then stand firm in the Cause of your Lord, the Merciful."

The exultant significance of the occasion seemed to urge those present to shout for joy even while they heeded the words: "The Lord is in His Holy Temple, let all the earth keep silent before Him." Then from out of this silence were heard in supplication further words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá beginning: "In the name of God, the Most High! Laud-ed and Glorified art Thou, Lord God Omnipotent! Thou before whose wisdom the wise falleth short and faileth—before Whose Light the enlightened is lost in darkness." The hearts responded also to the selection from the "Discourse of the Temple" including the words, "Glory be to Him who hath caused the signs to descend." Surely this material temple was one of the signs, erected by sacrificial gifts from loving Bahá'í believers in all corners of the world as well as Americans.

The simple service ended with the reading in English and chanting in Persian of the Tablet of Visitation made precious by its use at the sacred shrines of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Thus for the first time in history the praises of God dawned from a universal house of worship in America, this Temple where all religions blend into one religion, where all races are one race, where all creeds and prejudices are destined to vanish.

It is interesting to note in passing that nineteen years ago, also on May first, 'Abdu'l-Bahá dedicated the site for the Temple by laying a stone at the center of the grounds. Nine years ago, but on July ninth, the first service was held in the Temple's foundation hall.

In the evening of the same day as the dedication, opportunity was given to watch step by step the erection of the Temple when Mr. Shapiro* showed pictures taken every few days during its construction. At this time and Sunday morning when the privilege of seeing and hearing the engineers and contractors was granted, the uninitiated sensed a little what difficult construction and engineering problems had been overcome in erecting this absolutely unique structure and of the fine cooperation that had been exercised by all directing and participating in the work.

THE FEAST of the Ridván was beautifully restful after two days (three for many) of reports and concentrated discussion and consultation. It was held, as were all the sessions of the convention except the dedication, in the foundation hall of the Temple.

The words heard at the Feast in regard to guidance seemed peculiarly fitting and to link this consecrating service with the deliberating and consulting sessions of the convention. Shoghi Effendi in writing concerning the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár and the matter of guidance says: "Theirs (the willing worshippers in the Bahá'í Temple) will be the conviction that an all-loving and ever watchful Father who in the past, and at various times in the evolution of mankind, has sent forth His Prophets as the Bearers of His message and the Manifestations of His Light to mankind, cannot at this critical period of their civilization withhold from His children the Guidance which they sorely need amid the darkness which has beset them, and which neither the light of science nor that of human intellect and wisdom can succeed in dissipating."

The Temple then, symbolic as it is of light and guidance, is more than a place of worship. It is the "Dawning-Place of the Praise of God." Let the reader emphasize for a moment the first word, "Dawning-Place." The words of prayer and praise dawn in the Temple and are sincere only when they break forth into days of deeds. In the Bahá'í world worship and service must be indissolubly linked. "The people of Bahá must . . . manifest the Light of God in their deeds." This command of Bahá'u'lláh is urged again and again by Shoghi Effendi. He says, "It (worship) cannot afford lasting satisfaction and benefit to the worshipper himself, much less to humanity in general, unless and until translated and transfused into . . . dynamic and disinterested service to the cause of humanity."

If one listens to the deliberations, reports and consultations of the general sessions of the convention he finds abundant evidence of this service to the cause of humanity. The sympathetic listener is conscious of something new in the spirit in which experiences are shared, experiments are explained, advice sought and given; he senses a different method and purpose in electing, voting and administering. There are no nominations, there is no excitement, no demonstration. Voting time is preceded by prayer and silence. "We need group unity, no individual mind, just group mind," says one delegate. One of the essential qualities of the administration seems to be self-effacement, not personality. "Whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." "Success is in proportion to sacrifice" and "the measure of success is found in its effect on lives" are standards which we know are met by those who set them.

Two new features in connection with this twenty-third annual convention were the conference of Bahá'í youth and the teaching conference, both held on Thursday, the day preceding the opening of the conference proper. There seemed no room for doubt of there being life and activity in the group of Bahá'í youth gathered to face problems and seek advice. How irresistible seems the combination of youthful enthusiasm coupled with humility and sincere desire for light and guidance.

Most widely known of the teachers is Miss Martha Root with whom the readers of the Bahá'í Magazine are acquainted through her frequent contributions to it. For nine years she has been traveling throughout the world informing the "kings, rulers, chiefs, princes, learned men and mystics" that this is the time for world peace, for racial amity, for abandonment of all racial, national and religious prejudice, for the establishment of economic justice, for the realization of the oneness of all religions and of all mankind—that this is the foundation upon which Bahá'u'lláh has established His universal religion.

The inspiration that came from the getting together in exchange of experiences and ideas, in consultation, cooperation and planning of a group of such selfless, active and devoted souls could not fail to permeate the entire convention.

On Sunday afternoon two of these inspired teachers, Miss Root and Mr. Gregory, spoke at the public meeting to an overflowing house. Sunday evening the last session of the convention was held, the friends and delegates gave a lingering look at the dome of light and separated, filled with the consciousness of the truth of the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "the ages of darkness have passed away and the Century of Light has arrived."

"In this world we judge a cause or movement by its progress and development. Some movements appear, manifest a brief period of activity, then discontinue. Others show forth a greater measure of growth and strength, but before attaining mature development, weaken, disintegrate, and are lost in oblivion. Neither of these mentioned are progressive and permanent.

"There is still another kind of movement or cause which from a very small inconspicuous beginning, goes forward with sure and steady progress, gradually broadening and widening until it has assumed universal dimensions. The Bahá'í Movement is of this nature. . . . At the beginning the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh was almost unknown, but on account of being a divine movement it grew and developed with irresistible spiritual power until in this day wherever you travel East or West and in whatever country you journey you will meet Bahá'í Assemblies and institutions. This is an evidence that the Bahá'ís are spreading the blessings of unity and progressive development throughout the world under the direction of divine guidance and purpose."

SONGS OF THE SPIRIT

POSSIBILITY

VALERIA DE MUDE KELSEY

Suppose, after I died it would be like this:
 I'd find myself within a wondrous place,
 Quite freed of everything and facing Him,
 And He should smile and gently speak to me:
 "Well, child, did you succeed or fail on earth?"
 The while that glowing smile enfranchised me,
 And I beheld how all my life I had failed?
 The burning memory of constant fear
 Would make me cry: "How could I help but fail?
 The pain, the sorrow, all the endless woes
 Were heaped upon me till I groaned aloud.
 Now that I'm here the life on earth seems far—
 Had I known there this glory shining clear,
 I could have kept the pace with any man.
 But always it was pain, defeat and loss—
 I knew not this—else I had never failed!"
 He smiled and then I knew His strength had made More speech impossible. Sudden I swayed
 Into the depths of that divinest smile
 Dimly as from far worlds I heard Him say,
 "Dear child, you never left My Presence. All
 The while I sent your body forth to work
 Upon that pendulum of time, the earth,
 You dwelt here in the Kingdom of your Lord.
 But through that instrument of matchless skill
 Your register of consciousness was made,
 And I have heard your song—have heard your song!
 My child, my child, My love for you endures!"

CONCERNING TRUTH

WILLARD P. HATCH

"The source of all learning is the knowledge of God, exalted be His Glory, and this cannot be attained save through the knowledge of His Divine Manifestation."—Baba'u'llah.

How can a soul be truthful, if it knows not Truth:
 And, having known, within Its rays transmuted be,
 Until the baser metal of neglectful gloom
 Is gone, and happiness eternal takes its room?

"Oho," 'tis said, "and pray, what then, indeed, is Truth"

By which creation moves? Where find Its chemistry?
 And how attain the fluting of Its pleasing strain?"

The false doth meet decay, and, in the end, it finds Despair: then come and walk the Path of Life with pain,

If Truth shall top the cliffs whereto the Pathway winds!

The shining angels paused and prayed, the while they heard—

For Truth is God, effulgent in His holy Word.

THE GLORY OF HIS BEAUTY

BEATRICE E. WILLIAMS

I saw my Lord and Master,
 In a haze of golden light,
 His form of power and majesty,
 Was robed in dazzling white.

The flowers that bloomed around Him,
 Of every kind and hue,
 Were sending their perfume upward,
 While drenched in heavenly dew.

By the side of a pond where lilies grew,
 He paused and prayed awhile,
 And the very place seemed flooded,
 With the radiance of His smile.

The air itself seemed vibrant
 With a power undefined;
 As He prayed for peace triumphant,
 And unity of mankind.

He prayed for another garden,
 Where birds of knowledge soar,
 In the meadows of the souls of men,
 That their wisdom may be pure.

He prayed that knowledge, faith, and love,
 Into the heart of man be born;
 And the flowers of human kindness,
 Like a crown the head adorn.

That the Cause of God be nourished,
 And spread through all the land;
 Though sin and strife still flourished,
 With foes on every hand.

Then as I watched and waited,
 He vanished from my sight,
 But the Glory of His Beauty—
 It filled me with delight.

SPRING

KAUKAB H. A. MACCUTCHEON

In the great wild joy that thrills
 Through earth and plant and tree;
 In the awakening song of praise that fills
 All space from sea to sea;
 In throbbing pulse of quickening life
 As mighty heartbeat bursting cords of girth—
 We know that Spring's Creative Power is rife
 Among the atoms of the air and sea and earth.

“In these days there must needs be a mighty power of accord instilled into the nations . . . the activities which are trying to establish solidarity between the nations and infuse the spirit of universalism in the hearts of the children of men are like unto divine rays. . . .”

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

IN AMSTERDAM, Holland, is to be held during August, 1931, an “Industrial Relations Congress” to consider the causes and possible solutions of the present world-wide economic depression. In the first edition of the program, the call for the Congress states:

“Unemployment today is widespread throughout the world. Markets are restricted by lack of purchasing power. Yet productive capacity has been enhanced at an increasingly rapid rate by mechanization and the advance of technological invention. In a world of enlarged economic resources, employment is insecure and standards of living have not been raised or maintained in proportion to the increase in production. Maladjustment exists between economic capacity and buying power.

“In the present stage of economic life the task of achieving balance seems to demand international economic cooperation. Development of means of transport and communication is day by day establishing unity as the coming stage of economic evolution. The process is not yet complete. Some regions of the world remain largely self-sufficient. Others are more closely interdependent. But interdependence is rapidly taking the place of self-sufficiency. This constitutes the factual aspect of the subject.

“Nations and industries, however, are not fully conscious of this actual growth toward unity, and their policies are still largely shaped toward self-sufficiency as an objective, often to the detriment of human welfare, which can be assured only if economic and political policies are based upon the realities of economic development.”

INTERNATIONAL ideals in the realm of politics have been increasing rapidly since the beginning of the Twentieth Century, for this century, as 'Abdu'l-Bahá stated, “is the century of new and universal nationhood. Sciences have advanced, industries have progressed, politics have been reformed, liberty has been proclaimed, justice is awakening. This is the century of motion, divine stimulus and accomplishment; the century of human solidarity and altruistic service, the century of Universal Peace and the reality of the divine kingdom.”

The World War brought to all peoples an immense realization of the importance and necessity for the international viewpoint in politics, a necessity which had been rapidly growing since the marvelous inventions of the railroad, steamboat, telegraph, telephone, radio and the aeroplane have been bringing the nations of the world into such close contact with each other.

It was not until the present economic depression, however, that the necessity for an international point of view in the realm of economics was clearly perceived. Up to now economic activities and plans have been considered the individual privilege of each nation. Whether to have tariff or not; where one should trade; where get raw materials; where dispose of manufactured goods or agricultural products,— was a matter for each nation to decide as best it could according to its own apparent advantage. Whatever happened to other nations in this matter was felt to be no concern of the home nation.

IT HAS BEEN felt to be of no concern to one nation what happened to the industry, trade and general economic welfare of another country. But since the war this whole viewpoint has been amazingly changed. One of the first factors in that change was the realization that an economically prostrate Germany was a great obstacle to the economic recovery of Europe. Next came the loss of the Russian market through the establishment of Sovietism. Now has been added a depression which is nothing short of an economic cataclysm. It is this which has forced economists and statesmen of the world to realize that which happens in the economic field of other countries vitally concerns themselves. Now for the first time we have worldwide conferences on the economic problem, and an endeavor to act with some degree of unity upon this problem with an attempt at solution by some international agreement.

Already this country has been obliged to assume a tremendous amount of financial responsibility for European industry in order to maintain there a purchasing market for our goods. Some fifteen billion dollars have been invested by American citizens in European bonds and stocks in order that the industries of Europe could prosper sufficiently to buy our manufactured goods. Much of this investment has been undertaken at serious financial risk to the investor, but that risk is considered to be preferable to complete loss of export markets.

In order to secure markets in Russia for machinery and other industrial goods of this country, American firms have been willing to accept terms most onerous to them and containing very little assurance of complete cash payment.

A most extraordinary situation as regards international aid is the proposal made to Congress, and seriously considered by it, that this country loan China three hundred and fifty million dollars in silver in order to stimulate the economic life of China sufficiently to maintain a market for our goods. This plan may never become effective. But the mere fact that it could be considered at all seriously indicates how delicate is the economic relationship between countries, and how anxious one country may become over economic perturbations in another country.

Latest of all national problems which have become international in scope, is the threatened economic disintegration of Germany, and the attempts of the other Great Powers to arrive at some method of aiding Germany in order to avert worldwide catastrophe. The mere suggestion of a moratorium or postponement of Germany's reparation payments and of all international debt payments for one year, caused an upward trend in world markets. And it is clearly perceived by the Great Powers that this kindness to Germany is in reality kindness to themselves.

IT IS AN interesting fact that the world is being brought into this concept of close economic relationship not through theory but through the force of events themselves. Now we are beginning to realize that where one country suffers economically all the world will suffer to some degree; and when many countries suffer economically, the whole world is dragged down into a depression.

Mutuality is everywhere seen to be the secret of prosperous commercial relationship. It is so within any one country. It is so as between individuals. No person or group of people can continuously prosper at the expense of other people. True prosperity based upon lasting confidence is due to but one thing—the exchange of efficient services, of which money is merely a token.

Hence, the vital importance of such an international conference as the one to be held in Amsterdam. “The world’s experience today points to the conclusion that ‘economic integration must precede political cooperation.’ ” These leaders realize fully that the economic situation can be handled only from the international viewpoint. The meeting together of many minds representing the great countries of the world will start, let us hope, a careful investigation of this field and a willingness to view economics from a pure human standpoint which, we may be certain, will also be the most practical standpoint. It will eventually produce a sure and continuous prosperity for the world, and it is the only thing which can be relied upon to insure such prosperity.

“The spiritual brotherhood which is enkindled and established through the breaths of the Holy Spirit unites nations and removes the cause of warfare and strife. It transforms mankind into one great family and establishes the foundation of the oneness of humanity. . . . Until all nations and peoples become united by the bonds of the Holy Spirit in this real fraternity, until national and international prejudices are effaced in the reality of this spiritual brotherhood, true progress, prosperity and lasting happiness will not be attained by man. . . . The basic plank in any economic program must be that man shall love his neighbor.”

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE FUTURE RELIGION

HOWARD R. HURLBUT

This is the third installment in the series which describe the Bahá'í Movement as the fulfillment of prophecy and the solution of the world's present needs. The first and second chapters appeared in the May and June numbers respectively.

The author, in his previous articles, has developed the idea that the seven days of creation can be taken symbolically representing the seven great world religions as historically manifested. In this article he shows prophecy as referring to the coming of Bahá'u'lláh and the establishment of the Bahá'í Dispensation.

THERE is the creational story, and the Genesis account holds no other meaning. You perceive in all of this that it is not presented in whole or in part as having features of foundation for schools of religion, but that it is solely in explication of scriptural allegory. The establishment of the several schools of religion is something with which another prophecy of Isaiah has to do, and this is to be found in the first verse of the fourth chapter of his book. It reads as follows:

“And in that day, seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread and wear our own apparel, only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.”

Inasmuch as this applies directly to this time and to the Manifestation of Bahá'u'lláh, it is essential that it shall have explication. Whensoever, in scriptural prophecy the term ‘woman’ is employed, it is introduced to signify either ‘soul’ or ‘religion,’ which is the life of the soul. In this verse it takes on the latter meaning—religion. The term ‘man’ is used to identify the Perfect Man—the Manifestation of God—and, as we have previously explained, the term that day applies to this day in which we live—the end of the world.

Therefore, the prophecy, stripped of concealed meaning, is interpreted to read: “In this (our) day, seven religions shall present themselves before the Baha, and they shall say that it is their desire to continue in the teachings (bread) given to them by their particular prophet, and they will continue to be known by the name of their school of faith (apparel), only they ask to be admitted as a factor in His great temple of unity, in order that being so admitted as co-sharers in the belief of a single identity for all faiths they shall be called by His Name—Bahá'í, Glorious,—and in this way the reproach of having entertained differences will be taken from them.”

Has anything of this nature happened as yet, in order to validate the declaration of the prophet of thousands of years ago? Ask of those who, during the past twenty years, have made visits to Persia and the Holy Land. There, at a common board, they have witnessed the assemblage of adherents of every faith, each acknowledging the divine station of the Founder of every other faith. There they sit, count them—Brahman and Parsee, Buddhist and Confucian (of which Tao is the soul), Christian, Muhammadan and Jew—peoples of the oldest and the newest faiths, hitherto ever at loggerheads, now rubbing shoulders as brothers, and all acknowledging their faith in Bahá'u'lláh. In some of the Persian cities, nearly the total of the Jewish population, numbering thousands, is Bahá'í and, being such, recognize the divinity in Jesus, and have erected schools for Bahá'í instruction and temples in the name of Bahá'u'lláh as places of worship for the adherents of every faith.

As to all of this, it may be said (and not without reason)—that such application of prophecy as has been made is really only an interpretation of the utterances to which scholars of other faiths have attached an entirely different meaning. Therefore, it is necessary to present a more concrete argument which shall leave no loophole for differences of opinion, and as opportunities to this end are numerous, these will now be presented.

The meaning of the prophetic utterance by Isaiah regarding the "light of the sun" is unmistakable—Bahá'u'lláh discovering to mankind all the expositions of the Truth previously made. In reality, His light being sevenfold, "as the light of seven days," and as 'Abdu'l-Bahá was appointed as the Center of His Covenant and the Explainer of His Word, 'Abdu'l-Bahá stands as the "Moon" of this dispensation, shining with the fullness of the Light of the Sun itself."

II

DIVERSIFIED PROPHECIES

IN the mass of visionated utterance, it is difficult to know how best to begin. These references to the "final appearance" cannot well be placed in chronological sequence, for the reason that prophecy is not a matter of today or yesterday, but rather a kaleidoscopic vision of colorings of divine intent, wherethrough at intervals richly perceiving souls have been able to fix a time and place when and where these colorings shall merge into that of the shining luminary to be recognized by all men as the Light Divine. As the mission of Bahá'u'lláh is proclaimed as Divine, and all such in the past have had varied expressions of prophecy attached to them, the exalted personage, Bahá'u'lláh, is presented not only as One to whom numerous prophecies apply, but as the single and only one to which prophecies in all the books of religions can be made rationally to apply.

These attach not merely to the single personage—Bahá'u'lláh, but to that Holy Trinity of which He stood as the central and activating figure. There is none of the Christian mystery surrounding this Trinity, none of the Muhammadan mysticism, but three distinctly identified personalities expressing a single and unique individuality. One ignorant of prophetic meanings is as one ignorant of astronomy. Bahá'u'lláh was not only the fulfiller of prophecy, He was the Causer of the appearances of the prophets of the past to prepare the world for His coming by their advance announcements of it.

Practically all students of scriptural chronology are agreed on the meanings of certain terms employed to determine time when given prophetic pronouncement. Firstly, a day is recognized as a year: a "time" as 360 days: "times" as 720 days: "half a time" as 180 days. The Muhammadan calendar is based on lunar periods and 354 days constitute a year. With Christian peoples, a year is 365 days. Understanding this, it is easy to fix the dates to which prophecies have reference. It will be interesting to begin with Daniel's vision of that which the future was to expose. In the beginning of the seventh century A. D., when Jerusalem was conquered, the Holy of Holies (the Law of God) was outwardly preserved and when in those long centuries preceding this condition, the vision was given to Daniel, he gives us this—in the eighth chapter: "Then I heard one saint speaking and another said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?"

Then he answered (V. 14) "unto 2,300 days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed."

This dates from the issuance of the edict of Artaxerxes to rebuild Jerusalem—456 B. C. Deducting this date from 2,300 we have 1844.

Now, we will jump to the Revelation of St. John (ch. 11):

"The Holy City shall be trodden under foot forty and two months;" that is, the Gentiles shall govern Jerusalem during that time. This forty and two months is 1260 days, (or years), and is the duration of the cycle of the Qur'an. The Qur'anic cycle began with the night flight of Muhammad from Mecca to Medina, in 622 A. D., which followed by thirteen years the proclamation of His prophethood. To determine the date of the termination of the cycle, it is only necessary to multiply the 1260 years by 354 which totals 446,040 and divide by 365 which gives us 1222—1222 years according to our calendar.

Adding this to 622, the beginning of the cycle, we have 1844.

In Daniel, Ch. 12, verse 6, the prophet gives the period to elapse as "time, times and half a time," which as we have already pointed out figures 1,260.

Now, to go back to the Revelation of St. John—in the 11th chapter, verse 3, the entire verse:

"And I will give power to my two witnesses, and they shall prophesy a thousand, two hundred and three score days," by which you see the identical period. These "two witnesses" are Muhammad and Ali, his chief disciple, whose teachings were to be promoted during the stated period.

Again, in verse 9 of the same chapter, we read: "And nations shall see their dead bodies three days and a half:" $3\frac{1}{2}$ days are $3\frac{1}{2}$ years, or 42 months—again, 1,260.

The meaning of "their dead bodies" is that the spirituality of the Revelation becomes so beclouded in doctrines and faulty interpretations of Truth, that it is as a thing that is dead.

Verse 11 also carries the same reference, as it reads:

“After three days and a half the spirit of life from God entered into them.” That is, that at the conclusion of the predestined period, all clouds would be removed in the appearance of the Glorious Manifestation of God—Bahá'u'lláh.

Then, there is chapter 12, verse 6: “And the woman fled into the wilderness, where she hath a place prepared of God, that they should feed her there a thousand, two hundred and three-score days.” In scriptural symbology “woman” signifies religion, or soul. In this case, it refers to religion, and this prophecy goes back to Hagar, who was driven into the wilderness with her son Ishmael, from whom in direct line, after nearly two millenia, Muhammad was born. She is again injected into the picture in the 14th verse, which reads:

“And to the woman were given two wings of a great eagle that she might fly into the wilderness, into her place, where she is nourished for a time, times, and half a time from the face of the serpent.” Again, you perceive, we have the 1260.

In the consideration of prophetic utterances, it may be clarifying to the reader to be informed that the Bahá'is regard the expression “Lord of Hosts,” wheresoever it may be found in Holy Writ, as applying to Bahá'u'lláh, and none other.

The tri-une character of the Divine Appearance will now be given attention, as prophetic pronouncements regarding it are numerous and cannot possibly be rationally applied to any other than that which has come to us in this day. In the Book of Malachi, the 3rd chapter, first verse: “Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me: and the Lord, whom ye seek, shall suddenly come to his temple: even the messenger of the Covenant, whom ye delight in: Behold, he shall come, saith the Lord of Hosts.”

Herein, Bahá'u'lláh announces His own coming in the flesh: He mentions His advance herald, who was the Báb, and Whose sole purpose was to prepare mankind for the transcendent Appearance. That is the meaning of the Persian and Arabic word “Báb” which designates the station of the Herald—that of the Door to Divine attainment. It was through Him that mankind was to come to an understanding of, and a meeting with, “Him whom God would make manifest.”

You know that a tenet of Islam is that Muhammad was the “Seal of the Prophets.” That is, that all prophecy as to the oncoming of God and the establishment of His Kingdom ended with the declaration of the Arabian Prophet. And this is absolutely true, because after Him no voice spake of the promised Hour.

The Báb was in no sense a prophet: He was the very Door of Manifestation, and there were to be no long centuries of waiting for the Promised One. As Malachi declared: “The Lord shall suddenly come.” Then Bahá'u'lláh speaks of the Messenger of His Covenant (Who was 'Abdu'l-Bahá) saying: “Behold, he shall come!” In the Will and Testament of Bahá'u'lláh, the mantle of authority was bestowed upon 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and the designation of His station was “The Center of the Covenant.”

NANCY BOWDITCH

BETWEEN the sand dunes and the sea runs a road, wave-washed and uncertain, which leads from Haifa to the ancient city of Ákká in Palestine. Here Richard the Lion Hearted fought across the mighty ramparts, against whose sides the persistent onslaught of the sea still makes war. Near here Napoleon laid siege from an artificial hill, which he constructed in order to reach over the double walls of the city. There still remains the moat through which the strength of the sea used to be turned in times of war. It is outside of the walls of this town that "The Most Great Prison" stands, bleak and forbidding, and in this place Bahá'u'lláh and His family and followers were imprisoned. One can see the windows from which He gazed at the first pilgrims, who could only look at Him from a distance and be content to return many miles on foot with that precious memory. In a courtyard near the prison building is the long staircase up the outside of the house which leads to some rooms where the family were permitted to move later. Here came the first European visitors to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and it was here that "Some Answered Questions" were written. There is another house in Ákká where they were moved later, but this is a different story from the one I want to tell, for mine deals with the aftermath of those terrible and uncomfortable years, and it is with great comfort and joy that we can now turn toward Bahji.

After driving through the country outside of Ákká, and passing under an old arch of a Roman Aqueduct and through a forest of eucalyptus trees, we at last arrive at the place where Bahá'u'lláh spent His last and happiest days. On the left as we approach is a walled-in area with cypress peering over the top, and a cluster of old farm houses; on the right a lovely sweep of cultivated fields and a distant range of mountains. At this point the old mansion at Bahji looms into view. Indeed it comes suddenly like opening one's eyes on a ship at sea which one has not seen approaching. It is a big white house with an arched arcaded veranda around the second floor. All this is seen over the top of a high stone wall, vine covered at the base. Into this wall is set a small arch of plain white which frames the entrance door, a big green door, which seems to have been built to withstand any intrusion into this abode. But door and walls seem to cry "welcome" as the smiling Turkish Bahá'í servant swings open the gate and greets one with the "Greatest Name." Shoghi Effendi has so carefully renovated this old place that he has not erased the air of ancient mystery and romance. So much has stirred within these walls that will never be forgotten.

But now we are eager to enter. Leaving the lovely yard filled with lemon trees we pass through another green door with a knocker, which the servant unlocks for us. We enter and mount a long closed-in marble staircase to the second floor and turn to the right through a small hall. Passing through gold and blue draped damask curtains we enter the central room of the house. This is about twenty feet wide and thirty-one feet long. The ceiling is supported by eight white marble columns, and roofed with deep blue. Around the central point is a skylight letting in a soft light on the white marble floor and the elaborately stenciled walls. In the very center of the hall is a table which stands on a square of black and white marble with an inlaid design of simple pattern. The table is draped with a Persian cloth and on it rests a large vase of plumelike sprays of coral flowers, the favorite flower of Shoghi Effendi. There are, below that, small vases of flowers, and yet another set of roses of every hue floating in flat dishes—a fountain of flowers in a still room. There is an album placed among them all with pictures of the Baháí Temple near Chicago, showing its growth from the first to the latest picture.

As we look about we notice that the walls under the skylight and the walls above the columns are thickly stenciled with a design of small pink roses with green leaves on a white ground. All of the ceiling in the hall is blue, and the rest of the wall under the arcade is stenciled in broad perpendicular bands of designs in various dull shades of red and blue. A deep wainscoting of three broad stripes of blue, green, and red gives a strikingly Oriental look to the general effect, and sets off the beauty of the white marble. Under the arcade are hung, on one side, two old colored prints, one of Mecca and one of Medina. At one end is a large picture of the "Greatest Name," and at the other a view of the tomb of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Báb, showing the gardens and a view of the sea, with Ákká and Haifa. On the opposite wall there is a colored print of Jerusalem, and a painting, by Miss Marion Jack, of the view from the Mansion looking toward Ákká. There are ten doors leading off to various rooms, and one to a kitchen which is not used at present. These doors are dark brown with a panel of deep blue running crosswise about half-way, and each has a small brass knocker and a heavy lock. In the extreme left corner hangs a brown portier with a life-sized "Greatest Name" in gold, and behind this is the room in which Bahá'u'lláh used to stay, and where Professor Brown, one of the only two Europeans to do so, visited him in 1890. The account of that visit is framed and hangs outside the door. We read Prof. Brown's words:

"My conductor paused for a moment while I removed my shoes. Then with a quick movement of the hand he withdrew, and, as I passed, replaced the curtain; and I found myself in a large apartment, along the upper end of which ran a low divan, while on the side opposite to the door were placed two or three chairs. Though I dimly suspected whither I was going, and whom I was to behold (for no distinct intimation had been given me), a second or two elapsed ere, with a throb of wonder and awe, I became definitely conscious that the room was not untenanted. In the corner where the divan met the wall sat a wondrous and venerable figure, crowned with a felt head-dress of the kind called taj by dervishes (but of unusual height and make), round the base of which was wound a small white turban. The face of him on whom I gazed I can never forget, though I cannot describe it. Those piercing eyes seemed to read one's very soul; power and authority sat on that ample brow; while the deep lines on the forehead and face implied an age which the jet-black hair and beard flowing down in indistinguishable luxuriance almost to the waist seemed to belie. No need to ask in whose presence I stood, as I bowed myself before One who is the object of a devotion and love which kings might envy and emperors sigh for in vain.

"A mild dignified voice bade me be seated, and then continued: 'Praise be to God that thou has attained . . . Thou hast come to see a prisoner and an exile . . . We desire but the good of the world and the happiness of the nations; yet they deem us a stirrer-up of strife and sedition worthy of bondage and banishment . . . That all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers; that the bonds of affection and unity between the sons of men should be strengthened; that diversity of religion should cease, and differences of race be annulled—what harm is there in this? . . . Yet so it shall be; these fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away, and the Most Great Peace shall come . . . Do not you in Europe need this also? Is not this that which Christ foretold? Yet do we see your kings and rulers lavishing their treasures more freely on means of the destruction of the human race than on that which would conduce to the happiness of mankind . . . These strifes and this bloodshed and discord must cease, and all men be as one kindred and one family . . . Let not a man glory in this, that he loves his country; let him rather glory in this, that he loves his kind . . . ’

“Such, so far as I can recall them, were the words which, besides many others, I heard from Bahá. Let those who read them consider well with themselves whether such doctrines merit death and bonds, and whether the world is more likely to gain or lose by their diffusion.”

Porch of the Bahji Mansion.

But who can describe this room or this house where Bahá'u'lláh lived in exile, and from where mighty Tablets from His pen went forth to a world in need. We visited this room the last. The shoes, the bed of Him who lived there were set out for us to see. We stood just where Professor Brown was standing when he received this wonderful impression. But it is the whole house that speaks of those souls who lived under its roof. Some one said “people forget but places remember.” That is the feeling I had about the walls of Bahji. They have seen and remembered, and we can take from them if we will.

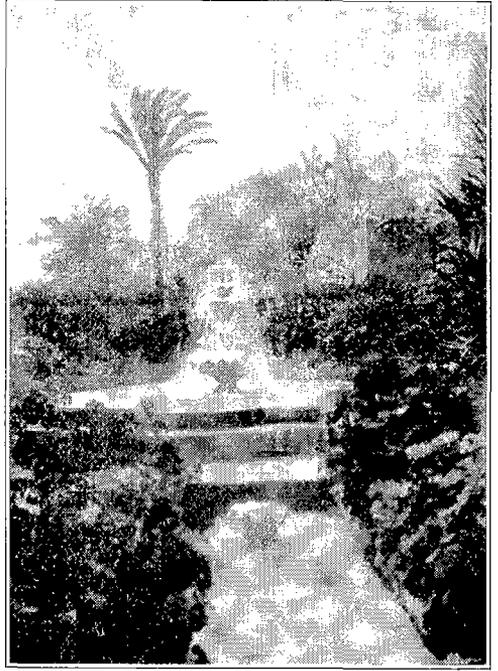

Shoghi Effendi has arranged a pleasant and convenient writing room for the friends. In it are two writing tables with every convenience, with the seal of the Mansion to stamp on the letter written there. Candles and flowers adorn the tables. A heavy straw matting cov-

Opposite the writing room is a sitting room. On the central table is a lovely framed picture of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and two beautifully bound books in morocco, one red and one green, gold embossed. One of these has recently been presented to Shoghi Effendi. It is the "Hidden Words" translated into Albanian by the first Albanian pilgrim, Refo Chapari, and the other is Shoghi Effendi's translation of the same. On the left is a filing case on whose shelves rest translations of the Bahá'í writings in thirty-nine languages, and nearby is a map of the United States with the different assemblies marked in red. The opposite wall has eight framed tablets of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and Bahá'u'lláh, and above these tablets is an old formal painting of the Mansion. Here also is another picture of the Temple, a rug with the Temple woven in it, a picture of the view from the Mansion looking towards the tomb of Bahá'u'lláh and Ákká, the matting and Oriental rugs, and many other things of interest to the pilgrims.

Now we pass through the central hall, through a large corner bedroom, around the walls of which are long seats covered with white linen commonly found in this house, and out to the big veranda. Here is a marble fountain with gold fish and gently splashing water. The window sashes are of green, the blinds and doors of blue, the floor of white marble, and beyond all this the vistas of landscape through the pillars and arches which support the roof. These are the lovely scenes at which Bahá'u'lláh and His family must have gazed so often. Through some of the arches a distant view of the city of Ákká is framed. In the foreground are grey-green olive groves, and in the middle distance stately rows of cypress, then the old farm house, and a grove of pine trees with rounded tops. To the left are more framed vistas of the rolling cultivated fields and distant mountains. Here, as we stand in the refreshing sun and breeze of spring, a camel caravan may pass slowly by reminding us that we are in Palestine, but otherwise it is hard to realize,—this place has such a feeling of freshness and freedom.

On the extreme right of the porch we have a lovely view of the enclosed garden adjoining the tomb of Bahá'u'lláh, and from there we can view the sea and the big trees under which 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to stroll. Here a white donkey is tethered as of old, but this one is a descendant of the one 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to ride. But now, before we leave this veranda, we notice painted at intervals on its clean white walls above doors and windows, all sorts of interesting designs in ancient mode, having been skillfully renovated under Shoghi Effendi's careful direction. The subjects are put on as one would paint a coat of arms above a door, giving the effect of concentrated masses of color from a distance.

We spent a night of perfect rest in one of the comfortable high-studded chambers. We arose early the next morning and the birds were singing in the garden below our window; a wind tossed the breakers on the shore which we could see in the distance. It was quiet in the big Mansion so we moved cautiously about, did some writing, and then found our way under the arcades of the lower porch into the garden. The clouds were racing overhead, letting the sun in and out. How lovely it would be to live at Bahji and paint the views from there. Ákká in the sunlight for one picture, with the sea beyond and Mt. Carmel in the distance, olive groves with cypress, and old houses peeping through the green.

Before leaving we visited the shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. We approached it through the closed garden, by gorgeous hedges of red geranium, over the red gravel paths to the white pebble path before the door that leads to the outer shrine. Here a lemon tree stood heavy with golden fruit, and a great cypress pointed heavenward. In the shrine the air was sweet with yellow jasmine that is thickly strewn on the threshold to the inner shrine. The outer room is a bower of green, reaching to the high skylighted ceiling, and the floor is completely covered with the finest silky Persian rugs, so fine that it seems wrong to tread them even without shoes. It is a place of indescribable sweetness and peace. But each pilgrim's heart knows best what sort of a place is the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh. I shall but say that next to this divine spot stands the old, old Mansion in which Bahá'u'lláh moved and lived, shut away from the world,—He who was for light and glory. The pilgrims of His following are greatly privileged in being permitted to go there and spend a night. We rejoiced to sit about the table where 'Abdu'l-Bahá used to receive the pilgrims in former days. We saw His simple little room just as He left it; and back of all these lovely experiences the painstaking hand of His grandson, Shoghi Effendi, in every room, among the books and relics and treasures saved, and so he it was whom we thanked in our hearts.

So at the end of the day, tired and happy, with our arms full of fragrant flowers, we returned along the tide-swept road, and home to Haifa and the Pilgrim House. We had slept at the Mansion of Bahá'u'lláh, and our hearts were full of the richness of this experience.

“O ye humankind! Verily ye are all the leaves of one tree; ye are all the fruits of one tree; ye are all one. Hence associate with each other in amity; love one another; abandon the prejudices of race; forget forever this gloomy darkness of ignorance, for the Century of Light, the Sun of Reality, hath appeared. Now is the time for affiliation and now is the period for unification. For six thousand years ye have been contending and warring. It is sufficient! Now is the time for unity. Ye should abandon selfish purposes, and know ye for a certainty that all mankind are the servants of one God and all are to be mutually bound.”—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

BAHÁ'Í PIONEERS

A Short Historical Survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

SIYYID MUSTAFA ROUMIE

In the first installment of this spiritual autobiography, Mr. Rounie told us of the work of the great teacher, Jamal Effendi, Persian apostle of the Bahá'í Cause who had proceeded to India by the command of Bahá'u'lláh - how he spread the Bahá'í teachings there; the author's own meeting when a youth with this great teacher and his keen desire to accompany him on his missionary tour of India. The second installment follows.

AT the time I succeeded in carrying out my desire to accompany Jamal Effendi on his missionary tour through India, he had with him two other Bahá'ís as his constant companions: they were Rafiuddin Khan of Hassanpur, and Haji Ramadhan of Rampur. After leaving Madras, our journey was broken for a couple of days at Gulburga where friends and officials from Hyderabad came to meet him. After a short trip to Bombay we set out for Rampur. On our way to the Cawnpore Railway Station Jamal Effendi met the very brother of the Ruler of Rampur State for whose sake he had undertaken this long journey. What happened was that the Rampur Chief, with the object of forming a closer acquaintance between Jamal Effendi and his brother, sent the latter to Cawnpore to meet him and travel with him up to Rampur State.

Jamal Effendi on this occasion stayed about a month and a half at Rampur, in the mansion of the Chief's brother, and availed himself of this opportunity to hold several public and private discourses on the ideals and ethical teachings of the Bahá'í religion. Within a few days the Chief's brother and those who were prompting him were silenced, their atheistic doctrines were thrown into the shade, and all their casuistry proved to have no real foundation. In this way Jamal Effendi incurred the displeasure of one Nazir Ahmad Hassan of Aligarh, a most zealous supporter of atheism, who wielded considerable influence over the Chief's brother and who, by some treacherous means, had cheated him out of more than thirty thousand rupees which resulted in much heated conversation and correspondence between the two. The Chief's brother was indignant at the conduct of this old atheist friend and had imprisoned him. From his prison he wrote to Jamal Effendi asking him to intercede for his release. Jamal Effendi did so and he was duly released, eventually having to leave the State. He swore vengeance against Jamal Effendi, although from him he had received nothing but kindness.

Jamal Effendi and I accompanied by a servant boy, left Rampur for Lucknow via Kashipur State and Moradabad. At Lucknow he met the Rajas of Amethi and Balarampur States, who accorded him a very cordial reception. Meanwhile the Raja of Kashipur also arrived and took him to meet and interview the Governor of United Provinces (India).

The Rajas gave us a letter of introduction to the Maharaja of Benares, the sacred city of the Hindus.

Jamal Effendi then proceeded to Benares and for a fortnight remained the guest of the Maharaja at his palace. During this short period he became acquainted with many leading citizens of Benares, Hindus as well as Muslims of all schools of thought. One of his acquaintances was Agha Mohammed Taqi Benarasi of Khurasan, at whose house he happened to meet Haji Ahmed Bindani, an influential and wealthy citizen of Rangoon; and several leading Persian Muslims of Calcutta.

At the very first interview the conversation gradually turned on the question of time regarding the appearance of Imam Mahdi, the Qa'im and the Raj-at-i Hussayni according to Shi'ih creed. A learned Shi'ih theologian who happened to be present in the assembly at the time, declared that no time had been specifically mentioned in regard to that, either in the Qur'án or in the sacred traditions of the revered Imams. Jamal Effendi then cited several passages from the holy Qur'án and the traditions of Imam Jafari Sadiq which pointed to the year 1260 A. H. (corresponding to 1844 A. D.)—as the time when one should look for the coming of the expected Mahdi who would be born like other human beings in accordance with the natural law of procreation. He refused the theory of the sudden and phenomenal appearance of a youth of one thousand years of age from the strange and unknown region of 'Jabulqa' and 'Jabulsa'.

Jamal further maintained that the Imam on his appearance would introduce a New Cause, a New Dispensation, a New Revealed Book, and a New Divine Law for the guidance of mankind. He also quoted numerous passages from the sacred traditions to the effect that the Imam would be subjected to all kinds of persecutions, humiliation and opposition, and eventually he and his followers would be martyred by men of his own race. It was an exceedingly interesting discussion which went on for a couple of days, at the conclusion of which the learned divine protested that although there was a good deal of force in Jamal Effendi's argument, were they justified in accepting it since there was no appearance of the Anti-Christ or Sufyani. Jamal Effendi then in his usual friendly manner said, "Let us jointly pray for the divine guidance and endeavor to grasp the true significance and right meaning of the Words of the Holy Book, which according to the saying of Imam Jafar Sadiq could be comprehended only by his chosen ones and faithful servants whose hearts are pure."

FROM BENARES we proceeded to Calcutta, visiting Patna on the way. We arrived at Patna at dusk and went directly to an Inn where we spent the night. Early next morning, information was received that the police had surrounded the Inn the previous night and had been checking the arrival and departure of the guests. Shortly thereafter some high European officials came directly to Jamal Effendi and informed him that the Chief Commis sioner desired to see him, and that he should accompany them. So we went with the officials to Danapur where the seat of government was at that time. On arriving at Danapur, we were ordered to wait in a room under police surveillance and remained there for four hours without knowing the cause of this sudden arrest. I suggested however that Nazir Ahmed Hassan, the atheist, who was offended with Jamal Effendi at Rampur, must have had something to do with this little surprise. My surmise proved to be quite correct for very soon a clerk came to Jamal Effendi with one of the letters which he had written to Nazir Ahmed Hassan, and began to question him about it. Finding that the reason of the arrest was some misunderstanding about this letter in the mind of the officials, I asked for permission to produce the letter of Nazir Ahmed Hassan to which that one was a reply. Upon receiving permission I promptly produced the letter in question, a reference to which at once cleared all doubts. We were immediately set free and all our effects were returned to us. Thus the attempt of an atheist to do mischief to the Cause was frustrated.

As this incident took place during the month of Moharram (Muhammadan New Year) the majority of the best citizens, like Nawab Mohammad, Nawab Welayat Ali Khan, and other illustrious persons, sympathetically, gathered together around Jamal Effendi and invited him to their homes, where he had opportunity to deliver the Bahá'í Message freely in those large meetings.

After a week or two we left for Calcutta. On arriving there the party went to live in a house in Kolutollah which had been engaged for us by Nawab Safdar Ali Khan, the paternal uncle of the Rampur Chief. Here, too, within a very short time the magnetic personality of Jamal Effendi and his exceedingly affable manners attracted many leading citizens of Calcutta and its neighborhood. He soon became a well known figure in the community, particularly among men of a religious and philosophic turn of mind. Jamal Effendi however, was always eagerly seeking an opportunity to deliver the Great Message of universal love and peace, the message of the wonderful revelation of God's mystery, the message of the advent of the New Age.

At last the opportunity presented itself when he met Haji Mirza Abdul Karim Shirazi, a renowned Persian merchant of Calcutta, at whose residence leading Muhammadans used to meet every day to discuss current topics. This was the time of the Russo-Turkish war of 1877, and so the main subjects discussed were the events of the war as they appeared in the newspaper reports. In the course of these discussions, Jamal Effendi, as often as possible, directed the attention of his audience to various prophecies in the Holy Qur'an and the Tradition of the Prophet, regarding the signs of the appearance of the Promised Redeemer.

His marvelous eloquence and his unique method of presenting the subject made a great impression on his audience.

About this time Jinabi Haji Mirza Mohammed Ali Afnan and his assistant Agha Mirza Abdul Hamid arrived from Honkong, China. They were enroute to Persia via Bombay. Jinabi Afnan was one of the maternal uncles of His Holiness the Báb. Both these gentlemen had business in China and came to see Haji Mirza Abdul Karim in this connection, and were his guests. They were known to Jamal Effendi, and they recognized each other at the meeting in Haji Mirza Abdul Karim's house. The unusual joy expressed by these friends on their sudden and unexpected meeting, the extraordinary warmth and affection manifested as they inquired about each other's welfare, astonished all who were present at the gathering. The people then began to suspect that Jamal Effendi was a member of the new sect.

On the following day the visitors came to see Jamal Effendi, and after a long conversation about the war and much discussion of various passages of the Holy Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh (Lawhi-Rais-the Tablet of the Chief) relating to prophecies concerning Turkey, Jamal Effendi requested me to chant the Tablet for his two honored guests. As it was the first time that he had heard these supreme utterances,—while I was chanting the Tablet—he was conscious of a sudden flash of Heavenly Light and was quite overwhelmed with an inexpressible divine illumination. He could not at the time fully realize the cause of the strange emotion that completely overpowered him. After the chanting of the Holy Tablet was over, the revered guests and Jamal Effendi discussed between themselves the fulfillment of Bahá'u'lláh's prophecies, His teachings for the upliftment of mankind, His noble ideals raising the standard of morality, and the majesty of His mission, all of which I listened to attentively as if spellbound. At the termination of the discussion, I confessed the truth of Bahá'u'lláh's claim and decided to dedicate my life to the service of the Divine Cause. The three veterans at once embraced me, and kissed me most affectionately. Jamal Effendi then in his supplication to the Sacred Threshold submitted my name, and a Holy Tablet was revealed in my behalf, the English translation of which is as follows:

“O Mustafa. (the chosen one or selected as the best one): The supplication of Jamal, who is soaring in the atmosphere of the love of his Lord, the Opulent and Exalted,—was submitted in the Holy Presence, and thy name was mentioned therein. We testify to thy truthfulness and sincerity, that thou mayst read it and be among the thankful ones. Say, ‘O God of the universe, who appeared with the Greatest Name! I beseech Thee by the essence of the existence in the name of those who were not prevented by the hosts from turning towards Thy Face, and those whom the Kings could not prevent from beholding towards Thy Horizon, to write for me with Thy Supreme Pen that which behooveth Thy Generosity. O possessor of the Names and the Creator of heaven! O my Lord! I hereby testify that which Thou hast already testified before the creation of heaven and earth, and I acknowledge that which Thy tongue has already declared before the manifestation of the Kingdoms of Thy Command and Creation. Verily Thou art He, there is no God but Thee. I supplicate Thee that thou mayst draw me in every condition near to Thy Horizon, and destine for me, O my God! that which is good in every world of Thy worlds. Verily, Thou art the Mighty, the Exalted, the High and the Great."

PROMOTED TO THE SUPREME KINGDOM

THE PASSING OF MISS ETHEL J. ROSENBERG AND MRS. CLAUDIA STUART COLES

"We cannot realize in this world the Bounty of God nor can we appreciate His Love. But in the next world we can do so The difference between this earthly kingdom and the heavenly kingdom is as the difference between the embryonic world and this world. After its ascension the spirit will enter into the presence of God in a form suited for eternity and for the Kingdom."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

MISS ROSENBERG

ONE of the pioneers of the Bahá'í Cause in the western world, Miss Ethel J. Rosenberg, passed away recently at her home in London, England, crowned with age and the service of the Master. The end was peaceful for this devoted servant of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, whom He knew and loved so well and to whose devotion and untiring labors He often paid priceless tribute by voice and pen.

Known and loved by all the members of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's family in Haifa where she had visited for months at a time in the earlier stages of the outpouring of the Bahá'í spirit from the East to Europe and America, Miss Rosenberg played no small part in the adaptation of the Bahá'í Message to the western mind. Ever modest and unassuming, the full value of her work in this capacity seldom appeared on the surface but those who knew her well and were in close touch with her activities were and are well aware of the great assistance she gave to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and how valuable was the help she rendered in the translation and transcribing of some of the outstanding works through which the truths of the Bahá'í Message were made known to the peoples of the western hemisphere.

No one is more fully cognizant of the worth of this servant's labors for the advancement of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh, as developed and expounded by 'Abdu'l-Bahá, than the Beloved Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, Shoghi Effendi, who, when tive expositions she was able, through contact with the Source of inspiration and the pure spirit that burned within her, to give to those who sought.

Miss Rosenberg, who was seventy-five years of age, was born in England and had lived for many years in London. She was one of the most prominent and active of the believers in Great Britain up to a short time before her removal to the higher plane.

During her long connection with the Bahá'í Cause her correspondence with 'Abdu'l-Bahá had been voluminous, and to her He had revealed numerous precious tablets, many of which, of a general nature, have been included in the Bahá'í writings.

Secretary, London Bahá'í Assembly.

he was advised of her passing, cabled forthwith to the friends in London a heartfelt message of condolence and appreciation.

“Deeply grieved passing England’s outstanding pioneer worker. Memory of her glorious service will never die. 'Abdu'l-Bahá’s family join in expressing heartfelt condolences to her brothers and relatives. Urge friends hold befitting memorial service.”

London Bahá'is held a fitting memorial meeting at the Bahá'í Centre for suitable expression of the love all the members of the Bahá'í Community felt for this long-time friend and counsellor. Here was voiced that reverent recognition due her for the clear vision she had of the Bahá'í Message and purposes, and the lucid and authorita-

MRS. COLES

WITH the passing of this great character, Mrs. Claudia Stuart Coles, the Bahá'í Cause has lost one of its most loyal and enthusiastic adherents.

Mrs. Coles was born in South Carolina about sixty-five years ago. When quite young she moved to Washington, D. C., and it was here she heard and accepted the Bahá'í Teachings, and served as a faithful and honored member of the Bahá'í community for many years. In 1920 she moved to London, England, where her daughter and granddaughters lived, and thus for the past eleven years she was a member of the London Bahá'í community. She had been reelected many times to the National Bahá'í Assembly of Mrs. Claudia Stuart Coles, Bahá'í teacher who recently died in London.

England, and as Secretary of this body served indefatigably.

Mrs. Coles' home in London was a meeting place for traveling Bahá'ís from other countries. It was always a joy to associate with and consult this radiant enthusiastic Bahá'í to whom friends could turn for help and advice. She undoubtedly worked far beyond her strength in her great enthusiasm, and one might well say that from the standpoint of her physical health, there was always in her work and service the element of sacrifice. Particularly noteworthy, too, was her great efficiency. She was undoubtedly one of the best informed Bahá'í teachers in the western world, and knew where to find any quotation asked for. She certainly has been instrumental in spreading the Bahá'í Message around the world, for her personal correspondence had assumed voluminous proportions.

As a Bahá'í, Mrs. Coles had an international reputation, and was distinguished and will be forever remembered for her true spirituality and her unique spiritual enthusiasm. She classified among the most sincere and devoted Bahá'ís, and we are told that "the rays of those spirits (the sincere) are the cause of the development of the people." From this beautiful soul "will appear the traces of God."

M. H.

"Humankind have come to the world in innumerable numbers, and passed away; their physical bodies and that which belonged to them passed away with them. Their health and disease both passed away. Their rest and hardship both vanished. Their wealth and poverty ended. Their honor and misery terminated. But the reality of man is immortal. The spirit of man is everlasting. It is the spirit to which importance is to be attached. The difference (between spirit and body) is this, that one will enter the realm of enlightenment, whereas the other will fall into the world of darkness."

THE GLORY OF GOD

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

The following is the third part of Chapter 5 in the series by the author under the general title "The Basis of Bahá'i Belief." This concludes a brief but most illuminating study of the Bahá'i Message as related to Christianity.

AS ALREADY outlined, when the Manifestation of God comes into the world, He brings with Him not only that quickening power which revivifies the dead spiritual life of man, but reveals as well, a social program which will better the earthy conditions under which he must live. One of the most convincing proofs of the Divine power of Bahá'u'lláh, is the plan which He has outlined for the amelioration of human conditions.

Amongst the principles laid down by Him for the guidance of men toward a better social order, are the reconciliation of religion with science and reason; the independent investigation of truth; the conquest of prejudice; universal peace; a universal tribunal of arbitration; universal education; a universal language; the equality between men and women; the solution of the economic problem; a democratic form of government. Space forbids a further enumeration, but the principles indicated are sufficient to show that the executive power of God's Word spoke through the Lips of Bahá'u'lláh; for although no concerted effort had been made previously to establish these ideas in the world, we find them developing with astonishing urgency as great human objectives after they had been enunciated by Bahá'u'lláh.

These are not new ideas, many of them have been in the world for thousands of years. Einstein has come with a new idea and we hear that there are only twelve people who can understand him. Bahá'u'lláh has voiced the age old wistful longings of man, until now despair-ed of as possible of human accomplish-ment; but becoming at last through the superlative potency of His command part of the great forward-looking plan of humanity. Certainly universal peace is not a new idea, Isaiah prophesies of that time when "the sword will be beaten into the ploughshare and the spear into the pruning hook, when nation will not lift up sword against nation, neither will they learn war any more." We must recall that these principles were laid down in the Orient around the middle of the last century. Though there had been those who had seen a vision of universal peace previous to this time it was not until after Bahá'u'lláh included this among His principles that the present almost universal agitation in favor of peace was started; today there are innumerable movements numbering millions of members working toward this end. Before Bahá'u'lláh's declaration that war must cease, as fundamental to the new order in the world, history had never witnessed anything comparable to our modern disarmament conferences. Thirty years after Bahá'u'lláh called for a universal tribunal, the Hague was established and later the World Court.

The sane and simple method of learning an auxiliary tongue in addition to one's own language would enable universal communication. No human being can speak as many as a hundred languages, (there are supposed to be three thousand dialects and languages in the world) but if a man could speak a hundred languages, there would still be millions upon millions of people with whom he could not converse: by this simple expedient of learning two languages the problem of human communication would be forever solved, without forfeiting the rich treasures of our literature and traditions. Fifteen years after Bahá'u'lláh recommended a universal language Doctor Zamenhoff invented Esperanto. There have been other efforts to introduce a universal tongue.

Today the widespread movement throughout the world toward literacy, education, and enlightenment, is antithetical to the condition when Bahá'u'lláh called for universal education. In that day monarchs and despots prided themselves upon keeping their populace in ignorance. This more urbane and advanced attitude was not taken until Bahá'u'lláh had included mental development in His scheme of human progress.

The Báb enunciated the equality between men and women in 1844. It was not until 1846 that the first suffrage meeting was held in America. More and more startling discoveries of our scientists are carrying matter back into the realm of metaphysics. The great names in this field of activity such as Eddington, Pupin, Milliken, and Lodge, are today advancing arguments to show that materialism is much too fantastic for science. Everywhere we see men throwing off the yoke of constraint, inhibition, and superstition, in order to follow truth wherever it may lead. These attitudes on the part of large numbers are much more recent than Bahá'u'lláh's proclamation of the reconciliation of science and religion, and the independent search for reality.

Ancient empires have crumbled, while democratic principles have been almost univesally incorporated into those that still stand. These changes took place quite fifty years after Bahá'u'lláh suggested democracy as the most appropriate form of government in the world.

A graduated income tax and profit-sharing were among the recommendations of Bahá'u'lláh as a means of solving the economic problem. These were not generally employed until many years after Bahá'u'lláh had formulated them into His program.

It is evident that to continue this form of argument would carry us far beyond the confines of this series of articles but from the examples already given we are constrained to accept the conclusion that the relation of Bahá'u'lláh to the changes that have taken place in social practice, are far beyond the realm of the coincidental. In science if we find the same effect recurring three or four times, we look for the law back of its recurrence. If Bahá'u'lláh had indicated only three or four of these great social principles which had afterward appeared so prominently in human thought and activity we might perhaps say that he had caught the spirit of the times, and was merely reflecting it; but it is utterly irrational to imagine that any human being not super humanly endowed could possibly grasp twelve or fifteen of the great trends of modern times not yet in practice (which appeared shortly afterward) without bearing to those events some form of interdependent and causative relationship. The candid and impartial inquirer, is bound to see the profound significance of Bahá'u'lláh's having enunciated His program in every instance before it was commonly practiced.

Ruhi Afnan said in his paper before the Congress of Living Religions that when we see the teachings and principles of this Revelation at last stepping down out of the cold empyrean of idealism and becoming part of the everyday working order of the world, we cannot but agree with 'Abdu'l-Bahá that "the pulse of this mighty message of Bahá'u'lláh is beating like an artery through the five continents of the world."

Another evidence of the station of Bahá'u'lláh was His stupendous and irresistible personality. In the "Bahá'i World" is summarized the convincing tributes of some of the world's greatest men to Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. His power was so gigantic that though the captive of two powerful despots, the Shah of Persia and the Sultan of Turkey, (who exercised over their subjects the right of life or death.) He arraigned them both in the Tablets already referred to, pointing out their crimes and injustices in a way that would have brought swift retribution to any other.

His magnanimity and superiority to His terrible sufferings were God-like and humbled even His worst enemies, to paraphrase the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

A history of His life shows that He invariably decided the terms on which He would live; as long as He accepted imprisonment, He remained a prisoner; as soon as He was ready to go free, He retired to the plains of 'Akká, there ending His days as He had begun them, in a Palace, which at will He had exchanged for His prison. When coming from Adrianople to the prison of 'Akká He defied the Sultan as to the terms on which He and His followers would go, and carried His point. Countless other examples can be given.

Most convincing of all is that indubitable power which Bahá'u'lláh has exercised over the lives of His followers. Upward of thirty thousand martyrs have joyously and willingly given their lives for the establishment of His Cause. Count de Gobineau, Lord Curzon, and other equally authoritative writers on Persia, point to this drama as indicative of the intense spiritual vitality of the Baha'i message.

'Abdu'l-Bahá says that these martyrs "hastened clad in holy ecstasy to the glorious field of martyrdom, and writ with their life blood upon the tablets of the world, the verses of God's Divine Unity." Men and women do not idly toss away their lives for base and ignoble purposes. These ecstatic souls, who drenched benighted and fanatical Persia in their blood, are the holy harbingers of that great power which is today sweeping like a mighty and majestic tide through the hearts and souls of those dedicated to this glorious command of Bahá'u'lláh to establish peace and unity throughout the world.

Nothing is more inspiring than this phase of our Bahá'í proof, this transforming, and revolutionizing power which Bahá'u'lláh exercises over the lives of His followers. We recall the prophecy in John that "He will send his angels with a loud trumpet-blast to summon his elect from the verge of heaven and the verge of earth." Like a great army of faith and strength His humble followers everywhere, without prestige, without importance, without means, often facing bitter opposition and sore trial, are going forth to vanquish the old, evil things of the world.

Daily into our ranks are flooding those who are seeking a complete and comprehensive program for human advancement. Today there are societies for a better understanding among races, for a solution of the problems between classes, for the improvement of international relations, for the reconciliation of religious differences; but the Bahá'í

Movement is the only great organized movement in the world which definitely includes them all.

We must bear in mind that our cause is not tentative, experimental; we are not going about suggesting to people that it might be well to try such a plan with the hope that it would work. To use our American colloquialism the Bahá'í movement is an "up and going concern" in which millions have already found sanctuary, exchanging their prejudices, distrust, arrogance and resentment for that abundant life of harmony and accord that has ever flown from the appearance of God among men, throughout the ages.

Words are futile to convey the impression of the reality and vigor, the grace and power, of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh.* We can only refer you to His multitudinous writings, so that "He, the spirit of Truth," through His Own Words and Teachings may "guide you into all Truth."

* It is regrettable that very few adequate translations of His writings are available. Worthier translations are projected.

HOW I BECAME A BAHÁ'Í

ANONYMOUS

The following account of a religious experience—the seeking for and finding of that which satisfies the soul—is written by a member of the Bahá'í Youth Group in an eastern city. It well demonstrates how the youth of today are on the highway of independent investigation of Truth.

MY religious training was received in a Christian church. When I was a very little girl, I was enrolled in the beginners' department of the Presbyterian Sunday School. My attendance there every Sunday was as much a matter of course as my attendance at the public school on the other days of the week. Some of my teachers were beautiful souls and unusually spiritual. When I grew older, I joined the Church and the Christian Endeavor Society. I then attended four services every Sunday; Sunday School and Church in the morning, Christian Endeavor and Church in the evening, and in addition sang in the choir. I even took a teachers' training course and then taught a class for a short time.

Trained in a knowledge of the Bible and Christianity, I believed, as all good orthodox Christians believe, that Christ was the only divine revelator and Christianity the only true religion. Buddha, Muhammad and the other prophets were all false, so their religions were untrue. The missionary books that I read more or less proved this to me. It almost seemed that the highest calling in life was to be a Christian missionary to the heathen in foreign lands. I was extremely religious by nature, so I liked books and articles on religious subjects. If I looked through a magazine, I would read the religious article and then throw the magazine aside.

This extensive reading broadened me considerably, for many articles written by people of different beliefs arrested my attention and not only interested but deeply impressed me. I began to realize that much of the Bible was written in symbolism.

To be an active member of the Christian Endeavor Society of the Presbyterian Church, one has to sign a pledge to read the Bible every day. Admitting to myself that I had not kept this pledge, my conscience troubled me. I therefore resolved to read the Bible through, and started with the New Testament, intending to read at least one verse every night before retiring. I found myself reading, instead of a few verses, several chapters. Somehow, to read from the Word of God when the house is quiet and one can truly concentrate, is more beneficial than all the sermons and training one receives from teachers. I felt Christ's power and greatness as I never had before and my love for Him was strengthened to a great degree. I read the New Testament through in a very short time, and then started on the Old, but my interest in it was not as great. Certain parts, like the Psalms, I loved, but some of the history and wars seemed very tiresome. When I meditated on the New Testament, I felt that I would like to understand some of the verses which apparently seemed contradictory, and I longed to understand "Revelations" and some of the symbolism. I was not satisfied. I was really seeking to understand the Bible.

MY FATHER had been a Bahá'í for several years and, without any knowledge of the teachings, the rest of the family had always opposed him. We thought it some peculiar cult, one of those many false religions. He tried to read to us and to get us to read from the teachings, but we thought that in order to be loyal to Christ, whom we truly loved, we should turn a deaf ear to everything he said upon the subject. Strange, how willing I was to read about New Thought and other sects, and how I resisted any suggestion to read the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

One memorable night, however, I was alone in the house. The town library was closed, and there was nothing about the house that I seemed especially to want to read. The bookcase was in my father's room. I went in and looked over the books.

Nothing looked interesting. With my usual instinct for choosing something religious, I picked up "Some Answered Questions" by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. My first thought was how much I would like some questions answered, but felt very skeptical about 'Abdu'l-Bahá's being able to answer them satisfactorily; just some more theorizing, and I could theorize about the meaning of the Bible just as well as anyone else and was just as apt to be correct in my theories. I opened the book and glanced over the chapter headings. My interest was aroused. The very subjects upon which I wanted more light were discussed. I started to read. I became amazed. I felt great power in the Words,—the same power that I felt when reading the Words of Christ. This teacher likewise spoke with authority. It was not like reading other books and articles on religion. I became thrilled. The same Voice which spoke through Christ was speaking through 'Abdu'l-Bahá. I was more and more aware of the power and authority with which He spoke. I did not put that marvelous book down until I had finished every word in it.

I not only read it but I drank in the meaning as one starved. I felt like a person who had stepped from a room dimly lighted by a candle, into a room flooded with electric light. Everything was clear. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's logic was perfect. He left no room for argument or difference of opinion.

To me the Bahá'í Revelation fulfilled the second coming of the Lord. It had not occurred to be sure, as I had imagined it would, and as the Christian world imagined it would, but "as a thief in the night" He had come and gone. The reason all of the Christians had not recognized Him when He came, was because they interpreted His coming literally, just as the Jews had done when Christ appeared, and so they, too, were prevented from recognizing Him as the promised Messiah. To interpret literally is to defy science and reason.

The spiritual meanings of the signs and symbols regarding the second coming are clearly explained in the Bahá'í teachings, and explained in such a way that they agree with science and reason. It would be beyond the scope of this article to explain them here.

How MUCH more reasonable it is to believe, as 'Abdu'l-Bahá teaches, that God has not only sent Christ to train just a part of the people of the world in the things of the spirit and has left the rest to grope in darkness all these years, but that He has also sent all of the other great prophets, Buddha, Muhammad and others. 'Abdu'l-Bahá says that each Prophet was sent by the one true God to teach the one true religion, but only in accordance with the capacity of the people to whom He appeared. Our capacity is much greater today, so Bahá'u'lláh has given us meat instead of milk, as was promised in the Bible. "Therefore be ye also ready: for in such an hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh. Who then is a faithful and wise servant, whom his lord hath made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season?"—Mat. 24:44, 45.

Since all the founders of the great religions of the world were sent by the one true God to teach the one true religion, man-made theology and forms which were introduced after the Prophets had left this world, were the causes of the differences in the beliefs of the peoples of the various religions. 'Abdu'l-Bahá shows in "Some Answered Questions" what Muhammad accomplished among those wild Arabian tribes, and one cannot help seeing that more than human power was needed for this resurrection of souls. The same thing is true of all the great spiritual teachers. Muhammad was only taken as an example. The symbolism of the Bible which no one had ever been able to understand, was explained so that it agreed with science and reason.

THE NEXT morning to the amazement of my family, I stated that I believed 'Abdu'l-Bahá was a Divine Messenger of God; that the second coming of the Lord was fulfilled in the person of Bahá'u'lláh. How sorry I was, thereafter, for my human prejudices as I so often read these Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

"Beware of prejudice! Light is good in whatsoever lamp it is burning. A rose is beautiful in whatsoever garden it may bloom. A star has the same radiance if it shines from the East or the West."

My father rejoiced exceedingly over my great spiritual happiness and suggested a course of reading for me. I read all of the Bahá'í books which we had, and then went up in the attic and read back numbers of The Bahá'í Magazine for hours at a time. When everything had been read and understood by both mind and heart to the extent of my capacity, I longed to interest others so that they, too, would read. Nothing has such power as the Word of God as spoken through His chosen Messenger. "God, and God alone has the power to do whatever He wills, and the greatest proof of a Manifestation of God is the creative power of His word—its effectiveness to change and transform all human affairs and to triumph over all human opposition. Through the word of the prophets, God announces His will, and the immediate or subsequent fulfillment of that Word is the clearest proof of the Prophet's claim and genuineness of His inspiration."*

Those who have read the Words of God—the Teachings for this New Day as spoken by Bahá'u'lláh, have laid aside their racial, religious and national prejudices. Colored and white, Jews, Christians, Muhammadans, and others, occidentals and orientals, are associating in perfect harmony.

In conclusion it is evident that I became a Bahá'í because I was not satisfied with the religious knowledge I possessed. I was seeking for Truth always, and the reading of this book made "the crooked things straight." The illuminating teachings I found therein swept the path which leadeth unto real life clear of "superstitious fancies;" I had found that which satisfied me, a religion to live for or to die for. And from that time I could truthfully state that I not only have mere faith about religion, but I know. And only the Word of God could have awakened me to the Divine Realities.

ORGANIC AND SOCIAL EVOLUTION

KOKICHI SUMI

The following is an address given by a young Japanese student, member of an English Speaking Society in Tokyo. Mr. Sumi is deeply interested in the Bahá'í Movement. After attending the Bahá'í Nawruz Feast on March 21st last, he wrote to Miss Agnes Alexander, our Contributing Editor, that he "appreciated this merry garden party very much indeed. That warm, bright, fair atmosphere I found on that day is the symbol of the ideal form of organic society, which is the nature of the sun. Through it and through it only all organic existence is conceivable as a reality, and that is the Bahá'í Spirit I guess . . . that beautiful sunlike spirit is indispensable to our human society: that penetrating spirit from heart to heart is the only rope to make man's society possible."

IAST summer I made a trip to the central part of the Island of Shikoku. The district I visited lies thirty miles from the nearest town and is three thousand feet above the level of the sea. It is divided into many smaller districts by ranges of high hills and mountains. I spent a week among the solitary houses and villages dotting the valleys and the hillsides.

My first interest was to study the folk-psychology of the region, but to my great disappointment, the social conditions were quite contrary to my expectation. Before I started on the trip I was told that the life of the people there was very primitive, and that one could hardly discover any modern cultural influences among them. With such information I fully expected to see wild men of little or no cultural training, little capacity for counting, little ability in abstract thinking, and speaking an entirely different language or dialect.

But what did I really find? On the day that I reached the very farthest point of the journey, and supposedly the farthest from the centers of civilization, I was overtaken by a storm. Seeking shelter, I entered a hut near the summit of a mountain. To my astonishment I found children reading the National Reader. At the entrance I saw little rubber shoes, and hanging on a nearby wall I observed a regulation school cap. Bicycles they know, motor cars, and even aeroplanes. And though they do not actually use it in their daily speech, they know quite well the same language Tokyo ladies and gentlemen speak so fluently.

Now what is the meaning of all this? It shows, it seems to me, the tremendous penetrating power of our culture, and the almost unbelievable capacity of a people to accommodate themselves rapidly to the demands of a changing social environment. Biological changes are very slow. It is said that our functional organs are almost identical with those of primitive man. And the capacity of modern men and women of backward races is almost the same as that of the more advanced races. The great differences are found, not in the field of biology, but in that of culture and civilization.

You may say that those primitive minded peoples are very mystical and superstitious. But I beg you to recall how many relics of superstition are still living amongst us. We do not eat dogs. We may be able to give many reasons for our refusal to do so. Perhaps it boils down to this, "it is not customary." If we are justified in saying that primitive peoples live by taboos, they can rejoin that dog-meat is taboo among us.

When we look back to ancient Egypt, ancient Greece, and ancient China, we must acknowledge that they could produce individuals equal in capacity to any modern man. Christianity has not produced a greater than Jesus or Paul. Plato's world of ideas is no less broad and deep than that of Bergson; and Kanpi's social observation is as keen as that of Karl Marx.

It is therefore not in the realm of individual capacity that the modern man exceeds the capacity of his more primitive prototype. It is rather in the realm of social evolution and interracial experience. Retaining practically the identical biological form of the man of milleniums ago, our civilizations have passed through various stages: tribal communistic, imperialistic, theological, feudal, aristocratic, democratic, socialistic and communistic. In passing through these stages we have increased our social inheritance and grown in wisdom acquired from this experience.

But it has been shown time and time again that it is not necessary to pass through all these stages to acquire the necessary wisdom for modern life. Just as the younger people of central Shikoku are able to enter into the problems of modern life quite successfully, though their parents represent a much more primitive type, so anywhere in the world the old customs and ideals of barbarous and semi-barbarous life can easily give place to those of our modern scientific age.

Now the chief characteristic of our modern civilization is that it is proceeding along the line of tested knowledge and experience. Instead of being guided entirely by the hit-and-miss methods of our pre-scientific age, we are learning to verify and test causes and results, and guide our conduct according to the results of our study. And it is entirely possible to teach this method of procedure to peoples who have heretofore been guided entirely by superstition and inherited traditions.

I wish to apply this principle to an institution among us which is undoubtedly a relic of barbarism, and has no place in the progress of a well-ordered international society. I refer to the institution of war.

War is the child of our tribal antagonism. It grew up in a world when there were no intertribal relations, and no international contacts. In those days the only way to gain an advantage or secure justice was by the sword. In that early age Might was Right, and the Beautiful and the Good were compelled to yield to the god of material power.

But it has come about that our international and interracial relations must be developed, for modern science has thrown the ends of the earth together, until we are all the members of one great neighborhood. So that war has become the enemy of social progress, the awful disturber of international good will and commerce.

But it may be said that changes must come slowly, and that it is impossible to give up war within one generation. But I beg you to recall my Shikoku experience. Within one generation the whole fabric of our social and political life has been changed. The feudal ideas of fifty years ago have given place to the international ideals of modern science, commerce and education. What has been done in these important fields of human achievement can and ought to be done in the case of war. If we had a mind to do it we could master this demon and throw him out in a single decade.

But what do we see? The fearful monster is taking advantage of all that our science has taught us. He squeezes our experience and prostitutes our tested knowledge, compelling us to act directly opposite to the demands of our reason. Our brain becomes his slave, and our inventions become the food for his voracious appetite! The powder which Nobel invented for the benefit of the coal and mining industry becomes the explosive for war's devastations. The gigantic Messenger of the Air invented by Zeppelin for peaceful international intercourse, becomes the frightful engine of the god of war.

Thus it is that war consumes its own offspring and destroys all the children of industry and peace. It is a menace to civilization which it is seeking to destroy. . . . But we can now choose whether we will yield to war or rise up and forever drive it from our human society. We can now choose whether we will follow our tested knowledge or whether we will be guided by the Demon of Destruction.

GREEN ACRE

I would stand on the knoll that overlooks
The radiant River of Light;
And lift my eyes to the distant hills,
From whence come strength and life!

I would walk through forest aisles, where pine Trees rise like cathedral spires;
And in the hush of early morning hours,
Feel the peace that God inspires.

Once again, I would enter the Inn,
The Inn that is glorified,
Because it had room and welcome for Him,
Our Lord, to enter and abide!

Green Acre, Green Acre,* home of my soul,
My heart ever turns to thee;
The beautiful spot where the Master walked,
And hallowed the earth for me!

WHAT IS THE ONENESS OF HUMANITY?

THE greatest prize this world holds is the consummation of the Oneness of Humanity. All are the children of God. God is the Creator, the Provider, the Protector of all. He educates all of us, and is compassionate towards men. His grace encompasses all mankind. The sun of God shines upon all mankind. The rain of God falls for all. The gentle breeze of God wafts for all. Humanity at large is sitting around the Divine Table of the Almighty. Why should we engage in strife? Why should we ever engage on the battlefield to kill each other? God is kind, is He not? Why should we be unkind? What is the reason? How are we benefited by being unkind? Today the chief means of dissension amongst the nations is religion, while in reality the religion of God is one. Differences lie in blind imitations which have crept into religion after its foundation.

“Religion is Reality, and reality is one. It does not permit of multiplicity. His Holiness Abraham was the Herald of Reality. His Holiness Moses was the Spreader of Reality. His Holiness Jesus was the Founder of Reality. His Holiness Muhammad was the Spreader and Promulgator of Reality. The Reality of religion is one. Fundamentally there is no difference.

“The Reality of religion consists in the love of God, in the faith of God, in the virtue of humanity, and in the means of communication between the hearts of men.

“The Reality of religion is the oneness of the whole of humanity.”

"For in this age the boundaries of terrestrial things have extended; minds have taken on a broader range of vision; realities have been unfolded and the secrets of being have been brought into the realm of possibility. What is the spirit of this age? What is its focal point? It is the establishment of universal peace, the establishment of the knowledge that humanity is one family."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

WHAT IS THE WORLD? This term, which is so widely used, I doubt if anybody understands. Just what do we mean by "the world"? When the inner earth first began to stir to life in obedience to the solar impulse, at that time the world was just a geographic, planetary object. Certainly this is not what we mean today when we say "the world," a concept not at all synonymous with "the earth."

Life sprang up upon the earth and grew and grew until it reached its climax, man. Human beings living upon the earth in widely scattered groups, not yet masters of their planet—here is a more advanced planet than the inert earth we first looked at. Yet this is not what we mean today when we say "the world."

Communications grew. Caravan trails and sea ways brought distant peoples together. Warfare and conquest consolidated tribes and peoples. Great empires evolved. Each empire became in time a cultural unit. Rome, mistress of land and sea, unifier of nations, builder of a great Mediterranean civilization,—now for the first time we have the term "world" meaning something definite in human society. Rome—that is the world, or so it seemed to the Romans. And so it seems to us today as we look back on that vast ancient culture which the Romans, after absorbing and assimilating, gave forth to all of Europe.

At the time Rome did not know that across the barrier of deserts and mountain ranges was another world all its own—the Celestial Empire. Here too a great unifying force had been at work for centuries—milleniums perhaps. Here had grown up an indigenous civilization so self-contained, so perfect, that to the Chinese it seemed that the whole world was contained within the Four Seas.

And neither the Romans, nor the Chinese realized that there existed across great stretches of ocean waste another world living its own life, creating its own civilization, passing thru phases of growth and disruption so little known that when later Europeans discovered its existence they called it the "New World" altho it is perhaps the oldest part of the land surface of the planet.

UP TO THIS point, then, there was not one world upon this planet, but many worlds of human society. Today, however, intercommunication —physical, intellectual, spiritual between the continents and peoples has grown so rapidly toward a psychic unity that now for the first time, when we say “the world” we mean a human society composed of all the educated, intelligent people of the planet.

We say “the world thinks this,” “the world thinks that,” “the world is progressing,” “the world is in economic distress,” and now for the first time we mean by such statements to include all civilized peoples of the planet, the vast majority of mankind.

But even when we use the term world to mean all the peoples of the world, we are using it loosely if we mean to intend a unity effective and real. Such has not yet been achieved upon this planet.

The nations of the world are still far too much divided between themselves by barriers of prejudice, of greed, of misunderstanding, of commercial competition, to make it possible to use the term “world” to mean humanity. There are still many spheres of selfish interest, so to speak, which compose the planetary life.

IN SPITE of this fact, there is growing before the sight of us all a super-structure of actual world unity, a universal culture and a universal consciousness. This universal consciousness is struggling with the provincial, national consciousnesses and is destined before the century is out to absorb and supersede all those more provincial units of society that make up humanity today. All men of intelligence and power of direction in human affairs, are now beginning to realize that if the national consciousnesses should continue to prevail to the sacrifice of the universal consciousness, humanity would soon extinguish its flame of life in a delirium of war. Therefore the intent and purpose of all leadership today is directed to the end of universal peace, of universal culture, of universal brotherhood upon this planet.

IF WE look ahead then a few decades, a few centuries, we can conceive that the term “world” will be synonymous with all humanity, that it will imply a human society which is homogeneous, coherent, unified—not only culturally but psychically and spiritually. Then when we say “the world thinks this”—“the world thinks that”—it will actually be true that all humanity is moving as by one impulse and one aim.

Life would be miraculous in such a dispensation. For if the unity of many small nations into one great empire such as Rome was able to build so mightily for civilization, what will be the result of the psychic unity of all races and peoples upon the planet?

The creative force and effectiveness of humanity will be multiplied, not in arithmetic but in geometric ratio, by the coalescence of all the various minds and temperaments of the world into one strong, coherent force—into one vast psychic unity of culture.

Then we may conceive of the world as having but one soul. The world will be synonymous with planetary life as a whole. It will be a unitary being, multitudinous in its component parts but one in its spirit and directive force and energy.

THIS IS the golden age, perhaps, of which the poets have dreamed and philosophers philosophied. The golden age of man in his full maturity as the son of God. The planet achieves its final destiny.

What other planets and worlds are achieving, we do not know. Certainly life is evolving elsewhere throughout the universe. Quite probably it is evolving in various planets of our own solar system—evolving in ways unique to each planet. Some day it may be our earthly destiny to merge into a still greater unity—that of the solar system. The time may indeed come when other planets will join hands with this planet in ways of communication not yet possible to foresee, each planetary society expressing through its own genius the destiny established for it by the Lord of creation, the whole planetary system vibrating to the creative evolving power of the Holy Spirit, the Logos, the Lord of all Being.

But here is a transcendent destiny that is beyond human comprehension. Let us come back to mother earth. It is enough for the present that we strive to make that earth a world.

“ . . . This limitless universe is like the human body all the members of which are connected and linked with one another with the greatest strength. How much the organs, the members, and the parts of the body of man are intermingled and connected for mutual aid and help, and how much they influence one another! In the same way the parts of this infinite universe have their members and elements connected with one another and influence one another spiritually and materially . . . Since this connection, this spiritual effect and this influence exists between the members of the body of man, who is only one of many finite beings, certainly between these universal and infinite beings there will also be a spiritual and material connection. Although by existing rules and actual science these connections cannot be discovered, nevertheless their existence between all beings is certain and absolute.”

“As to your question regarding the stars: Know that these brilliant stars are numberless and their existence is not devoid of wisdom both useful and important. Rather they are worlds, as is this world of ours. But they differ in their bodies, by the difference of elements, from this earthly body. They differ in formation. The beings existent upon these bodies are according to their formation.”

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE FUTURE RELIGION

HOWARD R. HURLBUT

Chapter IV

The author, in previous chapters published in the May, June and July numbers of this magazine, has developed the idea that the seven days of creation can be taken symbolically representing the seven great world religions as historically manifested, and in the last article particularly showing prophecy as referring to the coming of Bahá'u'lláh and the establishment of the Bahá'í Dispensation. In this article he continues his presentation of these prophecies.

SO much for the Bible prophecy. Now, to turn to the Book of Zoroaster: In the Ninth Vanant Yasht of the Zend-Avesta, there is an even more direct reference. While the time of the rise of Zoroaster is not of great importance, it may be of interest to note that there are wide variants of fixation by different students of chronology. None has fixed the time later than 1500 B. C.: More assign it to 2000 B. C. and a very great many relegate it to the rise of the first pyramid dating back four to five millenia before the dawn of the Christian era.

What is important, however, is that the Light of Divine Truth shone so clearly through Zoroaster that He was enabled to inspire the prophets who came after Him to point more clearly than those of any other time to the Appearance in the day and age in which we live. Of this, which was designated as "The Mighty Glory"—which is a free translation of the meaning of the Name "Bahá'u'lláh"—the prophet wrote: "This Splendor attaches itself to the hero (who is to arise out of the number) of prophets (called 'Saoshyanto') and to his companions, in order to make life everlasting, undecaying, imputrescible, incorruptible, for-ever existing, full of power (at the time) when the dead shall rise again, and the imperishableness of life shall commence, making life lasting by itself." (That is, by its inherent qualities).

"They will be commissioned to check the influence of the devil which increases at the time when the world is verging toward the end, by restoring truth and faith in religion. The dark period of wretchedness and sin in which they appear is compared to night, and the era of bliss they endeavor to bring about is likened to brilliant day. The first of these prophets is called 'Hushedar-Mah,'—the 'moon of Happy Rule.'" Surely, no more apt definition of the soft radiance of illuminating love of the Báb than this could be found. He was empty of every desire for individual recognition, and all of His song was of that One, immeasurably greater than Himself, "Whom God should make manifest."

"The second is 'Hushedar-Bami,'—the Aurora of Happy Rule."

How richly the glory of the Appearance of Bahá'u'lláh is pictured! The incomparable radiance of the effulgent glory of Light of God burst forth from this Center, Who was Light and the Source of Light, and illumined with its encompassing rays the remote areas of the realms of humanity, announcing in terms of dominant authority the establishment of the Day of God.

"And the third, and greatest, is called 'Sosyosh.' He brings a new Nask of the Zend-Avesta, hitherto unknown, and reveals it to man." This third One is 'Abdu'l-Bahá. It is not for any human to determine the relative greatness of the Manifestations of God.

That understanding is something entirely apart from any intellectual accomplishment, and we may assume that the prophet, looking through the vistas of the oncoming millenia, might well have considered this Appearance in its relation to closeness of communication with the people of this time, just as though we might, to make the argument clear, consider ourselves as the soil upon which the sower casts the seed. By reason of this intimate association of seed-sowing, we might come to consider the near one greater than the great provider of the seed in the granary from whose bounty all things must come. Our understanding could in no wise affect the true condition.

The "New Nask" which 'Abdu'l-Bahá did bring and which has hitherto been entirely unknown, is the chapter of selfless service universally rendered, which He read into the heart of humanity through living it in his long life of persecution, exile and imprisonment, as it has never been lived before in the history of the human race. When Zoroaster was asked whence God would come to establish His Kingdom in the earth, He answered "From the Land of Nur." Bahá'u'lláh was a descendant of the royal house of Persia and was therefore a prince. His estate was the Principality of Nur, which lies midway between the Persian capital, Tihrán, and the southern arm of the Caspian Sea. His title was Hosein Ali, Prince of Nur. The meaning of the word "Nur" is Light, and as the Bahá came as the great Revealer of Light, the declaration of Zoroaster carries a double significance.

Again, in the Pitakas of Buddha. If you are familiar with Buddhist literature, you must have formed a deep affection for Ananda the old servitor of the Buddha, who was the closest and most beloved of all the bikshus who followed in the footsteps of the Master. And when, in those last sad hours, the old servitor looked upon the emaciated form of his Lord and was troubled over what lay in store for those of the Faith, he asked "What shall we do, Master, when thou art gone?" And Buddha, looking upon his anxious face with a smile of infinite compassion, answered: "One will come after me who will be possessed of the fullness of all Truth, to point the way to salvation." Troubled, Ananda queried: "But how shall we know him, Beloved, when he comes?" And Buddha answered: "He will be known as 'Maitreyeh,' " which means kindness.

In the early youth of Hosein Ali, by the passing of his father, the responsibility of all the affairs of his great estate fell upon his shoulders. Repeatedly, he had been urged by public officials to take the place in governmental affairs to which his princely rank entitled him, but he had ever turned a deaf ear.

Now, these importunities became more insistent, but he held aloof and as time went on he gave from his wealth so freely to the poor and deprived ones that the officials looked on aghast and cried: "This youth needs a guardian, else he will dissipate all of his rich patrimony!" He was the personification of kindness in his every act of life.

In the writings of the idolatrous religion of Baal, which was founded on the pure Truth revealed by Enoch, there appear references to the "Last Days" which are repeated in the books of the Israelitish prophets, in the Gospel, and in the Qur'án of Muhammad.

It is of these that Bahá'u'lláh in His wonderful Book—the Iqán—devotes fully sixty pages to clear elucidation. The reading is in effect that in the last days the sun shall be darkened and the moon ashamed, the stars fall, etc. You will note mention of Enoch and recall that from the Bible narrative we have small understanding of him, his disappearance being recorded as "Enoch walked with God and was not." Yet, one of the strangest of the prophecies regarding the appearance of the Manifestation in the last day, is in connection with the Book of Enoch.

In 1892, Professor Charles, of Oxford University, chanced to read an obscure item in a German publication to the effect that an original Book of Enoch had been discovered in Russia. He had at no time heard mention of a Slavonic Book of Enoch and concluded that it was merely a translation of the Ethiopian Book of Enoch, but being a true student, he had an emissary go to Russia to trace the rumor, and much to his delight discovered an original pseud-epigraph which had been known to the inner circle in Russia for twelve hundred years, but was not a matter of general public knowledge. In this Book, Enoch described his journey to the "Seventh Heaven," under direction of an appointed guide and at last fell prostrate as there reached him a Voice from the unapproachable Presence, concealed behind His "seventy thousand veils of light." He gave the Book to his sons, saying that it would be sealed and guarded by two angels until the "time of the end, when the Great Michael shall stand up."

In scriptural parlance, the term "Michael" means one who is near or like unto God. This describes the station of the Manifestation of God which was Bahá'u'lláh, Who "stood up," or ascended in 1892, the precise year in which the Book was brought to light. In this Book of Enoch, there is written (Chapter 40, verses 3, 4 and 9): "The holy great one will come from his dwelling.

"And the eternal God will tread upon the earth (even) on Mount Sinai:

“And behold He cometh with ten thousands of His holy ones.”

You perceive the identical mandate as to the “sealing” of the Book As His Books were sealed by the Almighty God, none but He could have the power to unlock the seals, and when the time was to arrive for their revealment the ability to unlock would be one of the convincing proofs of the divine authority of the Messenger.

Bahá'u'lláh, in our time, has unlocked the doors of the chamber of mystery in the Word of God. The whole trouble in the world today and in the past has lain in the egotistic assumption that intellectual capacity enables one to read the meaning of the Word, whereas it is pureness of heart. Because of this attitude, the great diversity of sects and creeds has been evolved in all the schools of religion. The “Seventh Heaven,” to which reference is made in the flight of Enoch, and which corresponds to a like adventure recounted of Muhammad in the traditions of Islam, means his attainment to a complete knowledge of the seven great religions, the term “heaven” meaning religion, so that in his prevision he was given understanding of the culmination of the divine plan.

The place of the Appearance is also given by the prophets of Israel. In Jeremiah, the 49th chapter, 38th verse: “And I will set my throne in Elam (Persia) and will destroy from thence the kings and princes, saith the Lord.”

As you have been informed, the fortressed prison-city of 'Akká (or Achor), on the nose of Mount Carmel, the Zion of God, was selected as the place of imprisonment for Bahá'u'lláh and His followers. This, too, is in fulfilment of prophecy. In Hosea, chapter 2, verse 15, we read: “And I will give her her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor for a door of hope.” Also, in Isaiah, chapter 65, verse 10: “And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks, and the valley of Achor a place for the herds to lie down in, for my people that have sought me.”

The nearness of God in His physical Manifestation in the last days is also given. Turning to Revelation, chapter 21 and verse 3: “And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying: Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God Himself shall be with them and be their God.”

The repeated references to the “Branch” in the Bible has ever carried a conviction of the exalted station of the one so-called, but until our own time it had never had anything approaching a clear explanation. The sons of Bahá'u'lláh were always referred to as “branches” projected from the Exalted Tree,—the Pre-existent Root, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the oldest son, was designated as the “Greatest Branch.” The psalmist David particularly sang of His coming with an insistent adoration and praise. Of Him in the 2nd verse of the 2nd Psalm, we read: “I will make him, my first-born higher than the kings of earth.”

Also, did 'Abdu'l-Bahá fulfill the prophetic utterance in the 26th verse of the 88th Psalm, which reads: "He shall cry unto me, Thou art my father, my God, and the rock of my salvation," for it was in the ninth year of the Manifestation of the Báb, which was also the ninth year of the life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, after His father had been released from that dread dungeon in Tíhrán and exiled to Baghdád and there was explaining to 'Abdu'l-Bahá the mystery of the Manifestation that the boy fell at His Father's feet and with a cry of passionate adoration, called: "I know that Thou art God!"

It will, therefore, be of interest to review the Bible declarations regarding Him: In Zechariah, the third chapter and eighth verse: "Hear now, O Joshua, the High Priest, thou and thy fellows that sit before thee; for they are men wondered at; for, behold, I will bring forth my servant the BRANCH."

And in the sixth chapter, verse 12 and 13: "Behold the man whose name is the BRANCH, and he shall grow out of his place, and he shall build the temple of the Lord * * * And he shall bear the glory and shall sit and rule upon his throne."

And in Isaiah, the fourth chapter and second verse: "In that day shall the Branch of the Lord be beautiful and glorious." And in the eleventh chapter and first verse: "And there shall come forth a root out of the stem of Jesse, and a Branch shall grow out of his roots." "And the spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord."

Now, of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Manifestation has written: "O Thou, my Greatest Branch! Verily, we have ordained thee the guardian of all the creatures and a protection to all those in the heavens and earths, and a fortress to those who believe in God, the One, the Omniscient. I beg of God to protect them by thee, and to reveal to thee that which is the dawning-point of riches to the people of creation, the ocean of generosity to those in the world, and the rising-point of favor to all nations. Verily, He is the Powerful, the All-Knowing, the Wise. I beg of Him to water the earth and all that is in it by thee and that there may spring up from it the flowers of wisdom and revelation and the hyacinths of science and knowledge."

Has 'Abdu'l-Bahá fulfilled the requirements of the prophetic and other declarations of His station? As early as His ninth year, at the beginning of the dread period of exile, He independently took upon Himself the service of warding off intrusion on His father and the latter, once in speaking of Him, said: "There is only one who is Master and that is 'Abdu'l-Bahá." The term "Master" applies to Him to-day throughout the world. This service to His father was the beginning of that feature which characterized all of His wonderful life, which is vastly more important to us to-day, and must so continue throughout the oncoming ages, than any glamour of history or tradition. Yes, even more than the most profound philosophy, or of the unapproachable tragedy of exile and imprisonment which was His—this exemplification of selfless service. The entire story of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's life is saturated and permeated with this principle, across which He chose to write the name He bears, whose meaning is the "Servant of Glory."

It was during the period of the great world war, when the members of the Holy Family and all the followers in the Holy Land carried on under the dread experience of deprivation which was theirs because of being shut off from contact with the outside world and sources of supply, that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had established extensive gardens at Tiberias and from these cared for the needy, even for the poorly fed soldiers of the Turkish army, his oppressors, and afterward when the time of the adjustment of the difficult problems in the Near East confronted the British authorities, it was very largely due to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's influence and wise counsel that the way was made smooth. In partial recognition of this, Knighthood was bestowed on Abdul Baha April 17, 1920 by order of King George of England. Even while the Master was carrying on his great work and assisting the Turkish soldiers, their general announced that when he had defeated the British forces and seized the Suez Canal, he would return and hang 'Abdu'l-Bahá. It was then, with a smile inspired by his rich presence, that 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to him in effect: "When you shall have seized the Suez Canal and returned, 'Abdu'l-Bahá will await you here to be hanged."

This splendid courage was exemplified at the time, in 1908, when Abdul Hamid, Sultan of Turkey, had sent a committee to inquisition 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the order had been issued to send Him away from His followers to Feysan in the great desert. An Italian warship in the harbor at Haifa was offered to Him to transport Him to England or other place of safety, but His answer was: "Ali Muhammad, the Báb, did not seek safety in flight: Bahá'u'lláh declined to fly the dangers which beset Him: 'Abdu'l-Bahá will not fly away." On the day when His exile was to have begun, the Young Turks Party came into power and 'Abdu'l-Bahá and other prisoners were set free, and Abdul Hamid consigned to a dungeon in chains.

The opportunity for His father's release came toward the close of 1858, when Colonel Arnold Burrows Kemball, Consul General of Great Britain, at Tihrán, entered into a friendly correspondence with Bahá'u'lláh, offering to make Him a British subject and to place Him under the protection of the British Government. The Consul said to Him if He did not like to live in England He could journey to India and dwell in any spot agreeable to Him. This generous offer was declined. It was ten years later, on August 19, 1868, that witnessed the embarkation of Bahá'u'lláh and His little band of faithful followers in boats from Gallipoli for the Austria-Lloyd steamer which was to take them via Smyrna and Alexandria to that long imprisonment in 'Akká, which ended for the Manifestation in His final passing in 1892, and for 'Abdu'l-Bahá in His first freedom in fifty-six years, in 1908.

THE SIGNIFICANT ONENESS

“GUIDANCE IS GIVEN BY DEEDS”

MARY HANFORD FORD

“Turn your eyes away from foreignness and gaze unto Oneness, and hold fast unto the means which conduce to the tranquility and security of the people of the whole world. This spanwide world is but one native land and one locality. Abandon that glory which is the cause of discord, and turn unto that which promotes harmony.”—Bahá'u'lláh.

NOWADAYS it is a comparatively easy matter for a traveler—especially if he speaks at least one foreign language—to recognize in theory the oneness of mankind. Nevertheless his affirmation is frequently followed by a declaration of what he finds very objectionable in all races.

It is one thing to accept a statement mentally and quite another to feel it in one's heart so that thoughts are translated into the world of action. Bahá'u'lláh said:

“Guidance hath ever been in words, and now it is given by deeds. That is, every one must show forth deeds that are pure and holy, for in words all partake, whereas such deeds as these are special to Our loved ones. . . .”

Many in the past have been unable to admit the accusation of the customary attitude on the part of some people toward the Hindu,—because they were so accustomed to the feeling of superiority that they were unaware of its expression. With others the conviction of Negro inferiority is so strong a hereditary trait that they are not aware of resenting the Negro in any other capacity than that of belonging to the servant class.

In this day of reality it is not enough to register an intellectual conviction upon any subject. One must pragmatically feel it and live it.

Few seem to be aware of the extent of the discrimination against the Negro. It is accepted as a rule that the colored and white people should live in different sections and have but slight social relations. As a rule citizens accept the custom and do not reason about it. Recently an intelligent and well to do American woman of New York City said to the writer, “You know I am going to move, Mrs. Ford.”

“How is that?” I replied in surprise, aware that she owned a most attractive home.

“You see” she continued, “the Negroes are invading the locality and it is not agreeable any longer.”

“But are they an ignorant lot of people?” I asked, having in mind a group of highly cultured colored friends whom I knew.

“Oh no,” she answered, “but you know one does not like to put Negroes on one's calling list.”

“Are they not good neighbors?” I continued. “In my experience Negro neighbors are exceedingly kind.”

She was evidently surprised, and expressed her “hundred per cent” Americanism with decision: “I like Americans best,” she declared.

I laughed again. “But dear lady” I cried, “the Negroes are Americans as much as you or I. The only pure-blooded Americans are the Indians. All the rest of us from the point of view of the continent are aliens and came over here as an alien group of different races.”

There are many, however, and the number is increasing who feel that friendship with members of a different continental group is always inspiring. One discovers thus the salient qualities of each variety of humans. The Anglo-Saxon is an instinctive organizer; the Chinese have great capacity and are far-seeing; the Hindu is philosophic; the Norwegian and Russian possessed of natural insight; the Latin phenomenally quick to see and decide; the Negro is especially loving, poetic and psychically sensitive.

Roland Hayes, a colored man who has a superb voice, is a brilliant illustration of how fully genius banishes prejudice, for in his crowded concert audiences, white and black sit together without consciousness of difference, and are equally enthusiastic.

I saw Paul Robeson, a colored man with notable dramatic ability, play Othello in London last summer with such artistic interpretation, and often original conception that his success was always unqualified.

IN NEW YORK we have frequent social gatherings of colored and white people, among which was a delightful Racial Amity Meeting, or Conference which was largely attended. In its arrangement the Bahá'i Centre of New York City collaborated with the Urban League of Harlem, which is a particularly fine Negro organization. One of the meetings was in the form of a reception at the Bahá'i Centre.

I must not forget to chronicle the reception given some weeks ago also at the Bahá'i Centre, to Mrs. Mary McLean Bethune. The reception was planned by the Travel Club of Harlem, and it so happens that the members of this club are all fair skinned negroes and highly cultured women. Mrs. Bethune herself, who is very dark, was the only one present who looked colored, yet she was unquestionably extremely gifted. As an American woman she ranks high in eloquence, understanding and intelligence, and as President of Bethune Cookman College at Daytona Beach, Florida, and also president of the Woman's International Society of Colored Women, she labors with ceaseless enthusiasm for the betterment of her race.

A young white woman sat next to me who had never seen colored women of this particularly fine type. Each one, as she entered the room, was noticeable for beautiful manners, exquisite speech and undeniable charm. All these characteristics were exemplified in the chairman, Mrs. Horne. As each one entered my young friend would ask in an awed whisper, “Is she colored?” and the affirmative response drew from her a sigh of surprise again, showing how deeply her prejudice was being shocked.

We are living in a day when traditions and racial preconceptions must disappear. Bahá'u'lláh says:

“O Children of Men! Know ye not why We created you from one clay? That no one should exalt himself over the other. Ponder at all times in your hearts how ye were created. Since We have created you all from one same substance it behooveth you to be as one soul, to walk with the same feet, eat with the same mouth, and dwell in the same land; that from your inmost being, by your deeds and actions, the signs of oneness and the essence of detachment may be made manifest. This is My counsel to you, O Concourse of Light! Heed ye this counsel that ye may obtain the fruit of holiness from the tree of wondrous glory.”

NEVER BEFORE could such words transform life, but their effect is now manifest in every direction. Those who watched carefully the progress of events in India last year, and the development of the Round Table Conference in London, must have been delighted at two results—that English and Indians were discussing realities on a basis of equality never previously attained, and that on the Indian side of the Conference the outcast Untouchables were admitted to the circle.

These “untouchables,” constituting forty-three millions of the citizens of India have never been permitted the slightest contact with other inhabitants of the country. No untouchable can walk on the highways of India; or approach within a certain distance of one of another caste; he cannot even draw water from the village well. For many years Ghandi has been doing all he could to combat this bitter prejudice; and long ago adopted an infant girl from an untouchable household, who has played her part in the family and been associated with its entire environment.

For the first time the bars were broken, and at the Round Table Dr. Ambedkar, graduate of an English university, untouchable, was present to safeguard the rights of his people in the constitution that is to be drafted. Moreover his presence in London was a complete triumph for his oppressed and suffering group. He was received by all without prejudice, and was publicly entertained at dinner by the Maharajah the Gaekwar of Baroda, who invited as his other guest a distinguished and orthodox Brahman.

A charming book has been recently published, entitled A Marriage to India, in which Mrs. Frieda Das the author describes the eight years of her life in India as the wife of a Brahman who was endeavoring to introduce western methods of agriculture into his country. She makes such a picture of caste discrimination and purely hereditary human prejudice, that though her book contains not a word of criticism, one lays it down with the thought, “Am I hating some one or refusing association with some one through mere family or class, or race tradition? If so, I will stop it!”

The mind creates barriers more powerful than those of iron and stone, and one must sometimes pass through tragedies to understand that the color of the skin is merely a garment which may conceal an ineffaceable beauty of heart and soul. Moreover one discovers that the skin has exquisite attraction in every variety of shade both dark and light, and the bronze body and face, the Eurasian and quadron, are often much more fascinating than the dead Caucasian white of the Anglo-Saxon.

'Abdu'l-Bahá states that we should strive "to bring about absolute affiliation between the white and the colored. This variety in color is indeed an ornament. If in a rosegarden all the flowers are unicolor, what beauty may be found therein? Whereas if thou beholdest a garden wherein multicolored flowers bloom, infinite grace and beauty will appear therefrom.

"Likewise if the world of mankind were of one color what preference would it have? Whereas multiplicity of color is an emblem of the "Power of the Merciful. . .

"All mankind are the trees of the divine garden and the Gardener of this orchard is His Most High, the All-Sustainer. The hand of His favor hath planted these trees, irrigated them from the Cloud of Mercy and reared them with the energy of the Sun of Truth. Then there remains no doubt that this Heavenly Farmer (Gardener) is kind to all these plants. This truth cannot be denied. It is shining like unto the sun. This is the Divine Policy and unquestionably it is greater than the human policy. We must follow the Divine Policy."

A HUNDRED years ago when there were no railroads, no steamships, aeroplanes; no telegraphs, telephones or radio, all races were necessarily separated from one another. If a man was familiar with the speech of his district that was sufficient for every human contact. Now however he travels hundreds of miles by aeroplane in a few hours and feels the need of a dozen languages.

Bahá'u'lláh looking forward to this period of the world's history declared that in this day the complex demands of humanity could only be met by an auxiliary language which men must learn; so that whatever his native tongue the universal speech would also be at his command. In the late eighties when invention had broken down the outward barriers of mankind, Dr. Zamenhof created the beautiful Esperanto language, and gave us a means of unlimited communication.

Oneness has at length an intimate means of expression. The walls of ignorant prejudice have no longer a sanctuary, they are ever the last to yield. I shall be able presently to say to my friend Bonon Tagon in the same tone, with the same love, whether he is black, yellow, or white. I shall not think of his color because I shall be so entranced with the light of his soul shining through his eyes, and the noble harmony of his Good Day!

"In the estimation of God there is no distinction of color; all are one in the color and beauty of servitude to Him. Color is not important; the heart is all-important. It matters not what the exterior may be if the heart be pure and white within. God does not behold differences of hue and complexion; He looks at the hearts."

IS OCCIDENTAL CIVILIZATION DOOMED?

HASAN BALYUZI

The author of this article is a student at one of the large Near East Colleges. His analysis of present day world problems is just another evidence that the youth of today are thinking deeply and independently on causes and effects in relation to the body-politic.

I WILL try and answer this question briefly, avoiding a lengthy introduction. Is occidental civilization doomed?

What is Occidental civilization? First let us distinguish between culture and civilization, for there is a difference between the two. One is the spirit and the other the form. One is intangible for practical purposes, and the other is felt and often grossly materialized. Culture never dies, it is self-perpetuating, but civilizations rise and fall.

Examples may clarify the matter. The spirit of worship is original and eternal with man, but in different ages it takes different forms and finds various manifestations. The ceremonies and rituals which embody the spirit of worship, change with the changes of time, but the spirit is ever-living.

The Roman and the Greek civilizations have long ceased to exist, but their cultures are ever-fresh. Their intellectual works have not died out of our world, but their civilizations have long since passed into oblivion.

The Occidental civilization is based on machines and mass production. Mass production necessitates raw materials in huge amounts and free unrestricted, and unmolested markets for the sale of the finished products. Europe is small, her population large and her natural resources insufficient to maintain her industries. Markets and resources are to be sought elsewhere. And where are those to be found? In the undeveloped countries of Asia and Africa. And then the result—sometimes a cruel merciless policy called Imperialism.

The natives are not willing to share their wealth with the greedy intruders, and the Powers themselves cannot watch calmly and uninterestedly one another's acquisitions. The most natural consequence of these antagonisms, is conflict, war and bloodshed. The history of Europe in the last one hundred years is to be read in the light of this dementic search for new markets and new resources. The Great War itself was born out of this quest and struggle. But the hour of the doom of such so-called Imperialism has already struck for there is a slow but sure awakening to the fact that the law of compensation is always operative and when one part of the world suffers, all suffer more or less.

LET US set Imperialism aside for a while. Look at Europe itself. The laborer, a human being, a man like you and I and anybody else, is turned forcibly into a living machine. He has no will of his own, no initiative, no originality, nothing of the sort. A perfectly mechanical being. From morning to dusk he works on one wheel, not to mention on one screw. Have you seen the picture film, "Metropolis?" How a worker behaved! Quite thoughtless. That is exactly what the ill-used machine makes out of human beings. Poor creatures They are enslaved, and turned into desperate animals sacrificing their lives on the altars of business. Such is the standard set by the civilization of this age.

A good many authorities allege that mass production in goods, means a mass production in ideas. Who can deny it? Can you really?

The restlessness prevailing in the West, is a sign of decay. The birth of so many "isms" indicates the desperate efforts of a dying order. And why so? Because the divine spark is lost. The standard is not "one for all," but "one for oneself." It is the elimination of the weak and the struggle of the strong. And what results—war. The doctrine of "self-sufficiency" which precipitates an impending doom on any civilization, is already accomplishing its destructive work. It is playing havoc and bringing ruin in the form of economic depression. Who or what is to be blamed? A civilization which has outlived its day?

LACK OF FAITH and loss of belief in God and Man, are the direct results of occidental civilization. The way it acts is likely to make man disavow his trust in any power save what he feels with his rough senses. Everything fine and sublime is out of place in this diabolical maze, called a civilization. Some people have begun to believe in a mechanical Nature, without any mind or intellect behind it. They have lost every hope, and along with it their faith in God as well as Man.

See how a man caught in this whirlpool thinks and reasons. If there were a God, what the fools call a kind heavenly Father, then why should a civilization, sans Mercy have its way? Why should machine act as a destructive agent, rather than a blessing as it was intended to be? And then follows a revolt—a revolt of unfaith.

The mechanical, unwise and monotonous routine of a purely material civilization, works at the expense of human nerves. We in the East cannot imagine the conditions in the West. Ask a Londoner or a Parisian, and meditate on his reply. Just look at the statistics and then judge for yourself. Insanity is increasing in European centres of business and industry. And crime too. This unemployment business is born of what? What has been the impetus to the flourishing of crime?

Material civilization creates mechanical behavior, crime unfaith, human slavery, merciless competition, economic stress, imperialism and war—all agents of destruction. And therefore it cannot live. Every other civilization taking such a course, has met a terrible death. The Egyptian, the Hebrew, the Chaldean, the Persian, the Greek and Roman civilizations died because of turning into the wrong path.

This most unnatural of all the civilizations has to die. It has to go and something merciful, virtuous and divine shall take its place.

It is beyond the scope of this article to explain the nature and qualifications of the new world order. But I must sincerely express my heartfelt conviction that the new civilization is that foretold by Bahá'u'lláh. The changes in recent years point clearly to this fact. The more I study the principles laid down by that Divine Educator, the more I become tenacious in my faith and belief.

'Abdu'l-Bahá has given us many concrete teachings regarding material and divine civilization, among them this statement:

“Consider what is this material civilization of the day giving forth? Has it not produced the instruments of warfare and destruction? . . . Instruments and means of human destruction have enormously multiplied in this era of material civilization. But if material civilization shall become organized in conjunction with divine civilization, if the man of moral integrity and intellectual acumen shall unite for human betterment and uplift with the man of spiritual capacity, the happiness and progress of the human race will be assured.”

When we get a glimpse even of the divine civilization of the future, fresh hopes spring anew in the heart, and often do we think of one of Shoghi Effendi's constructive statements as we see the world in the throes of its new birth:

“But great achievements still await us in this world, and we feel confident that, by His grace and never-failing guidance, we shall now and ever prove ourselves worthy to fulfill his great purpose for mankind. And who can fail to realize the sore need of bleeding humanity, in its present state of uncertainty and peril, for the regenerating spirit of God, manifested this day so powerfully in this Divine Dispensation?”

“Four years of unprecedented warfare and world cataclysms, followed by another four years of bitter disappointment and suffering, have stirred deeply the conscience of mankind, and opened the eyes of an unbelieving world to the power of the Spirit that alone can cure its sickness, heal its wounds, and establish the long-promised reign of undisturbed prosperity and peace.”

“The East and the West must unite to give to each other what is lacking. This union will bring about a true civilization where the spiritual is expressed and carried out in the material. Receiving thus the one from the other, the greatest harmony will prevail, all people will be united, a state of great perfection will be attained, there will be a firm cementing, and this world will become a shining mirror for the reflection of the attributes of God.

“We all—the Eastern with the Western nations—must strive day and night with heart and soul to achieve this high ideal, to cement the unity between all the nations of the earth. Every heart will then be refreshed, all eyes will be opened, the most wonderful power will be given, the happiness of humanity will be assured.”

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

DIVINE JUSTICE

THE question has been asked "Will the spiritual progress of the world equal and keep pace with material progress in the future?" In a living organism the full measure of its development is not known or realized at the time of its inception or birth. Development and progression imply gradual stages or degrees. . . . Now is the beginning of the manifestation of the power spiritual and inevitably its potency of life forces will assume greater and greater proportions. Therefore this twentieth century is the dawn or beginning of spiritual illumination and it is evident that day by day it will advance. It will reach such a degree that spiritual effulgences will overcome the physical, so that divine susceptibilities will overpower material intelligence and the heavenly light dispel and banish earthly darkness. Divine healing shall purify all ills and the cloud of mercy will pour down its rain. . . .

Among the results of the manifestation of spiritual forces will be that the human world will adapt itself to a new social form, the justice of God will become manifest throughout human affairs and human equality will be universally established. The poor will receive a great bestowal and the rich attain eternal happiness. For although at the present time the rich enjoy the greatest luxury and comfort, they are nevertheless deprived of eternal happiness; for eternal happiness is contingent upon giving and the poor are everywhere in the state of abject need. Through the manifestation of God's great equity the poor of the world will be rewarded and assisted fully and there will be a readjustment in the economic conditions of mankind so that in the future there will not be the abnormally rich nor the abject poor. . . .

The essence of the matter is that divine justice will become manifest in human conditions and affairs and all mankind will find comfort and enjoyment in life. It is not meant that all will be equal, for inequality in degree and capacity is a property of nature. Necessarily there will be rich people and also those who will be in want of their livelihood, but in the aggregate community there will be equalization and readjustment of values and interests. In the future there will be no very rich nor extremely poor. There will be an equilibrium of interests, and a condition will be established which will make both rich and poor comfortable and content. This will be an eternal and blessed outcome of the glorious twentieth century which will be realized universally. The significance of it is that the glad-tidings of great joy revealed in the promises of the holy books will be fulfilled. Await ye this consummation."—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

SOUVENIR OF 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ

The writer of this article, having recently returned from a nine years' world pilgrimage devoted to the promulgation of the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, has been speaking through this country during the past few months in many of our leading universities and broadcasting from a great number of American radio stations. At the Souvenir Feast in West Englewood, N. J., herein described she lectured on "Progress of the Bahá'í Movement in Five Continents". As she also had the good fortune to have been present at the original Feast given by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 1912, she is especially qualified to narrate this remarkable memorial service at Evergreen Cabin.

It is not only on this anniversary that Evergreen Cabin functions, however, for meetings for Bahá'is and others interested are held several times each week. Visitors come daily to see and to admire. They ask: "Is this edifice a temple, a shrine, or a house of peace?" And "What is the Bahá'í Movement?" A silver-haired lady, Mrs. J. O. Wilhelm, meets many inquirers, answers their questions and explains the Bahá'í principles.

EPOCH making in the spiritual history of the American Continent was the Souvenir of 'Abdu'l-Bahá held on June twenty-seventh, 1931, at "Evergreen Cabin", West Englewood, New Jersey. It was a notable and unique gathering, Bahá'is coming from many cities. Looking at those groups including several hundred people during the afternoon and evening, one saw with the inner eye the great spirit of several systems of religion blended into one radiant whole. Besides Bahá'is, people attracted to find out what this new universal religion, the Bahá'í Movement, really is, came to hear and to learn.

"Evergreen Cabin" and its environs are beautiful. The capacity of this Cabin is being taxed by the ever increasing attendance and as the years go by it becomes evident that no cabin can be built large enough to house the throngs who will come to these Souvenirs. The building was aglow with soft lights gleaming through pearly, pastel-shaded shells, shells picked up from the shores of the seven seas of the globe. The gardens have immense rocks lifting their mighty heads above the pools in which they stand; waters rush up through these rocks and splash with rhythmic cadence into the air. They symbolize the living waters of pure religion coming out of the stones of the earth. The birds have built their nests in the pine trees of the gardens, and tilting on the topmost branches add their songs to the music of the afternoon. The pines waft their delicate perfume.

Even the outer, physical features of "Evergreen Cabin" and its garden represent all fatherlands, for stones in the fireplaces and gardens include rare specimens from every country in the world—stones from Persia from the homes and the prisons of the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh; stones from Akká, Bahji, Haifa and Mt. Carmal; stones from the great Wall of China, from the Wailing Wall of Jerusalem, from emperors' gardens, and from heroes' and heroine's scenes of action; all are a part of these grounds. Just as these historic stones from all countries, sent by friends, show to the visitors that here is a material portion from his fatherland, so also he finds that "Evergreen Cabin" in its inner reality is a home of the spirit of all the religions. The universality of this place impresses every guest.

What is this "Souvenir of 'Abdu'l-Bahá" when telegrams come from many lands and letters from many cities and guests from various races, nations and religions? Here nineteen years ago on June twenty-eight, 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the son of Bahá'u'lláh and the interpreter of His Teachings, Who was traveling through the United States to promulgate the principles of universal peace, gave a feast in this charming West Englewood place. He honored His friends with an invitation to present themselves in commemoration of His feast, and on that occasion He stated that this feast marked the real birth of the Bahá'í Cause in America. Later in a Tablet He referred to the gathering as "The Annual Souvenir of 'Abdu'l-Bahá."

There in the pine-perfumed grove on that beautiful June day, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Himself the host, smiling joyously, welcomed His friends. He said among other things, "Since the intention of all of you is toward unity and agreement, it is certain that this gathering will be productive of great results. It will be the cause of attracting a New Bounty. This is a New Day and this is a New Hour wherein we have come together; all are turning to the Kingdom of Abhá, seeking the infinite bounties of God."

"This gathering has no peer or likeness upon the surface of the earth, for all other gatherings and assemblages are due to some physical basis or material interests. This outward meeting is a prototype of the inner and complete spiritual meeting. . . . Hundreds of thousands of meetings shall be held to commemorate such an assembly as this, and the very words I utter to you on this occasion shall be reiterated by them in the ages to come. Therefore be rejoiced, for you are being sheltered beneath the Providence of God, and be happy and joyous because the bestowals of God are intended for you. Rejoice because the breaths of the Holy Spirit are directed to you.

“Rejoice, for the heavenly table is prepared for you!

“Rejoice, for the angels of heaven are your assistants and helpers!

“Rejoice, for the glance of the Blessed Beauty, Bahá'u'lláh, is directed to you!

“Rejoice, for Bahá'u'lláh is your protector!

“Rejoice, for the Glory Everlasting is destined for you!

“Rejoice, for the Life Everlasting is for you!”

One can but feel that if this Souvenir has made such progress in nineteen years, what will it be in nineteen hundred years when these Bahá'í Teachings are understood and lived throughout the world!

“Let us be ready to give our lives, our fortunes, positions, achievements, in order that a new state of existence may be diffused throughout the world. There are fellow-beings who are weaker than we are, let us strengthen them; there are those who are more ignorant, we must teach them; some are as children, help them to develop; many are asleep, awaken them; others are ill, heal them; never despise them. Be kinder to them than to the stronger ones. One must always be kinder to the weak and ill and to the children. Never seek to humiliate your brother.

“Bahá'u'lláh is the Sun of Truth: all humanity will be illumined under His protection, and whosoever follows His instructions in this day will feel the potency of His protection.” —Abdu'l-Bahá.

QUESTING

A Searching Soul's Pilgrimage

RUTH J. MOFFETT

"Son of Existence! Love Me, that I may love thee. If thou lovest Me not, My love can in no wise reach thee. Know this O servant."—Bahá'u'lláh.

SINCE man first lifted his gaze into the azure sky and wondered,—What is the purpose of life? Why am I here? Why does all life live and move and change?—he has continued to wonder. Philosophers, agnostics and sages have attempted answers but they have not satisfied the inner heart of man, so their theories have drifted away like falling leaves before the autumn breeze.

Slowly throughout the ages each groping, struggling, human being, has been trained by unseen forces, to an unfolding and fuller comprehension of the divine purpose. His feet have traveled through many dark and murky valleys, and been scratched by many brambles, weeping drops of blood along the way. He has drifted about on the grassy plateaus amid the clinging vines, until his understanding becoming quickened, he begins the long climb up the steep and thorny pathway with his eyes shining with the reflection of the Great White Goal beyond.

These familiar lines by an ancient poet vividly picture the pilgrimage of the soul.

"To every man there openeth
A way and ways and a way.
The high soul climbs the high way
And the low soul gropes the low.
And in between on the misty flats,
The rest drift to and fro.
And in between on the misty flats,
The rest drift to and fro.
But to every man there openeth
A high way and a low.
And every one decideth
Which way his soul shall go."

Shall we follow the quest of one of these souls whom we shall call, Ruhanea? Once upon a time a tiny blue-eyed baby came to live in this world, as a first child in a Christian home among the hills and lakes of Wisconsin. As a wee baby she was alert to all around her, always active except when her devoted mother would tell her stories. She would sit quietly for hours while her mother would tell her Bible stories, asking for them again and again. Then she would gather her family of dolls, nineteen in number (because she was born on the 19th), teaching them the stories she had learned.

Her father being superintendent of the schools for many years, believed in children starting young, so at three years of age, Ruhanea went to Sunday School and was soon teaching the other older children the stories she had taught her dolls. One day her mother heard her singing to her dolls, "One Glory has gone, another has come. Another has come. Another has come!" Her mother, shocked, asked her what she meant. She said, "Why, Mother, don't you understand? One Glory has gone, another has come." She never heard such a thought expressed by any one. At five she was sent to kindergarten, which was simply an experiment, in those days, and again taught her family of 19 dolls some of the things that she learned at school.

Because she always had a group about her teaching them something she was given a Sunday School class of children older than herself to teach and she was often gently reproved by the "higher ups" for teaching lessons not in the quarterly but much more interesting correspondences she found in the Bible, applied to their lives, so that the children did not want to miss a lesson.

The years rolled by. Her beautiful mother with high spiritual though orthodox ideals, her stern father, who was judge of the county courts, with his strict though unorthodox ideals, her teachers with their meticulous conformity to custom, all tried to mould this sensitive, loving, idealistic child after his own pattern. She would listen eagerly to all but was seldom satisfied with the answers to her questions. She would find her own answers from the Bible or elsewhere then teach them to her dolls or her twenty months younger brother. This searching while still a young child, caused her to read deeper and more broadly than many of the other children.

When Ruhanea was twelve years of age Rev. Arthur C. Kempton became pastor of the First Baptist Church. Because of his unusually beautiful spirit, clear well organized mind and broad vision, he had a great influence upon this sensitive young child. Ruhanea attended church every Sunday morning and evening for two years, almost without exception during his pastorate. She always took a little book with her in which she recorded the subject, date and text of the sermon, the general divisions and the conclusion. She told no one. Some thought she was drawing pictures, as she loved to draw.

One day at the end of two years when she heard the pastor say he wished he had kept a record of some of the subjects of his sermons, Ruhanea timidly gave him the complete record not only of his subjects but the way he had developed them and his conclusion, written in childish hand. He was astonished and delighted and they were fast friends until his untimely death. Walking hand in hand he would often answer satisfactorily her unusual questions.

High school days were happy, busy days filled with the many activities of youth. Ruhanea and her brother started and edited the first high school paper. It seemed to be her path to be the pioneer in many things and to blaze the trail for others to follow, always a difficult and thankless task. She and her brother graduated in three and one half years, thus starting a midyear graduation and opportunity for the first time for post-graduate work in that school. During those high school years her deepest spiritual education was reading where she would find some great truth that touched her soul, then she would teach it to her students, trying to illustrate it in their lives. Always there was the restless urge within her heart to find another gem of truth and share it with some listening ear. She read many books of an uplifting nature and read the Bible completely through seven times consecutively, for which she received a number of awards, and a valuable mental picture, but greatest of all an added power of comprehension, because of the concentration upon the words of the Prophets rather than what man has said about them.

ONE OF the most thrilling experiences of her life was the years spent at Oberlin College, in that wonderfully stimulating intellectual and spiritual atmosphere. The contact with great minds like John Henry Barrows, President of the Parliament of Religions of the World's Fair, and later President of Oberlin College when she entered; Dr. Henry King, Dr. Edward Bosworth with whom she took courses in comprehensive Bible studies, and many others, together with association and fellowship with sincere and eager students, all had a wholesome and broadening influence in moulding the religious drift of her life.

Because her brother wanted to attend the University of Wisconsin, Ruhanea returned home from Oberlin to teach, that her brother might, too, experience college stimulus.

THE SACRIFICE of that which meant so much to her, that another might have similar opportunities, was one of the most valuable lessons for her soul unfoldment. For of what use is religion, she reasoned, unless expressed in practical living and in self-sacrifice for the best good of others? This proved a further step in the expansion of her consciousness. Freshly returned from college, she was soon deep in the many activities of her home city, as president of several groups, and organizer of her church, all of which became avenues of expression for her growing ideas and ideals, but the mental inertia of her associates disheartened her.

ONE DAY IN 1907, in looking for a current event for a club of which she was Founder President, she read in her father's Literary Digest a long article about Bahá'u'lláh, the Prophet foretold by all the Bibles of the World. The article declared that the One for whom the whole world was awaiting had appeared in Persia. That He had established His proofs and given His Message to the world, and that He had declared the principles for the establishment of the New World Order.

Something stirred deep within the soul of Ruhanea, as a young bird's first glad awakening call to the first faint glimmer of the rosy dawn. Then her shocked orthodox-trained mind rose in rebellion, but the little bird in her soul had awakened.

She read the article several times with the conclusion that "this is either the greatest blasphemy or the greatest truth of the world today. I will find proofs." After she had given it to the club, she was disappointed, orthodox though she was, that their reactions were either shocked, apathetic, or with the remark, with a tone of finality, "O that is only a newspaper story." No one seemed to catch a new gleam of light in her spirit. Later she repeated the same current event for the benefit of some new friends present, and this time she was more disappointed, because the reaction then was, "Oh that current event is stale, you gave it before." She went to the library to search for proof, but the librarian after some search said, "I am sorry, but that was but a newspaper story." Ruhanea carried that precious clipping around with her for two years occasionally asking some one about it, usually with the same answer, "O that is only a newspaper story. It cannot possibly be true."

The year before Ruhanea married, she went to Europe with some of her college friends, visiting thirteen countries, doing everything that a good tourist should do, and seeing everything a tourist should see, but not once did she find a sign-board to the path of the New Knowledge she sought. She seemed to be on the "misty flats" wandering aimlessly with the masses, drifting. However because of that one little bird song in her soul, she was vaguely conscious that she was drifting, even though her orthodox-trained mind would continually try to hold her to the past.

Her marriage to a man of keen, philosophical mind, clear, broad vision, and noble, high ideals has been one of the greatest influences of her busy life. They went at once to Chicago to live. Here for nine years they eagerly sought together in the Valley of Search for the answers to many questions. They were earnest students of Christian Science first, then Theosophy, then New Thought, Psychology, Judaism, Buddhism, Muhammadanism, Mysticism, then the ancient Religions with most of their questions not yet satisfactorily answered. In each group where they had so earnestly studied, they found beautiful ideals entirely separated from the program of "living the life", individually or in relation to society. In each group they found some that were motivated by a deep unselfish love and universal ideals, but the many seemed to be drifting aimlessly on different plateaus, totally unconcerned about the kind of world they were living in, or what they could do to help society as a whole.

Certain great truths were the inevitable results of all this questing. Slowly had emerged the knowledge that—

1. The same divine precepts and development of the same heavenly qualities are taught in all the Bibles of the world.

2. That the Commandments and the Beatitudes are found in all other Bibles.

3. That the idea that certain precepts or passages could not be matched in any non-Christian Bibles was false.

4. That the seven great world religions and their numerous sects can no longer be called false or pagan any more than a child can be called a false man.

5. That all religions worship God according to the light and understanding they have.

6. That Chinese, Hindu, Muhammadan, Aztec, Christian, all bowing, kneeling or prostrating before an altar,—all have the same yearning, hungering for purer, nobler, more perfect life than they ever before experienced and their worship is accepted by God in the spirit in which it is given.

7. That all the Religions are founded by a Prophet of God, an Abraham, Moses, Krishna, Buddha, Zoroaster, Christ, and Muhammad.

8. That all foretell a Mighty One, a Promised One, The Everlasting

Father who in the Letter Day will bring the spirit of unity.

One day in the year 1919, a physician said to her, "I see by the light in your eyes that you know about Bahá'u'lláh and His Message to the world." Eagerly she arose and said, "Who? Who is He? What is His Message to the world?" For two hours she asked questions, until he said, "I cannot answer your questions, you ask them too fast, and I cannot answer them anyway. That book 'Some Answered Questions by 'Abdu'l-Bahá', will answer a few. She then began an exhaustive study of the available Bahá'i literature. The more she studied, the more compelling, illuminating and convincing it became, as had not been true in all of her other experiences. The unfolding Knowledge gripped her spirit. The actual Words of Bahá'u'lláh were as fire to her soul. No spiritual writing throughout all the study of the Sacred Books had the dynamic, spiritual creative power as had the Words of Bahá'u'lláh. All the Truths she had sought and previously found in other movements reached their fulfillment and climax in this great Message. Then she found the principles He revealed—which were practically unknown at the time of His appearance, 1817, and the announcement of His appearance in 1844—have become the dynamic of the world today. Such a dynamic that the world has made more progress in the acceptance and realization of these principles, than in all previous history, back to the Neanderthal man, 50,000 years ago.

Deeper research revealed to Ruhanea, that the whole earth has become flooded with a new Spirit. New things are unfolding everywhere. The scientist discovers new laws and facts. The artist beholds new beauties. The physician uses new methods. The student learns new lessons. The philosopher conceives new ideas. The aspirant forms new ideals. Never before has the earth witnessed such a disclosure of its secrets. All evidencing that "One Great Power which animates and dominates all things, which are but manifestations of its energy."—Bahá'u'lláh.

Ruhanea also discovered, that not only did Bahá'u'lláh reveal practical, workable principles for the uplift of society, but also the power to bring them into realization. This dynamic is the Spirit of the New Age. As the whole world today is discarding worn out forms, traditions and methods, the search for the new spiritual pattern is progressing among the youth of Islam, Confucianism, Judaism, and even Christianity. Many are catching this New Spirit in the various religious groups, though they are as yet unconscious of the Cause of the New Spirit of Unity and the Great Dynamic back of it, or the meaning of The Everlasting Father, The Glory of God, The Prince of Peace.

In her recent travels about the world, Ruhanea was astonished to find not only how sincerely the followers of Bahá'u'lláh live the life individually, but how they are proving themselves to be worthy and well qualified to the degree that they have already become outstanding factors in the building of the New World Order, especially in Persia, Egypt, Germany, Palestine, England, China, Japan, the United States and Canada.

Therefore Ruhanea became convinced that a New Civilization was becoming established by this New Manifestation, Bahá'u'lláh, Who states, "Concerning the progress of existence and the development of men We have revealed that which is the greatest Door to the training of the people of the world."

Though the Religious Drift has found its goal in satisfying realization, yet the soul of Ruhanea continues and will ever continue its quest for greater and ever greater understanding of how best to serve in building the New World Order in this world and in all the worlds to come.

She sees the picture of the world today as does Edward Carpenter, the English poet, in these vivid lines:—

"Slowly out of the ruins of the Past,

Like a young fern-frond uncurling out of its own brown litter;

Out of the litter of a decaying society;

Out of the confused mass of broken down creeds, customs, ideals;

Out of the distrust, unbelief, dishonesty, and fear;

Out of the cant of commerce,

The crocodile sympathy of nation with nation;

The despair and unbelief possessing all society—

The rich and poor, the educated and the ignorant, the money-lender and the wage slave, the artist and the washerwoman alike;

All feel the terrible strain and tension of—

The Modern Problem.

Out of the litter and muck of

A decaying world;

Lo, Even so!

I see a new life Arise!!!

"Man must cut himself free from all prejudice and from the result of his own imagination so that he may be able to search for Truth unhindered. Truth is one in all religions, and by means of it the unity of the world can be realized. * * * No one Truth can contradict another Truth. . . . Be free from prejudice, so will you love the Sun of Truth from whatsoever point in the horizon it may arise. . . . We must be willing to clear away all that we have previously learned, all that would clog our steps on the way to Truth; we must not shrink if necessary from beginning our education all over again. We must not allow our love for any one religion or any one Personality to so blind our eyes that we become fettered by superstition! When we are freed from all these bonds, seeking with liberated minds, then shall we be able to arrive at our goal."

'Abdu'l-Bahá.

WORLD THOUGHT AND PROGRESS

"THERE IS NO REASON to believe that one race is by nature so much more intelligent, endowed with greater will power, or emotionally more stable than others that the difference would materially influence its culture.

Nor is there any good reason to believe that the differences between races are so great that the descendants of mixed marriages would be inferior to their parents.

Biologically, there is neither good reason to object to family close inbreeding in healthy groups, nor to intermingling of the principal races. I believe that the present state of our knowledge justifies us to say, that, while individuals differ, biological differences between races are small. * * *

What is happening in America now is the repetition on a larger scale and in a shorter time of what happened in Europe during the centuries when the people of North Europe were not yet firmly attached to the soil. * * *

The high nobility of all parts of Europe can be shown to be of very mixed origin."—Professor Franz Boas, Opening as President the Summer Session of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.—New York Times.

"NEITHER religion, statesmanship, nor diplomacy having yet been able to prevent war, many of us ask ourselves, "Will it ever be possible to establish permanent peace among the nations of the world?" Some of the world's deepest students of the subject answer, "Yes; but only through lasting universal friendship based on confidence, understanding, tolerance and justice." However, such friendship is not possible until the war instinct which is innate in man and which since the day of his creation has been one of the dominant influences of his existence, has been brought under complete control. As every student of the biology of war knows, all wars, whatever their immediate causes, germinate from the war instinct in man, which, as history shows, when aroused causes him to make scraps of paper out of all peace treaties and other antiwar pacts made when the doves of peace are cooing. Only through the slow processes of education can the war instinct ever be controlled. But the time to educate man is when he is a child. So, we see that the solution of the age-old problem of the abolition of war is to be found only in the education of the childhood of the earth in world friendship founded on confidence, understanding, tolerance and justice. . . ."—Col. James A. Moss, U. S. Army, Retired. Washington Post.

"THE COMING of the Chinese students to the United States constitutes a part of the migration of Chinese students to the western world. The Opium Wars not only broke China's political and economic isolation, but also disturbed her intellectual complacency. The students began to see that the ancient Chinese culture was not adequate to enable China to struggle for existence during the modern period. Consequently, they set out to discover the secret power of a modern nation. . . .

“Whether the Chinese students who have studied in America constitute a helpful or harmful influence in China, one may confidently believe that this group has at least contributed to the intelligent mutual understanding between America and China, that it has also acted as a stimulant in the modern Chinese intellectual life, and that it has produced a few leaders for the political and social reconstruction of China.” Chih Meng, Associate Director, China Institute in America. In the Institute of International Education Bulletin.

IF NEGRO business is to succeed, it must become part of the business of the community. This does not mean that the Negro must not patronize his own concerns; but that is only an expedient. There must be found some more secure basis of growth. We can have no separate life in any field of endeavor.

We must not bar the Negro from any field of activity. Don't hand the Negro education with one hand and withdraw economic opportunity with the other. . . .

There can be no satisfactory life for the Negro except as part of the unified life of the United States. If this is to become so, the problem of race prejudice must be attacked from the top to the bottom. The Negro must be trained for any job, anywhere, and be allowed to do anything anybody else does.

Closing schools of engineering to him will never open the field of engineering to him. Perhaps, in the upper levels of our economic or industrial life is where it may be easier to break through, and those who do break through can help the masses break through at the bottom. —*Dr. Will W. SACRAMENTO, May 23 (A.P.)—Mme. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, world-famed singer, has rebuked war mothers here because of their protests concerning appearance of foreign-blooded children at a recital marking dedication of a memorial auditorium.

City Manager James Dean told Mme. Schumann-Heink some of the mothers had protested the scheduled appearance last night of Chinese, Japanese, Negro, Portuguese and Italian children on the stage. The women thought such a “melting pot” aggregation was not representative of the American race.

Last night the singer turned her back upon her adult audience and, facing the bank of well-scrubbed black, yellow and white faces, crooned a mother's lullaby especially for them. Then the children sang “The Star-Spangled Banner,” with her.

When Mme. Schumann-Heink finished her singing and after the applause died down she stepped to the footlights and said:

“As a war mother I know what it means to suffer. I gave five sons, four to Uncle Sam and one to his old fatherland.

“It is up to the war mothers to teach their children the love of law—and not make a difference between black or yellow or brown or white skins.

“Don't make a difference in race or creed. You make war among yourselves — through your children.”—Washington Post.

Excerpts from an address by Miss Hiroe Ishiwata in the International Oratorical Contest, Honolulu, April 10, 1931. Miss Ishiwata is the first Japanese college girl to enter an international contest in a foreign country.

PERHAPS it would not be without significance to speak on this occasion about the Japanese women, their ideals, and the problems they are confronted with today.

We have little to say about the upper class women, because they are comparatively few in number and most of them confine their career to the home life. What we are interested in are the women belonging to the middle and the lower classes. Their scope of activity is indeed great. And the women's problems that confront us now chiefly concern those classes.

From the occupational point of view there are of course a great many varieties of women. The kinds of work they are engaged in are ever increasing. There are about 29 million women in Japan, and out of them about ten million are in occupations of one kind or another. . . .

The number of women who aspire to study the English language is rapidly increasing in recent years. Their end is not only to broaden their own intellectual fields, but to use it as a means of the international purpose for their movements.

A number of girls go to America and European countries to study and come back with new assurance as well as intellectual power for fighting further for the cause of womanhood in Japan. We love and respect those western countries and are ever ready to welcome everything from them. And why? Because we know that it gives us the essential power for living and teaches us to know ourselves and awake to ourselves.

The best thing we can get from the western civilization is neither the splendid buildings nor the smart style of clothes, but the very sense of democracy. This is very simple to say and has been said thousands of times before. And yet the more we think about it, the more fully we can appreciate it.

It is this spirit that has opened our way to emancipation. It has at least suggested to us the way to our true happiness. It has inspired the doll-like women of the Meiji Era into taking up a new career to do something good of their own will. In fact, considerable changes have already been made by the hands of women.

Let me take an example from the Women's Suffrage Movement in Japan. Of all the problems confronting the women of Japan today, it is now the focus of keen interests and attention. It is a movement of the new womanhood of modern Japan to become established legally in the full sense of the word as human beings, women and citizens.

It is again a movement of self-awakened women of new Japan to regain their old lost right of freedom, equality, and activity. The movement had gradually developed first among the minority of self-awakened women, and later, fusing itself deeper and wider until at last it has become very recently a movement more universal in nature. . . .

Not only in the suffrage movement, but in various other ways can be seen the influence of the democratic spirit upon the women's life in general. . . .

Democracy aims at giving happiness to the mass instead of a selected few. Of course, we still have a lot of things to do and must be ready to undergo many difficulties to realize in our everyday life the true cause of democracy we have learned from the West. Japan is further on the way to westernization than any other Asiatic country; compared with others she is almost a western country now.

It does not follow, however, that she will lose what she has inherited. No, we remain Japanese at soul, but Japanese of this day well impregnated with American and European influences so that we can understand their ideals and serve to better our international relationship by increasing mutual friendship and good will.—Mid-Pacific Magazine, official organ of The Pan-Pacific Union, Honolulu.

O LIGHT REVEALING

Hast seen the Light? Know, then, thou hast found peace
 Of body, mind and soul; thy spirit once released
 From out the thralldom of material life
 Lives only on the heights; gone is all strife,
 All hatred, envy, fear, while only love is rife
 Within thee; mysteries are anon to thee revealed
 Which, e'er thy spirit eyes were opened were fast sealed,
 Not only as regards the things of earth,
 But Heaven as well; for e'en in thy rebirth
 Thou art transformed, illumined, potent, free,
 To greet thy Lord and Master, who sees thee
 Not as the miserable, wind-tossed grain of dust thou wert,
 But as a soul transfigured, pure, with heavenly spirit girt,
 Which in the direful battles with thy foes wast hurt
 But never conquered; for upon thy path the Light
 Hast been made manifest to thee—gone is the night!

JUSTICE

JUSTICE is not limited; it is a universal quality. Its operation must be carried out in all classes, from the highest to the lowest. Justice must be sacred and the rights of all the people be considered. Desire for others only that which you desire for yourselves; then shall we rejoice in the Sun of Justice which shines from the horizon of God.

“Each man has been placed in a post of honor which he must not desert. An humble workman who commits an injustice is as much to blame as a renowned tyrant. Thus we all have our choice between justice and injustice. I hope that each one of you will become just and direct your thoughts toward the unity of mankind; that you will never harm your neighbors nor speak ill of any one; that you will respect the rights of all men and be more concerned for the interests of others than for your own.”

“How shall we attain the reality of knowledge? By the breaths and promptings of the Holy Spirit which is light and knowledge itself. Through It the human mind is quickened and fortified into true conclusions and perfect knowledge.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

GENIUSES are people of strong intuitions and pronounced affinities. In this respect, as in many others, they are androgynous. We find in the poets such as Goethe, Shelley, Tennyson, a power almost subconscious of encompassing truth. These men, from sheer poetic insight into life, previsioned the theory of evolution which scientists later built up as a result of enormous amounts of research.

Intuition has long been realized as an important factor in life. It is a recognized trait of the feminine temperament, by means of which women seem able to arrive at just conclusions by some immediate process of a mysterious kind. It is not the laborious process of ratiocination which the male usually follows. Yet so clear-cut and directive is this experience, that many men find it but wisdom on their part to follow these guidances of their women-folk.

WHAT is this power which wells up from subconscious depths? Is it the deep-self within us, possessed of larger powers than our conscious self! Or is it a contact made with some outside Force?

Plato's theory of inspiration is worth our attention here. No greater mentality has existed upon this earth. Philosopher, poet, and seer, we cannot afford to treat slightly his belief, expressed in Phaedrus, as to how inspirational ideas come—as an intermittent illumination of man's inner being from the world of Reality. In this archetypal World of the Ideal—Truth, Beauty, and Goodness exist in their sublime perfection. To men who are sensitive and susceptible, visions come from time to time from this creative World. The poet and seer are seized by a Force outside themselves, greater than themselves, and thus are able to give to humanity nobler visions of truth than are those who endeavor by mere ratiocination to puzzle out the nature of life and the universe.

MODERNISTIC philosophy has tended to discard the idealism of Plato and to substitute a realistic attitude toward the universe. Pragmatism, as enunciated by James and Dewey, asserts that there is no Ideal World, that there is no perfection anywhere as yet in the universe. What we have as the present stage of our existence is a universe in the making. This universe is what we make it, no more and no less.

So practical a philosophy has found ardent acceptance in a country like America, dedicated to progress through activity. The idea of a universe already perfect appears to the pragmatists an idea stagnant and displeasing. But a universe which calls for heroic effort on the part of man, if perfection is to be achieved, is something both stimulating and inspiring to courage and daring.

HOWEVER, IS IT not possible that both concepts may be true? That there may exist somewhere perfection, although the material universe as a phenomenal concatenation of events is still in the making?

Recent investigations and discoveries of scientists, both in biology and in astro-physics, more and more bring to the front the concept of a universe progressing definitely according to some plan. The Universe is in the making, that is true. But its progress is so orderly, so marvelous both in microcosm and macrocosm, as to induce a belief on the part of many of the world's leading scientists that there is behind this cosmic development a Planner and a Plan.

Among others, Michael Pupin presents vividly this idea in his "New Reformation,"—that there is an everpresent, evercreating Force in the universe, harnessing multiplicity into a working unity.

Is it not possible, therefore, that in the main the concepts both of idealism and of pragmatism may be true and capable of harmonious adjustment each to the other? The Universe is in the making, yes. And we have both opportunity and obligation toward its perfecting. But the Plan is there, already existing, and when we strive wisely we work in accordance with the blue-prints of Destiny.

FROM THIS POINT of view a genius might be considered as an individual nearer than others to the Creative Force. He is a sensitive mirror, reflecting Light—a radio vibrating more clearly than others to messages from the Cosmos. Buck expresses this idea in his "Cosmic Consciousness," in which he described the lives of poets and thinkers whom he believes to have been inspired by contact with the Cosmic Force. Such men as Francis Bacon, Isaac Newton, William Blake, Walt Whitman, were according to his belief sensitive instruments vibrating to cosmic rays.

'Abdu'l-Bahá, interpreter and Exemplar of the world-wide Bahá'í Movement, uses a remarkable symbol to illustrate how these cosmic rays reach man in the form of spiritual and creative guidance. The divine force back of the universe which men call God is to man incomprehensible and impenetrable. By its very nature this Infinity which comprises all existence can never be directly perceived by the finite. But Its force reaches man, as the force of the sun reaches the earth, by emanation and radiation. The Spirit which contacts with the spirit of man is this radiant message from the Divine Reality.

If the mirror of man's heart be pure, the light reflects strongly from it. But if the mirror of the heart be dusty, little reflection is possible. That is why some individuals reflect greatly the creative force of the universe, and others but slightly.

This spiritual force, says 'Abdul-

Bahá, "is the energizing factor in the life of man." By means of it are manifested the various expressions of man's genius in the realms of art, of knowledge, of science, of universal achievement.

The most perfect mirrors known to man are those great Teachers who are pure channels for the Divine Force—a Moses, a Buddha, a Christ, a Bahá'u'lláh.

WHAT IS the practical application of such a doctrine for us as individuals? It is this: that we should consciously strive to increase our capacity for becoming channels of this Creative Force. We should definitely seek inspiration and guidance in all our undertakings, in order that we may reflect Beauty, Goodness, and Truth from a Source higher than that of our own individuality. Thus, as it were, we become workers for the Divine Planner in building a better universe. We have found the Source of inspiration. We have become agents of that Power back of evolution which is the energizing factor making continuously for progress throughout the Cosmos.

IT IS NOTICEABLE that the genius achieves those things which lie within his powers with apparent ease. He may work with industry. But it is not industry, as Anatole France has pointed out, which creates great literature. It is not the study of rhetoric. It is not scholarship nor continuous application which have created those great works of literature which still delight the human heart. No, in addition to all these, there was some added factor, some elusive force, which being absent in other men makes impossible such achievement on the part of ordinary mortals, no matter what the effort put out.

What is the lesson for us to derive from this? It is not necessarily discouragement, nor resignation to a life of mediocrity. It is rather a hint to follow what guidance is granted us, and strive with all the power that is within us to find that line of work which expresses our own innate powers. For when we are doing just the thing we are most fitted for, we too shall find inspiration in our work; and shall achieve with relative ease and joy, as does the genius, each according to our talent.

The genius has strong affinities for people, for things, and for ideas. He seems to possess intuitive power of reaching out and absorbing from the universe that which he needs for his self-development and for his work. Just as each flower knows how to absorb from the soil its own hues and fragrance, so man should be able to put his roots down into the depths and bring up easily and joyously the nourishment needed for his particular fruition.

This is what I call living creatively. Such a creative life is not dependent upon the magnitude of our talents, but only upon the perfect expression of that which we have within us. It is a matter of quality, not of quantity. We can all live creatively. And we shall be doing so when we turn our mirrors to the Sun and reflect to the utmost of our capacity.

EDUCATION BEYOND THE CURRICULUM

DALE S. COLE

"O people of God! Be not occupied with yourselves. Be intent on the betterment of the world and training of the nations."—Bahá'u'lláh.

IN these trying days, when the solutions to the many complex problems confronting humanity seem to be so elusive and difficult of attainment, our attention is drawn again and again to the need for education in many phases of life. A number of "ways out" have been suggested, most of them involve profound changes in our ideas. Many traditional viewpoints seem to be no longer tenable. Precedent, as bearing upon knotty questions, is either lacking entirely or is completely inadequate. These changes of attitude and thought concerning the relationships of life involve the necessity for education, and there are great objectives, international, national and individual involved in the remolding of human thought.

Of course the basic and fundamental requirement is for spiritual education for "religion is the greatest instrument for the order of the world and the tranquility of all existent beings."* When the population of the world is truly spiritually alive, many of the dilemmas which beset our statesmen and business men now, will disappear or be automatically solved. But we cannot hope to stir the world instantaneously into a realization of the significance of spiritual laws. Shoghi Effendi has warned us that the complete working out of the Divine Plan can come only in the "fullness of time," but this does not mean that some improvement cannot be made in the meantime.

Conditions can be made much better than they are and still be far short of ultimate fulfillment. And so it behooves us all to do what we can for immediate relief without losing sight of the fact that "the Most Great Peace" will come.

With such assurances of final success as we have, the hard work of the present should not be too discouraging. Knowing, as we do, that there are potent and irresistible spiritual forces at work, we can be more patient with the trial and error methods so commonly used, and with actions handicapped by traditional animosities. Even though we flounder about apparently, there are strong undercurrents in the right direction. Our opportunity is to recognize these undercurrents and to direct our efforts, however feeble, in the same direction.

With new and unprecedented difficulties before us, affecting every walk of life, there is an increasing need for education; education first and primarily in the great spiritual truths, but education secondarily in those less important but related affairs of life with which we have to deal in every-day intercourse.

"It is impossible to reform these violent overwhelming evils, except the peoples of the world become united upon a certain issue or under the shadow of one religion"

EDUCATION may be divided into two broad classifications; that which is given to us from outside agencies such as schools and experience; and that which we strive for ourselves from within. Both are necessary and both involve different degrees of individual effort. It is one thing to attend a lecture or to have some hard fact of life forced upon us through some bitter experience, and quite another to strive continuously for the illumination of the soul.

* Words of Paradise, Bahá'u'lláh.

Education involves certain obligations. Those who have knowledge of ways and means of betterment are most certainly obligated, by the very possession of such knowledge, to use it and disseminate it, for the good of humanity.

We are instructed to "hold fast to the rope of consultation, and decide upon and execute that which is conducive to the people's security, affluence, welfare and tranquility; for if matters be arranged otherwise it will lead to discord and tumult."*

It is interesting to note that there are certain analogies between the struggle business is going through for economic stability and the struggle which is going on, generally unappreciated, for spiritual advancement. Perhaps "analogy" is not the right word to use in this sense, for without doubt the superficial ills of industry, commerce, and politics arise from deep seated spiritual maladjustments. However, business men are voicing opinions and suggestions for remedial measures which are not without significance.

For instance, Norval A. Hawkins, in an article entitled "The Way Back" in Nation's Business for July, suggests that "Business as a whole can be restored only by way of recovery of individual institutions." And again—"So the whole gigantic problem becomes a question of individual initiative and energy, resting upon the resourcefulness and courage of some one man or group of men at the head of each enterprise." Another statement has a very familiar ring, ". . . the progress of the individual business institutions will act as a leaven, raising the whole mass."

What is he advising but a stringent re-education of the modern business institution within itself? He anticipates that "multiplication of effects will bring about the cure."

This is sound advice and just as applicable to the social and spiritual problems of the world as it is to business, in fact, one finds these very thoughts in the writings of 'Abdul-Bahá with reference to the necessity of every informed individual arising to spread the Glad Tidings.

Mr. Hawkins also says, "Given ten such businesses today and a hundred next month and a thousand the following month, each within itself solving its own problems, and general prosperity will be the inevitable result of such unit success."

This reminds us of the suggestion often heard in Bahá'í circles, that if each believer confirmed but one soul a year, spiritual welfare would soon be assured for the whole world.

The "unit success" of the individual in educating himself spiritually would soon be reflected in numbers being attracted to the real solution.

BUT HARD as it may be to achieve

* Tablet of the World, Baha'u'llah.

sufficient education of the right kind to be really effective as a small but potent individual force, it is first to know and then to do. In other words, we are taught that we must solve our own problems first, we must be illumined and understand before we can expect to pass our knowledge and inspiration to others. Our training must be so thorough as to be apparent in our lives. Small forces, acting in concert, may move mountains. The great force of expanding steam is due to the harmonious action of numberless particles. We are promised too, help from God, so that what may seem to us a very small force, may be very effective.

And so, while we cannot all sit on committees handling national and international affairs, we can educate ourselves to see the problems in their true perspective, in the light of the wisdom of the Manifestation of God, and to teach this viewpoint to others. Opinions change rapidly these days and we do not know what effect a little impetus in the right direction may have or how soon it may burst forth collectively in support of some new and progressive action toward the betterment of the world.

Mr. W. R. Ingalls, writing in the July Journal of the Franklin Institute, on "The Wealth of Nations" and speaking of the paradox of poverty amid plenty says that ". . . the correctives, which appear to be of psychological and political nature, may be extremely difficult to bring about. What we need more than anything else is a restoration of the principle of authority, by which I mean the leadership of intelligence."

Now a leadership of intelligence probably will not emanate from some uninformed source. Setting aside the possibility of genius, the very meaning of the word "intelligence" suggests a well balanced view of the problems and clear sighted vision. Setting aside also the possibility that some one great leader may arise to lead business and politics out of the morass, the responsibility falls on lesser shoulders, in short on those spiritually educated individuals whose collective efforts integrated can bring results, with the help of God.

AGAIN and again we return to the importance of the individual and his education, education in the broad sense, for a village, a county, a state or a nation is naught but a collection of individuals. Collective opinion is a powerful force. If it be the correct opinion it is almost irresistible. Correct opinions are the result of education. How great is the responsibility of those who have knowledge for imparting it to those who have it not! Never was greater accent placed on the need for proper instruction, of teaching, of education.

Education, in this sense, is not restricted to the usual curricula—it means a knowledge of life and how best to live it that the world may progress in accordance with the Divine Plan. Education in this sense is independent of time. We may strive for months or even years to attain to a well balanced, intelligent, spiritual station from which we may see things as they are, while another may attain this bounty in the twinkling of an eye.

Mr. Will Durant, in Adventures

in Genius, quotes an interesting and relevant passage from Confucius:

“The illustrious ancients, when they wished to make clear and propagate the highest virtues in the world, put their states in proper order. Before putting their states in proper order, they regulated their families. Before regulating their families, they cultivated their own selves. Before cultivating their own selves they perfected their souls. Before perfecting their souls, they tried to be sincere in their thoughts, they extended to the utmost their knowledge. Such investigation of knowledge lay in the investigation of things, and in seeing them as they really were. When things were thus investigated, knowledge became complete. When knowledge was complete, their thoughts became sincere. When their thoughts were sincere, their souls became perfect. When their souls were perfect, their own selves became cultivated. When their selves were cultivated, their families became regulated. When their families were regulated, their states came to be put into proper order. When their states were in proper order, then the whole world became peaceful and happy.”

However circular this may be, it is certainly comprehensive.

As Mr. J. M. Keynes, in a British magazine recently pointed out—“The prevailing world depression, the enormous anomaly of unemployment in a world full of wants, the disastrous mistakes we have made, blind us to what is going on under the surface, to the true interpretation of the trend of things.”

The trends of social and political progress are intimately associated with the economic pressures and 'Abdul-Bahá has informed us that the whole question, in the final analysis, is a spiritual one. This is the true interpretation, and while it may be a little difficult to see the strong tide of advancement, below the surface ripples, nevertheless it is there and at work.

“O ye sons of intelligence! The thin eyelid prevents the eye from seeing the world and what is contained therein. Then think of the result when the curtain of greed covers the sight of the heart.”

“O people! The darkness of greed and envy obscures the light of the soul as the cloud prevents the penetration of the sun's rays.”*

IT MAKES little difference whether we consider that business is finally educating itself or whether enlightenment is being forced upon it by the exigencies of the times, it is believed in many circles that its salvation must come from within itself, probably through stringently corrective practices.

Such sentiments being expressed in regard to mundane economic affairs, where the applications may be tangible and practical, ought to open the minds of the traditionally-bound to the fact that if business salvation must come from within itself, so must individual enlightenment shine from the inner being, and that if world economic recovery depends first upon individual institutions, likewise the more important spiritual progress must begin with the individual.

Two opportunities seem to be presented; one of using such business arguments as illustrative of spiritual methods and necessities, thus providing a unique and relevant approach; and secondly, of educating the individual to his importance and responsibility in any scheme of general improvement.

* Tablet to Zoroastrians, Baha'u'llah.

It is quite evident that the longer business drags along, the more dangerous become the possible social and political implications. This does not mean that spiritual progress depends upon prosperity. There seems to be nothing like adversity to bind people together and if out of the very necessity of the situation, nations are drawn into a closer harmony of action, their re-education in co-operation will recompense the world, in part at least, for its present agony.

Necessity is not only the mother of invention but it is also a great educating force. When old ways seem entirely inadequate in dealing with a desperate situation, we become less hesitant about changing our ideas. Necessity may be a stern task-master and the experience encountered a cruel discipline, but it seems that humanity must be faced with some grave crisis, before it is willing to avail itself of solutions based on progressive and intelligent analysis.

As evidence of this, we are hearing a great deal just now about reducing the amount of money spent on armament. This now seems to be the logical and intelligent step following the debt adjustments. Incomes of creditor nations are reduced by the suspension of payments. As the administrative costs of government are increasing, the loss of income from abroad must be made up internally by taxation. Already peoples are groaning under tax burdens in many places. If the governments stop expending such huge sums on armament, the absence of the debt payments will not necessarily result in increased taxation. This is pure business reasoning but it is a strong force towards the limitation of armaments, an end greatly to be desired. Is this not a step in the re-education of the world?

Limitation of armaments has been sponsored by thinking people for some time, as one means of eliminating the possibility of wars, but as such it has met obstacles in the old animosities and jealousies between nations. Now when economic affairs are in dire straits, the world accepts with some complacency, the suggestion that a holiday in armament construction is the intelligent epilogue to debt adjustment.

Such great changes of thought, when accepted by the leaders of a nation, are usually appropriated by the masses without any great resistance. This emphasizes the responsibility of the leaders. One or two or three leaders by accepting and sponsoring these epochal revisions, are the cause of untold numbers revising their own ideas, of opening their minds and hearts to progressive influences. On the other hand, these few leaders are, in many instances, swayed by what they believe public opinion to be. Public opinion is the synthesis of the opinions of numbers of individuals. Only in grave crises dares the small group of leaders to act without consideration of it.

IN THE present situation of the world, the problems are so complex and far reaching, that there is no concerted body of public belief discernible. This is partly because individuals have not, for various reasons, informed themselves of the facts involved. Then, we have habitually leaned on tradition and precedent and today these are falling props. Many people do not know which way to turn in their personal perplexities and consequently are more willing than usual to follow intelligent leadership in national and international affairs.

Education is being forced upon us. We have learned and are learning many things in this country at least. For instance, we know now that we are not economically independent of the rest of the world. We know now that high wages will not insure uninterrupted prosperity. We are about convinced that no country can be made to pay that which it has not and that which it has no opportunity of earning. We are not so proud of our business machine with its glaring faults. We have entirely overlooked the fact that "the ultimate and final cure is in the things men plant in or dig out of the ground and the thoughts which they think in their heads." We have misconstrued the meaning of wages, not realizing that "wages are fundamentally a measure of exchange of services." We have not appreciated that "while an employer may dispense wages in currency in an envelope it is in the final analysis the consumer who pays and that the payment is in exchange of one kind of service for another." We are not very proud of the condition of poverty amid plenty. The evils of widespread unemployment appal us.

Despite our business acumen, things are badly out of adjustment economically, socially, politically and religiously. There is serious criticism of the situation where few have and many have not. The old skeleton in the closet, the distribution of wealth, is coming in for another examination. We are less fearful of rattling his bones than formerly, for we have learned that widespread purchasing power is a boon to the standard of living.

But perhaps the thing that astonishes many of us the most is that trade no longer seems to be the end, but merely a means to the end, and many are wondering what the real end may be. Certainly it is not the attainment of material wealth for only in rare instances does that bring happiness. Perhaps it is leisure, but if so, leisure to do what? Perhaps it is power, but if so, how shall it be directed and to what ends?

Very little thought is sufficient to impress upon us that something very fundamental is wrong throughout the world, and that the solution lies in the spiritual education of the individuals, the nations, the world, in the knowledge and application of the Divine laws.

But lest we lose heart in individual, national and international educational endeavors, let us remember that we have been assured that the time is coming when "the world will be filled with science, with the knowledge of the reality of the mysteries of beings, and with the knowledge of God."*

THIS HANDFUL OF DUST

MARZIEH K. NABIL

ACCORDING to an aged religious official in Constantinople, who wore a lavender velvet skull-cap and had never spared himself wrinkles in toiling after knowledge, Eve was made out of Adam's rib for this reason: that all human-kind might be known to have sprung from one father. He felt that had Eve been specially created as was Adam, some amongst men might have gone back to their mother, taken her side, established and maintained a duality. As it was, Eve herself was only a component of Adam, the world had only one parent, and from the beginning the principle of unity was asserted.

College-bred Westerners who profess modernity may be only amused at such a statement. Since Darwin, the Book of Genesis is not often read in non-sectarian colleges, except in Bible courses, where it is treated at arm's length, or on Sunday evenings, if chapel attendance is compulsory. Conditions indicate that the professorial world is in doubt regarding how to proceed in the matter. The situation is almost embarrassing, because 19th century science has proved that the events related in Genesis cannot be read literally, and the professorial world is still so taken up with this discovery that it will not countenance the possibility of spiritual significances in the age-old record. On the other hand, mothers who grew up in a Mathew Arnold tradition desire the Bible for their offspring because of its literary beauty and its cultural value; hence the Bible courses, where the sacred lines are read as gingerly as possible, and their meaning contradicted by the biology across the hall.

Our professors' attempts at releasing their charges from orthodox faiths are of course sincere; except for the old-school pedagogues, dreaming their lives away in a mid-Victorian afterglow, every instructor feels that he must share with his classes, however implicitly, what he considers to be true; and so he gives to them the doctrines of our present age, an age bitterly disillusioned since the 19th century struck down, in a generation or so, the truths by which humanity had lived two thousand years. So much was then found untrue that human beings, with their characteristic exaggeration, are now inclined to deny everything. One remembers the modern child who not only did not believe in Santa Claus—he did not even believe there was a Lindbergh. At best, the most educated and tolerant of our contemporaries outside of Bahá'í communities consider everything to be relative, shifting; at worst, we see humanity embracing the most fantastic faiths conceivable, and reestablishing the medieval criterion of "I believe it because it is impossible"—until, with all our modern illumination, we find such things as stargazing and celery water elevated almost to a principle of life. Society, then, offers countless examples of the educated, who believe nothing, and of the quasi-educated, who believe anything, providing it is not true.

To Bahá'is, the Book of Genesis embodies profound spiritual realities, and is sacred. We may, then, accept the words of the old wise man of Constantinople, who sat under a shaft of sunlight in his darkened room, and said that all mankind were born from a single father. It is interesting in this connection to remember Darwin's concluding remarks in the Origin of Species, to the effect that animals and plants are respectively descended from at most four or five progenitors, and that both are possibly issued from one prototype. Here were two men, examples intellectually of countless others; one deep in the lore of the Torah, a follower of the Book; the other at variance with orthodoxy, interested only in natural phenomena, opposed to a teleological view of the universe (writing, for example, "I am in an utterly hopeless muddle. I cannot think that the world . . . is the result of chance; and yet I cannot look at each separate thing as the result of Design"); and yet each coming after years of search to a doctrine of original unity, however differently regarded: the priest rejoicing in the knowledge that human kind are one family; the scientist interested in what he considered a true explanation of origins, and saying, although he was probably not much concerned with any spiritual implications which others might draw from his work, that his theory and its connotations apparently "accords better with what we know of the laws impressed on matter by the Creator."

Whatever our attitude toward the human race may be, it is evident that thought must bring us to a belief in the basic oneness of humanity. Such a belief is an indispensable corner stone in any ideal life-structure that we may build; we cannot symmetrically lodge in the divine pattern of the world unless our thought is founded on the knowledge that the human family is one; that at most existing differences are superficial, indicate varying opportunity, varying degrees of adjustment; and that, stirred by a new heavenly force, every race will arise at last to fulfill its promised destiny. For within every race is latent the power to develop toward perfection, and wherever there is man, there is potential reflection of divinity. 'Abdu'l-Bahá says that "The greatest bestowal of God to man is the capacity to attain human virtues." He does not restrict this capacity to white men or yellow men, or to any so-called superior race; he tells us this bestowal is granted to "man." We must, then, honor the gift of God to man, and live in the certainty that all human beings are divinely endowed, however various may be the expressions of this endowment.

The understanding of human oneness is thus an all-important article of successful belief, but should it remain merely a philosophical conception, it is of little practical value. The violence of modern race-hatred is not to be quieted by the mere reiteration of an axiom. Our library shelves have been lined for centuries with splendid thoughts, and the dust is thick upon them. It is for this reason that Bahá'u'lláh has made it incumbent on His followers to live the principle of world unity, saying, "It behooveth you to be even as one soul, in such wise that ye may walk with the same feet, eat with the same mouth and dwell in the same land; that from your inmost being, by your deeds and actions, the signs of oneness and the essence of detachment may be made manifest." Bahá'í communities include members of every race and color, and Bahá'ís are forbidden to turn away from any human being; they are bidden, rather, to "see the face of God in every face."

This practicing of oneness comes often as a shock to those who are unacquainted with the Bahá'í Cause; such people express a physical aversion even to sitting in the same room with members of some race or races which they are accustomed to disdain; they feel this physical distaste to be in a measure even divinely ordained by the Creator; something on the order of that other physical manifestation, the antipathy to snakes, which many cherish in a spirit of righteousness because of what happened in Eden. As a matter of fact, the dislike of one race for another, far from being an ordained protection to the chosen and justly imposed punishment on the rejected, is the accumulated result of an age-long practice of tyranny; we are averse to those whom we have mistreated, just as we love those to whom we have been kind; the first recall to us our ugly and inharmonious action, while the second reminds us of happiness which came from fulfillment of function; it would seem that service is prerequisite to love. Again, dislike of the unknown is a cause of racial antipathy, and explains why people select some races to accept and others to repel. Moreover, a scandalous tradition grown up around a race and fostered by enemies often prevents the welcome of the victimized. Most important of all, perhaps, as a source of race hatred, is a feeling that members of some other race are unclean; uncleanness is often the greatest barrier between human beings; the idea of uncleanness is so closely associated with hate that every language includes in its vocabulary of profanities terms imputing uncleanness to those detested; and every people feels that other peoples are relatively dirty. The stressing of immaculate cleanliness in the Bahá'í teaching is thus of great importance: an unclean humanity can never be united. It is interesting that when a Westerner learns of the Bahá'í injunctions regarding cleanliness he usually comments on the great benefit to Easterners of this teaching; and in the same way, the Easterner, often a Muhammadan who washes five times a day, (whatever the water) feels that at last the West is to be clean. In any event, an attempt to adopt the Bahá'í standards of cleanliness is highly spiritualizing, one knows that future peoples will be dazzlingly clean.

'Abdu'l-Bahá tells us that "Man can withstand anything except that which is divinely intended and indicated for the age and its requirements." Conditions imply that the asserting of human oneness is become indispensable to livable existence, and we may therefore confidently believe that a time of perfect human solidarity is upon us. Our love for others may no longer be selective—selective love is indirect hatred. 'Abdu'l-Bahá explains that "When reality envelops the soul of man love is possible," and by reality is intended the Word of God as revealed through the great teachers who appear among men when hearts have faded and minds have crystalized in cruelty. He says, regarding human relations, "Never become angry with one another . . . Love the creatures for the sake of God and not for themselves. You will never become angry or impatient if you love them for the sake of God . . . the imperfect eye beholds imperfections," and again ". . . if you have an enemy, consider him not as an enemy. Do not simply be long-suffering, nay, rather, love him . . . Do not even say that he is your enemy. Do not see any enemies." This love, this centrifugal power by which hostility will be destroyed is impelling to its service people of every religion and belief. This love is neither a pasty sentimentality nor an hysteria, but an unfaltering practice of waiting on humanity; and humanity is not a vague abstract with a capital "H," it is the family, and the man going by in the street, and the chance acquaintance. Such a service is not exercised with any hypocritical hope of reward either in this world or the next—one does not accept pay in exchange for love. The offering it, is considered a privilege, like a tree's privilege of blossoming when the spring comes.

A leading anthropologist recently advocated intermarriage between the white and yellow races, saying that the union would result in a superior type of human being. This statement is encouragingly in advance of popular belief, demonstrates that informed men are approaching a conception of human oneness; and since ideas born in the laboratory are found to influence people at large, and to show them where they have erred before, it is interesting that scientists are unsaying past criteria and substituting principles that are more in harmony with the spirit of a modern age. Again, psychologists find in their study of gifted children that many such cases are products of mixed races. Obviously, were humanity not essentially one, and were certain races inferior per se, a cross could not be beneficial, and results would belie the above conclusions. Furthermore, we have recently heard of some distinguished people among the professional class here in the United States who are beginning to advocate inter-marriage of colored and white races, asserting that in view of the outstanding progress among colored peoples, the old exclusion policy is no longer workable. Everywhere, apparently, the cause of human oneness is winning adherents, and the "forts of folly" are battered down.

ONENESS, of course should not be confused with sameness, which is a tedious, artificial thing, entirely alien to a world where no two grains of wheat have ever been alike. The peculiar curse of the times is an effort at standardization; savages wear top hats and gum is chewed on the Himalayas, and everyone is trying desperately to be like everyone else, or more so. This situation results from the advent of machines, and will doubtless be corrected little by little, as humanity grows accustomed to machines and has them subservient to beauty. A Persian cobbler never dares to make two shoes identical in every respect, because he thinks such an act will kill his wife, he may be harboring a superstition, but artistically he is quite sound. Individuality is precious and refreshing; the world presents subtle blends of endless variations; there must be orchids and hills, roads and tuberose, intimacy of sunlight and the mystery of fog. Spiritually, too, every human being has his candle to burn, his spire of blue incense smoke to offer as a gift and a worship in the temple of humanity. Does it matter what color are the fingers curved in prayer? Or whether the music be a honey-slow spiritual from Louisiana, or the flute-song of a Persian shepherd, watching in a turquoise dawn? The sacred gift of an obedient life is treasured-up for all eternity, and every giver is beloved. In this dawn of a new humanity, no one is rejected. There are no untouchables, no social lepers, no spurned and remnant peoples any more; 'Abdu'l-Bahá tells us that "The love of God haloes all created things."

The oneness of the world of humanity is to be established because it is God's will that "this handful of dust, the world," should be one home. No materialistic endeavors, however sincere, can be of any permanent assistance here, because they cannot stir the hearts of men; no ethical practical "system," no legions of deft clerks and catalogues of statistics, no cheques and after-dinner speeches, can right the hatred of one man for another. No smiles can cup the blood that centuries have shed. Only a God-inspired effort, functioning through the knowledge that all humanity is equally beloved, that all are precious in the sight of God and wear the emblems of His beauty, will build the alabaster cities where the races of the future are to live united.

'Abdu'l-Bahá tells us that "the fundamental teachings of Baha'u'lláh are the oneness of God and unity of mankind," and He says: "Just as the human spirit of life is the cause of co-ordination among the various parts of the human organism, the Holy Spirit is the controlling cause of the unity and co-ordination of mankind. That is to say, the bond or oneness of humanity cannot be effectively established save through the power of the Holy Spirit, for the world of humanity is a composite body and the Holy Spirit is the animating principle of its life." Let us, then, be servants of the Holy Spirit, and live hour by hour the knowledge that humanity is one.

WHY WE SHOULD INVESTIGATE

REALITY or truth is one, yet there are many religious beliefs, denominations, creeds and differing opinions in the world today. Why should these differences exist? Because they do not investigate and examine the fundamental unity which is one and unchangeable. If they seek the reality itself they will agree and be united; for reality is indivisible and not multiple. It is evident therefore that there is nothing of greater importance to mankind than the investigation of truth." * * *

“It is incumbent upon all mankind to investigate truth. If such investigation be made, all should agree and be united, for truth or reality is not multiple; it is not divisible. The different religions have one truth underlying them; therefore their reality is one.

“Each of the divine religions embodies two kinds of ordinances. The first are those which concern spiritual susceptibilities, the development of moral principles and the quickening of the conscience of man. These are essential or fundamental, one and the same in all religions, changeless and eternal, reality not subject to transformation. His Holiness Abraham heralded this reality, His Holiness Moses promulgated it and His Holiness Jesus Christ established it in the world of mankind. All the divine prophets and messengers were the instruments and channels of this same eternal, essential truth.

“The second kind of ordinances in the divine religions are those which relate to the material affairs of humankind. These are the material or accidental laws which are subject to change in each day of manifestation, according to exigencies of the time, conditions and differing capacities of humanity. . . .

“In brief; every one of the divine religions contains essential ordinances which are not subject to change, and material ordinances which are abrogated according to the exigencies of time. But the people of the world have forsaken the divine teachings and followed forms and imitations of the truth. Inasmuch as these human interpretations and superstitions differ, dissensions and bigotry have arisen and strife and warfare have prevailed. By investigating the truth or foundation of reality underlying their own and other beliefs, all would be united and agreed, for this reality is one; it is not multiple and not divisible.”

THE FUTURE RELIGION

HOWARD R. HURLBUT

This is the concluding article of a series showing the progressive continuity of Divine Revelation. Here the author describes the universal dispensation for the present and future ages known as the Bahá'í Movement.

WE cannot fail to sense how the great hearts of the Prophets pulsed with divine inspiration about the far-off events which were to be centered about the Holy Land:

Witness Isaiah (Chapter 53, verse 8): "He was taken from prison and from judgment—He was cut off and out of the land of the living—for the transgression of my people was he stricken."

Chapter 40, verse 5: "And the Glory of the Lord shall be revealed and all flesh shall see it together."

Daniel 12:1: "And at that time shall Michael stand up: and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time."

Jeremiah 11:15: "And the Lord shall utterly destroy the tongue of the Egyptian Sea, and with his mighty wind shall he shake his hand over the river, and shall smite it in the seven streams, and make men go over dry-shod." (In May, of 1901, a road of solid masonry bridged the Nile.)

Isaiah: 19:23: "In that day there shall be a highway out of Egypt to Assyria and the Assyrian shall come into Egypt and the Egyptians into Assyria."

(This rail highway was constructed by the engineering force of the British army during the great war to facilitate transportation to the seat of activities in the Mesopotamian area.)

Did Job write idly when through him God asks: "Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go and say unto thee 'Here we are?' " In these "last days" on the rise of the Báb, the first electric telegraph in the known history of the race declared the voice of the lightnings "Here we are!" The birth-date of 'Abdul-Bahá and the Declaration of the Báb bore the same date—May 23, 1844. Oddly enough, in that twenty-four hours, the first telegraph message—sent from Philadelphia to New York—carried the words from the 23rd verse of the 23rd chapter of Numbers, these being "What hath God wrought." More curious still is it that the Báb selected for His immediate messengers eighteen who first recognized the divinity of His mission, and these He called the "eighteen letters of the living." The message sent as a material response to the great spiritual Appearance contained exactly eighteen letters—carrying to the world the tidings of the new means for the transmission of news, —a medium which was to make possible the instant communication of Bahá'u'lláh's great Universal Message to the most remote areas of earth.

Don't permit yourself to be misled into the belief that the world-unrest is because of the degraded condition of society, its disregard for law, its immorality, its social and economic greed, its irreligion. If these alone were existent in the world, all this upset would not appear, because mankind would be gliding along smoothly in the rut of its own making. The disturbance is the result of the injection into the realm of consciousness of the Spirit of Truth, which is diametrically opposed to all these things which are unable to endure or to successfully combat it for any considerable period. It holds up to the soul the faultless mirror by which the soul witnesses the degree of its departure from the purity of the Divine Design.

When we transgress the Divine Law in our social relationships, that transgression becomes subject to the inviolable law of evolution which will carry it along to the apex of accomplishment, from which it must totter to its fall. Man cannot for long play fast and loose with the eternal verities, nor can he hope to build up for himself a spiritual station by an outward observance of religion and an inward violation of its principles.

The argument regarding the year 1844 as the time for the appearance of a prophesied Great One is not at all unique with the Bahá'is. That year, which is the year 1260 of the Muhammadans, had been looked forward to for a thousand years as the time when the missing Twelfth Imam Mahdi would reappear on the earth and establish the religion of Muhammad as the religion for all the world. That year, too, had been fixed upon by the sect called the "Millerites," as the time for the re-appearance of Jesus the Christ "riding on a cloud," and in their misconception of meanings of the Gospel they gave away their earthly possessions and robed in white on the New England hills they waited and prayed for this impossible demonstration of Divine purpose. Their error lay, not in computation of the time, but in their misinterpretation of the Word. The "cloud" carrying the Christ is the human body—the temple raised up from the body of the people, like themselves,—this element of sameness with humanity blinding the eye of the soul, so that it becomes attached to the physical temple and is oblivious to the Light within. As we have seen, however, the Christ did appear, and exactly on time, in accordance with the schedule of the Prophets, and was recognized and acclaimed by pure-hearted ones who were able to read the signs aright. When the Báb was inquisitioned by the mullahs of Islam as to His claims, He answered: "I am that One for whom you have waited and prayed for a thousand years."

In His coming He fulfilled to a nicety all the wide ramifications of Muhammadan prophecy, exactly as to time and place, and also as to lineage, because He was of the family — Beni-Hashem — directly linked with the Arabian Prophet Muhammad, the founder of the Faith. The Muhammadans had and have the same misconception of Muhammad that Christians have of Jesus—that He was the final avenue designed by Deity for the salvation of all the races of men. That is the fault today with the Christian program: It aims to christianityize humankind instead of to Christianize it—that is, to establish the tenets of a sect or school instead of to make plain the universal character of the teachings of Jesus and the unbroken continuity of the Divine plan of salvation.

In conclusion, it may be instructive to engage briefly in elucidation of the relation of the three who appeared in fulfillment of prophecy as we have sought to show you. While to our purely human understanding there were three separate and distinct human entities, this was only superficially true. Of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh wrote: "Had the First Point (the Báb) been someone else beside Me, as ye claim, and reached the event of My appearance, He would never have left Me, but rather we would have had mutual delights with each other in My days: Verily, He lamented over our separation and came before Me to preach to the people of My Kingdom. * * * Would there were someone from those who are ignorant who have ears to hear His clamor in the Bayán (the Book of Explanation) of that which came upon Myself: and to know His yearning at My separation and His passionate love to meet Me, the Precious, the Incomparable."

As to the Báb Himself, all of His song was of that "One whom God would make manifest." He declared that upon that transcendent appearance, all that He had ever said or written would not be so much as a single word of the words of the Mighty Manifestation. Yet, Bahá'u'lláh declared the Báb to be the Supreme Lord.

Of 'Abdu'l-Bahá Bahá'u'lláh wrote: "He is Myself, the Shining-Place of My Identity, the East of My Cause, the Heaven of My Bounty, the Sea of My will, the Lamp of My Guidance, the Path of My Justice, the Standard of My Laws * * *"

"Whosoever turneth unto Him hath surely turned unto God, and whosoever turneth away from Him hath turned away from My Beauty, denied My Proofs and is of those who transgress. * * * Verily, He is the Remembrance of God amongst you, and His Spirit within you, and His Manifestation unto you, and His Appearance amongst the servants who are nigh."

And, of Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdul-Bahá wrote: "I am the servant of the Blessed Perfection: My greatest glory is to roll my head in the dust at the threshold of His Greatness: My greatest station is this."

Thus, are we faced with the condition of looking upon three facets of a single incomparable jewel of transcendent beauty, each radiating the Light from a single Source—each bestowing the Divine Bounty in giving reflection to the Glory of the effulgent Sun of the Truth of God.

The Bahá'ís do not merely believe in this Dispensation: They know it, through the consciousness of its verity ingrained by the inspiration of the revelation of the Word.

Never, at any time, has any Divine Messenger laid claim to the greatness and the Divinity of His station in such authoritative utterance as this Manifestation . . . the Beloved of the World, [has appeared] the Intended of the Knowers, the Worshipped of whomsoever is in the heaven and the earth, and the Adored of the ancients and the moderns.

"Beware of hesitating to accept this Beauty, after the Ruler of Might, Power and Glory hath appeared. Verily, He is the Truth and everything besides Him on the part of His servants is annihilated and lost at the appearance of His Light!" * * * "Shouldst thou turn thy face toward all the things of the world and listen with a spiritual ear, thou wilt hear them exclaim 'The Ancient hath come! The Lord of the Most Great Glory hath appeared!'"

As Bahá'u'lláh was the great Revelator of the Truth, 'Abdul-Bahá held the mission to spread it, to apply it, to exemplify it in His daily and hourly living. Did He fulfill His mission? Ask of the crowding thousands who on the day of His final passing stirred the heart of Mount Carmel with the throbbing footsteps answering the heart-beats of unutterable sorrow: Read the incomparable eulogies of those influential ones of the Near East who up to only the yesterday of His life had opposed Him, but in His passing realized that the greatest figure in their experience had passed beyond the reach of human vision: Ask of the Jews and Parsees, Muhammadans and Buddhists, Hindus and Christians throughout the East today who, having discarded the prejudices of caste, of race and religion, meet in brotherly amity and pay honor, each to the other's Prophet, while still acknowledging fealty to their own. Look about you in the world of business and politics and see great principles of broad consideration of human rights, which are today being regarded as they have never been before this Dispensation as moving factors in human relationships and considerations, and that through the forty long years of His imprisonment 'Abdu'l-Bahá had been penning and sending forth to all parts of the world messages of encouragement, instruction and hope, guiding the thought of humanity to a higher Light.

What, after all, is the compelling attraction in this latest Revelation? Its universality. It touches upon every human relationship: It shapes itself to every condition: It inspires in the deepest depths of deprivation and sorrow the consciousness that these are as nothing in comparison with the eternity of Light: It appeals by its completely understandable simplicity, and through it the unlettered becomes lifted to a plane of the richest understanding.

It does not offer any form of material reward: It does not, except under certain and difficult conditions, extend the hope of physical health: It taboos individual striving even for spiritual reward which is in itself a form of selfishness. What then has it to present which might be expected to attract the serious seeker? It offers the principle of Divine living, not for the reward one might hope to gain in some far world of the spirit, but to live it for the love of it—to be a factor in the world of humanity whereby the paths of other men may be illumined by your example, taking no credit to yourself by reason of the quality of your excellence. If your physical health is faulty it does not oppose any sane effort toward its correction; instead, it defines clearly how every form of healing is accomplished and it prescribes one means by which if you will adopt it you shall be guaranteed absolutely perfect physical, mental and spiritual health. Would you like to engage in the attitude whereby this will come to you?

'Abdu'l-Bahá told two such who came to Him with the plea for health:—"If you will live as Mary of Magdala lived the Word when she knew it, then shall you have perfect health. I promise it."

Mary of Magdala is placed in a station of spiritual excellence beyond that ever attained by woman. Hers was the spirit of faith which remained undaunted in the face of the failure of Jesus to outwit His enemies, as His disciples had been certain He would, and in those trying days which have been defined as the "Entombment," she alone of all the followers remained serene, filled with the fullness of the meaning of the resurrection of the Christ. It was she who at last by the wonder of her living the Word caused the others to see the Christ before them and in their newfound concept of His return they gave up their all and started out to give His Message to mankind.

And this Message which the disciples of Jesus ventured forth to spread—what was it? Was it the Pauline Christianity from which have developed all of the dogmas and creeds and rituals which have stirred the sects of the professing followers of Jesus through these thousands of years? Is it this faulty superstructure, reared entirely through the imaginings and sometimes selfish designing of man, which is to be the religion of the future? Were it to be that, how can we come to believe that the world of the future will be any different or any better than that of our own time? It is not the Love which Jesus taught which is at fault, but the manner of the presentment of it which has lain up to this time at the base of all human misunderstandings, the basic cause of all the wars that ever have been.

No,—it can be nothing of this. The religion of the future must be one so simple that all can understand it—even those who are highly educated. These latter have been the guides of those whom they have regarded as the deprived ones, but, in reality, it has been in every age the knowing who have been unable to understand. They have trained their egotistic assumption to replace the simplicity of the heart, and it is this which affords explication of the remarkable condition that an incomparable teaching of a faultless Love should be the generator of the most devastating of hatreds and greed, and ambition and desire.

Before such a condition, the Bahá'í presents the broad principle of human brotherhood, the casting off of misleading concepts of Divine design and the acceptance of the truth, that the "Chosen People of God" are not those of any particular race or age or clime, but that they are the pure in heart.

When man shall have risen to see every man really his brother, regardless of race, or color, or the channel for the profession of his faith, then will he be standing at the portal of the Temple of the Most High, through which he will witness the unending procession of the believers of every faith, consorting with one another without friction, freed from prejudice in the knowledge that every one of the great Founders of the schools of religion has been of equal importance in the sight Divine.

SONGS OF THE SPIRIT

RUTH J. MOFFETT

IN "HIS GARDEN"

The dew is on the petals of the rose;
 The lark sings out his greetings to the sun;
 A dewdrop glistens with resplendent light;
 The dawning of the day has just begun.

Upon this misty morn the Master walks,
 With majesty and power that thrills the earth,
 With piercing eyes of far celestial light,
 He sees each earth-born spirit at its worth.

The floating, graceful robes, illumined face,
 The glistening turban white, the aba bright;
 With peace ineffable, no word can name,
 The Master walks in palpitating light.

O hallowed strip of leafy bower green,
 O rapturous love and glory so divine;
 O attar of the rose, bowed heads anointing!
 Delectable fragrance—O to be Thine!

The dewdrop glistens in the morning sun,
 A dazzling prism, radiant and bright.
 O may we now be like the clear dewdrop,
 Reflecting Thy sweet fragrance and Thy Light.

AT THY SHRINE

From out the great Infinite Boundlessness
 From cosmic planes far beyond finite ken,
 The voice of God hath spoken to the world.
 The Essence of God hath manifested again.

The spirit of Thy love surrounds the earth
 As radiant halo crests the harvest moon.
 From distant climes, Thy spirit hath such power,
 Attracting hungry pilgrims to commune.

I did not think my heart could weep so much,
 While bowing humbly at Thy Holy Shrine.
 The nearness of Thy Presence melted all Except my wish to be completely Thine.

I did not think my heart could hurt me so,
 While ecstasy Divine filled all my soul.
 I dedicate my life to Thee, O God.
 To reflect Thy Light, my only wish and goal.

THE MESSAGE

If I could dip my pen in living fire
 And write a message that would never die,
 So full of truth and love and heartfelt urge,
 That every soul would answer to its cry.

This is the message writ in living fire:
 "Bahá'u'lláh, the God of Love is here;"
 "It is the Judgment Day, Awake, Arise"
 "Take Refuge in His Name, while He is near."

I'd pour my message out in flames of light,
 'Till all would see and hear my earnest plea,
 And all would shout in answer to that call
 "Oh God, we turn our hearts, our lives to Thee."

SUN-GLEAMS

As quiet as the sun-gleams on the blossoms,
 As silent as the sunrise o'er the hill,
 Is the gleaming of the spirit in our souls,
 Is the falling of its peace upon our will.

And subtler than the sunlift in the leafbud,
 That thrills through all the branches making May,
 Is that shining of God's Spirit in the world,
 Bringing light to human hearts in this New Day.

SIGNS OF GOD

Thou who art the fragrance of the flower;
 The blush upon the petals of the rose,
 The glory in the sunset path of gold,
 The soft caress of zephyr as it blows.

Thou the force that moves the distant star dust,
 The power behind the yearning heart of prayer,
 The deep love-urge that moves the vast creation,
 By all these signs, God makes my heart aware.

FINDING THE DIVINE FRIEND

E. T. HALL

NOT in the noise of crafty politics; not in the conflict of jealous religions; not in the conflict of the sexes; not in the inferno of war; not in the glamorous imaginations of the egotists; not in the superstitions of the weak; not in loveless minds may Truth be found. Only when the Glory of God lights up loving thoughts may one find in the peaceful, placid soul, as in a clear pool, the reflection of Eternal Truth.

How simple this sounds as one jots it down in a notebook whilst half dreaming of the pleasant woods and the sun-lit waters and meads of the Lune and the Ribble, where the footsteps have wandered this year ere the finish of Summer, in this homely atmosphere of Manchester. How simple, indeed, it sounds; yet looking back, there was a long period in life when I knew many things which were but fragments, broken bits, of Truth.

The heart of Truth I did not know. A mass of Scripture, a mass of other (secular) knowledge, a mass of thoughts gained from experience in everyday life, and a faith in some kind of a Supreme Being (of which all manner of things were being taught in most perplexing and contradictory ways) were stored in the mind. I could find my way about amongst some of this knowledge without getting lost, but in the main there was a feeling of insecurity, considerable dissatisfaction, and doubts regarding the views and theories of those whose lot it was to teach us.

Regarding the teachings of Jesus, of their goodness I had no doubts at any time, but felt very unsafe amidst the contradictory interpretations of the Gospel—indeed I often felt that it was being used merely to support the various views of self-interested teachers rather than as the basis of their lives; and especially vexed was the heart with a dreadful feeling that there was no intention on the part of the teachers and leaders to make any self-sacrifice so that the dead letter might be overcome and the real Glory shine out. In fact, there seemed to be nothing but controversy and prejudice in the world instead of the Spirit of Love manifested by the Glorious One in Galilee. In a sort of despair I was driven to penetrate for myself the veils which hid me from the something which was the Spirit of my life and urgent within me, and so reach the Truth for myself. But even at the age of twenty-eight I could but just reach the sense that the Brotherhood of Man should be the goal of all. Even at that, there was more despair in the conclusion than any of the Glory which is the perfection of life.

At the age of thirty, still learning, still seeking Truth, watching attentively the various happenings and events in the outer world, dissatisfied with the seeming futility of things in general, as it were by chance I heard of a remarkable figure dwelling in Palestine by the Bay of Haifa, in the vicinity of Scriptural Carmel—a figure of strength, beauty, and wisdom; a Servant of God in the Holy Land, standing for world peace, world unity, and the Glory of God! A figure with a tremendous and remarkable history behind it, and with a mighty purpose before it. A figure of which a traveler said: "A few days later we said good-bye to Him, saw Him standing radiant and beautiful at the top of the long staircase which leads down to the inner court where the fountain plays and the roses bloom all the year. The Light of Love was still upon His face—it is always there—it is a face of Love—and so I shall always see Him."

Imagine the eagerness with which I sought for more information concerning the revered Servant of God, 'Abdu'l-Bahá! Imagine the haste with which I read everything possible concerning Him and His mission! Friends were mildly surprised at such a suddenly awakened interest, and they intimated that such a sudden flare would quickly die down. But I had found the Key to all that mattered in life. I had found the beautiful Face of that Spirit of Life which dies not. I had found that which made Christ and the Sermon on the Mount real things, in a world of spiritual decay and doubt. I had found the upwelling spring of that Divine Power which is beginning to carry mankind to the next phase in the world's evolution—a settled world under an International Court of Arbitration (or World Parliament in the interests of Peace).

I learned that Revelation did not cease with the passing away of St. John, the beloved disciple of Jesus, but that Revelation is progressive, for the Holy Spirit is guiding the world to its appointed end. I learned that 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in the strength of God, was disseminating the world teachings of His still greater Father—Bahá'u'lláh—Who was the Mouthpiece of the Holy Spirit, fulfilling Christ! I loved the sense of it all—its truth; its beauty; its fitness to the needs of the world; its fulfillment of prophecy; and, indeed, as the poet has said: "We needs must love the highest when we see it! Who could fail to see the Glory so finely manifested? Who could fail to see the Hand of God in such a matter? I knew in all my being that this was what Christ had foretold when He said: "When He, the Spirit of Truth, is come, He will guide you into all Truth," that is to say, into the very concept of God, which is the Heavenly Kingdom.

In time I saw it all and thanked God for the Glory that illumined my existence from such a Divine Revelation. I was satisfied with the grand social teachings of Bahá'u'lláh as well as His Spiritual teachings, realizing that both social and spiritual are one necessity in the world now commencing. Through Bahá'u'lláh the Holy Spirit tenderly addresses each individual heart with these sweet words: "I loved thy creation, hence I created thee. Wherefore, do thou love Me, that I may name thy name and fill thy soul with the Spirit of Life." And also through Bahá'u'lláh the Holy Spirit calls all the warring peoples to peace and harmony ("Rebuking strong nations afar off"), saying: "This handful of dust, the world, is one home; let it be in unity!"

I pondered long over all these things, sometimes in the green glades of Blavincourt, sometimes by the pleasant shores of wooded Arnside and Windermere, and in the lovely gardens of Heaton Park, or on country rambles, and even amidst squalid surroundings in the City—but mostly in the quiet of my own home. More and more I realized that the origin of all things in the universe (visible and invisible) is in God's Loving Thought, and that the magnetic power which brings God's concept into manifestation binds the creature to God in the bonds of both conscious and unconscious love, until, in man, it brings the creature to know and to adore God. This magnetic power is God's Holy Spirit, and it was by that Spirit that the beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá, exclaimed: "I testify, O my God, that Thou has created me to know Thee and to adore Thee!"

I STUDIED the Bahá'í Revelation, and in its light re-studied the Bible and other Scriptures; but above all I looked steadfastly upon the needs of the world and upon the need for each soul to realize the truth of its existence. At last I summarized the Truth with a heart thankful to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, realizing that I had, by His light, reached the truth known to all the dear ones and enlightened ones of the past. How slowly does Truth find realization in the mind! Long had it been in the heart, but the mind had to be properly focussed to the Glory of it, that it might be a burning power in life itself—a clear, concentrated, burning power! When once the mind was clear, and satisfied, the pen swiftly noted down the summary; yet I refrained from putting it as a writing before people, merely confining myself to voicing the sense of it from time to time in various addresses.

At first it seemed a purely personal concern—a thing others would find out for themselves. However, at fifty years of age, it has come to me that it might help a mind here and there to realize something in their lives, and recently, whilst tramping along the country road from the precincts of the fine old church of Skipton to the beautiful church of Gargrave, I felt it strongly. Thoughts might be stirred in the minds of people by the breaths of such a summary, as the breaths of the pure breeze stir the leaves upon the splendid trees that whisper round those sacred fanes. The Scriptures of the world are a mighty maze of things, and it is well to throw a light upon the heart of them. One receives of the Glory freely, therefore one should freely shed the light for the sake of those who seek.

I would that the mighty theme were expanded to embrace the fullness of the sense of things—the universal, ethereal, magnetic power "rolling through all things"; the grandeur of the earth and the heavens in all their harmony; the beauty of the skies and sunshine with all the dazzling coloring involved; the health from seas and mountains and the winds; the nourishment from lovely fruits; the enchantments of fragrant gardens and forests; the heart attachments of the young people; and the friendships of all; and the love of parents for their offspring. O God! If Thy Glorious Love for all Thy creation were withdrawn, the universe would collapse—for it is built of Thy Love!

AS I MEDITATED on the Power of Love to recreate the world, this was the vision that I had of the coming humanity when all obey the Will of God, the All-Glorious, the Perfect.

In His Divine Wisdom God conceived a Heavenly Kingdom; a humanity, a Mankind, responsive to His Spirit, loving Him consciously and voluntarily, glorying in His Glory. A mankind living healthily, through knowledge and science, and in peace, through love and just laws, in a beautiful and interesting world; every one fed, clothed, housed, and educated, ideally and happily, to the end that each and all should show forth the virtues of the Heavenly Kingdom.

This was God's Concept, His Loving Thought, which originated our existence; the Spirit of which guides, comforts, and sustains us. Because God is all-glorious His Concept is filled with His Glory (in the Persian tongue "Glory" is known as "Bahá"). Because God is perfect His Loving Thought is perfect.

Our origin, therefore, is not in ourselves, nor in our parents, nor in the earth (no, not in this world at all), but in God's Loving Thought; and it is His desire that we should realize this sublime truth, and so continue to develop, fully conscious, in the Glory (in the Bahá) of His Loving Thought, through oneness with His Holy Spirit.

The Holy Spirit is the magnetic Power proceeding from God's Concept, which carries His Loving Thought into effect in creation—causing it to come into manifestation; giving power to this, taking the power from that; and attracting things through affinities to whatever is Willed; and, loving, guiding, comforting, urging, inspiring, confirming, developing, idealizing, and universalizing the mind of Man through its manifestations, principally the Holy Prophets.

The Holy Spirit, like the sunshine, is a personal friend as well as the Universal Friend; for, as the sunshine liberates the plant from the sealed-up yet predetermined seed, and brings it to leafage, blossom, fruition, and even to the ripening and sweetening of the fruit, so the Holy Spirit liberates the Concept of God from our sealed-up, yet predetermined nature, bringing it to full manifestation of the virtues of the Heavenly Kingdom.

Amongst all other blessings, even to the Scriptures of all peoples, the Holy Spirit gave to us the Gospel of Jesus Christ and the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. Through knowledge, through meditation upon these Teachings, and through prayer and supplication, we come to realize the sublime Truth (that our origin is in God's Loving Thought), and so we reach the first conscious stage of oneness with the Holy Spirit. The sense of self is lost in the sense of the Holy Spirit, which is universal. That is to say, "self" disappears in universality. A radiant, blissful condition of heart and mind and soul arises from the consciousness that we are in the presence of God—because we are consciously within the sunshine, the warmth, the magnetic field, of His Holy Spirit. This condition is that of Eden, and the Kingdom of Heaven.

HARI PRASAD SHASTRI, D. LITT

THE most indisputable Truth in the spiritual world, about which there is not the least doubt, and which has been demonstrated by each and every sage, is that beyond the veil of diversity there is Unity. This Unity is Existence absolute; in other words Consciousness absolute. Every atom, every living being is a conditioned form of it, and man is a self-conscious mode of the same.

Above man there are countless forms of life, invisible, and with a greater control over time and space. They are called by various names—devas, angels, spirits, etc. Matter, time, space, mind, intelligence, are all lower manifestations of this one great Unity—God.

“Man is the mystery of creation, and I am the mystery of man.” Man has not fallen, but the spirit in man is evolving. It is in his power either to hasten his evolution by conscious efforts to evolve through service to his fellow-men, and cultivation of his spiritual elements, or to retard his progress by living the life of sense worship, selfishness, and duality.

In the Gita, the Lord says that sacrifice is the spiritual law, and creation is based on this law. Cultivation of the law of sacrifice promotes our spiritual interests.

In the non-Aryan religions, the sacrifice of animals at the altar of gods was a symbol meaning that the lower passions and desires of man must be sacrificed. In the Aryan religions, first one must sacrifice anger, avarice, egotism, attachment to worldly things; and then offer at the altar of God, love, indifference to material advantages and works, knowledge, devotion, etc.

God who manifests Itself as nature and man, also manifests Itself as God-Man, or Manifestation of God. This is called Avtar, or descent. Such men were Buddha, Christ, Muhammad, Bahá'u'lláh and others. They brought the same fundamental Truth, and preached the same fundamental Law—supremacy of ethics and unselfish service with devotion to God-Men. These great Beings live today in the spiritual world, and are conscious of our efforts toward spiritual progress.

As Arjuna cried:—

“How shall I learn, Supremest Mystery!
To know Thee, though I muse continually?
Under what form of Thine unnumbered forms
Mayst Thou be grasped? Ah! yet again recount Clear and complete, Thy great Appearances,
The secrets of Thy Majesty and Might,
Thou High Delight of men.

And now, once again in the long ages of religious history has that Appearance become “clear and complete” in the Manifestation of Bahá'u'lláh.

A religious man must have a living ideal embodying in himself the highest and holiest spiritual ideals.

This is the highest understanding of the Existence absolute by the human mind. A religion which is based on dry laws, and ethical conceptions, however great, is bound to remain only a lip-assertion. It will not influence human life, and eventually produces moral anarchy. The fall of the beautiful Stoic doctrine, or the defeat of Neo-Platonism before the simple truths of the spiritual ethics of Jesus illustrates the fact. Stoicism has all that Jesus taught, but lacked a living personality—a God-Man through whom God spoke His authoritative Divine Word, whom one could love, revere, and worship. In the third century of the Christian era every laborer in Alexandria was a philosopher, but at the same time a moral wreck. What Paul (as a disciple of Christ) could demonstrate in his life Aristotle could not.

To realize Truth one does not need a keen intellect, but surely one must have a feeling heart. It is easier to feel unity with all through the emotions than through logic. Truth is to be realized in the heart; the head will take care of itself if the intuition is awake.

Let us fill our hearts with the love of the God-Man morning and evening, read the sacred scriptures, meditate, pray, and then manifest love by loving mankind in general. So shall we live glad in All-Good, nigh to the peace of God.

“The holy Manifestations of God—the Divine Prophets—are the first Teachers of the human race. They are universal educators, and the fundamental principles they have laid down are the causes and factors of the advancement of nations. Forms and imitations which creep in afterward are not conducive to that progress. On the contrary these are destroyers of human foundations established by the heavenly Educators. These are clouds which obscure the Sun of Reality. . . . Therefore there is need of turning back to the original foundation. The fundamental principles of the Prophets are correct and true. The imitations and superstitions which have crept in are at wide variance with the original precepts and commands. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh has revoiced and reestablished the quintessence of the teachings of all the Prophets, setting aside the accessories and purifying religion from human interpretation. He has written a book entitled “Hidden Words.” The preface announces that it contains the essence of the words of the prophets of the past clothed in the garment of brevity for the teaching and spiritual guidance of the people of the world. Read it that you may understand the true foundations of religion and reflect upon the inspiration of the Messengers of God. It is light upon light.”

BAHÁ'ISM—THE RELIGION OF PERSIA

“The Epidemic of the Persian Jews”

A. J. WIENBERG

The following article was published in the Jewish paper, Canadian Adler, of Montreal, Canada. Translated from the Jewish by Ethel Moss Murray.

DR. A. FISHEL, Jewish Professor of the Oriental Institute, Hebrew University,* on his return from Persia, Iráq and Kurdistán, stated to the Ita (Jewish News Agency) that a mass conversion is predominating among the Persian Jews. Whole communities turn to Bahá'ism, the religion of Persia. What is the Bahá'i belief?

The Bahá'i Movement originated in Persia in 1844 and then spread in the Near East and also in European and American countries. The main centers of the Bahá'i religion today are Akká and Haifa, Palestine, where its Founders are buried in specially erected Shrines. Few in our generation know of this modern religion. It really sounds like a paradox, that religion and reformation, spirituality and social progress, Prophet and revolutionary, could get together and actually unite without conflict.

Many European historians have delved into this religion, and with great enthusiasm express their opinion about the Asiatic thinker who was far from the influence of European philosophy. His religion is a calm and tranquil philosophy of life, but, a very active religion which requires the translation of the teachings into deeds.

Historians have written about Bahá'u'lláh, the Founder of Baha'ism. His religion carries the promise of a great progress, and is international in scope. This revelation from the East which offers a solution to the problems of the West, is in the form of an international or universal religion.

IN 1844 appeared in Persia before a multitude an enthusiastic young man, twenty-five years of age, who called Himself the Báb [which means Gate or Door]. He began to preach a doctrine designed to create new conditions for humanity. The masses immediately accepted the teachings, which had a great effect on account of His divine name. In 1850 the Báb was killed at the instigation of Muslim clergy who saw in this Movement a great danger for Islam.

After the martyrdom of the Báb, His followers turned to the One whom He prophesied would come after Him and who would be the Law-giver for this dispensation, namely, Bahá'u'lláh [which means the Glory of God].

In 1852 the Muslims started an inquisition against the followers of this religion. Every day many thousands were put to death and thrown into dungeons.

In 1863 Bahá'u'lláh, with his family and some seventy-two of His followers, were exiled to Constantinople and then later to Adrianople where they remained about five years. Then they were exiled to Haifa in Palestine, and were put in heavy chains and committed to the prison of 'Akká.

* In Palestine.  Refers to the Founder of the Baha'i Movement.

Bahá'u'lláh, while in prison, was occupied in giving out His teachings. He proclaimed twelve great basic principles of the Bahá'i Movement, namely:

(1) The oneness of mankind. (2) Independent investigation of truth. (3) The foundation of all religions is one. (4) Religion must be the cause of unity. (5) Religion must be in accord with science and reason. (6) Equality between men and women. (7) Prejudice of all kinds must be forgotten. (8) Universal peace. (9) Universal education. (10) Spiritual solution of the economic problem. (11) A universal language. (12) An international tribunal.

In 1892 Bahá'u'lláh died in the prison city of 'Akká. In His will and testament He had appointed His son, Abbas Effendi, as His successor.

After the revolution in Turkey, perfect freedom was given to the Bahá'is, and 'Akká became for the believers a second Mecca.

Abbas Effendi called Himself 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of God. In 1912 He visited Europe and America, and the Bahá'i teachings were widely proclaimed. The Bahá'i Cause has spread around the world.

On November 28, 1921, 'Abdu'l-Bahá died in Haifa, Palestine. His body rests in a tomb on Mt. Carmel, where also rests the body of the Báb.

THE BAHÁ'IS are spiritual but not emotional. They are good and refined people. They love each other and are ready to sacrifice for each other. All are equal in spirit—rich or poor.

The Bahá'i Temples are open to every one. There are no clergy or officials in them. In the Temple there is worship, and in the future as the Bahá'i Cause grows, the plan is to have all kinds of accessory buildings surrounding the Temple which will be used for definite services to humanity.*

Bahá'is can have but one wife. Divorce is granted under certain conditions. Bahá'is must not gamble, or drink intoxicating beverages, and must not use drugs. The true believer loves every one irrespective of belief, race or nationality. Bahá'ism also advocates love for animals.

The Bahá'i Teachings resemble in many instances a Kabala (mysticism) Movement. The creation of the world in accordance with the Bahá'i teachings is God's creation where God alone manifests His supremacy. All mountains, hills, flowers and grass, oceans and lakes, fields and other creations of nature, are all created so that God's attributes may be manifested. The sun and the moon are God's servants. Humanity is the highest type of creation, and man must strive, with all his marvellous endowments, to attain his birthright.

A person must be free from oppression. A slave cannot serve his Creator because the Lord loves freedom and justice. Slavery is against truth and freedom.

This Bahá'i religion is now predominating in Persia, and the Jews of Persia follow it because the Movement teaches love and respect for other beliefs. 'Abdu'l-Bahá explained that people have to love and respect other religions and beliefs. All are worshipping God in their own way no matter by what Name—Jew, Buddhist, Muhammadan, Christian, and others. The main thing is to live a life of righteousness, love and good deeds.

* Baha'is believe that divine and material civilization must go together.

A LETTER FROM PERSIA

RECENTLY I made a trip from Tihrán, the capital of Persia, to the town of Rasht, situated near the Caspian sea in the northern part of the country. Its port is Enzeli through which it has important commerce for it is probably the greatest center for the silk trade. I assure you one could write at great length about the scenic wonders of this country for travelers are charmed every instant with the beauty of nature.

But this is not the purpose of my letter. What I do most assuredly consider worth recording is something about the progress of the Bahá'í Cause in Rasht.

I had not visited this place for fourteen years or since 1917. And during that time we might say a miracle has taken place.

Formerly, or during the Qajar dynasty, there were but few believers in Rasht, and even they lived under the most difficult conditions. Hardships and troubles were inflicted on them by the Muhammadans at the instigation of the Mullahs and clerical class. At that time the Bahá'is in this town as well as in other places in Persia were denied social rights.

Under the most trying and difficult conditions the Bahá'is arranged their meetings, and sometimes these meetings were stopped and the audience dispersed when the Muhammadans knew about them.

But now, thanks to the wise management of affairs by the present Ruler of the country, peace and order has been established, and the Bahá'is are more or less enjoying peace and tranquility.

Recently the Bahá'is have purchased a house with a small garden which is used as a center for the Bahá'í administration, for meetings and activities, all under the name "Hazirat-ul-Quds." The Spiritual Assembly which administers the affairs of the Cause, holds its meetings here, and there are meetings every week for Bahá'is and non-Bahá'is for the study of the Teachings. People of all classes are coming to investigate the Cause.

The inhabitants of Rasht who may be averse to the comparative freedom enjoyed by the Bahá'is, at the same time cannot express anything against them.

And so a Bahá'í traveler is filled with joy as he sees the laws of God in this New Age taking effect in the heart of humanity, thus foreshadowing the day of The New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh.

In the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá "His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh came to renew the life of the world with this new and divine springtime which has pitched its tent in the countries of the Orient in the utmost power and glory. It has refreshed the world of the East."

As this is "the radiant century," the attainment of spiritual happiness in the human world is possible, and one must rejoice exceedingly to see the practical application of the Bahá'í Teachings in the lives of the Bahá'is of Rasht, and the great progress which naturally follows from the creative effect of the Revealed Word.

“Man must throughout all the degrees of life evolve and progress day by day, for life is continuous. The Divine Manifestations have appeared so that They may confer the divine realities upon man, an ideal power which enables him to advance along all the degrees of human attainment.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

WHAT is the meaning of life? As far as I can discover—and I have given the question a great deal of thought—the sole purpose of life as regards the individual is growth through struggle. That life is a struggle, all of us must admit—a struggle seemingly inseparable from existence. This fact is what chiefly causes the frequent complaint—“What is life all about? What is the good of it all?”

Growth, I feel assured, is the purpose of it all. If growth is attained, the struggle seems worth the while, especially if we believe in a continuity of individual existence. If growth has not been attained, I think it is safe to say that in every case the fault is ours and not that of the Cosmos.

Life, then, means opportunity for growth on the part of the individual. But what is the purpose of this growth? Evidently growth, if it remains a purely individual thing, can have no meaning beyond itself. But in a Cosmos made up of individual existences, growth on the part of the individual means increased power of functioning of the individual in the organization of the Cosmos. Growth means achievement, and achievement becomes the means of universal progress.

Having got thus far in our query, can we go further? I think not. What the purpose of individual progress is, I confess I am at a loss to state. It is not at all necessary for us to speculate about this matter. This, I presume, is the Great Enigma which many existences may fail completely to clarify. For when this Enigma is at last solved, the finite will have become Infinite.

To grow, to achieve, this is to perform our part in the universe. When we do this, we are truly creative—we are expressing the genius that is within each one of us. We are radiating, pulsating life.

We grow only by means of activity—or as the psychologists call it—purposeful activity. Not to be active is to stagnate, atrophy, crystalize. Movement is the sign of life. It is more even than that. It is the essence of life.

If we did not start on a career of purposeful activity the moment we came into the world we would never learn how to walk, how to talk, how to use our hands, how to think. We would not even learn how to eat.

We grow by acting, by expressing, by achieving. If this be true, we have then arrived at a peculiar paradox of existence: namely, that achievement is both the means and goal of growth. And since growth is life itself, we must conclude that achievement is at the same time the means and goal of existence.

Could any scheme of things more wonderful than this be conceived? Destiny has placed within the hands of every individual both the purpose of his existence and the means to achieve that purpose.

IN THE growth of the individual, just as in the growth of the plant, there is a power outside of us which energizes. In the case of the plant it is the physical sun. From this the plant derives all the energy for its growth. It is because of the sunshine pouring down upon it that the tree, through its myriad leaves, is able to perform the miracle of transmuting inorganic matter into organic matter. By means of the chemistry of light the plant builds up stalk and leaf from the carbon dioxide of the air and the mineral salts of the earth. Without sunshine there can be no plant growth, consequently no transmutation from inorganic to organic life; no food for the animal world; no sustenance for man upon this planet. Such is the importance of sunshine in the cycle of material existence.

Man, as pertaining to the animal world, also needs the light and warmth of the physical sun for the best development of his physical and nervous system. But there is another Sun which he needs also, for the development and growth of his spiritual being. From this Divine Sun there emanate, as it were, the rays of the Holy Spirit, which bear the same relation to man's spiritual growth as the rays of the physical sun bear to his physical growth. Without the energizing stimulus of these Rays, man cannot grow spiritually to the full stature destined for him in his cosmic evolution.

It is from this Source that man derives both his growth and his power for achievement. These cosmic rays of spiritual Force, penetrating and kindling his soul, quicken it to a creative power otherwise impossible. Thus the Spirit emanating from God and reaching man in this intermediary way is the cause of all his growth and achievement. Not only is his spiritual progress absolutely dependent upon this Force, but his creative development as an individual is influenced and fostered by this Power.

"The greatest need of the world of humanity today is to receive the efficacy of the Holy Spirit. . . . The Holy Spirit is the energizing factor in the life of man. Whosoever receives this power, is able to influence all with whom he comes into contact. . . . An humble man without learning, but filled with the Holy Spirit, is more powerful than the most nobly born profound scholar without that inspiration. . . . No capacity is limited when led by the Spirit of God."^{*}

Every person then who longs for more creative living, for richer growth and individual development, will find that he must seek this in the realm of the spirit. He must establish a conscious relationship with this Divine Force, with these rays of the Holy Spirit pouring down upon the world. Apart from this Cosmic Sunshine, growth can be but feeble; Man stagnates, remains but an animal, fails to reach the station of cosmic man that is destined for him.

“I came that you might have life, and have it more abundantly.” From the angle of the individual need this was the chief purpose of Christ’s mission—to disclose to man the secret of a marvelous source of power by which he could reach the glories of the Kingdom.

JUST AS man is destined to grow to his full development by means of the Holy Spirit, so is humanity in its corporate form destined also to attain to its perfection of organization only through the aid of this Divine Power. Humanity cannot solve its many problems—problems all of which arise from the carnal and self-seeking nature of man—except through the stimulating Force of the Logos. This Divine Sun shines always upon mankind; but more powerfully at certain epochs, the periods of the Divine Springtime.

“Just as the solar cycle has its four seasons the cycle of the Sun of Reality has its distinct and successive periods. Each brings its vernal season or springtime. When the Sun of Reality returns to quicken the world of mankind a divine bounty descends from the heaven of generosity. The realm of thoughts and ideals is set in motion and blessed with new life. Minds are developed, hopes brighten, aspirations become spiritual, the virtues of the human world appear with freshened power of growth.”*

This is the purpose, then, of the Manifestations of God so far as their universal mission is concerned: to aid humanity to progress and evolve into that perfect organization which Christ called the Kingdom of God. For this purpose the great teachers—Moses, Christ, Buddha, Muhammad, and lastly Bahá’u’lláh—bring not only a specific solution for the ills of mankind, but also the powerful dynamic of the Holy Spirit to revivify the souls of men and stimulate them to new spiritual growth. Without this spiritual rebirth mankind would not have capacity for carrying out the spiritual laws necessary for the maintenance of the organization of the Kingdom — an organization based upon love, upon service and cooperation rather than upon those egoistic and self-seeking qualities of man of which our present civilization is mostly the expression.

WHAT is the nature of these Manifestations that visit the world at certain intervals and stimulate humanity to the creation of new civilizations, replacing the old stagnant forms that have prevailed? What are these Manifestations but pure channels of the Divine Force?

“The Holy Spirit is the Bounty of God, and the luminous rays which emanate from the Manifestations; for the focus of the rays of the Sun of Reality was Christ; and from this glorious focus, which is the Reality of Christ, the Bounty of God reflected upon the other mirrors which were the reality of the apostles.”

As the primal impulse given to humanity by these Saviors of men die out and religion becomes stagnant, there comes a new Savior, a new focusing of the Holy Spirit upon a planet which otherwise would remain spiritually inert.

Such a period has now arrived, not only for Christendom but for Islam, for Buddhism, for the world of Confucius—in fact for all humanity. Everywhere religion is dying and is in dire need of the resurrecting Force of the Holy Spirit. To meet this need Bahá’u’lláh was manifested on this planet with a spiritual message the most complete that humanity has ever had the capacity to hear. In this message is given not only full instructions for the spiritual life of the individual and his resurrection from the grave of self to the celestial plane of selflessness; but there is also contained the specific solution for all the problems that beset the world:—

* Promulgation of Universal Peace, p. 91.

 Abdu'l-Baha in Answered Questions, p. 124.

The abolition of war and the establishment of universal peace. The abolition of race prejudice, and the establishment of a great and lasting brotherhood of man. The abolition of religious prejudices and differences, and the joining of all humanity into one great religious unity dedicated to the knowledge of the service of one God. The abolition of strife between capital and labor, and the establishment of harmonious relationships under which both these important factors of the economic world may survive in mutual beneficence. The abolition of poverty, with the assumption by society of complete responsibility for the lives of the individuals of which it is composed.

THE PURPOSE OF LIFE for the individual is growth through achievement. But that achievement cannot be an isolated thing. In whatever way we act, we are affecting some thing or some individual. That is the nature of action. All our growth and achievement has its bearing then upon the growth and achievement of humanity and upon the planet itself. We cannot play our part as isolated actors, but as performers in a group. It is in the group that our destiny lies. It is within this group that all our activities take place. It is for the sake of this group that we should achieve.

Today more than at any other time in the history of the world there is a marvelous opportunity for the individual to serve the group, to achieve in ways that will redound to the benefit of mankind for ages to come. It is in working for the establishment of that perfect Divine Plan for mankind—the Kingdom of God upon earth—that every individual today will find the fullest expression for his powers and the greatest enjoyment in living. Here he will feel that life is worth while. He will realize himself as living the “abundant life.”

Why then should we complain about life? We have it within our power to achieve, each according to our capacity. And when we are giving full expression to the creative force within us, we are living indeed. We are fulfilling the law of our being.

This is what brings happiness. This is the only way to tranquility. It is the path to perfection, not only for the individual but for the race. It is the path that leads upward towards those celestial heights where the rays of the Divine Sun are manifested in their full splendor.

THE HOLY SPIRIT AS A CREATIVE FORCE

THE Holy Spirit is the mediator between God and His creatures. It is like a mirror facing the sun. As the pure mirror receives light from the sun and transmits this bounty to others, so the Holy Spirit is the mediator of the Holy Light from the Sun of Reality, which it gives to the sanctified realities. It is adorned with all the divine perfections. Every time it appears the world is renewed, and a new cycle is founded. The body of the world of humanity puts on a new garment. It can be compared to the spring; whenever it comes the world passes from one condition to another. Through the advent of the season of spring the black earth and the fields and wildernesses will become verdant and blooming, and all sorts of flowers and sweet-scented herbs will grow; the trees will have new life, and new fruits will appear, and a new cycle is founded. The appearance of the Holy Spirit is like this. Whenever it appears, it renews the world of humanity and gives a new spirit to the human realities; it arrays the world of existence in a praiseworthy garment, dispels the darkness of ignorance, and causes the radiation of the light of perfections.”

WHEN you breathe forth the breath of the Holy Spirit from your hearts into the world, commerce and politics will take care of themselves in perfect harmony. All arts and sciences will become revealed and the knowledge of God will be manifested. It is not your work but that of the Holy Spirit which you breathe forth through the Word. This is a fundamental truth.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

"THE WAY TO RECOVERY"

DALE S. COLE

THE greatest call to unity and cooperation which has ever been given is found in the profound and magnificent words of Bahá'u'lláh. Repeatedly He admonishes us that we are "all the leaves of one tree"; "the flowers of one garden"; "the members of one family"—and that the way to progress lies along the path of universal goodwill and mutual endeavor. Superstitions, prejudice, animosities of all kinds must be abolished from the face of the earth and we must not glory in loving a nation but "in loving our kind."

This mighty call resounding from the tower of religious universality has fallen on deaf ears although years ago He addressed the monarchs of many nations, directly, pointing out that unless the "swords were beaten into ploughshares," swords of all kinds, economic as well as military, dire distress would fall on the peoples of the earth.

According to Sir George Paish, Governor of the London School of Economics, some such thing has happened, for the opening words of his book, "The Way to Recovery," emphasize the seriousness of the present world situation:

"The present crisis is universally admitted to be the most serious the world has ever experienced, and the most difficult it has ever had to adjust."

He points out that no comprehensive plan was made at the end of the world war to avert a world breakdown and that no concerted plan has yet been evolved, but that the time is now at hand "when a comprehensive plan of adjustment must be formulated."

Nations have been unwilling to act concertedly towards the ends dictated by the common good. Those nations which benefited by the world war have desired, above all things, to retain their advantages. Credit and trade have not been well nor equitably adjusted. Now there is difficulty on every hand, with possible far reaching political reactions, as evidenced by the changes in many governments, the distress of nations and the general feeling of insecurity and fear.

Each individual nation has largely been following its own policies, designed to protect its own interests. National self-sufficiency has brought the world near the rocks of bankruptcy and revolution. The motto of national prosperity regardless of other nations has been disastrous. It has also been a futile endeavor, for no nation can drive successfully towards prosperity alone.

But despite these policies there has been an ever increasing measure of international cooperation which is a hopeful sign in an otherwise drab picture. There is urgent need of greater cooperation; in fact it is the "supreme necessity" in these "days of universal interdependence."

Sir George Paish believes that—

"No policy other than one of whole hearted cooperation between all nations can preserve the world from the grave dangers with which it is confronted and can place it again on the high road which leads to an ever increasing measure of well being."

That this is a very difficult task, no one will deny, but the penalty of failure in this accomplishment is too severe to risk, and it is hoped that the needed increase in cooperation will come without delay.

There is a great feeling of political insecurity, despite the numerous pacts and agreements which have been consummated since the war. Economic cooperation would be the greatest safeguard against war and "economic cooperation demands that war be made unnecessary, impossible and unthinkable." Economic cooperation would do much to remove the feeling of political insecurity which can be nothing but a drag upon the recovery and advancement of the world.

There is also a great feeling of injustice abroad in the world today, a feeling that redress of past wrongs is impossible to obtain. Such impressions raise great psychological barriers to closer understanding.

The mental attitude of the world in regard to world problems is largely similar to that obtaining in the infancy of human relationships. We must learn that there is no limit to the possible volume of trade and that prosperity in one country affects others. We must recognize that one nation's gain is not necessarily another's loss. New truths must be learned to meet the new and changing conditions.

Forces for cooperative endeavor are gaining despite the gloomy forebodings of the present conditions. Democratic governments voicing the desires of their peoples are not so prone to be adamant to changes as long established monarchies. Easy means of communication and travel are doing much to foster more intimate acquaintanceship among the various peoples of the world. There is a strong desire for even closer and more intimate intercourse especially as regards commerce. Civilization is being lifted from a national to an international plane.

These things and the progress of science—

"Have converted all the nations of the world from a number of isolated units suffering from a relatively low standard of well-being into a group of complementary and interdependent countries each making its contribution to the well-being of the whole . . ."

This movement met opposition from nations and individuals in favored circumstances, just as the needed acceleration in the movement towards greater cooperation is meeting opposition today in old prejudices, animosities and beliefs which must be swept away.

It is not generally appreciated that the basic industries of each nation are largely dependent on other nations, and that these basic industries are in trouble today because of the extremely low prices of their commodities, resulting from national attempts to re-introduce the policy of self-sufficiency. Many nations are preventing the export of their basic products by placing prohibitive import duties on the products of other nations. Values in the world market govern movement of basic products, and when the demand is insufficient, prices fall. High import duties in many instances strangle the demand. The value of many nation's non-basic products are artificially maintained by a privileged position in a national, not international, market.

With such wide spread economic dislocation Sir George Paish asks:

"Is it not obvious therefore that the pressure of forces making for complete international cooperation are likely to prove irresistible in the not distant future?"

"In brief, will not the consequences of the present insular policy of the nations be so grievous until the true remedies are applied that the peoples of all countries will elect leaders with knowledge of present world economy, who will be prepared to apply the remedies for which the situation so urgently calls?"

The question of reparations is a great barrier. Each nation presented the largest claims possible and have erected tariff walls to prevent a flood of German goods. Germany in an earnest effort to pay offered her goods at low prices and reduced her own purchases, not without reactions in many parts of the world. France, for instance, will not accept goods in total payment and her gold supply is piling up. Germany's sincere but unsuccessful endeavors to meet her obligations have earned her the privilege of more lenient treatment.

"In the interest of all nations a complete settlement both of reparations and of the other questions at issue between Germany and her late opponents has now become a matter of urgent necessity if the world is to adopt a policy of conciliation, adjustment and cooperation and thus to overcome its difficulties."

The debts of the world add to the disorganization and tend to contract trade. They involve many phases of imports and tariffs against products and services, which might better be allowed to flow more freely.

"Taking into account America's farming, planting and mineral industries, it will be realized that if Europe is not to be allowed to meet her debt payments by selling more of her products to America, it would be most advisable to cancel the war debts altogether in order to increase the power of America to sell her products in foreign markets in normal quantities and at normal prices, and thus to help her own industries."

In the past nations were not averse to taking payment in goods and services. A wealthy nation would supply credit and markets. This resulted in great expansion of productive power, in trade, in wealth. Sometimes, however, production would outpace consumption, but the periods of expansion were long and those of relative depression short. Producers were assisted in selling their products to meet their obligations.

Today, for example, the United States discourages imports and debtors are compelled to reduce their purchases and consumption of goods made with the result that debtors to the United States are forced into financial difficulties, lenders private and institutional cannot collect, basic industries cannot dispose of their products, and general economic problems are made more difficult of solution.

Such obstacles to world adjustment should be removed, for "no nation can enjoy prosperity without the help of International trade."

It is rather a discouraging fact that statesmen still seem to consider trade as a form of war. Are all imports evil and all exports good? As nations increase imports they usually expand their exports.

"If the nations will now remove the mental, political and artificial obstacles which they have erected . . . the grave danger confronting them will disappear and they will enter upon a new period of greater trade expansion than they have ever experienced."

With reference to the gold problem Sir George Paish has this to say:

"The great obstacles to world recovery are political. When these are removed the world's present stock of gold will be found to be fully adequate for all requirements . . ."

But he believes that whereas now distrust prevails, there can be no general recovery "without a universal spirit of confidence." The mentality must be changed to appreciate underlying factors of the situation. Today, people are thinking for themselves and affairs are controlled in a large measure by public opinion. Statesmen and peoples fail to realize their common interests "in this age of easy and rapid communication."

"How can there be confidence when nations, institutions and individuals are being forced into bankruptcy not by an inability or any unwillingness to produce but because almost every nation is endeavoring to prevent payment being made in the products of other nations for what it sells or for obligations due it?"

A changed mental attitude is needed. "All reasonable people believe the war a product of wrong mentality," but the change in attitude is not complete.

"No single step that could be taken to overcome the present crisis would be as effective as the abolition of all danger of war both in the immediate and the distant future."

Fear needs be changed into confidence, injustice into justice, and antagonism into cooperation.

"Is it not obvious therefore that the change in the political mentality of the nations must become complete, and that politically as well as economically nations must regard each other as friends and partners, and not as antagonists?"

Definite, positive action along these lines is sorely needed. Words will not suffice.

"The conference which the situation now demands is one to which the statesmen of every country would come and would bring the greatest contribution, both political and economic, which their respective nations could possibly make to the solution of the most difficult and dangerous crisis with which the world has ever been confronted."

Both national and international stability is essential and each nation must contribute to the common good. National policies must be brought into harmony with international policies, and differences should be settled without further delay.

Among the measures which will facilitate the solution of world difficulties are that nations become responsible for maintaining world peace and that the European powers agree to reach a better understanding, that prosperity may again favor the world.

"The almost universal answer to this question would undoubtedly be the forgiveness of reparations, indebtedness, the cancellation of the so-called Inter-Allied debts, the removal of all hindrances to both national and international trade, and the provision of new capital and credit for world development in the same manner that it has been supplied, almost without intermission for the last two or three centuries, and more especially during the last century."

After outlining the needs and essential changes in attitude of several of the great nations, Sir George Paish concludes that all nations must make their best contributions, exchange goods freely with others, and create political and financial confidence.

He closes with the following:

"The existing situation is without precedent. The crisis is no ordinary depression that will right itself as former crises righted themselves. It is a great catastrophe that cannot be overcome without the cooperation of all nations, great and small. . . . The distress of all nations which is rapidly growing threatens to bring universal revolution. The difficulties of adjustment are thus not diminishing but increasing. The situation needs therefore to be considered not as a depression but as a disaster which necessitates and demands the combined efforts of statesmen and peoples of all countries to overcome. . . .

"The first and greatest step that is needed is a recognition of the common danger and of the need for united action. The statesmen of Europe have already recognized the European danger. The statesmen of the world have neither admitted nor recognized the world danger."

"Will the statesmen of all countries recognize the common danger before there is a complete breakdown, or must the peoples of all countries be subjected to unprecedented distress and suffering before the nations understand that they now constitute one great family and that they must cooperate for their common good?"

Thus from sheer economic necessity he pleads for the solution of the world troubles, for the abolition of war and animosity and for the establishment of better understanding and cooperation—for universal peace.

It is interesting to know that such an authority has the courage to speak so clearly on the complex problem of world betterment. It is more interesting to see how closely his admonitions synchronize with the great principles of Bahá'u'lláh. The one call is sounded from the halls of commerce and politics—the other from the chambers of religion.

However accurate and profound may be the thoughts expressed in "The Way to Recovery," 'Abdu'l-Bahá has taught us that the underlying secrets of the difficulties of economic adjustments are spiritual in nature, and that the real solution is in following the laws of God.

One cannot read "The Way to Recovery" without feeling gratitude to Sir George Paish for his excellent analyses of the problems and their solution, and feeling that it is a book which stimulates wholesome thinking.

The world must not only "recover" materially but progress spiritually.

EINSTEIN—THE MODERN MYSTIC

EMERIC SALA

EINSTEIN is a man of mystery. His picture has been reproduced in almost every magazine and newspaper. Perhaps no scientist ever attained such popularity as Einstein. And yet his scientific works are understood only by a very limited number of scientists.

He has destroyed the foundation of all physical sciences. He has overthrown the universe of Newton that endured for three centuries. He is the greatest mathematician of our day. And yet there are scientists who tell us that there is nothing we laymen can derive from his discoveries.

Einstein is an intuitive thinker. He is essentially religious by nature. His private life discloses the characteristics of a saint. He has been a dreamer all his life; and as such he caught a vision of the infinity of the universe. He produced scientific proofs of the endlessness and spacelessness of the cosmos. And yet many of our scientists and philosophers fail to recognize the significance of Einstein's contribution to modern thought.

Students of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh have, we assume, a better perspective and can perceive, in part at least, the radical changes Einstein's work will eventually impose on science, philosophy and religion.

His approach to scientific problems is unique.

As an intuitive thinker, he conceives an idea first, then he develops its mathematical soundness, and then he establishes its truth.

LET US apply this same method to other departments of human study. If one wishes to make new discoveries in economics, for instance, he will conceive an ideal first. He will recognize the fallacy of our economic system, which condemns millions of people to a state of stricken poverty and deprivation for no fault of their own. And after having convinced himself that this system can be replaced by one that assures an equitable distribution of wealth, he will concentrate all his powers towards the realization of such an objective.

Having caught that vision, he will according to Einstein's method, direct all his studies and research work towards that objective. He will discard all those antiquated books and confused theories that fail to serve his purpose. Such a process of crystalization will develop a clear and positive mind that will serve as a potential asset in the Commonwealth of the future.

This new method of scientific approach, as exposed by Einstein, has been referred to by Bahá'u'lláh in the following words: "To acquire knowledge is incumbent on all, but knowledge of those sciences which may profit the people of the earth, and not of such sciences as begin in mere words and end in mere words."

It is interesting to note that Einstein's statement: "I am of the opinion that all the finer speculations in the realm of science spring from a deep religious feeling" can be correlated with the following utterances of Bahá'u'lláh: "Verily we have made thee the rising-place of my science and the manifestation of my wisdom to whosoever is in heaven and on earth . . . we shall raise up from thee people of wonderful sciences and powerful arts and will show forth from them that of which the heart of no servant could ever conceive."

THE SCIENTIFIC discoveries of Einstein will, in all probability, have the same revolutionary effect on our religious outlook as it had on scientific thought. One of his most outstanding contributions is the complete eradication of absolutism and fundamentalism in religion as well as in philosophy.

All religious organizations of the past, within the reach of our knowledge, are based on doctrines that are to be interpreted as absolute and final. In the light of modern science a statement conceived by the human mind cannot hold as absolute and final. Our conception of truth is only relative and not absolute. Absolute is only infinity, which is timeless and spaceless, and beyond the comprehension of the human intellect. This is why Bahá'u'lláh said: "Ye shall be hindered from loving me, and souls shall be perturbed at my mention; for minds cannot grasp me nor hearts contain me."

Truth is God, the Infinite, which we cannot express in words. Every religious utterance, pronounced or reasoned out by man with logic, is, therefore, only of a relative value.

Shoghi Effendi* describes as “The fundamental verity underlying the Bahá'í faith—that religious truth is not absolute but relative, that divine revelation is not final but progressive.”

This new outlook contained in the Bahá'í teachings, and now being discussed by modern science, is unknown and unpracticed by any of the former religious systems.

All indications show that modern science is turning again towards a religious interpretation of the universe. (The mechanistic conception of life is already antiquated.)

Einstein says: “Only deeply religious people are earnest men of research!” And again: “Cosmic religious experience is the strongest and the noblest driving force behind scientific research.”

Modern science could never accept a religion that is based on absolutism or fundamentalism, that is, not a religion with human measurements and interpretations.

The Prophets of all ages were the harbingers of both spiritual and material teachings, but Bahá'u'lláh said: “Know thou, that in every age and dispensation all divine ordinances are changed and transformed according to the requirements of the time except the law of love, which, like unto a fountain, flows always and is never overtaken by change.”

And 'Abdu'l-Bahá explains what is meant by the unchangeable law in these words: “Each of the divine religions embodies two kinds of ordinances. The first are those which concern spiritual susceptibilities, the development of moral principles and the quickening of the conscience of man. These are essential or fun- damental, one and the same in all religions, changeless and eternal, reality not subject to transformation . . . all the Divine Prophets and Messengers were the instruments and channels of this same eternal, essential truth.

“The second kind of ordinances in the divine religions are those which relate to the material affairs of humankind. These are the material or accidental laws which are subject to change in each day of manifestation, according to exigencies of the time, conditions and differing capacities of humanity.”

The rising generation is slowly realizing all this, and they are turning away from superstitions, imaginations and dogmas. They are searching for a new conception of religion, which will not limit their thoughts and aspirations to certain obsolete rules.

In the light of modern physics everything is relative but the infinite, which is not subject to space nor time.

In the light of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh all the limitations of nature and of the human mind are earthly, while the attaining of a universal consciousness that knows no boundaries is of God.

Finally, here is a concrete statement from the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá which gives encouraging promise for the future:

“A New Era of divine consciousness is upon us. The world of humanity is going through a process of transformation. A new race is being developed. The thoughts of human brotherhood are permeating all regions. New ideals are stirring the depths of hearts and a new spirit of universal consciousness is being profoundly felt by all men.”

THE DIVINE PURPOSE

IT is our duty to put forth our greatest efforts and summon all our energies in order that the bonds of unity and accord may be established among mankind. For thousands of years we have had bloodshed and strife. It is enough; it is sufficient. Now is the time to associate together in love and harmony. For thousands of years we have tried the sword and warfare; let mankind for a time at least live in peace. Review history and consider how much savagery, how much bloodshed and battle the world has witnessed. It has been either religious warfare, political warfare or some other clash of human interests. The world of humanity has never enjoyed the blessing of Universal Peace.

“Year by year the implements of warfare have been increased and perfected. Consider the wars of past centuries; only ten, fifteen or twenty thousand at the most were killed but now it is possible to kill one hundred thousand in a single day.* In ancient times warfare was carried on with the sword; today it is the smokeless gun. Formerly battleships were sailing vessels; today they are dreadnoughts. Consider the increase and improvement in the weapons of war.

“God has created us all human and all countries of the world are parts of the same globe. We are all His servants. He is kind and just to all. Why should we be unkind and unjust to each other? He provides for all. Why should we deprive one another? He protects and preserves all. Why should we kill our fellow-creatures?

“If this warfare and strife be for the sake of religion, it is evident that it violates the spirit and basis of all religion. All the Divine Manifestations have proclaimed the oneness of God and the unity of mankind. They have taught that men should love and mutually help each other in order that they might progress. Now if this conception of religion be true, its essential principle is the oneness of humanity. The fundamental truth of the Manifestations is peace. This underlies all religion, all justice. The divine purpose is that men should live in unity, concord and agreement and should love one another. Consider the virtues of the human world and realize that the oneness of humanity is the primary foundation of them all.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

BAHÁ'Í PIONEERS

SIYYID MUSTAFA ROUMIE

*A Short Historical Survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

The missionary journeys of the author, Mr. Roumie, with the great Bahá'í teacher Jamal Effendi throughout India, were successful in a general way. Jamal, a cultured Persian scholar of refined, venerable appearance and eloquent discourse, found no difficulty in attaining access to leading people of various Indian States, including high government officials and rulers themselves. During his stay of two years in India, he visited many important States. Everywhere he received a warm reception and his message was listened to courteously. In many cases men of influence became followers of the Bahá'í Faith, and in several places Bahá'í Assemblies were formed. The work thus begun by Jamal has continued in unbroken succession to the present day when India has reached the point of being second, perhaps, in importance to Persia itself in the number of Bahá'ís.

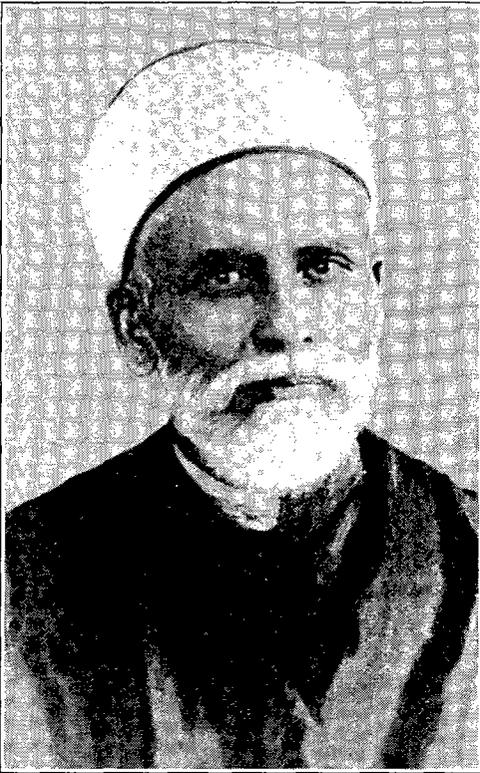

WE left Calcutta May 1878 and reached Rangoon after a trip of seven days, steamers at that time being very slow. Our arrival in Burma was rather unusual. Though we had no acquaintances in this city, the news of our missionary journeys had been widely spread and because the difficulties in regard to our baggage and the police department had been noised abroad, all of the citizens of Rangoon knew of our arrival. At the wharf were many people who had come to meet us, among them a young man, Haji Siyyid Mahdi Shirazi of Egypt. We had written to him about our coming, requesting him to procure a suitable place for our residence. This he attended to, and was at the wharf to meet us upon our arrival.

Here we found in this picturesque new country everything different: new faces, new kinds of dress, new language, new manners, new food, new religion, and new forms of worship which were not known in India. There were very few Persians then living in Rangoon, and most of them rich merchants; the other foreign peoples frequenting Rangoon were Chinese and Indians. Our new friend, Haji, assuming us to belong to the wealthy commercial class had secured a large building in the business quarter. Later, because of defects in the roof, we moved to adjoining quarters in Mogul Street. Here people of all nationalities, creeds and castes came daily to see us. Jamal Effendi had the faculty of speaking to each soul in accordance with its own needs. His wisdom as a teacher was extraordinary. His audiences were always attracted and as a rule felt themselves blessed by his eloquent addresses.

The Chief Commissioner gave us a wonderful reception and listened with kind attention to our statements, promised to help us in every way possible, and gave us a letter of

* The first and second installments of this series were published in the June and July numbers respectively.

Siyyid Mustafa Roumie, a renowned Bahá'í teacher, and author of this series.

introduction to the then chief secretary, Mr. J. E. Bridges. The next day we went to interview this gentleman. He received us courteously, was very kind to us, and after due inquiry into our affairs, directed us to see the Deputy Commissioner to whom he gave us a letter of introduction.

AS A RESULT of this mission of Jamal Effendi in Rangoon many wonderful souls accepted the Faith enthusiastically, and in a very short time the Cause was widely promulgated. Then occurred a peculiar incident due to the unwise zeal of our Rangoon friend, Haji Shirazi. Being a novice in the Cause and untrained in the best way of giving the Bahá'í Message, he took it upon himself, in a moment of great zeal, to go to the Shiite Mosque in the midst of the Friday worship; and there making a stand loudly called upon the congregation inviting them to come and see the Bahá'í teacher, Jamal Effendi. "Dont pause or tarry for a moment," he said, "come immediately. The appointed time foretold in the Holy Books has arrived. The prophecies have been fulfilled. The Promised Ones have duly appeared. The glad-tidings of Their Manifestation is widely known in Persia and all over the world. Thousands of people in Persia have accepted this Faith, and have sacrificed lives, family and wealth in this path. Come immediately and hear Jamal Effendi in his wonderful way expound this Movement. You will see with your own eyes the new heaven and the new earth, the new sun and the new moon, the new religion and the new faith . . ." etc.

This unwise and ill-timed discourse created the greatest commotion and tumult among the fanatical Shiite congregation in the Mosque. Outcries, curses, abuse, scoffings,—were raised from every side. A terrible excitement reigned, in the midst of which Haji fortunately escaped and slipped out of the Mosque, otherwise he would undoubtedly have received fatal injuries from the mob and perhaps have been killed then and there.

The Muhammadans called a meeting to deal with this "infidel," and a special priest named Agha Sayed Jawad, a visitor to Rangoon, brought there to officiate especially at the Feast of Moharram, rose in the pulpit and openly denounced and abused and cursed our friend Haji, mentioning him by name. He roused the mob to fierce excitement, urging them to unite in force and violence and to eradicate the Bahá'is from Burma. He urged that our friend Haji be expelled from the Shiite Mosque, excommunicated and killed on the spot lest the whole province be won over to this heretic faith.

This provocative sermon impressed only a few of the audience. Fortunately the majority were of too much culture and intelligence to pay any attention to it.

Meanwhile we were all in the dark concerning this event—Haji, probably because he was ashamed, having given us no information concerning it. It had been done entirely without consultation with us.

What he did do was to bring a charge of defamation of character against the priest who had delivered the violent sermon against him. This charge, brought before the District Magistrate Court, after full investigation, was decided against the fanatical priest. He was obliged to execute a bond for keeping the peace for six months. Feeling disgraced by this, the priest left Burma by the next boat for Calcutta.

Soon Haji came to us again bringing half a dozen of his relatives and friends to Jamal Effendi to hear the Bahá'í Message. Haji's father-in-law—a well known merchant—having died, his wife had inherited the property and rule of the family. Since she did not sympathize with Haji in his Bahá'í Faith, it was necessary for him to leave his kindred and become separated from the family.

THE RESULT of Haji's mistaken zeal in the Mosque did not cause any violent hindrance to the work as was feared, but it was some time before the poisonous effect of the incriminating sermon of the priest had died away. After all, some results did come from Haji's public announcement of Jamal's mission as given in the Mosque, for some of the people who heard it were curious to investigate the truth of the matter.

One afternoon a young Persian gentleman of about thirty came up to see us, evidently by his appearance some one of high family. But he was most rude and coarse in his manner to us, and we soon noticed that he was intoxicated. Evidently he had been under the impression that we were people of low class. As soon as he entered into the presence of Jamal Effendi and recognized his culture and station in life, he realized his mistake, became silent and remained only a little while, asking permission as he left to come and see Jamal Effendi the next day.

He came punctually as promised, a perfect gentleman now both in manner and dress. We welcomed him warmly, and as Jamal Effendi discoursed to him with love and wisdom, gradually the young man's face shone as a result of the effect of the Divine Message with which he seemed to be delighted. He remained seated for a long time in silence, a soul enchanted. Then Jamal told him to come again the next day, for he should take time now to digest what he had heard this day. It was enough of a lesson for the present.

Jamal Effendi learned upon inquiry about him that he was a descendant of the "Kad-Khoda" family of Shiráz, Persia, and his name was Agha Muhammad Kassim Shirázi. He had come to Rangoon to visit his uncle and cousins who had settled here many years before and were clothing merchants.

This youth now came every day to see us and soon was a confirmed Bahá'í. Later he told us how he had come first to see us as a foe, and purposely had made himself intoxicated in order to inflict some fatal injury upon us. But what a miracle, he said, that he had returned the next day and the next and the next, impelled by his attraction to the Cause. This youth received many wonderful Tablets from Bahá'u'llah.

In Rangoon we had many followers from the Sunnite community and some from the Shiite community.*

In the Sunnite community were Meolvi Abdul Subhan Koreishes, his five sons, his wife and his wife's sister and mother, as well as other relatives belonging to this family. This composed the largest Bahá'í family in Rangoon. They subsequently received many Tablets from Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Among the Shiite community also there were a large number who received Tablets from Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and from this community a group journeyed in 1899 to Haifa; they were the pilgrims who went with the sacred marble coffin, made in Mandalay for His Holiness the Báb, which was placed in the Tomb of the Báb on Mt. Carmel.

(To be Continued)

* The Muhammadan world is divided into two main groups: the Sunnites and the Shiites. The Sunnites (Turkey, Arabia, part of India) are literal followers of the Word and acknowledge the Caliph as their spiritual head whom they look upon as the spiritual and temporal successor of Muhammad. The Shiites, on the contrary, do not accept the Caliphate, considering that Omar usurped this rule by his martyrdom of Ali and his two sons. They believe in the hidden spiritual succession of Mahdís, the twelfth Mahdi yet to be revealed would be the return of Muhammad. They follow interpretation rather than the letter of the Qur'an and in the interpretation depend upon their priests, who thus have great power over them. They are more excitable than the Sunnites.

EL BÁB

O inner heart
 Thru which the rivers of God's love shall flow,
 Thou art the Gate
 By which a waiting world will know
 That glorious Orb
 Who rose o'er Persia's slowly yielding night
 To flash a host of angels into flight.

O Gate of God,
 Ope wide Thy door
 And let the vista of Thy mystic lore
 Reveal the pre-existent plan
 To make of earth a paradise for man.
 Take Thou our hearts and gently lead us in
 The chalice of supernal grace to win.
 Lead us beyond our hopes; beyond our tears;
 To see that Beauty Whom Thy soul reveres.
 O Gate of God!

AUGUSTE FOREL—MAN OF VISION

STANWOOD COBB

I SHALL never forget my pilgrimage in 1922 to "La Fourmiliere" at Yverne, Switzerland, home of the great scientist, philosopher and humanitarian, Dr. Auguste Forel, recently deceased. He was then in his seventy-fourth year and crippled by paralysis as a result of a previous stroke. His enunciation was poor, it was difficult for him to formulate his thoughts rapidly in words, his hands were crippled and writing was extremely arduous for him. Yet the thing which impressed me most in my day's visit and communion with him was the feeling of a great intellect and a great soul expressing itself through the crippled medium. One could see plainly that the spirit of the man was undiminished, his intellect as powerful as ever. It was only the channel through which that intellect could reach the world that was effected. What an argument for the immortality of the soul! His brain had become injured, his mind not at all. His spirit, may we say, had become even greater as a result of his physical disability.

Dr. Forel showed me with interest and indefatigable patience his works ranged about on the numerous shelves of his study, innumerable books on a wide range of subjects. He had literary command of two languages, German and French, in each of which some of his publications had appeared. In addition, copies of his works had been translated into almost every language of Europe. All these he showed me with pride.

Besides his own publications, these book shelves which surrounded the room on every side from floor to ceiling, were piled thick with other publications which he used as research material, all divided into sections according to subject matter. Here no housekeeping diligence was allowed to invade. This room was sacred to Dr. Forel and his literary work. Everything must be left as he himself left it, so that he might know just where to put his hand on anything that he wished. It was not as orderly as a modern office or library. But it was evidence of the strange paradox that a creative mind which is most orderly in its power to organize intellectual material, may be in the organization of the material environment somewhat cluttery. For the mental and physical energy is given in such cases to the organizing of ideas, and no time or energy is left for tidying up.

With the keenest interest Dr. Forel showed my wife and myself five volumes on the life of the ant* which has just been published in French. This work has later been translated and published in this country. He turned to the different parts of the book, and gave us a long discourse in elucidation of the text and of the illustrations, telling us how he came to make his discoveries. At the age of twenty-one, he had published a book on the ant, the observations and discoveries of which he never had reason to modify. By coloring with cobalt the food which he fed the ants, and by keeping food from all but one ant at a time, he made the discovery of the strange social stomach of the ant which is anterior to its own individual stomach. Food is first turned into liquid form in this social stomach and from there regurgitated and shared in case of need with other hungry ants, only one-nineteenth being kept to go into the individual stomach.

He showed us an illustration of the valve which leads from the social stomach into the individual stomach. I remember my attempt at that time to picture to myself in how far we must consider the workings of this valve to be automatic, and in how far we may consider this a voluntary ethical effort on the part of the ant.

DR. FOREL gave us many interesting incidents of his life. He said that as a boy he was not very fond of studying. He was poor at Latin and mathematics. What he loved best was to linger on his way to and from school to study insect life by the roadside. From the age of six years he observed the snails, the wasps and the ants. At the age of eleven his grandmother, appreciating his fondness for insect life, gave him a rather costly book on the ant, highly prized by him ever since. This book he said, was a great formative influence in his life; for it led him into making the study of this remarkable insect his major life work.

At the age of twenty-one, as stated above, he brought out his first work on the ant, which made him famous. Others too have become world authorities on the ant, but Forel has the honor of having added more variety of ants to the knowledge of science than any other man, and of having formed the largest collection of ants in existence, which later he donated to the Natural History Museum of Geneva.

Dr. Auguste Forel, distinguished scientist, scholar and humanitarian.

DR. FOREL had a many sided mind. Both his interests and education covered many spheres of human thought and study. He received the Doctorate of Medicine, also of Philosophy, and made distinguished contributions to the science of psychiatry, myrmecology and philosophy. He published books which became well known on such subjects as hypnotism, alcoholism, psychiatry and the sex life. "The Sexual Question," published late in life, has been widely circulated and has been translated and published in this country.

During his long life of scholarly achievement, Dr. Forel published more than four hundred different works. The mere enumeration of these filled a pamphlet of thirty pages which was published by his friends in Vienna in 1908 on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday.

DR. FOREL'S medical and psychiatric work at the lunatic asylums of Munich and of Zurich (of the latter he became director) turned his attention to the fatal effects of alcoholism. From then on it became one of the chief missions of his life to combat in every way possible this curse. I recall with what fire and indignation he spoke to me of how besotted drunkards get, how filthy they make their homes, and how tragic their inebriation may become for their wives and children. This poison which leads men to foul and evil deeds of which they would otherwise be incapable, seemed to him one of the greatest curses of humanity. He was one of the first in Europe to found a temperance society. When he bought the property at Yvorne he told me that he had the vineyards torn up to make place for vegetable and flower gardens.

"On the first of September 1928," says the "Feville D'Avis de Lausanne," "thousands upon thousands of the people of Europe wrote their recognition of the master of Yvorne as a compassionate physician, a courageous struggler against alcohol and all forms of vice, as a learned psychiatrist, a seeker who revealed the world of the ants, and a thinker who showed the people prophetic vision and the voice of a life free, peaceful, united and happy. All of which he lived as he recommended."

Shortly after the world war, which was a tragic blow to his humanitarian belief in the ideals of world peace, he came in contact at Karlsruhe—(where he was visiting his daughter and son-in-law, (Mrs. and Dr. Brauns)—with the teachings of the Bahá'i Cause. The principles enumerated by Bahá'u'lláh for the New World Order, those lofty ideals for world peace and world brotherhood, so deeply impressed Dr. Forel that he became himself a Bahá'i.

"I found Bahá'u'lláh had years ago declared the very principles which I had come to believe in, he told me, therefore I wished to be considered a follower of Bahá'u'lláh."

From that day on "the grand old man" of Switzerland devoted his life largely to the promulgation of these principles of Bahá'u'lláh. "He served Bahá'u'lláh with immense capacity and indefatigable faithfulness up to the day of his passing," says of him Miss Martha Root, Bahá'i teacher and world traveler, who visited him a few years before his death, "He was truly a glorious and loving apostle of Bahá'u'lláh."

"Dr. Auguste Forel," she declares, "was one of the great Bahá'is in Europe. Wherever, in lecturing at the leading universities of Europe and the far East, I spoke of Dr. Forel, his great achievements and his Bahá'i acceptance, the students listened with keen interest and acclaimed their approval with tremendous applause. And when I visited the chief cities of Switzerland to lecture about Bahá'u'lláh's universal principles for world peace, every city and every educator in Switzerland had heard of these teachings from their celebrated patriot and scientist, Dr. Forel.

"I had the privilege of visiting Dr. Forel in 1929," Miss Root further states, "and I consider him one of the greatest humanitarians I have ever met—one of the most just, most kindly, most intelligent. He was a genius who saw the truth and the power of Bahá'u'lláh's teachings to usher in a New Era in divine civilization."

IT IS OF interest in connection with the later life of Dr. Forel to know that one of the most important Tablets given by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to the world was addressed to this great scientist. The Tablet dwelt chiefly on the proof of the existence of God and the immortality of the soul, Dr. Forel having been, up to the time of becoming a Bahá'i, a positivist; he was an ardent humanitarian devoted to the advancement of humanity but not believing in the existence of God or the soul. This remarkable exposition of 'Abdu'l-Bahá on the scientific proofs of the existence of a Divine Creator and of the soul was accepted by Dr. Forel. It would be well if this Tablet could be studied in every university in the world, and by every scientist and religionist.

A PROOF OF THE SOUL

An extract from the remarkable Tablet of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Dr. Forel mentioned in the above article. For the complete Tablet the reader is referred to The Bahá'i Magazine, Vol. 14, pp. 101-109.

WE regard knowledge and wisdom as the foundation of the progress of mankind, and extol philosophers that are endowed with broad vision. . . .

"Now concerning mental faculties, they are in truth of the inherent properties of the soul, even as the radiation of light is the essential property of the sun. The rays of the sun are renewed but the sun itself is ever the same and unchanged.

"Consider how the human intellect develops and weakens, and may at times come to naught, whereas the soul changeth not. For the mind to manifest itself, the human body must be whole; and a sound mind cannot be but in a sound body, whereas the soul dependeth not upon the body. It is through the power of the soul that the mind comprehendeth, imagineth and exerteth its influence, whilst the soul is a power that is free. The mind comprehendeth the abstract by the aid of the concrete, but the soul hath limitless manifestations of its own. The mind is circumscribed, the soul limitless. It is by the aid of such senses as those of sight, hearing, taste, smell and touch, that the mind comprehendeth, whereas, the soul is free from all agencies. The soul, as thou observeth, whether it be in sleep or waking, is in motion and ever active. Possibly it may, whilst in a dream, unravel an intricate problem, incapable of solution in the waking state. The mind, moreover, understandeth not whilst the senses have ceased to function, and in the embryonic stage and in early infancy the reasoning power is totally absent, whereas the soul is ever endowed with full strength. In short, the proofs are many that go to show that despite the loss of reason, the power of the soul would still continue to exist."

DRIFT AND DIRECTION*

FLORENCE E. PINCHON

DRAMATIS PERSONAE:

Sir John and Lady Gray
Frances (daughter)
Mr. James Magnous
Rev. Goodenough
Roduki Effendi, a traveling teacher

IT is a quaint and pleasant sitting-room whose windows overlook a broad river shining in grey and silver, and fringed by a few trees.

An ancient barge, heavily laden, drifts slowly down stream.

Afternoon tea is being arranged on a small table to right centre of the room. Lady Gray, a gracious motherly woman, is seated there putting some finishing touches to a bowl of flowers.

Sir John Gray, a white-haired statesman, is standing on the hearth-rug filling a cigar box with fresh cigars. He is a dignified man with brows drawn in fine lines of anxious thought.

Sir John—It is scarcely like your usual tact, my dear, inviting this colored gentleman to meet our guests.

Lady Gray—(Quietly) Just wait till you see him, John. He's not a bit darker than a Spaniard or Italian. Besides, it is surely time that we gave up these foolish prejudices about a person's skin.

Sir John—Yes, of course. But you know the Rev. Goodenough is not too tolerant of any religious ideas other than his own. Although I must say that, as parsons go, he's pretty broad-minded.

Lady Gray—(to maid entering with cakes, etc.) Yes, Mary, put them there. (Continues arranging the flowers.)

Sir John—By-the-way—you said he is a kind of travelling teacher. What does he profess to teach?

Lady Gray—(calmly) He is going round the world spreading the ideals and principles of a great Movement which—he declares—is divinely inspired.

Sir John—Humph!—Divinely inspired! I wonder what his reverence will say to that!

Lady Gray—And that a practical application of these spiritual principles would solve all our modern problems.

Sir John—(with short laugh) I should like him to have just half an hour in my shoes at the Home Office!

And I can't imagine that Jimmie will appreciate anything that the East has to say about the management of coal mines.

Lady Gray—(with gentle coolness) I don't think you need be uneasy, John. One can at least always rely upon Oriental courtesy.

Sir John—(meaningly) Oriental—yes!

Enter Frances, young, with fair shingled hair, wearing an artists overall and carrying palette and brushes. She pauses at sight of tea tray.

Frances—Oh!—I quite forgot—your tea-party!

Lady Gray—Be quick and change Dear. (As she is turning away).

*Author's Note: The gestures and movements portraying the emotions of the characters are, of course, most necessary in order to impart reality to the spoken dialogue, but these must be left to the skill of the Producer. It has not been possible, in the circumstances, to give more than slight indications.

Sir John—(calling her) Frances! . . . I suppose you know we're expecting a stranger this afternoon—a Persian. . . . Persia—the home of the Arts.

Frances—It is hardly likely that he will have any opinions to offer on modern Art. (Turning swiftly to Lady Gray.) What is he, Mother?

Lady Gray—You will see for yourself, my darling.

Frances—(going out on door to left and aside to herself.) Something morally devastating, I suppose. Religion—politics—money! . . . A real boring afternoon I can see!

She exits on left, as maid announces—door to right—Mr. Magnus. He is middle-aged, stout, and very well dressed. He shakes hands with hostess, accepts a cigarette from host, and stands talking.

Mr. Magnus—Came down from the mines in record time, and then got held up for nearly ten minutes. . . . Never think we were facing severe economic depression to see the traffic.

Sir John—Trouble again with your men?

Mr. Magnus—Yes, the usual. Higher wages—shorter hours. I just won't stand for it (gloomily). It means another strike, I'm afraid.

Sir John—My wife tells me that a Persian friend she has invited to meet you holds a kind of—magic solution—for all these difficulties.

Mr. Magnus—A pretty big order that, Sir John!

Door opens, maid announces Rev. Goodenough. Tall and thin with glasses. He shakes hands and talks with hostess.

Rev. Goodenough—I was very interested in your kind note, Lady Gray. There is no doubt much that we may learn from the East (with slight condescension).

Lady Gray—(sweetly) I am so glad that you were able to come.

Sir John—(jocularly) I hope you have all your guns ready, Sir; for I understand that Roduki Effendi is something of a theologian.

Rev. Goodenough—Oh, I like to keep an open mind, you know. It doesn't do to be dogmatic these days. (Takes cup of tea from hostess.)

Enter Frances. As she is greeting guests, footsteps are heard approaching.

Sir John—(glancing at wrist watch, observes smilingly) The virtue of punctuality, anyhow!

Door is opened and Roduki Effendi enters. Maid does not announce him, and lingers a moment, staring after him curiously.

Company betray, by little signs, surprise at his appearance and apparent age. He is a youthful looking man, dressed in Persian costume of pure white, small neat turban crowning dark, rather long hair brushed back behind ears, buttoned tunic and sari. His bearing is upright and dignified, his voice and manners pleasing and extremely courteous, conveying an impression of happiness combined with alertness and strength.

A breath as of spring seems to come into the room with him.

Everybody looks interested.

Frances—(aside to Lady Gray). And I thought he'd sure to be a real old fossil!

Quite naturally the Traveller is given a seat in centre of the group after being introduced all round, and tea and cakes are handed about, to be followed later by cigars and cigarettes, as the following conversations proceed.

Sir John—I hear that you are a great traveller, Effendi, and well acquainted with the state of affairs in this part of the globe.

Effendi—Yes—the whole world being—so to speak—my home, I perceive that the needs and problems of both East and West are, fundamentally, the same.

(His voice is quiet, measured and courteous.)

Mr. Magnus—(rather loudly) But you're better off, in some ways, than we are, Sir—with our strikes, trade unions, and unemployment.

Effendi—Ah, no! Only our spirit of discontent, greed and class prejudice has always taken a somewhat different form.

Mr. Magnus—(makes a little gesture of surprise. The others begin to listen intently.)

Lady Gray—You mean, I suppose, the terrible castes, and so on?

Effendi—Yes. For with us the dividing lines are formed rather by religious beliefs and superstitions than by the size of the banking account.

Rev. Goodenough—Yet it is surprising how much more charitable people are now than they used to be. At any rate we do not leave our unemployed to starve.

Mr. Magnus—(with conscious benevolence) Yes, and of course some form of public charity it must be—or the dole. But in my opinion both are equally pernicious. If only—as you were saying Sir—(turning to Effendi) we could get rid of this ugly temper among the workers, this bitter class prejudice and discontent (strolling towards window). But meantime the whole industrial system of the country is in more or less chaos, and drifting—like that old barge out there (waving hand towards window as he moves again to company)—to heaven knows where!

Effendi—(sympathetically) If the captain of the ship does not know the port of destination, how can he steer his course?

Mr. Magnus—That's just it! How in the dickens can he? We capitalists have no unified policy or plan of action at all . . .

Effendi—Yet the plan is there—only waiting to be adopted.

Mr. Magnus—(eagerly) Really? I've never heard of it then. Whose is it?

Effendi—(with quiet emphasis) It is God's. (There is a significant hush. Company exchange glances. Mr. Magnus looks very disappointed.)

It is a part—only a part—of an all-inclusive and constructive plan which He is giving, not to your country alone, but to the whole modern world.

Sir John—(urbanely) Well, granted that this is so, by what means do you suggest this—eh—Plan may be applied?

Effendi—In the industrial world by means of intelligence, and a sympathetic imagination.

Frances—(handing tea, stops, and repeats softly with pleased surprise) Sympathetic—imagination!

Rev. Goodenough—(carefully wiping his glasses) Just the golden rule—of course—the golden rule!

Effendi—(smilingly assenting) Certainly. But the golden rule as applicable to the social and economic conditions of a great industrial age.

Lady Gray—(leaning forward eagerly) Which means, Effendi—?

Effendi—That owners of factories, mines and big businesses would cease to regard their employees either as inferiors, or as cogs in a machine; but would consider the happiness and welfare of the workers equally with their own.

Mr. Magnus—But you've no idea the enormous increase I've already made in the wages of my men.

Effendi—But wages are not enough!

(Several voices repeat in surprise—not enough!)

Effendi—No, because the worker needs to put his heart and energy into his business, and to feel that he has a personal interest and ambition in the particular work he is doing.

Mr. Magnus—(appealing to Sir John and Lady Gray) Now, isn't that just what I've always said?

Lady Gray—(nodding) Yes. You have often complained.

Effendi—Yet this interest should not be difficult to secure. Why not introduce a system of bonuses and fair profit-sharing, say—a certain number of shares assigned to each employee. This, combined with frank and open dealing on the part of the directors, would surely serve to transform the discontented employee into a happy and willing partner and co-worker.

Mr. Magnus—(with surprised dismay) And you really think—it must come—to that?

Effendi—Unless you wish to suffer far greater losses.

Frances—(handing her Mother a cup) Yes—Mother—for Mr. Magnus. He will need it extra strong. (Magnus motions her to be careful.)

Sir John—(helpfully) You know, Jimmie—the kind of thing that a few firms are already trying out in the States and Australia—with quite satisfactory results, I believe.

Mr. Magnus—(slowly and thoughtfully) Yes—I think I catch the idea. Good-will, co-operation and all that—as a sort of illumined self-interest. But—my dear fellow, as you are only too well aware, there's a whole vicious circle of other problems involved—currency—tariffs—customs. . . .

Sir John—It seems to me that none of these questions can now be solved by any country alone. So rapidly is the world becoming a single economic unit, the distress or prosperity of one must affect all. What do you think, Effendi?

Effendi—That is, happily, true. For this is the Hour of Unity of the sons of men, and there is awakening in the consciousness of mankind a new keen realization of their essential oneness. So—let us strive to fling wide open the rivers of commerce, and remove the barriers of suspicion, fear and jealous rivalry by means of international co-operation and trust, by unified systems of distribution and exchange of wealth, goods, produce and natural resources. For glory is no longer his who only loves his native land—glory is his who loves his kind!

LIGHT ON BASIC UNITY

LOUIS G. GREGORY

Interracial amity has been taught by Bahá'is since the early days of the Cause when Bahá'u'lláh so marvelously proclaimed the oneness of humanity in His teaching, "Ye are all the leaves of one tree, and the drops of one sea." And again, "Do ye know why We have created you from one clay? That no one should exalt himself over the other. Ponder in your hearts, how ye were created . . ." Many other similar instructions are found in the Bahá'i teachings. The following reports the Conference for Race Amity held at the Bahá'i Summer Colony in Green Acre, Eliot, Maine, during August.

THE Oneness of Mankind is one of the fundamental Bahá'í principles. Adherents of the Bahá'í faith understand the vital importance of the practical application of the teachings in the daily living, for deed not words are essential in this Age of Light.

Conferences or conventions organized for racial amity under Bahá'í auspices have covered a decade and have been uniformly successful. Such occasions always bring a glad exhilaration with wealth of thought, felicity of expression and spiritual understanding. The latest conference held in Green Acre, Eliot, Maine, in August of this year was no exception, indeed it even surpassed the sanguine hopes of its sponsors.

One of the most significant contributions to the Conference was the address by Mr. William Leo Hansberry, Harvard scholar, specialist in the Department of History, Howard University, Washington D. C., who unfolded recent studies in anthropology, paleontology and archaeology bearing upon the continent of Africa. His two lectures, "Negro Civilizations in Ancient Africa" made a deep and lasting impression not only by their profound learning but by his ability to express the discoveries almost entirely in common parlance and a way intelligible to the laity. He presented knowledge of recent years which has completely changed current ideas among the learned about Africa and the influence of its Negro inhabitants upon the great civilizations of the past. As a result many now believe that Africa has a prior claim to Asia as the cradle of the human family. There has come to light positive proof of great kingdoms and empires which formerly existed in Eastern, Western and Central Africa which often surpassed the better known cultures of Europe and Asia. These findings upset the idea that Central Africa and its Negro peoples have had but little part in human history. This region of the world has had a most decided and positive sway over the destinies of mankind. Science fortified by ancient literature now shows that European types of people in very ancient times emigrated there from Africa and that this is quite manifest, it is claimed, in most of the Mediterranean races. It was shown quite clearly that these African peoples played a much more important part than has been realized in early prehistoric civilizations.

Mr. Hansberry's lectures were illustrated by numerous pictures of fossils, monuments, paintings, tombs, sculptures, temples etc. These showed the features of kings and other great characters unmistakably Negro. The story of the human race in evolution and his description of Proplipithacus haeckelli, the supposed missing link of the scientists, a very interesting little creature which gradually evolved through such stages as Australopithicus africanus and Homo rhodesiensis, Homo capensis, types found among African fossils and similar to types in other continents, all finally culminating in Homo sapiens, presented a very fascinating study. The effect of climate upon hair and features over long periods of time was also scientifically explained.

He accepted from the standpoint of his researches without reservations the Bahá'í principle of the oneness of humanity.

THE SOCIAL ASPECTS of race relations claimed a session and a half of the convention and two special meetings extra, growing out of a spontaneous desire to deal more intimately and directly with problems of daily life involving the color line or to cheer the hearts by disinterested kindness. Questions were asked and many voices were raised in consultation with no trace of inharmony. What do we owe to our fellow beings of another race? How can we aid them if victimized by oppression on the one hand or heedlessness or indifference on the other? The lordly ideals of Bahá'u'lláh, the lofty exhortations of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the strident notes of Shoghi Effendi all gave light to consultation. A friend from far off New Zealand, wise beyond his years, gave an enlightening account of the high standards of justice maintained by the English settlers in New Zealand to the Maori, the aboriginal race, which has brought the latter, but half century ago cannibals, to the highest plane of social, political, cultural and spiritual awakening.

The power of the Prophet brings new birth. The new teachings of the new day are adequate for unity in race relations. This work is one of the most needed and inviting for service. Justice to our fellow beings clarifies our vision. The ignorant can and must be taught. The heedless must be attracted and even the dead must be revived! People born in an atmosphere of prejudice are not hopeless. Such conditions yield to spiritual training. Association with those who firmly but lovingly take the stand for right may often bring astonishing results.

Improvements in the ways of transportation with justice for all; education which proves the subjective as well as objective harm of human prejudices; practical ways of handling situations and people; the need of keeping willing workers busy and therefore happy; the need of friends themselves finding opportunities to serve a world full of sorrowing hearts; are some considerations that require action. Truly an amity convention is one that has life.

How the psychology of suffering masses may be affected by the knowledge that somewhere in the world there is a group of people who believe in justice and fair play is something to ponder. That which is, is affected by that which ought to be. The real is influenced by the ideal. Ideals must be cherished and spread. Should ideals disappear all worth while in humanity would soon be lost. So idealists and workers came augmenting the joy of life, while many others sent expressions of regret. Among the latter is a man of great influence, former governor of a neighboring state, who asked to be remembered when such another convention is held.

One of our seasoned workers who could not attend in person sent her address which contained among other beautiful thoughts this exhortation:

“Amity is a campaign requiring patience, knowledge and spiritual guidance, holding the good of another in mind vigilantly lest satisfaction in a deed blind us to its quality. Let us determine that not one day shall pass without an effort towards racial amity. Thousands of little acts, small sacrifices which are within the reach of all will bring great results. God will assist us to march forward to a new day in the relationship of all mankind.”

THE SPIRITUAL part of an Amity Conference is always most important and it was emphasized by the chairman on the opening night. After quoting a number of the most powerful and beautiful of the Bahá'í teachings, he said:

“If the light is one, is it possible any longer to view and treat mankind as separated by color, race or merely material origin? We are meeting tonight representatives of many races in a world baffled and confused by the serious problems of adjustment that confront it. If a man wishes to plant a garden and raise fine vegetables or fruits and has no suitable instruments such as plow, hoe and seed, he is helpless. Such is the condition of the world today. Mighty forces are at work which no man can subdue unless equipped with divine instrumentalities at present unknown or unacceptable to the statesmen and governments of the world. Nevertheless these instruments exist and are divinely fitted for the work at hand. Therefore it remains for those who are informed of their existence, who are conscious of their perfect adaptation to the needs of the world to demonstrate their perfect fitness, usefulness and uniqueness to heal the wounds of the world. This is a mighty task. But be assured that Divine Assistance is at hand to strengthen and assist and confirm every soul who arises for this supreme service to mankind.”

The Sunday morning session, was especially planned to teach man's sole dependence on God and His creative Power. The chairman read the divine explanation of man's creation in the image and likeness of God. A voice from the far South told of distressing conditions which could only be remedied by a heavenly power. The one universal outlook is the spiritual. The slow but steady process which makes success certain, that of striving to gain the respect, esteem and affection of those we try to teach received due emphasis. An account of prayer at the Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh and the immediate answer was impressive.

The Spirit of the Glory of God seeks willing mirrors for its reflection in the world of man. Those who pray, those who are active in service under the shadow of guidance may perceive its power. Eyes may see the signs of God. Ears may be attentive to celestial music. Hands may serve. Feet may tread in the foot steps of the True One. Minds may reflect the ideals of the Kingdom. Knowledge from Him may teach His ways. Hearts may favor His loved ones. This is the way of amity, which is quite free from personalities, but at all times relates to the eternal realities.

One of the most effective workers writes: "I was inwardly impressed during the three days of the conference, and particularly at the unique and wonderful atmosphere of the musical and fellowship meeting Sunday night, that the Pentacostal outpourings were flowing. I don't think I have ever seen or experienced before such an utter demonstration of the blending of races as on that evening, nor witnessed such love as passed to and from every heart. This is the first realization at Green Acre of what 'Abdu'l-Bahá told us to participate in. This is the answer to Green Acre's problems, spiritual and material. The message from Shoghi Effendi through Miss Easterbrook a recently returned pilgrim from the Holy Land,—clearly points to this as the solution,—'an emphasis (there) upon the racial harmony.' You should feel radiantly happy."

HAWAII PROVING GROUND OF PACIFIC PROBLEMS

WALLACE R. FARRINGTON

President of the Pan-Pacific Union

Excerpts from a talk given over the National Broadcasting Company Radio, New York City, and printed in the Honolulu Star-Bulletin.

THE intermingling of Oriental and Occidental cultures in Hawaii is a topic on which a volume could be written. A whole evening of discussion would not exhaust all phases of the subject.

At the outset one is faced with the attitude of some of our good citizens and my good friends on the Pacific coast, that the mingling of these cultures, the Orient and the Occident, is impossible. They tell us that the barriers are insurmountable, that any intermingling must result in lowering the standards of all concerned.

The immediate answer to that point of view is the life of Hawaii, where the Orient and the Occident have intermingled, formed unions, so to speak, taken of value something from the East, and something from the West.

Hawaii is one place on this earth where the evils of racial caste have been reduced to a minimum. To my mind this is the secret of the successful development of sterling citizenship in a territory that is the strategic key to the Pacific; strategic in the commerce of the Pacific; strategic in the scheme of defensive control in time of emergency; strategic in the good will among the peoples and the races whose homes are in the lands about the Pacific ocean, the peoples on whose good sense, good judgment and good will depends the continued and permanent good will of the Pacific. . . .

THE HAWAIIAN indeed is well denominated as an amalgam race. Contrary to the popular conception, the Hawaiian population is steadily increasing.

Though not of pure Hawaiian blood, the mingling of the races with the Hawaiian has probably furnished a foundation for the high character of American citizenship in Hawaii, a citizenship where representatives of pure blood families of the Occident, pure blood families of the Orient, mingle freely and on terms of social equality with pure blood Hawaiians and mixtures of ancestry that in some instances combine in one family the ancestral strains of New England, Europe, Hawaii, and China. . . .

When you realize that there is no public or private school in the Territory of Hawaii where a child is barred from the school for reasons of race, you have a better appreciation of why we speak of the future with confidence and point to our past and present citizenship with definite pride. . . .

WITH SUCH a situation prevailing among our people; with such an atmosphere pervading Hawaii's social, political, business and neighborhood life, it is natural for Hawaii to become known as a human laboratory, a proving ground to determine how the peoples of the Pacific may adjust themselves so as to avoid the mistakes of bitterness, suspicion and antagonism that have punctuated the history of the Mediterranean and the Atlantic. . . .

And thus we feel that we of Hawaii, with all our races and mixtures, are, besides having the joy of living in the most beautiful place of the world, making a definite contribution to the future happiness and material welfare of the Pacific area by doing daily what so many have said cannot be done—mingling the cultures of the Orient and the Occident on even terms. If any doubt it, come to Hawaii, observe for yourself, form your own estimate. If you come as a doubting Thomas, we are confident you will leave a convert and an evangelist in the cause of happier human relationships that create the eternal foundations of enduring friendships and peace between nations.

“The world of humanity is like unto one kindred and one family. Because of the climatic conditions of the zones, through the passing ages colors have become different. In the torrid zone on account of the intensity of the affect of the sun throughout the ages the black race appeared. In the frigid zone on account of the severity of the cold and the ineffectiveness of the heat of the sun the white race appeared. In the temperate zone the yellow, brown and red races came into existence. But in reality mankind is one race. Because it is of one race unquestionably there must be union and harmony and no separation or discord.”

THE APPEAL

By His side I wandered and saw His hands outstretched
To give.

Under the beautiful sun of glory He walked,
Administering to the poor,—no word of censure,
Only a quiet giving of self, always a giving of self.
And I could only smile and wonder, not understanding.

Yesterday, when the blue haze of morning covered the world,
I came upon Him unawares;

He stood pensive, contemplating the drifting clouds
Above Mount Carmel.

Suddenly the garment of sorrow descended upon Him,
And I felt Him surrounded by warring elements:

A myriad voices tore the delicate fibre of His being;

At once He seemed overcome with longing

And fell prone upon the warm earth.

Alas, I heard Him sob and I shuddered—

But I understood.

“Thine aid, O Father!” He whispered,

Soaring to heaven with soul-pinions fleet;

“Thine aid, O Father! Thy children stand on a precipice,

Caught in a whirlwind of destroying forces;

Help me to reveal the loveliness of Thy desire for them!

Let them look into the heart of Thy glory!

Thou hast called me. Ere I cast the earth mantle away,

I would tie the jeweled sandals of love upon their feet,

That when I am gone, they may remember, remember!”

Then I saw the blue haze of morning shift.

The destroying forces were withdrawn,

And the clamour of tongues was lost

In a solemn thrill that came down the mountain-side.

Among the low shrubs I lay quiet.

Soon a figure, wrapped in a long, flowing robe, passed me,—

My soul—burdened, weighed down, beheld the white form,

And purged of all else but the heaven I yearned for—

Reached out in the silence.

Today He is gone!

His mantle of earth He has laid aside;

Only the wonderful whiteness of His presence

Still lingers.

I have looked into the heart of His desire for me

And am content, for I understand.

“. . . The Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are such that all the communities of the world whether religious, political or ethical, ancient or modern, find in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh the expression of their highest wish . . . These teachings constitute the all-inclusive power among all men, and are practicable.”—Abdu'l-Bahá.

“No one has any plan!” said a friend to me recently as we were discussing the confused and chaotic condition of the world today. “Every one is discussing the situation but no one has come forward with a perfect plan to remedy conditions.”

It is true that the statesmen and economists of the world find themselves baffled by the peculiar symptoms, as it were, of a cultural disease sweeping over humanity and threatening the overthrow of civilization itself. Rivalry, fear and hatred between races, nations and classes the world over are disturbing the stability of the present order. In addition to that comes the terrible economic collapse which no one seems able to remedy.

How can we remedy these evils which now effect the very foundations of human living upon this planet? Every one has ideas. But who has a perfect plan? Even if some one did come forward with a perfect plan, how could the whole world be brought to accept this plan and put it actually into execution? When we realize how difficult it is to carry out a logical and beneficial reform in a single city or even in a small town, the obstacles in the way of actually effecting a world-wide reform in economics and world government seem insuperable.

SOME YEARS AGO, meditating upon this very problem as to how humanity could discover and put into practice a perfect organization, I came to the conclusion that humanly this was impossible. For man, being basically an individualist, would not universally acquiesce in a new plan, even when proposed. And for any human being to attempt to mould all of humanity with its diverse traditions, racial differences, and individual idiosyncrasies into the pattern of a perfect civilization would be absolutely impossible.

But the thought occurred to me, that if some one should appear upon the planet plainly endowed with divine inspiration and divine authority, like the Prophets and Teachers of the past, such a character could both propose and effectuate a plan for the perfecting of humanity.

Strangely enough it was not long after this that I discovered such a thing had actually happened, that a perfect plan for a new humanity had been given to the world by Bahá'u'lláh—not only with spiritual insight but with spiritual force sufficient to enroll as loyal and devoted followers of this plan individuals of every clime, of every race, of every creed and of many distinct nationalities. I discovered that so great had been the devotion of these followers that they had been willing to sacrifice possessions, family, and even life itself—to the extent of twenty thousand martyrs—for this Great Cause which they saw as the Cause of God for this day and generation.

STUDYING unprejudicially the great plan laid down by Bahá'u'lláh, no reasonable person can find in it faults either of commission or of omission. The great principles therein enunciated: of the oneness of mankind, the independent investigation of truth, the abolition of racial and religious prejudices, the substitution of universal peace for the cruelties and wastes of war, the establishment of a great brotherhood of man upon the planet, harmony of science with religion, the establishment of universal education the world over, a universal auxiliary language, an international tribunal,—these principles have for years commanded the respect of all unprejudiced thinkers. And today when such reforms are plainly seen to be so much needed for the tranquility and prosperity of mankind, there is a fast growing appreciation of the world-order of Bahá'u'lláh on the part of statesmen, economists and earnest thinkers of all types.

This plan seems capable of solving all the problems which confront humanity. It is all-inclusive. There is nothing in it that should be left out, and there is nothing left out that should be in it. In other words, it is a perfect plan.

So MUCH for the plan. It is already here it seems, and the friend who said to me "But no one has any plan," was unaware of this platform laid down by Bahá'u'lláh for the perfecting of humanity. The plan exists. But how about its execution? Can the world's millions of diverse races, creeds, nationalities, temperaments and intellectual backgrounds be persuaded, first to accept this plan, and secondly to put it into operation?

The average person, upon hearing of these great ideals of Bahá'u'lláh, reacts to them with the statement, "Beautiful ideals, but impossible of fulfillment." Let us see if this be true. Certainly if these plans were proposed by an ordinary human it would be true that they would be impossible of fulfillment. For the individualistic bias of the human mind and temperament, and the egoism and self-seeking which are the strongest motives of man's conduct, would interpose insuperable barriers.

But BAHÁ'U'LLÁH brought not only a plan. He brought also a spiritual power which gripped as by a powerful magnet the hearts of men; enrolled them as devoted and zealous followers; and changed their very natures, moulding them into the form required for this perfect civilization.

Since the promulgation of these teachings by Bahá'u'lláh, thousands, nay, millions of citizens representing nearly every country of the world have become followers of the Bahá'i Movement. This means that they have absolutely accepted the Plan of Bahá'u'lláh,—not only because it appeals to their reason, which it does; but also because they see it as the Divine Plan for humanity. To it they vow their full energy and power. They are endeavoring with heart and soul not only to live and carry out this plan as regards their own lives; but also to spread these ideals throughout their community, their country and even throughout the world—so that all humanity may in due time come to accept this vision and cooperate with it.

The writings of Bahá'u'lláh have already been translated into fifteen languages and circulated among all types. And it is not the intellectual only who are influenced by these ideals. From every class of society, from every degree of culture, from every type of person, are drawn these loyal and ardent followers who are willing to give life itself for the spread of the Bahá'í Cause.

So WE HAVE not only the perfect plan, but we have the dynamic power operating to put this plan into effect—a power operating in the hearts and consciences of humanity. What more is needed, then, than the gradual spread of this plan throughout humanity, the accession of other millions to its ranks of followers, and their devoted efforts to carry out this plan in their own lives and in the life of their communities?

Reader, if any one says to you that no one has any plan for curing the various ills that threaten civilization today, say to that person that he is mistaken; that a plan has already been given, and is actually being carried out. Say that this plan is perfect in all its details; that it contains every necessary solution for the evils of human society; and that it commands the respect and admiration of all those who give it their unbiased attention.

In the perplexity and desolation of world thought today, there is no more cheering prospect than that of the Bahá'í Movement developing to the point of successfully carrying out the Great Plan of Bahá'u'lláh. And I know of no greater motive for efficient action and for spiritual growth on the part of the individual than the appeal of this noble Movement to the heart and conscience of mankind.

“Bahá'u'lláh, we should readily recognize, has not only imbued mankind with a new and regenerating Spirit. He has not merely enunciated certain universal principles, or propounded a particular philosophy, however potent, sound and universal these may be. In addition to these He, as well as 'Abdu'l-Bahá after Him, have, unlike the Dispensations of the past, clearly and specifically laid down a set of Laws, established definite institutions, and provided for the essentials of a Divine Economy. These are destined to be a pattern for future society, a supreme instrument for the establishment of the Most Great Peace, and the one agency for the unification of the world and the proclamation of the reign of righteousness and justice upon the earth.”

—SHOGHI EFFENDI,
Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause.

THE DRIVING STORM

DALE S. COLE

"O Son of Man! If calamity befall thee not in my path, how wilt thou tread in the way of those who are content in My will? If affliction overtake thee not in thy longing to meet Me, how canst thou attain to the light of the love of My Beauty?"

"I am not impatient of calamities, in God's way, nor of affliction for His love and at His good pleasure. God hath made affliction as a morning shower to this green pasture and as a match for His Lamp whereby earth and heaven are illumined."

—Bahá'u'lláh.

TO a hardy soul there is something compelling in the whip and lash of a driving storm. To be out in it, to bare one's face to the rain, is to touch one of nature's vibrant cords. We may flinch at the flash of lightning, tremble at the crash of thunder, and cringe before the destructive force of the wind, but in it all there is an element of grandeur, of sublimity, of irresistible power which arouses awe and wonder.

The young sapling bends before the blast, its branches whipping in the wind. The whole tree, and every fiber in it is being tested. The roots—are they firmly enough implanted to withstand the pressure on the leaves and branches? The slender trunk—will its fibers break or tear under the tremendous forces of tension and compression? Is there enough elasticity to cushion the effects of the sharp gusts? And after the fury has passed, can the beautiful little tree summon its recuperative powers and resume its life, erect in the rain and sunshine, through the changing seasons, functioning as nature intended? Or will it snap, crashing its foliage to the ground to wither there in brown impotence?

However somber the possibilities of tragedy in such a test, it is overshadowed by the implication of mystery. Why should the little sapling be called upon to undergo such vicissitudes? Is it that some element of strength be instilled into its fibers, thence to its seeds, that generations of increasingly stronger trees may grace the slope of woodland glade?

Science seems to answer "yes," that in nature many things become strong where there are compelling reasons for their doing so. This strength is not acquired instantly, but during the slow process of withstanding many storms and of gradually reinforcing the fibers of being and transmitting this additional strength into the never ending and dynamic stream of life.

We may view natural meteorological disturbances with momentary fear knowing that the storm will pass, and that in time any resultant damage will be repaired, but when the storms assail our social, economic and political institutions and methods, we have not the same assurance because we are dealing with more or less intangible things. While wind cannot be seen, it can be felt and does not seem so mysterious as the apparently sinister and subtle forces which attack our material operations so ruthlessly. We are at a loss to know how to repair such damage. Seemingly brilliant remedies prove ineffective and we become baffled and discouraged, when purely human endeavors seem incapable of solving difficulties.

Tests are old, as old as the world and the universe itself. Nature has always imposed tests and thereby has evolved those species of animals and things which best serve the purposes conceived for them.

Science and industry have taken many pages from the book of nature, but none which assume greater importance in these enlightened but troublesome days, than the method of proof by test. Tests—chemical, mechanical, electrical—prove the fitness of things and combinations of things. Tests—intellectual, emotional, psychological and spiritual—determine the metal and caliber of individuals and try their souls.

PROOF BY test is a scientific and natural method. It may be severe and not without pain, but the mere successful outcome engenders strength. Proof by test is positive. Positive forces and methods accelerate progress and therein lies some compensatory consideration for those subjected to tests ever more severe.

A good designer knows that his structure is not complete and trustworthy until proven, therefore testing is a vital part of any constructive program. Trials may result in failure but from the bitter ashes of failure, through increased knowledge and experience, a hardy, rugged structure evolves, to fulfill the designer's purpose and to embody his dreams.

A careful designer also knows that his structure, whatever it be, ship, building or machine, must withstand not only the usual stresses of everyday utility but it must be able to withstand the destructive tornadoes of emergencies. Therefore there is incorporated in it a factor of safety. Every bridge, however small, is built to carry several times the normal load imposed upon it.

An intelligent person knows that not only must an individual be so balanced—intellectually, emotionally, and spiritually—as to meet with poise the demands of ordinary life, but if that individual is to withstand tests, trials and vicissitudes and maintain his equilibrium and effectiveness, he must also have a factor of safety, a reserve beyond the usual demands, and the amount of such excess power is the gauge of his ability to rise above his environment and to progress against the opposing currents which he may have to breast.

This reserve is also the measure of his faith in God and his compliance with the Divine Will, for his reliance is on Divine Power, irresistible and all-sufficient, and he acts with the assurance of Divine confirmations.

Every test that we meet successfully strengthens the fibers of our beings, increases our confidence, and prepares us to meet even harder tests. Spartan as this may be, it is nevertheless true, and always has been. It will probably always be so. A life of ease may easily become one of retrogression.

A test well-met is a victory earned and suffuses the individual with thankfulness that, through the kindness of God, strength has been acquired, fear dispelled, confidence attained and balance assured.

Individual crises are the woof of life. National tests are not uncommon, but when the whole world is storm-wracked one cannot help but wonder what the result will be. Such wholesale tests cause us to fear for the welfare of humanity as we have never feared before. Individuals may stand or fall without affecting the total result very greatly, unless there be tremendously large numbers of them. Businesses may fail and a nation here and there go financially or socially bankrupt without causing a great deal of concern. But when it seems that the whole world is involved in trials and tribulations the like of which is unknown to historical record, humanity wonders what is the wisdom and mystery of these hurricanes and catastrophes, which can shake the very foundations of civilization.

However difficult and insistent our own personal problems may be, their significance pales in comparison with the plight of the world. Were it not for assurances given in the Bahá'í Revelation, the situation would seem almost hopeless and that our concern could only end in despair.

WHEN WE are unable to control the forces in play about us, when our experience does not teach us what they are or how to handle them, when there is no precedent to copy, and no leadership in evidence, when material means are ineffective, and the scheme of life as we have known it in the past threatened with unpredictable changes from obscure influences, then we turn to some realm beyond the material and physical for enlightenment, inspiration and guidance.

To the untutored savage, storms were supernatural forces which he could not understand. He cowered in abject fear before them and attributed all sorts of superstitious powers to their fury. It is quite possible that a considerable heritage of this kind has come down to us, and when we are weighed down by adversity, we lose our sense of perspective and question the justice of a scheme of things which forces some of us to undergo great hardships while others speed along unimpeded and luxuriously. In such a state of mind the poison of envy is distilled to further disturb our equilibrium. When one is ill, in a state of nervous tension, worried or frightened, it is very difficult to pronounce sound judgment and to reason clearly. It is then that we must rely on the Divine Power.

“Do not think for one moment, that these trials and ordeals are confined to thee. In reality all the people are surrounded with sufferings so that they may not attach their hearts to the world, but will seek for composure and rest in the Divine World and beg for the bestowals of the Kingdom.”*

Peoples hearts, many of them are attached to the world and worldly things. The seriousness of the present world business depression registers itself forcibly on most people because it has so shackled the business world. When income is reduced, savings and property endangered, the situation becomes very real and intimate. At first people think only of the outward effects but when the tests become severe, when people become helpless before economic disturbances, then it is realized that there are deep lying causes which involve spiritual considerations, and in turning to the Divine Physician we learn the true significances of values.

*Divine Art of Living, p. 126.

Christ said, "Come unto me all ye who are heavy laden and I will give you rest." Where else can stricken humanity turn for guidance today but to God and how soon will the realization of this become general? If all the world turned sincerely to Him, the troubles being encountered would be considered a very small price indeed.

TESTS, WE are taught are necessary, and it is not possible to be saved from them. But we are assured, that "there is a great wisdom therein of which no one is aware but the wise and knowing." A realization of this wisdom is attainable. It is made clear in the Bahá'í Teachings. It is at once the solace and inspiration which we have to give to an ailing world.

"Were it not for tests, genuine gold could not be distinguished from the counterfeit." In this day of the application of science to the welfare of humanity, it is essential that the designers know which metals they can trust and how far they can trust them under stress and strain. Likewise, it is even more essential that each individual assay himself and ascertain his own weaknesses, that he may know of what he is capable, and seek to strengthen himself, that he may have a full share in dispelling the dark storm clouds which hover over a distraught world community.

"Were it not for tests, the courageous could not be known from the coward." Especially in troublesome times, is it essential to know upon whom we can depend, and to attain that degree of courage which will urge us to act constructively.

"Were it not for tests, the people of faithfulness could not be known from those of selfishness." Thus by tests will those among us emerge who will have the ability to guide humanity away from the selfish practices which have made the economic situation so complex and baffling, to lead nations into closer agreement and to guide humanity into the way of God. Great spiritual leaders have been vouchsafed us. The need is to apply their admonitions, as quickly and completely as possible.

"Were it not for tests, the intellects and faculties of the scholars in the great colleges would not be developed." In the midst of suffering, it is hard to realize the great educational possibilities and force of tests. However, the sapling bending before the blast of the wind is being taught even if in a hard school. Unconsciously, it seems to understand that it must strengthen the fibers of its being and transmit such strength to succeeding generations.

"Were it not for tests, the sparkling gems could not be known from worthless pebbles." In the labyrinthian byways of life and thought, it is essential to be able to recognize that which is fundamental, that which is true, and to weigh the real significance of things and events. How can we exercise the kind of judgement necessary if we are not taught by tests to acquire the requisite knowledge and how to apply it?

"Were it not for tests, the fisherman could not be distinguished from Annas and Caiaphas who were amid glory (Worldly dignity). Were it not for tests the face of Mary, the Magdalene, would not glisten with the light of firmness and certainty to all horizons. These are some of the mysteries of tests which we have unfolded unto thee that thou mayest become cognizant of the mysteries of God in every cycle.”*

TESTS, TRIAL, hardships and afflictions are being experienced on an unprecedented scale. There are few corners of the world today which are not affected. If tests are conducive to the development of the individual, how much more effective they should be in contributing to the advancement of the world, for when such large numbers are affected the combined force of their actions, their thoughts, their hopes and aspirations, their longing for peace and security is multiplied many fold and can be a very potent force of itself, but when the yearnings are supplemented by the realization that God's way is the only way—the effect will be irresistible and profound, touching every sphere of life.

Becoming disturbed to the extent of committing rash and ill advised actions adds to the burden of the individual and the world at large. When the tempest rages it is time to remain calm and well poised. “Be patient in time of affliction and trial, endure every difficulty and hardship with a dilated heart, attracted spirit and eloquent tongue in remembrance of the Merciful. Verily this is the life of satisfaction, of spiritual existence, of heavenly repose, divine benediction and of the celestial table. Soon the Lord will extenuate thy straightened circumstances even in this world,” ‘Abdu'l-Bahá advised an inquirer, and we may all appropriate His kind words to our own needs.

Tests are a part of the training of teachers and every one possessed of the knowledge of the Divine Plan wants, most sincerely, to be an effective teacher. We are told that unless one accepts suffering and undergoes trials and troubles, he can reap no reward nor can he hope to attain success and prosperity. We must endure tests “so that the infinite Divine out-pourings may encircle” us and so that we may “be assisted in spreading the fragrances of God.”

A truly discerning person will not be too disturbed by tests because he foresees the final result, the end of which the storms are but a means, that the aim Divine is the revivification of the world. Storms may trouble the uncertain, who see but the physical phases of the play of forces and are saddened thereby and frightened “at the surging of the waves which storm the shore.”

What a firm and unshakable foundation for the conduct of all human affairs would result should all the people of the world be fully cognizant of the Divine Plan and active in its application! What suffering could be averted should they do this voluntarily instead of waiting to be forced into it by utter despair in the failure of all human measures!

*Divine Art of Living, p. 127.

WAITING FOR A MAN WITH A MESSAGE

SCIENCE has been advancing by giant strides in our days. The veil which hangs between the known and the unknown, which science every day endeavors to pierce, is tending here and there to become very thin.

Science itself, in the examination of the constitution of matter, has led many wise and learned men, in consequence of their researches, to realize that there must be light behind all material things—a spiritual something which it is difficult to grasp and yet impossible to define.

Such a feeling is widespread amongst thoughtful people today. We are waiting for someone who will not overthrow the old revelation, who will not disestablish the old faith, but who will carry us into a wider field and will give us a new vision of a world that is beyond, a new vision of the unknown and the eternal, toward which we ordinary folk can but blindly grope.

Thirty years ago I and my companions were standing on the shore of an Arctic island waiting the arrival of a ship that was to carry us away. We had shot our last cartridge, eaten our last biscuit, and we were waiting for the ship that did not come. We waited and anxiously watched the horizon for a day or two. At long last a little puff of smoke appeared very far away. It was the herald of our deliverance.

Thus we, the puzzled people of the modern world, are waiting on the shore of eternity, each one of us authentically on its very margin, every day looking out on the unknown, waiting for a message of salvation, waiting for a new message which this world longs for.

We want something more than ecclesiastical refinements and aesthetic frills, something more than a slight change in this or the other prayer of ceremony. We want a new spirit—a wider revelation. We are waiting for the man who shall come with his lips touched with the live flame from the Altar of God. He will bring a new message, a new revelation from heaven of the meaning of the eternal verities.

As it is, our ordained shepherds know not where are the pastures, and so “The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed.”

ONE of the Presidents of American universities whose name will go down the centuries because of his friendship with 'Abdu'l-Bahá and for his unprecedented contribution to world peace is Dr. David Starr Jordan, President Emeritus of Leland Stanford University in Palo Alto, California, who passed on, on September 19, 1931.

The writer had the privilege of a little talk with Dr. Jordan in January 1931, at his home in Palo Alto where he had entertained 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 1912, the day the latter spoke in Leland Stanford University. Although this President and scientist of such international repute was ill, on this January day I called, his face suddenly lighted up with a splendid fire of interest as I said that I was a friend of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. His first words were:

“'Abdu'l-Bahá! I always remember 'Abdu'l-Bahá because He worked for World Peace! Give my love, my very best love to Shoghi Effendi, grandson of 'Abdu'l-Bahá who is now the Guardian of the Bahá'i work!” He added: “I wish you could speak on Bahá'u'lláh's principles in our university; but I am helpless, my work in this world is over!” And tears came into his eyes.

The writer told him that his peace plan, his noble achievements were working for him all the time, and that university students in Europe, in China and in Japan were studying and adopting some of his measures. She did speak in his university on “The Bahá'i Movement.”

As an apostle of peace who welcomed 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Leland Stanford University, Dr. Jordan will be long remembered. His work as a scientist and educator is outstanding, but greatest of all has been his work for universal peace. He was fittingly chosen President of the Carnegie Peace Foundation and Director of the World Peace Foundation. He will always have a leading place among the American heroes who have led in the plans for world peace.

“When man dies his relation with the body ceases. The sun is reflected in the mirror; the mirror reflects the light and brilliancy of the sun, but the sun does not reside in the mirror. It does not enter nor come out of the mirror, nevertheless one sees it in the mirror; so the soul reflects itself in the body. If the mirror be broken the sun does not die. The body is the temporary mirror; the spiritual soul suffers no change, no more than the sun does, remaining eternally in its own station. Even as in the world of dreams when all the physical faculties are in abeyance and the soul travels in all realms seeing, hearing, speaking,—so when the physical body decomposes, the soul is not affected.”

A PATHWAY FOR ETERNITY

GRETCHEN WESTERVELT

IN a recent book one of the characters speaks of memories as being of two kinds: the kind that is "just a sort of knowing how something in the past happened," and "when suddenly everything seems to be happening all over again." Looking back over the religious experiences and training that were a part of my life through high school I find memory functioning just as the little girl described.

"In the past" I went to an orthodox church, Sunday school, and Christian Endeavor. During the last year in high school I also acted as organist for the church services. But, as vividly as though it were happening all over again is the breathless search for, and firm conviction in the reality of fairies. Born on Midsummer's Day, the legend was early told me that therefore I was under the direct control of the fairies; and never did I doubt this for had they not again and again granted me certain material desires that has seemed impossible of attainment. Equally vivid are the moments when a need for guidance or for understanding of a problem led to a sincere carrying out of a ritualistic procedure of my own devising as I turned to Pallas Athene. Just when I ceased finding aid in fairies and in the Grecian goddess of Wisdom I can not say positively but the habit certainly persisted, even though more and more infrequently, into high school.

During this same period there was an interest in such school acquaintances as I knew to be of different race or religion than myself. In spite of the social disapproval of my own group I constantly found friends amongst these others and learned that fundamentally there were no differences.

A few years later found me in one of the four or five largest cities of the United States working in close association with people of other races, colors, customs, and creeds. Eagerly I learned about their customs, their beliefs. (Of course one could not help being puzzled over the family who was so sanctified it could do no wrong even thus found with the contents of your pocket book! Because my family desired it, I affiliated with a church, choosing one of an historically liberal denomination. Here it was possible to establish social contacts. It meant but little more.

My real religion at this time was 'brotherhood'. Means of expressing it were found in an International Club, the League for Industrial Democracy, and similar agencies. No longer needing the church as a social agency my attendance became very desultory until the development of another church whose leader was a social reformer. Here at last was institutionalized religion trying to interpret the ethical teachings of Jesus in terms of social living. The brilliant sermons held me intellectually, but always there was a quest for certain values and realities on which these teachings were supposedly based. I knew Jesus only as a teacher to be honored, a teacher whose ethical teachings satisfied though I felt they had rarely been carried into practice. Again the church retreated; why tie theology to ethical teachings? For a time I drifted in a current of activities which filled each day but after a few months a growing sense of futility pervaded my thinking; no longer sure of myself in the face of a complex urban civilization I longed as never before for some centre of reality. Still I sought in organized religion but failed as I always had failed to have any conscious awareness of God. I knew beyond any doubt He must exist if only somewhere a Path might be found. Unable to maintain the early reliance on Pallas Athene, I sought for Something that should replace that childhood security.

It chanced that the young reformer was called to another city and another field. In the ensuing period I was attracted by a series of sermons on world religions. These sermons were followed by a forum. Already somewhat familiar with Islam and Judaism through friends in the International Club I listened eagerly; God was not there. There did evolve, however, a realization that the fundamental teachings of all religion seemed to be similar. Toward the end of the series during a discussion period one speaker was introduced to us as the representative of a Conference soon to take place in the city. As we left the church my companion and I found ourselves continuing the discussion with this person. The conversation led to an appointment for another time as we seemed to have much in common. That night I found myself unable to forget the stranger. I was also possessed of an intense feeling that something was soon to occur that for me would be in some way a crisis. I did not connect this feeling with the stranger.

In the days that followed there was placed in my hands a small blue book having on its cover the figure nine. Here I first learned of a movement whose twelve principles embodied those things which I had found hitherto scattered through many agencies and organizations. This interested me but casually because my entire attention was bent upon fathoming the personality of our new friend. Back of her, through her surged a power such as I had never known before, a power that I felt must be the answer to my quest for Reality.

The Conference ended, the people connected with it left. I turned again to the little book reading it through with great care. Impressed by the twelve principles I decided to give more attention to the history of the movement. Another revealed religion! Annoyance and irritation were my inevitable reactions. The booklet was tossed on the desk. More restless than ever, I plunged again into activity that should preclude thinking. In spite of this "as if it were happening all over again" memory brought back sentences from the little book and I spent much time trying to integrate them with the unusual impression made by our friend of the Conference; somehow one must explain the other.

After several weeks, contrary to all my habits, I wrote to her asking, haltingly enough, for more information about the Bahá'í Movement. Certainly she read in that letter all the things I found it impossible to ask coherently or concretely. Return mail brought a letter, a copy of "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era," and a small book of prayers. The latter, after a casual glance, was put aside for prayer was only 'wishful thinking;' how could it seem otherwise in the light of the only real prayers I had ever uttered, those to Pallas Athene. I read the book from cover to cover in an initial attitude of antagonism and scepticism. This attitude gradually changed until, closing the book, I acknowledged an intellectual assent.

In the months that followed I reread such parts as dealt with social conditions, skipping the chapters which told about the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. They seemed to be great Teachers similar to Jesus, Muhammad, and Buddha; this was the only reaction to Them at this time.

Later, in putting my desk in order, the little book of prayers came to light. Remembering the chapter on prayer in "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era," I read them all. Certain ones were marked and these I reread. Their power penetrated my intellectual assent and there began to develop a realization of their potency. I decided to memorize one or two of the prayers and use them regularly over a given period of time; hoping against hope that they might prove to be, not just wishful thinking, but a bridge which would lead to God.

During the weeks that followed I continued the experiment, wavering between indifference and hope. So gradually did inner conviction of the Station of Bahá'u'lláh evolve that I failed to recognize it until the day I first visited the Bahá'í Temple. There, in the "Dawning-Place of the Mention of God," that place so pregnant with the spirit of the New Day, I first experienced the presence of God.

It is sheer coincidence of course that it chanced to be Midsummer's Day, but so it was. The early connotations of that day have faded, into a memory of "something in the past that happened." The Bahá'í Cause with its divine philosophy which goes so far beyond my former concept of social living permeates all my thinking, all my actions. It has given me also that other kind of memory "when suddenly everything seems to be happening all over again;" a precious memory that is the end and the beginning of a quest,—the presence of God.

* Dr. J. E. Esslemont, Baha'í Publishing Committee.

"Hitherto the world has been as a child at the breast, able to receive and manifest but little of the powers of the Spirit. Now it is entering the age of its maturity, and it is possible for the divine teachings, confirmations, bounties and spiritual laws of God to appear perfectly because now there is capacity."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD

THERE are periods and stages in the life of the aggregate world of humanity which at one time was passing through its degree of childhood, at another its time of youth but now has entered its long presaged period of maturity, the evidences of which are everywhere visible and apparent. Therefore the requirements and conditions of former periods have changed and merged into exigencies which distinctly characterize the present age of the world of mankind. That which was applicable to human needs during the early history of the race could neither meet nor satisfy the demands of this day and period of newness and consummation. Humanity has emerged from its former degrees of limitation and preliminary training. Man must now become imbued with new virtues and powers, new moralities, new capacities. New bounties, bestowals and perfections are awaiting and already descending upon him. The gifts and graces of the period of youth although timely and sufficient during the adolescence of the world of mankind, are now incapable of meeting the requirements of its maturity. The playthings of childhood and infancy no longer satisfy or interest the adult mind.

From every standpoint the world of humanity is undergoing a re-formation. The laws of former governments and civilizations are in process of revision, scientific ideas and theories are developing and advancing to meet a new range of phenomena, invention and discovery are penetrating hitherto unknown fields revealing new wonders and hidden secrets of the material universe; industries have vastly wider scope and production; everywhere the world of mankind is in the throes of evolutionary activity indicating the passing of the old conditions and advent to the new age of re-formation. Old trees yield no fruitage; old ideas and methods are obsolete and worthless now. Old standards of ethics, moral codes and methods of living in the past will not suffice for the present age of advancement and progress.

This is the cycle of maturity and re-formation in religion as well. Dogmatic imitations of ancestral beliefs are passing. They have been the axis around which religion revolved but now are no longer fruitful; on the contrary, in this day they have become the cause of human degradation and hindrance. Bigotry and dogmatic adherence to ancient beliefs have become the central and fundamental source of animosity among men, the obstacle to human progress, the cause of warfare and strife, the destroyer of peace, composure and welfare in the world.

While this is true and apparent, it is likewise evident that the Lord of mankind has bestowed infinite bounties upon the world in this century of maturity and consummation. . . . Heavenly teachings applicable to the advancement in human conditions have been revealed in this merciful age. This re-formation and renewal of the fundamental reality of religion constitute the true and outworking spirit of modernism, the unmistakable light of the world, the manifest effulgence of the Word of God, the divine remedy for all human ailment and the bounty of eternal life to all mankind."

Sir John and Lady Gray
Frances (daughter)
Mr. James Magnus
Rev. Goodenough
Roduki Effendi, a traveling teacher

SUMMARY OF PREVIOUS INSTALLMENT

A group of people in an English drawing-room have been discussing the existing industrial unrest and the deplorable economic conditions and possible solution. A mysterious stranger from the Orient, Roduki Effendi, impresses them with his suggestions for a more perfect civilization. He says that the hour of unity is at hand, that men are awakening to a realization of their essential oneness, that the solution of the economic depression is the removal of all suspicions, fears, jealousies and rivalries between nations, and the establishment of international cooperation with universal systems of distribution and exchange.

Mr. Magnus—(aside to Rev. Goodenough sitting back in chair and accepting cigar) Idealistic; . . . but one must admit thoroughly sensible . . . might be worth trying out.

Rev. Goodenough—(pleasantly superior) Certainly the right—and I should say—quite the obvious direction.

Sir John—(rises from couch beside his wife and takes up favourite attitude on hearth-rug).

But, of course, all this happy—one might almost call it—"spiritually democratic" state of affairs is a mere Utopian dream in the present condition of this country—to say nothing of the world in general.

Effendi—But is not every advance in human welfare at first but as a poet's dream—or a vision in the mind of some great Seer?

Rev. Goodenough—(from the depths of a comfortable chair contributes) Where there is no vision the people perish.

Sir John—Exactly. For as far as political faith or vision is concerned we're certainly drifting into a dangerous position. The masses are full of fear and anxiety, or else strangely indifferent, while the younger generation appear to have no convictions about anything.

Frances—(from a seat in the window) But Dad, we don't know what to be "convicted" about. It all seems such a queer muddle!

Sir John—Oh, I didn't mean to blame you young people. Even we experts (with apparent anxiety) find it almost impossible to agree on any policy adequate to deal with the ever-increasing difficulties.

Lady Gray—(sympathetically) It must be a dreadful worry for you, John. The blind leading the blind—so to speak.

Sir John—(trifle nettled) Not quite as bad as that, I hope, my Dear. But (frowning) I must admit that, where government is concerned, our democratic system seems to have largely failed. We often cannot get the right men for responsible posts. Parties tend to split and multiply—valuable time is wasted in mere bickering and nullifying each other's efforts. Naturally the people are losing faith in us—and Communism-Bolshevism—and all kinds of rival factions are on the increase . . . (getting anxious and excited).

Mr. Magnus—I should just think so!

Sir John—(then slowly, as thinking aloud) I sometimes wonder whether some supreme leadership

. . . a kind of super dictator . . . might not prove a solution. Yet . . . no mere man could . . . (voice trails off. There is a little pause, then—)

Effendi—(softly and reverently)—Only a man charged with the power to apply the laws of God.

Sir John—(suddenly stiffening) I have not found religion much use, so far, in the solving of these practical problems.

Effendi—(graciously persuasive) But did you not say that you need the best men for the task of government? Not necessarily those who possess money, social position, or personal ambition—but those who, by reason of character, ability and disinterestedness, could hold the confidence of the nation—in fact—spiritually-minded men?

Sir John—Well—yes. Of course it really comes to that.

Effendi—Therefore, would not the most effective form of government consist of a body of such men who would meet—not to further the aims of any particular party, but for impartial and harmonious consultation concerning the country's welfare as a whole? Then only from out the clash of differing opinions would emerge the shining spark of Truth.

Rev. Goodenough—Like a great conference with its various committees, I presume.

Sir John—The idea seems sound enough; but I don't see how it would work out in actual practice.

(Company lean forward as if wondering what would be) answered.

Effendi—Election by universal franchise could be made to local councils or (smilingly) shall we call them—Houses of Justice? which would administer as far as possible all local affairs.

Sir John—(aside to himself) “Houses of Justice”—good name—that!

Then delegates appointed by the inhabitants could elect the members of the National Council—or House of Justice. And finally accredited men of outstanding capacities and wisdom could be sent forward to the Supreme Council of the United States of the world. In such a way, democracy would obtain its aristocracy of brains and of character, and stable government, progress and prosperity be the better ensured.

(Company sit back and relax a little.)

Mr. Magnus—Good! but what about the electors? You've human nature to reckon with there—

Effendi—But “human nature” that is also divine—and that, given wise leadership and a more enlightened system of education, would learn to choose those who were proved worthy. That they are now discontented shows this.

Rev. Goodenough—(taking cake from Frances) Thanks—most delicious! (aside to her) An aristocratic young Daniel of democracy,— Frances—(with sudden warmth)—With no fear of the lions—anyway.

Sir John—(with slowly dawning conviction) But—how is it possible to know that this ingeniously simple and selective system would be successful—or in the right direction? You (if you will pardon me) are still so young—

Effendi—But I do not presume to speak of myself. This universal plan which combines social justice and efficiency with opportunity for the highest expression of the individual life, is the authoritative word of God's new Messenger to men—Bahá'u'lláh—whose humble servant I am.

Lady Gray—(radiantly) Don't you see, John? That supreme leadership you want! Not a dictator—but a Prophet!

Frances who, as though fascinated, has drawn a hassock nearer and nearer to Effendi Roduki, at this juncture asks hesitatingly:—

Frances—Excuse me—but please—do you consider Art one of those “highest expressions?”

(Sir John and his wife exchange a meaning smile. Then all look surprised, for Effendi turns to her with evident eagerness.)

Effendi—So high—that a true Artist should be considered as one having an honoured place and a great right among the people.

Lady Gray—Now, there's a feather in your cap, Frances!

Effendi—For the mission of the Artist is to interpret or reveal Beauty, and this can only find expression through the whole spirit and personality of its medium—not alone by clever technique—for otherwise it would not be creative, but merely manufactured work.

Frances—Is that what you mean by a true Artist?

Effendi—Yes. For has not one of your most famous critics said: All great art is the expression, by an art-gift, of a pure soul, and is the clear evidence of its character?

Rev. Goodenough—(with evident relish) Just what I'm always telling our modern youth—you can't, I say, hope to get away from morals.

Frances—(slightly scornful) Yes

—but—put like that it sounds so-so stuffy!

Effendi—(smiling) Yet, little Sister, is not Art, in its essence, the mirror of the underlying spirit both of the age and of the individual; for the artist can only express what he, or she, is capable of feeling, or paint according to his spiritual perceptions.

Frances—(eagerly) Yes, yes, of course.

Effendi—Now, in this dawn of a great new cycle of creative power, forth from those inner realms of Spirit there is flashing upon receptive minds everywhere, a fresh revelation of that One Eternal Beauty; a new Impulse inspiring originality of ideas and stimulating to novel, and sometimes startling forms of artistic expression in colour, form and sound.

Frances—(with gesture of surprise and delight) Ah, yes! I feel—I know this! Oh, do please go on—Effendi—On the shores of a beautiful lake in the heart of the American continent is rising today a noble witness to this new creative Spirit. It is a Temple of Light—a lacy envelope enshrining an idea—the idea of beauty and radiance; and embodying an ideal—the ideal of religious Unity.

Sir John—Ah! now I remember reading something about it in the papers. Quite unique in design—they said—the first really original conception in architecture known for several centuries. Might be—when finished—as lovely as the Taj Mahal!

Mr. Magnus—Then that means money.

Effendi—Yes, indeed. But whereas the Taj was an offering of love from a great and wealthy monarch, this temple is a tribute of the love and devotion of even the poorest and most obscure member of the Movement in every part of the world.

Lady Gray—How wonderful! And will anybody be allowed to worship there?

Effendi—Everybody. Its nine illumined portals stand open wide to every race and religion. For it is an earthly symbol of the beauty of divine Love and Unity—the church of the New Day.

Frances—(with dreamy, half abstracted gaze) Yes—I think I'm beginning to see it . . . the worship of Beauty—and the beauty of Worship—made one. . . like some lovely dream . . . come true.

Rev. Goodenough—And your clergy? I suppose they're well paid?

Effendi—We have no priesthood in this religion of Light. All may be priests unto God, and serve according to the gifts that are theirs.

Rev. Goodenough—Really! Quite like the early Christians.

Effendi—Naturally, for the Bahá'í Faith has the same root as Christianity, and is as the full flower of that beautiful bud.

Rev. Goodenough—(irritably) But we have no need of any new sect or religion Sir, there are far too many in the world already.

Effendi—(sweetly) Then why not a religion of reconciliation?

Rev. Goodenough—(firmly) But I hold that Christianity has provided us for two thousand years with all that is necessary.

Effendi—And for that past age and cycle, this was true. But did Galilee exhaust, for all time, the Manifestation of the Divine?

Lady Gray—Then, you believe, Effendi, in a progressive revelation?

Effendi—When all else evolves and progresses, must religion alone remain static?

Lady Gray—(wistfully) It is strange—but sometimes I feel that Christ has grown so—so dim.

Effendi—Yet is His Spirit being renewed in the world to-day by this fresh outpouring of Love and Wisdom. For that which is being revealed through the New Name of Bahá'u'lláh is that same ancient Glory that shone through the compassion of the Buddha, the wisdom of Confucius, the love of Christ, the simple austerity of Muhammad. It is the Sun of yesterday, arisen in fresh splendor, and shining, as always, from the East even unto the West.

Rev. Goodenough—(aside) Irrefutable—yet so different to what I had always imagined.

Mr. Magnus—(with blunt simplicity) I've noticed that folks don't attend church nearly as much as they used to do.

Neither do I—for that matter I'm afraid. . . . Golf on Sundays—so good, you know—for the liver!

Rev. Goodenough—Yes—I must admit that the voice of the Church seems scarcely to be heard nowadays. So much of my time too has to be spent in trying to get into line with modern science.

Frances—(l a u g h i n g) Who wouldn't prefer a lecture on light-waves to a sermon on original sin?

Rev. Goodenough—(plaintively) That's it. These new physicists are quite unsettling the minds of people, and, somehow, dissolving all our old foundations.

Effendi—Yet is Science only the other wing of the bird of humanity, and both are needed for perfect flight. For if the bird tries to soar with only the wing of religion, it will fall into the slough of superstition; or if it tries to fly with only the wing of science, it will end in the dreary bog of materialism. But with the clarity of science balanced by the power and passion of religion, the possibilities of progress are infinite.

(Turning to Rev. Goodenough) And in these new teachings you will discover solid—because spiritual—foundations, and a complete reconciliation with your former enemy.

Rev. Goodenough—(in agitation, and allowing cigar to drop unheeded to ash-tray) If only I could believe—what an inspiring message to have to preach!

Sir John—But all this, of course, presupposes that we have succeeded in establishing Peace—Effendi?

Effendi—Yet permanent peace, my friend, can never be achieved by politicians and statesmen alone.

Mr. Magnus—You mean that it must also be secured in social and industrial spheres?

Lady Gray—With, I suppose, some enlightened standard of universal education?

Rev. Goodenough—Which will imply that we have managed to lose all our old prejudices.

Effendi—Yes, indeed! For this supreme goal may only be attained by the application of spiritual principles and good-will along every line of human activity.

(Turning to Sir John) But have no fear. For it is the divine purpose that—ere another decade has passed—an International Tribunal and Council of the Nations shall stand at the apex of the world, guiding and co-ordinating all affairs towards a new world order, and maintaining for a thousand years, the Most Great Peace . . . (Turning to Rev. Goodenough) But its spiritual support must be the recognition that, though God's Messengers are many,

the message and guidance to humanity is One.

For such truths as these, souls are waiting and hungry. Have faith! Have courage! and feed them. And soon you shall behold from out the crumbling ruins of the old, a new and glorious edifice arise—the Temple of Divine Unity.

Mr. Magnus—(with keen interest) Tell us, Sir, are there many people who believe these wonderful things?

Effendi—In every country groups are forming upon an ordained plan; and quietly but surely the social and spiritual scaffolding of another civilization is arising. Among the busy cities of the American continent; in the far-flung dominions of the British Empire; and the diverse nations of Europe; beneath the burning suns of India, Arabia and Africa; in the universities of Japan and China; and above all, throughout the scattered towns and villages of Persia—the land of its origin—everywhere I behold the dawning of the new kingdom. Men and women—from a European queen to a Burmese rice-grower—are thrilling to the new melodies of the Spirit, and dedicating their all to this high service. They are the heralds of that oncoming Glory which shall one day cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

(During these words Effendi Roduki rises, and then making a sign of blessing and farewell says:—"Happy is he who penetrates these mysteries, and takes his share from the world of light."

While the company appear to be deeply pondering these words, the room grows dim, and before they seem aware, the Speaker has gone. Figures of group can just be seen as though gazing after him. Voice of Frances is heard.

Frances—Oh, Mother — why—how strange! He's gone. How beautiful he was—like the Spring. Shall we ever see him again?

Lady Gray—Yes, my child. I believe we shall. For surely we have seen the Light of a New Day.

Sir John—And heard the call of a Herald of that Most Great Peace.

Rev. Goodenough—And did not our hearts burn—while he talked with us!

A MAN WITHOUT TROUBLE*

"I have heard thy cries and am conscious of thy tears. Remember at all times and in all places that God is faithful and do not doubt this. Be patient even though great calamities may come upon thee. Yet fear not! Be firm in the path of thy Lord; as a mountain unmoved, unchanging in thy steadfastness."

THESE words were written by Bahá'u'lláh to Mirza Haydar-'Ali to strengthen him during great persecutions. In his early days Mirza Haydar-'Ali traveled from city to city in Persia proclaiming with great wisdom and love the glad tidings of the new and divine day which was dawning upon the earth. But the fanatical religious leaders to whom the vision of universal brotherhood and peace was too bright to be endured soon persecuted him with terrible bitterness. At one time he was beaten and driven through the streets of a city by a wild and howling mob. During this experience he cried out, "This is my triumphal procession." Again he was transported from one prison to another in a very cruel fashion. His hands and feet were tied and he was put in a bag, head downward, and flung across the back of a donkey. Another Bahá'i was put in a bag on the donkey's other side. The head of each of the prisoners dragged on the sand as the donkey was driven the long journey over the desert. Mirza Haydar-'Ali sang gaily as they went along. The guard whipped him unmercifully, saying, "Now, will you sing?" Mirza Haydar-'Ali replied, "I will sing more gladly than ever because you have given me the pleasure of enduring something for the sake of God."

For twelve years Mirza Haydar-'Ali was a prisoner in Khartoum, Egypt. The dungeon-room in which he was confined had a tiny window through which the sun shone but one hour a day. For one precious hour every day Mirza Haydar-'Ali read with glowing heart the Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh. The rest of the day he was in the twilight. But he concentrated his spirit upon the glory of God so perfectly that each day he grew more saintly.

When, in later years, he was asked by Miss Stevens why the Bahá'is all looked so happy (she was thinking especially of the radiant joy in his face), he replied, "Sometimes we have surface troubles, but that cannot touch our happiness. The hearts of those who belong to the Kingdom are like the sea. When the wind is rough it troubles the surface of the water; but two meters down there is perfect calmness."

MRS. LUIA GETSINGER was one day in 'Akká. A western woman was there also and she was telling 'Abdu'l-Bahá all about her troubles. This was a strange thing to do for usually when people entered the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá they were so filled with the contagion of His radiant love that they could think only of their blessings. 'Abdu'l-Bahá with great kindness listened for a half hour to the western woman's troubles; they were really not very big troubles. At last He arose, and said He had another engagement and must be going." "But there," He said, pointing out of the window, "goes a man whom I will bring in to see you. His name is Mirza Haydar-'Ali. We call him the 'Angel of Mount Carmel.' He walks on earth but he lives in heaven. He has had many troubles and he will tell you about them." 'Abdu'l-

Bahá went out, but quickly returned with Mirza Haydar-'Ali whom He presented to the woman, and then departed.

The "Angel of Mount Carmel" with great humility and sweetness of manner began to talk with the woman of the luminous century in which we live and the divine age that is to be. She listened for a while, impatiently, and at last broke in with, "But 'Abdu'l-Bahá said you would tell me about your troubles." Mirza Haydar-'Ali looked up in amazement.

"Troubles?" he replied, "why madam, I never had any troubles. I don't know what troubles are."

"The life of this world is only a few days. Whether happy or unhappy, in freedom or in bonds, healthy or ill, in comfort or in poverty—they will pass away. The one who is established on the throne and the one sitting on the mat—both will cease to exist here. . . .

"But the hearts of the people of faith are assured. If they are surrounded by a thousand enemies they stand firm on their ground. The greatest divine bounty is a confident heart. When the heart is confident, all the trials of the world will be as child's play. . . .

"Rest assured in the protection of God. He will preserve His own children under all circumstances. Be ye not afraid nor be ye agitated. He holds the scepter of power in his hand, and like unto a hen He gathereth His chickens under His wings."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

WHAT OF THE FUTURE?

IF the tent of the oneness of the world of humanity is not pitched on this earth and Universal Peace is not established, there will be more wars. For this war has become a cause of hatred. For instance, the Germans will not forget, the Austrians will not forget, the Bulgarians will not forget. If the banner of Universal Peace is not raised, this question of war will be more acute.

“On one side there will arise the tumult of the Socialists, from another the storm of Bolshevism, from another the problems of labor, from another the antagonism of nations, from another religious hatred, and from another racial prejudices. It is clear what will happen. All of these are like dynamite. One day they will explode, unless the banner of Universal Peace is raised according to the divine teachings, and the oneness of the world of humanity proclaimed.

“According to the divine teachings the banner of Universal Peace must be raised by the Power of the Word of God. The oneness of the world of humanity must be established by the Power of the Holy Spirit. No matter how the politicians strive, it will become worse. The power of man is helpless. . . .

“This period is like the false dawn. This peace is like the false dawn. We will see what the future brings. This has not taken place yet.

“We cannot abolish war by war, for it is like cleansing blood with blood. The divine teachings will accomplish it however.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

BAHÁ'Í PIONEERS

A Short Historical Survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

SIYYID MUSTAFA ROUMIE

Jamal Effendi, accompanied by the author, Mr. Rounie, during two years of pioneer missionary work in India, found no difficulty in obtaining access to the leading people of many important Indian states including high government officials and rulers themselves. Everywhere Jamal received a warm reception and his message was listened to courteously. In many cases men of influence became followers of the Bahá'í Faith, and in several places Bahá'í Assemblies were formed. The work thus begun by Jamal has continued in unbroken succession to the present day when India has reached the point of being second, perhaps, in importance to Persia itself in the number of Bahá'ís.

In 1878 they left Calcutta for Rangoon. Here their mission was highly successful, and in a short time the Bahá'í Cause was widely promulgated in spite of some instances of attempted persecution.

AFTER the establishment of the Cause in Rangoon we left for Mandalay early in 1879 with several Persian companions. As there was no railroad communication at that time, we had to go by a slow river steamer which ran once a week from Rangoon to Mandalay, capital of the then independent kingdom of Burma.

There were many obstacles to successful missionary work in Burma. In the first place we did not know the Burmese language. Secondly, we had no arrangements for our entertainment there or for contact with the natives, and had to shift for ourselves until we were fortunate in finding, as later described, a Persian from Calcutta who knew us and who gave us our first opening in the city. Thirdly, under the rule of the despotic Burmese king, teaching of the Cause was extremely dangerous.

Promulgation of a new religion was, by Buddhist law, to be punished either by banishment, or execution by torture.

But did not a Tablet from His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh give us the Divine command to proceed to Mandalay and establish the kingdom there? This, then, was our spiritual duty. What difference did it make to the lives of obedient servants if they were killed or spared in the line of duty? They considered nothing to be their own, all belonged to their Lord.

The trip to Mandalay was long and tedious, as the boat did not run at night, and it took us more than ten days to reach our destination. We arrived at Mandalay about an hour before sunset, and had great difficulty in finding lodgings there. At the advice of the chief of customs, who was a Muhammadan, we took shelter for the night at a Mosque called Joon Pulli, where we slept as well as we could in an open shed adjoining the Mosque.

Fortunately on the very next morning a Calcutta friend, previously referred to, Haji Abdul Kareem, upon hearing of our arrival, came to see us bringing with him a Burmese friend named Haji Abdul Aziz (in Burmese Ko Pooh), a dealer in precious stones. This Burmese gentleman was well known and respected by the Moslem community of Burma. We asked him if he could procure us a house, which he did—a residence in the Moslem quarter not far from the Mosque.

News of our arrival spread through the Moslem community of Mandalay, and men of all classes came now and then to see us asking many religious questions. One gentleman who had already accepted the Cause in Rangoon, Agha Mohammed Kassim Shirazi, came rejoicing to see us, and became a regular and enthusiastic visitor thereafter.

Also our Calcutta friend Haji Abdul Kareem came regularly to question Jamal Effendi upon spiritual problems connected with the Moslem law. He joined us every day to take with us the Persian tea.

As far as possible in our missionary travels, we tried to mingle with all races, creeds and nationalities, but the people brought to us at this time were chiefly Muhammadans. As it was in this circle that we mingled mostly, we felt it necessary to observe all due Muhammadan rites. There was for instance the Fast of Ramadhan and the Feast that follows it; all the obligatory prayers we also attended; but although we were associating constantly in this way with Muhammadan Burmese, we were unfortunately not able to converse with them in Burmese, and our Calcutta friend Haji Kareem interpreted for us.

Thus our days went on until one evening as we were returning home, all of a sudden, stones were thrown at us from the darkness opposite our house. We were seated at the time in front of the house in conversation with friends who had been waiting to see us. Fortunately no one was hurt, and the landlord came out, shouted loudly, and the stoning ceased. The next morning our friend Haji Kareem came to tell us that the people of the quarter disliked our presence there and it would be best to move somewhere else—they wanted to get rid of us. We thought it best to comply with their desire and engaged a house with a compound at some distance from this one. Here our friends continued to meet with us, occasionally bringing new seekers of truth. These people Jamal Effendi welcomed and entertained in the most kindly way, conversing with them on spiritual subjects, and they would depart strong admirers of him and of the message which he had presented.

This quiet and unobtrusive method of teaching led to some important results. One of our new friends, Abdul Wahid, who, like many other Muhammadan merchants in Burma, had taken the Burmese name, Ko Thin, carried the news of Jamal Effendi and his spiritual message to his uncle Abdus Sattar (in Burmese U Koo), a very well known silk merchant, a man of great intelligence and influence in his circle. Abdul Wahid related to his uncle all that he had heard and seen during his visits with Jamal. The old gentleman, Abdus Sattar, an ardent seeker of truth, told his nephew to invite us both to dinner in his home—an invitation which we accepted with great pleasure.

They came to fetch us with a bullock chariot, then the chief vehicle in Burma, and after our evening prayers, we accompanied them to the home of Abdus Sattar where we found our host very eagerly awaiting us. We observed that we were the only guests, and after the dinner and the usual exchange of politenesses, Abdus Sattar began to put all sorts of questions to Jamal relating to Sufi mysticism. Jamal Effendi with great promptness and brilliancy answered all of his questions and solved all of his spiritual problems to his entire satisfaction. We talked until the early morning hours and it was about two o'clock when we made our apologies and took our departure. Later we heard that our aged host, through the sheer delight and pleasure he had in conversing with Jamal, was unable to sleep that night.

The very next day, to our great surprise, his nephew came with a bullock cart and a chariot to take us with all our belongings to a home which Abdus Sattar had assigned to us. Upon arrival there we found the old gentleman busily at work, engaged in having constructed for us a meeting-house on a vacant piece of land adjoining our home. Soon this meeting-house became a center which attracted a sincerely devotional audience. This was the real beginning of the Divine Cause of Bahá'u'lláh in Mandalay. It is evident that the chief credit for the opportunity to spread the Cause in Burma must be given to Abdus Sattar and his nephew. They were the first to become believers in Mandalay, noble souls, each of them, and they were the recipients of many Tablets from His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh.

Gradually the number of believers increased from day to day until it reached the number of some two hundred or more. These were busy and happy days. Indeed we worked day and night, and I was also kept busy translating Tablets into the Urdu language, translating verses from the Qur'án and the Traditions regarding the time, place and person of the Divine Manifestation prophesied in these Holy Books. This subject finally extended itself into a book of some three hundred pages, The Standard of Truth or Reality, which I wrote for Abdus Sattar.

We stayed in Mandalay for eighteen months. When the time came to leave, Abdul Wahid was appointed as our representative. Through him we were able to continue communication with the Mandalay friends. In order to prepare him for this responsibility we had been teaching him daily the divine principles of Bahá'u'lláh.

How grateful we were to God that in a city where there was such danger in spreading the message of Bahá'u'lláh, we had been protected by the friendship and influence of our new Bahá'i brother, Abdus Sattar. This was our salvation, for although the Persian Shiite community publicly denounced Jamal Effendi as a Bahá'i and incited the people to do us injury, yet so great was the influence of Abdus Sattar that no one was found who dared to come forward and oppose or obstruct the Movement.

Meanwhile our Persian friend, Agha Muhammad Kassim Shirazi, was working independently within the circle of the Persian Shiite community where he was able to guide many souls to the Truth, among them Agha Sayed Mehdi Shirazi and Agha Muhammad Sadiq, both of them partners of his in his Mandalay shop, and others some of whom had become natives of Mandalay.

In the course of time the prejudice of the Persian Shiite community became somewhat decreased. Two well known merchants, Mirza Muhammad Ali Isfahani and Agha Muhammad Ibrahim Shirazi, each invited us to dinner in their homes where we found gathered all the notable Persians of Mandalay. Jamal Effendi took advantage of this wonderful opportunity to deliver a most convincing address on the expectation of the Gha'im and the Messiah. The audience received this address in the most respectful silence except for a few polite questions. It seemed these souls had been impressed, but due to their ignorance of Truth and to their intellectual pride they preferred to follow blindly their own dogmatic creeds.

The Priest of the Chinese Muhammadan Mosque, a learned sage, came to see us bringing with him a written question, a spiritual puzzle, which he wanted made clear. This Jamal Effendi accomplished to his great satisfaction, pointing out how the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh had fulfilled all these prophecies. The Chinese gentleman retired completely satisfied with his answers.

Thus having finished our duties for the present in Mandalay, feeling that much of importance had been accomplished and that the Supreme Cause of Bahá'u'lláh was well founded there, we returned to Rangoon by the same river steamer by which we had arrived.

"The will and plan of God is that each individual member of humankind shall become illumined like unto a lamp, radiant with all the destined virtues of humanity, leading his fellow creatures out of natal darkness into the heavenly light. Therein rests the virtue and glory of the world of humanity. This is the perfection, honor and glory of man; otherwise man is an animal and without differentiation from the creatures of that lower kingdom."

EDUCATOR AND PUBLICIST

ALAIN L. LOCKE

THE many friends of Professor George William Cook were shocked in August by his unexpected passing just a few weeks after relinquishing the office of Secretary of the Alumni Association of Howard University. Mr. Cook was in succession student, pupil-teacher, teacher, dean, secretary-treasurer, dean emeritus, alumni secretary and finally trustee of this important Negro educational center, and his association with it spanned a period of fifty-seven years all but four years of its life history as an institution. He was therefore in an intimate and peculiar way a part of this institution; and although he was a man of many public associations and interests, it is as a Nestor of Howard University that he will be most remembered. Indeed he shares with fewer than a half dozen figures the honor of being a symbol of the Old Howard.

But why mention this outside the constituency where it is too well-known to be anything but a platitude? Because the key to an appreciative understanding of the man is in this fact. Mr. Cook was spiritually a product of the period of Reconstruction and so also was the Negro college. Its stamp was upon him; its ideals and principles were the dominant passion and motivation of his life. What were they? Liberty, education and justice. We shall have a true picture of the man if we trace the way his life reflected them.

Mr. Cook escaped early from the dark house of bondage. He passionately loved freedom all his life, and sought it for himself and for his people as an indispensable of life. With a persistent and deep-seated fervor he hated all forms of slavery and gloried in independence. With insistence and cannieness he struggled for economic independence, and attained it. Similarly, he advocated it for his people, and it is not surprising that he was a pioneer advocate of business training at Howard first as head of the commercial academy course, later as first dean of the College of Commerce and Finance. Although an ardent and efficient educator, Mr. Cook was always thought of as essentially a man of business, because of this preoccupation as much and more than because of his long service as business manager of the university during its trying and perilous years of financial struggle and uncertainty. It was not a mere selfish interest in wealth,—rather a passionate realization of the necessity for economic independence for the Negro. Political and civic independence were equally dear, and although denied direct political activity through life-long residence in Washington, Mr. Cook was ever an advocate and counsellor of political action and joined every campaign for the safeguarding of the Negro's political and civic rights. Thus he became one of the main supporters and officers of the Washington branch of the National Association of Colored People.

Similarly, he believed ardently in education. It was perhaps his profoundest illusion. The reconstruction period, in which he matured, believed in education as a panacea. So the newer ideas of social reform did not appeal to Mr. Cook,—liberty, justice and education were social salvation enough for him,—because he thought they could bring it about. Perhaps they could if fully applied everywhere. But we are trying to understand a man, not solve the problem of society. Mr. Cook emphasized knowledge as that which makes men masters of themselves and sets them free. And for a person with such a faith, one can imagine no greater boon than to spend practically all his life in a school that grew in sixty years from a handful of unlettered freedmen to today's community of nearly three thousand college and professional students, and from a mortgaged farm property to a state supported university. It was Mr. Cook's good fortune and great life-long effort to build himself into this institution, and even after the memory of friends has faded out, this will be for him an enduring monument.

But with all the conservatism of his mind, he was yet able to embrace whatever new truth seemed to him a logical extension of fundamental principles. On many occasions he expressed with earnestness and enthusiasm his appreciation of the great principles enunciated by Bahá'u'lláh for the perfecting of the human race, and unhesitatingly offered his home for Bahá'í meetings.

There is but one thing more to be said,—and that worthy of being last;—this life, and that of his faithful wife have been lives of tireless, scrupulous, sacrificing and devoted public service,—in so many capacities and connections that the detailed mention would be bore-some. This principle of social responsibility and social service is after all, my conception of the vital proof and test of the presence of real religion in a character and life, and it is a privilege to attest its deep and profitable presence in the life of this friend whom we all shall miss greatly, but just as greatly remember.

SONGS OF THE SPIRIT

EL ABHA
E. T. HALL

I truly lived to find out God—
And I have found His Holy Light
In Heaven, in every path I trod,
And in my heart by day and night.

I thank Thee, Lord, for all the seers
Who trained my sight to know Thy Face;
And for Thy love through all these years—
These years in which Thy signs I trace.

I love Thy light in all Thy ways,
Thy works, Thy words, Thy cosmos grand,
Thy mercies great, Thy lovely days,
Thy love that makes me understand!

I praise Thee, Lord, I praise Thy Name—
That Greatest Name to which I kneel;
I fan its mention to a flame
And in my heart a warmth I feel.

From all Mankind within my heart,
And from the trees, the hills, the seas,
That in my being have their part,
I send my praise on Summer breeze!

As to the sun the morning star
Responds with lovely radiant glow,
Though small I be—at distance far—
Thou knowest me and Thee I know.

Thou lovest me and I love Thee,
Thy Glory fills my life and mind;
And I in Thee in full degree
The Treasure of existence find!

THE SONG OF THE PINE OF BAHJI

MARY ALICE PEARMAN

I am the Pine of Bahji, and my limbs
Bear scars of pain, still they are full of light.
Sun love caresses them with golden glow.
Moon fills their depth with peacefulness at night.

I am the ancient pine of centuries;
The sentinel who stands without a sword,
By day, by night, by radiant dawn I guard
The Threshold of the Prophet of the Lord.

Before the Prophet came I was alone;
All day the caravans went trooping by,
Yet no one stopped—the sun was dull like bronze,
And there were no bright stars across the sky.

I was alone and blind, nor could I hear
The singing of the glad bird on his nest—
Until one day two people, passing by,
Stopped for a moment in my shade to rest.

Oh glorious day! My branches filled with joy,
The sun sent forth her radiating light,
I woke, and to my poor blind eyes there came Dawn, and the clearness of eternal sight!

TO THE MADONNA AT THE PLACE OF CRUCIFIXION

MARY ALICE PEARMAN

Little Madonna the wind that is blowing
Seeks the night long, but it cannot find you.
By hill and valley and rivulet calling,
But you have left the green world behind you.

Little Madonna your arms are o'erflowing
With gifts the adoring world has carried;
If your son Jesus had not been going
From the green pastures, would you have tarried?

In a dark chamber, forever praying;
What a sad face, so pale with sorrow—
But Christus is living little Madonna!
Why not go back to the fields, tomorrow.

DEEDS NOT WORDS

ETHEL CLAIR MURRAY

Efficiency rules in the Kingdom of God,
The spirit is keen and alert,
No thought of one's self has a part in the plan,
Resentment comes not for a hurt.

If we hear S. O. S. we are ready to act,
Though our station be high or be low,
For the angels are there to aid in our task,
To strengthen our faith. This we know.

Our courage is great for we've nothing to fear,
There's no thought of hiding away
To let someone else do the service of love,
Or wait till another day.

In the Kingdom we care not what others may say,
When our hearts appeal to our minds,
We realize the MOST important comes first
And leave the important behind.

If we are efficient the spirit will lead
The way to a life more divine;
We'll never refuse to give one a drink
From the cup of Heavenly Wine.

We'll think of the needs of God's pitiful poor,
And feed them and clothe them and aid,
We'll give our last crust without thought of self:
Far greater than if we had prayed.

We'll take in the homeless without thought of harm,
Believing that God will protect;
And through being selfless, a blessing is born
From which God's Love will reflect.

O, efficiency rules in the Kingdom of Love;
It's something that all must acquire.
To gain it we go through the hardest of tests:
O, let us come safe through the Fire.

C H R I S T

WHY did Christ come into this world? People think He came in order that they might believe in Him as the Word of God, or the Son of God. 'He came,' they say, 'to redeem us through His blood.'

Christ was not seeking after fame. He came that He might educate the world of humanity and illumine the world of reality. He sacrificed His life for the realization of this fact. This is reality. Every fair and just man accepts this. Now is it befitting that we lay aside the refining of character and engage in war, or abandon the second birth and occupy ourselves with enmity? Christ came to release the people from the promptings of the lower nature, to make them angelic. For this thing He accepted all calamities."

WHEN His Holiness Christ appeared in this world it was like the vernal bounty; the outpouring descended; the effulgences of the Merciful encircled all things; the human world found new life. Even the physical world partook of it. The divine perfections were upraised; souls were trained in the school of heaven so that all grades of human existence received life and light."

CONSIDER the essential teachings of His Holiness Jesus Christ, you will see they are lights. Nobody can question them. They are the very source of life. They are the cause of happiness for the human race, but subsequently imitations appeared, which imitations becloud the Sun of Reality. That has nothing to do with the Reality of Christ."

THE world must come to know the Word in Christ. How He was mocked, scorned and laughed at, yet His mission was to uplift the very world which refused Him. Realization of this will bring tears to the eyes of those who deny Him; cause them to grow silent and thoughtful. Christ is Always Christ."

"This Bahá'í Cause is great and it was at great cost that Bahá'u'lláh strove to spread these principles in the world. During His Life He was imprisoned, His property was pillaged. He was separated from His friends, and twenty thousand of His followers were martyred. They sacrificed their lives in the glorious cause of doing away with imitations and limitations, to this end that Unity might be established among the children of men."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

A MOST STRIKING parallelism exists between the national and religious conditions incident to the rise of the Bahá'í Movement and those conditions which surrounded the birth of Christianity. Those who give a favorable ear to the soul-challenging claim of Bahá'u'lláh as the Messenger of God for this day and age may formulate—expressed or unexpressed—the query, "Why did this Prophet of the new age arise in Persia, one of the most insignificant and degenerate countries of the world at the time of Bahá'u'lláh's declaration?"

"All observers agree," says Shoghi Effendi in his introduction to *The Dawn-Breakers, "in representing Persia as a feeble and backward nation divided against itself by corrupt practices and ferocious bigotries. Inefficiency and wretchedness, the fruit of moral decay, filled the land. From the highest to the lowest there appeared neither the capacity to carry out methods of reform nor even the will seriously to institute them. National conceit preached a grandiose self-content. A pall of immobility lay over all things and a general paralysis of mind made any development impossible. To a student of history the degeneracy of a nation once so powerful and so illustrious seems pitiful in the extreme."

WHY SHOULD the Messenger of a new day, the proclaimer of a new social, economic and political order for mankind, the Founder of a new and ultimate civilization, appear in this isolated and backward country?

As one reads Nabil's story of the rise of the Cause, the reasons for this paradox appear and it becomes apparent that Persia was the one country of the world in which the new dispensation could gain a foothold and mature to the point of world-wide propagation. For in Persia alone of all the countries of the world, in 1844 there permeated through all classes and sects the ideal and the expectation of the coming of the Messiah.

Here is a striking parallelism to the time of Christ. Only a country psychologically isolated as Judea was, and as Persia was in 1844, could carry in their hearts and minds with unmitigated fervor a belief in the immediate appearance of the Messiah. This expectation had a double cause: first in the prophecies of the Scriptures of these two peoples; and secondly in the realized need, a desperate need indeed, for some force to lift them out of their degradation.

In both these countries the popular concept of the Messiah and His destined achievement proved erroneous. It was confidently expected that He would lift these peoples not only out of national degeneracy but also out of national weakness, into a position of supreme command and glory among the nations of the earth. Thus racial and national pride was a powerful factor in the vivid concepts and expectations of the Messianic hope as held in Persia in 1844; and here, as well as in ancient Palestine, the ecclesiastical hierarchy looked forward to the coming of the Messiah as eagerly as did the populace. "They confidently expected that the promised Advent would not substitute a new and richer revelation for the old but would endorse and fortify the system of which they were the functionaries. It would enhance incalculably their personal prestige, would extend their authority far and wide among the nations and would win for them the reluctant but abject homage of mankind."*

*The Dawn-Breakers—Nabil's Narrative of the Early days of the Baha'i Revelation. Translated into English from the original Persian and edited by Shoghi Effendi—$7.50; Baha'i Publishing Committee, P. O. Box 348, Grand Central Station, New York City.

Into such a nation and race—fanatical in the extreme, ignorant of all but the ecclesiastical learning—came the Báb in 1844 with His declaration of Prophethood and His announcement of the coming of the Messiah. What a tense and spectacular environment in which to stage such a noble drama! Nowhere else in the world could such a claim have received the attention, both favorable and unfavorable, which it received in Persia. The full intensity of the Messianic hope had prepared the mind of Persia either for the ardent acceptance of the claim of the Báb or for bitter and diabolical attacks upon the growing strength of His movement.

It was this very ardor of the Persian temperament which made possible the drama of the Báb. Staged elsewhere in the world, His claims would have been more tolerantly endured, but with a sophistication which would have defeated the very essence and power of His movement. The Persian psychology, with its Messianic complex set for an explosion like a gun with a hair-trigger, was the only possible locale in which the Messianic claim could be made and fulfilled.

WHAT A GREAT drama unfolds to us from the pen of Nabil! Simply, with no effort at rhetoric but with the power which comes from the sincere narration of great events, Nabil unfolds to us the concrete story of the missions of the Báb and of Bahá'u'lláh. We see the Báb in all his youthful glory and appeal win, as if by a miracle, the greatest of the divines to Him as disciples, pledging heart and soul and life to His Cause.

Here even more than in ancient Palestine the spiritual battle of reform is waged in the midst of ecclesiasticism. On the one hand are the great divines and Qur'anic scholars,—leaders of spiritual thought, and because of the power of the church leaders also in affairs—becoming flaming apostles of the gentle Báb; enduring all manner of persecutions and martyrdoms; yet spreading with the incredible rapidity of fire the conflagration which the penetrative power of His word affected. On the other hand we see powerful ecclesiastics combining with provincial and local rulers and endeavoring by every means possible to suppress this Cause which threatened their power and glory. We see, as in the time of Christ, of what diabolical selfishness, egoism and cruelty the human soul is capable. To the illumination of the apostleship is contrasted the stygian darkness of an evil priesthood.

What an inspiration to have spread before us by the touch of Nabil's simple art the pictured power of the Báb to melt souls at a glance, to overwhelm hearts with conviction, to reduce the proudest of scholars to tears and win them to an ardent following of His teachings. What a stir it gives to our smug complacency and our easy enjoyment of a great faith to read the tales of bitter persecution, of life blood poured out; of diabolical tortures endured by great souls in order that all the world might ultimately receive the Light which dazzled their vision and drew them to It as the moth is drawn candleward.

AS WE READ these stories of discipleship we seem to be moving in a spiritual domain as ancient as the Planet itself; and to sense the epic recurrence of the Manifestation, staged intermittently from time immemorial, as humanity has had the need. Take for example the winning to apostleship of Siyyid Yahyay-i-Darabi, the most learned, the most influential of His subjects who occupied a position of such pre-eminence among the leading figures in Persia that at whatever meeting he happened to be present, no matter how great the number of the ecclesiastical leaders who attended it, he was invariably its chief speaker. This great divine, chief ecclesiastical figure of Persia, was sent by Muhammad Shah to interview the Báb and to investigate His claims. On the way to Shiráz, Darabi thinks out various questions with which he would confront the Báb, and "upon the replies which the latter should give to these questions would, in his view, depend the truth and validity of His mission." Coming into the presence of the Báb he undertook with the latter a long and abstruse discussion of the metaphysical teachings of Islam.

More and more as the Báb conversed with him and answered his queries, did the learned divine come to feel a sense of deep spiritual humility before this glorious youth. In the course of his second interview, Siyyid Yahyay discovered to his amazement that the questions which he had intended to submit to the Báb had vanished from his memory. As the interview went on he discovered again to his amazement that the Báb was answering with great lucidity and conciseness the very questions which he had momentarily forgotten. This, however, "might have been merely a coincidence," so Siyyid Yahyay resolved in his third interview with the Báb to request Him to give a commentary on one of the most difficult chapters of the Qur'án and to base the validity of the Báb's claim of Prophethood on His elucidation of this obscure Surih. The Báb, before His interviewer could state his question, smilingly gazed at him and said, "Were I to reveal for you the commentary on the Surih of Kawther, would you acknowledge that My Words, My claim is born of the Spirit of God?"

The Báb then requested His secretary to bring His pen-case and paper and started to reveal His commentary on the Surih of Kawthar.

"How am I to describe this scene of inexpressible majesty? Verses streamed from His pen with a rapidity that was truly astounding. The incredible swiftness of His writing, the soft and gentle murmur of His voice, and the stupendous force of His style, amazed and bewildered me. He continued in this manner until the approach of sunset. He did not pause until the entire commentary of the Surih was completed. He then laid down His pen and asked for tea. Soon after, He began to read it aloud in my presence. My heart leaped madly as I heard Him pour out, in accents of unutterable sweetness, those treasures enshrined in that sublime commentary. I was so entranced by its beauty that three times over I was on the verge of fainting. He sought to revive my failing strength with a few drops of rosewater which He caused to be sprinkled on my face. This restored my vigor and enabled me to follow His reading to the end. . . . We later verified all the traditions in the text and found them to be entirely accurate. Such was the state of certitude to which I then attained that if all the powers of the earth were to be leagued against me they would be powerless to shake my confidence in the greatness of His Cause."

It was by such a majestic spiritual power as this that the Báb drew to Him the greatest minds of Persia, and the most sincere hearts. Like a fairy tale, this story reads. But it is no myth or legend. It is an accurate first-hand account of scenes witnessed by Nabil, or of scenes witnessed by friends who themselves narrated these events to Nabil.

The author was thirteen years old when the Báb declared Himself, and was throughout his life closely associated with the leaders of the Cause. For many years he was a close companion of the Báb's secretary, Mirza Ahmad. "He entered the presence of Bahá'u'lláh in Kirmansháh and Tíhrán before the date of the exile to Iráq, and afterwards was in attendance upon Him in Baghdad and Adrianople as well as in the prison-city of 'Akká. He was sent more than once on missions to Persia to promote the Cause and to encourage the scattered and persecuted believers, and he was living in 'Akká when Bahá'u'lláh passed away in 1892. . . . His chronicle was begun in 1888 when he had the personal assistance of Mirza Musa the brother of Bahá'u'lláh. It was finished in about a year and a half, and parts of the manuscript were reviewed and approved, some by Bahá'u'lláh, and others by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The complete work carries the history of the Movement up to the death of Bahá'u'lláh in 1892.

The Dawn-Breakers, it is clear, will become to the Bahá'ís a second Book of Acts of the Apostles; its power of inspiration equals that of the Cause itself as a stirrer of man's heart and conscience. In the secular world, this unique volume will take its place as the greatest source-book on the early days of the Bábist and Bahá'í Movements.

This is a book which every Bahá'í family should own and study deeply, in order that through it they might live again in these stirring days of the early Cause. The book gains tremendously in its appeal to Bahá'í readers from the fact of its having been translated and edited by Shoghi Effendi. And it gains also added importance in the eyes of the world of scholarship from this authentication by the present leader of the Bahá'í Movement, the great-grandson of its Founder.

CHOICE OF MARTYRDOM

DR. YOUNESS AFROUKTA

The author, a distinguished Persian Bahá'í who was with 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 'Akká for nine years (from 1900 to 1909), told the following story to a group of friends on his recent visit to Germany. It has been recorded at their request, and is here published for its great spiritual value and historic interest.

SOME thirty years ago when 'Abdu'l-Bahá was surrounded by His bitter enemies; when they were instigating the Turkish Government to illtreat Him; when in His confined place of 'Akká He had a very small group of true and faithful Bahá'is, 'Abdu'l-Bahá always expressed great joy and happiness at the thought of being martyred like unto Jesus Christ and His disciples, and like unto thousands of faithful followers of the blessed Báb and Bahá'u'lláh.

In those days the doors were opened wide for the Oriental friends to enter heaven.* All the true believers prayed to God and yearned to be accepted for martyrdom. One day one of the pilgrims and I were discussing the best way of being admitted to sacrifice. My friend, M. Fazlullah, said that he preferred to be killed by Shamajeen like Suleiman Khan, who danced with joy during that terrible torture. (Shamajeen means decorated, grafted with candles.)

This is the way that Suleiman Khan was martyred. His body was cut through in several places and burning candles were planted in the wounds. In such a horrible state he was driven for several hours throughout the city to show the people the fate of a distinguished and honorable man converted to the new Faith. This was the way that the government, instigated by the clergy, punished the believers, in order to terrify those who desired to know about the new religion.

Now my friend, M. Fazlullah, preferred this way of being sacrificed in the Path of Bahá'u'lláh. But I did not choose this way. I preferred to be put to death by cannon shot, for that was the best way of propagating throughout the world the call to steadfastness. Several prominent people have been martyred in that way. This was the way that I had chosen, and I implored God to help me to attain to it. But I could not convince my friend that mine was the best way. He stuck obstinately to his own way. The discussion lasted a long time without being able to convince each other.

At last we left the pilgrims' room and went to the room of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. In His simple courtyard room, we found Him standing among a dozen of the faithful ones who were from the different oriental countries. They had surrounded Him like unto a number of butterflies of various colors gathered around a lighted candle. He was full of joy, uttering heavenly words, giving divine exhortation. And the first words we heard Him say, as we arrived, in continuation of His speech was: "In the Path of Bahá'u'lláh, the faithful Bahá'í must become Shamajeen."

* So violent were the persecutions that thousands were being put to death at this time.

On hearing this my friend looked at me severely. I understood what he meant by that look.

But lo! What heard we after that? 'Abdu'l-Bahá, without paying any attention to our arrival, said: "Yes, the true believer is he who wishes to be sacrificed with cannon shot for the sake of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh!"

Hearing this, I did not fail to look at once at my friend, and could not help smiling. I am sure he understood what I meant to say.

This was the end of our discussion. None of us has ever proved worthy to attain to the zenith of such a desire. But the remembrance of the heavenly power of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to know our mind and to conciliate the different thoughts of His disciples gives me such an eternal joy and spiritual happiness that I mentioned this event once in Europe* and am repeating it now in order to sanctify His Name for ever and ever.

* In lecturing on the Bahai Cause in Mecklenburg, Germany.

IN the nineteenth century, strife and hostility prevailed among the people of the Orient. Apathy and ignorance characterized the nations. They were indeed gloomy and dark, negligent of God and under the subjection of the baser instincts and passions of mankind. The struggle for existence was intense and universal. At such a time as this, His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared among them like a luminary in the heavens. He flooded the east with light. He proclaimed new principles and teachings. He laid a basis for new institutions which are the very spirit of modernism, the light of the world, the development of the body-politic and eternal honor. The souls who hearkened to these teachings among the various oriental nations immediately renounced the spirit of strife and hostility and began to associate in good-will and fellowship. From extremes of animosity they attained the acme of love and brotherhood. They had been warring and quarreling; now they became loving and lived together in complete unity and agreement. Among them today you will find no religious, political or patriotic prejudice; they are friendly, loving and associate in the greatest happiness. They have no part in the war and strife which take place in the east; their attitude toward all men is that of good-will and loving-kindness. A standard of Universal Peace has been unfurled among them. The light of guidance has flooded their souls. It is light upon light, love upon love. This is the education and training of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh. He has led these souls to this standard and given them teachings which insure eternal illumination. Anyone who becomes well versed in His teachings will say, "Verily, I declare that these words constitute the illumination of humanity; that this is the honor everlasting; that these are heavenly precepts and the cause of never-ending life among men."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

MY VISIT TO TEMPLE UNIVERSITY

"Newspapers are as a mirror which is endowed with hearing, sight and speech; they are a wonderful phenomenon and a great matter. But it behooveth the writers thereof to be sanctified from the prejudice of egotism and desire and to be adorned with the ornament of equity and justice; they must inquire into matters as much as possible, in order that they may be informed of the real facts and commit the same to writing."—Bahá'u'lláh.

TEMPLE UNIVERSITY in Philadelphia, Pa., a University for the people, was founded by Dr. Russell H. Conwell, one of America's most celebrated preachers, lecturers and educators. Two hundred students from three international relations groups, came together on October 28, to hear a talk on Bahá'u'lláh's peace principles, Professor Graves, in his talk afterwards, expressed thanks for the intimate glimpse of the lives of peoples in other countries that the students otherwise would not have had the opportunity to see. He expressed appreciation, also, for the glimpse of the world of peace that might be realized through these Universal Principles.

The writer told of her interview a few years ago with Dr. Conwell, concerning the Bahá'í Movement. He had said to her for publication: "The Bahá'í Movement is the biggest Movement in the world today for world-wide Christianity, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá is the Peace Prophet of this age. I know because I spent seven months in the orient and I saw that millions of Muhammadans, Buddhists, Jews and other orientals have come up beautifully into Christianity through becoming Bahá'is. I cabled to Egypt, asking 'Abdu'l-Bahá to speak in my church (Baptist Temple)—and when He came to this country He did speak there on June 9, 1912."

It may be interesting to know that Dr. Conwell, in introducing 'Abdu'l-Bahá on that occasion in the Baptist Temple said: "Our own people know well the history of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, visitors are here who already know Him, hence there is no necessity of any further introduction. We wish to hear of the efforts of those who have gone before Him and of His own splendid efforts in bringing about the unity of all mankind. I therefore give the time entirely to our friend and the friend of humanity everywhere, 'Abdu'l-Bahá Abbas of Persia, more recently of Palestine."

Miss Root's lecture in Temple University was on these peace principles of Bahá'u'lláh. After the lecture, several of the students of the school of journalism asked questions and the speaker told them what 'Abdu'l-Bahá had said about newspapers when He had visited Philadelphia. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's own words were:

"Newspapers are the mirrors that reflect the progression or the retrogression of the community. We may ascertain the progress or the retrogression of a nation by its journalism. If journalists should abide by their duties, they would be the promoters of many virtues among the community. Truth and the virtues would be fostered. This would be so if they carried out the duties incumbent upon them."

Journalists must serve truth. Newspapers must investigate the means for the progress of humanity, and publish them. Journalists must write significant articles, articles that shall foster the public welfare. If they do so they will be the highest promoters for the development of the community.'*"

Miss Root's lecture had been announced in the Temple University News Wednesday, October 28, 1931 as "a representative of the Bahá'í Movement, an organization designed to promote ideals of peace." As she was shown through the university of the temple afterward, a number of questions were asked about the Bahá'í teachings. She commented that Dr. Conwell's great project was somewhat like the plan for the Mashriq'ul Adhkár of the Bahá'ís in the fact that it was not only an institution of theory but an institution of practice. In the center is the Church (the Temple) and connected with it is the great people's university where several thousand students are enrolled in the year 1931, and connected with Temple Church three great hospitals have been built, and Dr. Conwell also has done much work for children.

The words of Dr. Conwell about 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the Bahá'í teachings are significant because he was one of the very greatest humanitarians of America, and though his last days were spent while theological controversy was rife, he never descended to it. He did not attempt to define Christ but to live like Him.

* This was published in the Philadelphia Ledger June 10, 1912.

"The glory and the exaltation of the Station of Christ is as clear as the sun at midday from the books and tablets of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh. The object of the Baha'i Cause is identical with the object of the Bible and the Gospel. The Bahá'ís must be informed as to the contents of the Old and New Testaments. Concerning the faith of the Bahá'ís as to the Station of His Holiness Christ, they believe He is the Word of God."

MAHATMA GANDHI AND VOLUNTARY POVERTY

FLORENCE E. PINCHON

"To be poor in all save God is a great blessing; make it not small, for in the end it will make thee rich in God."

—Bahá'u'lláh.

BROWN, emaciated, clad in white scanty garments—a strange enough figure—he stood before the crowded audience gathered in the Guildhouse, Eccleston Square, London. Gathered, in this famous modern church of Dr. Maude Royden, to see and to hear the greatest living exponent of voluntary poverty—the Mahatma Gandhi.

Voluntary poverty! The bare idea made us shiver a little in the chilly autumn evening. But then, as we were to discover later, we had not realized the spiritual glow and blessedness enfolded in that pregnant word "voluntary."

Quietly the keen, luminous eyes behind their large spectacles scanned the rows of well-dressed people. And one could imagine that he clearly enough perceived the conflicting opinions, ideas and curiosity that filled our minds concerning him—our genuine friendliness but bewilderment.

For here was a man, known to every newsboy as "the Naked Fakir," who, by some magic of personality, had become the most powerful leader of his country's destinies. A man who, to our amazement, considered his seven o'clock hour of prayer of more importance than a meeting of statesmen; who preferred a cell-like room in an East end settlement to a palatial hotel; who shunned social functions, and made friends with costers and mischievous street urchins; who had even won the hearts of the Lancashire cotton spinners by humbly confessing how it had distressed him to have to injure them in the course of his duty to India's starving millions. A man who had defied the law and suffered imprisonments, yet whom archbishops delighted to entertain; who was absorbed in affairs of high import yet loved to sit on the floor and talk with outcasts; who was gentle as a lamb and as unyielding as iron; who could command almost any position he wished, but deliberately chose the lowest station of poverty.

Conscious of our wonder, very simply and naturally he began:

"You will be astonished to hear from me, that though, to all appearances my mission is political . . . its roots are spiritual. I claim that at least my politics are not divorced from morality, from spirituality, from religion. . . . A man who is trying to discover and follow the will of God cannot possibly leave a single field of life untouched. . . . I found that the politics of the day are no longer a concern of kings, that they affect the lowest strata of society . . . and that if I wanted to do social service, I could not possibly leave politics alone."

Here then was a sincere worker for humanity who had realized that, ultimately, all its problems, whether economic, social, political or national, were inextricably interwoven, and having their secret roots embedded in the hearts and minds of men, were profoundly spiritual in nature.

To a Bahá'í these expressions of personal conviction held a peculiar significance, coming like an echo from that autumn—just twenty years ago—when in other famous London churches, that great Visitor from the Orient, the Master 'Abdu'l-Bahá, taught to the Western world the interdependence of all things, and offered for its enlightenment those truths that He, in His own life exemplified.

THE PROCESS OF DISPOSSESSION. But soon Gandhi realized that to carry his fight for his destitute countrymen into the political arena and remain unsoiled by its untruth, immorality, and what is known as "political gain" was impossible. And so, after much anxious consideration, he came to the conclusion that there was only one way in which he could continue to remain "in the world, but not of it"—the way of utter renunciation. And that if he would effectively aid those of whose sufferings he was a daily witness, he must be prepared to share their afflictions. Not only must he discard all personal ambitions, all earthly desires, all monetary gain, but also all ease and comfort and every material possession possible.

The process of dispossession was slow and painful. It was such a complete reversal of the ordinary impulse of human nature. Not how much could be won, used and accumulated—but how much discarded? With how little was it possible to keep alive and efficient? A tremendous experiment in living!

There were naturally struggles too, with his wife and children.

And one recalls how the members of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's household protested when the Master, Who happened at the time to actually possess two abas (coats), would insist on giving one of them away.

The pathway was beset with many temptations. It was so easy to say: "In spirit and intention I have given up all these things, although externally I am still possessing them." But this, for Gandhi, was not enough. He was resolved to press on towards the valley of absolute poverty in God, to attain that station where, at last, poverty may be, and is, transfigured into a glory.

That such a state of extreme asceticism is not possible for all, this modern Diogenes frankly admitted, strongly as he would like to recommend his tub! He was, he said, only trying to explain his own interpretation of complete non-attachment, an ideal that he felt far from having realized in its fulness. If one must have possessions, then he considered that the only true consistency was to hold them at the disposal of those who needed them more; for the service of one's fellowmen, in a spirit of surrender to God. Even the body was only a temporary possession given us by His bounty. But in the opinion of the Mahatma, the vow of voluntary poverty was indispensable for those who would wholly dedicate their lives to spiritual service.

In the graphic words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá: "We must die to ourselves and to the world." "In a state of complete renunciation call the people to the Kingdom of God."

Do any of us understand the full implications of such an injunction? What it must involve in the actual daily living out?

Yet it is not unlikely that Gandhi would have endorsed the wisdom of 'Abdu'l-Bahá when the latter explained that for a rich man to denude himself of all his possessions, would not help to solve economic inequalities. Rather must he hold them in the spirit and practice enjoined by Bahá'u'lláh.

"O ye who are wealthy on earth! The poor among ye are My trust. Therefore guard My trust, and be not wholly occupied with your own ease."

". . . Know ye that wealth is a strong barrier between the seeker and the Desired One. . . . Never shall the rich arrive at the abode of nearness, nor enter into the city of contentment and resignation, save only a few. Then good is the state of that wealthy one whose wealth preventeth him not from the everlasting Kingdom, and depriveth him not of the Eternal possessions."

COMPENSATING RICHES. But it was when the Mahatma began to speak of his compensating riches that a thrill passed through the audience. For, at length, a point was reached in his experientæ when it became a positive joy to give things up. When the possession of anything became a burden.

"And then, one after another, by almost geometric progression, things slipped away from me . . . a great burden fell off my shoulders, and I felt that I could now walk with ease, and also do my work in the service of my fellowmen with great comfort and still greater joy. I tell you that it is beyond description, the happiness, the bliss, and the ability that this voluntary poverty gives one. I can only say to you, try it, test it for yourselves."

He could go among the outcasts now without fear of robbery, and as a friend could make suggestions and bring some ray of hope and comfort to their hearts. There was no need then to preach or argue. They would say—"He is happy, although he possesses nothing, how is this?" And they would fall to making enquiry.

The basis of culture for civilization, continued the Speaker, is understood to be the multiplication of all our wants. The more you possess, the better culture you represent, so to speak. He had found on the contrary that the less you possess and the less you want, the better you are. Better for what? For the enjoyment of personal service to one's fellows.

Then in tones of deep conviction, he went on to explain how, when a soul had reached that blessed state of utter dispossession in God, he would find that having nothing he yet possessed all things. That is, anything that he really needed for service was then at his disposal. He could command all the resources of the world—but he could do so only for service—and to the extent of his ability to serve.

He, personally, could not recall a single instance when, at the eleventh hour, God had forsaken him. Christian men and women would say that they knew something of this experience as an answer to prayer. "But," declared Gandhi, "it is not only an answer to prayer; it is a scientific result of this vow of non-possession."

In the Bahá'í scriptures, speaking of this condition where the soul has abandoned all mortal attachments, we are told—

"When thou reachest this station, there shall remain no obstacle . . . and all that is thy highest wish shall be realized." "The victory of the Supreme Concourse is the associate of every one who is pure in heart."

VOLUNTARY SHARING. It was interesting to find that this great Soul advocated the fundamental Bahá'í principle of voluntary sharing of wealth, rather than a grudging acquiescence in measures of taxation. Legislation alone cannot solve social injustices and economic distress. A revision of values, a far higher degree of unselfishness is needed to-day among all men.

To the myriads of the depressed classes for whom Gandhi thus strives "that they might have life, and have it more abundantly"—and to those who know and love him throughout the world, small wonder is it that he is "Mahatma"—one who has become spiritually illumined and attained to the station of cosmic consciousness.

ATTAINMENT. And those of us upon whom, in these distressful days, poverty has fallen as an avalanche, or stolen, as a thief in the night, shall we not try to accept the experience in this spirit of voluntariness, thereby making it a supreme opportunity for spiritual attainment? Consider, for instance, the high level of resourcefulness that is required in order to maintain health and self-respect on the borderland of destitution. What inventiveness necessity can awaken! What firm faith in God and mental courage must be exercised if we are to avoid sinking into depression and perhaps despair! Even the sweetness and humility that is called for when one has to stand aside from the particular form of service that one loves.

May we not then draw strength and comfort from the realization that, over this rough pathway, we are making swift journey to that bright Treasure-house of incorruptible riches, those fine qualities of heart and mind, of which we can never again be deprived? That to us the Masters are extending, even as They would have done if on earth, a peculiar care and tenderness. Therefore, "let us not be grieved at the hardships of these numbered days," for more and more shall we feel within our souls the fulfilment of the gracious promise that "every destruction is followed by a construction, and a paradise of rest is concealed in every hardship."

"If wealth was a necessity, Christ would have wished it for Himself. He lived a simple life, and one of the titles of Bahá'u'lláh was 'the poor one.' In Persian His title was 'darvish', and that means one who has not a slave. All the Prophets of God were poor. His Holiness Moses was a mere shepherd. This will show you that in the estimation of God poverty is greater than the accumulation of wealth—that the poor are more acceptable than the lazy rich. A rich man who spends his wealth for the poor is praiseworthy."

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

TRUE WEALTH

IT is clear that the honor and exaltation of man must be something more than material riches; material comforts are only a branch, but the root of the exaltation of man is the good attributes and virtues which are the adornments of his reality. These are the divine appearances, the heavenly bounties, the sublime emotions, the love and knowledge of God; universal wisdom, intellectual perception, scientific discoveries, justice, equity, truthfulness, benevolence, natural courage, and innate fortitude; the respect for rights and the keeping of agreements and covenants; rectitude in all circumstances; serving the truth under all conditions; the sacrifice of one's life for the good of all people; kindness and esteem for all nations; obedience to the teachings of God; service in the Divine Kingdom; the guidance of the people, and the education of the nations and races. This is the prosperity of the human world! This is the exaltation of man in the world! This is eternal life and heavenly honor!

“These virtues do not appear from the reality of man except through the power of God and the divine teachings, for they need supernatural power for their manifestation. It may be that in the world of nature a trace of these perfections may appear; but they are not established and lasting; they are like the rays of the sun upon the wall.

“As the compassionate God has placed such a wonderful crown upon the head of man, man should strive that its brilliant jewels may become visible in the world.”

BAHÁ'I PIONEERS

A Short Historical Survey of the Bahá'i Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

SIIYID MUSTAFA ROUMIE

Jamal Effendi, accompanied by the author, Mr. Roumie, during two years of pioneer missionary work in India, found no difficulty in obtaining access to the leading people of many important Indian states including high government officials and rulers themselves. Everywhere Jamal received a warm reception and his message was listened to courteously.

In 1878 they left Calcutta for Rangoon. Here their mission was highly successful, and in a short time the Bahá'i Cause was widely promulgated in spite of some instances of attempted persecution.

After establishing the Cause in Rangoon the missionaries went, early in 1879, to Mandalay. Here they met with some persecution. Their teaching had to be quiet and unobtrusive. Fortunately they were befriended by a wealthy merchant of great influence who built them a small hall in which to carry on their work, and put them under his personal protection. Feeling that they had given a good foundation to the Cause in Mandalay, they now return to Rangoon.

 UR safe arrival back at Rangoon delighted the hearts of the friends and uplifted their spirits. We found awaiting us there many holy Tablets revealed by His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh for the friends in India and Burma as well as for ourselves.

As we planned to stay for a while in Burma, it was thought best to undertake some kind of business in order that, like the apostle Paul, we might earn our own living and pay our own way as we went about our missionary work. It was finally decided to open a pony market, also have a line of hackney carriages, and a shop for the sale of provender. This business in due time proved quite successful and profitable.

The Cause of Bahá'u'lláh, meanwhile, was gradually progressing; but although we had a goodly number of followers, they were, as a rule, of our own race, and we felt it very necessary that the Cause should reach out among the natives. Otherwise the foundations of the Bahá'i Movement in Burma would not be strong enough to withstand the changes that time brings about among a foreign population who are constantly on the move, going here and there in search of business. The result would be that unless the Cause was spread among the native population, it would gradually die away again.

By this time we counted among our followers only two native families in Rangoon: that of Jenabi Agha Haji Sayed Mehdi Shirazi from amongst the Shiites; and secondly that of Molvi Abdus-Subhan Korishee. Even these, however, were not actually natives of Burma, although they had become naturalized citizens: the former family being from Persia, and the latter from India.

We did our very best to remedy this defect in the establishment of the Cause in Burma, and exerted our utmost to attract the natives to the Kingdom. But our endeavors at this time were not effectual.

After the lapse of one year we took a second trip to Mandalay to see the friends, upon their invitation and continual requests, so that we could nourish them with new and higher teachings. A member of the Shiite Persian community of Mandalay who was very hostile to the Bahá'í Movement engineered a piece of chicanery which proved quite fatal to our work at Mandalay at this time.

He instigated a professional cook, who had been with us at Hyderabad while we were sojourning in that city, to start, falsely, a civil suit against us for one hundred and seventy-six thousand five hundred and nine rubies, stating that he had sold goods to us in Hyderabad for which he had not been paid.

The courts in Mandalay, we were informed, were entirely lawless and unjust at this time and well known for their bribe-taking. Many bona-fide claims had been dismissed by them as false, and many false claims had been decided in the affirmative. Many defendants, and some of the plaintiffs even, had been sent to jail and violently tortured preliminary to the first court hearing.

Fortunately some of our influential Bahá'í friends managed to secure all of the details of this claim and a copy of the complaint from the Court. We also had an interview with the Prime Minister Kewun Mingyi through the kind intervention of our Bahá'í friend Mulla Ismail, the Chief Commissioner of Customs. After listening to our story, he promised to give us justice upon the following day when the case was called. He was as good as his word, and the case against us was dismissed on the ground that it was not a case for the judiciary of the Burmese Court, but should be presented at the Court where the business transaction had taken place. The Judge stated in his judicial opinion that the case seemed to be nothing but a piece of religious antagonism and hatred toward the revered personage of the defense.

Although thereafter we found ourselves free from this danger, the Bahá'ís of Mandalay had no peace of mind even after the decision of the case in our favor, for they well knew the lawlessness of their courts. Anybody might bring an action, civil or criminal, against any person without much trouble or expense. Therefore it was deemed too risky for us to stay longer in this city, and after a few months we departed for Rangoon although it was a great disappointment to our friends. This was the decision of the Mandalay believers, although it was a bitter disappointment and sorrow to them.

We came back to Rangoon distressed and heartbroken over the results of our trip to Mandalay, but we could not sit down and lament in idleness. We had to earn our living. So the writer was sent with some ponies and some jewelry to Calcutta, from which trip he returned with great profits. He was then sent on another trip of the same kind with livestock and gems to Penang in the Malay peninsula. This was an entirely new part of the world to him, but I managed to find lodgings, upon my arrival, in the house of a well-known leader of mysticism, Omar Khalidi, a man of Malay descent. He was about sixty years of age with half a dozen grown up sons and daughters, most of whom were able to speak in Arabic. Thus I was able to converse with them and got along very well. Because this island was quite small, I became within a week a conspicuous figure everywhere, and although I had not yet found educated and interesting souls, yet I continued to deliver the message of Bahá'u'lláh to all receptive and intelligent people. Finally after disposing of all my ponies and gems favorably, I returned safely to Rangoon.

After a couple of months I was sent on a similar errand to Calcutta. Now it was decided that Jamal Effendi and the writer should go on a long trip through India, and if possible around the Malay peninsula and to the Java Islands. The friends in Rangoon unanimously agreed to this proposition. Therefore leaving our business in charge of some of the friends, we took the first boat to Calcutta. Here we found that most of the Bahá'í friends had either moved or died, therefore we did not stay long here, but left for Dacca, an important city of Bengal. Here we met with some interesting and important people. From there we went to Bombay where we stayed about three weeks. Bombay at this time was an important center of the Bahá'í Movement in India.

We next went to Madras where the Cause had a large number of followers, about four hundred in all. The number of believers was considerably increased after our arrival in Madras, and the writer was kept busy delivering public lectures every night in various parts of the town. He was delighted to be again with his aged Father, Sayed Muhammad Roumie, then in his one hundred and fourteenth year.*

During our stay in Madras many eminent persons joined the Bahá'í religion, among them: Nawab Ferooz Hossein Khan, Nawab Mahmood Miyan, Sayed Kazim Ali, Osman Khan Subadar, Major Bahadur, Sayed Dawood, and one mullah, Muhammad Ali Rampuree, a very learned sage, also his nephew, Morad Ali, a merchant.

Our next stop was Singapore, where we were the guests of the Turkish Vice-Consul, a well known Arab merchant. From here we sailed for Batavia, the chief seaport of Java. We had great difficulty in getting a passport for traveling in Java, but finally secured one from the British passport office. This allowed us, however, to travel only in seaport towns and for only six months.

During all our travels in Java, we were closely watched by detectives and spied upon everywhere, as the Dutch government was exceedingly afraid of religious propaganda in Java. We were also hampered here by lack of facility in the Javanese language, which Jamal Effendi did not understand.

From Batavia we went to Sarabaya where we sojourned for a couple of months, leaving there finally for the island of Bali Lombok. The inhabitants of this island had originally been Hindus and Buddhists, but their religion now had become somewhat corrupted; the king of this province could hardly be said to practice any religion except perhaps a corrupted form of Buddhism. His queen had been a Muhammadan by birth. This queen was keenly desirous of seeing Jamal Effendi. She sent some high officials to fetch us to the palace, bringing two beautiful ponies for us to ride on as there was not any kind of a vehicle. Accompanied by the palace escort, and by our friend the Chief Commissioner of Customs who served as interpreter for us, we reached the palace and were cordially welcomed. For hours the king and queen questioned us earnestly about spiritual subjects. It was a most interesting conversation. Finally, after partaking of coffee and some sweets, we received permission to retire.

After a couple of days, we sailed for the Celebes islands, the chief seaport of which is Macassar, now the seat of the Dutch Governor. We landed here safely and the police instructed the porters to take us with our luggage to the Arab quarters, where we were to be put under the guardianship of the Chief of this quarter.*

We were greeted cordially by this Arab Chief, who had been born and brought up here. A very large brick building with an iron gate was given us to live in, of which we occupied only two rooms on the top floor, one for Jamal Effendi, and one for our luggage, occupied by the writer.

As experienced travelers, it occurred to us to inspect carefully the whole building. We closed the doors of all vacant rooms, especially we took particular pains to close the huge gate opening on the public road. The wisdom of this precaution will soon be seen. The building, owned by a rich Chinese merchant, seemed to have been abandoned for many years. It took hours to lock the gate with the utmost difficulty. Meanwhile news of our arrival and of the location of our lodgings was being spread over the whole town.

In the morning, to our amazement, when we looked out we saw a throng of citizens outside the building. They asked us with great astonishment how it was that our lives had been spared that night. Had no ghost, demon, or evil spirit disturbed us? How was it that we had been safe from harm? Had we overcome the Monstrous Devil? It had always been the case previously that those who spent the night in this great edifice, were found dead in the morning, and from no known cause. So terrible had been the reputation of this residence that the surviving heirs of the Chinese owner of the building dared not live in it.

We told them that we had driven out the evil spirits, ghosts, demons and devils from the house and made it habitable, thus wiping out the superstitious ideas that the Chinese and natives had had about this house for years.

Knowing that the Chinese have many superstitions and a great fear of demons, we concluded that, owing to some deaths in this household, they had abandoned the place because of the belief that it was haunted. But to our amazement we subsequently learned that their fears were by no means groundless. The Chief of this Arab quarter who was in charge of the residence, had been in the habit, it seems, of bestowing it as a shelter upon inexperienced and unknown fellow courtymen traveling to that city, if he considered them to be rich. They would retire for the night assured of the careful protection of this Arab Chief and would go to sleep without taking any precaution. Once they were sound asleep, some of the Chief's men would creep in, dressed up to resemble demons, and choke the sleeping men until they were dead. The next morning they would be buried by the Chief and their belongings would be taken away by the said Chief for safe custody!

But in our case the evil designs of the Chief were thwarted by our precaution. His men did come to the big gate, it seems, and tried hard to force it open. Jamal had been awakened by the noise and shouted loudly in Arabic, "Who is there?" and looking out he saw men running away from the gate.

In spite of this knowledge which we had acquired of the evil designs of our native Chief, we dared not disclose to him our awareness of his villany, for we needed his help in all of our movements. So instead of confronting him with his crimes, we deemed it best to present him with a gem worth twenty dollars and thanked him for his kind protection.

THE BLIND OF JAPAN IN THE NEW WORLD ORDER

AGNES B. ALEXANDER

"Effort must be exerted that the East and West may be reconciled, that the darkness of bigotry may vanish, that the unity of mankind may be made manifest and that East and West, like unto two longing souls may embrace each other in the utmost of love. For all are the sheep of God and God is the Real Shepherd and is kind to every one."—'Abdu'l-Bahá in a Tablet to an American Bahá'í teacher in Japan.

IN the New World Order which is slowly and imperceptibly ushering a dispensation of spiritual Light into the world, the blind of Japan have a unique place. The limitless love of 'Abdu'l-Bahá poured out during His lifetime on all mankind, irrespective of race or class, was especially bestowed on the Japanese blind. That among nineteen Tablets revealed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Japanese living in Japan, five should have been addressed to blind young men is significant of the part which seems destined for the blind of this land in the New World Order of Bahá'u'lláh.

Mr. Tokujire Torii was the first one of these friends to hear of the Bahá'í Message. Through the New Light which he found he wrote, "Every prejudice in my heart is forgotten. Truly, there is no country, no nation, no race in my heart, —everything is equal in the presence of the Almighty, indeed, 'the heart is the real country.'"

Already an ardent Esperantist at the time, Mr. Torii's first supplication to 'Abdu'l-Bahá was written in Esperanto. In reply 'Abdu'l-

Bahá addressed him in part: "O thou possessor of a seeing heart! Although, materially speaking, thou art destitute of physical sight, yet, praise be to God, spiritual insight is thy possession. Thy heart seeth and thy spirit heareth. Bodily sight is subject to a thousand maladies and ultimately and assuredly will be obscured. Thus no importance may be attached to it. But the sight of the heart is illumined, it discerns and discovers the Divine Kingdom and is everlasting and eternal. Praise be to God, therefore, that the sight of thy heart is illumined, and the hearing of thy thought responsive."

In the Japanese place of honor in Mr. Torii's home is a small bronze relief copy of a picture of 'Abdu'l-Bahá under which, carved from wood, is the Greatest Name in Persian characters. Here these spiritual treasures are touched by the fingers of those deprived of material sight.

The library of this home contains many braille volumes of the writings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá transcribed from the English editions. It was Mr. Torii's devoted wife, who, spelling the words of these books, one by one to him, as she did not know English, helped to accomplish this great task of transcribing into braille.

From these Writings in 1917, Mr. Torii succeeded in translating into Japanese a braille book for the blind of Japan entitled, "A Message of Light." This book, which was sent by Mr. Torii to a Japanese woman who had lost both her sight and hearing, became the means of her awakening. Reading with her finger tips its pages, she came into the joy of the knowledge of the Bahá'i Revelation and in a dream had the blessing of a visit from 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Of this experience she wrote to me, "Even though one has eyes and ears he cannot see 'Abdu'l-Bahá because He is far away, but I could meet Him. With sightless eyes and deaf ears I saw and heard Him in a dream and this is the utmost happiness in the world. This bounty came from God and I thank 'Abdu'l-Bahá heartedly." (Translated from Japanese braille.)

Mr. Torii's prayer is to be able to translate the Bahá'i Teachings into Japanese and to help the blind of his land. In a second Tablet from 'Abdu'l-Bahá he was given permission to visit the Holy Land whenever the means of travel were secured. As the International Association of the Blind will meet in Geneva in the summer of 1933, it is his hope to be able to attend it and to visit Haifa on his way.

The words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to another blind young Japanese who had sent Him a supplication were: "Praise be to God, the sight of thy mind has been opened and thou hast acquired the power of spiritual healing. Thou hast sought and found the Truth and hast been aware of Heavenly Mysteries. The teachings of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, like unto the rays of the sun illumine the East as well as the West, vivify the dead and unite the various religions. They prove the Oneness of God, for they gather all communities of the world under the pavilion of the Oneness of the world of mankind. Consider how stirred the world is and in what a commotion are the people of the world. Heavenly power is needed to do away with this stir and agitation. Otherwise, this great Cause will not be realized through human power. Human power, no matter how strong it may be, it illumines like unto an ignited lamp a limited space and trains a small number of souls. It is the sun which illumines all regions, and it is the Heavenly Power which gathers around a single spot all the sects and communities. Strive therefore, that thou mayest serve this remarkable Power and attain unto profitable and far reaching results."

The receiver of this message afterwards wrote to his friends, " 'Abdu'l-Bahá declares Himself a Servant of God and proclaims His life-giving Message to the whole world, yet He receives such unworthy letters as mine and answers their questions so clearly and kindly. What great generosity, what limitless mercy He has for us! At first I couldn't realize His great love, but now I acknowledge His limitless love for mankind."

To a third blind young man 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote in part: "Verily, verily hast thou suffered much in thy life time. Do not thou be grieved because of the loss of thy sight. Praise be unto God, that thy insight is keen. Do thou not lament over thy poverty, for the Treasury of the Kingdom is thine. Do thou not worry that thou couldst not study in the material schools, because thou hast received lessons in the Verses of the Oneness of God in the Divine University."

About fifteen years ago the study of Esperanto began among the blind of Japan and now is quite widely spread among them. It was my privilege to take part in the Nineteenth Congress of Japanese Esperantists which was held in Kyoto, October 16 to 18, and speak of the Bahá'í Revelation in the sectional meeting of the Association of the Blind Esperantists of Japan. The general sessions of the Congress were attended by more than 300 Esperantists who gathered from all parts of Japan. Although I was the only foreigner present, I felt as though among brothers and sisters.

In recent years the blind Esperantists in a school of Tokyo published the small compilation of the Bahá'í teachings known as, No. 9, in Esperanto braille. In 1916, at the request of one of the blind friends, I wrote a letter telling of the Bahá'í Message and addressed to the blind women of Japan which was published in Japanese braille. Another recent Japanese braille publication is the booklet, "What is the Bahá'í Movement?"

To our late Bahá'í brother, Dr. George J. Augur, when he was serving the Bahá'í Cause in Tokyo in 1916, 'Abdu'l-Bahá revealed the following words: "A thousand times bravo to thy high magnanimity and exalted aim! Trusting God and while turning thy face toward the Kingdom of Abha, unfurl thou the Divine Flag in Tokyo and cry at the top of thy voice:—O people! The Sun of Reality hath appeared and flooded all the regions with its glorious light. It has upraised the standard of the Oneness of the world of humanity and summoned all mankind to the refulgent Truth. The cloud of mercy is pouring; the Zephyr of Providence is wafting and the world of humanity is being stirred and moved. The Divine Spirit is conferring eternal Life; the heavenly lights are illuminating the hearts; the table of Sustenance of the Kingdom is spread and is adorned with all kinds of foods and victuals. O ye concourse of men! Awake! Awake! Become mindful! Become mindful! Open ye the seeing eye! Unstop the hearing ear! Hark! Hark! The soft tones of the Heavenly Music are streaming down, ravishing the ears of the people of spiritual discernment. Ere long this transcendent Light will wholly enlighten the East and the West!"

After the return of Dr. and Mrs. Augur to Honolulu from Japan in 1919, 'Abdu'l-Bahá in addressing them wrote: "You two have fulfilled your roles and have striven within the limits of your capacity. At present ye must rest for a time; the turn of others has arrived, that they may similarly travel to Japan, may water the seeds that have been sown and may serve and take care of the tender shrubs. The days of life are swiftly going by and eventually man will be confined into subterrean regions and his name shall perish except those souls who become divine gardeners and who sow seeds in the soil of hearts. These shall eternally remain shining and glittering like unto stars from the horizon of truth."

"Know thou verily, insight seeth that which sight seeth not and apprehendeth that which the body perceiveth not, inasmuch as the sight seeth the mirage as water, the images pictured in the mirror as a reality and genuine, and it seeth the earth as stationary, and the great stars as though they were small. But the insight correcteth the mistake of the sight and apprehendeth the reality and seeth that the mirage is not water, that the images pictured in mirrors are naught else save reflections, that the earth is moving and the distant stars are large. Consequently the truth of insight, its effectiveness and power, is proven, as well as the weakness of sight, its inefficiency and defects."

NINE DAYS AT LOUHELEN RANCH

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

FOR many years Bahá'is and other forward looking people have assembled during the summer months at Green Acre, Maine for the purpose of promoting interest in the universal principles of Bahá'u'lláh; and for the past several summers the friends in the Pacific States have gathered at a camp near Geyserville, California for a short time in order to study and promulgate these principles which are the basis of universal peace and world unity.

This last summer (1931) a new and similar venture was carried out for the Central States at Louhelen Ranch, Davison, Michigan. This beautiful farm is most strategically located for such purposes, being twelve miles from Flint and only fifty from Detroit. Indeed, situated as it is, on a state highway, we may say, in these days when distance is almost no barrier, that it is easily accessible from all parts of the Middle West. Here in a beautiful ravine, a half mile back from the road, a group of earnest friends gathered daily to listen to talks on subjects of vital importance to mankind.

Individuals and groups all over the country and throughout the world are asking the same questions as were asked here: Why this stagnation in business? Why starvation and inadequate clothing when enormous crops of wheat and cotton lie unused in storehouses? Why must the willing worker sit abjectly and hopelessly idle at home or homeless wander the streets? Why continued war and fighting when all agree that prosperity cannot come without peace?

These questions, asked so often as to seem almost trite in spite of their tremendous importance, were asked again here. And we believe the true answer was given. The cause of the world maladjustment is deep seated and the remedy must go to the roots of human nature and come from spiritual sources. Nineteen years ago and more 'Abdu'l-Bahá traveled from coast to coast of the United States explaining the cause of the world sickness and telling the remedy. More than this He carried with Him and radiated wherever He went the boundless, tender, universal love which, He said, is the remedy and which must come into human hearts to heal the ailing world. These are the penetrating and loving words He spoke on that trip to a group in New York City:

"Love and unity are the needs of the body-politic today. Without these there can be no progress or prosperity attained. Therefore the friends of God must adhere to the power which will create this love and unity in the hearts of the sons of men. Science cannot cure the illness of the body-politic. Science cannot create amity and fellowship in human hearts. Neither can patriotism nor racial allegiance effect a remedy. It must be accomplished solely through the divine bounties and spiritual bestowals which have descended from God in this day for this purpose. This is an exigency of the times and the divine remedy has been provided. The spiritual teachings of the religion of God can alone create this love, unity and accord in human hearts."

The group of friends assembled at Louhelen Ranch last summer believed these words and were acting on them. They believed that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had understood and stated the true cause of the world misery and disintegration. Yet at the time these Words were spoken the World War had not occurred and few realized how sick the world was. They believed too that these "spiritual teachings of the religion of God" which "can alone create this love, unity and accord in human hearts" are found in the written teachings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that these Creative Teachers have brought again to the earth the Christ love that the sick world so much needs today. Those who know the teachings and follow them will grow in love, unity and accord. It is even as Christ said, "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love."

The aim of the school was to study these teachings of Bahá'u'lláh and spread them abroad. Those who were well informed in the teachings through long study and experience and those who were eager beginners were happily brought together. People in neighboring communities heard the Bahá'í message for the first time. A spirit of unity and cooperation was established, spiritual forces were loosed, confirmations descended.

Two series of fine lectures formed the nucleus of the nine day's program. One series was on "The New Economics." These talks were designed to make the listeners intelligent in regard to the established economic order, giving a bird's-eye-view of the economic development of society as civilization has advanced, and to set forth the New World Order. The speaker traced briefly this development from the nomadic and barter stage of society down through the emergence of our present day metropolitan industrial system, showing how this system coupled with man's greed and selfishness has plunged the world into its present plight. Then he pointed out how perfectly Bahá'u'lláh's teachings give us the perfect remedy for this sick world, and finally set out vividly the need of a Bahá'í community as a working plan of the New World Order.

The other series dove-tailed into the first, furnishing as it did both practical suggestions and spiritual inspiration for the boundless, selfless love and infinite wisdom which are needed to raise the call and summon others to aid in establishing the New World Order.

A daily class in public speaking unfolded latent talent, developed the immature, furnished a real basis for cooperation and friendship, for all, younger and older, were learners together. Vivid and meaningful reminiscences of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, experiences of those who are devoting their lives to the spread of Bahá'u'lláh's Message, a carefully developed and practical outline for the "Education of Children for the New Day," talks on "Radiant Acquiescence," "Russia Today," "The Hidden Words,"—all these varied themes make it apparent that this group realized the need for and the interdependence of both the practical and spiritual. Nor were the social and physical needs ignored. The opportunity for swimming and horse-back riding was made good use of; the lawn and other quiet places were used for group conversations, intimate talks and rest. The evening campfires and out-door suppers were particularly conducive to friendship and unity.

The physical setting of this school must not be overlooked for the natural beauty of the place did its part in adding the quiet inspiration and peace which comes with close contact with nature. The traveler speeding along M 15 would not realize that he was passing any but an ordinary Michigan farmstead unless the modest sign "Bahá'i Summer School" caught his eye. He who stopped to investigate found a real welcome, an atmosphere of hospitality and rest which invited one to linger. He sensed a feeling not of an impersonal school but of a home. Outside again he found the road which led between the farm buildings and past the corn fields to the wide ravine, through whose grassy valley a silvery stream wound. Halfway down the valley side a log cabin had been built overlooking the valley. "Ridvan Garden" was the name given to this lovely, peaceful valley. It was here, out in the open or on the cabin porch, that most of the meetings were held. A miniature dam held back the waters of the stream thus forming a pool where the children delighted to play. Across the stream the wooded banks invited both children and elders to explore the hidden beauties above and beyond them. Even so the beauties of the Divine Word that were unfolded at the meetings invited the seeker to explore its hidden meaning.

But although we may enumerate the varied activities and dwell on the beauty of the natural environment, these do not hold the secret of the bountiful blessings gathered into these nine days or of the spirit of attraction which urged friends from a distance to come day after day, or the spirit of love and unity which caused those who came for the purpose of finding fault to go away in thoughtful silence, or the spirit of power which awakened sleeping souls and sent them forth to bear to others Bahá'u'lláh's Message. This spirit of love, attraction, and power can be explained in no other way than as the "animating, unifying presence of the Holy Spirit" radiated from the hearts of those present.

Those who experienced some of the bounties of this summer school are tempted to paint its future in glowing terms but it is the part of wisdom not to make predictions. It may be allowable however to suggest that observers keep watch for future activities and developments at Louhelen Ranch where in the summer of 1931 such a happy and fruitful beginning was made.

ESPERANTO—A LINGUISTIC BOND*

HENRY W. HETZEL

(President, Esperanto Association of North America)

Few men are as well qualified to write on Esperanto and its progress over the world as the author of this article. He has attended world conferences of Esperanto, and the impressions of these conferences as regards their feeling of unity and brotherhood, he admirably describes. Through his instrumentality a resolution was presented and passed at the Conference of the "World Federation of Education Associations" in Denver last summer, recommending the appointment of a commission formally to look into the matter of the international language question specifically with regard to Esperanto and to report at the next conference in 1933.

IT is evident to thinking people that the peace of the world, if it is ever to be realized, must be established by means of and maintained by the greatest possible degree of mutual understanding and cooperation. To a large extent this necessity is already being met (but without any conscious idea to insure peace) by an enormous, even a feverish, urge to shorten the distance and time between ourselves and our neighbors. However, irrespective of our preferences in the matter, and whether the immediate result be a quickening of moral progress or not, we all realize that the peoples of the world are being brought together in contacts increasingly numerous and intimate. Big movements of all kinds are becoming as much at home in one country as another. Problems of statecraft, education, science and industry are arising which only the united intelligence of mankind can solve. Acknowledging the nature-ordained fact of their interdependence, the peoples of the earth must seek the fulfilment of their highest ideals thru world-wide cooperation.

Yet in the very tool of communication and cooperation, language, there have always been and are potentialities for keeping alive the spirit of suspicion and aloofness. National tongues are not only distressingly numerous, exceedingly cumbersome, illogical and difficult to master, but each is notoriously tinctured with the characteristics, psychology and even prejudices of the country where it is native. The admitted truth whose significance time certainly intensifies, that the diversity of tongues is a serious barrier to world progress and that eventually civilization must adopt a common speech for all peoples, is thus qualified by the further thought that no national tongue can serve the purpose; the "world democracy," heralded on all sides by far-seeing statesmen and enlightened thinkers, demands neutrality even in its choice and use of a vehicle of thought. The universal adoption of any national language would confer such diplomatic, commercial, political and cultural advantages on one certain group of nations as to make such a proposition absolutely intolerable to all others.

The world has been, and still is, suffering from an over-emphasis

*Baha'u'llah founded the universal Baha'i religion, and one of its great principles is a universal auxiliary language. Miss Martha L. Root, a prominent Baha'i lecturer and traveler, who has attended all of the world Conferences of Esperanto in recent years, is now making a tour of this country and has given frequent lectures as well as broadcasting on the subject of Esperanto in nearly every city she has visited.

on mere nationality. A national consciousness is, of course, not to be deplored,—at least as a step from a narrow tribal isolation toward a wider solidarity. But today, mountains and deserts, rivers and oceans have lost their power to divide mankind; the chief barriers are linguistic ones, which determining as they do, in large measure, the confines of nationality, tend to fix even the economic frontiers. When, with an increasing knowledge of other countries and their inhabitants, man comes to realize his essential oneness in thought and feeling, in hopes and in aspirations, with his fellow on the other side of the ocean or mountain chain, these barriers of language stand out glaringly as monstrous anachronisms and tragic absurdities.

Mankind has long ago gotten used to certain codes for the universal communication of ideas. For instance, there is nothing strange to us in the internationality of the Arabic numerals, musical notation, the metric system, the graphic arts, the chemical symbols and signaling at sea, and yet in the matter of mere speech we have been well-nigh helpless. A mariner by means of signals raised aloft may convey some crude idea to a passing ship of another nationality, but should he step upon its deck he and its commander would find an ordinary conversation impossible.

To the obvious thought of the reader at this point that an international language would be a blessing to humanity there is only one objection; the verb should be is. The International Language brought forth in 1887 has had a breadth of application and a success which rightly claim the attention of humanitarians and thoughtful people everywhere. The world will some day give high honor to Dr. Ludwig Lazarus Zamenhof of Warsaw (died 1917) whose genius and whose devotion to the idea of a world of brothers united by the bond of a common speech has made him one more genius with which the Jewish race has blessed mankind. His project, Esperanto, though not the first that has been devised to meet the growing world need, immediately attracted an attention that was more than academic, and in a few years it had far outdistanced its competitors, both as to the extent of its literature and the number of its adherents. Its root-words, prefixes and suffixes were selected on the basis of "maximum internationality" and so easy and logical is the formation of derivatives that only a few hundred primary words need be learned. An Esperantist actually coins words as he goes along, and, even by a person who may never have heard such words before, he is instantly and precisely understood. The spelling is phonetic, the tonic accent is always on the penultimate syllable, and the whole grammar is stated in sixteen simple rules (without an exception) which many people have actually learned in a couple of hours! A translation will hardly be needed for the following specimen:

"Simpla, fleksebla, belsona, vere internacia en siaj elementoj, la lingvo Esperanto prezentas al la mondo civilizita la sole veran solvon de lingvo internacia; ĉar tre facila por homoj nemulte intruitaj, Esperanto estas komprenata sen peno de la personoj bone edukitaj. Mil faktoj atestas la meriton praktikan de la nomita lingvo."

Far from being a "universal" language in the sense of attempting to displace existing national tongues for home use, Esperanto has a record of accomplishment as an auxiliary language that has long ago lifted it above the level of a mere project. It has become, say its advocates, an everyday, practical means of communication between thousands of people in all parts of the world. Correspondence in it is a commonplace, all the way from stamp collecting and the mere exchange of picture post cards up to high brow discussions of philosophy, scientific matters and world politics, as may easily be seen by anyone who cares to glance through the correspondence columns of the journals (now about 125 of them) regularly published in the language in all parts of the world. Text books for instruction have appeared in about fifty languages including such little known ones as Catalanian, Finnish, Japanese, Croatian, Arabic, Icelandic and Welsh. Limitations of space prevent all but a reference to the literature of Esperanto. That it is rapidly growing and already extensive, both in translated works and originals, in prose and poetry, covering practically every use of the printed word, is a statement that can easily be verified.

Quite in line with one of its objectives, Esperanto is of considerable help to the tourist. Thousands have visited foreign shores and journeyed through distant countries where, by the aid of the International Language and the "Universala Esperanto-Asocio" whose nearly two thousand delegates or consuls are practically everywhere, they have had their travels made more pleasant and profitable than could otherwise have been. This statement will not seem significant to the person who can "get along in Europe on English alone." He can "get along," but the traveler who can do merely this must limit his conversation to the "business English" of waiters, ticket sellers and porters. To the Esperantist alone belongs the joy of meeting foreigners, well-educated and intelligent, as many as one has time to see in any journey or in any visited city, and of conversing with a freedom and on a linguistic equality that is never experienced when a national tongue is the medium. In at least thirty cities of Europe there are Esperantist policemen specially trained (in the case of several, specially compensated) to be of service to the visiting foreigner who has already taken the little trouble to meet the world on the linguistic middle ground. Thanks to the system in use among Esperantists the visitor is assured of a hearty welcome and friendly guidance which no mere tourist agency can supply. The testimony is unanimous that the fine spirit of helpfulness thus displayed is due to a bond of union stronger than the mere possession of a language in common; it is a fine faith in the possibility of a better world through complete mutual understanding.

In addition to its abundantly demonstrated utility for general commercial purposes, Esperanto has a special field for advertising the expositions and fairs which, in spite of the war and the blunders of diplomats, are doing a great service in bringing together the business men of Europe. At least a dozen of such annual fairs are regularly using Esperanto,—but that is a story in itself. That other international institution, the world congress of the usual kind, whether for professional, religious, commercial or scientific aims, not only has felt the diversity of tongues to be a serious handicap, but it has never been able to forget the nationalistic differences among its members. Compared to this kind of a gathering with its inevitable division into mutually uncomprehending groups, its restriction to two or three “official languages” and the waste of time spent in translations, a congress of Esperantists stands out in refreshing contrast. There have been twenty-three of these since 1905, attended by as high as five thousand delegates from forty-three different countries and representing nearly as many national tongues.

Here, not only in the general business sessions, where the formal speeches, the unprepared discussion and even the chance remarks are all in the International Language, but in a dozen or more “side congresses” it is the sole medium heard. Teachers, editors, Red Cross nurses, physicians, railway and postal employees, vegetarians, Socialists, Roman Catholics, theosophists and spiritualists,—to name only part of the list—form groups each having its own meetings.

Notable among these are the groups of Bahá'is—at the Bahá'i Congresses—many of whom are very zealous in the study of Esperanto. The Bahá'i religion—the universal religion of this mature age—was founded by Bahá'u'lláh, and one of its great principles is a universal auxiliary language.

Here the delegates “talk shop” with no uncomprehending auditor, with perfect geysers of technical terms, too, and with a vigor and a naturalness that are only paralleled where everyone speaks the same mother tongue. There is usually a play and a musical evening, a travel-talk and a scientific lecture or two, an opera and perhaps even a vaudeville show,—to say nothing of several excursions and many informal social gatherings; and not a word of any national tongue is heard the whole week through. As an indication of the fact that congresses wherein Esperanto is used are not limited solely to propagandists of the language, let us take the Commercial Congress which met in Venice in April, 1923. Here were over two hundred official delegates from twenty-three different countries, representing eighty-nine Chambers of Commerce, thirty tourists' associations, twenty-one international fairs, and over sixty industrial federations, (business men, and not long-haired idealists merely) conducting its three days' program entirely in Esperanto. As an indication of the ease with which the language may be acquired, it is significant that a number of participants, even speech-makers, actually learned all they needed of Esperanto on their way to the Congress.

In all these gatherings, and in truth, upon every occasion when the International Language is used orally, one striking fact makes itself evident,—the absolute uniformity of pronunciation. As far as speech is any indication, you cannot tell the Spaniard from the Bulgarian or either from the Swede, and the laughable mistakes that are made in such guesses at one another's nationality are among the commonplaces of Esperanto world-gatherings. The significant fact is impressed upon all, visitors as well as participants, that the sense of nationality is completely lost in such an atmosphere and is all but forgotten!

The idealistic side of an Esperanto congress finds its climax and appropriate symbol in the religious service, always a feature of such a gathering. Here you are in a big church filled with worshipers from at least twenty different countries and you hear, in a language perfectly understood by all, the priest, pastor or rabbi, as the case may be, preach the brotherhood of man, now being realized through a neutral medium when heart speaks to heart across the boundary line. Here, when you see every head bowed in reverence before the same and all important verities and realize that before you is actually assembled a cross-section of the world, you will concede the claim that something big has come to pass in the affairs of men; here, at least, is one new thing under the sun! And however unimaginative you may be, does not the sight before you hold a promise of tremendous significance for civilization and the spiritual welfare of the race?

That there are untold possibilities for good in such an instrument of civilization is now being realized, particularly in Babel-cursed Europe. In many a place in England and on the Continent Esperanto is a regular, even an obligatory, part of the course of study. School children broaden their knowledge of foreign peoples and their human sympathies by letter and post card correspondence with students in other lands. Here is a practical and at once usable means for applied idealism which, as a substantial contribution to a new and better world-order, will not be overlooked by forward-looking educators and leaders of men.

IN talking with a distinguished aviator I was impressed anew with the need of a universal auxiliary language. From his wide experience he painfully felt the need of a common tongue.

"Is it not most unreasonable that in an age when man can provide himself with "the wings of the morning," and the human feet are more truly than ever shod "with the preparation of the gospel of peace."—in an age when physical means are invented for the free and swift movement of the human body, is it not more unreasonable that man should feel his smallest "member" tied in bondage? . . .

"Every step in the improvement of the means of communication and transportation, is a new argument for the adoption of a world language."

BROTHERHOOD

The gray old world is about the same
Travel over the earth as you may,
The same old hopes and joys and fears
Will greet you along the way.
The same egotism, vanity and pride
That hinder the growth of men,
And makes them sink beneath the tide,
As the billows of life descend.

What matters if cap or curl or frill
Are found in a different place,
What matters if climate, thought and will Produce a different race,
No matter if talent embraces one
And passes the other unknown,
Like the law that governs moon and sun
Each shall contribute his own.

The things that count are the gifts alike
Bestowed on all mankind.
The love of God, of nature, art,
Of justice and of peace of mind.
The love of home where children play,
Dear hearts that brighten the hearth
And find their place, in God's own way
Into the hearts of all on earth.

Love of the hero—man of strength,
The martyr with his courage rare,
Love of achievement great and small,—
Such are the glorious loves we share.
These gifts are ties that bind us tight
That make us brothers true
Till we behold afar a Glorious Light,
A world of love with all things new.

“The purpose of religion is the acquisition of praiseworthy virtues, betterment of morals, spiritual development of mankind, the real life and divine bestowals . . . Religion is meant to be the quickening life of the body-politic.”

—‘Abdu'l-Bahá.

THERE IS today a running to and fro—a search often despairing—for Truth, as foretold ages ago that there would be. There is a falling away from religion; and this abandonment of ancient spiritual guideposts is due not only to the individualism of the age, but to the fact that institutional religion today is not meeting the actual spiritual needs of humanity.

In regard to the value and authority of any religion, one may well bring certain tests and criteria to bear. We may even formulate beforehand the question what should religion do for us; what should it bring to our individual lives; and having defined in our own minds the purpose which religion should fulfil for us, we may consider from such a criterion the claim of any existing religion upon our allegiance.

THE FIRST and most important thing that religion should do for the individual is to explain the universe to him. This universe in the midst of which we live and move and have our being is an ever present force from which we can in no way escape. What are we to think of it? What is to be our understanding of it and our attitude toward it? If we believe it to be a concatenation of fortuitous forces and events, we have but a sorry philosophy upon which to base our lives. We shall be living apparently in an unregulated chaos, whatever order there is in such a universe being merely that observed from day to day with no guaranty of stability, permanency or beneficence so far as individual destinies are concerned. This is the way the universe appears to millions of highly intelligent people today who have cast off the old guidances of religion.

Now religion, if it should accomplish nothing else for the individual, would be the greatest of blessings if it could give a sense of individual security in the midst of a constantly changing universe; if it could give the conviction of spiritual beneficence behind the shifting kaleidoscopic events which compose existence. That is really what everyone is seeking; and the individual life can never find happiness, peace and contentment until it has solved the universe in these terms. Yet such a solution must today be rational and in accord with science. The old anthropomorphic conceptions of God are unthinkable now. Religion must give us a teaching about God which is perfectly rational, which comports with science, yet also conduces to faith in the universe and to a sense of the essential value of the individual as against the brute power of a material cosmos.

SECONDLY, religion having explained the universe in terms of God, should teach the individual how to relate himself to God and the universe; it should reveal certain immutable laws for governing the conduct of man, as of the atoms, obedience to which will result in happiness and success and become the stable foundation for the individual career. Religion, in a word, should teach us to build upon the rocks of time and not upon the shifting sands; it should teach us the use of aspiration, meditation and prayer as a means both of harmonizing ourselves with the universe and of attracting to ourselves guidance and blessing from the universe. It should explain to us the mystery of God as made accessible to human understanding and experience through the succession of Manifestations or Prophets, whose function it is to reveal the Infinite to the finite comprehension and to aid man in that greatest of all quests—the quest for God.

THIRDLY, religion should aid the individual in acquiring those spiritual characteristics, those divine qualities, which will conduce to a spiritual rebirth. This is one of the chief functions of religion. It is here that religion descends from the pinnacle of thought to the arena of action. It is not enough to have a belief in religion; that belief must become transmuted into action, and the first step toward action is the purifying and sublimating of our qualities so as to raise us from the plane of the brute to that plane of the spirit which is the reality of man. "The Prophets," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "come into the world to guide and educate humanity so that the animal nature of man may disappear and the divinity of his powers become awakened."

FOURTHLY: Religion must guide the individual in his relations to his fellowmen. This is very important, for we cannot live on isolated heights of rapture. We can no more fulfil our religion by aspiration and inner growth alone than could the disciples of Christ fulfil their religion by memorializing the transfiguration of Christ (which Peter, James and John were privileged to witness) by the construction of tabernacles, as the enraptured Peter suggested—one for Christ, one for Moses and one for Elias; for it was Christ's mission and their mission "to come down from the hill, where much people met him."

The real temple which the individual must build is that of harmonious relations with his fellowmen, and this edifice can be erected only on the foundations of love and unity. Religion therefore must become the means of unity among men regardless of age, class, intelligence, race or creed. It must abolish all prejudices such as divide men and become the seeds of opposition and inharmony.

Religion in both its individual and organized expression must be the means of the most absolute unity. Its administrative development must eliminate all the old tricks of politics, of intrigue, of personality, and become a matter of sincere and loving cooperation based on the principle of consultation free from personal aims or ends, free from rancors caused by individualism.

FIFTH: Religion should give a definite teaching regarding immortality. The human heart yearns for such a faith here as science alone cannot convey. Religion must have something definite to offer—a compelling truth, a radiant message regarding the other life. This message must not only be a consolation to those deprived of friends by death; it must also show the individual how to so order his life on this earth as to be worthy of immortality after death. It must teach man how to acquire those spiritual qualities necessary for successful existence upon higher planes of life than we know of on this earth.

SIXTH: Religion should be a consolation and inspiration in all sorrow and misfortune. But it should not be an anodyne, a lethal drug, causing supineness before the events of fortune. It is one of the chief criticisms made of religion by freethinkers, that it lulls the senses of religionists in a way that weakens their active and effective resistance to the difficulties and obstructions of life.

The real power of religion in times of misfortune is to give not only consolation but also courage, initiative and creativeness to the individual, such as to aid him out of his difficulties. It was such a consolation that the Psalmist sought and found in religion. And the most marvelous example I know of in all history of spiritual guidance salvaging a man's broken fortunes is to be found in the story told in the thirtieth chapter of First Samuel. Here we read the remarkable story of how David met at Ziklag the greatest crisis and misfortune of his life; met a tempestuous destiny and conquered it through the power of the spirit joined to the power of a captain of men.

SEVENTH: Religion should not only console in times of misfortune and sorrow, but should conduce to the finest and greatest living at all times. Christ said, "I came that ye might have life and have it more abundantly." One of the chief evidences of an active religion in the life of an individual is this joyousness, this spiritual uplift which gives to life a "radiant acquiescence." It was 'Abdu'l-Bahá's habit to ask every one who came into His presence, "Are you happy?" and He would add without waiting for an answer, "Be happy." And who shall say that this brief command had not in reality a great creative force. Be happy! Is not this the essential exhortation of all the great founders of religion? Is not this the chief purpose of their self-sacrificing mission to humanity?

EIGHTH: Religion in addition to presenting concepts, exhortations and directions for the spiritual life, must also embody the divine art of living in an actual incarnated form. That is to say, it must present the person of its Founder as an Exemplar, a Model of the behavior which it teaches. It is, after all, the lives of the great Founders, more even than what they have said, which has caused their teachings to penetrate the hearts of men and become a permanent guide of conduct.

NINTH: Religion must bequeath a living Word to humanity, a Bible which can be resorted to for ages after the departure of the great Teacher. This revealed Word is not merely a body of religious teaching; it is incarnated Wisdom, a Potency distilled into words and capable of affecting conduct. Thus the revealed Word of a great religion has an enormous power and influence upon human living; has had, and always will have. Those educators today who are seeking material and text books for character education would do well to realize that the greatest medium for character education is the revealed Word of God. "Man must come to know and to acknowledge the precepts of God," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "and he must come to the point of knowing for a certainty that the ethical development of humanity is dependent upon religion."

LASTLY, religion should offer to its adherents a great and noble Cause to work for. This Cause should be such as to command the utmost allegiance, the utmost loyalty, the utmost service and sacrifice upon the part of its adherents. No religion that fails in these respects is worthy of the name. Here is where the individual transcends himself, rises above the limitations of personality, and becomes a cooperator in the Divine Purpose for humanity. This is the greatest fulfillment that can come to the individual life.

LET THE READER apply these criteria to religion in general; and in particular let him test by these principles the claims of the Bahá'í Movement to represent the fulfillment for today of man's spiritual aspirations and needs.

The unprejudiced searcher for Truth should ask himself in regard to the Bahá'í religion as to whether or not it is the destined spiritual vehicle for the human race in its present stage of development. For spiritual Truth as defined and expressed in actual religion, must adapt itself always to man's capacity and to his stage of development. "Religion," 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "is the outer expression of the Divine Reality. Therefore it must be living, vitalized, moving and progressive. If it be without motion and nonprogressive it is without the divine life—it is dead. The divine institutes are continuously active and evolutionary; therefore the revelation of them must be progressive and continuous. All things are subject to re-formation. This is a century of life and renewal."

"How vast is the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh! How great the magnitude of His blessings showered upon humanity in this day! And yet, how poor, how inadequate our conception of their significance and glory! This generation stands too close to so colossal a Revelation to appreciate, in their full measure, the infinite possibilities of His Faith, the unprecedented character of His Cause, and the mysterious dispensations of His Providence."

A MEDITATION

"To the people of Bahá glory is in knowledge, good deeds, good morals and wisdom —not in native land or station."

BAHA'U'LLAH, in "Words of Paradise."

Potentially in seed, the soul appears:
Its ways untutored and untrained; its tears
Its smiles, await the passage of the years;
Where deeds shall yet unfold, if near or far,
The dread abyss—the tranquil, brilliant star.

Shall world of now and here lay unchecked claim,
In wealth of gold; in dusty hall of fame;
And mouthings of the heedless speak his name?
Shall passion, like a sculptor, shape the dust—
The living-dead, to moulder in his lust?

Or shall an armoured, inner sight defy,
The strange illusions of the outer eye—
The worldly plea—its bleak, phantasmal cry?
Shall guidance that the true, Blessed Beauty* gave,
Uplift man's soul above his body's grave?

For only in the selflessness of will,
Can man his noblest destiny fulfill:
The right uphold; subordinate the ill.
The Lord of "Be"† the altar flame shall fire,
When flight o'ertakes the armies of desire.

The hours, soon turned to years, go filing past:
Like porters, bear their loads until the last;
Until upon His scales their weight they cast—
To mark (a balance that the pure shall see)
What God has taught a life's true worth to be.

And there each finds the slightest, hidden deed,
He wrought to serve the Living Lord, a seed
So grown in bounty, that its harvests feed
The fainting hordes of hunger, who had died,
Had Love left incomplete the good It tried.

They've searched the Word of God for Its behest:
They've walked in Paths of Glory that He Blest;
Those saints whose hearts the Love of God confest.
All praise to souls, in Springtime's precious Day,
Whose inner life has trod the highest way.

BREAKING DOWN THE BARRIERS

Foad Ashraf

The author is a young student who came to this country in 1927 to enter the Ford School in Detroit through arrangements made by the Persian government with Ford representatives. Although he was sent by his government, he is now, however, an independent student, and he is taking a college course in chemical engineering. This article, his first contribution to The Bahá'í Magazine, was written upon request of the Editors for a description of how the Bahá'í Movement is actually working out in Persia.

PERSIA, the birthplace of the Bahá'í faith, has gone through a period of most unusual transformation during the past eighty years. In the field of government, religion, education and industry, everywhere new scenes have appeared which have made the modern Persia an entirely different country. But the most significant of all is the radical change that has taken place in the social relations between the Persian Muslims and the adherents of various other religions in the country.

The glorious principle of the oneness of mankind declared by Bahá'u'lláh eighty years ago, had convinced His followers that progress in any field was impossible unless the various religious groups of Persia were united and worked together in perfect peace and harmony. Urged on by a true patriotic spirit and inspired by the words of their beloved Master, the Bahá'ís set out to establish unity and fellowship among the Persian people. A remarkable success has been attained. Difference of religion is no longer the cause of hatred and separation in Persia, and everybody believes this to be the secret of the rapid improvement of conditions in recent years.

It is the object of this article to point out in detail some of the ways in which the Bahá'ís of Persia proceeded in breaking down the barriers of social and religious prejudice in that country. However, before beginning such an account, a few words should be said about the nature and the extent of religious hatred and discord prevalent in Persia at the time of Bahá'u'lláh in order that the reader may appreciate the tremendous importance of this heroic achievement.

FOR MANY years the people of Persia have been actually divided into four distinct religious groups—the Muslims, the Jews, the Zoroastrians and the Christians. Out of 8,500,000, the estimated total population of the country, more than 8,000,000 are Muslims and only about 130,000 belong to the other religions.* The Jews have been in Persia probably since the time of Cyrus the Great, and at present about 40,000 of them are in various cities, the most of them in Hamadan, the site of the old city of Ekbatan. The Christians consist mainly of Armenians (50,000) and Nestorians (30,000), who first lived in the northwestern part of the country, and later gradually moved around and settled in several large cities like Tabriz, Tihiran and Isfáhán. The Zoroastrians, 10,000 in number, are the old Persians who at the time of the conquest of Persia by the Arabs preferred to stay in their homeland, accepting the terms imposed by the conquerors rather than fleeing to India. The Jews in Persia are mainly engaged in trade, the Nestorians and Armenians in agriculture and rug weaving, while the Muslims are in all occupations. It is well to mention that, although in physical features there are no certain distinctions between a Persian Jew and a Muslim, or an Armenian and a Muslim, until quite recently the Armenian could be recognized at once by his cap and short coat, the Zoroastrian by his flowing robe, brown turban and a silk shawl wrapped several times around his waist. Furthermore there is the difference in language and the difference in habits. Zoroastrians do not smoke, probably from a sense of respect for fire. Their women appear publicly unveiled, but are very particular to keep their hair covered. The Jewish women wear the black chuddar (a long cloak) of the Muslims, but they leave off the veil, while the Nestorians and Armenians are free from both.

Since the conquest of Persia by the Arabs (652 A. D.), Islam has been the state religion and the laws have been based on the Qur'án. Until recent times the authority to interpret and execute the civil, and in some cases, the penal laws, was in the hands of the clergy. For a long time the adherents of other religions, although deprived of most civil rights, were left in peace and were allowed to practice their religious rites in isolated communities, provided they would comply with certain rules such as not building structures higher than those of the Muslims, or not ringing a church bell, etc.

DURING the nineteenth century the decadence of the Muslim clergy, and with it the corruption of the government, gave the Jews, Zoroastrians, and Armenians the opportunity to gain more freedom and to rise above the limitations herein mentioned; for example, the production and sale of intoxicating liquor, which was absolutely impossible in the early days, became a profitable business for many non-Muslims, because now they had the patronage and protection of government officials and other influential persons. In general, however, Jews and Armenians and especially the Zoroastrians, whether in trade or in agriculture, attained superiority and independence by sheer industry and honest labor.

Now hatred and prejudice remain dormant so long as a rival is kept down, but as soon as he shows signs of rising, conflict and struggle start. That was the reason the Muslims began fighting their fellow-countrymen, who were now their competitors and whom they condemned as infidel and defiled. In the city of Tihran the Jews were not permitted outside their own district except during the day, and then they had to sew colored patches on their clothes as an identification mark. On a rainy day the infidel could not approach the Muslim shops and markets, because to touch an infidel, as well as a dog, in the presence of moisture, would defile the fanatical Muslim and would necessitate a long process of washing and purification. Men were posted along the road to throw salt in the cases of grapes which the Armenians carried to their homes, thus preventing the making of wine. In Yazd Zoroastrians were compelled to face a donkey's tail, while riding through the city, which for centuries had been a method of humiliation. Muhammad spoke with admiration and reverence for Jesus, Moses and the prophets of Israel, and upheld their holy books, but the ignorant Muslims did not recognize the Holy Bible and destroyed every copy of it they could find. Zoroaster was not even considered a prophet of God, because no direct reference could be found to His name in the Qur'án.

One would expect that the Jews, Christians, and the Zoroastrians would unite to resist the injustice of the Muslims, but there was enough difference and discord among the three to make such a union impossible.

Such was the extent of religious animosity in Persia when the supreme pen of Bahá'u'lláh proclaimed the great principle of the oneness of mankind in such emphatic words as: "O people of the world, the religion of God is for love and union, make it not the cause of discord and dissension. . . . Associate, O my friends, with people of all religions with joy and fragrance."

HUNDREDS OF Muslims embraced the cause of Bahá'u'lláh, and the influence of His divine words completely changed their hearts. Love and understanding took the place of hatred and prejudice. Heretofore they shunned the Jews and scorned the Zoroastrians and Armenians; now they loved them all. Once they despised and burned the books of other religions; now they were taught by Bahá'u'lláh that the Bible of the Jews and Christians and the Zend Avesta of the Zoroastrians contained revelations from God and should be looked upon and read as holy books. No sooner had they joined the circle of the friends of God than they were urged to "associate with the people of all religions with joy and fragrance."

But to live in a group of fanatical Muslims and associate with Jews and other infidels seemed next to impossible, and it needed a great deal of courage and sacrifice on the part of the early Bahá'ís. How could a Bahá'í entertain a Jew in his home or walk with a Christian on the street, and ignore the malicious looks and threats of the neighbors and shopkeepers? I remember when I was a child we entertained in our home three American women, my sister's teachers at the American High School. The next morning I did not dare go out for fear the neighbor's children might throw stones at me. Were the Bahá'ís to preserve their social prestige and temporary comforts of life and give up following the admonitions of Bahá'u'lláh? No. They read in the Kitáb-i-Aqdas:

"One who has tasted the sweetness of the words which have issued from the mouth of the Merciful, will expend all that he has, though it may be the treasures of the earth, to uphold even one of the teachings which have dawned from the horizon of His blessing. Moreover in addition to spending all his earthly goods he will offer even his eyes as targets for the arrows of the enemy and his body as food for their swords. . . ."

This was a severe test for the Bahá'ís of Persia in the same way that the adjustment of international relations are now the crucial test for the Bahá'ís in Europe, and the solution of the race problem is to be a supreme test for the Bahá'ís in the United States. The test in Persia, however, was not too hard for the faithful friends of Bahá'u'lláh. The Bahá'ís of Persia, assured of the ultimate victory of the host of God, decided to break down the social barrier and associate with the people of all religions. True they had to suffer a great deal in the beginning, but by application of Bahá'í courage and wisdom they came out victorious in the end. In a short time many Jews and Zoroastrians became attracted to the cause. This brought great joy and happiness to the circle of friends, but at the same time somewhat aggravated their social problem. In some cases a number of families succeeded in living close together, and in this way they avoided much of the trouble which might result from living next door to fanatical Muslims. In one instance in Tih-rán, one of the friends rented a farm seven miles from the city and every Friday (the Persian "Sunday") old friends and prospective believers of all classes and religions assembled there to partake freely of both material and spiritual food.

The home of Ibne-Abhar, one of the "Hands of the cause of God" in Tih-rán, was situated in the heart of the city, a district thickly populated not only with Muslim laymen, but fanatical mullahs (priests). For years the gate of this blessed home was open to all, and there Jews, Zoroastrians and Christians, who had never before set foot in that district, sat at the same table with Muslims. To my young and inexperienced mind this was a miracle, the secret of which I could not understand until one evening father and I went to call on Ibne-Abhar and found ourselves at a large dinner party, a very unusual one for that house I thought. There were more than forty mullahs in their black or white turbans, seated in two connecting rooms around the white dinner mats, spread in Persian style on the floor. There was an abundance of delicious food of all kinds, enough to satisfy the appetite of forty mullahs and have some left for them to carry home for their families. I must have looked very astonished, because Ibne-Abhar soon found a chance to speak to me. In explanation, he said: "This is the way we make friends of our enemies. We feed the mullahs of the district once in a while, so that we may always be able to have Bahá'í feasts at our home."

Other Bahá'ís, who were not tied down to a certain locality, got around the difficulty of unfriendly neighbors by moving into places suitable for a Bahá'í home. In general the Bahá'ís of Persia, in choosing a site for a home, or even in renting a house, bear in mind that their home should be "A center for the radiance of light and the glowing of His love in the hearts of people."

In the city of Tih-rán, for example, the Bahá'ís gradually moved out of the southern and central districts, where orthodox Muslims lived, and went to the northern part of the city, which had recently developed into a place for foreign legations, their employees, and other Europeans and Americans. Meanwhile a liberal-minded mullah, who had the jurisdiction of a newly rising northwestern district, became attracted to the cause. He helped not only the Bahá'ís, but also the Jews and Armenians, to settle in that district. The more progressive Muslims gradually moved into the new district, and although they kept aloof in the beginning, they could not help being affected by the joyful and happy fellowship that existed between the Bahá'ís and the Christians or Jews, and one by one they too found their way into the ever widening circle of Bahá'í friendship.

THUS SLOWLY but surely the barriers of social and religious prejudice were broken down in the Persian capital, followed by a similar achievement in other cities. The victory began in the more enlightened circles and little by little spread to people of all classes.

At present in every city or town, even in the small villages, there are Bahá'í homes in which people of all religions and classes associate together with the utmost freedom. They have no fear of public disapproval or the interference of fanatical Muslims. To these homes are attracted daily hundreds of people, who eventually can not help but join the circle of Bahá'í love and friendship.

A great demonstration of the Bahá'í fellowship takes place at the time of Nawruz, the feast of the beginning of the new year. The holiday begins on the first day of spring, March 21, and lasts twelve days. It is an old habit of Persians to call on relatives and friends during these days. Sweets and refreshments are served, presents are given and people have a gay time. Naturally among the Bahá'ís the circle of friends is so large and contains so many different types of people, that it is astonishing to the neighbors. Sometimes the door of a Bahá'í home is wide open for three days, and the neighbors watch groups of callers walk in and out. They see a group of Zoroastrians in their flowing robes just about to leave the house, while two Muslims and three Jews hand in hand walk toward the door and shout, "Allah'u'Abha! Allah'u'Abha!" Look! How they embrace each other! What love! What joy! What is the meaning of all this? The perplexed neighbor will soon find out that those whom he calls Jews, Zoroastrians, or Armenians are known to each other by no other name than "Friend" or "Bahá'í Friend." It is this discovery alone that has already attracted thousands of souls, and will hereafter attract the whole world to the cause of Bahá'u'lláh.

"The oneness of the world of humanity shall be realized, accepted and established. . . . All mankind are the servants of the glorious God our Creator. . . . As He loves humanity without distinction or preference, why should we not love all? Can we conceive of a plan and policy superior to the Divine purpose? Manifestly we cannot. Therefore we must strive to do the will of the glorious Lord and emulate His policy of loving all mankind. . . . Therefore if we follow the example of the Lord of divinity, we will love all mankind from our hearts; and the means of the unity of the world of humanity will become as evident and manifest to us as the light of the sun."

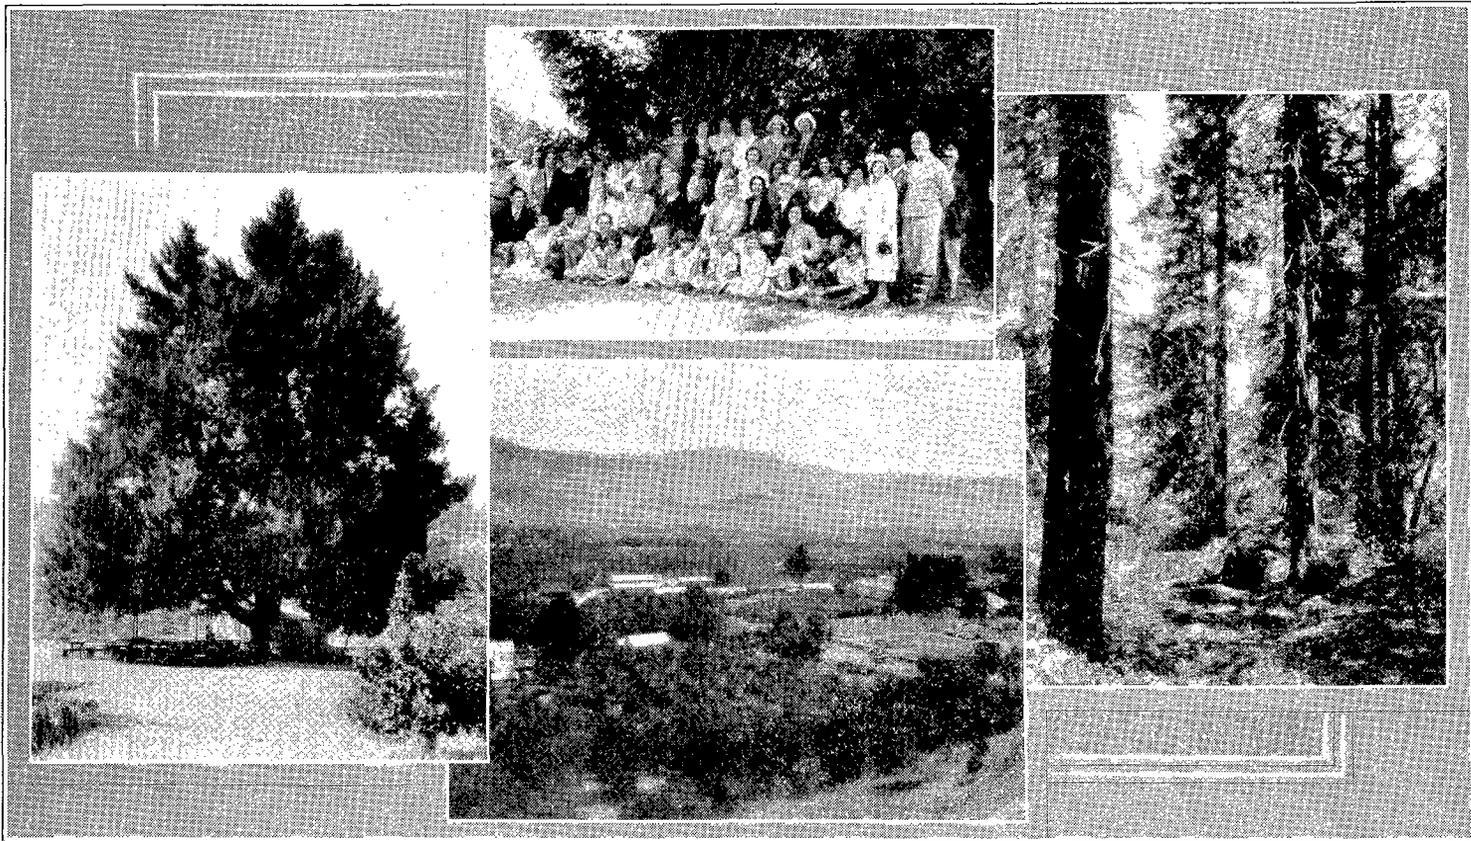

—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

THE CENTURY OF RADIANCE

HIS Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared from the horizon of the Orient and re-established the essential foundation of the religious teachings of the world. The worn-out traditional beliefs current among men were removed. He caused fellowship and agreement to exist between the representatives of varying denominations so that love became manifest among the contending religions. He created a condition of harmony among hostile sects and upheld the banner of the oneness of the world of humanity. He established the foundation for International Peace, caused the hearts of nations to be cemented together and conferred new life upon the various peoples of the east. Among those who have followed the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh no one says "I am a Persian," "I am a Turk," "I am a Frenchman," or "I am an Englishman." No one says "I am a Mussulman upholding the only true religion," "I am a Christian loyal to my traditional and inherited beliefs," "I am a Jew following talmudic interpretations," or "I am a Zoroastrian and opposed to all other religions." On the contrary all have been rescued from religious racial, political and patriotic prejudices and are now associating in fellowship and love to the extent that if you should attend one of their meetings you would be unable to observe any distinction between Christian and Muhammadan, Jew and Zoroastrian, Persian and Turk, Arab and European; for their meetings are based upon the essential foundations of religion, and real unity has been established among them. Former antagonisms have passed away, the centuries of sectarian hatred are ended, the period of aversion has gone by, the mediaeval conditions of ignorance have ceased to exist.

Verily the century of radiance has dawned, minds are advancing, perceptions are broadening, realizations of human possibilities are becoming universal, susceptibilities are developing, the discovery of realities is progressing. Therefore it is necessary that we should cast aside all the prejudices of ignorance, discard superannuated beliefs in traditions of past ages and raise aloft the banner of international agreement. Let us cooperate in love, and through spiritual reciprocity enjoy eternal happiness and peace.

A FORTNIGHT AT BOSCH PLACE, GEYSERVILLE

CLARA WEIR

THE Bahá'í Summer School at Geyserville, Calif., an institution undoubtedly destined to become an important center for Bahá'í activities on the Pacific coast, held its fifth annual session during July and August.

Bahá'í students and their friends from various parts of the West attended in large numbers. Bosch Place, located as it is on the main highway (seventy-five miles north of San Francisco) is easily accessible by every means of transportation. Some came by boat, via San Francisco, others by stage; some chose the railway, and many came by automobile, most of the latter carrying their own camping equipment—sturdy pioneers, all, from as far north as Vancouver, British Columbia, to as far south as Phoenix, Arizona. (It would not require much stretch of the imagination to see students arriving from the four corners of the states by aeroplane. While the environs are hilly, Bosch Place, also, provides sufficient level ground to accommodate the landing of aeroplanes which would, however, necessitate the cutting down of numerous prune trees.)

Housing conditions at Bosch Place are not only comfortable but unique. One feels that here is offered an ideal opportunity for spiritual regeneration, as well as physical relaxation in the country. Truly, the Summer School at Geyserville demonstrates the import of the statement of Bahá'u'llah, "The city is the home of the body, while the country is the home of the soul."

The natural beauties of Geyserville satisfy the aesthetic sense which is conducive to greater tranquility of spirit, a factor so very important to mental and spiritual growth.

Bosch Place is situated on a gentle slope of the mountains, planted to a considerable height in vineyards and fruit trees. Still higher the natural growth of redwood and eucalyptus trees begins. In the foreground is an orchard of prune trees with a level plain extending to the river and, beyond, another range of mountains rises verdant and pine-clad. Natural springs are numerous, and the water from these is piped to all parts of the estate.

Could a dramatist ask for a more ideal setting? What could be more commanding than a play presenting such vivid scenes as these: Scene I, under "the Big Tree"; Scene II, A lecture hall in the village; Scene III, Living-room in the Bosch home; Scene IV, The Redwood Grove? Enchanting! Yes, but enchantment not of a fleeting moment that lifts and is no more, but that which endures—the enchantment of reality. The setting is a necessary adjunct, of course, but "the play's the thing"; something which consists of real events having unity and interest; and the manifestation of "unity and interest" during the Summer School at Geyserville made a deep impression upon Bahá'í and stranger alike.

"The Big Tree," (a huge fir and what a beautiful symbol it has become) stands near the center of Bosch Place. As many as two hundred persons have gathered beneath its shade. It is the gathering place for all activities. The morning devotion, the Unity Feast, the social hour, and committee meetings are held here. Should inclement weather (of which there was none last summer, however) prevent, or the evening dews chill the air, then the Bosch living room offers radiant hospitality. Here we often gathered to discuss important questions, stimulated by the morning lecture.

To the Summer School were invited not only the erudite of our own ranks, university professors, and advanced students, but others who were qualified by the necessary scholarly attainments.

While the purpose of the Geyserville Summer School is primarily for spiritual regeneration, and for the study and promulgation of the principles of Bahá'u'llah yet all who attended the session also felt the effect of intellectual stimulation. Those familiar with the college classroom noted that the direction was systematic and dignified, and the presentation of material typically academic, while an atmosphere of genuine good will and fellowship pervaded the lecture hall, making all feel welcome.

There were two principal lecturers, while five others also contributed an important share to the lecture course.

Since the Bahá'í principles are so universal in scope, the lectures covered a wide range, revealing many important aspects of the various subjects.

The first series traced the evolution of society from its beginning, in the organization of family life to its present development. The speaker traced the correlation of the Bahá'í teachings with modern thought and human experience. "All humanity," he said, "is growing into an organization. We live a life of relations and nothing is isolated. The essence of all prophetic message is the social relation, and the goal of human endeavor is, 'the better way of living'."

PRESENT DAY tendencies in the economic field were outlined and a solution for the various problems confronting this country and the world in general, was presented. It was based, first, upon the plan of Bahá'u'llah, and, secondly, upon a complete understanding of our economic, political, and ethical institutions.

The necessity for international cooperation was stressed as one of the means of improving the economic situation. The same motivating principle in the conduct of individuals affects the conduct of nations and their relations to each other. 'Abdul-Bahá once gave the following diagnosis: "The disease affecting humanity today is the absence of love and the lack of altruism," and, again, in a tablet to one of the believers, he said, "When thou wilt compare the teachings of Bahá'u'llah with the requisitions and necessities of the present time, thou wilt conclude that they are to the sick body of the world the swift healing antidote; nay, rather, they are the remedy producing everlasting health."

"The Relation between Invention and Universality," a lecture by one of our University professors, revealed our progress in the field of invention since the advent of the steam engine, and showed the effect of the various means of transportation and communication upon our national life, and upon international relations.

A discussion of "Universal Education" revealed the following factors which have contributed to international understanding in the Bahá'í era: the Suffrage Movement (1850), the Postal Conference (Paris, 1863), the influence of the International Education Association upon the rewriting of history books, the establishment of cosmopolitan clubs in universities, the exchange of faculties between countries; the establishment of the Institute of Pacific Relations, (by Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, President of Leland Stanford University), the International Chamber of Commerce, World Friendship Societies; the study of Esperanto, and comparative religions; the Religious Congress; the study of the race question; the Olympic games; and the recognition of the essential unity and interdependence of the world by President Hoover.

A lecture entitled, "The Abolition of Racial Barriers, and the Development of Latent Powers in All Peoples," called to mind the words of 'Abdul-Bahá spoken in Washington, D. C., "The world of humanity is like a garden and the various races are the flowers which constitute its adornment and decoration. . . . In their never ending variety man finds enjoyment instead of monotony. There is unity in diversity, one setting off and enhancing the beauty of the other."

THE SECOND continuous series of lectures was on "Comparative Religions," covering the divisions of Hindu philosophy; the religions of China and Japan; of Greece and Rome; the Semitic religions, and Muhammadanism, concluding with, "The Aspects of Christianity," when the speaker made this significant statement, "One cannot discuss comparative religions without discussing "World Peace," and "Social Justice," which bears out the statement of Bahá'u'llah that "the foundations of divine religion are one reality which does not admit of multiplicity or division. Therefore the commandments and teachings of God are one."

There were round table discussions in the "Redwood Grove" which partook of that spiritual quality so inspiring and so uplifting to the human heart. The tall redwoods reminded one of the giant pillars of a cathedral, and when the sun, filtering through the brilliant foliage, shone upon the happy faces, one realized that no stained-glass window could produce an effect so lovely. 'Abdul-Bahá was again brought into our midst as vividly as in the days at 'Akká, for there were present some who had visited Him in the prison—others who had met Him in His travels, and some who had, recently, visited Haifa.

STUDENTS of the Summer School found relaxation in excursions to the geysers and to the petrified forest, while children, and their elders, too, enjoyed the exhilaration of aquatic sports in the river nearby.

A combined Unity Feast, picnic supper, and program on the picturesque Griffith estate will long be remembered as an outstanding event. Here, in a small but perfect amphitheater various members of the Summer School found expression for their histrionic ability, and were there any newcomers who felt at all restrained this occasion dispelled any sense of strangeness.

So close was the bond of fellowship, so unified the purpose, so delectable the viands, intellectual and spiritual, offered by the Summer School, that when the session ended the students departed with great reluctance, not realizing, perhaps, that they, too, had brought something to the Summer School which contributed to the building of an historic Bahá'í institution, an edifice destined to play an important part in the unification of the human world by the establishment of the great fundamental principles of Bahá'u'llah — "not through material means or political power; not through racial or patriotic power but through the divine power and breaths of the Holy Spirit," thus fulfilling the highest aspirations of the human race in the "Most Great Peace," and the establishment of the kingdom of God upon earth.

WE were lost, hopelessly lost it seemed to me, in a dense forest at night. The heavy foliage above obscured the stars. The small lantern which my companion carried shed but a feeble circle of wan light. There were no signs for guidance but the moss on the trees. I was utterly bewildered and would have despaired entirely had it not been for the confident bearing of my friend. Somehow even in our extremity, he seemed calm, assured and serene.

The natural beauty and grandeur of the forest was changed into foreboding. The stately trees loomed as great obstacles. They seemed to be labeled—"doubt," "perplexity," "apprehension," "fear." There were the prickly low briars of selfishness and greed. There were the impenetrable bushes of economic maladjustment. There were the sharp thorns of misunderstanding and ignorance. The illusion was so over-powering and so analogous to world conditions that I could not help commenting upon it in doleful syllables, thinking that perhaps thereby the feeling of desolation would be swept away.

"Our condition may be strange, in that we are temporarily lost, but it is not surprising," my companion replied. "Do you not remember the words of Bahá'u'lláh? 'The thin eyelid prevents the eye from seeing the world and what is contained therein. Then think of the result when the curtain of greed covers the sight of the heart. Say, O People! The darkness of greed and envy obscures the light of the soul as the cloud prevents the penetration of the sun's rays.'"

I did not reply and we trudged along silently for a time.

"Look!" my friend suddenly exulted, "there are trail marks on those trees. Surely we have hit upon a way out."

“Do you think we can follow them,” I asked, “with only this weak, little lantern of human understanding to furnish light?”

“We do not have to rely solely on that lantern,” was the reply “There are other sources of light.”

AND THEN AS we picked our way slowly through the forest, he continued:

“Never before has humanity so needed a long-range, broad-guage view of life and affairs as today. Individuals and nations yearn for some measure of assurance. In the chaotic and disturbing conditions existing we are likely to lose sight of the forest and see only the trees—just as they appear as obstacles to us now, although under different circumstances we appreciate their beauty and utility. If one focuses attention closely on some detail it gains in relative importance until the significance of the whole may be entirely obliterated. It is quite natural that human beings should concentrate on the woes which affect them intimately and personally. See how our present predicament has forced an illusion upon you.”

“I know,” I replied, “but when large numbers of people become disturbed, are destitute of assurance and feel insecure and fearful, they are indeed in an unstable and sorrowful condition. They seem lost in a forest of vicissitudes over which they have little or no control.”

“Yes, could a world-wide referendum be taken, as to what humanity most desires at the moment, undoubtedly the vote would be overwhelming for assurance and a measure of security, for some assurance that all this suffering is not to be repeated and that things are going to turn out all right.”

“Human precedents,” I answered, “have proven to be inadequate guides. Are we beginning to realize that we must look elsewhere in our search for assurance and security? To the other sources of light you mentioned?”

“Certainly, but one of the hardest lessons to learn in this connection, is that assurance and security are states of mind. They can be attained without recourse to the material influences in which we live, but not without effort, for assurance and security rise from spiritual foundations.

“Humanity is crying out for assurance. It must come if civilization is to progress, and the attainment of it must begin with the individual. One calm, assured person even among many who are not, has a stabilizing and inspiring effect on the others. It is important for as many as possible to attain and radiate assurance, that others may be tranquilized and the affairs of the world be placed on a plane where continuity of progress will be certain.

“‘Abdu’l-Bahá tells us ‘that a material man lets himself be worried and harassed by little things but a spiritual man is always calm and serene under all circumstances. If a person is confirmed in the accomplishment of the services of the Kingdom, his worldly conditions are of secondary importance.’* ”

“Thus is a correct perspective clearly established. Worldly conditions are of secondary importance. Undoubtedly many have placed them first, and the consequence is the avalanche of troubles and vicissitudes which beset the world.

“ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has gone further and defined the object of life for our guidance, that we may direct our efforts effectively. ‘The object of this life is the attainment of the spirit, the manifestation of the fear of God, the acquisition of the love of God, the attainment of the good pleasure of the Lord of Mankind. If a man characterizes himself with these God-like attributes he will become freed from all ties of this mortal world, the light of God will shine in his heart, he will hear the voice of the heavenly angels, he will be surrounded by the confirmations of the Holy Spirit, he will become an irradiating center of the perfect names and qualities of the Merciful and a light through which the darkness of the world of humanity is dispelled.’ ”*

He paused a moment and looked about.

“See, the trail is becoming easier.”

So engrossed had I been in his discourse, that I had not noticed that we were now on a well marked forest pathway.

“Please continue,” I requested as he started off at a brisker pace.

“Thus in this one paragraph the aims of life are clearly set forth, and not only are the individual rewards made clear but the potentialities for influence on the world are sung in such glowing words, that we need search no further for the way to assurance and usefulness.

“ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has also said: ‘The world needs more happiness and illumination. The star of happiness is in every heart. We must remove the clouds so that it may twinkle radiantly. Happiness is an internal condition. When it is once established man will ascend to the supreme heights of bliss. A truly happy man will not be subject to the shifting eventualities of time. Like unto a king he will sit upon the throne of fixed realities. He will be impervious to outward, changing circumstances and through his deeds and actions he will impart happiness to others. A Bahá’í must be happy for the blessings of God are bestowed upon him.”

“The problem each individual has to face today, more than ever, is how to be happy in the midst of adversity. It is clearly incumbent that this station be attained in order that we may be of the utmost service to others in sharing their burdens and in bringing assurance to them.

“First the true aims of life must be recognized and secondly we must learn what real happiness is. Both of these lessons have just been recited in the words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.”

THE WAY is not left unmarked from this point for we have the guidance of Bahá’u’lláh in these words—

“ ‘When the lamp of search, effort, longing, fervor, love, rapture, attraction and devotion is enkindled in the heart and the breeze of love blows forth from the direction of Unity the darkness of error, doubt and uncertainty will be dispelled and the lights of knowledge and assurance will encompass all the pillars of existence. Then the ideal Herald will dawn as the true morn from the divine city with spiritual glad tidings and awaken the heart, soul and spirit from the sleep of negligence with the trumpet of knowledge. Then the favors and confirmations of the eternal Holy Spirit will impart such a new life that one will find himself the possessor of a new eye, a new ear, a new heart, and a new mind and will direct his attention to the clear, universal signs and to the hidden individual secrets.

“If we make the effort to attain individual assurance, surely we will be helped, and as the number of assured individuals increases, new attributes will be manifested which will place the affairs of the world in true perspective and significance.”

“Then we must try hard to be assured and to have faith,” I interrupted.

“Yes, and less we place undue importance on this life, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá assures us* that our stay on this planet is relatively short and that we may expect many troubles here, but that life does not culminate in this transitory existence. ‘There are many worlds of light. For even as the plant imagines life ends with itself and has no knowledge of our existence, so the materially-minded man has no knowledge of the other worlds of consciousness.’

“But those who have real sight know of other worlds, celestial ones, where the darkness which enshrouds this one does not exist. All the Prophets knew of these worlds and renounced ‘everything material and gave their hearts to the heavenly world.’

“Suppose, for a moment,” my friend continued, “That it were impossible to progress in this world. There would still be the worlds to come. But it is not impossible to progress here. Much can be done to illumine even this dark world. All that we have to do is to follow the instructions given in order that we may enter, partially at least, the worlds of light here and now. ‘This is the fruit of the tree of creation, to be freed from the darkness of the planet in order to enter the worlds of light. This is the object of existence; this is the fruit of the tree of humanity.’”

For the last half hour we had been climbing steadily. The going was rough and we were both breathing rapidly. Stopping for an instant to rest, we glanced about.

“Ah, look!” my companion exclaimed. A patch of starry sky was visible. “The timber line is just ahead.”

Soon we were above it and out of the forest but we did not stop again until several hundred yards higher up along the trail. Looking back, that great forest in the valley, which had held us prisoners, spread its vast extent darkly in the bright light of the moon.

“Where are your obstacle trees now?” my friend inquired.

“Down there, just below, where they were.”

“Show me one.”

“Why, I can’t. All we can see now is the forest, all of it, not just single trees.”

“And it is beautiful is it not?”

“Yes it is,” I replied, “even by moonlight. How much more beautiful it will be in the morning’s sun!”

LETTERS HOME

KEITH RANSOM-KEHLER

The author, distinguished lecturer and writer in the Bahá'í Cause, is at present making a world tour in behalf of this Cause. She is generously sharing her impressions of the Far East with readers of the Bahá'í Magazine in a series of brief descriptions which she chooses to entitle "Letters Home."

SPLENDOR of splendors!
I have seen Nikko!

As long as I live I shall miss Nikko and long for it as for a well-beloved person. I stood in a hearty downpour, unconscious of wet feet, puddles and staring strangers, taking my last look at the never-to-be-forgotten beauty of the Yomeimon (Day-spending Gate) as one would fill one's eyes with a loveliness too perfect to be understood, too sublime to be neglected, too up-lifting to be relinquished. And through my vitals jagged and twisted the sharp cut of the parting pang that has not searched me for many years.

Here was all the poignant ache of Beauty in a sumptuous, a magnificent mood. I recalled my enraptured wanderings through Rouen, my spell-bound view of the Sphinx, my visit to the Daibutsu—everything that had ever cleansed and relieved and released and intoxicated my soul, and there crept over me again a realization of the wondrous, and an incommunicable gladness, as at the dawn of the world's first morning.

Who can endure bare Beauty without an agony of longing for her uninterrupted presence, and who possesses the hardihood to remain long in her abode? The heart swoons from its unwonted expansion, and the eyes dazzle to sudden blindness with stabs too bright to bear.

The rich brocade of pine branches against a soft gray sky, as one mounts an ancient avenue between mossy stone walls, gentle with out-cropping ferns and the stealthy stroke of lichen, sets the mood for the wonders that are to follow. But even before the peaceful climb begins the first sight of the "Sacred Bridge," a buoyant structure of red lacquer spanning the hoydenish Daibu river, gives a lilt to ones spirits and a promise.

Beauty is based on an harmonious diversity that is recapitulated into perfect unity. There is not one false note in the sublime symphony of the Toshogu Shrines: from the faintest trace of jade or gold on a facade to the complete relation of the architectural mass there is a mighty coordination. If concinity could be used of things instead of words, it would apply perfectly.

One's progress from the first Torii (the two-uprights with a cross piece that always marks the entrance to a Shinto Shrine) to the Shrine itself is a record of progressive astonishment and grandeur that reaches its climax at the Yomeimon Gate and its exotic denouement at the Shrine itself.

AN ATTEMPT to describe Nikko would be like an attempt to describe love or prayer, or those wistfully-remembered moments when God turns His merciful glances toward the trivial seed-plot in one's heart and suffuses it with the fragrant breath of His tenderness.

At Nikko Beauty is neither august as in Egypt, majestic as at Kamakura nor dramatic and energetic as at Rouen; here she is elegant, sumptuous, magnificent.

Fifteen thousand men worked for twelve years to complete this monument to the great Iye Asu, the Founder of the Tokugawa Shogunate, at the right hand of whose lineal descendant I was seated on my first day in Tokyo.

Nothing but pure joy, a great exultant realization of the boundless rhythm of creation, a daring flight to the iridescent realm of holy dreams could have made an accomplishment like the Nikko Shrines possible. One remembers the words of Baha'u'llah concerning those servants who "when they mention their Creator, all things will mention with them the same." Hills, river, rocks and forest combine with the thrilling spot of worship and commemoration "to draw us from ourselves and from the world unto the shore of" God's "presence and communion."

The infinitude of detail would be elsewhere bewildering; the opulence of ornamentation would be ordinarily vulgar, but here every touch is indispensable, every fleck an added grace.

The whole scheme cries, a jubilant shout, with color. The general background is red, indescribable in its subdued but joyous tone, with black to balance and off-set it, and gold to maintain the magnificence of the Shrines' purpose—the habitation in this world of those lofty beings who would here renew human ties and bestow their benison upon those left to struggle with earth's problems.

Even yet the breathlessness and wonder of this adventure so fills me that I am unable to remember or understand why front upon front, grille upon grille, cornice upon cornice, jade, pink, orchid, maroon, gold, cobalt, peacock beside a veritable concourse of miniature figures did not seem tedious, overwrought or decadent? But the eye mounted hungrily from detail to detail filled at last with a delicate ecstasy before the bewildering astonishments of the Yomeimon Gate and the unexpected rarity of the Karamon. Here, tree-trunks gnarled and carved with dragons and plump petals are partially plastered with white chalk. The conception of the detail is as fantastic and wilful as the whole is unified and gorgeous.

Just as in the Grand Canyon one has the somewhat guilty feeling of having surprised God at work, so here one has the odd sense of having penetrated those hidden recesses of man's soul where Beauty suckles her nurslings with streams of living water and hopes too high for earth.

THE RAIN, which fell steadily, lent its soft, calm influence to the perfect spell. The dread of waking, the feeling of a glorious dream, the realization that its aching beauty would fade by degrees, leaving the world a little gaunt and pinched where loveliness had stood full-panoplied; this, and the sense that one could endure no more; that the heart was too straight and the mind too cramped for this relentless onslaught of the hosts of joy brought again the words of Baha'u'llah; "hearts are troubled because of Me and minds cannot grasp Me."

Frantic for relief I visited the adjoining shrine of Futara-San; then in a frenzy of anguish lest the closing hour should come before I could see Toshogu again, I ran back breathless to assuage my home-sick eyes on the gigantic bas-relief of chrysanthemums that decorate the side walls inside the Shrine enclosure, and to beat the wings of longing once more against the diaphanous grilles extending from the Karamon.

The multiplicity and rare delicacy of the wood-carvings everywhere are emphasized in the flights and clusters of animals and birds across this brilliant cloister.

When Whistler concluded that "the story of the beautiful is already complete, graven in the marbles of the Parthenon and broidered with the birds upon the fan of Hokusai at the foot of Fujiyama" he should have carried us one step further to where she sits enshrined forever amid the glories of Nikko.

The reverence, the eagerness, the appreciation with which the Japanese view this monument to their innate taste and devotion was impressive. Coolie and peer, student and geisha wander wrapt from spot to sacred spot.

Inside the loggia of the Yomeimon are quaint and portly vessels of the sacred wine contributed for the priests of the Shrine by those wishing to honor their ancestors, or to win favor from them. Even these containers are artistic and in keeping with the charm of the whole.

Two hundred steps lead to the tomb of the great Iyeasu, up which young and old, clad in white with the typical pilgrims' staff, toil to the honor of their ancestors.

From the facade of the Sacred Stable is taken the detail of the world-famous representation of the three wise monkeys.

As I turned to look upward from the entrance level of the Shrine back to the platform of the Yomeimon I did not attempt to control my grief at the stabbing thought that perhaps my eyes would be divorced forever from the rapturous sight of its uplifting glory.

"Beneficent rivers of tears flow at the finger of pain
And out of the cloud that smites beneficent rivers of rain."

I was saying farewell to one of life's deepest and most joyous experiences: spontaneous tears were the only appropriate tribute that I could pay.

"The true test of personality is not the man, but the range of his interests. What causes does the man espouse? With what great thoughts is he familiar? What ideals lure him on? How large a section of the world does he care for in a vital, responsible way, thinking, planning, working for its welfare, its improvement, its advancement? The magnitude of the ends one sees and serves is the true measure of one's personality. Call the roll of the great. Study their activities. It will be to discover that he only is great in mind who has fastened upon some great idea, some lofty cause, and that he only is great in heart who has flooded the world with a great affection."

BAHÁ'Í PIONEERS

A Short Historical Survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

SIYYID MUSTAFA ROUMIE

Jamal Effendi, accompanied by the author, Mr. Roumie, during two years of pioneer missionary work in India, found no difficulty in obtaining access to the leading people of many important Indian states including high government officials and rulers themselves. Everywhere Jamal received a warm reception and his message was listened to courteously.

In 1878 they left Calcutta for Rangoon. Here their mission was highly successful, and in a short time the Bahá'í Cause was widely promulgated in spite of some instances of attempted persecution.

After establishing the Cause in Rangoon the missionaries went, early in 1879, to Mandalay where they laid a good foundation for the Bahá'í Cause.

Several years were spent in missionary journeys to Burma, Mandalay and the chief cities of India. Then Jamal Effendi and the author left for more distant journeys to Singapore, Java and the Celebes Islands where they met with extraordinary adventures.

DURING our stay in Macassar we became well known as experts in the healing of the sick and the soothing of nervous ailments. With the supreme power and help of the Greatest Name we were able to heal many of the sick, and those who thought themselves possessed by evil spirits were also relieved by our prayers. Through this healing work we were able to deliver the message of Bahá'u'lláh to every one with whom we came in contact; and when the time arrived for us to depart, it was only with the greatest difficulty that we were able to tear ourselves away from these people who had begun to depend so much upon us.

From Macassar we proceeded in a small sailing vessel to a seaport of the Celebes islands called Pari Pari, then ruled by a native independent chief called Fatta Aronmatua Aron Raffan, which means "The Great Monarch and King of all Kings." On our arrival I went directly to the customs official to ask permission for landing. The officer in charge gave me a pony on which to ride to the royal palace—a palace built of bamboo—to obtain this permission from their King. The King, who was advanced in age, was eagerly awaiting our arrival and watching with a telescope through the window of his palace. As soon as I entered the royal palace the King got up from his seat and warmly embraced me saying that he was happy to see his honorable guest. Then he eagerly inquired the whereabouts of Jamal Effendi, who, I replied, was still in the ship awaiting for his royal command to disembark.

When I entered the royal presence I saw there two envoys sent to the King by the Dutch Governor of Macassar with a private letter to the King indicating the arrival of the two visitors—Jamal Effendi and the writer—and requesting the King to refuse any help that they might request for the purpose of making their journey into the interior of the native states; for the letter stated these two men were necromancers, and would use the art of enchantment to win the chiefs and their subjects for their mystic religious rites.

The King was not favorably impressed with this defamatory letter.

In fact he was noticeably annoyed by it and in an angry tone he said to the two envoys, "These venerable visitors are our guests and under our protection, and the Dutch Governor should not interfere with our religious affairs. This is my reply to his offensive letter, and an unofficial message which should be conveyed by you to him." The envoys, thunderstruck, immediately retired disheartened and unsuccessful in their hostile mission.

The King enjoined upon the customs official to apologize to Jamal Effendi on his behalf for not being able to do him the honor of a public reception, and directed the customs official to accommodate the guests in his own house. This was done, and we were honorably received by this official. The day after our arrival we were summoned to the Court to have an audience with the King. We were warmly received by him. He embraced each of us and bade us be seated close beside him. After the usual salutations and politenesses, he inquired about our voyage and the object of our unexpected and delightful arrival at such an unfrequented spot.

With perfect sincerity and candor, yet with tact and sympathy, we explained to him our whole missionary adventure in a way calculated to produce interest and satisfaction on his part. The King was exceedingly delighted and asked us to call again on the next morning. So on the morrow we were again furnished with ponies and rode a distance of about two miles to the palace, and this time had audience with the Queen and also with the princes. In fact we found ourselves becoming very intimate with the King and all the royal family.

THE KING was suffering with an ugly disease called psora. His whole body was covered with scales like fish scales which caused constant irritation and itching. His skin was so sensitive that he could stand but little clothing and so he wore but very few garments. Jamal Effendi had inspired such faith and admiration in the King as to make him confident that his spiritual visitor could heal his painful disease, and he requested this of Jamal. The latter replied, "We are not qualified physicians or trained in the healing of material ills. But we will earnestly pray for divine guidance, and by means of that try to find the remedy for you."

When we returned home we consulted and prayed together for the solution of this problem and responsibility which the King's sickness and his faith in us had placed upon us. The results were, as the reader will see, a remarkable confirmation of the fact that no matter what the difficulty, Bahá'ís will find a heavenly guidance through consultation and prayer.

Having sought the guidance, then, we immediately proceeded to act. We went out to the neighboring jungle to search for medical herbs, as we had nothing of this nature with us. We found many trees of cassia fistula with its abundant fruits which are mildly laxative. We collected some of these fruits; and going further into the jungle found some plants of jungle mint and gathered the leaves of this also. We sought to be guided in the collection of other plants and herbs, continually using the Greatest Name while we were engaged in this extraordinary search. We brought them home, and praying also the while, prepared from them a brew, and also a purgative from the casia. We had a few cakes of carbolie soap with us fortunately, and we prepared three bottles of oxymel combined with vinegar and sugar, and took all of these preparations and the soap with us to the royal palace the next day. We gave four doses of the purgative to the King on alternate days, and gave him nourishment in between times. Every day he had a hot bath with a strong application of carbolie soap, taking internally some of the herb brew we had made and the oxymel.

As the natives were unable to carry out any of these services, even the bath, the writer personally executed everything necessary. It took more than a month to soften the skin and gradually bring it to a smooth and velvety condition as before this sickness. Finally through divine confirmations and the glorious powerful effects of the Greatest Name, we succeeded to a certain extent in affecting a cure. After all, the faith of the old King was certainly a great factor in his remarkable recovery. Needless to say, the royal family were greatly impressed because of this healing, and were won to our friendship and to attachment to our Message more than ever before.

SEEKING AND FINDING

BY ONE WHO HAS "SOUGHT" AND "FOUND"

Chapter 1.—Introduction

"O people, avail yourselves of the Day of God. Verily, it is better for you to meet Him in this day than in any upon which the sun rises, were you of those who know!"

Bahá'u'lláh.

WHY was I born? Why did I ever come here? Where did I come from and where am I going? Is there a God, if there is where and what is He?

These are the questions that the Youth of today is asking, and these questioners will not be satisfied and happy until they have discovered the perfect answers.

There is nothing new in these questions. They are youth's age-old problems. Possibly the only difference may be that today the young people are so delightfully frank and open about everything that we hear more about them than formerly.

Fathers and mothers, these were your problems, they were mine too. Perhaps you had them answered early to your satisfaction, or perhaps you did not. Possibly you gave up the struggle before you got very far for it is always easier to go with the tide, or because you could not find the one who could give to you the complete and perfect answers.

You may have stepped out of the current of generally accepted opinions and built up your own 'personal philosophy', that temporarily, at least, brought a certain satisfaction. Most boys and girls go thru these phases in their endeavor to really know, and know that they know.

MANY CHILDREN are born into this world with a wish, a longing, and a realization that they have come for a definite purpose. Sometimes it may take a long time to discover its meaning but thru seeking one 'finds' and thru knocking the doors are 'opened'.

At nine years of age I told my mother that I felt I had come into the world to do something for Women. Whether it was to write a book, or invent something, I did not know, but that I did not want to go until I had done it. I have since come to the realization that just to have been born in this 'Great Day' is sufficient destiny for any woman whether a book is written or an invention ever materializes.

BORN, THE daughter of a Canon in the Episcopal Church, with devout Christian parents, I found myself at a very early age fearing that I must some day "Go to Hell"—(wherever that was) because I just could not feel or believe all that my family seemed so ready and willing to accept. Each remonstrance on my part would bring the well remembered answer "You must accept it on Faith". What was that thing they called faith, it did not mean a thing to me. Why should I accept anything that seemed unreasonable and that could not be logically explained so that my mind, as well as my heart, could accept it?

Sometimes I would have a distinct experience as if I were way up in the air looking down on the streets (this was before the days of air-planes). The people seemed like tiny ants racing around making a great commotion over nothing. What was it all about anyway, this thing we called "Life"? That experience recurred several times, especially, as I recall it, between the ages of seven and seventeen.

Well the "Thrilling Adventure" of spiritual Life began! It has been a longer and more hazardous voyage of discovery than I imagined, but I 'started' so could never turn back.

The reason for humbly recording these experiences now is because I have found the "Key" that has opened every door, and it is therefore my hope that this spiritual autobiography may point the arrow for some other young traveler who is in as much of a tangle as I went thru.

DURING ADOLESCENCE, ill health, to such an extent, overcame the body that a cry for release went forth. In response to this call there seemed to be a wee small voice down deep inside that replied "You have not yet done what you came for."

The effect was electric! An inner motion took place that brought a realization of the purpose of existence, and in a comparatively short period of time complete restoration to health and vigor resulted, thru the application of scientific and spiritual remedies—largely electrical treatments—and—Prayer.

Later, the death of my Mother (my Father had died before then) made possible an Art Training in New York, which led on into ever expanding fields.

Having more or less cut loose from the orthodox paths, I began searching everywhere for more Light. Drinking from first one fountain, then another — New Thought, Christian Science, Unity, Theosophy, Psychology, Science. Each of these offered something that the others did not, and every one of them slaked the thirst for a time, up to a certain point—but then came that ever-appearing twilight zone I called it, and discouragement again descended.

Was the journey never to end? Why these inner longings and ideals if they could not be satisfied? Where could one find a "Guide" who really knew the Way?

Then arose the surgings of the questions concerning marriage and divorce and individual freedom (The matter of Birth-Control and Companionate Marriage were not then so popular). Each brought more questions. I found so many theories and viewpoints but who was right? Was there no one who "Spoke as one having authority"? Was there such a thing as happy married life? What was the basis upon which such an existence could be built that would carry thru hardships, storms and stress of a changing world?"

THEN WITH ART Course finished—I found myself Director of a Department in one of the most perfectly equipped Colleges of Modern Education. There the inner unrest and longing grew more intense.

In early childhood I had been taught "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and all things shall be added unto you." This was supposed to be a Christian Institution, at least it was carried on in a Christian land. Those words burned in like fire! Where in that College was the Kingdom being sought? By this time I was again studying the Bible and had never really lost my belief in prayer, even though many other things had experienced their shaking and siftings and questionings.

Every material perfection appeared in that Institution. Every device for the physical progress and advancement of the hundreds of students, but where was there any sign of "Seeking first the Kingdom"? If one mentioned God, the Bible, or sometimes even Browning, they were opposed by the growingly large group of pupils who were being dominated by the rising tide of Atheism.

The heart grew faint, it sickened at the very perfection of these externalities on one hand and the absence on the other, of any means for the quickening of the inner Spirit of those young people who were supposedly fitting themselves for "Life."

I loved my work. Some of the students both boys and girls were my real friends, and we often gathered to discuss these and other matters. They were apparently just as much at sea as I was.

Although outwardly every comfort and luxury surrounded me, life became unbearable. It was as though I had lungs but was not breathing thru them. I felt that I would suffocate. So, early each morning I went farther out into the country with my favorite copy of Emerson, Browning and sometimes my New Testament to seek a union with Reality—with God. I left behind me the man-made institution as I sought Divine Tuition.

The Spiritual unrest could not be conquered and my soul cried out to "Go forth and find God. A God that could be understood, be revered, be loved and served, and also of whom I could speak without fear of misunderstanding.

My resignation took effect at the end of the College year, and another door immediately opened as it always does, to the sincere seeker.

The six weeks that followed were spent in the mountains with two kindred souls, man and wife, who were equally aware of the lacks in Education at that time.

The "Harvest" of those Mountain-weeks could never be written. Suffice it to say that a simple Educational Plan was worked out which was founded upon the pedagogy of the New Testament and provided an opportunity for the whole of life to be developed, naturally and unconsciously. It still stands, carrying on its splendid and unostentatious work in the upbuilding of nobility and spirituality among some of the best of the Youth of America.

Notwithstanding the joy in this pioneer work which I served with all that was in me for five years, I was not satisfied, and my search continued.

WHILE STILL there, one day, a devoted servant of the Bahá'í Cause came as a guest to that spot, and that same evening delivered the Message of Bahá'u'lláh to a group of seventy-five men, women, and young people who gathered together for that purpose in a New England Barn, where once hay had been stored.

Here at last was a religion that was in perfect accord with Science and Reason! This was the next step in Spiritual Evolution! Here was a program that provided the "Remedy" for the ailments of the body-politic! Something that was not tearing other religions down in order to build itself up. A "Universal Outlook" that brought order out of chaos and utilized all Truth that had been given to man since the human journey began without carrying forward its superstitions and imaginations.

As I listened intently my questions were answered, my longings were satisfied and I knew that after much wandering I had found my "Home". That the battered ship had at last found its "Port".

Very distinctly was I conscious of a great nearness to my dear Father and Mother who apparently were exhorting me to listen, that this was the Truth which I had sought. A strange realization came to me that with an inner ear I was listening to something that I knew all about before I was born.

The Bahá'í speaker became as a door thru which the Soul entered,—and—it beheld only "The Light"!

In later chapters it will be my great joy to "cruise" upon the Ocean of the Love of God, sharing with you incidents and stories that will reveal the ecstasy and joy of finding—and meeting face to face the "Beloved" of all the Worlds.

"Whatsoever question thou hast in thy heart, turn thou thy heart toward the Kingdom of Abha and entreat at the Threshold of the Almighty and reflect upon that problem, then unquestionably the light of truth shall dawn and the reality of that problem will become evident and clear to thee. For the teachings of His Highness Bahá'u'lláh are the keys to all the doors."

CHINA AND AMERICA IN HAWAII

MUI KING CHOW

This is part of an address delivered by Mr. Mui at a Pan-Pacific Program in Honolulu. Mr. Mui is Chinese Consul in Honolulu. He has been a student in Lingnan University, Canton; the University of Chicago; the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Oberlin. He has a remarkable record for achievement.*

HINA and Hawaii are several thousands of miles apart. Commercially, these two lands have grown closer and closer together during the past century. The Pan-Pacific Union, as we all know, is an organization which aims to develop international good-will and friendly cooperation among the nations bordering this greatest of oceans, the Pacific. Needless for me to repeat here that the past records and accomplishments, especially those important conferences of the Pan-Pacific Union, are highly praised by people of every land. May I take this opportunity to pay my high respects to Mr. Alexander Hume Ford, founder of this notable organization.

Modern scientific means of communication and modern scientific experiments have not yet eliminated all of the obstacles to a perfect international understanding and goodwill. False pride and prejudice of one particular nation or against one particular race cannot, and must not survive. Prejudice, after all, is nothing but a by-product of ignorance and misunderstanding; ignorance of the custom and cultures of others; misunderstanding of things which may appear to us casually or at random. Below the veneer of the outward appearance of things, however, we can always see, if we are to possess a genuine spark of what has been called "The International Mind," that human beings, irrespective of their race or nationality, are more alike than they are different. Into walls we must and should place windows which look out far and wide on the behaviors, concepts and sentiments of our fellow creatures. We must supplant misunderstanding with understanding; we must substitute tolerance for intolerance. If from time to time we seek to understand and appreciate the customs, modes of living and all other things that pertain to the national life of another country or another people, we are rendering valuable service to the cause of international goodwill and international friendship. It is in this respect that I consider myself exceptionally fortunate, in behalf of the people of the Republic of China to bring to you their greetings and their message of goodwill.

China has been interpreted in a thousand and one ways by various observers. But whether their interpretation has been reasonable or ridiculous, one thing seems to be certain: that is, that China will eventually play a spectacular role in world politics and in international commerce and trade.

During the past two decades, China has been fighting for a republican form of government, based upon Dr. Sun Yat Sen's "Three

*Reprinted from the Mid-Pacific Magazine.

Principles of the People," which aim to secure for China a position of independence and equality among the nations, and to establish in China a government of the people, by the people and for the people. Much blood has been shed so that these principles may triumph. China now stands at the threshold of a new era, its era of reconstruction. China today is fighting for international and social justice and is equally opposed to imperialism on one hand and communism on the other. The Chinese people are willing to fight and die for these principles. With this new spirit imbued in the minds of the present generation, just as surely as the sun will rise in the East, so surely shall China play a significant part in the affairs of the world and in the society of nations.

Now let us see what role China assumes in the field of international commerce. We all know that the whole world is suffering from economic depression. Over-production is the order of the day. To remedy this disease it is imperative to have new outlets for things produced, that is, to find new markets. The greatest undeveloped market in the world awaits you in China, if you care to take advantage of it. In spite of all sorts of impediments and a world slump in trade, the commerce of China has steadily increased. That she can consume a good portion of things overproduced by other nations is beyond any question of doubt. Not long ago several trade commissions visited China from foreign countries for the purpose of securing Chinese trade. In order to use China as a market for their surplus goods, however, foreign nations should obtain the goodwill of the Chinese.

As you know, friendship between China and the United States, and particularly the Hawaiian Islands, has been more than cordial. As far back as 1789 Chinese landed in Hawaii. Commercial relations have ever since then been established between China and the Islands. According to a recent survey, out of 583 retail stores in Honolulu, 281 are operated by Chinese, and these range from grocery stores to banking institutions. Statistics show that there are 300 Hawaiian-born Chinese teachers here in the public grade schools, high schools and universities who are all helping to build Hawaii's progress and prosperity.

Theodore Roosevelt once said, "The Mediterranean era died with the discovery of America; the Atlantic era is now at the height of its development, and must soon exhaust the resources at its command; the Pacific era, destined to be the greatest of all, is just at its dawn."

Hawaii, situated in the middle of the Pacific, at the ocean's crossroads of American civilization, is helping to establish this new era in the history of mankind for linking the Orient and the Occident in a bond of international friendship and goodwill. The Chinese people are eager and anxious to contribute their share to the development of this bond and to assist in blending the two cultures and two civilizations into a harmonious whole.

THE UNIVERSAL GRAVEYARD

WAR is a grievous calamity. It begins and ends in disaster . . . What is this land, this earth? Is it not this: that for a few years we live on this earth, then it becomes our grave, our cemetery? Eternally shall we be beneath it. Now is it beneficial or kind to engage in war and strife for an eternal cemetery? Many generations have come and have lived for a short time on this earth and are buried under it. It is the universal graveyard of humanity. Is it praiseworthy that we engage in warfare, shedding blood, destroying homes, pillaging the wealth of nations and killing little children . . . ? Is it worthy that we sacrifice eternal life and the everlasting soul of man for the sake of a little dust?

“There is no doubt that God is displeased with this. There is no doubt that the perfect man will not approve. Justice and equity will not permit it.”

“Praise be to God, all the people who have accepted the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are peace lovers and are ready to sacrifice their lives and forfeit their fortunes for it. Now let this standard be hoisted in the West, and many shall respond to the call. Just as America has become renowned because of her discoveries, inventions and skill, famous for the equity of her government and colossal undertakings, may she also become noted for the Most Great Peace . . . Like unto a spirit this ideal (Universal Peace) must run and circulate through the veins and arteries of the body of the world. There is no doubt that this wonderful democracy will be able to realize it and the banner of international agreement will be unfurled here to spread onward and outward among all the nations of the world.”

The Holy Spirit is the only power which will ultimately unite and harmonize the races and nations of the world. The Cause of God is the only panacea which will heal for all time to come the social, economic and political diseases of mankind. . . . Human power is limited in its influence. . . . But the divine power unites nations and peoples and cements them together in the bond of brotherhood and peace for ages and cycles.
—'Abdu'l-Bahá.

"I DO NOT pose as a preacher, but let me tell you," said Mr. Edison to Mr. Babson, "that if there is a God He will not let us advance much further materially until we catch up spiritually. A great fundamental law of science is that all forces must be kept in balance. When any force goes off on a tangent, there is a smash."

A very remarkable statement by Sir Arnold Wilson discloses the true cause of the present world crisis. He said, "The tendency to extol and exalt a standard of living which is purely cerebral is the cause of much unhappiness and discontent. A purely intellectual standard of life entails misery, futility, and eventual decadence."

Therein we find the trouble with our present civilization—that it is an expression too much of the purely intellectual powers of man devoid of moral and spiritual responsibilities. Never before have the rational powers of the human race so fully expressed themselves in every phase of living. Analysis revealing faults and limitations in accustomed implements or methods have been followed with almost magical celerity by inventions to replace these outmoded forms of human activity. Never has the intellect of man so shone, so penetrated into every region of living. By this means there has been accomplished an enormous acceleration in material progress. Also in the field of theoretical science, man's marvelous vision has accomplished seeming miracles in the way of discoveries concerning the universe.

But for one thing, humanity might well be tempted to take Reason as its god and say, "See what with Reason we have been able to accomplish! We have conquered the earth, we have conquered the water, we have conquered the air, we have penetrated even the depths of the universe. We know of what stuff the sun and stars are composed; we have unveiled the distant stars and know their mass, their degree of heat. Through Reason we have made life comfortable for all and surrounded it with instruments of beauty and of joy. What more can be asked?"

But for one thing we might say all this—that one thing is the crash of all our economic, social and political institutions due to the failure of the "god" Reason to rule the emotions of men and control their motives. With every individual a self-seeker, using the full powers of the intellect to attain his selfish desires, what could be expected save conflict and chaos?

Reason has shown its power to order the material universe, but it has completely failed to organize the human family. Here Reason has shown itself but an instrument to be used by man's powerful will for the exploitation of his fellowmen.

As some one has recently stated in public utterance, the cause of all this confusion and upset of the world today is man's greed. This is true. What institutions can permanently be built upon such principles of action? Greed will vitiate the noblest edifice conceived by the intellect of man.

Now if the intellect proves unable to cope with the selfish or evil desires of man—rather even lending itself to those desires as accomplice and particeps criminis—what force is there that can rule the apparently ungovernable emotions of man?

The prophets and teachers of humanity have come from epoch to epoch for but one purpose—to teach man, both individually and collectively, how to sublimate his emotions and how to regulate his desires in such a way as to motivate social action and make possible the building of humane institutions and a stable civilization. For be it known that no institutions, no civilization can be stable unless erected upon humanitarian foundations.

These prophets—Moses, Buddha, Christ, Muhammad—have ever had a titanic task before them in seeking to awaken and stimulate the better part of man to control his life. Individual man would much rather go on expressing the self-seeking side of his nature, which is the natural side inherited from the brute that man once was. All the momentum of the past, all the desire—nature of the present impels man to self-seeking, to self-indulgence, to self-pleasure. What a stupendous force, then, had to be exerted by these Great Teachers of humanity in order to lift men up to higher levels of motivation, of action. This force, however, was not exerted aggressively; on the contrary. Christ ascended the cross in order to lift man's gaze and motives upward.

FOR A TIME after the appearance and mission of these Prophets, humanity has built noble institutions expressing unselfishness, devotion, obedience to the divine laws for a universal humanity. But in time the force human selfishness has undermined all this building, all this structure of the perfect civilization. Man's intellect, making alliance with his exploitive desires, has known how to vitiate all the foundations built upon the spiritual concepts of the Manifestations. Still claiming to be adherents of a Buddha, a Moses, a Christ, men in the latter stages of a religion have been able to express purely selfish and cruel motives without running the risk of being denied fellowship of the Faith—a thing which could not possibly have happened in the early days of a religion.

Muhammad, Omar and other Caliphs in the early days of Islam took strenuous measures to preserve democracy; to prevent exploitation; to assure justice and equal opportunity to the individual. This same thing is true of the early days of Christianity, or Buddhism, of any world religion. When the motives of religion are powerful, they are able to overrule the motives of the Self, and to bring together into a noble pattern the capabilities of multitudinous humans. It is only when the spiritual motives wane that the Self dare step forward to dominate the life of society.

WHEN things have reached such a pass as they are in today, religious institutions proving unavailable to cope with the forces of selfishness that prevail upon the planet, what cure is available? One may easily deduce from the experiences of the past that there is no possible cure except a spiritual renaissance. Again we face the need of a great spiritual message to humanity capable of sweeping us off our feet and carrying us on broad streams of enthusiasm to oceans of universal love, harmony and peace.

I see nothing else on the horizon capable of doing this. All the analyses of economists, of sociologists, of statesmen, all the preachments of moralists—will have no more avail on the structure and trend of present-day civilization than did the satires of Roman poets upon a decadent Rome.

For be it noted, the efforts of said economists, sociologists, statesmen, moralists, are purely intellectual. They remain in the realm of the Reason only, and so are completely ineffective in the realm of the emotions. It is within the capability of any intelligent person today to proclaim to the whole world its faults and what the right course of action should be. But this intellectual analysis of the situation is entirely futile in any effort to actually persuade man into the right course of action.

THUS WE FACE a gloomy prospect, man's intellect standing as futile and helpless spectator of the disintegration going on, the chaos approaching, the downfall of an ancient culture as tragic as the "Twilight of the Gods" portrayed in Wagner's "Gotterdammerung." Nay, this very intellect of man, which sees the terrors approaching, is strangely enough one of the factors of this very cataclysm, as has been shown above.

No force, no power, can save man but the awakening of his soul to the eternal realities, to obedience of the divine commands for unity, love and unselfishness. These things have been said before, but they have to be said again for today. And as if Destiny knew the situation which was to arrive in this Twentieth Century, it has been preparing already the cure for the disease. There exists at the very moment of our present social, economic and political cataclysm, a spiritual movement so dynamic, so powerful, that it is already effecting a miraculous change in the motives and conduct of man both individually and collectively.

The Bahá'í Movement, as revealed by Bahá'u'lláh, not only enumerates the spiritual principles by which human organization in all its phases must be guided; but it has in its brief history given ample evidence of its power to affect the human behavior—to sublimate man's emotion and inspire noble action. We see it overcoming the bitterness of racial and religious prejudice. We see it, wherever operating, binding men and women together in a truly cooperative community. We see a marvelous new law for human activities revealed and practiced for the first time, that of consultation—a group effort in which all personal motives are eliminated and prayerful group-guidance becomes the basis for all action. We see, in fact, a miniature Utopia being built upon the present wrecks of civilization; a Utopia not chimerical, not quixotic, but so responsible, so solid in its foundations, so powerful in its effects as to arouse the deepest interest of all who sincerely investigate.

Every new movement makes its early stages of growth during the life and dominant power of old established institutions into which it is born; the new and growing movement overlapping, as it were, the old and decadent movements of humanity. Thus Christianity was moulding the hearts and consciences of men and controlling their social organizations for three centuries in the midst of the old order, building quietly for the new before it could become publicly effective. So the Bahá'í Movement for almost a century has been quietly working in the hearts and consciences of individuals representatives of all the races and creeds. Only lately have these individuals been joined in world administration for the purpose of more effective action.

The time is rapidly approaching when this new structure based upon divine foundations will give evidence to the world of its power to house the culture of the future. More and more, as men and women despairingly realize the lassitude and effeteness of present culture modes, will they turn for illumination and inspiration to the new modes being created by the potent message of Bahá'u'lláh to humanity.

“Today the world of humanity is walking in darkness because it is out of touch with the world of God. That is why we do not see the signs of God in the hearts of men. The power of the Holy Spirit has no influence. When a divine spiritual illumination becomes manifest in the world of humanity, when divine instruction and guidance appear, then enlightenment follows, a new spirit is realized within, a new power descends and a new life is given. It is like the birth from the animal kingdom into the kingdom of man. When man acquires these virtues, the oneness of the world of humanity will be revealed, the banner of international peace will be upraised, equality between all mankind will be realized and the Orient and Occident will become one. The lights of the love of God will shine; eternal happiness will be unveiled; everlasting joy and spiritual delight will be attained. Then this material, phenomenal world will become the mirror of the world of God and within this pure mirror the divine virtues of the realm of might will be reflected.”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá

THE TWO PATHWAYS

FROM the time of the creation of Adam to this day there have been two pathways in the world of humanity—one the natural or materialistic, the other the religious or spiritual. The pathway of nature is the pathway of the animal realm. The animal acts in accordance with the requirements of nature, follows its own instinct and desires. Whatever its impulses and proclivities may be it has the liberty to gratify them; yet it is a captive of nature. It cannot deviate in the least degree from the road nature has established. It is utterly minus spiritual susceptibilities, ignorant of divine religion and without knowledge of the kingdom of God.

“One of the strangest things witnessed is that the materialists of today are proud of their natural instincts and bondage. They state that nothing is entitled to belief and acceptance except that which is sensible or tangible. By their own statements they are captives of nature, unconscious of the spiritual world, uninformed of the divine kingdom and unaware of heavenly bestowals.

“The second pathway is that of religion, the road of the divine kingdom. It involves the acquisition of praiseworthy attributes, heavenly illumination and righteous actions in the world of humanity. This pathway is conducive to the progress and uplift of the world. It is the source of human enlightenment, training and ethical improvement; the magnet which attracts the love of God because of the knowledge of God it bestows. This is the road of the holy Manifestations of God for they are in reality the foundation of the divine religion of oneness. There is no change or transformation in this pathway. It is the cause of human betterment, the acquisition of heavenly virtues and the illumination of mankind.

“Alas! that humanity is completely submerged in imitations and unrealities notwithstanding the truth of divine religion has ever remained the same.”

SENATOR BORAH INTERVIEWED ON PRESENT WORLD CONDITIONS

HOWARD C. IVES

ONE of the most pleasant and inspiring experiences connected with my recent visit to Washington was a half hour talk with Honorable William E. Borah, United States Senator from Idaho, Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. His response to my request for an interview was most cordial, and I looked forward with intense interest and pleasure to meeting him in his office in the Capitol building.

I began by saying that I wished to assure him, speaking unofficially for many of my friends in the Bahá'í Movement for world peace and religious and national unity, that we appreciated his endeavors to keep our government free from entanglements with European political imbroglios. That we considered America to be the one hope of the world, and that the time may be near at hand when our independence of foreign complications would be our greatest strength in our endeavors to establish international peace, harmony and justice.

"What is it that you wish to ask me?" he inquired.

I showed him the Bahá'í Magazine and briefly explained the objects towards which we are working, and said: "We would like to have your opinion on the present world conditions. What hope do you see of a successful termination to the Disarmament Conference to be held in Geneva, opening next week? And especially how, in your opinion, will world affairs be affected by Japan's present attitude towards China and the Covenants to which she is a signatory?

"Regarding your last question," he said with the most serious emphasis, "the present situation in Manchuria and now in China proper in the Shanghai region, is a very grave one." (Japan had begun her operations against Shanghai only a day or two before this conversation.) "The outcome no one can possibly predict, but it is evident that within the last few weeks there has occurred a practical breaking down of all the peace machinery built up by statesmen and well-wishers of humanity in the past ten years. The fact of the matter is," he went on, "that the Treaty of Versailles was not a Peace Treaty at all, but was really a document which perpetuated the envy, rivalry and hatred which was the cause of the war in the first place. Not until that Treaty is revised or discarded in favor of some just and equitable international agreement can we hope for a durable peace in the world.

"Another reason for the many smouldering fires in world affairs is the perpetual economic unrest due to the unstable condition created and kept alive by the reparations and war-debt questions. We are, of course, justly entitled to the payment of the war debts. But we are far more interested, in my judgment, in the economic recovery of the world and escape from this awful depression. What does a two hundred fifty million dollar payment a year benefit our farmers, our business men, our working men, compared with the benefit which they would receive with better markets, better business and higher wages? What our people want and need and what all the world needs is economic stability; harmonious commercial relations; the revival of trade and commerce. For myself, I am perfectly willing, when I see a program which to me seems to insure economic rehabilitation of the world, I shall be perfectly willing to use the debts as a part of our program."

When I suggested that any settlement of this question seemed remote so long as our government maintained its position of refusing to consider as one issue these two questions of reparations and war debts, he responded:

"If we could be sure that the European governments would cancel all reparations and drastically reduce armaments, I would not hesitate myself to make the cancellation of our debts a part of the program. I do not know how our government would look upon the matter, but personally, I would regard the benefits to be derived to our own people far in excess of any benefits to be derived in the payment of the debts. But when I say this, it must be understood that the cancellation of all reparations and the reduction of armaments are pre-requisites to any successful program."

When I remarked that in view of the many and forcibly expressed opinions on the part of influential men in the executive and legislative branches of our government, absolutely repudiating any possibility of confusing these two issues—war debts and reparations—he made a remark which revealed the fundamental straightforwardness and simple reasonableness of his mind, and explained largely the respect and honor in which he is held.

"It seems to me self-evident," he said, "and it has been repeatedly demonstrated as well-founded by my life's experience in state affairs, that anything which seems to me, or to you, right and just as individuals, and which is the carefully considered judgment of a sane and normal mind, would, if presented at the bar of public opinion, ninety-nine times out of every hundred, meet with the same judgment. I feel convinced," he added, "that we shall ultimately have to come to some arrangement which will remove this terrible burden from the minds and hearts, as well as from the backs, of the German people and from the debtor nations of the world if we are ever to hope to regain our lost position in the respect and affection of the peoples of the world, or to aid in the establishment of a lasting peace."

He expressed himself as unalterably opposed to the principle of the application of force to establish or conserve peace between sovereign nations. This in answer to my question as to why two or three strong nations would not be justified in bringing armed pressure to bear upon any nation which violated its treaty obligations so flagrantly as to endanger world peace, and refused to bring its disagreements with a sister nation before the League of Nations.

"This very question," replied

Senator Borah, "came up before the Fathers of our country when they were deliberating whether our National Constitution should provide that the Supreme Court have power to enforce its decisions against a sovereign state. Madison and Hamilton stood out against this and it was finally decided not to include any such sanctions in the provisions of the Constitution." He brought forward several instances from our national history to illustrate the power inherent in a just decision on the part of an authorized high tribunal to compel obedience through the force of public opinion.

I briefly laid before him at this point the Plan of Bahá'u'lláh for a World Government, based upon the constitutional authority derived from duly elected representatives popularly chosen from every nation in the world, and providing sanctions authorizing other nations to compel, by means of an international army and fleet, any recalcitrant nation to submit to the adjudication of its differences by the International Tribunal, even if it became necessary utterly to destroy the unjust and warring nation.

"But that," he quickly answered, "is an entirely different matter. I am assuming now that you are talking of a world government, a government which brings under its control and direction all peoples. If it were possible to do a thing of that kind, we would have a wholly different situation from what we have now. But when you speak of an international army and fleet to bring into submission a recalcitrant nation, you are still dealing with different nations, and so long as you have different nations, I do not believe that force can be made effective as a peace measure. The moment you employ force against a sovereign you have war."

PEACE MESSAGE—'Abdu'l-Bahá to Andrew Carnegie

Today the most great service of the Kingdom of God is the promotion of the principle of the unification of mankind, and the establishment of Universal Peace.

"Today the life of mankind and its attainment to everlasting glory depends on its display of effort and exertion in accord with the principles of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh; for His first and foremost teaching consists of the oneness of the world of humanity. He says: "We are all the sheep of God. His Highness, the Almighty is the real Shepherd, and kind to all the sheep. Why, then, should we be unkind toward each other? Another of His most great institutes deals with the subject of Universal Peace, the establishment of which would be conducive to the well-being and progress and tranquillity of the commonwealth of man.

"Today the most important purpose of the Kingdom of God is the promulgation of the Cause of Universal Peace and the principle of the oneness of the world of humanity. Whosoever arises in the accomplishment of this pre-eminent service the confirmation of the Holy Spirit will descend upon him.

"After the war, the workers for the cause of Universal Peace will increase day by day, and the pacific party will array its force, displaying great activity over all the other parties. The realization of this matter is incontestable and irrefragable.

"Therefore, ere long, a vast and unlimited field will be opened before your view for the display of your powers and energies. You must promote this glorious intention with the heavenly power and the confirmation of the Holy Spirit. I am praying in your behalf that you may pitch a pavilion and unfurl a flag in the world of peace, love and eternal life.

OBEDIENCE TO GOVERNMENT

The Divine Plan for the New World Order indicated by Bahá'u'lláh is the one which will solve all national and international questions when the people of the world are ready, themselves, to follow it. Bahá'is, being taught to conform to the laws of the country in which they live, devote themselves to bringing about the New World Order by endeavoring to create public opinion along broad lines.

WE have commanded the Most Great Peace, which is the greatest means for the protection of mankind. The rulers of the world must, in one accord, adhere to this command which is the main cause for the security and tranquility of the world. They (Rulers) are day-springs of the power and dawning-places of the authority of God. We beg of God to assist them in that which is conducive to the peace of the servants * * *

In every country or government where any of this community reside (the Bahá'is) they must behave toward that government with faithfulness, trustfulness and truthfulness.

In this day it is incumbent and obligatory upon all to adhere to that which is conducive to the progress and elevation of the just government and people * * *

O people of God! Be not occupied with yourselves. Be intent on the betterment of the world and the training of nations. The betterment of the world can be accomplished through pure and excellent deeds, and well approved and agreeable conduct.

This oppressed one hath forbidden the people of God to engage in strife and conflict, and summoned them to good deeds and to spiritual and pleasing morals . . . We have forbidden all to work sedition and strife; and ordain that victory be gained only through commemoration and explanation.

From the Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh

THE BAHÁ'Í PEACE PROGRAM AND DISARMAMENT

BERTHA HYDE KIRKPATRICK

"We desire but the good of the world and the happiness of the nations; yet they deem us a stirrer-up of strife and sedition worthy of bondage and banishment. . . . That all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers; . . . that diversity of religion should cease and differences of race be annulled—what harm is there in this? . . . Yet so it shall be; these fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away, and the 'Most Great Peace' shall come."

HE above words were spoken by Bahá'u'lláh to Professor E. G. Brown of Cambridge University, England, in 1890.

Who was Bahá'u'lláh? Outwardly and to the world He was and had been for well nigh thirty years an exile from His native country of Persia and a prisoner of the Turkish government because, as Bahá'u'lláh said "they deem us a stirrer-up of strife and sedition worthy of bondage and banishment." On the other hand, Professor Brown, recounting this same visit, said: "No need to ask in whose presence I stood as I bowed myself before One who is the object of a devotion and love which kings might envy and emperors sigh for in vain."

What did Bahá'u'lláh mean by the "Most Great Peace"? Let us look further for the answer to this question.

There is a book entitled "The Promulgation of Universal Peace." It is bound in two good-sized volumes containing in all some five hundred pages. Let us turn the leaves of this book. We find it is a compilation of addresses given in 1912 in leading cities of the United States. The addresses were given before diversified groups, some in churches of various denominations, in Jewish temples, before women's clubs, in hotels and private homes, before the rich, the humble and lowly, the educated and unlettered.

Who was it who traveled from coast to coast in 1912 speaking so frequently and tirelessly before such diverse groups, both colored and white, both Jewish and Christian, both humble and distinguished? The title page tells us that it was 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Son of Bahá'u'lláh. The introduction tells us more about 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Read it if you would know more of this distinguished personage, Who, having been with His Father a prisoner of the Turkish government from young manhood to an advanced age, with no opportunity for schooling, upon His release from prison traveled throughout Europe and America raising the call to universal peace.

The mission of Bahá'u'lláh was to establish the foundations of world peace. He appointed 'Abdu'l-Bahá to carry on this work and especially to interpret the teachings of His Father to the Western World. In carrying out this mission 'Abdu'l-Bahá traveled and taught throughout Europe and America.

One of the first things that impresses us as we glance through the pages of the book is the variety of subjects covered. A paragraph from a letter which 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote in 1919 to the Central Organization for a Durable Peace at The Hague helps us to understand this diversity of topics. He wrote:

"But the wise souls who are aware of the essential relationships emanating from the realities of things consider that one single matter cannot, by itself, influence the human mind as it ought and should, for until the minds of men become united, no important matter can be accomplished. At present Universal Peace is of great importance, but unity of conscience is essential, so that the foundation of this matter may become secure, its establishment firm, and its edifice strong."

II

'ABDU'L-BAHÁ was aiming at the root causes of war when He said that "one single matter" was not enough to bring about universal peace. This helps us to understand why 'Abdu'l-Bahá sometimes spoke directly on peace; sometimes on the true unity of science and religion; sometimes on the oneness of mankind; sometimes on the oneness of all religions; again on the just solution of the economic problems or the necessity of abandoning all prejudice—racial, national, religious; or on the independent investigation of truth; the equality of men and women; a universal language; universal education; an international tribunal; the reality of man or the Holy Spirit.

Notice that 'Abdu'l-Bahá speaks in the passage above quoted of "the wise souls who are aware of the essential relationships emanating from the realities of things." In the mind of 'Abdu'l-Bahá Who truly understood the "realities of things" and Who inspired others with some of this understanding, there was a close connection between all these subjects. They were related to each other and to world peace. Let us try for a few moments to be among those wise souls who are aware of these essential relationships.

It is not difficult to see the very close connection between a realization of the oneness of humanity and universal peace. Suppose for a moment that His principles were actually believed and lived in the world. Where would be the Manchurian problem, the Franco-German problem, the Balkan problem, — to mention only a few of our danger spots? Let the reader not be misled by these words. The followers of Bahá'u'lláh do not think that mere belief in the oneness of mankind is sufficient to solve such difficult problems as those mentioned above. They do believe that when sufficient numbers of mankind are so sincerely and profoundly filled with the realization that peoples of other nations and races have the same needs and feelings as themselves that noble men will arise with a determination to solve these problems. With such unity of purpose and love of mankind the wise of the earth will be able to solve most difficult problems. At present the selfish interests of each nation prevent us from working out these vexed questions.

CLOSELY associated with the oneness of mankind is the principle of Bahá'u'lláh that all kinds of prejudice must be abolished. National race and religious prejudices have always been a source of contention and war. With the belief and practice of the oneness of humanity such prejudices must and will disappear. Furthermore, the just and righteous solution of economic problems, those problems which today are leading to strikes, class warfare, and untold deprivation and suffering and are dividing the whole world into two opposing camps, will obviously be brought about when with a feeling of true brotherhood we resolutely set ourselves to solve them. When our hearts overflow with love for all humanity it will be impossible for any to enjoy luxury knowing that our brothers lack necessities.

This relationship between world peace and economic problems is indeed recognized by thoughtful people. In the December issue of the "World Tomorrow," W. E. B. DuBois says:

"If you are thorough-going, if you mean the overthrow of the idea of war, . . . then the defenders of militarisms see and see with perfect truth that the main foundations of present international commerce will be overthrown. And the stream of profit from Asia and Africa will be cut down, perhaps destroyed. In other words, real pacifism as compared with piecemeal disarmament, means that Europe and America must give up their exploitation of wealth from the poor of the world and live upon their own labor and industry and upon a fair exchange with peoples who are able to bargain because they are free and uncowed by armies, navies and airplanes."

In the same magazine Richard Cabot gives a hint as to how to get rid of national prejudice:

"To advance the cause of peace and to make war less likely, two essential things must be done. One, which is the duty of only a portion of our population, is to cooperate in every way, as opportunity offers, with people of other nations in order that by cooperating with them we shall learn to be less touchy, more appreciative. . . . The other thing that we can do and that is open to all, is to exalt the virtues and pardon the errors of other peoples. . . . Truth, that is the understanding of other people as they are and as they see themselves, is far more important than exhortations or the passing of resolutions or writing to our congressmen, because truth alone can make us free."

OUR GREAT scientists are lending their aid to the "Most Great Peace" by giving us glimpses of greater truths than we have known, thus giving hope that the centuries-old conflict between science and religion which has been at the root of so much persecution and conflict is about to come to an end, and to come to an end, too, without the death of religion. Truth is one and not multiple and since both science and religion seek truth they must ultimately agree.

Another principle closely associated with universal peace according to Bahá'í teaching, is the recognition of the equality between men and women. This is because the human race cannot progress to its greatest development on one wing alone. God has designed two wings of equal importance, man and woman, by which mankind is to soar to his greatest achievements. The appointment of President Mary E. Woolley of Mt. Holyoke College to be one of the three who are to represent the United States in the Disarmament Conference to be held at Geneva in February indicates that the wise ones of the earth are beginning to realize that womankind may have something to contribute to peace that man does not.

Of paramount importance and associated with the idea of the genuine equality of men and women is the necessity of universal education. All classes must receive education according to their capacity, and boys and girls must have the same advantages. Indeed, if both the boy and girl cannot be equally educated the girl should have the preference because she is the potential educator and trainer of the next generation. When we realize the importance that 'Abdu'l-Bahá puts upon spiritual education as a part of His educational program and that knowledge and wisdom are at the basis of all progress then we see how near this principle, too, is to the peace movement.

Again of great importance and associated with universal education is the need of an international language which shall be auxiliary to one's native tongue. This will aid in mutual understanding as well as save a great deal of time and labor which at present are expended in translating and interpreting or learning other languages. In regard to this 'Abdu'l-Bahá states:

"Unless the unity of languages is realized, the oneness of the human world cannot be effectively organized and established; because the function of language is to portray the mysteries and secrets of human hearts. The heart is like a box and language is the key. . . . Therefore the question of an auxiliary international tongue has the utmost importance. Through this means, international education and training become possible; the evidence and history of the past can be acquired. . . . Therefore the very first service to the world of man is the establishment of this auxiliary international means of communication. It will become the cause of the tranquillity of the human commonwealth."

Finally, when we consider the root causes of antagonism and war and the means of bringing about peace we find that an absolute necessity and a basis of all these principles already mentioned is the need of a universal religion. In smaller or larger groups religion is now a cause of unity and there are many movements towards greater religious unity, but it is still true that members of different religions misunderstand each other, dislike and even hate each other. Witness the recent clashes between Jews and Muslims in Palestine and between Muslims and Hindus in India. Indeed certain students and statesmen consider that religious intolerance renders governmental problems well nigh insoluble in these countries. The Crusades and the Inquisition are but two examples of bitter bloodshed in the past caused by religious intolerance. There have been and are a few scattered groups and individuals who have believed a universal religion possible, but the majority of people today who give the matter any thought think that the best we can do is to get people to tolerate or possibly appreciate other people's religions. Bahá'u'lláh taught us that all religions in their purity have one foundation, that there is but one religion when we understand the true meaning of religion; that great Prophets have come from time to time whose mission it was to renew religion, to teach people again pure religion. Differences in religion are man-made and have crept in in spite of the pure teachings of the Founders, or sometimes they have grown out of the nonessential teachings which were in accord with the needs of the times. Bahá'u'lláh came to unite all under the canopy of one universal religion.

III

THUS WE see faintly the meaning of the "Most Great Peace." Bahá'u'lláh has given us directions for such fundamental changes in governments, institutions, habits and proceedings in general as to bring about a new world order. This is what the Bahá'í Movement means. This is what Bahá'ís are working for. In this new world order religion is not a thing apart from life but a way of life. Religion is life. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá expresses it: "Religion is the essential connection which proceeds from the realities of things." That is, true religion underlies all the proceedings of our lives and our relationships with each other. Mankind, both individually and collectively as nations, is constantly weaving patterns as he lives. If true religion forms the warp on the loom of life, we shall weave beautiful patterns which will be for "the good of the world and the happiness of the nations." Then all our occupations, institutions and endeavors proceeding in fact from the realities of things—the truth of things—will bring about a new world order in which justice and righteousness will prevail. This is the "Most Great Peace."

Is such a world order wherein righteousness shall rule an idle dream? How can such stupendous changes be brought about? "Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith Jehovah of hosts." 'Abdu'l-Bahá speaks thus:

"It is evident that no means but an ideal means, a spiritual power, divine bestowals and the breaths of the Holy Spirit will heal this world sickness of war, dissension and discord. Nothing else is possible; nothing can be conceived of. But through spiritual means and the divine power it is possible and practicable."

This subject of the power of the Holy Spirit is another topic upon which 'Abdu'l-Bahá often spoke. Is this connected with universal peace?

THE PRESENT machinery and organization for bringing about and maintaining world peace is generally recognized as inadequate. Bahá'u'lláh advocated a League of Nations and World Court, but some of the conditions which He laid down are still unfulfilled. Briefly some of these conditions are as follows according to the explanation of 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

1. Some noble rulers of high ambition, shall, for the good and happiness of all the human race, step forth with firm resolution and keen strength of mind and hold a conference on universal peace.

2. Keeping fast hold of the means of enforcing their views, they shall establish a union of the states of the world, and

3. Conclude a definite treaty and alliance between them on conditions not to be evaded

4. The whole human race should be consulted through their representatives and be invited to corroborate this treaty of universal peace.

5. It would be the duty of the united powers of the world to see that this great treaty should be strengthened and should endure.

6. A Supreme Tribunal shall be established by the peoples and governments of every nation, composed of members elected from each country and government. These members should be the elect of the elect.

7. ALL disputes of an international character shall be submitted to this court, its mission being to arrange by arbitration everything which would otherwise be a cause of war. The mission of this tribunal would be to prevent war.

8. By a general agreement all the governments of the world must disarm simultaneously.

9. The size of the armaments allowed each government should be definitely agreed upon. Armaments sufficient for a police force would be allowed.

10. If one of the states should break any of the articles of alliance the rest of the nations of the world should rise up and reduce it to submission.

Are such conditions impossible? Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá lived long lives of extreme suffering and utter self-abnegation in order to establish both by precept and by practice these principles which are the basis of universal peace. Let me quote again from the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Answering the question whether such things are impossible he said:

"Far from it. For by the grace of God, and by the incomparably high ambitions of the souls that are perfect, and the thoughts and opinions of the wisest men of the age, there never has been and is not now anything improbable and impossible in existence. What are required are the most resolved determination and the most ardent enthusiasm."

CURRENT MYTHOLOGY

MARZIEH K. NABIL

Here is the message of a brilliant graduate student of Leland Stanford University who makes the amazing discovery that the scholars and scientists of today are full of superstitions, as true of them as people of the middle ages. What these amazing superstitions are will be found here described.

A POPULAR modern belief, and one which characterizes the present in every age, is to the effect that our ancestors were benighted people. This idea is paralleled in individual experience—we look back pityingly at our last year's self and wonder how we could have been so inferior to our present exalted condition; and the faults of our present status come to light only in the retrospect of another year. Now it is true that our ancestors were, in comparison with us, benighted, and that their ignorance expressed itself in superstition: they burned witches and before that they practiced black magic, and before that they sat on pillars for years at a time. Whereas, we, benefiting from the encroachments of science on the unknown, realize that life on a pillar is unhealthy, and that even if we did conjure up mountains of gold, they could not solve our economic problem. Speaking from a materialistic standpoint, the average educated man of today, who is not afraid of goblins and does not wear assafoetida around his neck, can look patronizingly on the past and call it benighted, superstitious; scientists have cleared the world of figments, so that roosters can crow now without sending ghosts to their graves again, and the lights that flit over marshy cemeteries are only phosphorus.

And yet, we of the present have our superstitions too, and are bound to fictions infinitely more harmful than those of past ages, because these are mental fictions, rationalizations, supposedly approved by modern wisdom, and therefore not to be sprinkled away with drops of holy water. For example, many educated people imagine that members of other races or communities are inferior, that war is necessary, that individuals may sin without hurting the group, that progress is an illusion; they believe that man is an animal, the universe self-made, and religion a means of quieting the masses; that immortality is only perpetuation in the race, and prayer only an expression of fear, or a demand for a timely violation of natural law; and the basis of their thought is this—that God is a collectively fashioned Goodness, which has evolved from a tree or a star into a depersonalized Idea.

THE LOVE of God, which is the mainspring of the Bahá'í life, and which constitutes that love for humanity whereby the old world is to be made new again, is not a love built up on theories or grown out of fears;—it is not a synthetic philosophy or a refurbished superstition;—it is the adoration which haloes knowledge. This earth today is holy ground, fragrant with the footsteps of One Who has proved for all men to see that God is near us—"Nearer than the jugular vein"—that our lives are His, our deeds accountable to Him, our growth through all His worlds by His permission.

If our ancestors worshipped through faith alone, their faith collapsed with the coming of the new science—their faith which had long since changed to imitation, and functioned only with the impetus of time. The nineteenth century shows us two groups of thinkers: those who, terrified by biological discoveries, withdrew into hermetic orthodoxy; and those, who studied the sciences, lost God, lost immortality, but went down bravely, “with unreluctant tread . . . into the darkness.” These two survive today, except that the glamor has gone from some, and others, like the Phoenician dead, are feeding on dust in a sorrowful city. But this new love of God which has broken into life surrounds the farthest reaches of men’s thoughts; it is a foreshadowing of this which made Bacon feel that he did “but tinkle a little bell . . .” and Newton that he was only playing with pebbles on a shore, and Pupin that “Sound is the voice of God.” It is the love born of the Manifestation of God among men, the perfect human being who reflects to humanity the omniscience, the tenderness, the justice of God.

THE LOVE of God through His Manifestation is not to be lightly assumed and lightly laid aside. It is not a human love, withering to old flowers and faded ribbons. It is the life blood of the soul, without which we cannot develop the higher consciousness which is our existence when the body has died. Those of us who do not strive, through service in the love of God, to form this consciousness, cannot live fully beyond death. As Emerson says in the Journals, we know already whether we are to be immortal; if our life is centered about materialisms, it must cease with death. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says:

“This stone and this man both exist; but the stone in relation to the existence of man is non-existent. . . . In the same way, the souls who are veiled from God, although they exist in this world and in the world after death, are in comparison with the holy existence of the children of the Kingdom of God, non-existing and separated from God.”

Certainly, if our interests are not earthly, they are turned toward reality; ‘Abdu’l-Bahá tells us that the farther we go from one, the nearer we are to the other.

Our modern world is orphaned by its superstition. We must go back to the love of God, to the love that flowers in the world’s springtimes when God walks with us again. We must learn that what men have always hoped is not a makeshift of the human ego, but reality; that God leads us by the hand, and earth is a road to heaven; that our hungering is not in vain, our dreams not the mere wrack of the centuries. We must unite again in the love of our God—

For, lo, the winter is past;
The rain is over and gone.

“A delicate spiritual power is ever exercising an influence over the hearts and minds of men. Why should we abandon the Holy Power which binds us together and cleave to the barbarous traditions which keep us apart?”

—‘Abdu’l-Bahá

CHILDHOOD AND THE RACE QUESTION

LOULIE A. MATHEWS

The author sends us this very interesting material containing the spontaneous expressions of High School youth toward the race problem, as a result of a presentation of the subject by Mr. James H. Hubert, Executive Director of the New York Urban League. This is a rare human document—a revelation of the sincere justice-loving heart of youth.

THE child is unaware of race or class distinctions, dwelling in the state of consciousness to which Jesus called us: "Unless ye become as little children, ye shall not enter into the Kingdom of Heaven." Again in this day Bahá'u'lláh commands us to strike off the fetters of race prejudice and with the searchlight of science to study the origin of man that the intellect may be convinced of the oneness of mankind.

The mind of a little child is enmeshed in imagery, a word or phrase makes an impression entirely different from its real meaning.

Professor William James recalls that his father often read aloud a poem in which the word "barque" was repeated in the refrain, in imagination the boy saw a piece of bark from a certain tree in the garden floating down a stream steered by tiny men in blue jackets. As he appeared to like the poem and asked no questions his father concluded that he understood the words and Professor James adds that the word "barque" always remained connected in his mind with a willow tree no matter how it was spelled.

As a child grows older and reaches adolescence, imagination recedes and reality advances. The yardstick by which he measures values is now the thought of his own generation. He loves, he hates, he decides with great intensity. At this stage of growth, the child's mind is well developed, he has a keen sense of justice and the arena of thought has not been invaded by compromise.

There are many schools of the new age that understand the adolescence period and they are making marvelous use of child psychology. It was to one of these, a high school in northern New York, that Mr. James H. Hubert, Executive Director of the New York Urban League, came to speak to an organization formed in the school on the subject, "The Negro and Race Prejudice." Mr. Hubert touched a sympathetic cord speaking in terms that awoke interest; he created a tie between himself and the students. They asked to be allowed to write, and forthwith a bundle of letters arrived in New York. No mistakes had been corrected but in spite of the limitations imposed by the pen these young jurors handed down an unqualified decision for justice to the Negro.

These letters go straight to the heart of the question. Here we find real response, inner determination towards future action and very real promise for the New Day. They are offered for publication not only as a human document of great interest, they are more than that, they are an inspiration to the adult world, for who can read these sincere epistles, so breathing the air of brotherhood and justice without feeling, himself, a sermon in them. It is as Christ said, "Verily, a little child shall lead them."

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS*

Dear Sir:

"Not alms but opportunity is what the Negro of today is asking. Opportunity for what? Not merely for an opportunity to work—to eat but a chance to play his full part in the making of America along with all the other races.

I am glad that our school has an organization like this one to make it possible for us to come together and discuss such questions as seem to me very important."

Mr. Hubert:

"Everything you said about the Negro was true. We in this part of the country don't realize the condition of the Negroes, because we do not see them as they are in real life, but we can imagine their hardships. Sometimes they are burned at the stake and this is a striking example of the feeling against them. It is well to think now what we can do when we grow up so we can put an end to all their suffering. I don't see why a group of white and colored could not work together just as well as all one color because God made man different shades."

Dear Mr. Hubert:

"Many thoughts have passed through my mind concerning the race question since your talk. I too believe that the colored race should have more opportunities. They might use them to better advantage than some white people do. You impressed on my mind many thoughts which I can not fully express right now but which have benefitted me and made me see what is beyond this town—what is going on in the world and when I grow up I will help you. I want some one to understand me and I know you will. Maybe people don't know about the race question because it has not been explained to them. Couldn't you go around and tell the people? I hope you will write me so I can improve my knowledge on this subject."

Dear Dr. James H. Hubert:

"I received much knowledge on the slave question from your talk. When I go to bed I think about how they should have opportunity and I cannot wait to grow up so I can be of use on this question. This is something worth thinking about and I hate injustice and I mean to fight it with all my might just as soon as I get through school."

Dear Dr. Hubert:

"I learned many things from your lecture. I had no idea that a Negro child could do so much with a dime, a white child can't do much and by the time the colored child had a dollar I should think he would be a merchant. I would like to see him there, for I like people to be treated fair and right."

Dear Dr. Hubert:

"I derived many thoughts from your lecture. My thoughts run like this, God made every man equal, we think we are better than others, but God does not. The thought that flashed through my mind was, does every man know what an opportunity he possesses at the time when he possesses it. I thought about this and I believe that if we could share just alike our chances, one chance for the white boy and one for the colored, maybe we would be surprised to see the Negro come out ahead. We don't understand this matter of opportunity because as white children we have education right in our hand and we think we have nothing. I should like to share my education and chances with a colored boy and I believe I would learn more from giving him half, than from having it all for myself."

*Mr. Hubert courteously consented to the publication of these letters.

Dear Dr. Hubert:

"I was impressed all throughout your talk. I am glad the Negroes are progressing and I suppose they have made discoveries too. Our post office is being constructed by Negroes. You know I never noticed that, but now I am going to speak of it and say, it is beautifully built and then I shall say, do you know why, because the Negroes who are so progressive are at work upon it, and that might help to make people realize what they could do if given opportunity. We are all strong to help in this kind of work."

Dear Mr. Hubert:

"It gave me truer ideas about the Negro than I had. It is a pity that they were ever treated as they were, and made slaves, because it could not last. They ought to have thought about that in the beginning and saved all this trouble. I only see about two Negro boys a day but I am going to ask them right away if they are treated right and if not to call upon me and I will tell the people that did not hear you, just what you said and how we want justice around here and won't stand for anything else. I think some of the states would feel ashamed on Sunday when they read about all men being equal. It is hard for children to understand why people don't act the way they preach. It seems simple enough, but we are not grown up yet."

Dear Friend:

"I was as much touched, as interested by your talk. I picture to myself a frontier as a land in the West that is treeless. People go there for opportunity. There is danger. We must go right into battle—farther and farther into the depths of life to look at things as they are. We don't specially own the land the United States are located on, no one does, but the Indian and therefore any man who is here has as much right as any other man. Colored people are here and they should have the same rights. Our teacher has told us some of the names of great colored people whose names are written down in history. There are white men's names there and it seems to me fine that they can be written down side by side. I wish to get my mind trained on this subject and then make good use of it. Grown people don't explain things clearly and when you ask questions they don't seem to know what to answer, but I want to know and so do the others. We want to do what is just and although it is not very good to fight, I believe justice is one thing worth fighting about. Fair play and never hit a man when he's down is going to be my motto."

Dear Friend:

"Your talk last week made a deep impression on me. How cruel and unjust the white is to his brother, the Negro, and what a surprise as both are Christians. Until the Negro has as big an opportunity as the white man I will not be content.

Before your talk I thought there was no frontier for American Youth but now I know there is. The frontier for us who are growing up will be to conquer race prejudice and give the Negro a chance. This frontier can be conquered. Our ancestors conquered slavery and we can conquer prejudice, and Dr. Hubert, you can just count on me to help go over the top in this cause and win opportunity for the Negro."

BAHA'Í PIONEERS

A Short Historical Survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

SIYYID MUSTAFA ROUMIE

Jamal Effendi, accompanied by the author, Mr. Roumie, during two years of pioneer missionary work in India, found no difficulty in obtaining access to the leading people of many important Indian states including high government officials and rulers themselves. Everywhere Jamal received a warm reception and his message was listened to courteously.

In 1878 they went to Rangoon, where their mission was highly successful. In 1879 they started on an extensive missionary tour of Burma, Mandalay and the chief cities of India. They then undertook a still more distant journey to Singapore, Java and the Celebes Islands where with the primitive people they met with extraordinary adventures and success.

AFTER several minor trips we reached the province of Padalia, ruled by Fatta Chikourdi. When our boat, after a rather alarming trip through a crocodile-infested river, reached the town in which the King resided, his officers met us at the landing and took us to a commodious guest house on the river side. They then presented to us the formal greetings of the King and took in return our greetings to His Majesty. The next day we were summoned to the palace. King Fatta Chikourdi, of Padali and his Queen Diammarala welcomed us warmly and invited us to visit them and have audience with them daily. In our judgment, however, this place was utterly devoid of spiritual souls. The people were not at all interested in our mission, nor did they have capacity, it would seem, for receiving our declaration of the divine dispensation. So we made up our mind to move further on to the province of Boonay as soon as the King should deign to provide us with canoes and other requisites for our trip. We could not of course ask for this immediately as it would be rude to make too short a visit.

As we were waiting an opportunity to tactfully talk of our departure, to our surprise a serious epidemic of smallpox broke out in the principle towns of Padalia. The houses around the palace had many victims, especially among children, and the loss of life was very great. The King felt uneasy about this and asked us to do something to arrest the ravages of the plague. We had no instruments or medical material to handle such a situation. We found ourselves forced, however, to take some steps to oblige the King. I was instructed by Jamal Effendi to procure some ordinary needles, tie them up tight and put them in a small vial together with some ripe scabs from long effected children, adding to this the milk of some woman who was giving suck to a male child. With this I was to vaccinate the children of the province. I carried out the instructions to the letter and later I vaccinated daily upwards of five hundred children. Of these only one per cent died; all the rest were saved by this treatment.

Through this medical work we found opportunity to deliver the Message to all. We were not able to stay long enough however, to prove the results of this missionary activity, for we soon left for the province of Boonay. The King generously supplied us with all the necessary traveling equipment and three long canoes with full escort. He affectionately bade us adieu, and we started down the crocodile-infested river once more. Before sunset we reached our destination and were warmly received by the King and his officials and given the guest house opposite the palace for our residence. After dinner we were invited to the audience chamber where we were received enthusiastically by the King and Queen. In this very first interview we became intimately acquainted with each other, and the King as simply as a child put all sorts of questions to us, both material and spiritual.

With our party, as it happened, was an Arab from the province of Yamen. He happened to journey with us down the river. The King undertook to recite a prayer known in Islam mystical denominations as Jeljelutich. This Arab suddenly interrupted and impertinently attempted to correct the pronunciation of an Arab word in the prayer which the King had, in reality, pronounced correctly. The King, very much annoyed, told him that he was mistaken as to the proper pronunciation; but the Arab, who was quite impolite and rude and even insane in his obstinacy, continued to contradict the King. So irate did the King become that he ordered the Arab put out of the palace, and gave instructions that he should never be admitted again. He then turned to us and asked us if we had brought this monster in our company. We explained the facts as to how he happened to be with us, and the King became appeased.

The King was so attracted by the stirring talks of Jamal Effendi that he kept him answering religious questions until the late hours of the night; in fact, it was not until two o'clock in the morning that we were permitted to retire.

Every day and evening we were now in the audience chamber holding religious conferences with the King, continuing to solve his spiritual problems. After a few days the King asked us to write a handbook in Arabic outlining principles for the administration of his State, as well as a booklet for teaching Arabic colloquial conversation. This gave us an unusual opportunity to present the principles of Bahá'í administration and government to the King, for we based our handbook upon the universal laws of Bahá'u'lláh.

Meanwhile the Arab, really partially insane it would seem, deprived of the privilege of entering the palace turned his grudge upon the writer. It took a good deal of precaution on my part to avoid trouble, but one day as I was working on the manuscript of the handbook above mentioned, the Arab, sitting upon his bed, started to vehemently shake the bamboo floor of the house in such a way as to prevent my writing. Upon my polite request to him to desist, he suddenly appeared quite naked from behind the curtain of his bed and struck me upon the head with a heavy block of wood. Fortunately the Queen, happening to look out from her palace window, saw this attack and informed the King who with a large corps of his followers rushed in and arrested the Arab. He also had my wound treated and dressed. Then he gave orders to have the Arab executed. As Bahá'is, Jamal Effendi and myself both begged the King to forgive the criminal; and after a long entreaty upon my part, it was granted and the order was given that he should not be executed but banished with a criminal record to the Dutch settlement. The King and Queen, great admirers of Jamal Effendi and the writer, kindly permitted us to present to the insane man some gifts for his journey, about ten dollars in cash and five dollars worth of native cloth.
